impressed, we flew to Chanchung where we were met with a police motorcade and taken to Jilin College, an art college. A two-hundred-piece band flying a Chinese flag awaited us, and as I approached, they unfurled the American flag. When the band played "The Stars and Stripes," there wasn't a dry eye in our group.

Jilin College is only one-and-a-half-years old – the sidewalks had been completed just ten days before our arrival – but it is magnificent. As we entered the foyer, there was my picture – I was already installed a professor emeritus, though that ceremony wouldn't happen until later that day. The students were studying cartooning, art, and animation. There were four floors of classrooms, two filled with students drawing and painting, and two filled with students working on Apple computers. I met two teachers, an American and a Russian.

They begged me to do a painting, so, with a one-inch brush and a painting knife, I finished a seascape in fifteen minutes. They loved it.

Another bit of historic significance occurred that evening when we were hosted for dinner in the very room where President Nixon and Mao had met to discuss the opening of China to America thirty years before.

Next, on to Shanghai for sampan rides, visits to silk factories, and a farewell banquet. Finally, good-bye to China where I had been Queen for a Week. Δ know they can't make a bad choice because I am happy to trade out any images that don't sell after a reasonable period of time."

With the exception of doing an occasional show in areas where he does not have representation, Policky sells his work on a wholesale basis through a network of more than two hundred dealers. His goal is to attain three hundred outlets from coast to coast, border to border. The artist is clearly pleased with this form of marketing. "HorseHead Productions has been in business a little less than four years, but even with the softness of the industry, we have managed to double in size each year. We already have two sold-out editions and another half dozen are reaching the endangered mark. Sales continue to grow so we must be doing something right." Δ bells. "Everything that is here, all this beauty, existed in my mind long before it became a living, growing garden. It is a cherished dream that has come to life and it is as real to me as the fairies I paint. It's just as I tell my daughters and grandchildren," she says, summing up her philosophy, "there are only two kinds of people in the world – those who believe in magic and those who wish they could." value, and many consider him one of the most popular wildlife artists working today. His third and newest print in the Big Buck Series, Big Country Buck, illustrates the extensive research and care Zach dedicates to his art.

Furthermore, Zach works with a variety of conservation groups and has helped raise well over a million dollars for conservation projects. He also donates time, knowledge, and personal resources to the reclamation of Iowa's natural ecosystems. "On my own farm I have established ponds and wetlands, and have worked to improve the health of the forest and re-established the prairie," adding that he believes a wide range of habitat types is needed for a healthy ecosystem that will guarantee outdoor and hunting traditions can for future generations to enjoy.

With a lifetime of outdoor experience, a biology degree, and "a deep love of nature," Zach has captured the images of these great animals in his art: but more important, he has raised his children to hunt responsibly and has passed the American tradition of respect and conservation to another generation. the substance of solid figures and has plans to expand his use of patinas to include the look of stone or wood.

At 27, Eli emphasizes, "Because my father and I do have different interests and diverse ways of looking at our art, my dream is to create sculptures that will complement what he does and widen our audience while still following my own creative vision."

The elder Hopkins has been very supportive of his son's need to work in his own individual style. "Even though we may differ in some aspects, I believe there is a synergism when two artists work together. Creativity feeds creativity," Mark relates, "and we both will grow by working together." Δ

Afterthoughts

What Is Wrong With Sentimental?

by Jack Hines

I have an axe to grind. Big surprise. In a lot of years of authoring columns for art-oriented publications, I think I've ground more axes than the guys who do it for lumber camps.

The nice thing about this particular complaint is that I can state the beef in one short phrase. After that I can wax rhapsodic over the positive side, which is, for me, more formidable than the motivating complaint.

Here's the thing that has my nose out of joint. There is a segment of the contemporary art community that puts the knock on any art other than their own by dismissing it as "sentimental."

What the hell is wrong with sentimental?

Who, in a right and healthy state of mind, can truly say there is no sentiment in their lives?

I can't recall any image presented in InformArt that hasn't carried a visual and narrative message designed to arouse some sort of sentiment in its viewers. Nor is one apt to find in collections of the Old Masters much of anything that isn't meant to touch one deeply.

Let's consider the basic definition of the word.

The Oxford Americana Dictionary says it well: "Sentiment, a mental attitude produced by one's feelings about something, an opinion." There it is... lots of latitude for applications to art.

Back to the Old Masters. Much of the art done in the classic eras had to do with religion or mythology. To view this art was to enhance understanding of the theologies at issue. A lot of altered "mental attitudes" there. The same is true of much of the work done to glorify royalty or military heroes or simply to present persons of surpassing beauty. And what about portraits of family members, those loving records of lives lived and appreciated? Aha! Sentiment!

I have a personal theory about the chronological coincidence in the rise of densely-settled city cultures and the industrial revolution and the appearance of landscape painting on the art scene. I think pure landscape paintings filled a nostalgic need to bask in nature, even if vicariously. And, we're still doing it. What a lovely sentiment it is, to so love nature, purely depicted, that we want to have it in our homes.

Think about America's booming transition to industrial building and mechanization... and then recall the marvelously sentimental, beautiful Hudson River school of painting. I'm sure the work was appreciated not only for its sheer and boldly idealized overstatement of nature's glory, but for its inspirational power as well.

Good sentiment!

If anyone is of the opinion that western art – cowboys and Indians, pioneers and fur traders – is not an elaborate reach for romance (sentiment), then that individual is sadly out of touch with what makes humanity tick.

We could fashion an endless list of what stirs sentiment people, starting with still life, running to wildlife, then detouring to old steam locomotives and the gorgeous grace of the open sea and everything in between.

Maybe what all of this comes down to is something even more basic: beauty is an almost constant companion to a piece of art that conveys a sentiment.

Just as a wonderful food, a delicious scent, a penglow on a mountain range, or a tender touch from one you love, evoke good feelings (a kind of beauty) so too does a beautiful piece of art have an effect upon us.

Is it contrary to human feelings to prefer beauty to ugliness? When did you last hear someone exclaim rapturously about something ugly? And yet, anti-beauty can also convey powerful sentiment. I defy anyone to stand before Picasso's painted horror story Guernica and not be deeply moved. It isn't "beautiful," but it is a masterful depiction of an evil twist of human nature. Ugly? Sure, but try to tell me that no sentiment has been aroused! This guy had a message to convey. If he had not intended to rouse sentiment, you can bet he wouldn't have bothered to create this powerful piece of art.

What I am left with by this diatribe is an assumption that many of the naysayers of sentiment must be lacking in the ability to create beauty, or powerful anti-beauty. With no hint of greatness in their artistic souls, perhaps they try to fill that lack by creating shock and ugliness.

It must be a very cold dwelling place. Δ
