FOREWORD

This volume is in honor of Professor Yiwoḷa Awoyale, a pillar of African linguistic research and former chair of the Department of Linguistics and Nigerian Languages at the University of Ilorin, Nigeria. Professor Awoyale, it turns out, also wears another hat: he is a founding member of the Egbé ọmọ Yorùbá (Yoruba Descendants Association) of North America, where he is known primarily for his community organizational activities.

The three editors planned this volume in part as a “thank you” gift for the impact Professor Awoyale’s work has had on the development of our individual careers, and also as a celebration of the richness of his contributions to African linguistics and to Yoruba studies. We are honored by Professor Awoyale’s colleagues, collaborators, and friends, who willingly agreed to contribute to this volume.

Having had his linguistic training in a theoretical atmosphere, and spending his life in the midst of abundant data, it is not surprising that Professor Awoyale’s work is a cross between linguistic (syntactic) theory and rich data. His research is always centered around data—tons of data. He never makes a claim based on scant data. The Ilorin linguistics department, with speakers of different Benue-Congo languages (Ebira, Akoko, Edo, Igbo, Yoruba-Igbomina, Oyo, Ife, Ekiti, Ijesa, Egba, etc.), was an amazing linguistics ‘fieldwork site’. He tested his own theory of ideophones in his classes. But he was not only a collector of data, he also really liked to be around people. His gregarious nature has made him a great field worker and a wonderful colleague.

Professor Awoyale has had a distinguished career in linguistics. A brilliant and talented scholar, he received both his BA degree in English (with honors) and Graduate Certificate in Education from Ahmadu Bello University, Zaria, Nigeria, in 1970. Four years later, he received his MA and PhD degrees in Linguistics from the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign. His dissertation—Studies in the Syntax and Semantics of Yoruba Nominalizations—was an influential work, and is still cited by scholars working on the syntax of African languages.

He has contributed (and continues to contribute) in a myriad of ways to the development of contemporary linguistics in Nigeria and Africa and to the professional training and development of scores of scholars of African linguistics. His record as a teacher is best appreciated by the number of fine scholars he has produced, some of whom are now Professors and superb researchers in their own rights.

This edited volume—Data Rich Linguistics: Papers in Honor of Yiwoḷa Awoyale—is a collection of papers by an international group of scholars in recognition of Yiwoḷa Awoyale's contributions to African languages and linguistics, and to Yoruba studies. The volume brings together a collection of brand new and innovative papers by authors who have been influenced by Awoyale's work. The volume presents current research on topics in syntax, semantics, phonology, applied linguistics and sociolinguistics. The topics presented in the volume expand some of Awoyale's ideas to a variety of research topics and languages; for example, the lexicon in Kwa and Niger-Congo languages, the syntax of Bantu languages, and the interface of syntax and phonology. The papers in this volume present a state-of-the-art account of contemporary issues in African languages and linguistics today.

INTRODUCTION

The Festschrift, Data-Rich Linguistics: Papers in Honor of Yiwoḷa Awoyale, is a collection of papers reflecting the diversity of Yiwoḷa Awoyale's contributions to African Languages and Linguistics. We especially highlight his contribution as a great field linguist, who pays careful attention to data and data documentation. His seminal work on Yoruba lexicography illustrates his devotion to the study of the globalization of the language across space and time. The volume presents current research on topics in syntax, semantics, phonology, applied linguistics and sociolinguistics. The topics presented expand some of Awoyale's ideas in new domains—for example, the lexicon in Kwa and Niger-Congo languages, the syntax of Bantu languages, and the interface of syntax and phonology. These papers present a state-of-the-art account of contemporary issues in African languages and linguistics. Aside from the papers contributed by Professor Awoyale's students and colleagues, we showcase three of his original but rare publications in the volume.

The abstracts of the chapters are as follows:

Syntax and Semantics

1. On the Status of Object Markers in Bantu Languages, Mark Baker

This paper argues that some Bantu languages, previously thought to have object agreement, in fact have pronominal clitic doubling, similar to the clitic doubling found in some European languages. In contrast, other superficially similar Bantu languages do indeed have true object agreement. The difference is revealed when the direct object being doubled or agreed with is less than fully referential: a nonspecific indefinite, question word, quantifier, negative expression, anaphor, or nominal containing a bound variable. According to a recent analysis of Amharic, all such less-referential DPs are bad with clitic doubling, because of weak crossover or binding theory violations. I show that the Amharic analysis of clitic doubling is compatible with the basic design of Bantu languages. Then I show that, by the referentiality test, Sambaa and one dialect of Swahili turn out to have object agreement, whereas Haya and another dialect of Swahili turn out to have clitic doubling. The impression that variation in this domain is random, chaotic, and continuous comes from not distinguishing properties that are rooted in syntactic theory (quantifier versus referential DP) from properties that are not constrained by that theory (like animacy and humanness). Suggestions are also made about additional data that could help clarify the picture further.

2. The Pronoun, Tense and Aspect System of Ìkàrè: Evidence for High Tone Syllable, Francis Oyebade and Taiwo Agoyi:

The issue of the pronoun system of Yoruba has become a hotly debated one in recent times following the suggestion of Awobuluyi (2001, 2008) that the 3rd pers. (sg.) subject pronoun is not ‘ó’ as is commonly held. This paper investigates the subject pronoun system of Ìkàrè and its implications for the tense and aspect system of Yoruba as a language. In the process of the investigation, evidence is adduced that ‘ó’ seems to be a preverbal element – as suggested for Yoruba by Awobuluyi. This element contracts with the 2nd pers. (sg.) pron. – which is ‘wè’ – to produce ‘wò’ in some contexts in ìkàré. The study inevitably led to the investigation of the tense and aspect system of Ukare. The conclusion reached is that Ukare classifies experience in two broad categories: events that have been initiated in the past—and have consequences for the present—and those which have not. This is different from that of standard Yoruba, which classifies experience on the basis of future and non-future occurrence.

3. The Complementary Bi-Clausal Pattern of Yorùbá Proverbs, Issa O. Sanusi:

Language and culture are closely interconnected. Language is an important medium through which the culture of a particular group of people is expressed and preserved. In other words, language constitutes one of the cultural elements in a given society. In the same vein, proverbs form an integral part of human language. As a cultural element, proverbs are found among nations and belong to all generations. Proverbs are ‘popular sayings’ that are employed for expressing one’s thought or idea in a given discourse. They provide a concise medium of communication. Pragmatically, proverbs are used in order to avoid ‘direct contact’ with the interlocutor or listeners. The use of proverbs provides a covert method of sending messages or passing information that would otherwise injure the feelings of one’s audience. It forms an alternative medium of expression that is less offensive. As is evident in this study, most proverbs in Yorùbá consist of two clauses that may be syntactically autonomous, but semantically interdependent. The purpose of this paper is to identify and describe the syntactic features that are common to Yorùbá proverbs. Such features give the proverbs their peculiar grammatical pattern. Most proverbs in Yorùbá are derived through the application of one or more syntactic transformations to basic declarative sentences. However, only Yorùbá bi-clausal proverbs that are derivatives of relativisation, focus constructions and negative constructions were employed for our analysis in this study. Based on the syntax/semantics interface in the two complementary clauses that make up a Yorùbá proverb, this paper proposes that those clauses are co-ordinate clauses, and a semi-colon rather than a comma is required to mark off the first clause from the second.

4. What if your roots are polyfunctional? The Lexical Entry Problem in Benue-Kwa, Enoch Oladé Aboh:

In accounting for the so-called serial verb constructions (SVCs) in Yoruba, Awóyalé (1988) argues that any adequate analysis must focus on the lexical entries of the verbs in order to define the contribution of each verb to the series. This view is compatible with Aboh's (2009a) conclusion that SVCs in Benue-Kwa represent monoclauses where a functional verb combines with a lexical verb acting as the/a main predicate. In his terms, SVCs are not sequences of lexical verbs but rather verbal combinations in which one verb acts as the main predicate, and retains its full argument structure, while others are grammatical elements functioning as modifiers of the event that is being expressed or described. These languages therefore involve a significant class of verbal roots, with a rather vague meaning, that can either serve grammatical purposes or be used lexically, when properly specified. This view corroborates the fact that Benue-Kwa languages are also known to exhibit Inherent Complement Verbs (ICVs) which, in their citation form, require a complement that further specifies the meaning of the verb phrase. Taking the discussion a step further, this paper shows that the recruitment of material that is used as a lexical entry for grammatical purposes is also found in the nominal domain. In this case, a nominal root is used as a functional element within the noun phrase.

5. Possessive Unaccusatives in Yorùbá, Akinbiyi Akinlabi and Oluşeyẹ Adeşọla

This paper describes the occurrence of inalienable possessive unaccusative constructions in Yorùbá and proposes that only such constructions are permitted to retain (some remnants of) their underlying subject in non-equative unaccusative constructions. The authors also note that such constructions are restricted to verbs that appear to be agentless transitive verbs (Tuite 2009), which denote events that are not usually of the experiencer's own volition.

6. Why Do Your People Speak at the Top of Their Voice: Tone and Aspects of Ẹmai Grammatical Constructions, Francis O. Egbokhare:

Many years ago, an individual asked me the following question: “Why do your people always speak at the top of their voice?” This question may have arisen from a cursory observation of a preponderance of non-low pitch in an Emai sentence environment. Emai is an Edoid language spoken in Edo State in southern Nigeria. The current paper examines the behaviour of tone in Emai grammatical constructions. Constructions pattern into two aspectual classes, perfective and imperfective, in terms of their realization of tones in the preverbal and verb phrase. A subcategorization of the perfective into indicative and subjunctive mood has an additional implication for tonal behaviour due to the construction markers of the subjunctive class which constrain tonal behaviour in interesting ways. In terms of the tonal behaviour of the subjects of sentences, aspectual groupings are cross-classified into two mood categories, realis and irrealis, both defining H and lexical tone patterns respectively. A defining characteristic of the imperfective class is the preponderance of downstep H tones and rising melody of L H tones on preverbal and verb phrase forms. The perfective on the other hand shows a preference for a falling HL melody with the tones distributed on alternate forms of the construction. We propose that Emai is a transitional tone language in which the functional load of tone is being shifted from the lexical level to the grammatical level. The surface output of tone in a grammatical construction is a function of the interaction of melody assignment rules, the position of a form in a sequence, morpheme length, lexical tone patterns of forms, the application of syllable structure processes, as well as the phenomenon of downstep.
