he British playwright Tom Stoppard once said, "I still believe that if your aim is to change the world, journalism is a more immediate short-term weapon." Yeshiva University is proud to have many alumni who believe that the pen is mightier than the sword and who are changing the world through their written words.

ARI GOLDMAN '71YC: RELIGION AND REPORTING INTRINSICALLY TIED

The decision to attend YU was not a difficult one for Ari Goldman, originally from Hartford, CT. "It was the only school I applied to," he said. His father, Rabbi Marvin Goldman, was a 1944 YC graduate; an uncle, Rabbi Israel Miller, served as the senior vice president of YU; and another uncle, Rabbi Dr. Norman Lamm, was YU's third president.

As a freshman, Goldman joined The Commentator. "From the time my first byline appeared in the Commie, I decided I wanted to be a journalist," he said.

Goldman's fondest memories include those of putting out the paper every two weeks. "This was in the precomputer era, so it was a very labor-intensive process," he explained. "Late at night, we'd pile into cars and head for the printing district in Lower Manhattan, where we'd write headlines, size pictures and lay out the paper, sometimes finishing in the wee hours of the morning."

It wasn't only the Commentator that inspired him. "I also credit Professor Leo Taubes with imbuing me with a love of literature and the belief that I could be a writer someday."

While at YU, Goldman's work on the Commentator led to a gig as a New York Times campus correspondent. After YU, he attended the Columbia University Graduate School of Journalism. When he graduated in 1973, he went to work at the Times as a copy boy, and, from there, worked his way up to news clerk and then to reporter, where he primarily covered the religion beat and also politics, education and transportation.

"When I look back at my body of work at the Times, I realize that many of my stories were incremental, such as the passing of a bill, a budget enacted or a candidate elected," he said. "What seems to be most lasting were the obituaries that I wrote, including obits of Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson and Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach."

Goldman often had to field angry questions from fellow community members, who asked him why the Times printed certain religion stories but chose not to cover others, about its perceived anti-Israel slant and even about articles in sections that had nothing to do with religion or Goldman at all.

Goldman's work has also appeared in the Washington Post, the Forward, The New York Jewish Week and the New York Daily News. He has written three books: the best-selling memoir The Search for God at Harvard, about his year studying religion at Harvard Divinity School; Being Jewish: The Spiritual and Cultural Practice of Judaism Today; and Living a Year of Kaddish. Goldman has also been a Fulbright Professor in Israel and a Skirball Fellow at Oxford University, and sits on the boards of several organizations, including the Jewish Book Council and the Covenant Foundation. He was also a visiting professor for a semester at Stern College for Women.

Goldman began teaching at Columbia University Graduate School of Journalism in 1993, where he is currently the director of the Scripps Howard Program in Religion, Journalism and Spiritual Life. He teaches a popular seminar, Covering Religion, which features an annual trip abroad to places like Israel, Jordan, Russia, Ukraine, India and Ireland. His students have gone on to cover religion in newspapers across the United States.

"I agree with Rabbi Chanina, who says in the Talmud that he learned the most from his students," said Goldman. "My students have opened my eyes to so many new ideas and ways of thinking. What I try to teach my students is not explicitly in the Talmud, but it is certainly rooted there. I tell them to write about other people the way they would like to be written about—with respect, knowledge and sensitivity."

Goldman is excited whenever a YU graduate shows up in his classes at Columbia, and he encourages current students to truly consider a journalism career if they maintain an interest in the field. "Don't be afraid; take chances and do something you love," he said. "Many people told me that I shouldn't be a journalist, and said that I couldn't be observant, that I couldn't make a living. I am glad that I didn't listen to them."

Goldman remains optimistic about the future of journalism. "Too many people complain about the state of journalism, but these young people are going to make it better," he said.

Goldman is married to Shira Dicker and lives in Manhattan. They have three children: Adam, Emma (who is engaged to Michael Goldberg '09YC) and Judah.

SHAYNDI RAICE '05S, '07BR: WALL STREET JOURNAL REPORTER FINDS SCOOPS AND CHALLENGES IN DIFFERENT BEATS

Shayndi Raice '05S, '07BR comes from a longtime YU family. "My family believes strongly that a Jewish education should not stop after high school," she said. With their encouragement, Raice attended YU's Stern College for Women, where she double-majored in Jewish studies and English, with a concentration in journalism.

At Stern, Raice had visions of entering academia until she became involved with the student newspaper, The Observer. "I had written an opinion column that criticized a YU humanitarian mission to Israel for being too political and realized the power of the press," she said. She began writing regularly and, eventually, served as editor-in-chief of the paper in her senior year. She also made great friends and found professors whose courses really challenged her, like Rabbi Ephraim Kanarfogel's class on the Tosafists and Rabbi Haym Soloveitchik's class on the Rishonim. "Ari Goldman also taught a great class, and he ended up writing my recommendation for Columbia," she said.

Raice graduated with a joint BA/MA in modern Jewish history through an undergraduate program with the Bernard Revel Graduate School of Jewish Studies. She began working for the Jewish Advocate and later the Boston Courant, a larger paper, where she covered city issues, including transportation and real estate development.

After three years of professional experience, Raice attended Columbia University Graduate School of Journalism. During her studies, she interned at Dow Jones Newswires, a financial news organization that is owned by the same company that oversees The Wall Street Journal. Her clips that appeared in the Journal impressed several editors, who hired Raice after her internship to cover the telecom industry. A year later, she was sent to San Francisco to cover social media companies like Facebook, Groupon, LinkedIn and Zynga, all of which were about to go public.

Raice's big scoops included breaking the news that Verizon planned to sell the iPhone and almost every aspect of Facebook's IPO. "My favorite part about journalism is finding out news that nobody else knows and getting people to tell me things they aren't supposed to tell me," she said. "Sometimes I feel like being a journalist is like being a spy, except everybody knows you're a spy, so it makes your job much harder. But the fact that it's so challenging is what makes it so much fun."

Last summer, the Journal brought Raice back to New York to cover the banking industry, which she calls her biggest career challenge to date. "I write about complex regulatory issues, like how banks are struggling to meet new capital ratios or charge all sorts of punitive fees, even as regulators crack down on them," she said. "My job is to make it all easily relatable and, at the end of the day, fun to read. When my Savta [grandmother] calls me and tells me she understood my story, then I know I've done a good job."

Current students encouraged by Raice's success should ignore those who downplay their own budding journalism dreams. "I think a lot of people think that journalism is not the kind of job that an observant Jew can do," said Raice. "I take off for all the Jewish holidays, and I've never once had anything but complete and total support from my editors at the Journal."

Lawyers also have grueling schedules, she pointed out, "and nobody tells an observant Jew that he or she can't be a lawyer."

Raice advises students who wish to pursue journalism to obtain internships at publications. "Journalism is not something that's easily taught in school," she said. "It's something you learn by trial and error. If you can, in addition to internships, get a lot of clips in different publications outside of the Jewish community. Mainstream experience is really important and, you don't want to get pigeonholed as a Jewish journalist, even if that's ultimately what you decide to do."

Above all, Raice advised, "Just do what you love and don't worry about the rest. I wish more people had told me that along the way."

GARY ROSENBLATT '68YC: EDITOR COMMITS TO HIS CRAFT DESPITE CRITICS

Gary Rosenblatt's long and storied career as editor-in-chief and publisher of two of the most prominent papers in the Jewish community almost never happened. There are a lot of stories that would never have been told and a lot of injustice that would have been left unearthed.

Rosenblatt, who grew up in Annapolis, MD, as a son of the rabbi (Morris Rosenblatt '47R, '58F) of the only shul in town, majored in English at Yeshiva College with the vague idea of entering academia. A stint as a freshman writer for The Commentator, the college's undergraduate newspaper, led to a full-blown case of the journalism bug, with Rosenblatt writing a wide variety of features and news stories over the next four years.

"Some of my fondest memories at Yeshiva are going downtown and laying out the paper all night at the printers before putting it to bed, and the camaraderie of the whole staff heading to Ratner's at 5:30 a.m. for breakfast," Rosenblatt recalled.

That love of journalism stayed with him through his graduate studies in English at the City College of New York, where he also wrote part time for the Jewish Chronicle of London. Gradually, Rosenblatt came to realize that he wanted to pursue journalism as a full-time career.

"It had never occurred to me that you could be shomer shabbos and work in journalism, because I was only thinking of reporters who write for daily newspapers," Rosenblatt said. "Of course, today there are many outlets you can write for without working on Shabbos."

Rosenblatt took a position as a sports editor for TV Guide, which, at the time, had a weekly circulation of more than 20 million. In 1972, he began working at The New York Jewish Week, which was under different management then and was a more modest version of the paper he edits today. "I was probably 35 years younger than the next editor, but that meant I was the one who got sent out in the field to cover all sorts of stories," said Rosenblatt. "I got to learn from veteran editors who covered events like World War II; it was a great training ground."

Rosenblatt worked there for two years before heading to Baltimore to become the editor of The Baltimore Jewish Times, where for the next 19 years he helped the paper grow in circulation and prominence. His investigative report on the Simon Wiesenthal Center—which explored the rapid growth of the famous Holocaust museum and education center and the marketing of it as a non-sectarian, humanitarian institution qualified to receive state funding—was one of two finalists for the Pulitzer Prize in the category of Special Reporting in 1985. "That remains one of my proudest journalistic achievements, as it was the first time that an article in a Jewish publication was recognized and nominated for a Pulitzer," said Rosenblatt.

In 1993, Rosenblatt returned to New York as editor and publisher of The New York Jewish Week, a post he still holds. He has written more than 1,000 weekly "Between the Lines" columns, and he has written and overseen major breaking stories in the Jewish world.

Rosenblatt often receives disapproval from critics who question why he feels the need to "air dirty laundry," so to speak, of the Jewish community, and it is something Rosenblatt frequently grapples with and does not take lightly.

"It's a little bit like having people look in the mirror and not always liking what they see reflected there," he said. "It's a very big responsibility, and one of my constant challenges is not to dismiss the criticism but use it as an opportunity to learn and grow."

Rosenblatt spoke to YU students at the annual Commentator/Observer Shabbaton this past April, where he shared some of the wisdom he's accumulated in Jewish journalism over the years. He considers his longevity in the field something of an achievement in itself; it's a tough, fast-paced business and a constant learning experience.

"There's a certain corrective element to managing a newspaper, and we make mistakes all the time," he said. "There's always that pressure to be both timely and humane, and you certainly need a measure of humility in this business. Journalism is not a science but an art, if you do it well, and it needs constant refinement. But if young people love it and worry about where the field is headed, I think there'll always be a need for talented professional journalists, whatever the format."

Rosenblatt lives with his wife, Judy '68S, in Teaneck, NJ. They have three children: Avi '97YUHS (and Daniela), Tali '96YUHS (and Sender Cohen '90YUHS, '94YC, member of the YU Board of Trustees) and Dov '08YC (and Aura) and six grandchildren.

AVITAL CHIZHIK '12S: A CAREER TAKES ROOT WITH A NEW YORK TIMES BYLINE AND ASSIGNMENT ABROAD

Writers sometimes work their entire careers for that coveted New York Times byline, but for Avital Chizhik, that measure of journalistic success came early on: as a recent graduate of Stern College for Women.

"Somehow, I always knew I wanted to write," said Chizhik, now 21. "When my family first began keeping Shabbat when I was 7 years old, the most difficult part for me was not being able to write stories."

Chizhik grew up in Highland Park, NJ, with her parents—Russian immigrants who came to New York in 1980. "I was really excited about Stern's honors program and its courses and community. Later on, I appreciated the experience of writing my honors thesis, too," said Chizhik, who majored in English communications with a concentration in journalism.

At Stern, Chizhik headed the Israel Club and wrote for The Commentator, although the majority of her writing was done on the side or in class. "I found more value in meeting people, attending lectures, researching literature in the library and exploring New York City than I did attending editorial staff meetings," Chizhik said.

In 2011, Chizhik was honored as a Point of Light at YU's 87th Annual Hanukkah Dinner and Convocation, where she was recognized for her award-winning writing and involvement in extracurricular activities at Stern, including the World Zionist Organization, Political Science Society and a CJF service mission to Kharkov, Ukraine.

Since graduating, Chizhik has written for many publications in addition to the Times, such as The Jewish Daily Forward, Moment Magazine, Tablet Magazine and Haaretz, where she is a regular contributor. She is also working on a collection of short stories, set mostly in the Orthodox and Russian Jewish émigré communities.

Chizhik recently traveled to Belarus and Russia for her first reporting assignment abroad. "It was my first time in both countries, and it was incredibly meaningful to walk the streets of Moscow, a city I have heard about my entire life, to see the city for what it is today and to decide what it should mean for me, a generation after my family's exodus."

While Chizhik writes often on the Russian Jewish community, many of her pieces are personal in nature: thoughtful essays on observant life and being a religious Jewish woman. She has written about modesty and dress codes, professional ambition within Orthodoxy and, for the Times, a piece on the similarities between marriage-minded young women of both the Jewish and Muslim faiths.

"I write about what I know, and I try to offer glimpses into communities that might be underrepresented or misrepresented in the media," said Chizhik. "I am constantly inspired by the present, by images and conversations, but also by texts of the past, like the Torah and writings by Chekhov, Agnon, Borges, Oz and Keret."

Chizhik also finds herself returning to many of the readings and lessons of her English and journalism courses at Stern: Holocaust Literature with Dr. Linda Shires; The Philosophy of Literature with Dr. Kim Evans, The Art of the Essay with Dr. Ann Peters; and The Craft of the Newspaper Feature with Professor Alan Tigay.

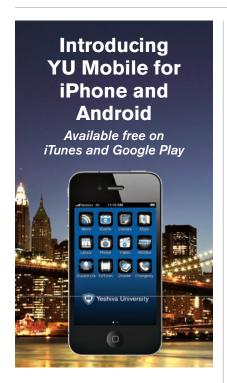

Chizhik's favorite part of being a journalist is the positive and inspiring letters she receives from readers. "I read each message I receive and always try to respond," she said. "Knowing my words resonated with someone, or that something in my work moved him or her to think differently, is a great blessing."

One thing that doesn't come easily is dealing with criticism, which Chizhik said is constant. "I think I was pretty naive when I began writing about life as a frum Jew," Chizhik said. "I had no idea what a Pandora's box I was opening, and a part of me wonders if this will be a lifetime struggle as I cover the Jewish community."

Despite the naysayers who would rather Chizhik not "expose" certain less favorable aspects of Orthodox life, she remains undeterred. "I strive to write with an unflinching eye because I want to offer my readers full and real experiences," said Chizhik. "I hope to capture the nuances of what it means to be Orthodox in the modern world, and that demands both celebrating the beautiful and confronting the difficult."

Chizhik admits that her confidence has taken some time to build, and she is helped along by the unwavering support of her parents. "Upsetting readers is certainly not my purpose in writing, but if that's a consequence, I think it only indicates the urgency of the problem I'm addressing."

Ari Sauer '99SB, '01C: Advocating for Immigrants

or more than a decade, Ari Sauer '99SB, '01C, has been helping people from countries around the world obtain visas, green cards, permanent residence and citizenship so that they can stay in the United States to continue studying, working or just being with their loved ones. It's a tall order, but all in a day's work for an immigration lawyer.

As an undergraduate student at Yeshiva University's Sy Syms School of Business, Sauer, who was born and raised in Memphis, TN, hadn't even heard of the highly specialized field of immigration law. In fact, he wasn't planning on becoming a lawyer at all.

"I had planned to become an accountant, and while I loved most of the accounting courses for my major, I didn't care for the tax side of it," said Sauer. "During my senior year, I realized I had enough credits from my elective courses in management, many of which were taught by the wonderful Dr. Moses Pava, to graduate with a degree in business management."

An active undergraduate, Sauer co-hosted a popular radio show—"Popular with my friends, anyway,"—where he played music and discussed current events with his co-host. "It was a great experience, and we held a party every week at the radio headquarters when we hosted the show," said Sauer. He also ran on YU's cross-country team for two years under Coach Stan Watson, and some of his closest friendships were formed at YU, including one with Joe Bednarsh, YU's director of athletics, physical education and recreation.

With Sauer's change in major and career trajectory late in the undergraduate game, he decided to use his fallback plan and attend law school following graduation, enrolling in YU's Benjamin N. Cardozo School of Law. There, he was a student of Professor Leon Wildes, a prominent immigration lawyer and member of the Yeshiva College Board of Overseers.

"I had already balanced a dual curriculum at both the Margolin Hebrew Academy in Memphis and at YU, so I was surprised by how few classes I had to take each semester in law school," said Sauer. "I decided to take a position at Cardozo's Immigration Law Field Clinic."

Though Sauer had not taken an immigration law course before starting the job, where he assisted lawyers in drafting immigrant petitions for abused spouses, he fell in love with the work. He realized the impact that immigration lawyers could have on their clients and the people in their clients' lives. He decided to specialize in the field and immediately signed up for immigration and administrative law courses, eventually serving as president of Cardozo's immigration law society.

Sauer worked in the tristate area for a few years before returning to Memphis to raise his family. He now works at Siskind Susser, PC, a leading immigration law firm headquartered in Memphis.

"Many people think immigration lawyers just fill out forms all day," Sauer said. "While there is that component, it's actually an extremely complicated area of law with many subfields, including asylum, defense from deportation and family and employment-based immigration and naturalization, which are my areas of expertise. I help immigrants obtain the proper documentation so that they can be assured a place of residence here in the United States."

At Siskind Susser, Sauer works on dozens of cases at a time, which can each take months or years to resolve. At the time of this writing, Sauer's varied clients include a university professor applying for a green card to continue teaching in the United States, a husband who first came to the United States on a fiancé visa seeking permanent residence and a doctor who came to do his residency in the United States applying for a green card. Most of Sauer's clients come from India and China.

For Sauer, the biggest challenge of his job is also the one that keeps him on his toes and, in some ways, a perpetual student; immigration law is an ever-changing field that requires continuous education.

"There are constant changes to immigration laws, bylaws, regulations and how cases are processed," said Sauer. "One can't possibly remain informed in this field from a single book or law school class. Immigration lawyers need to remain up to date by reading government memos and speaking to each other to share our knowledge and what we've learned. As a result, immigration law is a very collaborative type of law and also offers a more level playing field; younger attorneys can often catch up to more experienced ones because the rules and dynamics are always changing."

In his role as chair of the Mid South Chapter of the American Immigration Lawyers Association (AILA), a post to which he was recently re-elected, Sauer helps educate other lawyers and officials about immigration issues and possible repercussions about changes in the law. "As a general rule, immigration is a very hot-button topic in this country, and politically, there are a lot of different emotions involved," said Sauer.

As chair, Sauer facilitates communication between lawyers in Tennessee, Kentucky, Mississippi, Arkansas and Louisiana, and he also helps alert AILA's national office when changes in immigration regulations occur in local cities. Four times a year, Sauer travels to national meetings across the country to represent the Mid South Chapter, although he did not attend a recent meeting in Austin, Texas, because it took place on Simchat Torah.

"I'm not the only Orthodox Jew in AILA, and at our annual conferences, we usually do a pretty good job of organizing a minyan [quorum]," said Sauer. "As chapter chair, I also changed our meetings from Saturday to a weekday and, overall, everyone is understanding."

Sauer suggested that students who are interested in pursuing immigration law after graduating from YU would do well spending some time in the offices of practicing lawyers. "Seeing lawyers on the job in their offices is the best way to learn what it's really about and to adopt mentors, which is essential for any immigration lawyer," he said. "While you're in Washington Heights, also make sure you practice your Spanish. It was a missed opportunity for me but one that certainly would have come in handy in my job today, as I have a good number of Spanish-speaking clients. My paralegals translate for me, but the more Spanish you know, the better."

"Ari is a wonderful example of a YU student who took to heart the mission of the University and used his education to go out and help people," said Bednarsh. "It's no surprise to me, because Ari has always been a compassionate and caring person—qualities that were evident to even the casual observer during his time at YU."

Sauer lives in Memphis with his wife, Hanielle, and their twin daughters, Lee and Magen, 10. \blacksquare
