Graduate Courses Taught

Civil-Military Relations and National Security (SEC 6310)

The study of civil-military relations is a crucial aspect of security studies. It examines the proper relationship between the military, the government, and society. This course will examine civil-military relations in its broader context to include such issues as civilian control of the military, changing roles for the military, military service, interagency cooperation, military effectiveness, and operational challenges. Throughout, the course will consider the complex relationship between policy, politics, and society.

Security Issues in Africa I (SEC 6341)

This course examines political, military and social issues of the states of Sub-Saharan Africa. The focus of the course is on the impact these issues have on world politics and particularly US national security interests in that region. The course addresses issues of the colonial legacy, the rise of African nationalism and the emergence of independent Africa. It also addresses many of the difficulties of the post-colonial legacy. Finally, the course turns to the place of sub-Saharan Africa in Washington's national security policy and potential outcomes for the future.

Security Issues in Africa II (SEC 6343)

While Security Issues in Africa I focuses on issues of conflict and tension, this course is an introduction to the political economy of Sub-Saharan Africa. Students will explore the theory and practice of how economic motives affect political decisions and how most political decisions have economic repercussions, both domestically and throughout Africa. This course reviews and explores the key themes of Africa's contemporary political economy and its deep historical bases. In doing so, the course concentrates on Africa's relationship with the global political economy and raises questions about the nature of state action in African countries.

Research: Health Security in Africa (SEC 6391)

With a very young population across the continent, an underdeveloped economy, and the power of globalization, Africa is poised to play a significant role in the twenty-first century. A multitude of health security issues continue to plague the continent, however, to include several uncontrolled epidemics. As a result of this course, students will be able to develop and to articulate a better understanding of the impact of ongoing uncontrolled epidemics in Africa and how such a health security concern limits the economic growth of certain sectors and detracts from human security across the continent.

Research: Somalia's State Fragility and Maritime Insecurity (SEC 6391)

Using the history of Somalia, contemporary events, and an understanding of international and U.S. capabilities, this course considers ways to solve the twin Somali problems of state fragility and maritime insecurity. As a result of this course, students will gain a nuanced grasp of the deleterious effects of these factors on Somalia, both historical and contemporary, and will be able to communicate how state fragility and maritime insecurity limit the economic growth and political stability of Somalia, often requiring international intervention in the form of economic aid and military enforcement.

Introduction to Security Studies (SEC 6302)

This is a basic introduction to the field of security studies. This course will help students examine the recent history of security studies. Students will learn about many of the theoretical approaches and debates relating to world politics. Studies will include the origination and causes of conflict, deterrence and coercion (in both theory and practice), diplomacy and international dynamics, and an examination of the growing list of transnational issues. The course deals with many of the theoretical works in the field as well as numerous case studies that deal with the national security issues that impact current world politics and international security.

Grand Strategy and National Security (SEC 6309)

This course gives students key insights into the basic elements of grand strategy and how they relate to security studies. The course gives students a unique baseline of knowledge that will be important as they move into other aspects of the security studies program. Key issues that will be addressed in detail include: the national security decision-making process—particularly as it relates to issues of international and homeland security; civil-military relations as applicable in the development of strategy and statecraft; an analysis of how nation-states develop military operational capabilities and readiness; and the differing strategies for international conflict, including both conventional and unconventional warfare.

Globalization and International Security (SEC 6312)

This course examines how globalization affects the policies, economies, societies and militaries of both state and non-state actors on the regional and world stages. While globalization has had many benefits since the end of World War II, it has also created “haves and have nots,” radical religious and political ideologies, and ethnic conflict in regions affecting the national security of the developed world. This course conducts important studies that examine how the interconnected world creates differing realities for various nation-states and regions, and what the potential is for future conflict.

Peacekeeping and Stability Operations (SEC 6316)

Stability and peace operations have become an integral part of US foreign and military policy. This course analyzes several concepts, including nation building, stabilization and reconstruction. It also examines the roles of various groups that have become important to these types of operations in the 21st century. These groups include nongovernmental, intergovernmental and governmental organizations. The course examines the roles and missions of the many new players who have become integral to stability and peacekeeping operations.

Human Rights and National Security (SEC 6320)

This course gives students a clear understanding of what constitutes human rights. The course also explores why human rights and human security have become such major players in policy, as well as an important aspect of the work that non-governmental organizations (NGOs) and other non-state actors conduct. Of particular importance to this course is conducting an analysis of the role of civil society (human rights NGOs, church groups, and grassroots organizations). The course also features important writings by practitioners and experts in the field.

Energy Security Studies (SEC 6321)

This course examines the relatively new concept of the importance of the relationship between energy and security in the 21st century. The course conducts analysis of important policy challenges that include, but are not limited to, economic, geopolitical and environmental issues. The United States and its key allies (not to mention its competitors, such as China) have huge concerns about vulnerability to disruptions in supply, price volatility and environmental degradation. US national security interests can also potentially be at peril if such issues as unequal access to energy sources and instability in key regions that are sources for energy arise.

Transnational Issues and National Security (SEC 6322)

With the advent of more societies around the world and more open trade, a variety of transnational issues have become important for American national security. The role of NGOs in dealing with a variety of issues, the role of the many powerful transnational corporations, and transnational crime have changed how nation-states deal with both state and non-state actors. This course examines the key transnational issues that are important for US policy, and analyzes a series of case studies that deal with important issues, such as transnational crime, transnational corporations and other issues that cross borders between states and regions.

Security Issues in Asia (SEC 6327)

This course covers contemporary regional issues, such as the influence of Japan, India, Korea and China on regional and global affairs, with a particular focus on regional security concerns. The focus of this course is on the changing dynamics of contemporary international security in Asia. This course will include several case studies that are important to understanding regional security in Asia. These case studies will include, but not be limited to, the ongoing and hotly-debated military rise of China and its implications for the region and the world; the nuclear stand-off on the Korean peninsula; contemporary security issues in Southeast Asia; the India-Pakistan conflict; and transnational security issues in Asia.

Undergraduate Courses Taught

World Cultures (CUL 2323)

This course introduces students to the importance of culture around the world. It familiarizes students with cultures in different regions, including but not limited to Africa, Asia, Europe, Latin America and the Middle East, and their historical, contextual, and cultural differences. It introduces basic concepts related to culture and illustrates their relevance through case studies on how culture has impacted the world. Among the questions explored are how culture shapes political systems, economic development, internal security, group conflict, and religious influence in each region. By the end of the class the student should have an appreciation of the multi-dimensional character of different global cultures and how they shape overall political, social and economic development.

Cultural Competency and Contemporary Security Issues in Africa (CCSS 4331)

This course focuses on current major issues within the African region. While engaging in critical analysis of current issues, it examines the broader conceptual context and analytic framework that explain interactions within the region and the international arena.

Introduction to Cultural Competence: Making Sense of the World I (CUL 3310)

This course serves as an introduction to various analytical approaches for understanding the dynamics of global interaction. Students will explore the variety of “worlds” made visible through the lens of theory. The course aims to foster critical thinking about how conceptual tools shape our understanding of the world and about attempted solutions to global problems.

Cultural Competence: Making Sense of the World II (CUL 3312)

This course is a continuation of CUL 3310 that extends its analysis of cultural diversity in the world, how culture relates to specific security issues, including the historical relationships between military power and politics, and how cultural understanding is essential in influencing outcomes in a variety of security contexts.

Contemporary Security Issues in World Politics (CCSS 3315)

This course focuses on current major issues with an international dimension and global impact, and with salience for the emerging patterns of world politics. While engaging in critical analysis of current issues, it examines the broader conceptual context and analytic framework that explain interactions among nations.

American Government Politics and National Security (CCSS 3317)

This course introduces students to the study of politics and government and examines the basic ideological, structural, and procedural choices faced by any political system. Students study the foundations and traditions of American democracy and the structure, decision processes, and policy outcomes, especially defense policy outputs, of the American political system. Students also examine current policy issues that affect the military.

Politics and Culture of Latin America (CCSS 3325)

This course examines the historic, cultural, economic, social, and geographic traits that distinguish this region and shape its domestic political processes and interstate relations. Students explore selected Latin American political systems in detail. Students analyze issues such as political stability, civil-military relations, and democratization along with politico-economic concerns, such as developmental strategies, debt relief, and trade relations. The course also covers contemporary regional issues, such as democratization, arms control, and regional integration, with a particular emphasis on security concerns.

Comparative Security Policy and Political Culture (CCSS 4150)

Students study the security policies and policy-making processes of various world regions as well as the national and regional implications of both traditional and non-traditional security issues. The course examines the relationship between civilian authorities and the military establishment and the implications for governance.

Cultural Competency and Contemporary Security Issues in Latin America (CCSS 4327)

This course focuses on current major issues within the Latin American region. While engaging in critical analysis of current issues, it examines the broader conceptual context and analytic framework that explain interactions within the region and the international arena.

Research: The Politics and Culture of Europe (CCSS 4391)

This course examines the historic, cultural, economic, social and geographic traits that distinguish this region and shape its domestic political processes and interstate relations. Students will critically compare the politics, governments and orientations of European states and important regional powers. The course will also cover contemporary regional issues, such as democratization, arms control and regional integration, with a particular emphasis on security concerns.

*Graduate Courses DevelopedCivil-Military Relations and National Security (SEC 6310)

The study of civil-military relations is a crucial aspect of security studies. It examines the proper relationship between the military, the government, and society. This course will examine civil-military relations in its broader context to include such issues as civilian control of the military, changing roles for the military, military service, interagency cooperation, military effectiveness, and operational challenges. Throughout, the course will consider the complex relationship between policy, politics, and society.

Security Issues in Africa I (SEC 6341)

This course examines political, military, and social issues of the states of Sub-Saharan Africa. The focus of the course is on the impact these issues have on world politics and particularly United States national security interests in that region. The course addresses issues of the colonial legacy, the rise of African nationalism, and the emergence of independent Africa. It also addresses many of the difficulties of the post-colonial legacy. Finally, the course turns to the place of Sub-Saharan Africa in Washington's national security policy and potential outcomes for the future.

Security Issues in Africa II (SEC 6343)

While Security Issues in Africa I focuses on issues of conflict and tension, this course is an introduction to the political economy of Sub-Saharan Africa. Students will explore the theory and practice of how economic motives affect political decisions and how most political decisions have economic repercussions, both domestically and in Africa. This course reviews and explores the key themes of Africa's contemporary political economy and its deep historical bases. In doing so, the course concentrates on Africa's relationship with the global political economy and raises questions about the nature of state action in African countries.

*Undergraduate Courses DevelopedWorld Cultures (CUL 2323)

This course introduces students to the importance of culture around the world. It familiarizes students with cultures in different regions, including but not limited to Africa, Asia, Europe, Latin America and the Middle East, and their historical, contextual, and cultural differences. It introduces basic concepts related to culture and illustrates their relevance through case studies on how culture has impacted the world. Among the questions explored are how culture shapes political systems, economic development, internal security, group conflict, and religious influence in each region. By the end of the class the student should have an appreciation of the multi-dimensional character of different global cultures and how they shape overall political, social and economic development.

Cultural Competency and Contemporary Security Issues in Africa (CCSS 4331)

This course focuses on current major issues within the African region. While engaging in critical analysis of current issues, it examines the broader conceptual context and analytic framework that explain interactions within the region and the international arena.
