INTERSECTIONALITY AND PROFESSIONAL DEVELOPMENT May 2011-June 2013

Doctoral Paper

Rosemead School of Psychology • La Mirada, CA

Committee: Christina Lee-Kim, Ph.D. & David Cimborra, Ph.D.

Title: “Influences on the Personal Identity and Professional Development of the Black Female Psychologist.” Various constructs that may contribute to the personal and professional identity of Black female psychologists are addressed in the context of the theory of intersectionality. These constructs include influences on personal identity that stem from familial influences, racial socialization, messages of empowerment from the African-American community, and stereotypic gender-laden messages from society. Additionally, the combination of different racial, ethnic, and gender-identity constructs and their influence on the Black female’s professional development are examined. Lastly explored are the effects of gender identity, racial identity, or both regarding professional development in terms of mentoring, supervision, clinical development, and mobility in the field of psychology.
