In the New Testament. Elders or “presbyters” (presbyteroi) appear early in the life of the church, taking their place along with the apostles, prophets, and teachers. At Jerusalem they are associated with James in the government of the local church after the manner of the synagogue (Acts 11:30; 21:18), but in association with the apostles they also share in the wider, or more sanhedral, government of the whole church (Acts 15:2, 6, 23; 16:4). An apostle can be a presbyter (1 Pet. 5:1).

Presbyters do not appear at Antioch during Paul's stay there (Acts 13:1), nor are they mentioned in Paul's earlier epistles. Possibly government was then a matter of minor importance. But Paul and Barnabas on their first missionary journey had presbyters appointed in all the churches they founded (Acts 14:23).

The presbyters whom Paul addressed at Ephesus (Acts 20:17–35) and those addressed in 1 Peter and Titus have a decisive place in church life. Besides their function of humble pastoral oversight, on them largely depend the stability and purity of the flock in the approaching temptation and crisis. They are in a position of authority and privilege that can be abused. They share in the ministry of Christ toward the flock (Acts 20:28; 1 Pet. 5:1–4; cf. Eph. 4:11).

It is often asserted that in the Gentile churches the name episkopos is used as a substitute for presbyteros with identical meaning. The words seem to be interchangeable in Acts 20:17, 28 and Titus 1:5–9. But though all episkopoi are undoubtedly presbyteroi, it is not clear whether the reverse is always true. The word presbyteros denotes rather the status of eldership while episkopos denotes the function of at least some elders. But there may have been elders who were not episkopoi.

In 1 Timothy 5:17 teaching as well as oversight is regarded as a desirable function of the presbyter. It is likely that when the apostles and teachers and prophets ceased to be able to minister to the whole church in their travels, the function of teaching and preaching would fall on the local presbyters, and thus the office and the qualifications of those holding it would develop. This, again, may have led to distinction within the presbyterate. The presidency of the body of presbyters, in both the ordering of the congregation and the celebration of the Lord's Supper, would tend to become a permanent office held by one man.

The “elder” in 2 and 3 John refers merely to someone highly esteemed within the church. The twenty-four elders who appear so frequently in the visions of the book of Revelation are examples of how all authority should humbly adore God and the Lamb (Rev. 4:10; 5:8–10; 19:4). It is to be noted that even these presbyters seem to minister in heaven to the church on earth (Rev. 5:5, 8; 7:13).

In Church History. At the time of the Reformation, Calvin found that the office of elder was one of the four “orders or offices” Christ had instituted for the ordinary government of the church, the others being pastors, doctors (teachers), and deacons. The elders, as representatives of the people, along with pastors or bishops were responsible for discipline. In Scotland the elder was later ordained for life, without the laying on of hands, and was given the duty of examining communicants and visiting the sick. He was encouraged to teach. The theory arose, through 1 Timothy 5:17, that ministers and elders were both presbyters of the same order, the former being the teaching elder, the latter the ruling elder. But, as a whole, the Presbyterian Church has held that there is a distinction between ordination to the ministry and that to the eldership, ordination being determined by the end to which it is directed. The elder has been regarded as a representative of the people (though not appointed by or responsible to the people) in the ordering of church affairs, and has fulfilled many of the functions appropriate to the diaconate in the NT. The pattern of the elder’s work within the church corresponds closely to that of the OT “elder of the people.”

R. S. WALLACE

See also CHURCH GOVERNMENT; CHURCH OFFICERS.

Bibliography. G. Bornkamm, TDNT 6:651–683; L. Coenen, NIDNTT 1:188–201; G. D. Henderson, Scottish Ruling Elder; A. A. Hodge, What Is Presbyterianism?; T. M. Lindsay, Church and Ministry in the Early Centuries; T. W. Manson, Church’s Ministry; L. Morris, Ministers of God; K. H. Rengstorf, Apostolate and Ministry; J. M. Ross, What Is an Elder?; E. Schweizer, Church Order in the New Testament; B. H. Streeter, Primitive Church.

Elect, Election. Scripture employs a rich vocabulary to express several aspects of God’s sovereign election, choice, and predestination. Five types of election call for distinction. (1) There is only one reference to “the elect angels” (1 Tim. 5:21; cf. 1 Cor. 6:3; 2 Pet. 2:4; Jude 6). (2) Election to service or office is evident in God’s sovereign choice of David as Israel’s king (1 Sam. 16:7–12) and in Jesus’ choosing of the disciples and apostles (Luke 6:13; John 6:70; 15:16; Acts 9:15; 15:7). (3) The election of Abraham’s descendants to form the theocratic nation of Israel is a common biblical theme (Deut. 4:37; 7:6–7; 10:15; 1 Kings 3:8; Isa. 44:1–2; 45:4; 65:9, 15, 22; Amos 3:2; Acts 13:17; Rom. 9:1–5). The election of Israel originated in God’s sovereign choice, expressed his covenantal love, and served the goal of redemptive history culminating in Jesus Christ. (4) The election of the Messiah is a fourth type of election. Isaiah referred to the servant of the Lord as “my chosen one” (42:1; cf. Matt. 12:18). Of the Synoptics only Luke refers to Jesus as the Chosen One (9:35; 23:35). Peter echoes another Isaiah reference (28:16) in 1 Peter 1:20 and 2:4, 6. These references indicate the unique mediatorial office of Christ and the Father’s pleasure in him. It is an election basic to the final type, (5) election to salvation, with which the rest of this article is concerned.

The most common NT reference to election is God’s eternal election of certain persons to salvation in Jesus Christ. The subject is dealt with comprehensively in Ephesians 1:3–11 and Romans 8:28–11:36. John Calvin, who became a major defender of the Reformed doctrine, saw the whole doctrine of election summarized in Ephesians 1. All the Reformed confessions include divine election, but the Canons of Dort, reflecting the controversy with the Arminians, provide the greatest detail. Election is part of God’s eternal decree, and it has a soteriological role: “That some in time are given faith in God and that others are not given faith proceeds from His eternal decree.” Election is then defined as “the unchangeable purpose of God whereby, before the foundation of the world, out of the whole human race, which had fallen by its own fault out of its original integrity into sin and ruin, He has, according to the most free good pleasure of His will, out of mere grace, chosen in Christ to salvation a certain number of specific men, neither better nor more worthy than others, but with them involved in a common misery.”

Double predestination is the typical Reformed doctrine. The Canons of Dort distinguish election and reprobation because the Scripture “declares that not all men are elect but that certain ones have not been elected, or have been passed by in the eternal election of God. These God out of His most free, most just, blameless, and unchangeable good pleasure has decreed to leave in the common misery into which they have by their own fault plunged themselves, and not to give them saving faith and the grace of conversion” and “finally to condemn and punish them eternally” for all their sins. Predestination thus includes election and reprobation, and reprobation involves both a sovereign passing by (preterition) and a just condemnation.

Principles of Election. Six main features of election deserve attention.

1. Election is a sovereign, eternal decree of God. The elect have been “predestined according to the plan of him who works out everything in conformity with the purpose of his will” (Eph. 1:11). God chose us in Christ “before the creation of the world” (Eph. 1:4). God’s sovereign decree is not arbitrary; “in love he predestined us . . . in accordance with his pleasure and will”

(Eph. 1:4–5; cf. Rom. 8:29). This perspective is reflected in the definition of election quoted above from Dort.

2. The presupposition of God's eternal decree of election is that the human race is fallen; election involves God's gracious rescue plan. It is not based on human works or God's foreknowledge of works (Rom. 9:11). The elect are chosen "to be holy and blameless in his sight"; they are "adopted as his sons through Jesus Christ" (Eph. 1:4–5). Hence election leads to "redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins" (Eph. 1:7). The same perspective is evident in Romans, for those whom "God foreknew he also predestined to be conformed to the likeness of his Son" (8:29). The presupposition is that they are fallen, and hence God's predestination includes calling, justification, and glorification. This presupposition, that the fallen race is the object of predestination, reflects the infralapsarian perspective that is also that of the Canons of Dort.

3. Election is "election in Christ"; election involves rescue from sin and guilt and receiving the gracious gifts of salvation. Election in Christ is evident in the words already quoted from Ephesians 1:4–5, 11 and Romans 8:29. Christ is not merely a subsequent means to effectuate a decree of election; election is in Christ and through Christ. This is clearly expressed in the Canons of Dort: "He has . . . chosen in Christ to salvation. . . . From eternity He has also appointed Christ to be the Mediator and Head of all the elect and the foundation of their salvation. Therefore He decreed to give to Christ those who were to be saved, and effectually to call and draw them into His fellowship through His word and Spirit." Thus, God's election is in Christ, and Christ is both the foundation of election and the foundation of salvation. Calvin also referred to Christ as the mirror of our election.

4. Election involves both the elect's salvation and the means to that end. This is already evident in the repeated references to election in Christ, but it is made even more specific. God chose the elect "to be holy and blameless in his sight, . . . to be adopted as his sons" (Eph. 1:4–5); the elect are those whom God "foreknew . . . predestined . . . called . . . justified . . . glorified" (Rom. 8:29–30). God chose the elect "to be saved through the sanctifying work of the Spirit and through belief in the truth" (2 Thess. 2:13). Hence, the preaching of the gospel is indispensable in effecting God's election (Rom. 10:14–17; cf. Acts 18:9–11). The salvation of the elect has its decretive origin before time, is realized through means in history, and culminates in eternal glorification. This is echoed in the Canons of Dort: "He decreed to give them true faith in Him, to justify them, to sanctify them, and, after having powerfully kept them in the fellowship of His Son, finally to glorify them, for the demonstration of His mercy and the praise of the riches of His glorious grace." This feature of election negates the objection that if one is elect, one will be saved regardless of whether or not one believes. It also excludes the objection that election leads to a libertine spirit; unbelief and careless living are inconsistent with the scriptural doctrine of election.

5. Election (as well as reprobation) is individual, personal, specific, particular. Ephesians refers repeatedly to "us" and "we" in connection with election (1:4–5, 12). In Romans, Paul refers to "those" whom God foreknew, predestined, called, justified, and glorified (8:29–30). Romans 9 indicates that personal election unto salvation was operative within the election of Israel. Paul states that "not all who are descended from Israel are Israel" (9:6, 8), and he shows that "God's purpose in election" distinguished between Isaac and Ishmael, between Jacob and Esau (9:7, 11–13). This is also the implication of the expressions in John 6:37–40; 10:14–16, 26–29; 17:2, 6, 9, 24. Hence, the Canons of Dort refer to election as the selection of "a certain number of specific men" and also state that "not all men are elect but that certain ones have not been elected" but passed by in God's decree. The Westminster Confession expresses this even more emphatically when it refers to the predestined as "particularly and unchangeably designed, and their number so certain and definite that it cannot be either increased or diminished." The Arminians held to an indefinite conditional election, the election of those who believe. The Reformed view took the above Scripture references seriously as well as the comforting assurance that nothing "shall separate us from the love of Christ" and that "in all these things we are more than conquerors through him who loved us" (Rom. 8:35–39). Particular, personal election leads to the believer's comfort and does not promote carelessness or false confidence.

6. Finally, the ultimate goal of election is the glory and praise of God. Election to salvation involves personal privilege, blessing, security, and comfort for the elect. But Scripture makes clear that it is "to the praise of his glorious grace" that everything leads (Eph. 1:6). The elect have been chosen and predestined "in order that we . . . might be for the praise of his glory" (Eph. 1:12). God's goal is "to bring all things in heaven and on earth together under one head, even Christ" (Eph. 1:10; cf. Matt. 13:27–30; 24:31; 1 Pet. 1:1; 2:9). When Paul finished his long discussion of election in Romans, he concluded with a doxology (Rom. 11:33–36). That praise is also echoed in the Reformed confessions; the final glorification of the elect is "for the demonstration of His mercy and praise of the riches of His glorious grace." The Westminster Confession concludes its discussion of God's eternal decree and predes-tionation with similar words: "So shall this doctrine afford matter of praise, reverence, and admiration of God; and of humility, diligence, and abundant consolation to those that sincerely obey the Gospel." F. H. KLOOSTER

Elect, Election

See also DECREES OF GOD; PREDESTINATION; REPROBATION; SOVEREIGNTY OF GOD; SUPRALAPSARIANISM.

Bibliography. G. C. Berkouwer, Divine Election; L. Boettner, Reformed Doctrine of Predestination; J. Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion; P. Y. De Jong, ed., Crisis in the Reformed Churches: Essays in Commemoration of the Great Synod of Dort, 1618–1619; F. H. Klooster, Calvin's Doctrine of Predestination; B. B. Warfield, Selected Shorter Writings of B. B. Warfield; Biblical Doctrines; Studies in Theology.

El-Eloe-Israel. See GOD, NAMES OF.

El Elyon. See GOD, NAMES OF.

Elements, Elemental Spirits. The root meaning of this NT expression (ta stoicheia) is "belonging to a series." It was used to describe, among other things, the order of letters in the alphabet, and hence the elementary principles (the ABCs) of any science or system. This usage is reflected in Hebrews 5:12, where immature Christians are criticized for failing to grow out of their doctrinal infancy. Stoicheia was also widely used in NT times for the four primary elements of the physical world (earth, water, air, and fire). So 2 Peter 3:10, 12 foretells the destruction of the elements on the eschatological day of the Lord.

The meaning Paul attaches to stoicheia is not so clear (Gal. 4:3, 9; Col. 2:8, 20). By "basic principles of the world" he may simply mean world order; that is, the elementary truths of natural religion, expressed in basic ethical precepts, which structure the lives of ordinary people (cf. NIV "basic principles"). Many commentators, however, believe that Paul had supernatural powers in mind (cf. RSV "elemental spirits"). He certainly appears to personify the stoicheia (Gal. 4:2–3) and to link them with angel worship (Col. 2:18). Jewish and early Christian sources attest a widespread belief in spiritual agencies behind the natural elements (2 Esdr. 6:3; Jub. 2:2; Aristides, Apology 3–6, 7.4). If the heresy under attack in Colossians is a syncretistic combination of Eastern religion and Jewish law, Paul's sights may also have been set on the worship of astral deities (stoicheia came in time to mean "stars"; cf. 1 Enoch 80:6).

The main argument against this interpretation is that all the known instances of stoicheia with a spiritual reference occur after the first century A.D. Paul also links bondage to the stoicheia with Jewish legalism. Whatever the Judaizers' failings, it is hard to believe that he meant to accuse them of star worship. Identifying the elemental spirits with the angels who mediated the giving of the law (Gal. 3:19) only aggravates the problem by suggesting an un-Pauline disparagement of the law itself (contra Rom. 9:4–5).

Whether Paul meant to spiritualize the "elements" or not, the theological thrust of his argument is clear. The stoicheia stand for all religious and ethical practices, whether Jewish law-keeping or pagan worship of "no-Gods" (Gal. 4:3–5, 8–9), which belong to life outside Christ. Compared to him, they are all "weak and miserable" (Gal. 4:9). He has triumphed over them and intends his followers to be free from their bondage (Col. 2:20). D. H. FIELD

See also LAW, BIBLICAL CONCEPT OF; PRINCIPALITIES AND POWERS.

Bibliography. C. E. Arnold, Powers of Darkness: Principalities and Powers in Paul's Letters; G. Dellings, TDNT 7:670–87; H.-H. Esser, NIDNTT 2:451–56; D. Guthrie, New Testament Theology; G. E. Ladd, Theology of the New Testament; E. Lohse, Colossians and Philemon.

Elijah. Of four persons so named in the OT, the life of only one is known in detail: Elijah the Tishbite, one of the prophets, who came from the region of Gilead in Transjordan. The name means "Yahweh is God." Elijah's prophetic ministry was conducted in the northern state of Israel, ca. 875–850 B.C., during the Omride Dynasty, principally during the reign of King Ahab and his foreign wife, Jezebel.

In the OT, the principal sources of Elijah's life are to be found in 1 Kings 17–19; 21:17–29; and 2 Kings 1–2. A series of incidents in his life and ministry are known, but it is not possible to reconstruct a complete biography. Elijah is described only in the historical narratives of the OT; unlike many other prophets, no book has been named after him. Key incidents in his life include raising the widow's son, the contest on Mount Carmel with the prophets of Baal, the encounter with God on Mount Horeb, and his departure from this world in a chariot of fire. He was succeeded by his distinguished disciple, Elisha.

In Israel's religion Elijah stood firmly in the tradition of the Mosaic faith and championed a return to the old ways against the encroachments of the foreign religion introduced in Israel by Jezebel. He emphasized a number of important perspectives in Israel's faith. (1) He stressed the dangers of syncretism; the true faith would be lost if it became fused with the religion of Baal-Melqart. (2) He emphasized the intimate relationship between faith and ethics. The incident of Naboth's vineyard (1 Kings 21) illustrates the championing of the just cause of an individual against a monarch's authority. (3) He perceived the international nature of God's power; even an evil foreign king could be used to achieve God's purposes.

In later Judaism, Elijah came to be seen as a forerunner of the messianic age; this view was based in part on his translation and on the prophecy of Malachi (4:5–6). In addition, he is referred to frequently in the Talmud and in the later mystical writings of Judaism as one who visited the rabbis and mystics, instructing them in the meaning of the Torah. Elijah is believed to be present in the contemporary Jewish ritual of circumcision; an empty chair is set out for him, his presence symbolizing faithfulness to the covenant.

Continuity with the Jewish tradition can be observed in NT references to Elijah. Many persons hesitated to accept the message of Jesus, claiming that the kingdom could not come until Elijah had returned; Jesus indicated that Elijah had already appeared in the person of John the Baptist (Mark 9:11–13). Indeed, many people thought that Jesus himself was Elijah (Mark 8:27–28). At the transfiguration Jesus talked with Moses and Elijah, who represented the law and the prophets.

Elijah is also a significant figure in Islam, being referred to several times in the Koran. His attempt to turn people away from the worship of Baal, back to the true faith, is used in Muhammad's preaching to exemplify true prophecy.

P. C. CRAIGIE

Bibliography. J. Gray, I and II Kings; H. H. Rowley, "Elijah on Mount Carmel," BJRL 43:190–210; G. E. Saint-Laurent, "Light from Ras Shamra on Elijah's Ordeal on Mount Carmel," in Scripture in Context, C. D. Evans, W. W. Hallo, and J. B. White, eds.

Ellul, Jacques (1912–1994). French sociologist, ethicist, and theologian. He spent most of his life in Bordeaux, France, where he attained his degrees at the university (including a doctorate in Law). While at the university he converted first to Marxism, then to Christianity. In 1940 he was dismissed from the faculty at Strasbourg because of his opposition to the Vichy government. He participated in the Resistance, was deputy mayor of Bordeaux, and from 1944 to 1980 was professor of the history and sociology of institutions in the faculty of law and economics at the University of Bordeaux. He was also an active member of the Reformed Church of France and a leader in the National Council and the World Council of Churches. His writings are sociological or biblical and theological studies, influenced especially by Marx, Kierkegaard, and Barth.

Ellul argued that the Christian way of freedom, holiness, and love is a radical response of refusal to bow to the principalities and powers of our era. Above all, these powers include what he called "technique": "the totality of methods rationally arrived at and having absolute efficiency (for a given stage development) in every field of human activity." Ellul's concern was the hegemony of technique as it threatened to become the constitutive element of society—the dominant mode of thought and the source of value in everything from science and technology to politics, art, communications, popular culture, and even the church.

In dialectical fashion, Ellul's lifelong project brought together rigorous sociological analysis of the modern world with a Christian response fashioned out of the biblical revelation. The two must be held together for confrontation and mutual criticism: the former helps keep theology relevant and concrete; the latter helps to keep social science from becoming reductionistic.

Ellul's experience of post-World War II politics convinced him of the powerlessness of politics to bring anything but cosmetic changes to society. The church and theology must refuse to be assimilated to the forms and forces of society. Yet Christians live at the juncture of two realms: the Already and the Not Yet of the Kingdom. This leads to an "agnostic" style of life, in the world but not of it. The city is the epitome of human pride and self-sufficiency, yet we yearn for the New Jerusalem. The state is both God-ordained and the Great Babylon. Reality is fraught with opposites and contraries.

To understand Ellul one must observe this dialectical nature of reality, epistemology, and even biblical revelation. Indeed, even Ellul's books must be read dialectically—one an answer to another.

D. L. OKHOLM

Bibliography. J. Ellul, Presence of the Kingdom; Subversion of Christianity; Technological Society; What I Believe; Christians and Van Hook, eds., Jacques Ellul: Interpretive Essays; "Between Chaos and Paralysis," in CCen (June 5, 1968); Ethics of Freedom.

Elohim. See GOD, NAMES OF.

El Shaddai. See GOD, NAMES OF.

Elyah. See GOD, NAMES OF.

Emanation. The English word used to describe the Greek aporroia, "a flowing down from," which became a technical term for Greek philosophers such as Empedocles, who employs the idea of emanation to connect external realities with mind perceptions. In Philo the Logos doctrine becomes the first stage of bridging the gap between the transcendent God and the world of sense perception or between the realm of unity and world of plurality. Plotinus seeks to interpret the move from transcendence to the world of sense by an analogy to light and its weakened intensity as it moves farther from its source.

Emanation

In the Gnostic systems the concept of emanation becomes the basis for explaining the problem of evil through the development of a defect in the Godhead itself. The emanation process in a Valentinian structure begins with a transcendent pair of deities—"ultimate depth" and "silence"—and ends with a defective "Sophia" or "wisdom" who is subject to a "fall" or defection from her intended state.

In the Middle Ages the Neoplatonic ideas of Plotinus and others were mixed with Christian perspectives and gave birth to the mysticism of thinkers like John Scotus Erigena. The universal is real, and a causal process gives birth to the particular. Thus, the created order is really God unfolded into particularities. This unfolding process is basically the emanation process of Plotinus, and the angels of Christian mysticism are conceived according to Neoplatonic order.

G. L. BORCHERT

See also GNOSTICISM; MYSTICISM; NEOPLATONISM.

Ember Days. In Roman Catholicism and Anglicanism, these days are Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday of the four Ember weeks. They occur in the weeks after the feast of St. Lucy (December 13), Ash Wednesday, Pentecost, and Holy Cross Day (September 14). Originally in the fifth century there were three Ember weeks corresponding to the agricultural festivals of sowing time, corn harvest, and vintage time. A fourth was added by the seventh century. The twelve days were seen as times for prayer, fasting, and almsgiving. In modern times they have been retained but with modifications in their intentions. They can be associated either with special prayer for those to be ordained in the church or with special prayer for the needs of the world.

P. TOON

See also CHRISTIAN YEAR.

Emerson, Ralph Waldo (1803–1882). American transcendentalist, essayist, poet. A child of the Puritans, Emerson fathered a cultural tradition his spiritual ancestors might well have deplored. He helped to sever the final ties of that tradition to the historic Christian faith, and he is considered the central figure in the birth and growth of a distinct American literature. Because of his immediate impact upon Thoreau, Hawthorne, Whitman, Melville, and Dickinson, and his continuing influence upon figures as diverse as William James, Robert Frost, and Henry Ford, it is all but impossible to imagine the development of American literary and cultural life without Emerson.

Emerson attended Harvard and followed a long family tradition by training for the ministry. Yet though the Unitarianism of Emerson's day required little specific theological commitment, Emerson found even its limited requirements stifling. He resigned his own pastorate in 1832 in a dispute over the Lord's Supper. True radical Protestant that he was, Emerson questioned both the morality and efficacy of any historical event or ritual that claimed to mediate the soul's direct experience of God.

To the training in liberal Christianity and commonsense realism he had received at home and at Harvard, Emerson added through his reading the influences of the controversial sectarian Emanuel Swedenborg, the Neoplatonist philosopher Plotinus, the English poet and critic Samuel Taylor Coleridge, and through Coleridge the German philosopher Immanuel Kant. Countless scattered references to these and other sources made their way into Emerson's journals and eventually into the lectures and essays through which he established his fame in the late 1830s and 1840s. Having abandoned pulpit and sermon, he found in lectern and lecture a forum perfectly suited to his needs.

In that forum he preached a message of romantic idealism that was distinctly his own and distinctly American. In Nature (1836), Essays, First Series (1841), Essays, Second Series (1844), and Representative Men (1850), Emerson exhorted his audiences to lead lives of self-reliant rectitude and purpose. He took many underlying themes in the American experience—a disdain for the past, a distrust of authority, an unbridled faith in the future—and made them the manifest content of his artistic and religious faith. "Imitation is suicide," Emerson proclaimed in "Self-Reliance," and he repeatedly preached the need for American writers to free themselves from bondage to the English literary tradition and the need for American spirituality to break with historic Christianity. Instead of a faith bound to what he thought to be the dead letter of Scripture and tradition, Emerson called, in "Divinity School Address," for "a faith like Christ's in the infinitude of man." In his loftier moments Emerson foresaw nothing less than the total regeneration of historical life, a secularized millennium ushered in through the exercise of American principles.

R. LUNDIN

See also TRANSCENDENTALISM.

Bibliography. G. W. Allen, Waldo Emerson: A Biography; F. O. Matthiessen, American Renaissance: Art and Expression in the Age of Emerson and Whitman; J. Porte, Representative Man: Ralph Waldo Emerson in His Time; R. Richardson, Emerson: The Mind on Fire; S. Whicher, Selections from Ralph Waldo Emerson.

Emmanuel. See IMMANUEL.

Emotion. Emotions have been viewed by Christians in a variety of ways. Some see them as one of God's finest gifts to humankind, reflecting something of the divine nature and bestowing richness on personal functioning. Others have viewed them as a serious complication to life; sometimes they are even seen to be a result of the fall. This ambivalence has been heightened in recent years by the attention given to emotions by modern psychology, with some psychologists even telling us to trust our emotions as a guide for behavior. Sensitivity groups encourage free emotional expression. Many Christians have recoiled from this culture of emotionality.

An understanding of the intended role of emotions in personality must begin with the creation account in Scripture. God created humanity in his image and pronounced that the created product was good. Emotionality was part of the original creation and not a consequence of the fall. This is clear from the record of Eve experiencing delight in considering the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil (Gen. 3:6).

But if humanity was created with emotions and described as being in God's image, then God must have emotions. Indeed, the biblical record makes it abundantly clear that this is the case. God is described as experiencing sorrow (Gen. 6:5–6), anger (Deut. 13:17), pleasure (Ps. 149:4), and a number of other emotions. An examination of the life of Jesus makes this point even more forcefully. Jesus is reported to have experienced anger on numerous occasions (Matt. 23; Mark 3:1–5; John 2:14–22). He also experienced fear (Matt. 26:38–39), grief (John 11:35), sadness (Luke 19:41–42), joy (John 15:11), compassion (Mark 1:41), and love (John 14:31). So characteristic were emotions of our Lord that we call him the Man of Sorrows.

In the Bible a great deal of emphasis is given to emotional states in the description of individuals. In fact, Scripture not only speaks about emotions, it also speaks to and through our emotions. The Bible itself is emotional literature, filled with emotional expression and designed not just to communicate with our rationality but also to stir us emotionally, thus affirming our emotionality.

Yet discovering God's affirmation of emotions does not answer our question about their intended role in personality. God makes us emotional creatures because he is emotional in nature and wished to create us like himself. But how are we to respond to our emotions? Can they be trusted as a guide for behavior?

An answer to these difficult questions must begin with the realization that our emotionality bears the marks of the fall. Expressions of emotion can be sinful; for example, Paul warns us that such can be the case with our anger (Eph. 4:26, 31). However, Christ's example teaches us that it is possible for the expression of anger to be an act of righteousness (Mark 3:5). It would seem that any emotional expression has the potential of being either God-honoring or God-displeasing.

The response of some Christians to this realization has been to suppress emotional expression. They feel that while they may not be able to control the experience of the emotion, they certainly can control its expression. Rather than have their life complicated by deciding between appropriate and inappropriate expressions, they simplify matters by attempting to minimize emotional expression. However, such emotional suppression is not only the cause of many psychological problems, it should probably also be seen as sinful response to emotion in that it violates God's intentions. Emotions were given in order to energize behavior and were intended by God to be a catalyst for action. Because of the fall, they are imperfect guides to behavior, so we cannot simply "do as we feel." But we must pay attention to our feelings. Only when they are acknowledged can the appropriate response be made.

Christianity alone of the world's religions gives man's emotional life a balanced place. In contrast to the Stoics, who viewed emotion as irrational, and the Epicureans, who acquiesced to the inevitability of emotions, Jesus realistically faced emotion in man's life and provided us with guidelines for emotional expression. Life gains an intensity and richness when emotions are used as valid means of relating to the world, other people, and to God. Therefore, Christians should thank God for their emotions and allow them to enrich their lives in the ways God intended.

D. G. BENNER

Bibliography. J. E. Eccles, Human Psyche; E. Lutzer, Managing Your Emotions; J. E. Pedersen, "Some Thoughts on a Biblical View of Anger," JPT 2:210–15; B. B. Warfield, "The Emotional Life of Our Lord," in Person and Work of Christ, S. G. Craig, ed.

Empiricism. The philosophical theory that all ideas are derived from experience, asserting that both internal and external experience are the sole foundation of true knowledge and of science. While Enlightenment figures such as John Locke and Francis Bacon have been associated with the empiricist approach, David Hume is the clearest representative of empiricism. In his Enquiry Concerning Human Understanding, Hume maintained that all of one's knowledge of the world is the product of experience. While one can know the relation between ideas with certainty, their actual reality cannot be established beyond probability. Thus, the true nature and scope of ordinary and scientific knowledge can be revealed only by a "science of man," founded on experience and observation. In Hume's view observation and experience teach that all thoughts are derived from past experience. In contrast to the blind person, for example, people can think about colors because they have seen them. It is from a person's impressions that all of his or her ideas are ultimately derived. Impressions are one's forceful and lively perceptions, whereas ideas are nothing but faint copies of impressions. A remembered pain, according to Hume, is obviously less vivid a perception than a felt pain.

Empiricism

Hume's empiricism established a criterion for meaning and significance that has been adopted by many since his time. Complex ideas are only combinations of simple ideas. Thus, the idea of a "golden mountain" is only the joining together of two previously experienced simple ideas, "gold" and "mountain." Since the simple ideas are copies of impressions, one can test the meaningfulness of both scientific and philosophical statements by asking, "From what impression is that supposed idea derived?" If it is impossible to assign any, one should be suspicious of that statement. Any truth discoverable by thought alone never tells one about the world, but only about internal relations between one's ideas. Such a truth is a statement true only by definition, the denial of which is self-contradictory; e.g., "All spinsters are unmarried." Therefore, in the empirical approach, all reasoning about relations of ideas—e.g., logic, arithmetic, geometry, algebra—is analytic and based on the principle of noncontradiction; all reasoning about matters of fact—e.g., physics, chemistry, one's everyday knowledge—is based upon merely probable past observations and experiences.

While "all ideas are derived from experience" is the crux of empiricism, the word empirical has been overused and misapplied to such an extent that in the last two centuries ideological incompatibles such as Francis Bacon, Thomas Hobbes, Immanuel Kant, William James, Henri Bergson, Rudolf Carnap, and Edmund Husserl have been designated at one time or another as empiricists. Most of this confusion results from differences in definition and interpretation of "ideas," "derived from," and "experience." Since Hume comes closest to a thoroughgoing empiricism, the problems with the empiricist approach are seen perhaps most clearly in his criteria. When his criteria are applied consistently, they narrow the scope of genuine knowledge almost to a vanishing point. For example, when Hume applied his criteria to the scientific method (induction), he concluded that because empirical generalization is founded on the principle of cause and effect, and because cause and effect cannot itself be clearly confirmed by experience, the scientific method has no certain foundations. In fact, such empirical principles led Hume to declare that one could not know whether physical things (such as a body, house, or tree) actually existed. All one could ascertain was that there have been and are particular impressions and ideas of physical things.

The root problem with any form of empiricism is that of the relation of discourse concerning experience to the factual or empirical data. It involves the relation between experiences and the "meanings" by which experiences can be conceptualized, articulated, and communicated. Since there may be a variety of interpretations of what constitutes an experience, any appeal to experience as the sole arbiter of meaning and significance is problematical. Such an appeal is completely dependent on which interpretation of the experience one applies. This problem was particularly apparent when twentieth century logical positivists attempted to construct a unified approach to all areas of knowledge and science. This attempt failed because logical positivists were unable to keep theoretical interpretations from entering into their "observation" language.

Empiricism has been applied to theology in various ways. Hume believed in studying religion scientifically because there was nothing unique about religious experience. Friedrich Schleiermacher did believe that religious experience was unique, and he believed that theology could only provide symbols for describing the great diversity of man's religious experiences. Therefore, every man must have a private description of his feelings, an individual theology. Some would suggest that Schleiermacher is the source of all the "religious experience" theories current today. Liberal theologians of the latter nineteenth and early twentieth centuries applied the scientific method to religion, attempting to reconstruct the Christian faith in accordance with the "modern" findings of science. Thus, a proper Christian understanding of the world and its progress required the empirical method. This desire to harmonize the Christian faith with the empirical method of science is not merely a modern liberal phenomenon but also can be found in the eighteenth century natural theologies of conservative writers such as William Paley and Bishop Butler. Some modern conservatives, such as John Warwick Montgomery, have continued this trend.

D. A. RAUSCH

See also HUME, DAVID; LIBERALISM, THEOLOGICAL; POSTMODERNISM.

Bibliography. A. J. Ayer, Problem of Knowledge; J. W. Montgomery, Shape of the Past; H. Morich, ed., Challenges to Empiricism; A. Pasch, Experience and the Analytic.

Encratites. A group who practiced an ascetic mode of life, including permanent abstinence from eating meat, drinking wine, and marriage. They appeared first in the second century. The early church viewed such permanent abstinence as wrong because it denigrated God's creation. While it cannot be decisively proved that the Encratites were Gnostics, they were considered heretical by some early writers—e.g., Irenaeus, Hippolytus, and Eusebius of Caesarea. Their stress on permanent abstinence was certainly a Gnostic trait. Some of the best-known followers of this extremely ascetic mode of life were Tatian, Marcion, and Saturninus. These men added theological heresy to the practical heresy of extreme asceticism.

J. H. HALL

Bibliography. Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History; R. M. Grant, "The Heresy of Tatian," JTS new series 5:62–68.

End of the World. See ESCHATOLOGY.

Energumen. See DEMON, DEMONIZATION.

Enlightenment, The. The Age of Enlightenment (German Die Aufklärung), also known as the Age of Reason, reached its climax in the eighteenth century. Its roots, however, reach back into the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries and even beyond.

Definition. A classic definition was given by Immanuel Kant in an article for the Berlin Monthly Journal (1784) in answer to the question, "What is enlightenment?" Kant replied that enlightenment was humanity's coming of age. It was the emergence from the immaturity that caused human beings to rely on such external authorities as the Bible, the church, and the state to tell them what to think and do. No generation should be bound by the creeds and customs of bygone ages. To be so bound was an offense against human nature, whose destiny lies in progress. Kant admitted that the eighteenth century was not yet an enlightened age, but it was the age of enlightenment. The barriers to progress were coming down; the field was now open. The motto of enlightenment was Sapere aude—"Dare to be wise," meaning "Have courage to use your own understanding."

The Enlightenment has often been viewed as a cultural phenomenon with three key clusters of ideas: Reason, Nature, and Progress. More recently it has been seen as the ideology that characterizes the "modern" period, in contrast to the premodern period (i.e., before the advent of Descartes's rationalism in the sixteenth century) and in contrast to postmodernism (with its stress on relativistic cultural and historical conditioning). However, such characterization should not be allowed to obscure the fact that the Enlightenment also fostered a revival of ideals from classical antiquity—a fact amply attested by the architecture and artistic fashions of the period and vividly illustrated by the mottos adopted by prominent advocates. Kant's Sapere aude was taken from Horace's Epistles 1.2.40. The motto of England's leading scientific body, the Royal Society, was also taken from Horace:

Nullius in verba (1.1.14), i.e., "Not bound by anyone's authority." Esteem for the classical pagan past found expression not only in the rich allusions that pervade Enlightenment literature, but also in the way that leading thinkers like David Hume (1711–76) and Thomas Jefferson (1743–1826) saw themselves as modern counterparts to Epicurus. Widespread interest was shown in Cicero's On the Nature of the Gods, which provided the model for Hume's Dialogues on Religion. The term Empiricism, which initially was used as a term of abuse for skeptics, derives ultimately from the name of the ancient skeptic Sextus Empiricus.

The great figures of the Enlightenment were thinkers who embraced a variety of disciplines. Their thought represented an interplay between science, religion, philosophy, social thought, and political theory. It was enriched by international travel and personal contact with scholars of other nations. On the continent of Europe, especially in Germany, the Enlightenment was linked with the founding and growth of state universities. Despite its desire to transcend the bounds of culture, the Enlightenment was not free from cultural conditioning. It took different forms in Britain, France, Germany, and America. These forms were shaped by the prevailing situation in church and state.

Political Theory. Enlightened political theory was in part a reaction to the view inherited from the pre-Reformation and Reformation churches that existing forms of government were endorsed by divine sanction. In England the conflict came early with the Civil War, which ended in victory for Parliament and the execution of King Charles I (1649). However, the restoration of the monarchy in 1660 and subsequent political upheavals made urgent the questions of the source of political authority and of the role and limits of political and religious dissent. The leading English thinker in this area was John Locke (1632–1704), who himself had been exiled in Holland for a period. Locke advocated a theory of social contract between all free persons in order to preserve life, freedom, and property under natural law. Not even monarchs were exempt from such law. In trying to get absolute power, they put themselves in a state of war with the people. If no other redress could be found, the people may resort to war.

Locke's ideas were influential in France and America. It was not accidental that such leading figures and thinkers in the American Revolution as Jefferson, Franklin, and Paine enjoyed close ties with their French enlightened counterparts. Both the Declaration of Independence of the United States of America (1776) and the Statement of Human and Civil Rights ratified by the French National Assembly (1789) bear the stamp of enlightened thinking. Both appealed to truths that were deemed to be self-evident. Although some reference to God or a Supreme Being was retained, such concepts as life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness (American) and freedom, property, security, and the right to protect oneself from violence (French) were regarded as naturally valid.

Linked with these ideas was an enlightened philosophy of government that implicitly rejected the idea that kings and governments had been appointed by God with inalienable rights to govern. Governments were now said to derive their authority from the consent of the governed. Essential sovereignty resides in the nation as a whole and not simply in those who govern. Laws may be changed to meet the needs and desires of the subjects. Likewise governments may be changed when they become injurious to the governed. Underlying all this was the idea of the social contract, which had been put forward by Thomas Hobbes in the seventeenth century and restated by John Locke and Jean-Jacques Rousseau. The latter saw society based on an implicit social pact that combined freedom with just government in the interests of the majority. All society involves compromise by which individual members accept certain constraints in order to achieve the maximum liberty for all.

The classic documents of the American and French Revolutions with their allusions to God represent a middle stage between the traditional Christian view of the state and modern secular democracy. Calvin had seen the state as a divinely appointed instrument for the protection of law and order, the maintenance of morals, and the promotion of true religion, all based on the Word of God. The enlightened view of the state did not dismiss God altogether. In general, enlightened thinkers adopted a deistic view of God, acknowledging his existence as creator but leaving the conduct of life to humanity and human reason. The enlightened view of the state acknowledged the deity but proposed essentially humanistic goals for society, insisting that both the ends and the means should be determined by reason acting in accordance with nature.

Nature. The theme of nature figured large in enlightened thought. Nature embodied both the beautiful and the good. It was also eminently accessible to the right use of reason. The high esteem in which nature was held was linked in part to the fact that it was simply there as self-evident reality and in part to the prestige of modern science, exemplified in Isaac Newton's mechanistic view of a world governed by rational laws. Although God was the ultimate author of such laws, nature was to be explained on its own terms without reference to God. In private life Newton (1642–1727) devoted considerable energy to the study of prophecy and biblical interpretation. His unpublished writings indicate leanings away from orthodoxy. In France the enlightened view of an orderly, rational world found expression in the Encyclopedia (1751–65) edited by Diderot and d'Alembert. It described itself as "an analytical dictionary of the sciences, arts and trades." It proved to be a platform for skeptical attacks on religion and for progressive political views.

Education. Not all enlightened thinkers went so far as the atheism of Baron d'Holbach, but many shared the convictions expressed in his System of Nature (1770) that man is unhappy because he is ignorant of nature. D'Holbach saw religion as a barrier to a true understanding of nature. Somewhat earlier Jean-Jacques Rousseau (1712–78) had eulogized the myth of the noble savage. Repudiating the Christian doctrine of the fall, Rousseau held that man is noble by nature. He is born free, but everywhere he finds himself in chains. His enslavement is due to the corruption of society, for which religion must bear a large share of the blame. As a remedy Rousseau's Émile (1762) proposed a theory of education based on nature. Ideally, children would be educated away from the harmful influences of society and the church. They would be allowed to follow their own inclinations rather than being coerced into learning or adopting patterns of behavior. They would find things out for themselves, happily turning to the teacher, whose role would be to facilitate their free inquiry. In this way Rousseau and the Enlightenment laid the foundations for much modern educational theorizing.

Religion. In France, Rousseau and Voltaire led the attack on the church and institutional Christianity. At the same time they both professed belief in a supreme being. Rousseau's religion denounced all creeds beyond the assertion that natural religion was based on feeling and that all beliefs should be brought "to the bar of reason and conscience." God was not a fit subject for argument and debate. He is known already in the depths of our being. Voltaire (1694–1778), on the other hand, professed a theism based on the order and rationality of the world. Just as a watch proves a watchmaker, so a universe proves a God. On this basis Voltaire urged tolerance of all religions except that of the institutional church, against which he directed his celebrated slogan, "Blot out the infamous one."

Voltaire's thoughts on religion were heavily indebted to the English deists, whose ideas he got to know during his exile in London. The deists claimed that true religion was the religion of reason and nature, and that Christianity, which was perverted by "priestcraft," should be made to conform to this view. They were highly critical of the traditional appeal, made by Christian apologists, to fulfilled prophecy and miracles as proof of divine attestation of Christianity. They argued that the Old Testament passages that were alleged to be fulfilled did not really predict the events concerned, and that the New Testament miracles did not really happen. However, other enlightened thinkers took a more positive view of traditional Christianity. In Analogy of Religion, Natural and Revealed, to the Constitution and Course of Nature (1736), Joseph Butler (1692–1752) argued that the presupposition of “an intelligent Author and Governor of nature” was the necessary condition of belief in the rationality of the universe and in the genuine objectivity of moral values. The Scottish “Common Sense” philosopher, Thomas Reid (1710–96), developed a theory of situated rationality that not only provided an alternative to the skepticism of David Hume, but also anticipated twentieth-century criticisms of foundationalism. In America Jonathan Edwards (1703–58) drew on enlightenment philosophy and science to restate classical Calvinism.

The quest of the historical Jesus owes its impetus to the Enlightenment. Its origin is widely credited to the Hamburg teacher Hermann Samuel Reimarus (1694–1768). Many of his ideas, however, were derived from the English Deists who maintained that the Christ of orthodox faith was very different from the Jesus of history. Reimarus wrote a private Defense of the Rational Worshippers of God, which portrayed Jesus as a simple Galilean preacher whose moral teaching got mixed up with politics and eschatology and who died a disillusioned man, having vainly tried to establish the kingdom of God on earth. Christianity is based on the fraudulent claims of the resurrection and the second coming of Christ, which the disciples invented after Jesus’ death. Extracts from Reimarus’s manuscript were posthumously published by Gotthold Ephraim Lessing (1729–81), the dramatist and essayist who pretended to have discovered them in the library of the Duke of Brunswick. Lessing suggested that they might have been the work of a long-deceased heretic. He himself did not defend Reimarus’s ideas. Instead, he questioned whether the truth of any religion could be settled by appeals to history. Like other enlightened thinkers, Lessing viewed the major religions as different expressions of the one true religion whose role is to provide a moral education for the human race, teaching all men to live as brothers.

To many of similar persuasions in the eighteenth century Freemasonry offered an attractive ideal, combining altruistic beliefs with esoteric ritual, seeming to offer the enlightened thinker a superior view of life and reality. On both sides of the Atlantic, Freemasonry enjoyed renewed popularity among the enlightened.

Limitations. The Age of Enlightenment was characterized by the desire for a superior, more rational view of everything. It was a desire that contained within itself the seeds of its own destruction. In the hands of the Scottish philosopher David Hume (1711–76), enlightened criticism was turned back on itself. Hume used skeptical, empirical philosophy to question the powers of the human mind. Not only was Hume critical of religion; he was skeptical of one’s knowledge of the world outside one’s self and of the power of the human mind to know anything for certain. Kant’s philosophy of mind was in part an answer to Hume, but many felt that Kant had given back Hume’s problem as if it were the answer. The philosophy of Immanuel Kant (1724–1804) was the last great attempt by an enlightened thinker to work out a truly enlightened philosophy of reality. His Critique of Pure Reason (1781, 2d ed. 1787) sought to show how the human mind is limited by the conditions under which it functions. Thus, the “Forms of Intuition” (time and space) and the “Categories of Understanding” (Quantity, Quality, Relation, and Modality) make human understanding possible and at the same time impose limits on what is understood. Kant’s Foundations for the Metaphysics of Morals (1785) and Critique of Practical Reason (1788) sought to place ethics on a rational objective basis. However, his teaching left unanswered the question of why behavior should be based on the principles that Kant proposed. Kant’s Religion within the Limits of Reason Alone (1793) reduced religion to ethics and treated Jesus as an enlightened moral teacher and example.

By the beginning of the nineteenth century, the Enlightenment had already given way to idealism in philosophy and to classicism and romanticism in the arts. Hume and Kant had shaken confidence in human rational capacities, and the Enlightenment’s lofty confidence in innate human goodness and rationality seemed increasingly misplaced as the French Revolution took its course and the Napoleonic Wars plunged Europe into turmoil. Nevertheless, the Enlightenment left its mark on the modern mind. Many of the ideas that are taken for granted in Western society have their origin in the Age of Enlightenment.

C. BROWN

See also BUTLER, JOSEPH; DEISM; EDWARDS, JONATHAN; HUME, DAVID; IDEALISM; KANT, IMMANUEL; LOCKE, JOHN; ROMANTICISM; SCOTTISH REALISM.

Bibliography. K. Barth, Protestant Theology in the Nineteenth Century; C. L. Becker, Heavenly City of the Eighteenth-Century Philosophers; L. I. Bredvold, Brave New World of the Enlightenment; C. Brown, Christianity and Western Thought; Jesus in European Protestant Thought, 1768–1860; J. B. Bury, Idea of Progress; E. Cassirer, Philosophy of the Enlightenment; O. Chadwick, Secularization of the European Mind in the 19th Century; F. Copleston, History of Philosophy; H. N. Fairchild, Noble Savage; P. Gay, Enlightenment; C. E. Gunton, Enlightenment and Alienation; E. Halévy, Enlightenment, The

Growth of Philosophic Radicalism; P. Hazard, European Mind, 1680–1715; European Thought in the Eighteenth Century; J. F. Lively, Enlightenment; R. O. Rockwood, ed., Carl Becker's "Heavenly City" Revisited; F. J. Teggart, ed., Idea of Progress; N. Wolterstorff, Reason within the Bounds of Religion.

Environment. See NATURE, THEOLOGY OF.

Envy. In the OT qānā' and its derivatives are translated "envy" and, in some cases, "jealousy" or "zeal." The root meaning of the Hebrew verb is "to become intensely red," i.e., the blush resulting from emotion.

OT representative occurrences are Genesis 30:1—where Rachel becomes envious ("jealous" in NASB, NEB, TEV) of her sister Leah, who gives children to their husband Jacob while she remains barren—and Genesis 37:11, where Joseph's brothers are jealous (RSV, NASB, NEB, TEV) of him after hearing the interpretation of his dream.

In several OT passages there is anthropomorphic reference to God's jealousy (Exod. 20:5, in the context of the commandment against worship of other Gods; Deut. 4:24, the admonition against worship of images). Calvin observes regarding the second commandment: "This is as if [God] were saying that it was he alone to whom we ought to hold fast. . . . We are not to transfer to another what belongs to him" (Institutes of the Christian Religion 2; 8.16.18).

The OT expressions "evil eye" and "to eye" also indicate envy and jealousy. In 1 Samuel 18:9 the verb designates Saul's envy of David following the latter's publicly acclaimed victories. A further implication is that the envy results from Saul's being overtaken by an evil spirit after the Spirit of God had departed from him (1 Sam. 16:14–16). Consistent with OT rejection of dualism, the evil spirit is characterized as being from God.

The term "evil eye" also occurs in the NT (Mark 7:22 where, in a catalog of sinful acts, it clearly means envy). Envy and jealousy in the NT are chiefly translations of phthoneō and phthonos. The verb is used in Galatians 5:26, "envying each other," which is contrasted with being led by the Spirit. As D. H. Field observes, envy is featured in several of the lists of vices found in the Pauline Epistles. In Romans 1:29 it is "an identification of those given up by God to a base mind"; in Galatians 5:21, a work of the flesh; in Titus 3:3, a characteristic of life prior to conversion that is to be put off by those who have experienced salvation; and in 1 Timothy 6:4, "it is symptomatic of pseudo-Christian teaching which trades on controversy and wordy dispute."

Envy, not loyalty to Rome, no doubt motivated the Jews to deliver Jesus to trial and to call for his crucifixion (see esp. Mark 15:10), a fact discerned by Pilate (Matt. 27:18).

The meaning of phthonos in James 4:5 is widely debated. The reference may be either to the envious nature of the human spirit given to humankind by God (TEV, NEB), or to the characteristic of God who "yearns jealously [cf. Exod. 20:5] over the spirit which he has made to dwell in us" (RSV). S. Laws gives a full review of the discussion.

While jealousy may in rare instances have a good connotation, envy is universally bad. The most telling biblical example is its ruinous and deadly effect upon Saul, whose envy of David "did more to break his health than his advancing years" (R. McCracken). Envy merits well its place among the cardinal sins. V. CRUZ

Bibliography. D. H. Field, NIDNTT 1:557–58; S. Laws, Epistle of James; R. J. McCracken, What Is Sin? What Is Virtue?

Ephesus, Council of (431). There were two Councils of Ephesus. The first, held in 431, is reckoned by all as the third ecumenical council (following Nicea in 325 and Constantinople in 381). The second is termed the Robber Synod of Ephesus. It occurred in 449 and by manipulation and force attempted to exonerate Eutyches and compromise orthodoxy. Pope Leo I immediately denounced it, giving it the label by which it has been known.

At issue in Ephesus in 431 were the christological concept theotokos (mother of God) as applied to the Virgin Mary, the personality of Nestorius, patriarch of Constantinople, and the rivalry between Alexandria and Constantinople. Cyril of Alexandria supported the concept of Mary as the mother of God, i.e., that Jesus Christ was God the Word and man fully joined. Nestorius apparently believed that in Jesus Christ the Logos and a human person were joined in a harmony of action but not in a single personhood; he objected to the term theotokos. The final actions of this council included the condemnation of Nestorius, the excommunications of John of Antioch, Theodoret of Cyr, and their adherents, and the banning of any creed other than the Nicene.

In character the Council of Ephesus in 431 was almost as turbulent as the Robber Synod. It was convoked by Emperor Theodosius II; convened June 7, 431, by Cyril of Alexandria before the Eastern bishops arrived; on June 22 Nestorius was condemned; June 26 the Eastern bishops arrived with John of Antioch and held their own council condemning Cyril; Emperor Theodosius II then issued a rescript annulling the premature decisions of Cyril and his council. The papal legates arrived, and in their presence Cyril's half of the council met again on July 10–11 and again condemned Nestorius. In August, Theodosius issued a rescript ordering the bishops home and deposing Nestorius, Cyril, and Memnon and ordering their arrest. Cyril escaped and returned to Alexandria in triumph, while Nestorius was confined to a monastery. It was not until 433 that Cyril and John of Antioch hammered out a compromise accepting Mary as theotokos, "because the Word of God has become flesh and is made man," asserting that Christ's natures were distinguishable but united in one person, and condemning Nestorius. Pope Sixtus III then ratified Cyril's Ephesus Council, and the Council of Chalcedon in 451 confirmed this certification of Ephesus as the third ecumenical council.

V. L. WALTER

See also CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA; ECUMENICAL COUNCILS; NESTORIUS, NESTORIANISM.

Bibliography. W. P. Dubose, Ecumenical Councils; J. L. Neve, History of Christian Thought; R. Rainy, Ancient Catholic Church.

Epicureanism. Epicurus (341–270 B.C.) established a school in ancient Athens that became famous for its teachings on ethics in the Hellenistic world. Reality was understood to be composed of indivisible, qualitatively similar atoms of matter eternally "falling" in empty space. To account for human agency in a mechanistically material universe, Epicurus posited an unexplainable swerve in the travel of some atoms that caused them to strike other atoms unpredictably. This, in turn, caused a chain reaction that resulted in the physical world we know inhabited by human agents.

At the present life is all a person will have, and as there are no supernatural beings to fear or obey, the good life is the one bringing the most pleasure or happiness now. However, the wise person will learn to distinguish between natural desires and unnatural ones. Not only are unnatural desires impossible to satisfy, but they also cause negative repercussions in the person who tries to satisfy them. Of the natural desires, the one to choose for supreme happiness is the desire for physical and mental repose. Since the greatest disturbers of mental repose are the fear of death and the fear of a supernatural meddling in human affairs, elimination of these beliefs through the espousal of mechanistic materialism is advantageous.

The kinds of acts Epicurus held to be the most pleasure producing are those characterized by justice, honesty, and simplicity. But he failed to notice that unless everyone would derive the most pleasure from such actions always, these virtuous acts would hinder or compete with attainment of the highest good, which is pleasure. He was so much a part of his culture that he assumed what it regarded as virtuous, such as honesty, would bring the most pleasure. He does not seem to have considered the possibility that a dishonest act might bring more pleasure to someone, thereby being a more virtuous act. Apparently Epicurus was confused as to whether honesty is a means to an end—i.e., pleasure—or an end in itself. This confusion lies behind the fact that Epicureanism has come to be a term used for profligacy and luxury. Pleasure of the individual—egocentric hedonism—as the highest good can just as easily lead to debauchery and extreme selfishness as it can to the simple, honest lifestyle of Epicurus.

The apostle Paul preached to a group of Epicureans in Athens, emphasizing the incarnation and resurrection of Jesus (Acts 17:16–32). They were evidently not very impressed with what he had to say.

S. R. OBITTS

Bibliography. A. H. Armstrong, Introduction to Ancient Philosophy; C. Bailey, Epicurus: The Extant Remains; Greek Atomists and Epicurus; É. Bréhier, Hellenistic and Roman Age; F. Copleston, History of Philosophy; P. Merlan, Studies in Epicurus and Aristotle; W. J. Oates, ed., Stoic and Epicurean Philosophers; G. K. Stradach, Philosophy of Epicurus.

Epiphany. This word is a transliteration of the Greek epiphaneia, which means a disclosure or unveiling. In the history of the Christian church it has been used to refer to various occasions on which the incarnate Lord Jesus Christ was revealed to various groups of people at his birth, the coming of the magi, his baptism, and the wedding at Cana (first miracle), as well as when he will be revealed at his second coming. Consequently, the word has come to be used liturgically to refer to the festival at which this revelation of Christ is celebrated. By the fourth century the Eastern church remembered all these facts on January 6. Clement of Alexandria had earlier referred to a Gnostic sect who kept a feast on this day in honor of Jesus' baptism. The Western church (certainly in Rome) appears to have observed December 25 as the birthday of Jesus from at least 336, and so January 6 was then kept as a day for commemorating his subsequent manifestation to the Gentiles at the visit of the magi.

The origins of the festival are far from clear, and the issue has been further confused by variations in calendar between Eastern and Western churches, some following the Julian and others the Gregorian.

D. H. WHEATON

See also CHRISTIAN YEAR.

Bibliography. J. Gunstone, Christmas and Epiphany; A. A. McArthur, Evolution of the Christian Year; T. J. Talley, Origins of the Liturgical Year.

Episcopacy. See CHURCH GOVERNMENT.

Episcopius, Simon

Episcopius, Simon (1583–1643). Remonstrant leader. A native of Amsterdam and student at the University of Leiden under Arminius, Episcopius was banished by the Synod of Dort for his able defense of the Arminian position. He published Confessio (1622) while in exile. Returning to Holland in 1634, he published a systematic exposition of Arminianism in four volumes, Institutiones Theologicae (1650–51).

Challenging four of the basic tenets of orthodox Calvinism, the Remonstrant movement achieved its fullest statement in Episcopius, who was less interested in speculative theology than in the practical, daily, disciplined pilgrimage of the believer. Consequently, he was accused of Pelagianism, and some unhappy Calvinists leveled an unfounded charge, based on his emphasis on practical Christianity and the freedom of the human spirit, that Episcopius was influenced by Socinianism.

P. A. MICKEY

See also ARMINIANISM; DORT, SYNOD OF; REMONSTRANTS.

Bibliography. V. Ferm, Encyclopedic Dictionary of Religion 1:1221; Protestant Dictionary.

Epistemology. The branch of philosophy that is concerned with the theory of knowledge. It is an inquiry into the nature and source of knowledge, the bounds of knowledge, and the justification of claims to knowledge.

Nature and Source of Knowledge. The question of the nature and source of knowledge has been dominated by the rationalist/empiricist debate. Rationalists (e.g., Plato and Descartes) have held that the ideas of reason innate to the mind are the sole source of knowledge. The mind through its activity can originate the content of knowledge. While the rationalist often speaks of experience, it is to denigrate it. It is the source of error. At best it can lead one to opinion. Empiricists (e.g., Locke and Hume) have argued that sense experience is the primary source of human knowledge. The content of the mind is built upon what it passively receives from the senses or through reflection. The mind begins as a tabula rasa, or blank tablet.

Both rationalism and empiricism have been criticized as inadequate. Rationalism has been objected to on the grounds that, while it offers certainty for its claims, such certainty applies only to mathematical and logical propositions. Such knowledge remains only in the realm of concepts, symbols, and deductive inferences, and none of these tells us anything about the real world. Empiricism, on the other hand, is in no better position. It seems as if the simplest statements about material objects deal with far more than momentary sense impressions. Knowledge is “built up” by interpreting these impressions by means of a complex and rich set of concepts and principles (e.g., cause and effect). These concepts and principles are different from sense impressions; e.g., they lack the immediacy of the impressions.

It has been argued that Kant marks a significant point in the debate between rationalism and empiricism. He is responsible for synthesizing the two views. In a sense this is true. Like the rationalists Kant argued that there was an a priori element to knowledge. He held that the forms of intuition (space and time) and the categories of the understanding (e.g., causality) were the a priori conditions of knowledge. Any objects that did not conform to these structures could not ever be possible objects of knowledge. But concepts alone were empty. Knowledge required sensation. There is, however, a sense in which Kant stands over against both rationalism and empiricism. Both systems are reductivistic. Kant is not.

The Meaning and Justification of Knowledge Claims. In contemporary Anglo-American philosophy, under the influence of philosophers like G. E. Moore and Ludwig Wittgenstein, the concerns of the epistemologist have shifted. The two questions that have dominated discussion are the meaning of knowledge claims and their justification. A commonly held view is that when a subject claims to know a proposition, he or she is making this kind of claim: (1) the subject believes the proposition; (2) the proposition is true; and (3) the subject has good reasons for believing the proposition.

Another alternative analysis of the meaning of knowledge claims was provided by J. L. Austin. Austin distinguished between constative and performative utterances. This was roughly similar to Gilbert Ryle’s distinction between knowing that and knowing how. On this analysis, to say that one knows is to be able to tell or to go on (e.g., continue on in a multiplication table). Austin later came to include his earlier views in his speech act theory. On this account, every speech act had these elements: a locution (roughly the statement in a language), an illocution (what the speaker intends by uttering the statement), and a perlocution (the effect the utterance has on the hearer). Thus, a performative element is retained in both the illocutionary force of a statement and its perlocution.

On the matter of justification, two distinguishable positions characterize modern epistemology. First, foundationalism is the view that there are epistemologically basic propositions or beliefs. Generally it is argued that these are not justified in terms of anything more basic. In turn these epistemologically basic beliefs justify other higher-level beliefs or propositions. The idea of basic and higher-level beliefs gives the schema the name “foundationalism.”

Second, coherentism or contextualism is the position that there are no epistemologically basic beliefs. Rather, the justification of any knowledge claim is more like a web of belief. Propositions support or justify one another at various points.

The Bounds of Knowledge. For an epistemologist like Plato knowledge was confined to a suprasensible world of forms or ideas. Most philosophers, however, have rejected Plato's view. Kant insisted that knowledge was limited to the world of experience. Anything that was not a possible object of experience was not a possible object of knowledge. Still others have held that our knowledge is not restricted to the world of experience. Knowledge includes not only what is observed but also what is beyond observation in any straightforward way (e.g., God).

Religious Epistemology. Religious epistemology is the inquiry into the nature of knowledge about God and the justification of claims to religious knowledge.

In the contemporary Anglo-American scene the two questions that have dominated epistemological discussions in general have influenced inquiry into religious epistemology. Philosophers like A. J. Ayer and Antony G. N. Flew charged that religious language was meaningless because it was impossible to either verify or falsify in sense experience. Religious statements were compatible with any and all states of affairs.

Responses to this charge took three forms. First, there were those like John Hick who argued that religious language was in fact verifiable but not in this life. He advocated what has become known as eschatological verification. Verification of religious statement is not presently possible because of the ambiguity of our experience. There is, however, a future unambiguous state, promised as a part of Christian theology, where the verification of religious language would be possible. Second, there were those who challenged the applicability of verifiability as a criterion of meaningfulness. It was claimed that at worst the principle itself could not be verified, and was thus meaningless. At best, it was an arbitrary rule of language that could either be accepted or rejected. Moreover, it became clear that every formulation of a verification principle was either too exclusive or too inclusive. Third, other philosophers argued that religious language was not descriptive in character but served some other function. For example, R. B. Braithwaite held that religious language was conative language. It did not describe, but rather committed one to a way of life.

Following the lead of this last group of philosophers, analysis of the meaning of religious utterances moved from verification to function. The meaning of religious statements was seen in their use. For instance, religious language was a part of a language game, which in turn was embedded in a form of life. Religious language could not be analyzed in the abstract but had to be understood in its context.

As the question of meaning has diminished in importance, the problem of the justification of claims to religious knowledge received greater attention. Recently Alvin Plantinga has contended that belief in God, at least for some, is epistemologically basic. That is, it needs no justification in terms of something more basic.

Other philosophers of religion have sought to justify belief in God in terms of the concept of God (e.g., the ontological argument) or some set of sense impressions (e.g., the cosmological or teleological argument). Following Hume and Kant, they have objected that the concept of God does not guarantee the instantiation of this concept in reality. Nevertheless, Descartes argued that God was the only being for whom essence (concept) and existence (reality) are the same. Those who object to an appeal to sense impressions in defense of religious belief point out that no conceivable set of impressions can justify an infinite, eternal, omniscient being. Moreover, if it is argued that there is an analogy between an object and its maker, and the world and its creator, then it must be admitted that the creator is evil as well as intelligent, because both evil and design are found in the creation.

Revelation is often appealed to as the ultimate ground of knowledge about God. Yet this does not eliminate questions of justification. Are there grounds for accepting a revelation as from God? On what grounds is its authority justified? If there are historical data, then are these data well based?

P. D. FEINBERG

See also GOD, ARGUMENTS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF; REASON.

Bibliography. R. M. Chisholm, Theory of Knowledge; S. T. Davis, Faith, Skepticism, and Evidence: An Essay in Religious Epistemology; D. W. Hamlyn, Theory of Knowledge; B. Mitchell, Justification of Religious Belief; T. Penelhum, Problems of Religious Knowledge; R. Swinburne, Faith and Reason; L. Wolfe, Epistemology; A. D. Woozley, Theory of Knowledge: An Introduction.

Equiprobabilism. See CASUISTRY.

Erasmus, Desiderius (1466?–1536). The leading Christian humanist of the Reformation era, who wished to reform the church through scholarly effort. Educated at Deventer by the Brethren of the Common Life (1475–84), he spent six years as a monk and then attended the Collège de Montaigu in Paris (1494). In 1499 he visited England, where he met John Colet and Thomas More. This experience influenced him to employ literary talent, intellectual brilliance, and clever wit in the service of Christ. He became fascinated with the prospect of studying Scripture in addition to the classical heritage that so impressed him.

Erasmus, Desiderius

With a new outlook Erasmus returned to Paris and Louvain, where he began the most productive period of his life. He published the Adages (1500), an annotated collection of classical proverbs; the Enchiridion (1503), a handbook of practical theology; editions of Cicero and Jerome; and a critical edition of the Annotations of the New Testament by Lorenzo Valla. A constant traveler, he went back to England in 1505, where he began his translation of the NT, and in 1506 he journeyed to Italy, where he had direct contact with humanistic culture.

In 1509 Erasmus was back in England once again and had finished Praise of Folly. He continued traveling, translating the NT, and preparing critical editions of Jerome, Seneca, Plutarch, and Cato. In 1516 he published his Greek edition of the NT together with his own Latin translation, perhaps his most important work. Another publication from the same period, the Education of a Christian Prince, advocated toleration, peace, education, and social justice. By this time he had settled in Basel, where, except for some short excursions, he was to live and work for many years.

Erasmus was a prolific writer, and each main category of his work reveals something of his personality. First, he produced many scholarly books including historical material, lexicons, translations, and critical editions of earlier books. His purpose was to combat ignorance. He believed that truth was attainable through clarity of expression. A second element of his approach is revealed in satirical works such as Praise of Folly. Here Erasmus ridicules humanists and scholars who take themselves too seriously, but he saves his most biting satire for bigoted churchmen, pompous lawyers, and warmongering rulers. A final category of his work, the more overtly Christian writings, demonstrates that neither scholarship nor humor was to be an end in itself. These elements were pursued to reach the goal of the restoration of primitive Christianity. Erasmus felt called to cleanse and purify the church through the application of humanistic scholarship to Christian tradition. For him truth and piety were not the result of ritual and sacraments but of historical research. Erasmus reached the height of his fame at the beginning of the Protestant Reformation. At first he encouraged Luther, but after the Leipzig debate (1519) he began to criticize him. Finally, he publicly broke with Luther in his Diatribes on Free Will (1524). In a sense, history passed Erasmus by, leaving him to defend his position against Reformers and Counter-Reformers. R. G. CLOUSE

See also HUMANISM, CHRISTIAN.

Bibliography. R. H. Bainton, Erasmus of Christendom; R. L. DeMolen, ed., Erasmus of Rotterdam: A

Quincentennial Symposium; J. Huizinga, Erasmus of Rotterdam; J. B. Payne, Erasmus: His Theology of the Sacraments; M. M. Phillips, Erasmus and the Northern Renaissance; J. K. Sowards, Desiderius Erasmus; J. D. Tracy, Erasmus: The Growth of a Mind; Politics of Erasmus.

Erastianism. Erastianism takes its name from Thomas Erastus (1524–83), who was born at Baden, studied theology at Basel, and later medicine, becoming professor of medicine at Heidelberg. He was a friend of Beza and Bullinger and was a Zwinglian.

A controversy arose in Heidelberg over the powers of the presbytery. Erastus emphasized strongly the right of the state to intervene in ecclesiastical matters. He held that the church has no scriptural authority to excommunicate any of its members. As God has entrusted to the civil magistrate (i.e., the state) the sum total of the visible government, the church in a Christian country has no power of repression distinct from the state. To have two visible authorities in a country would be absurd. The church can merely warn or censure offenders. Punitive action belongs to the civil magistrate alone. The church has no right to withhold the sacraments from offenders.

In practice, the term Erastianism is somewhat elastic. Figgis calls it “the theory that religion is the creature of the state.” Generally it signifies that the state is supreme in ecclesiastical causes, but Erastus dealt only with the disciplinary powers of the church. When the Roman emperors became Christian, the relations of civil and ecclesiastical rulers became a real problem. It became universally accepted until modern times that the state could punish heretics or put them to death.

The name Erastian emerged in England in the Westminster Assembly (1643) when outstanding men like Selden and Whitelocke advocated the supremacy of the state over the church. The assembly rejected this view and decided that church and state have their separate but coordinate spheres, each supreme in its own province but bound to cooperate with one another for the glory of God. A. M. RENWICK

See also CHURCH AND STATE.

Bibliography. W. Cunningham, Historical Theology; J. N. Figgis, “Erastus and Erastianism,” JTS 2:66–78.

Erickson, Millard J. (b. 1932). Evangelical Baptist theologian. Erickson was born in Stanchfield, Minnesota, on June 24, 1932, and grew up in a godly Baptist home. He attended the University of Minnesota (B.A. in Philosophy, 1953), Northern Baptist Seminary (B.D., 1956), University of Chicago (M.A. in Philosophy, 1958), and Garrett Theological Seminary/Northwestern University (Ph.D., 1963), where he studied with William Hordern. He also studied at several other schools, including the University of Munich, where he became personal friends with Wolfhart Pannenberg. He served in several pastorates, taught Bible and apologetics at Wheaton College (1964–69), was professor of theology at Bethel Theological Seminary, and later dean (1965–92). Erickson is currently professor of theology at Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary.

Erickson's views were shaped by several factors, some academic and some personal. Academically, the rise of the new evangelicalism in the late 1940s and such men as E. J. Carnell, Carl F. H. Henry, and Vernon Grounds played a part. Erickson singles out three men of particular importance to him—Bernard Ramm, William Hordern, and Wolfhart Pannenberg. On the personal side, Erickson's pastoral experience, concern for a vital spirituality and philosophical bent blended into the mix to produce a combination of rigorous academics and deeply felt piety with a concern to reach people with the gospel. For Erickson, theology is of no value if it does not have positive practical consequences in one's life.

Author of over twenty two books and numerous articles, Erickson's magnum opus is his Christian Theology in three volumes (1983–85). It is Baptist, moderately Calvinistic, biblically based, and, in his word, classical, meaning that it is centered around the magnificence of God. This is done in language as free from jargon as possible to make the ideas accessible to God's people. Because Erickson's theology is self-consciously biblical, a distinctive method needed to be worked out to move from biblical text to systematic theology. The nine steps in this process are as follows: collection of the biblical materials relevant to the particular doctrine being investigated; unification of the biblical materials; analysis of the meaning of the biblical teachings; examination of historical treatments; identification of the essence of the doctrine; illumination from sources beyond the Bible; contemporary expression of the doctrine; development of a central interpretive motif; stratification of topics (Christian Theology 1:66–70).

The doctrine of the Trinity is also crucial to Erickson's understanding of God, as evidenced in God in Three Persons: A Contemporary Interpretation of the Trinity (1995). Concerned with modern aberrations of the traditional doctrine in such thinkers as Sally McFague and Karl Rahner, Erickson emphasizes the necessity of a metaphysical basis for God's threeness-in-oneness and his spiritual, personal, and social nature. This is the ultimate foundation for God as love. Without an eternal threeness there can be no eternal interactive love.

Most recently Erickson has raised the point that evangelicalism itself is beginning to show the unraveling effects of time in Evangelical Left: Encountering Postconservative Evangelical Theology

(1997). He expresses concern that some fundamental aspects of historic orthodoxy relating to the doctrine of Scripture, Christology, God, and salvation are now being reassessed, not with a view to strengthening them, but perhaps restating them in less than orthodox terms. Here, and in other works such as Where Is Theology Going? (1994) and How Shall They Be Saved? (1996), Erickson the theologian is becoming Erickson the prophet. His points are in many instances well taken, and the evangelical world would do well to listen carefully to what he is saying. W. A. ELWELL

See also CARNELL, EDWARD JOHN; EVANGELICALISM; HENRY, CARL FERDINAND HOWARD; PANNENBERG, WOLFHART; RAMM, BERNARD.

Bibliography. D. S. Dockery, "Millard J. Erickson," in Baptist Theologians, T. George and D. S. Dockery, ed.; D. S. Dockery, ed., New Dimensions in Evangelical Thought: Essays in Honor of Millard J. Erickson; L. A. Hustad, HET 412–426; L. R. Keylock, "Evangelical Leaders You Should Know: Meet Millard J. Erickson," Moody Monthly 87, no. 10:71–73; J. E. White, What Is Truth?: A Comparative Study of the Positions of Cornelius Van Til, Francis Schaeffer, Carl F. H. Henry, Donald Bloesch, Millard Erickson.

Erigena, John Scotus (810–877). Irish philosopher who played a significant role in interpreting Greek thought to the West. He was involved in two major theological controversies. One was with the monk Gottschalk over predestination; the other focused on the Eucharist and was begun by Paschasius Radbertus.

As a philosopher Erigena helped direct and develop the emergent scholasticism through his translations and expositions of the Neoplatonic writer Dionysius the Pseudo-Areopagite and also the Aristotelian logic of Boethius. For Erigena, philosophy and theology were identical. His goal was to give an exhaustive, rational explanation of Christian doctrine from Scripture and the early church theologians. He accepted Scripture's authority but argued that proper biblical interpretation was that which best coincided with reason. Thus, he could write that "reason and authority come alike from the one source of divine wisdom, and cannot contradict each other." His work helped signal the beginning of a philosophical shift from Platonic thought to that of Aristotelian reasoning as a dominant force in Europe. While Scripture was the main source of the knowledge of God for Erigena, it was the function of reason, as illuminated by God, to study and expound the biblical data supplied by authority.

Erigena's views on nature and creation were portrayed in his greatest work, De divisione naturae. In the thirteenth century this work was condemned. It divided nature into four categories, urging a sharp distinction between God and creation and describing the emanation of the created order from God. While denying that creatures are part of God, Erigena also claimed that God is the only true reality. Elements of pantheism are strong in his thought. D. K. McKIM

Erigena, John Scotus

See also ARISTOTLE, ARISTOTELIANISM; NEOPLATONISM; SCHOLASTICISM.

Bibliography. F. Copleston, History of Philosophy; P. Edwards, ed., Encyclopedia of Philosophy; E. Gilson, History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages; J. González, History of Christian Thought; D. Moran, Philosophy of John Scotus Erigena; J. J. O'Meara, Erigena.

Erlangen School of Theology. See HOFMANN, JOHANN CHRISTIAN KONRAD VON.

Error in the Bible. See BIBLE, INERRANCY AND INFALLIBILITY OF.

Eschatology. Traditionally defined as the doctrine of the "last things" (Gr. eschata), in relation either to human individuals (comprising death, resurrection, judgment, and the afterlife) or to the world. In this latter respect eschatology is sometimes restricted to the absolute end of the world, to the exclusion of much that commonly falls within the scope of the term. This restriction is unwarranted by biblical usage: the Hebrew bē-ʾahārit hayyāmim (LXX en tais eschatais hēmerais, "in the last days") may denote the end of the present order or even, more generally, "hereafter." For reasons explained below ("NT Eschatology") the term is frequently used to refer to anything that has to do with the Final Age, from the beginning of Jesus' ministry onward.

The biblical concept of time is not cyclical (in which case eschatology could refer only to the completion of a cycle) or purely linear (in which case eschatology could refer only to the terminal point of the line); it envisions rather a recurring pattern in which divine judgment and redemption interact until this pattern attains its definitive manifestation. Eschatology may therefore denote the consummation of God's purpose whether it coincides with the end of the world (or of history) or not, whether the consummation is totally final or marks a stage in the unfolding pattern of his purpose.

Note should also be made that much contemporary nonevangelical theology proceeds on assumptions that deemphasize or deny the intervention of supernatural forces into the natural order and claims of the end of the material world. It tends to focus attention upon other issues under the heading "eschatology." These, for an example, may include discussions of assumptions about the final stage of moral, social, intellectual, physical, and spiritual developments.

The result, it assumes, is utopia on earth, brought about (largely) by naturalistic processes. Even more likely, since "end" may refer to "goal" or "purpose," some contemporary theologians (e.g., Rudolf Bultmann) view the subject matter of eschatology as the attainment of meaning, purpose, self-awareness, and the authenticity of the individual.

Individual Eschatology in the Old Testament. A shadowy existence after death is contemplated in much of the OT. Jesus indeed showed that immortality was implicit in a person's relation to God: the God of the fathers "is not the God of the dead, but of the living; to him all are alive" (Luke 20:38). But this implication was not generally appreciated in OT times. Perhaps in reaction against Canaanite cults of the dead, the OT lays little emphasis on the afterlife. Sheol is an underworld where the dead dwell together as shades; their former status and character are of little account here. The praises of Yahweh, which engaged so much of a pious Israelite's activity on earth, remain unsung in Sheol, which was popularly thought to be outside Yahweh's jurisdiction (Ps. 88:10–12; Isa. 38:18). Occasionally a more hopeful note is struck. According to Psalms 73 and 139, one who walks with God in life cannot be deprived of his presence in death: "If I make my bed in Sheol, thou art there!" (Ps. 139:8). While Job and his friends generally discount the possibility of life after death (Job 14:10–12) and do not suppose that the comforts of a future existence can compensate for the sufferings of the present, Job asserts, in a moment of triumphant faith, that if not in this life then after death he will see God rise up to vindicate him (Job 19:25–27).

The hope of national resurrection finds earlier expression than that of individual resurrection. In Ezekiel's vision of the valley of dry bones, where the divine breath breathes new life into corpses, a national resurrection is in view: "These bones are the whole house of Israel" (Ezek. 37:11). National resurrection may also be promised in Isaiah 26:19: "Your dead will live, their bodies will rise." Individual resurrection first becomes explicit in Daniel 12:2.

The persecution of martyrs under Antiochus Epiphanes gave a powerful impetus to the resurrection hope. Henceforth belief in the future resurrection of at least the righteous dead became part of orthodox Judaism, except among the Sadducees, who claimed to champion the old-time religion against Pharisaic innovations. With this new emphasis goes a sharper distinction between the posthumous fortunes of the righteous and the wicked, in Paradise and Gehenna respectively.

World Eschatology in the Old Testament. The day of Yahweh in early Israel was the day when Yahweh would publicly vindicate himself and his people. It was possibly associated with an autumnal festival at which Yahweh's kingship was celebrated. If the "enthronement psalms" (Pss. 93; 95–100) provide evidence for this festival, his kingship was commemorated in his work of creation, his seasonal gifts of fertility and harvest, and his dealings of mercy and judgment with Israel and other nations. His sovereignty in these spheres would be fully manifested at his coming to "judge the world in righteousness" (Pss. 96:13; 98:9).

In the earliest significant mention of this "day of the LORD" (Amos 5:18–20), the Israelites are rebuked for desiring it so eagerly, because it will bring not light and joy (as they hope) but darkness and mourning. Since Yahweh is utterly righteous, his intervention to vindicate his cause must involve his judgment on unrighteousness wherever it appears, especially among his own people, who had exceptional opportunities of knowing his will.

Psalms and prophets recognized that, while Yahweh's kingship was exercised in many ways, the reality they saw fell short of what they knew to be the ideal. Even in Israel Yahweh's sovereignty was inadequately acknowledged. But one day the tension between ideal and reality would be resolved; on the day of Yahweh his kingship would be universally acknowledged, and the earth would be filled with "the knowledge of the LORD" (Isa. 11:9; cf. Hab. 2:14). His effective recognition as "king over all the earth" is portrayed in terms of a theophany in Zechariah 14:3–9.

The decline of the Davidic monarchy emphasized the contrast between what was and what ought to be. That monarchy represented the divine kingship on earth, but its capacity to do so worthily was impaired by political disruption, social injustice, and foreign oppression. As the fortunes of David's house sank ever lower, however, there emerged with increasing clarity the figure of a coming Davidic king in whom the promises made to David would be fulfilled and the vanished glories of earlier times would be restored and surpassed (Isa. 9:6–7; 11:1–10; 32:1–8; Jer. 23:5–6; 33:14–22; Amos 9:11–12; Mic. 5:2–4).

This hope of a Davidic Messiah, Yahweh's permanent vice-regent, dominates much subsequent Jewish eschatology. In some portrayals of the new age, however, the Davidic ruler is overshadowed by the priesthood, as in Ezekiel's new commonwealth (Ezek. 46:1–10) and later in the Dead Sea Scrolls, where the Davidic Messiah is subordinate to the chief priest, who will be head of state in the coming age.

Another form of eschatological hope appears in Daniel. No king reigns in Jerusalem, but the Most High still rules the kingdom of men and successive world emperors attain power by his will and hold it so long as he permits. The epoch of pagan dominion is limited; on its ruins the God of heaven will set up an indestructible kingdom. In Daniel 7:13 this eternal and universal dominion is given at the end time to "one like a son of man," who is associated, if not identified, with "the saints of the Most High" (Dan. 7:18, 22, 27).

New Testament Eschatology. OT eschatology is forward looking, its dominant notes being hope and promise. These notes are present in the NT, but here the dominant note is fulfillment—fulfillment in Jesus, who by his passion and resurrection has begotten his people anew to a living hope (1 Pet. 1:3), because he has "destroyed death and has brought life and immortality to light through the gospel" (2 Tim. 1:10).

Jesus' Galilean preaching, summarized in Mark 1:15 ("The time has come. The kingdom of God is near. Repent and believe the good news!"), declares the fulfillment of Daniel's vision: "The time came when they possessed the kingdom" (Dan. 7:22). In one sense the kingdom was already present in Jesus' ministry: "If I drive out demons by the finger of God, then the kingdom of God has come to you" (Luke 11:20; cf. Matt. 12:28). But in another sense it was yet future. Jesus taught his disciples to pray, "Your kingdom come" (Luke 11:2). In this sense it would come "with power" (Mark 9:1)—an event variously associated with the resurrection of the Son of Man or with his advent "with great power and glory" (Mark 13:26).

The expression "the Son of man" figures prominently in Jesus' teaching about the kingdom of God, especially after Peter's confession at Caesarea Philippi (Mark 8:29). It echoes Daniel's "one like a son of man" (Dan. 7:13). In Jesus' teaching he himself is the Son of Man. But while he speaks occasionally, in Daniel's terms, of the Son of Man as "coming on the clouds of heaven" (Mark 14:62), he more often speaks of the Son of Man as destined to suffer, in language reminiscent of the servant of Yahweh in Isaiah 52:13–53:12. This portrayal of the Son of Man in terms of the servant is quite distinctive, in that Jesus undertook to fulfill personally what was written of both. As Daniel's "one like a son of man" receives dominion from the Ancient of Days, so Jesus receives it from his Father. As Daniel's "saints of the Most High" receive dominion, so Jesus shares his dominion with his followers, the "little flock" (Luke 12:32; 22:29–30). But its fullness must await the suffering of the Son of Man (Luke 17:25).

Sometimes Jesus uses "life" or "eternal life" (the life of the age to come) as a synonym for "the kingdom of God"; to enter the kingdom is to enter into life. This links the kingdom with the new age, when the righteous are brought back from death to enjoy resurrection life.

In the apostolic teaching this eternal life may be enjoyed here and now, although its full flowering awaits a future consummation. The death and resurrection of Christ have introduced a new phase of the kingdom, in which those who believe in him share his risen life already, even while they live on earth in mortal bodies. There is an indeterminate interval between Christ's resurrection and parousia, and during this interval the age to come overlaps the present age. Christians live spiritually in "that age" while they live temporally in "this age"; through the indwelling Spirit of God they enjoy the resurrection life of "that age" in anticipation.

Eschatology

This outlook has been called "realized eschatology." But the realized eschatology of the NT does not exclude an eschatological consummation to come.

Realized Eschatology. If the eschaton, the "last thing," which is the proper object of eschatological hope, came in the ministry, passion, and triumph of Jesus, then it cannot be the absolute end of time, for time has gone on since then. In the NT the "last thing" is more properly the "last one," the eschatos (cf. Rev. 1:7; 2:8; 22:13). Jesus is himself his people's hope, the Amen to all God's promises.

According to Albert Schweitzer's "consistent eschatology," Jesus, believing himself to be Israel's Messiah, found that the consummation did not come when he expected it (cf. Matt. 10:23) and embraced death in order that his parousia as the Son of Man might be forcibly brought to pass. Since the wheel of history would not respond to his hand and turn round to complete its last revolution, he threw himself on it and was broken by it, only to dominate history more decisively by his failure than he could have done by attaining his misconceived ambition. His message, Schweitzer held, was thoroughly eschatological in the sense exemplified by the crudest contemporary apocalypticism. His ethical teaching was designed for the interim between the beginning of his ministry and his manifestation in glory. Later, when his death was seen to have destroyed the eschatological conditions instead of bringing them in, the proclamation of the kingdom was replaced by the teaching of the church.

Schweitzer's interpretation of Jesus' message was largely a reaction against the liberal nineteenth-century interpretation, but it was equally one-sided and distorted in its selection from the gospel data.

Later Rudolf Otto and C. H. Dodd propounded a form of realized eschatology. Dodd interpreted Jesus' parables in terms of the challenge to decision that confronted his hearers in his announcement that the kingdom of God had arrived. Dodd viewed the kingdom as coming in Jesus' life, death, and resurrection; to proclaim these events in their proper perspective was to proclaim the good news of the kingdom of God. Jesus' future coming did not, at first, come into the picture. His redeeming work constituted the decisive or eschatological manifestation of the power of God operating for the world's salvation; the later concentration on a further "last thing" in the future betokened a relapse into Jewish apocalypticism, which relegated to a merely "preliminary" role those elements of the gospel that were distinctive of Jesus' message. (As time went on, Dodd made more room for a future consummation: what came to earth with Christ's incarnation was finally decisive for the meaning and purpose of human existence, so that at the ultimate winding up of history, humankind will encounter God in Christ.)

Joachim Jeremias, who acknowledges indebtedness to Dodd, found that Jesus' parables express an eschatology "in process of realization"; they proclaim that the hour of fulfillment has struck and compel hearers to make up their minds about Jesus' person and mission.

Dodd's pupil, J. A. T. Robinson, interprets Christ's parousia not as a literal event of the future but as a symbolical or mythological presentation of what happens whenever Christ comes in love and power, displaying the signs of his presence and the marks of his cross. Judgment day is a dramatic picture of every day. Robinson denies that Jesus used language implying his return to earth from heaven. His sayings that have been so understood express the twin themes of vindication and visitation—notably his reply to the high priest's question at his trial (Mark 14:62), where the added phrase "from now on" (Luke 22:69) or "hereafter" (Matt. 26:64) is taken to be an authentic part of the reply. The Son of Man, condemned by earthly judges, will be vindicated in the divine law court; his consequent visitation of his people in judgment and redemption will take place "from now on" as surely as his vindication.

Instead of realized eschatology, Robinson (following Georges Florovsky) speaks of an "inaugurated eschatology"—an eschatology inaugurated by Jesus' death and resurrection, which released and initiated a new phase of the kingdom in which "hereafter" God's redeeming purpose would achieve its fulfillment. Robinson applies the term "proleptic eschatology" to Jesus' ministry before his passion because in that ministry the signs of the age to come were visible in anticipation.

Conclusion. Jesus' use of OT language was creative and cannot be confined to the meaning that language had in its original context. He probably did point forward to his personal coming to earth—not only to manifest his glory but to share that glory with his people, raised from the dead by his quickening shout. When the consummation to which his people look forward is described as their "hope of glory," it is their participation in Jesus' resurrection glory that is in view; that hope is kept bright within them by his indwelling presence (Col. 1:27) and sealed by the Spirit (Eph. 1:13–14, 18–21).

There is a tension between the “already” and the “not yet” of the Christian hope, but each is essential to the other. In the language of the seer of Patmos, the Lamb that was slain has by his death won the decisive victory (Rev. 5:5), but its final outworking, in reward and judgment, lies in the future (Rev. 22:12). The fact that we now see Jesus “crowned with glory and honor” is guarantee enough that God has put “everything under him” (Heb. 2:8–9). His people already share his risen life, and those who reject him are “condemned already” (John 3:18). For the fourth evangelist, the judgment of the world coincided with the passion of the incarnate Word (John 12:31); yet a future resurrection to judgment is contemplated as well as a resurrection to life (John 5:29).

Some much canvassed questions, such as the chronological relation of the parousia to the great distress of Mark 13:19, to the manifestation of the man of lawlessness of 2 Thessalonians 2:3–8, or to the millennial reign of Revelation 20, are marginal to the main course of NT eschatological teaching, belonging rather to the detailed exegesis of the passages concerned. The eschatological outlook of the NT is well summed up in the words: “Christ Jesus our hope” (1 Tim. 1:1).

F. F. BRUCE AND J. J. SCOTT JR.

See also AGE, AGES; APOCALYPTIC; DAY OF CHRIST, GOD, THE LORD; ISRAEL AND PROPHECY; JUDGMENT; JUDGMENT OF NATIONS; JUDGMENT SEAT; KINGDOM OF CHRIST, GOD, HEAVEN; LAST DAY, DAYS; MILLENNIUM, VIEWS OF THE; RAPTURE OF THE CHURCH; SECOND COMING OF CHRIST; THIS AGE, THE AGE TO COME; TRIBULATION.

Bibliography. G. R. Beasley-Murray, Coming of God; Jesus and the Future; R. H. Charles, Critical History of the Doctrine of a Future Life; O. Cullmann, Christ and Time; C. H. Dodd, Apostolic Preaching and Its Developments; Coming of Christ; Parables of the Kingdom, J. E. Fison, Christian Hope; T. F. Glasson, Second Advent; J. Jeremias, Parables of Jesus; W. G. Kümmel, Promise and Fulfillment; G. E. Ladd, Presence of the Future; R. Otto, Kingdom of God and the Son of Man; H. Ridderbos, Coming of the Kingdom; J. A. T. Robinson, In the End, God . . . ; Jesus and His Coming; A. Schweitzer, Quest of the Historical Jesus; E. F. Sutcliffe, Old Testament and the Future Life; G. Vos, Pauline Eschatology.

Essence. The noun essence comes from the Latin verb esse, meaning “to be,” which comes from the Greek einai, which also means “to be.”

There are two ways to get at the concept of an essence. (1) Reflect on the simple fact that many things undergo change. Things usually survive or persist through change. A maple gets taller through the spring and summer, loses its leaves in the fall, and stops growing in the winter. But it is still the very same thing after these changes as it was before; it is simply that after the changes it has some properties that it did not have before.

There are some changes, however, that a thing cannot survive. If a maple were to be reduced to a pile of ashes, it—that very maple—would no longer exist. It would not be the very same thing as the pile of ashes. What is it about a thing that allows it to persist through some changes but not others? Answer: its essence. The essence of a thing is that set of properties it possesses in virtue of which it persists through changes; or, alternatively, the essence of a thing is that set of properties it possesses, which, were it to lose any of them, it would no longer exist. The property of being a tree is essential to a maple, while the property of having leaves or being precisely six feet tall are not. An essence, then, is a thing's essential properties, to be contrasted with its accidental properties, that set of properties it possesses, which, even if were it to lose all of them, it would still exist. (2) Certain properties of a thing are more basic to it than others. I might have had brown eyes instead of blue. But I could not have been a rock instead of a human. Being human, then, is much more basic to me than being blue-eyed. An essence, then, consists in a thing's most basic properties, what it is most fundamentally. (These two ways of getting at the concept of an essence may be related: a thing's most basic properties are those, which, were it to lose any of them, it would cease to exist, and vice-versa.)

While essentialists disagree about specifics, they all agree that things in nature have essences and that what constitutes a thing's essence is not up to us in any sense. Anti-essentialists either believe that things have no essences at all and that all talk of essences is just a fancy way of talking about rules for the use of language, or they believe that there are essences in nature but that what constitutes a thing's essence is up to us: we “construct” the sorts of things that there are. Christian theism is most at home with essentialism since, according to it, there is a sharp line between creator and creature, a line that could not possibly be blurred regardless of what we did or thought.

D. HOWARD-SNYDER

See also EXISTENCE.

Bibliography. T. Aquinas, Being and Existence; Aristotle, Categories; Metaphysics; A. J. Ayer, Language, Truth and Logic; S. Kripke, Naming and Necessity; A. Plantinga, Does God Have a Nature?; Nature of Necessity; W. V. O. Quine, Word and Object.

Essenes. An important Jewish group that flourished in Palestine from the late second century B.C. to the late first century A.D.

Sources. Our understanding of the Essenes is determined to a large degree by how we delimit our sources. Certainly the sources that explicitly mention the Essenes are pertinent. The most valuable among these are Philo's Apology for the Jews (now lost but preserved in part by Eusebius, Praeparatio evangelica 8.2) and Every Good Man Is Free, both written in the first half of the first century A.D.; Flavius Josephus's Jewish War and Antiquities of the Jews, dating from about A.D. 75 and 94 respectively; and the elder Pliny's Natural History, completed about A.D. 77. Also of some independent value is Hippolytus's Philosophumena, written in the third century A.D.

Essenes

Though they explicitly mention the Essenes, these sources present several problems. None of them gives a firsthand, inside view of the Essenes. Furthermore, these sources generally cater to Greek or Hellenized readers and thus, on some points, misrepresent Essene practices, doctrines, and motives. Finally, it is doubtful that any of these sources has anything to say, by way of description, about the Essenes as they existed before the reign of Herod the Great (37–4 B.C.).

In the last thirty years scholars have sought to mitigate these difficulties by using information derived from the Dead Sea Scrolls. This approach has problems of its own, however. The relationship between the Essenes and the Qumran sectaries is uncertain. The name "Essene" never appears in the Qumran literature, and viable cases have been made for identifying the Qumran sectaries with Pharisees, Zealots, Sadducees, and other Jewish and Christian groups. Nevertheless, on the basis of archaeological and literary evidence, most scholars now believe that the Qumran sectaries were Essenes—though not necessarily the Essenes. The inhabitants of Qumran may have been the leaders, or perhaps only a small branch, of a broad Essene movement. In either case it is impossible to know just how and to what extent the Qumran documents reflect standard Essene practices and beliefs. For this reason, it would seem prudent to make at least a provisional distinction between what Philo and Josephus claim to know about the Essenes and the potentially relevant evidence of Qumran. Of the Qumran documents the Manual of Discipline, the Damascus Document, the War Scroll, and the various peshet-type commentaries on the Minor Prophets are proving to be the most useful in the discussion of Essene life, doctrine, and history.

Name. "Essenes" is an English transliteration of the Greek Essēnoi. The derivation and meaning of the Greek word have been a mystery since the first century A.D. Philo, our earliest source (ca. A.D. 40), speculated that "Essenes" was derived from the Greek hosios, meaning "holy." Modern scholars have preferred to go back to Semitic originals. The two most probable etymologies offered to date are from the Aramaic 'āsēn, 'āsayyā, "healers," and from the East Aramaic ḥasēn, ḥasayyā, "the pious." The first etymology would suggest a link between the Essenes and the Therapeutae (Gr. "healers"), a similar Jewish group flourishing contemporaneously in Egypt. The second etymology would imply a historical relationship between the Essenes and the Hasidim (Hebrew: "pious ones"), the faithful Jews who distinguished themselves during the Maccabean revolt (ca. 167 B.C.). Extant evidence will not allow a firm decision between the two etymologies, though it would seem that the latter currently enjoys more credence. In any case, there is no reason to assume that "Essenes," or its Semitic equivalent, was a self-designation. It may have been a label applied to the group by outsiders. As such, it would point to the manner in which the Essenes were perceived by their contemporaries.

Life and Doctrine. Philo, Josephus, Pliny, and Hippolytus generally agree quite closely on the main characteristics of the group. Asceticism was a central trait. Many Essenes were devoted to the celibate ideal, though Josephus mentions a group who married. They eschewed luxury items, such as oil, and avoided all unnecessary social and economic contacts with non-Essenes. Their highly regimented life centered on prayer, rigorous work, frequent lustrations, and the study of Scriptures.

Essene life was also communal. Not only was property held in common, but it seems that many, if not all, of their meals were taken together as well. An Essene traveler could always be certain of finding free lodging wherever fellow Essenes lived. Essene communities were highly structured with four different classes of membership divided according to seniority. It would seem that priests occupied the top rung of the Essene social ladder; Josephus explicitly mentions that the ones who administered the communal finances were priests. The internal social structure of Essene communities was maintained by careful and exacting discipline. An entrance procedure requiring a three-year novitiate and solemn vows ensured a committed membership.

There is some disagreement between Philo and Josephus on the Essene attitude toward the temple and sacrifices. Philo claims that the Essenes abstained from animal sacrifices altogether, while Josephus reports that, because of their views on purity, the Essenes were excluded from the temple courts and for this reason sacrificed among themselves.

Finally, Josephus says that the Essenes were thoroughgoing predestinarians, and that along with a belief in the immortality of the soul they held to a doctrine of preexistence.

This picture of Essene life and doctrine is, on the whole, corroborated by the information derived from Qumran and its documents. As one might expect, however, the agreement is not perfect; there are some outright contradictions. For example, the Manual of Discipline mandates a two-year, not a three-year, novitiate. According to Philo, the Essenes eschewed oaths, but the Damascus Document prescribes several oaths for the Qumran sectaries. These and other incongruities highlight the uncertainties of using the Dead Sea Scrolls to illuminate Essenism. Even if one assumes that Philo and Josephus were mistaken on some points (and this is quite probable), one must still reckon with the possibility that the Dead Sea Scrolls do not reflect universal Essene characteristics.

Yet, with this possibility in mind, one can still appreciate the tremendous value of the Qumran scrolls for Essene studies. The scrolls give clear evidence that at least some of the Essenes followed a solar, 364-day calendar as opposed to official Judaism, which used a lunar one. Moreover, the scrolls intimate that the Qumran Essenes (if no others) were implacable foes of the Hasmonean high priests. In fact, it seems that many Essene leaders were Zadokites—members of the high-priestly family displaced by the Hasmonians. This information has in turn shed light on the vexing problem of the Essenes and temple sacrifices. It seems that the Qumranians abstained from temple sacrifices because of a rift with the ruling priests in Jerusalem, not because they repudiated the sacrificial system, as Philo implies. Finally, the scrolls expose an Essenism that was thoroughly eschatological in outlook. The writers of the scrolls believed themselves the true remnant of Israel living in the last days. They eagerly awaited the appearance of both a political messiah and an eschatological high priest.

In general it can be said that the Dead Sea Scrolls have preserved a place for Essenism within the mainstream of Judaism. Josephus's and Philo's accounts show it was difficult to fit the Essenes into what was known about late second temple Judaism. The Essenes were often regarded as syncretistic monastics, imbued with a Hellenistic asceticism. Recent studies on the Qumran scrolls, however, have revealed an ascetic and communal lifestyle not based on some Greek philosophical ideal but on an overwhelming concern for ritual purity. Regardless of the identity of the Qumran sectaries, it is now possible to understand the Essenes as one of the numerous purity-conscious groups that flourished in Judaism before A.D. 70.

History and Influence. Our explicit sources contain very little information of a historical nature. The Qumran documents are full of historical allusions, but they are notoriously ambiguous. Moreover, the history of the Qumran community may not accurately reflect the history of Essenism as a whole. By using a combination of sources, however, scholars have developed the following tentative outline of Essene history. The Essenes seem to have arisen after the Maccabean revolt (ca. 167–160 B.C.). Sometime between 152 and 110 B.C. at least some of the Essenes—perhaps only the leaders—retreated to Qumran, on the shores of the Dead Sea. There they stayed until the Parthian invasion of 40 B.C. or the earthquake of 31 B.C. forced them to leave. At that time they settled in the regions around Jerusalem. Soon after Herod the Great's death (4 B.C.) at least some of the Essenes returned to Qumran. Some seventy years later Essenes were involved in the revolt against the Romans. The survival and persistence of the Essenes as a separate group after A.D. 70 is still debated. Many scholars have found traces of Essenism within such later sects as the Ebionites, the Mandaeans, and the Karaites.

Also still undecided is the importance and influence of Essenism within pre-A.D. 70 Judaism and early Christianity. It has often been dismissed as a peripheral Jewish sect or hailed as the very seedbed of the Christian faith. Both of these positions are too extreme. It is more likely that the Essenes were one expression of a widespread pietistic reaction to the pragmatic and tepid spirit of official Judaism. From the ranks of such a reaction the early church would have drawn heavily.

S. TAYLOR

See also DEAD SEA SCROLLS; PHARISEES; SADUCEES.

Bibliography. F. F. Bruce, Second Thoughts on the Dead Sea Scrolls; M. Burrows, Dead Sea Scrolls; J. H. Charlesworth, "The Origin and Subsequent History of the Authors of the Dead Sea Scrolls: Four Transitional Phases among the Qumran Essenes," RQum 10:213–33; R. deVaux, Archaeology and the Dead Sea Scrolls; A. Dupont-Sommer, Jewish Sect of Qumran and the Essenes; C. D. Ginsburg, Essenes; W. S. LaSor, Dead Sea Scrolls and the New Testament; G. Vermes, Dead Sea Scrolls in English.

Aesthetics, Christian View of. A Christian view of esthetic theory differs from a secular perspective on the discipline in showing how the field and its development relate to the lordship of Jesus Christ.

Development of a Theology of Beauty. For centuries before the historical incarnation of God in Jesus Christ, reflection on beauty, epitomized by the dialogues of Plato, set up what became perhaps the major stumbling block to a fruitful theory of art, a down-to-earth sense of the esthetic and a hermeneutics that can trust imaginative knowledge.

Plato posited an absolute beauty outside the visible, temporal world as a pearl of great price that humans should desire to know. A good Greek mind would persist in pursuit of such transcending perfection until it came to contemplate the unspeakably well-proportioned, noetic form of Beauty itself. Then one's immortal soul would be saved from the curse of bodily, earthly transience (Symposium 209^E–12^A). The only prayer in Plato's works has Socrates intone the words, "O Pan, grant me to become beautiful inside" (Phaedrus 207^{B8}–9).

The Hellenist Plotinus and even Augustine carried on the Platonic tradition with a chain-of-being ontology that allowed them to declare everything beautiful insofar as it is. Worms are beautiful (On True Religion 41.77), and evil too with its punishment fits harmoniously into the balancing mosaic of God's goodness (Confessions 7.18–19). Although Thomas Aquinas thought in Aristotelian categories and maintained an analogical distance between creature and Creator, his doctrine of beauty retained the highly mathematical, Platonized dogma that proportion, perfection, and now brilliance constituted the attribute of God the Son (Summa Theologica 1.39.8), which pleases us in its more mundane form as "the beautiful."

The Reformer John Calvin understood the visible beauty of creation to be a mirroring of God's glory; art then became God's gift to humans to help them recognize beauty, a kind of general revelation of God. The 1898 Princeton lectures of Abraham Kuyper followed through on this idea and formulated somewhat idealistically what has become almost the mainline tradition among evangelical Protestant thinkers: Art has the mystical task of reminding those who are homesick for heaven of the beauty that once was lost and of the perfect luster that is coming.

In the context of comparative religion, Gerardus Van Der Leeuw developed an apologetic for the "beautiful" as an ancillary or penultimate step toward what is "holy." In his 1952 Mellon lectures, Thomist Jacques Maritain presented a complex theology of artistic and transcendental beauty in which he confessed "that all great poetry awakens in us one way or another, the sense of our mysterious identity, and draws us toward the source of being."

Christian thinkers who adopt a theology of beauty are beset by the problems that attend natural theology and all theodicies: how radical and disfiguring is the reality of sin and the necessity of Christ's redemption? Can beautiful nature and art be evil? If human art is beautiful, is it not naturally good? Whether beauty is taken to be an elemental harmony in the world or a fitting and satisfying quality of human artifacts, the concepts of balanced order, form, and delight are at best analogues of esthetic reality. Such properties of "beauty" do not define the peculiar character of artistry, nor do they explain art's special province of oblique meaning.

Struggle for a Foolproof Hermeneutics. Modern debate in esthetic theory has largely converted beauty into a problem of taste and then argued about the kind and reliability of "esthetic" judgments. There is concern with how to read and interpret art and literature with a critical mind that can be sure its exegesis is correct.

In the eighteenth century Alexander Gottlieb Baumgarten conceived the esthetic realm to be one of fused image-knowledge, which lacks the precise distinctness of ideas that is requisite for higher, logical knowledge. Immanuel Kant identified taste as an autonomous, disinterested form of sensitivity that involved the satisfying use of one's cognitive faculties but was not a source of knowledge; human sensitivity to beautiful and especially to sublime affairs was important to Kant, because such esthetic activity is analogous and propaedeutic to morality.

Hegel, however, was influential in cutting concerns about taste and esthetic judgment at large more narrowly down to examination of art, and art as a kind of secular theophany. Such romantic idealist philosophers of fine art as Herder and Schelling strongly supported the idea of artistic genius and intellectually intuitive creativity, which give art, music, and especially poetry a revelational character that transcends logical examination. Critique of literature soon became largely a matter of empathic discernment of the "spirit" of the text and its prophetic meaning for the present; historical settings became largely immaterial for interpretation, next to the imaginative inspiration for humanity afforded by the piece.

Wilhelm Dilthey aimed to overcome the problem of historical relativity of artworks by making a rigorously descriptive, psychological analysis of the structure shaping poetic imagination. He believed he might be able to fashion a scientific method for interpretation that would distill the lasting, typical knowledge of literary art relevant for any time thereafter. Positivist I. A. Richards undid this hope in English-speaking lands by divorcing poetry as important emotive language from scientific prose that had semiotic referents. It remained for a new critique of poetic language (the "new critics"), harking back to Kant, to find a format that would keep distinct yet in synthesis the formal, textural devices of poetry that demand close, professional reading and the paraphraseable message.

Marxist thinkers like Georg Lukács and Leon Trotsky made more clear than many confessing Christians how deeply permeated all art and literature is with the committed perspective of the artist forming the work. Marxist esthetics is normally so partisan, however, and its literary hermeneutic so dictated by class-conscious, orthodox political dogmas, that the theory and the reading of texts became more a predictable diatribe than genuine analysis and exegesis. Quite differently, Hans-Georg Gadamer reintroduced a Hegelian dialectic, humanized and authorized by Platonic dialogue on the beautiful, as the model for critical interpretation of art. Gadamer's hermeneutics mutes Heidegger's belief in the aracular nature of poetry to a conviction of the mediating power of language to bridge time and transmit the cultural heritage of literary art, if a reader's consciousness is free to be playfully charmed out of the darkness of prejudices into the light of "adequate knowledge" of the speaking text.

Christians working in literary theory and the esthetics of art and literary criticism, as well as ordinary expositors of the Bible, have usually, unfortunately, followed secular trends at a distance. The neo-idealist concern for the "spiritual content"—never mind the technical details—converted to Bultmann's demythologizing attempt to get at the kerygma core of Scripture, to let the trappings go. The subsequent positivist creed, that only rational, logical knowledge (preferably scientifically verified) is trustworthy, has encouraged a teaching of literature that separates cleanly (1) neutral, technical description from (2) orthodox evaluation of the worldview. The idea that Holy Scripture is not a true story so much as "propositional revelation" also owes a debt to the positivist commitment. Current schools of French structuralist esthetics and the "deconstructivist" critics who treat texts with the arbitrary originality of Dada artists and whose focus is above all on the reader and the spectator, seem to have a curious echo in the praxis of those who do not mind eisegesis of the biblical Scriptures so long as the result is an orthodox point. There seems to be great ferment and much confusion at present, because imaginative (literary) knowledge still lacks a Christian philosophical home as bona fide knowledge.

Problematics of Systematic Esthetic Theory. A theoretical esthetics informed by knowledge that we inhabit a world created by the Lord God revealed in Jesus Christ will posit an ordinance for esthetic reality, for the style of ordinary life, and for the professional construction of artworks. An esthetic theory that has its analysis cast from a biblically Christian orientation will also recognize that performers and critics as well as leaders in style and composers of artworks have breathed a holy or evil spirit into their respective artistic results, and each needs to be examined as to how the legitimate exercise of these tasks has served the public with insight or with curses.

One major attempt to think these matters through with Christian sensitivity takes the incarnation of Jesus Christ as the paradigm for artistic acts. Artists give the "flesh of sensible matter to the content of spiritual ideas." Such a "theological esthetics" tends to accept a theology of transcendental beauty, to think within a God-artist analogy, and to proffer an apologetics that treats all art as essentially sacramental.

A different current attempt to formulate a radically Christian philosophical esthetic theory asks for a thoroughgoing reformation of received tradition and thinks out of a different categorical framework. The defining law of God for the esthetic side of life and style to be obeyed is the ordinance of allusivity, where activity is to be ruled by playfulness and surprise—what would make God smile. Artists are called to catch things and events in creation with an imaginatively crafted miming characterized by the quality of nuancefulness. Artists are understood not as imitators of Christ taking on flesh but as diaconal workers skilled in forming symbols pregnant with meaning for whoever has eyes to see and ears to hear. Artworks are at core metaphors and parables that need to be treated as expressions of seriously committed, living human subjects under Christ's coming rule. If the artwork is vain, it needs to be charitably humbled; if weak, it should be aided by informed wisdom; if fruitful, it should be praised with thanks. Christian esthetic theory will fashion an encyclopedia of the special arts and literature that avoids any ranking hierarchy. It will welcome art bound to special tasks such as commemorative portraiture, monuments, advertising, and liturgy, but will also promote theater, concerts, paintings in museums, and novels, which have their own special contribution to make as art in society. Christian esthetics makes clear that our style, artworks, critique, and theory of the esthetic and artistic in history will be judged for its redemptive fruit on the final Lord's day.

C. G. SEERVELD

See also ART, CHRISTIAN.

Bibliography. J. Begbie, Voicing Creation's Praise; G. Birtwistle, Living Art; M. Edwards, Toward a Christian Poetics; H. W. Frei, Eclipse of Biblical Narrative; A. Kuyper, Lectures on Calvinism; S. K. Langer, Feeling and Form; F. Lentricchia, After the New Criticism; J. Maritain, Creative Intuition in Art and Poetry; M. Murray, Modern Critical Theory; F. O'Connor, Mystery and Manners; W. Percy, Message in the Bottle; H. R. Rookmaaker, Creative Gift; Gauguin and 19th Century Art Theory; Modern Art and the Death of Culture; D. Roper, "Gems Afire, The Reformational Contribution to Aesthetic Theory," Issues 7:1–32; "Gospel, Art and Aesthetic Theory," in Issues 6:1–34; N. A. Scott Jr., ed., New Orpheus; Christian Critique of Art and Literature; Rainbows for the Fallen World; G. Steiner, Real Presence; W. Tatarkiewicz, History of Six Ideas; D. van den Berg, "Coping with Art Historical Diversity in Methodological Terms," Acta Academia 22, 1:35–50; G. Van Der Leeuw, Sacred and Profane Beauty; G. E. Veith Jr., State of the Arts, from Bezalel to Mapplethorpe; J. Wilson, One of the Richest Gifts; N. Wolterstorff, Art in Action; L. Zuidervaart, Adorno's Aesthetic Theory.

Eternal Generation. Deriving from Origen, this is the phrase used to denote the inter-Trinitarian relationship between the Father and the Son as is taught by the Bible. "Generation" makes it plain that there is a divine sonship prior to the incarnation (cf. John 1:18; 1 John 4:9), that there is thus a distinction of persons within the one Godhead (John 5:26), and that between these persons there is a superiority and subordination of order (cf. John 5:19; 8:28). "Eternal" reinforces the fact that the generation is not merely economic (i.e., for the purpose of human salvation as in the incarnation, cf. Luke 1:35), but essential, and that as such it cannot be construed in the categories of natural or human generation. Thus it does not imply a time when the Son was not, as Arianism argued. Nor is there to be expected a final absorption of the Son. Nor does the fact that the Son is a distinct person mean that he is separate in essence. Nor does his subordination imply inferiority. In virtue and not in spite of the eternal generation, the Father and the Son are one (John 10:30).

Eternal Generation

Objections have been lodged against the phrase on the ground that it is rhetorical, meaningless, and ultimately self-contradictory. Yet it corresponds to what God has shown us of himself in his own eternal being, and, if it carries an element of mystery (as is only to be expected), it rightly has been described by O. A. Curtis (Christian Faith, 228) as "not only conceivable" but "also one of the most fruitful conceptions in all Christian thinking." It finds creedal expression in the phrases "begotten of his Father before all worlds" (Nicene) and "begotten before the worlds" (Athanasian).

G. W. BROMILEY

See also ONLY BEGOTTEN.

Bibliography. H. Bettenson, Documents of the Christian Church; J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines; C. W. Lowry, "Origen as Trinitarian," JTS 37:225-40; G. L. Prestige, God in Patristic Thought; J. Stevenson, New Eusebius.

Eternality of God. See GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF.

Eternal Life. Though anticipated in the OT, the concept of eternal life seems to be largely a NT revelation. The common translation, "eternal life" or "everlasting life," is the translation of zōē (life) and aiōnion (eternal), an expression found throughout the NT, but especially in the Gospel of John and 1 John. Zōē is found 134 times, translated "life" in every instance in the KJV except one (Luke 16:25). The verb form zaō is found 143 times and is similar in meaning. Aiōnion appears 78 times, usually translated "eternal" (42 times in KJV), but also "everlasting" (25) and once "for ever."

Both the terms "eternal" and "life" are difficult to define except descriptively. Zōē is used in many shades of meaning in Scripture, sometimes little different from bios, which occurs only eleven times in the NT and refers to earthly life only. Zōē

is found in the following meanings: (1) life principle, or that which makes one alive physically (John 10:11, 15, 17; 13:37); (2) life time, or duration of a human life—similar to bios (Heb. 7:3; James 4:14); (3) the sum of all activities comprising life (1 Cor. 6:3-4; 1 Tim. 2:2; 4:8); (4) happiness or state of enjoying life (1 Thess. 3:8, verb form; cf. John 10:10); (5) as a mode of existence given by God, whether physical or spiritual (Acts 17:25); (6) spiritual or eternal life, a state of regeneration or renewal in holiness and fellowship with God (John 3:15-16, 36; 5:24; 6:47); (7) the life that is in Christ and God—divine life itself (John 1:4; 1 John 1:1-2; 5:11).

Though zōē is sometimes used without adjective to denote eternal life (1 John 5:12), in many instances aiōnion is used to distinguish eternal life from ordinary physical life. The adjective aiōnion corresponds to the noun aiōn, which refers to life in general, or the age in which a life is lived. The idea of eternity seems to be derived from the fact that eternity is a future age that eclipses in importance all other ages, and thus is the age preeminent. Hence, eternal life or age life is that which anticipates and assures fellowship with God in eternity as well as having promise of entering into that eternal fellowship in time.

The Scriptures describe but do not formally define eternal life. The nearest approach to a definition is given in John 17:3, where Christ stated: "This is eternal life: that they may know you, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom you have sent." Eternal life is described in its experiential aspect of knowing God and having fellowship with God through his Son, Jesus Christ.

Eternal life is contrasted in Scripture with ordinary physical life. One having physical life without eternal life is described as "dead in . . . transgressions and sins" (Eph. 2:1). The lack of eternal life is equated with the state of being unsaved, condemned, or lost, in contrast to those who have eternal life who are declared to be saved, and promised that they shall never perish (John 3:15-16, 18, 36; 5:24; 10:9).

Even in the case of the elect, eternal life is not possessed until faith in Christ is exercised (Eph. 2:1-5). Eternal life is not to be confused with efficacious grace, or that bestowal of grace that is antecedent to faith. Nor is it to be confused with the indwelling of the Holy Spirit or of Jesus Christ, though this accompanies and manifests eternal life. Eternal life is to be identified with regeneration and is received in the new birth. It is resultant rather than causative of salvation, but is related to conversion or the manifestation of the new life in Christ.

Eternal life is given by the work of the Holy Spirit at the moment of faith in Christ. As in the case of the incarnation of Christ, however, the Trinity is related to the impartation of life. Ac-ording to James 1:17–18, the Father is said to beget his spiritual children. The life that is bestowed upon the believer is identified with the life that is in Christ (John 5:21; 2 Cor. 5:17; 1 John 5:12). In other passages the Holy Spirit is declared to be the one who regenerates (John 3:3–7; Titus 3:5).

The impartation of eternal life is embodied in three principal figures in the Scripture. (1) Regeneration is described first as a new birth, being “born of God” (John 1:13), or “born again” (John 3:3). The bestowal of eternal life therefore relates the believer to God in a father and son relationship. (2) The new life in Christ is described as a spiritual resurrection. Not only is the believer “raised with Christ” (Col. 3:1) but is “brought from death to life” (Rom. 6:13). Christ anticipated this in his prophecy: “A time is coming and has now come, when the dead will hear the voice of the Son of God and those who hear will live” (John 5:25). (3) The bestowal of new life is compared to the act of creation. As Adam became a living soul by the breath of God, so the believer becomes a new creation (2 Cor. 5:17). The possessor of eternal life is declared to be “created in Christ Jesus to do good works” (Eph. 2:10). The concept of a new creation not only carries with it the possession of eternal life, but involves a new nature that corresponds to the life: “old things are passed away; behold, they are become new” (2 Cor. 5:17 ASV).

J. F. WALVOORD

See also LIFE; MAN, OLD AND NEW; NEW CREATION, NEW CREATURE; REGENERATION; SALVATION.

Bibliography. J. Baillie, And the Life Everlasting; L. Berkhof, Systematic Theology; L. S. Chafer, Systematic Theology; H. Küng, Eternal Life?; X. Léon-Dufour, Life and Death in the New Testament; J. J. Reeve, ISBE 3:1888–90; A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology.

Eternal Punishment. It is plain from the Bible that sin will be punished (Dan. 12:2; Matt. 10:15; John 5:28–29; Rom. 5:12–21), and the duration of this punishment is sometimes expressed in the NT by the use of aiōn or one of its derivatives (e.g., Matt. 18:8; 25:41, 46; 2 Thess. 1:9). Aiōn means “old age,” and it was used of the never-ending “age to come,” which gave to the corresponding adjective aiōnion the meaning “eternal,” “everlasting.” These words are used of “the King eternal” (1 Tim. 1:17), of “the eternal God” (Rom. 16:26), and when glory is ascribed to God “forever” (Rom. 11:36) and God is blessed “forever” (2 Cor. 11:31). The concept of endless duration could not be more strongly conveyed; the use of these expressions for the eternity of God shows conclusively that they do not mean limited duration. It is important that the same adjective is used of eternal punishment as of eternal life (Matt. 25:46 has both). The punishment is just as eternal as the life. One is no more limited than the other.

A similar idea is conveyed by the use of other terminology. Thus, Jesus said, “It is better for you to enter life maimed than with two hands to go into hell, where the fire never goes out” (Mark 9:43; cf. Luke 3:17). He referred to “hell, where ‘their worm does not die, and the fire is not quenched’” (Mark 9:47–48). He spoke of fearing God because he, “after the killing of the body, has power to throw you into hell” (Luke 12:5). He said that there is a sin that “will not be forgiven, either in this age or in the age to come” (Matt. 12:32). Similarly John writes, “Whoever rejects the Son will not see life, for God’s wrath remains on him” (John 3:36). The awful finality of Christ’s warnings implies permanence. He spoke of the door being shut (Matt. 25:10), of being “thrown outside, into the outer darkness” (Matt. 8:12; “thrown out,” Luke 13:28), of an impassable chasm (Luke 16:26). It is not always realized that Jesus spoke of hell more often than did anyone else in the NT. And nowhere is there a hint of any possible reversal of the last judgment.

More could be cited. And against the strong body of NT teaching that there is a continuing punishment of sin we cannot cite one saying that speaks plainly of an end to the punishment of the finally impenitent. Those who look for a different teaching in the NT must point to possible inferences and alternative interpretations. But if Jesus wished to teach something other than eternal retribution, it is curious that he has not left one saying that plainly says so. In the NT there is no indication that the punishment of sin ever ceases.

In the light of the cross we can be sure that the mercy of God reaches as far as mercy can reach. God does all that can be done for humankind’s salvation. Beyond that, and the teaching of the permanence of the doom of the wicked, we cannot go. It may be that the dread reality is other than people have usually pictured it, as C. S. Lewis suggests. It must be borne in mind that Scripture uses symbolic terms of necessity to refer to realities beyond the grave. The imagery Christians have tended to stress is that of “the fire of hell” (Matt. 5:22). But there are references also to “where the fire never goes out” (Mark 9:43), “the darkness” (Matt. 8:12), the “worm” that “does not die” (Mark 9:48), “weeping and gnashing of teeth” (Luke 13:28), rising “to be condemned” (John 5:29), “condemned to hell” (more literally, “the judgment of hell,” Matt. 23:33), being “beaten with many blows” (Luke 12:47; or being “beaten with many stripes,” KJV, being “lost” (Matt. 10:6), “perishing” (1 Cor. 1:18), death (Rom. 6:23), and losing one’s life (Luke 9:24). With such a variety of terms, it is unwise to press one as though that gave the complete picture. We should beware of oversimplifying; it is impossible to envisage what the reality is which can be described so variously. But we should beware also of yielding to the sentimental demand that we water down such expressions. Scripture leaves us in no doubt that there is a grim reality.

Eternal Punishment

But from early days some Christians have rejected this teaching. Origen taught that all will finally be saved. Such views did not attract a wide following until modern times. A group of nineteenth-century poets popularized this line (cf. Tennyson and "the larger hope"), and in this century universalism is widely accepted.

The basic reason is that it is not easy to reconcile the idea of hell with the love of God. It is argued that the love of God would be defeated if only one sinner were left to suffer in eternity. Such an approach must be treated with respect, but it is not found in Scripture. Some passages are adduced, such as those that express God's goodwill toward all (1 Tim. 2:4; 2 Pet. 3:9) the universal scope of the cross (2 Cor. 5:19; Col. 1:20; Titus 2:11; Heb. 2:9; 1 John 2:2), and the wide outreach of Christ's atoning work (John 12:32; Rom. 5:18; Eph. 1:10). But to interpret such passages as meaning that in the end all will be saved is to go beyond what the writers are saying and to ignore the fact that in the contexts there are usually references to God's condemnation of the wicked or to the final separation between good and evil or the like.

Another idea is that people are no more than potentially immortal. If they put their trust in Christ and enter into salvation, they attain immortal life. If they fail to do so, they simply die and that is the end of them. This might accord with passages that speak of "death" as the lot of the wicked, but not with those referring to Gehenna or the like. If we are to be true to the whole teaching of Scripture, we must come to the conclusion that the ultimate fate of the wicked is eternal punishment, though we must add that we have no way of knowing exactly what form that punishment will take.

L. L. MORRIS

See also ANNIHILATIONISM; APOKATASTASIS; HELL; UNIVERSALISM.

Bibliography. J. Blanchard, Whatever Happened to Hell?; H. Buis, Doctrine of Eternal Punishment; W. Crockett, ed., Four Views on Hell; L. Dixon, Other Side of the Good News; A. Fernando, Crucial Questions about Hell; F. C. Kuehner, "Heaven or Hell?" in Fundamentals of the Faith, C. F. H. Henry, ed.; C. S. Lewis, Great Divorce; J. A. Motyer, "The Final State: Heaven and Hell," in Basic Christian Doctrines, C. F. H. Henry, ed.; R. A. Peterson, Hell on Trial: The Case for Eternal Punishment; S. D. F. Salmond, Christian Doctrine of Immortality.

Eternal Security of the Believer. See PERSEVERANCE.

Eternal Sin. The expression does not occur in the KJV translation of the NT. But in Mark 3:29, instead of kriseōs ("judgment"), the very oldest Greek manuscripts have hamartēmatos ("sin"). So the best translation is not "in danger of eternal damnation" (KJV) but "guilty of an eternal sin" (NASB, NIV)—which is actually far worse morally. It is the sin of blasphemy against the Holy Spirit, for which there is no forgiveness (Matt. 12:31; Mark 3:29; Luke 12:10). R. EARLE

See also BLASPHEMY AGAINST THE HOLY SPIRIT.

Eternal State. See FINAL STATE.

Eternity. The word suggests transcendence of the temporal and is employed in various senses: durability ("the eternal hills"); time without end ("passing to his eternal reward"); time without beginning (speculative conceptions of the universe as "an eternal process"); infinite time (the ascription of temporality to the nature of God). Beyond this the term traditionally has been used by theology and philosophy to designate God's infinity in relation to time—i.e., to designate the divine perfection whereby God transcends temporal limitations of duration and succession and possesses his existence in one indivisible present.

In Greek philosophy the eternity of divine being simultaneously implied the shadow reality and insignificance of the temporal, a speculative view contradictory of biblical theism with its emphasis on redemptive revelation in time and place. Parmenides already had shaped the Greek prejudice: Only the unchanging and permanent is real, all else is illusory. By another route Plato and Aristotle reached the same conclusion: Genuine significance pertains only to eternal realities, never to the temporal.

Biblical theology and philosophy, however, affirmed the unique eternity of God without ruling out the created and conditional reality of the time-space order and its momentous significance. The doctrines of creation, preservation, providence, incarnation, and atonement all involved a strategic role for the world of time and history.

Prompted by Hegel, modern philosophy lodged time (and the universe) in the very nature of the Absolute. The immanent speculations conceived the whole of reality as temporal, as the Absolute in process of logical evolution. Thus, the idea of an insignificant temporal order was subverted, but so also was the conception of the self-sufficient God. Hegel indeed distinguished the Absolute's indivisible timeless inner unity from the Absolute's temporal differentiation as nature and spirit. But this ambiguity led post-Hegelian thinkers in two directions. F. H. Bradley declared temporal distinctions unreal in the Absolute's experience, while most post-Hegelian scholars rejected divine timelessness. Josiah Royce proposed a mediating position. While affirming the temporality of all experience, he asserted that the Absolute knows all events in a single time span, a unitary act of consciousness, in contrast with the long successions of time spans involved in our finite knowledge. But Royce's formula transcended the duality of eternity and time only verbally, since on his theory time would not exist for the Absolute in the same sense as for its parts, nor would events as known by finite selves carry absolute significance. Edgar S. Brightman vigorously asserted the divine temporality of his finite God. As naturalism more and more displaced idealism as the influential modern philosophy, its exponents affirmed the ultimacy of time.

In reaction to the modern temporalizing of deity, neo-orthodox theology stresses the "infinite qualitative difference" between eternity and time. It emphasizes not only the ontological transcendence of God as creator and his moral transcendence of the human as sinner, but sketches his epistemological transcendence in such a way that, in the exposition of the imago Dei, it curtails the role of cognition and the significance of the forms of logic in the human reception of divine revelation. It minimizes the historical aspect of redemptive revelation, moreover, by assigning God's disclosure a superhistorical locus in one's internal encounter with Deity. Later writings of Barth and Brunner somewhat moderate their more extreme early statements; nonetheless, although now emphasizing the created reality of time and the crucial importance of the incarnation and atonement, they evade the direct identification of history at any point with divine revelation.

To repair this gulf between the temporal order and the Deity, some recent theologians in turn discard the definition of eternity as pure timelessness or nontemporality. While thus avoiding Hegel's identification of the temporal order with God's direct self-manifestation, they lodge time in the very nature of God instead of viewing it as in created dependency. Oscar Cullmann foregoes the whole idea of timelessness with reference to the eternal. He maintains that eternity is simply infinitely extended time: the former, boundless time; the latter, bound by creation at the one end and by eschatological events at the other.

Here the philosophical and theological repudiation of nontemporal eternity meet, though the philosophical motives are avowedly speculative, while Cullmann's are professedly biblical and exegetical. From the NT use of aiōn for a period of time, both defined and undefined in duration, alongside its use of this term for eternity, Cullmann argues that eternity is not timeless but rather is unending time. Since he applies the same term both to this age and to the next, the temporal and eternal worlds are presumably not qualitatively distinguishable in respect to time. The eschatological drama, moreover, requires the idea of time progression. Hence, the qualitative disjunction of eternity and time is dismissed as Greek rather than biblical in outlook. Instead of binding time to the creation alone, Cullmann affirms that time falls into three eras: precreation; from creation to "the end of the world"; and posteschatological. The first is unbegun, the last unending.

No objection can be taken to Cullmann's aim, which is to preserve the absolute significance of redemptive history and to prevent a dissolution of the Christ-event as the decisive center of history from which both time and eternity are to be understood. His detection of docetic and Hellenic influences in the theology of Kierkegaard, Barth, Brunner, and Bultmann, moreover, gains its point from their excessive formulations of divine transcendence. But the repudiation of the unique eternity or nontemporality of God is not required to preserve the reality and significance of historical revelation and redemption; indeed, the temporalizing of the Eternal poses theological problems all its own.

Admittedly many biblical representations suggest nothing beyond an exaltation of God above all temporal limitations of the universe (John 17:24; Eph. 1:4; 2 Tim. 1:9). Recourse to Exodus 3:14, "I AM WHO I AM," where the French render the name of Jehovah as the Eternal, is unavailing, for the comfort of the oppressed Israelites in Egypt must surely have sprung from an assurance that God intervenes redemptively in fallen history, and not especially from his nontemporality.

But the nontemporality of God nonetheless can be firmly supported. The constant use of aiōn for the spatial world (cosmos) suggests the concomitance of time and space; hence, not simply the temporality but also the spatiality of God—an assumption objectionable to biblical theists—would seem to be implied by a one-sided reliance on aiōn. From this circumstance the conviction gains support that time and space belong to the created order as distinct from the divine essence and that eternity is an incommunicable divine attribute. Moreover, the biblical contrast of divine and temporal duration frequently looks beyond a quantitative or proportional to a qualitative contrast. Temporal categories are viewed as inapplicable to Jehovah (cf. Ps. 90:2) and the word 'ōlām gains theological significance. This qualitative connotation is more fully carried by the later use of 'ōlām in plural form for God's eternity, a turn of phrase required by the absence of alternatives in Hebrew vocabulary to express a qualitative differentiation.

"The plural cannot mean the literal addition of a number of indefinite, unbounded temporal durations; it can only be read as a poetic emphasis by which a quantitative plural is a symbol for a qualitative difference" (RTWB, 266). The NT translation of 'ôlām by aiōn and aiōnios is instructive, moreover. The primary thrust of the familiar terms "eternal life" and "eternal death" is qualitative, and not simply quantitative. The former phrase depicts a quality of life fit for eternity, in which the believer already participates through regeneration (John 5:24), although it does not, of course, imply nontemporality; the latter, eternal death, is spiritual death, which, in the case of the impenitent unbeliever, is transmuted at physical death into an irrevocable condition. Finally, the attribute of eternity cannot be disjoined from God's other attributes. The biblical emphasis on divine omniscience supports the view of his supertemporal eternity. If God's knowledge is an inference from a succession of ideas in the divine mind, he cannot be omniscient. Divine omniscience implies that God knows all things in a single whole, independent of a temporal succession of ideas.

Eternity

C. F. H. HENRY

See also AGE, AGES; GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF; GOD, DOCTRINE OF; THIS AGE, THE AGE TO COME; TIME.

Bibliography. O. Cullmann, Christ and Time; C. F. H. Henry, God, Revelation, and Authority; J. Marsh, "Time," in RTWB.

Ethical Systems, Christian. For generations Christians have found directions for daily life in the records of Jesus and the occasional counsels of the apostles; the church has never attempted to systematize its ethical teaching as it did its theology. The earliest attempts to commend Christian morality to the ancient world presented it as either the fulfillment of the Judaic system of ethics or the culmination of pagan moral philosophy. The first of all Christian ethical "systems"—that of Ambrose—followed the Roman pattern.

The Early Church and Middle Ages. Ambrose's concern was to equip the church for ministry to a Christian state. His Duties of the Clergy is explicitly a Christian adaptation of Cicero's De officiis. Accordingly, Ambrose constantly appealed to the Stoic law of nature (leading to later Christian moralists' preoccupation with natural law) and to the philosophical mean—moderation in all things. He defined the Christian virtues on the Stoic model, holding that Scripture illustrates Greek insights with supreme clarity.

Theological controversy prompted the great church councils, but from them issued authoritative decisions governing church discipline which, with counsels and adjudications of outstanding leaders, attained the status of canon law (codified by Gratian in the twelfth century). This was accompanied by a penitential system allotting penalties to breaches of church rules governing private and public life; Christian ethics was here reduced to ecclesiastical discipline, perpetuating the legalism and casuistry characteristic of Judaism.

Meanwhile the more contemplative, ascetic, "Greek" trend in Christian thought, desiring to escape the active world rather than to control it with Ambrose, retreated into monasteries for intense cultivation of the inner life, seeking the vision of God by internal and external imitation of Christ. Soon there arose the need for "Rules" of discipline (e.g., Benedict's) in which monastic vows of poverty, chastity, and humility were spelled out in detailed guidance for corporate living, useful work, and Christlike ministry.

Similar summaries of Christian morality were produced in more individualist and mystical Christian circles in innumerable books of spiritual counsel (à Kempis's Imitation of Christ is one of many), in which emotional and contemplative devotion is concentrated on inward imitation, especially in renunciation, purgation, humility, and prayer.

Earlier Augustine, immersed in controversies, wrestled to elucidate the place of ethics within a theology of salvation that assumed the helplessness of the human will, corrupted by original sin, and the consequent necessity of divine grace to the accomplishment of any good in humans. At the same time, faced with social and moral disintegration of the empire, Augustine expounded the Christian social ideal as the coming City of God.

Augustine's far-ranging thought embraced a privative theory of evil as the absence of good; one's responsibility (as free of external restraint) for not choosing the good; available irresistible grace, an internal dynamic which alone can create a good disposition of will; and the principle that one cannot do evil, even in persecuting heretics, if love be the motive. Augustine's basic position was eudaemonist: morality is pursuit of the good, which will bring happiness; all seek happiness, differing only in where. Christians find it in the spiritual satisfaction of loving God as chief good—the only summum bonum that can satisfy.

From this Augustine derived all personal Christian virtues, the social love of neighbor on every level, and a whole series of practical counsels on marriage, property, the state, the just war, not with academic precision of analysis but with the informal system imposed by a single profound mind.

The first thoroughgoing attempt at systematization was that of Aquinas, sitting at the feet of Augustine and Aristotle, and producing the most massive of all intellectual expressions of Christian thought. In ethics he set out from the purposive nature of every act of will to discover one's supreme goal in the vision of God, which only revelation can make known, only right reason can apprehend (the moral law being natural to a rational creature), and only faith, created by the infusion of divine grace, can hope to attain. Within this framework Aquinas explains the seven cardinal Christian virtues; the complex meaning of law; the place of right emotions, dispositions, and habits in the formation of character; and the outworking of such faith (“a social and political animal”).

The Reformation. While Luther’s thought is anything but systematic, his fertile thought (On Liberty; Good Works; Authority and Obedience; Galatians; Decalogue) exercised such influence that his ethic must be mentioned. Starting from a dynamic view of humanity as ever active, he defined the central issue as freedom to act, which as creature, sinner, “curved in upon himself,” fallen humanity does not possess; one is enslaved under moral law but not saved by it. Only faith in the saving initiative of God can create a person anew, justifying him or her before God. Such faith is then ever active in love and good works, becoming “a sort of Christ” to its neighbors; it lives within the secular world, not withdrawn from it, exercising a new freedom bestowed by Christ—though that may lead to imitation of Christ’s crucifixion.

The social consequences of salvation are expounded on the basis of the Decalogue in generally conservative terms, preserving the established orders of society as divinely instituted and defending existing structures, marriage, commercial order, political authority, the traditional just war. Luther’s doctrine of “two kingdoms” differentiated sacred and secular spheres while insisting that the secular, too, is God’s.

The nearest Protestant equivalent to Aquinas’s architectural structure is Calvin’s monumental Institutes of the Christian Religion. Starting from the absolute sovereignty of God, Calvin summarizes Christian ethics as the discipline of the individual life and the creation of a sanctified society, both to God’s glory. God’s sovereignty confronts the individual as law, first in nature and then in revelation through the Decalogue, interpreted in the light of later insights. To keep this law means perfection for the believer.

But Adam’s disobedience corrupted human nature into moral helplessness; repentance (including mortification and reform), which God in grace bestows and faith receives, so regenerates human nature as to produce righteousness, the image of God, and holiness. The resulting moral life is disciplined, energetic, free, charitable, imitating Christ. Discipline is the central principle and includes self-denial.

God’s sovereignty confronts humanity corporately with the ideal of a sanctified society. The commercial world would be brought under God’s rule as the sense of vocation developed faithfulness in work, justice and compassion in the ownership of property, investment for fair interest (a wholly novel principle in Christian ethics). The political world would be brought under God’s sovereignty as civil institutions regulated and restrained manners according to God’s natural law, exercising divine authority in promoting true religion, defending the weak, and punishing the wicked, all with Christian support. But only under God: rulers are neither above criticism nor to be obeyed when misgovernment becomes intolerable. War is simply the extension of the magistrate’s “power of the sword” against international crime, rightly claiming Christian loyalty. Thus church and state cooperate to make this world again God’s kingdom.

Modern Ethical Systems. Various attempts to replace the external ecclesiastical authority repudiated at the Reformation by an internal autonomous authority of conscience (Butler), moral reason (Kant), or the inner light of the Spirit (Barclay) failed to achieve a system of ethics, and systematizing fell out of fashion.

The nineteenth century saw the emergence of a unifying movement to set Christian ethics on a new basis, to express the common thinking (or feeling) behind very many attempts at Christian social amelioration and prevention of evils. Numerous propagandists contributed, usually starting from strongly evangelical compassion, but the new thrust’s intellectual formulation owed most to F. D. Maurice, who emphasized Jesus’ teaching on the kingdom of God as the heart of the gospel: “The kingdom of God is the great existing reality that is to renew the earth.”

Walter Rauschenbusch likewise stated that “Christ’s concept of the kingdom came to me as a new revelation,” and his social gospel (emphasizing both words equally) sought the establishment of Christ’s rule in all human relationships. Sin and salvation, the Christian goal, he saw as essentially social; the task of Christian ethics was “the Christianizing of the social order.” Against the more idealistic aspects of the movement Reinhold Niebuhr insisted upon Christianity’s limitations in the political field, with a realism that Dietrich Bonhoeffer, confronting Nazism, sought to adapt into an existentialist, secular, “religionless” Christianity. This would accept the secular world as already, and in fact, redeemed and in process of being conformed to “the form of Christ.” This world is not separate from God; a world “come of age” must not look for divine interventions. Christians must work to conform this world to Christ by living for others, under certain divine mandates of labor, marriage, government, and church. In Bonhoeffer’s posthumous and fragmentary Ethics is material that might have become a new system of Christian ethics on radical social lines.

Instead, on one side Christian ethical thought has turned to existentialism expressed as “situation ethics,” which almost implies the denial of all system and consistency. On another side it has turned to “the theology of the Word”—again more a movement than a system, but marked by a consistent pattern thoroughly pursued. Re-asserting the transcendence of God and the givenness of revelation against overemphasis on religious experience, Karl Barth rejected natural morality in favor of the objective authority of the word God speaks to people in Christ. Ethics is the doctrine of God’s command implied within all Christian theology: within creation (God commanding in nature), within reconciliation (God commanding in salvation), and within final redemption (God commanding for glory); and the command is always concrete (“situational”), never in abstract principles. Obligation, then, is really privilege, and obedience is one’s acknowledgment that God is right in all he does and asks. This is freedom, too, and an expression of love.

Ethical Systems, Christian

Emil Brunner carried Barth’s main emphasis further: the good is not what is natural to persons, but what God wills. But Brunner gave greater place to human responsibility—one’s ability to respond—to the given, saving act of God in Christ, which becomes the very center of life: (1) by revealing what the good is, namely love, whose prescriptions cannot be known beforehand, but whose endeavor exceeds justice as needs exceed right; (2) by achieving the good, as faith lets God, by the Spirit, have his way with us. Love constitutes community—of life (in marriage and parenthood), of labor (working to use and serve creation), of the state (God’s order for a sinful world), of culture (enriching common life), and of the church (molding the institutions of society).

To this emphasis on the Word of God Rudolf Bultmann added the existential overtone, that the Word comes to the soul in the very act of the proclamation of Christ, received in faith. The death and resurrection of Christ attain meaning only in my dying and rising with him. To receive the proclamation is to participate in it, in obedience and love. Ethics is the unfolding of faith itself, in “authentic existence.”

Here again a common mind appears to be shaping a system. After several generations of diverse analysis, any ethical synthesis is attractive if it promises clarity and authority. But when it emerges, certain unflinching constants that have marked all truly Christian systems will no doubt characterize the new formulation. It will uphold a given, objective moral standard; it will demonstrate the relation of ethics to human nature as God made it; it will offer to sinful humans not merely moral counsel but incentive and hope; it will be as relevant to society as to the individual, as flexible to changing situations as it is loyal to the given unchanging ideal that unites obligation with love—the imitation of Christ.

R. E. O. WHITE

See also ETHICS; BIBLICAL; GOOD, THE GOOD, GOODNESS; SITUATION ETHICS; SOCIAL ETHICS.

Bibliography. T. Aquinas, Summa contra Gentiles; Summa Theologica; K. Barth, Church Dogmatics; W. Beach and H. R. Niebuhr, eds., Christian Ethics; E. Brunner, Divine Imperative; B. Häring, Free and Faithful in Christ; C. F. H. Henry, Christian Personal Ethics; A. F. Holmes, Ethics; E. G. Rupp, Righteousness of God; H. Thielicke, Theological Ethics; R. E. O. White, Christian Ethics; C. J. H. Wright, Living as the People of God.

Ethics, Biblical. Ethics finds place in a theological dictionary precisely because neither in Judaic nor in Christian thought can ethics be separated, except for the purpose of concentration, from its theological context. All biblical theology has moral implications that comprise the biblical ethic.

In the Old Testament. In recognizing the Old Testament as Christian Scripture, the church adopted some embarrassing moral precedents: burning of witches, the poisoned trial cup, family punishment, polygamy, concubinage, and much violence and war. But it also fell heir to a great deal of moral instruction, warning, example, high inspiration, and moral faith that immeasurably increased Christianity’s ethical resources.

Chief among gains was undoubtedly the theocratic foundation of ethics as the will of God, holy, faithful, and good, and based on what God had already done as creator and redeemer of his people. Thus, the Decalogue opens with “I am the LORD your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt, out of the land of slavery”; while the unique covenant that bound Israel to its God, not in a natural bond (as though God were the remotest ancestor) but in a moral relationship, originating in God’s choice, promise, and deliverance and answered by Israel’s grateful obedience and trust, lent an unparalleled quality of humility and confidence to Jewish ethical thought. Properly understood, obedience did not aim at divine favor but was inspired by it.

The Decalogue itself (perpetuating even older ideals) is a remarkable ethical document, its received form embracing a dual code of religious (Exod. 20:3–12) and social (vv. 13–17) duties, though bringing both areas (worship, prohibition of idols, the oath, the sacred day, and filial piety on the one hand, and the sanctity of life, marriage, property, truth, and desire on the other) under direct divine authority. Inevitably this form of commandment gave its tone to Judaic morality, although the final commandment against coveting enters a realm where legalism is helpless.

The development of this ethical basis in the “Book of the Covenant” (Exod. 20:22–23:19; see 24:7) reflects a simple nomadic and agricultural background, bringing a sense of justice and measured responsibility into primitive conditions; capital offenses are numerous, slavery accepted, but equity and piety begin to affect social life.

Deuteronomy emphasizes a humanitarian spirit, a liberality, sympathy, and inward holiness ("Love the LORD your God," 6:5) entirely in accord with the teaching of the prophets. Amos made ethics essential to Israel's relation to God, and his morality was pure, self-disciplined, passionately defensive of the poor and oppressed, passionately opposed to cruelty, deceit, luxury, and selfishness. Isaiah and Micah demanded a religion consonant with the character of the Holy One of Israel. Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Isaiah 40–66 apply the bitter lessons of the Babylonian exile in relentlessly ethical ways, though always within the context of God's unswerving purpose for his people. Israel's God is emphatically the author and guardian of the moral law, requiring above all that people do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with their God (Mic. 6:8).

Later Jewish moral teaching included (in Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Job, Sirach) valuable ethical "wisdom" whose aim was to simplify duty into practical reverence for God, the merest common sense in those who know themselves creatures of the Eternal: "The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom" (Ps. 111:10). Wisdom's ideal is eloquently expressed in Job 31.

The Babylonian exile and the foreign domination that followed so threatened Jewish self-identity that immense emphasis was laid upon the written and oral law, which enshrined everything distinctively Jewish. Piety, nationalism, and pride combined to produce an exaggerated legalism, burdensome to most and a source of moral blindness, hypocritical casuistry, and self-righteousness to many. Hence, there arose "religious" opposition to Jesus, for whom legalism held no divine authority, and Christianity's emphasis on freedom.

In the New Testament. A long ethical tradition was summarized, therefore, when John the Baptist appeared demanding purity, righteousness, honesty, and social concern (Luke 3:10–14). But especially illuminating is the discrimination of Jesus as he took up from Judaism its ethical monotheism, its social conscience, and the relation of religion to morality, while rejecting the tendency to self-righteousness, the hard, external legalism, the nationalism, the cultivation of merit, and the failure to differentiate ritual from morality. On the other hand, Jesus pressed the demand for righteousness still further than the law, into the mind and motive behind behavior (Matt. 5:17–48), back to the original purposes of God (Matt. 19:3–9; Mark 2:27), or to the sufficient and overriding commandment of love to God and neighbor (Matt. 22:35–40). In this summary of all duty, religious and social, as love lies Jesus' most characteristic contribution to ethical thought, as his example of love's meaning and his death in love for humanity comprise his most powerful contribution to ethical achievement.

Religion and ethics meet again in Christ's gospel of the kingdom of God, his version of the messianic hope and of the prophets' vision of God as Lord of history. Christ's description of life in the kingdom, its opportunities and obligations, applies his radical and realistic idea of righteousness and love to family life, stewardship of wealth, responsibility toward the state, social evils, the fact of sin's sickness and cruelty. In all realms obedience to the will of God constitutes the kingdom and ensures its blessings; though it may involve loss of the self-life, that will gain eternal profit.

But the King is also Father, and the citizens of the kingdom are his sons and daughters, sharing a status and life that reflect the character of God, in a fellowship and forgiveness, a freedom and trust, that make obedience glad. Beneath all else is the personal attachment of people to Jesus himself as Savior and Lord; in that love (John 14:15; 21:15–17) the desire to be like Christ becomes a moral incentive of immense emotional power. Such love delights to keep Christ's commandments.

There is good reason to believe the apostolic church offered considerable moral training to converts, covering abstinence from old sins and pagan ways, steadfastness under persecution, the fostering of fellowship, and submission to leaders. This probably included lists of duties as husband, wife, parent, child, servant, slave, and neighbor (see Colossians and 1 Peter). The earliest development of Christian ethical teaching is perhaps best illustrated in 1 Peter, where the emphasis falls upon holiness and submission—to civil powers (2:13–17), to slave-masters (2:18–25), to husbands (3:1–7), and within the fellowship (3:8–9; 4:8–11; 5:5–6). This unexpected theme not only spells out the meaning of life under divine rule; it follows from the biblical view of the essence of sin as self-will.

Illustration of the earliest Christian moral life is best seen in Luke's impressive gallery (in Acts) of essentially good, happy, socially useful, courageous, and transformed people, closely corresponding to his picture of Jesus in his Gospel. James, too, probably presents an early picture of the church's moral stance, in a series of meditations on great words of Jesus in the manner of Jewish wisdom literature.

Paul's ethical concern was to counter the legalism that had failed in his own life and that threatened to confine the church to a Jewish sect, by insisting on the sufficiency of faith to save Jew and Gentile alike, and on the freedom of the Christian to follow the leading of the Spirit (so Galatians). While handing on to converts the common tradition of ethical teaching (Rom. 6:17; 2 Thess. 2:15; 3:6), Paul especially explicated the ethical significance of faith and the nature of life in the Spirit.

Faced with the challenge that if justification is by faith alone the believer may continue to sin with impunity, Paul replies that the faith that saves involves such a personal identification with Christ in death to sin, self, and the world, and in resurrection to a new life of freedom, surrender, and triumph, that to continue in sin while exercising such faith is inconsistent, unnecessary, and impossible (Rom. 6; Gal. 2:20). For Paul, the faith that saves sanctifies. If any believer finds this not so, it is because he or she is failing to be what in Christ he or she has become—dead to sin, alive to God.

Paul's other ethical theme contends that what the law can never do, through the weakness of human nature, "the law of the Spirit of life" in Christ Jesus does accomplish, so that the law is fulfilled in us (Rom. 8:1-4). Already Jeremiah and Ezekiel had linked the invisible power of God in creation and history (Spirit) with the new heart and will needed in Israel. Luke, by showing Jesus as the bearer and bestower of the Spirit, and John, by describing the Spirit as Jesus' other self, reveal how in early Christian thought the whole idea of the divine Spirit had become stamped with the image of Jesus (Acts 16:7). Paul spells out the effect of this identification as producing the Christlike character—the fruit of the Spirit—in every willing believer (Rom. 5:5; 8:9-14; Gal. 5:22-23). This transformation of people by the inner dynamic of the Christ Spirit is one of the central ethical motifs of Christianity.

The other is the theme common to all New Testament ethical teaching, the imitation of Christ. The Synoptic Gospels present this as simply following Jesus. John expounds the ideal of Christus Exemplar as loving (13:34; 15:12), obeying (9:4; 15:10), standing firm (15:20), and humbly serving (13:14-15) as Jesus did for us. First John links it with the Christian hope (3:2). Peter connects imitation especially with the cross (1 Peter 2:21-25; 3:17-18; 4:1, 13). Paul makes it the goal of worship (2 Cor. 3:18), of ministry (Eph. 4:11-13), of exhortation (1 Cor. 11:1), and of God's providence (Rom. 8:28-29), defining its inmost meaning as having "the mind of the Lord" (1 Cor. 2:16; Phil. 2:5), "the Spirit of God" (1 Cor. 7:40).

Summary. In contrast with philosophical systems, the enduring marks of biblical ethics are its foundation in relationship with God; its objective, imposed obligation to obedience; its appeal to the deepest in people; its down-to-earth social relevance; and its capacity for continual adaptation and development.

The final biblical formulation of the ideal as Christlikeness is related directly to love and gratitude kindled by the experience of redemption; it is rooted in objective history (as the obvious ethical implicate of the incarnation); it appeals strongly to one's finest moral intuitions; it calls to Christlike ministry among the needy of the world and to the fulfillment of God's kingdom on earth; and through the Christian centuries its many forms and interpretations have proved its flexible adaptability to changing conditions. The early biblical command, "Be ye holy, for I am holy," finds clear echo in the latest biblical promise, "We shall be like him."

R. E. O. WHITE

See also ETHICAL SYSTEMS, CHRISTIAN; IMITATION OF CHRIST; KINGDOM OF CHRIST, GOD, HEAVEN; TEN COMMANDMENTS.

Bibliography. B. Chilton and J. I. H. McDonald, Jesus and the Ethics of the Kingdom; C. H. Dodd, Gospel and Law: The Relation of Faith and Ethics in Early Christianity; J. H. Houlden, Ethics of the New Testament; W. Lillie, Studies in New Testament Ethics; T. W. Mansin, Ethics and the Gospel; L. H. Marshall, Challenge of New Testament Ethics; W. O. E. Oesterley and T. H. Robinson, Hebrew Religion.

Ethics, Sexual. See SEXUAL ETHICS.

Ethics, Situation. See SITUATION ETHICS.

Ethics, Social. See SOCIAL ETHICS.

Eucharist. See LORD'S SUPPER.

Eugenics. Selective breeding, or genetic manipulation with the purpose of producing an enhanced population or master-race of people. Eugenics is best known for the German experiment in master-race building that culminated in the Holocaust. Interest in eugenics is being revived as a result of the bio-technical advances made in the last few decades and the knowledge gained from the Human Genome Project (HGP) begun in 1990. This project will chart the sequence of all 3 billion human nucleotides—the molecules making up the human DNA—linking genetic maps with the physical characteristics controlled. This work will give us unprecedented powers to cure and control human disease, but these same methods may be directed with equal ease toward eugenic ends—the enhancement of the human genetic code, or compulsory genetic testing. In the early twentieth century, the work done by the Austrian monk Mendel, in plotting the laws of inheritance, sparked an interest in human eugenics. Although the German eugenics experiment is best known, similar ideas were rampant in other countries including America, where compulsory sterilization was often mandated for the mentally ill, and couples with high IQ or social standing were encouraged to reproduce. The genetic era began in earnest in 1953 when the biochemical structure of DNA was discovered. By the 1980s methods for cloning and artificially splicing and recombining genes (small sections or frames of the DNA molecule) were legalized, as was the patenting of these new genes. This made possible the breeding of mixed species of animals or plants and the commercial exploitation of genetics. Together with advances, which since 1979 allow in vitro fertilization of human eggs, these techniques pave the way for deliberately changing human DNA.

“Soft eugenics” occurs now in a number of ways. Couples with a family- or race-related history of inherited disease may get or may be urged to get genetic counseling. This is often followed by prenatal testing of a fetus. To date there have also been several attempts by different ethnic or religious groups to reduce the incidence of race-related recessive diseases. A program of premarital counseling, carried out by the government and Orthodox Church of Cyprus has eradicated all incidence of thalassemia on the island since 1992. Recently, orthodox Jews in New York have attempted a program to eliminate Tay Sachs and other diseases in their midst by encouraging genetic counseling. These programs are being watched with interest, as the fine line between prevention and eugenics would be crossed were one group or government to impose such measures on another.

Prenatal testing for inherited disease now commonly ends in abortion if the test is positive. Increasingly common in the future will be in vitro fertilization for couples with suspected genetic disease, followed by genetic testing of the eight cell embryo, destruction of those afflicted, and implantation of others into the mother’s womb. Ethical issues relating to these procedures are complex and at present are tied almost completely to the cure or prevention of disease. Abortion is considered unambiguously wrong by evangelical Christians as well as Roman Catholics, Orthodox, and many Jews. Most groups who oppose abortion on religious grounds will also resist the destruction of fertilized embryos, there being no point other than fertilization at which to measure the beginning of life. In vitro fertilization and counseling both represent an ambiguous good, being used to help prevent infertility or gross genetic disease, but both are quietly ushering in a new age in which we view ourselves as “self created.” We do not know the long-term spiritual effects of artificial conception on the person or society. Obvious also are the commercial dangers of this manipulation in terms of the temptation to sell or dispose of the product of the test tube.

But these methods will also be the basis of any future eugenics program. Increasingly, scientists will be able to tamper with DNA itself, either in body (somatic) cells or in the germ cells (sperm or ovum) of the human. We are beginning to be able to do what is called gene therapy, removing body cells from afflicted organs, changing the DNA, and reintroducing the new cells into the body. This will also be done in the future at the embryonic stage, thereby affecting—and hopefully correcting—the germ cells of the new person and all subsequent generations. On the surface we can only applaud the use of medicine to remove the affliction of severe disease, and this has been the response of most religious groups to this possibility. But the risks may be great, and errors introduced into human germ cells will be reproduced endlessly through future generations. And in the post-Holocaust age, in which whole races of people have been deemed subhuman, there must be great caution in determining which states or characteristics are “disease.”

The second type of genetic tampering involves applying similar methods to the human germ cells in order to enhance human characteristics. The response of most religious groups to this possibility has almost universally been negative, and evangelicals would share in this condemnation. Although some have argued that genetics is a God-given gift enabling us to be cocreators with God, few share this affirmation. There is a sense that tampering with human DNA would be a violation of sacred trust, and an undermining of human dignity. Fears are raised that in emphasizing the characteristics prized at the moment we will cease to value human diversity, and the gifts and contributions of the least among us will be devalued. More importantly we would be attempting as never before to redeem the human race by human effort, and we would run the risk of tampering with the centers of will or personality, or of producing a radically different “human” species with attendant ethical and social problems now only barely conceivable. At present there is very real reserve about this possibility among scientists, but nevertheless there will be perceived great benefits for parents and possibly offspring in genetic enhancement. Most of the reasons against such tampering are religiously based, and the utilitarian advantages and even commercial temptations may be so great as to override any religious scruples. More generally the ethical problems pertaining to genetic therapy or enhancement revolve around issues of social inequalities in medical care, and the great temptations to discrimination that will almost certainly be exacerbated in the future, producing perhaps a new superior breed of “clean” persons. If the wealthy are able to buy genetic enhancement or therapy, the gap between the rich and the poor and the First and Third World will be increased dramatically. Major structural safeguards like insurance only work when there exists states of relative ignorance, which will no longer ever be the case. While a degree of genetic self-knowledge may well be advantageous or even compulsory, problems of privacy and confidentiality will be overwhelming. And lastly a radical change will take place in our view of persons. It will be harder to relate to that aspect of ourselves that is in touch with the spiritual and the moral, which is unfinished and mysterious, and much easier to see ourselves only in terms of our unique—or not unique in the case of cloning—genetic structure or beginning.

Eugenics

In February 1997, British scientists announced a successful cloning from the differentiated cells of an adult sheep, an event that had not been anticipated in the near future. Genetic technology has hence passed a threshold, the intended effect of which is the more efficient management of livestock for human purposes. Possible and probable consequences include an increase in the use of scientifically controlled reproduction of animals and humans as a means toward the ends of other humans, be they individuals, groups, or governments. Christians will greet this new technology with caution; cloning, while conferring many benefits, may be a temptation to a false immortality, and will deprive us of the diversity, surprise, and uniqueness accompanying natural reproduction. N. HOGGARD-CREEGAN

Bibliography. K. Drlica, Double-Edged Sword; J. Kilner, ed., Bioethics and the Future of Medicine; K. Lebacqz, Genetics, Ethics and Parenthood; J. R. Nelson, On the New Frontiers of Genetics and Religion; P. Ramsey, Fabricated Man; M. Rothstein, Legal and Ethical Issues Raised by the Human Genome Project.

Eusebius of Caesarea (ca. 265–ca. 339). Bishop of Caesarea and "father of church history." Eusebius was probably born in Palestine and educated at a school of theology in Caesarea. There he worked with Pamphilus, the school's founder, whose name he later adopted. Pamphilus was martyred around 309 in the Diocletian persecution, and Eusebius fled to Tyre and then Egypt, where he was briefly imprisoned. He became bishop of Caesarea about 315, remaining in the post until his death. He was active in the key theological debates of the day, initially leaning toward the Arian position on the nature of the Son, inclined to Origen's view of the Son's subordination, and distrusting of Sabellian teaching. When confronted with the charge of heresy for his Arian inclinations, he adopted the Nicene formula and repudiated Arius. He used as his confession a creed of Caesarea, which although lacking the key homoousios phrase, was modified to become the Nicene Creed. Throughout the controversy Eusebius led the moderate group, remaining somewhat sympathetic to Arians and engaging in debate with members of the Athanasian faction. He was president of the Council of Tyre in 335, which led to Athanasius's exile. Along with being an advisor to Constantine, he was a productive writer. His enduring contribution was his writing, most notably the history of the early church from the period of the apostles until about the time of the Council of Nicea in 325, considered to be the best source of the early church's history and a source for information on events and people not recorded elsewhere. P. A. ERICKSEN

Bibliography. Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History; G. F. Chesnut, First Christian Histories; F. J. Foakes-Jackson, Eusebius Pamphili: A Study of the Man and His Writings; J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Creeds; H. J. Lawlor, Eusebiana: Essays on the Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius; J. Quasten, Patrology; J. Stevenson, Studies in Eusebius.

Euthanasia. The word is derived from two Greek words meaning "good" and "death." It refers to any attempt to prevent the process of death from being prolonged and/or painful in situations of inevitable and painful death. Often heavy medical expenditures are a factor. The heightening of the issue of euthanasia is in part a by-product of medical success. Persons who formerly would have died at a relatively early age are now kept alive to the point of contracting diseases of older age or experiencing the general physical deterioration that so often accompanies advanced years. With a rapidly increasing population of older persons in our society, euthanasia will become a larger issue. In the 1980s and 90s Detroit pathologist Dr. Jack Kevorkian has come to be called "Dr. Death" because of supplying terminally ill patients with information enabling them to take their own lives.

Euthanasia may be classified on the basis of several criteria. It may be passive or active. Passive euthanasia involves simply allowing the person to die through withholding or discontinuing treatment that would prolong life. Active euthanasia involves some positive step to terminate life, such as administration of a toxic substance or injection of an air bubble into the bloodstream. Euthanasia may also be classified as voluntary or involuntary. Voluntary euthanasia is the case where the subject has expressed a desire for life to end. In involuntary euthanasia the decision is made for the subject by some third party, usually the closest relative. Thus, there are four possible classes of euthanasia: voluntary passive, involuntary passive, voluntary active, and involuntary active.

Passive euthanasia is in fact quite widely practiced today. Typically the situation is one in which there is no medical prognosis of recovery or even of improvement. The patient is ordinarily in great discomfort or even acute pain. Frequently, great sympathetic distress is felt by the patient's loved ones as well, and in addition, crushing economic burdens may be imposed on the family by prolonged costly medical care.

Some opponents of euthanasia advance what has been called the sanctity of life argument. On these terms life itself is a good, a gift from God. It should therefore be preserved by all means. While Scripture does accord a high value to life, it is questionable whether it is an absolute value, in disregard of other considerations. On the other side is the natural death argument. God is the giver and taker of life. There is a time for death, and when this time comes, the person is to die. We should not interfere with this occurrence. The difficulty with this argument is that it would preclude any medical assistance, even first-aid, since that could be interpreted as (and might actually be) interference with the inevitability of death. This has caused some to distinguish between more customary medical treatment and the more unusual (sometimes termed "heroic measures"), maintaining that we are obligated to take all normal steps to conserve life but need not take heroic measures. The difficulty with this approach is the relativity of the terms. What is extraordinary treatment now may be routine ten years from now.

Sooner or later, death is God's will (Heb. 9:27). Mercy may call for permitting it, especially when the patient has declared that to be his or her wish. The use of a "living will" enables the next of kin to know the patient's wish when he may no longer be capable of expressing it. Nonetheless, such a step is a sobering one, particularly when the patient is not a Christian, since it cuts off the last opportunity of accepting Christ. Christians will want to make certain that such persons have heard the gospel.

Active euthanasia presents somewhat different issues. Although it is currently illegal in most countries, appeals are being made for its legalization. Some simply reject this either as murder or as assisted suicide. It should be noted, however, that biblically not all cases of homicide were treated as murder. There was condemnable killing (murder), excusable killing (accidental death), and even mandatory killing (warfare and capital punishment). Murder was intentional, premeditated, malicious taking of the life of someone not deserving of capital punishment and contrary to the wishes of the person. While involuntary active euthanasia contains too many of these features to be acceptable, voluntary active euthanasia is neither contrary to the wishes of the subject nor done for the purpose of inflicting harm.

Nor is the effort to treat this as suicide convincing. The Bible does not speak clearly regarding suicide, the cases (Abimelech, Judg. 9:50–57; Saul, 1 Sam. 31, cf. 2 Sam. 1:1–16; and Judas Iscariot, Matt. 27:5) being simply reported rather than given any moral evaluation. The first two are most like euthanasia but appear to have been motivated by desire to avoid disgrace rather than pain. And not all cases of self-willed death are regarded as suicide. Self-sacrifice is commended by Jesus (John 15:13) and even practiced by him. Suicide involves willing a death that would presumably not otherwise occur for some time and that may terminate an otherwise useful life. Euthanasia merely hastens the end of a life that is possibly already largely useless and alters the circumstances of the death.

Some, recognizing the lack of clear-cut biblical statements about euthanasia, have attempted to resolve the difficulty by appealing to biblical principles. Those who oppose euthanasia usually cite the sanctity of life and the sovereignty of God. Those favoring it appeal to the principles of mercy and love. While relevant, none of these considerations appears compelling, however.

Great caution should be observed in dealing with this difficult issue. Both revealed and non-religious principles suggest that active euthanasia is less than God's best: the value of life; the finality of death; the possibility of diagnostic errors; the possible danger of abuse; and the biblical perspective that suffering is not an unqualified evil but may have a purifying or strengthening effect. It is desirable, therefore, that the present laws prohibiting euthanasia be retained while further thorough study is done. Other options, including the possibility of passive euthanasia, the use and development of painkillers, the sustaining power of God, and the encouragement of believers, should be explored and utilized.

M. J. ERICKSON

See also DEATH; ETHICS, BIBLICAL.

Bibliography. R. R. Baelz, "Voluntary Euthanasia," Theol 75:238–51; T. Beauchamp and R. Veach, eds., Ethical Issues in Death and Dying; N. Cameron, ed., Death without Dignity; A. B. Downing, ed., Euthanasia and the Right to Death; C. E. Koop, Right to Live, The Right to Die; D. C. Maguire, Death by Choice; K. Vaux, ed., Who Shall Live.

Eutychianism. See MONOPHYSITISM.

Evangelicalism. The movement in modern Christianity, transcending denominational and confessional boundaries, that emphasizes conformity to the basic tenets of the faith and a missionary outreach of compassion and urgency. A person who identifies with it is an "evangelical," one who believes and proclaims the gospel of Jesus Christ. The word is derived from the Greek noun euangelion, translated as glad tidings, good or joyful news, or gospel (a derivative of the Middle English godspell, a discourse or story about God), and verb euangelizomai, to announce good tidings of or to proclaim good news. These appear nearly one hundred times in the NT and have passed into modern languages through the Latin equivalent evangelium.

Evangelicalism

Biblically the gospel is defined in 1 Corinthians 15:1–4 as the message that Christ died for our sins, was buried, and rose again on the third day in fulfillment of the prophetic Scriptures and thereby provided the way of redemption for sinful humanity. Three times the NT calls one who preaches the gospel an euangelistes (evangelist).

Theological Meaning. Evangelicalism has both a theological and historical meaning. Theologically it begins with a stress on the sovereignty of God, the transcendent, personal, infinite Being who created and rules over heaven and earth. He is a holy God who cannot countenance sin, yet he is one of love and compassion for the sinner. He actively identifies with the sufferings of his people, is accessible to them through prayer, and has by his sovereign free will devised a plan whereby his creatures may be redeemed. Although the plan is predetermined, he allows them to cooperate in the attainment of his objectives and brings their wills into conformity with his will.

Evangelicals regard Scripture as the divinely inspired record of God's revelation, the infallible, authoritative guide for faith and practice. Inspiration is not mechanical dictation; rather, the Holy Spirit has guided the various biblical authors in their selection of words and meanings as they wrote about matters in their respective places and times. Thus, the words and imagery are culturally conditioned, but God has nonetheless conveyed his eternal, unconditional Word through them. The Scriptures are inerrant in all that they affirm and serve as the adequate, normative, and wholly reliable expression of God's will and purpose. But the heavenly teaching of the Bible is not self-evident, and the guidance and illumination of the Holy Spirit are required to bring out the divine meaning embedded in the text and to apply it to our lives.

Denying the Enlightenment doctrine of a person's innate goodness, evangelicals believe in the total depravity of humanity. All the goodness that exists in human nature is tainted by sin, and no dimension of life is free from its effects. Humanity was originally created perfect; but through the fall sin entered the race, making people corrupt at the very core of their being, and this spiritual infection has been passed on from generation to generation. Sin is not an inherent weakness or ignorance but positive rebellion against God's law. It is moral and spiritual blindness and bondage to powers beyond one's control. The root of sin is unbelief, and its manifestations are pride, lust for power, sensuousness, selfishness, fear, and disdain for spiritual things. The propensity to sin is within a person from birth, its power cannot be broken by human effort, and the ultimate result is complete and permanent separation from the presence of God.

God himself provided the way out of the human dilemma by allowing his only Son, Jesus Christ, to assume the penalty and experience death on our behalf. Christ made atonement for sin on Calvary's cross by shedding his blood, thereby redeeming us from the power of spiritual death by dying in his place. Christ's substitutionary or vicarious atonement was a ransom for humankind's sins, a defeat of the powers of darkness, and a satisfaction for sin because it met the demand of God's justice. Then when Christ arose from the grave, he triumphed over death and hell, thus demonstrating the supremacy of divine power in a sin-cursed world and laying the foundation for the eventual redemption of all creation from sin's corrupting influence. To affirm the atonement, Christians are called upon to bear witness by following their Lord in a life of demanding discipleship and bearing the burdens, sufferings, and needs of others.

Evangelicals believe that salvation is an act of unmerited divine grace received through faith in Christ, not through any kind of penance or good works. One's sins are pardoned, and one is regenerated (reborn), justified before God, and adopted into the family of God. The guilt of sin is removed immediately, while the inward process of renewing and cleansing (sanctification) takes place as one leads the Christian life. By grace believers are saved, kept, and empowered to live a life of service.

Heralding the Word of God is an important feature of evangelicalism. The vehicle of God's Spirit is the biblical proclamation of the gospel which brings people to faith. The written word is the basis for the preached word, and holy living is part of the process of witness, since life and word are inseparable elements of the evangelical message. Holiness involves not withdrawal from the world and detaching oneself from evil but rather boldly confronting evil and overcoming its effects both personally and socially. In this fashion the church brings the lost to a knowledge of Christ, teaches the way of discipleship, and engages in meeting human needs. Social service thus becomes both the evidence of one's faith and a preparation for the proclamation of the gospel. The preevangelism of works of mercy may be just as important as preaching itself in bringing people into the kingdom of God.

Finally, evangelicals look for the visible personal return of Jesus Christ to set up his kingdom of righteousness, a new heaven and earth, one that will never end. This is the blessed hope for which all Christians long. It will consummate the judgment upon the world and the salvation of the faithful.

It should be stressed that these are special emphases of evangelicals and that they share many beliefs with other orthodox Christians. Among them are the Trinity; Christ's incarnation, virgin birth, and bodily resurrection; the reality of miracles and the supernatural realm; the church as the body of Christ; the sacraments as effectual signs or means of grace; immortality of the soul; and the final resurrection. But evangelicalism is more than orthodox assent to dogma or a reactionary return to past ways. It is the affirmation of the central beliefs of historic Christianity.

Historical Meaning. Although evangelicalism is customarily seen as a contemporary phenomenon, the evangelical spirit has manifested itself throughout church history. The commitment, discipline, and missionary zeal that distinguish evangelicalism were features of the apostolic church, the fathers, early monasticism, the medieval reform movements (Cluniac, Cistercian, Franciscan, and Dominican), preachers like Bernard of Clairvaux and Peter Waldo, the Brethren of the Common Life, and the Reformation precursors Wycliffe, Hus, and Savonarola. At the Reformation the name “evangelical” was given to the Lutherans who sought to redirect Christianity to the gospel and renew the church on the basis of God’s authoritative Word. With the onset of Lutheran orthodoxy and the domination of many churches by civil rulers, unfortunately much of the spiritual vitality evaporated. Soon the word came to be applied collectively to both Lutheran and Reformed communions in Germany. Congregations belonging to the Prussian Union Church (founded 1817) utilized it as well, and in contemporary Germany evangelical (evangelisch) is synonymous with Protestant.

A recovery of the spiritual vigor of the Reformation resulted from three movements in the late seventeenth and the eighteenth centuries—German pietism, Methodism, and the Great Awakening. Actually these were rooted in Puritanism with its strong emphasis on biblical authority, divine sovereignty, human responsibility, and personal piety and discipline. The pietism of Spener, Francke, and Zinzendorf stressed Bible study, preaching, personal conversion and sanctification, missionary outreach, and social action. It directly influenced developments in Britain and America and laid the foundations for the later revival in Germany.

To be sure, the Enlightenment had a chilling effect on spiritual movements, but this was countered by the Methodist revival of John and Charles Wesley and George Whitefield in Britain and the Great Awakening in America prior to the Revolution. The new fervor spread within the Anglican Church at the end of the century where the “Evangelical” party of John Newton, William Wilberforce and his Clapham sect, and numerous others fought social ills at home and abroad and founded Bible and missionary societies. Similar developments occurred in the Scottish church under Thomas Chalmers and the Haldane brothers, while the Baptists, Congregationalists, and Methodists all created foreign mission agencies. In Germany, where the old pietism had waned, a new wave of evangelical enthusiasm spread across the land, the Erweckung, which cross-fertilized with British movements, while a parallel development occurred in France and Holland, the Reveil.

The nineteenth century was clearly the evangelical age. The Anglican party, represented by such distinguished personalities as Lord Shaftesbury and William E. Gladstone, occupied a central position in public life, while Nonconformist groups like the Baptists with their silver-tongued orator Charles H. Spurgeon and the Christian (Plymouth) Brethren reached many with the gospel. Other instances of British evangelical vitality included the YMCA founded by George Williams, The Salvation Army of Catherine and William Booth, the social ministries of George Mueller and Thomas Barnardo, the China Inland Mission of J. Hudson Taylor, and the Keswick movement. In Germany were the Gemeinschaft (fellowship) movement, the charitable endeavors of J. H. Wichern, and the spiritual preaching of the Blumhardts, while in Holland the Calvinist theologian and political leader Abraham Kuyper had a major impact.

In America revivalism was the hallmark of evangelical religion. The urban efforts of Charles Finney and D. L. Moody as well as rural and frontier movements among the Baptists, Methodists, Disciples of Christ, and Presbyterians and the growth of holiness perfectionism all helped to transform the nation’s religious landscape. Evangelicalism reached to the grass roots of white America, while the black community, in both slavery and freedom, was sustained and held together by its churches, which expressed a deep, personal evangelical faith. Evangelicalism shaped the nation’s values and civil religion and provided the vision of America as God’s chosen people. Political leaders publicly expressed evangelical convictions and suppressed non-Protestant and “foreign” elements who did not share in the national consensus. Not only unbelief but also social evil would be purged, and revivalism provided the reforming vision to create a righteous republic. The antislavery and temperance campaigns, innumerable urban social service agencies, and even the nascent women’s movements were facets of this.

The Protestant nations of the North Atlantic region shared in the great foreign missionary advance that carried the gospel to every corner of the earth, and before long the evangelical revivals that had repeatedly swept the Western world began to occur in Africa, Asia, and Latin America as well. The Evangelical Alliance was formed in London in 1846 to unite Christians (but not churches or denominations as such) in promoting religious liberty, missions, and other common interests. National alliances were formed in Germany, the United States, and many other countries. In 1951 the international organization was replaced by the new World Evangelical Fellowship.

Evangelicalism

The Twentieth Century. In the early twentieth century, however, evangelicalism went into a temporary eclipse. A decorous worldliness characterized by a stress on material prosperity, loyalty to the nation-state, and a rugged individualism inspired by social Darwinism virtually severed the taproot of social concern. Orthodox Christians seemed unable to cope with the flood of new ideas—German higher criticism, Darwinian evolution, Freudian psychology, Marxist socialism, Nietzschean nihilism, and the naturalism of the new science—all of which undermined confidence in the infallibility of the Bible and the existence of the supernatural. The bloodbath of World War I shattered the optimistic, postmillennial vision of ushering in the kingdom of God as soon as the hold of social evil was broken at home and the Great Commission of carrying the gospel to all parts of the globe was fulfilled. Emerging from the struggle against theological liberalism and the social gospel in Britain and North America was a narrow fundamentalism that internalized the Christian message and withdrew from involvement in the world. In addition, communism in the Soviet Union, nazism in Germany, and secularism throughout the world contributed to declining church attendance and interest in Christianity in general.

After World War II things turned around dramatically. Foreign missionary endeavors, Bible institutes and colleges, works among university students, and radio and literature ministries blossomed, while the evangelistic campaigns of the youthful Billy Graham had a global impact. A party of “conservative evangelicals” emerged in Britain and Evangelikaler in Germany, and their strength was reflected in such developments as the National Evangelical Anglican Congress and the German-based Conference of Confessing Fellowships. In the United States the foundation of the National Association of Evangelicals (1942), Fuller Theological Seminary (1947), and Christianity Today (1956) were significant expressions of the “new evangelicalism,” a term coined by Harold J. Ockenga in 1947.

The new or “neo” evangelicalism took issue with the older fundamentalism. Ockenga argued that it had a wrong attitude (a suspicion of all who did not hold every doctrine and practice that fundamentalists did), a wrong strategy (a separatism that aimed at a totally pure church on the local and denominational levels), and wrong results (it had not turned the tide of liberalism anywhere nor had it penetrated with its theology into the social problems of the day). Edward J. Carnell maintained further that fundamentalism was orthodoxy gone cultic because its convictions were not linked with the historic creeds of the church and it was more a mentality than a movement. Carl F. H. Henry insisted that fundamentalists did not present Christianity as an overarching worldview but concentrated instead on only part of the message. They were too otherworldly, anti-intellectual, and unwilling to bring their faith to bear upon culture and social life.

Although the new evangelicalism was open to ecumenical contacts, rejected excessive legalism and moralism, and revealed serious interest in the social dimension of the gospel, many of its spokespersons remained tied to the political and economic status quo. Groups of more “radical” Christians within mainstream evangelicalism—e.g., the Chicago Declaration of 1973, the Sojourners Community, and the British Shaftesbury Project—began calling attention to needs in this area. As more attention was given to defining an evangelical, it became clear that the numbers were far greater than had been believed. This was caused in large part by the charismatic period that began in the mid-1960s, a phenomenon that was worldwide in scope and continued on for decades. But the variations among the groups—Mennonites, Holiness, charismatics, Christian Brethren, Southern Baptists, black churches, separatist-fundamentalists, “nondenominational” bodies, and evangelical blocs within the traditional denominations—were enormous and a cause for deep concern.

Nevertheless, evangelical ecumenism has proceeded apace. The Billy Graham organization has been a major catalyst, especially in calling the World Congress on Evangelism (Berlin, 1966) and the International Congress on World Evangelization (Lausanne, 1974). The subsequent consultations sponsored by the Lausanne committee together with the activities of the World Evangelical Fellowship and the regional organizations formed by evangelicals in Africa, Asia, Latin America, and Europe have done much to foster closer relations and cooperative efforts in evangelism, relief work, and theological development. With the indigenization of mission society operations, the multinational character of relief and evangelistic organizations, and the sending of missionaries by people in Third World countries themselves, evangelicalism had become a truly global phenomenon.

Recent Developments. Following the charismatic revival of the 1960s, evangelicalism has experienced phenomenal growth both in North America and worldwide, with most of the growth taking place in the charismatic sector. In the United States, ninety million people now profess to be evangelical, and there has been commensurate growth in related concerns such as seminary enrollments, publishing, and a relatively new phenomenon, political involvement. This growth has taken place against the backdrop of a dramatic decline in mainline church membership and an increased secularization and postmodernization of U.S. society at large.

Internally within evangelicalism this growth has created some difficulties, and cracks are beginning to show. The very nature of evangelicalism never was a unified movement but a collection of emphases based on a common core of belief—a core that itself is now under discussion.

One notable development has been the appearance of a loosely connected group of mostly younger men and women intent on reforming evangelicalism, variously called “postconservative,” “reformist,” “progressive,” “the evangelical left,” or even “liberal evangelicalism”—a label harking back to the early part of this century. This is not a particularly large group, but they are articulate, highly placed academics whose word carries significant weight, men such as Roger Olson, Clark Pinnock, and Stanley Grenz. They are counterbalanced by defenders of a more traditional evangelicalism, such as David Wells, Millard Erickson, and Timothy George. At the present moment the vast majority of evangelicals are more traditionally inclined and are alarmed at what they perceive to be a defection from the faith. In some instances they are justified in their concern; in others they act as alarmists.

Presently a number of doctrinal issues are being hotly debated within evangelicalism, forming the crux of this issue. First, the nature of God. Some reformists would like to abandon a traditional theism for a more process model of God or would redefine various of God's attributes, in particular God's omniscience, arguing that for humans to be truly free, God cannot know the future. Second, Christology. In order to preserve the true humanity of Jesus, some reformists are advocating an adoptionist or kenotic form of Christology. They argue that evangelicalism is in danger of becoming docetic by placing too much emphasis on the deity of Christ. Third, the doctrine of salvation. The theory of the atonement is now being revisited, and various forms of universalism are being openly defended as evangelical. This denies the doctrine of hell, as do annihilationist theories, which are also being broached within the evangelical community. Fourth, the doctrine of Scripture. Reformists are dissatisfied with the traditional doctrine of inerrancy and would substitute “infallibility” (Scripture infallibly leads us to Christ), “final authority in what it teaches” (but nowhere else), or “final authority in faith and doctrine” (but not necessarily in matters of science or history). Fifth, the traditional doctrine of direct creation (not necessarily twenty-four-hour day theories) is being replaced by theistic evolution. Sixth, in the area of hermeneutics, postmodern literary theories are being used to deny that we may know to any truly meaningful extent the original author's intent when reading the Scriptures.

Needless to say, traditionalists are deeply concerned about these trends and are wondering aloud if the liberal evangelicalism of this generation is going to become the liberalism of the next generation, as has happened in the past.

It was perhaps inevitable that these differences surfaced when evangelicalism was no longer fighting for its life and had time to ask itself just what it really was. And this is the question that must be faced. Much of what is taking place within the reformist camp is outside the limits of evangelicalism as historically understood, but not all. It remains to be seen how these differences will be worked out and whether evangelicalism can become a united force against the real enemies of the faith in our own day.

R. V. PIERARD AND W. A. ELWELL

Bibliography. C. E. Armerding, ed., Evangelicals and Liberation; J. Barr, Fundamentalism; D. Bebbington, Evangelicalism in Modern Britain; D. G. Bloesch, Essentials of Evangelical Theology; Evangelical Renaissance; J. A. Carpenter, Revive Us Again; R. G. Clouse, R. D. Linder, and R. V. Pierard, eds., Cross and the Flag; D. W. Dayton, Discerning an Evangelical Heritage; G. Dorrien, Remaking of Evangelical Theology; J. D. Douglas, ed., Let the Earth Hear His Voice: International Congress on World Evangelization; M. Erickson, Evangelical Left; New Evangelical Theology; R. O. Ferm, Cooperative Evangelism; D. E. Harrell Jr., Varieties of Southern Evangelicalism; C. F. H. Henry, Evangelicals at the Brink of Crisis; Evangelicals in Search of Identity; Plea for Evangelical Demonstration; Uneasy Conscience of Modern Fundamentalism; D. E. Hoke, ed., Evangelicals Face the Future; J. D. Hunter, American Evangelicalism; Evangelicalism: The Coming Generation; M. A. Inch, Evangelical Challenge; J. Johnston, Will Evangelicalism Survive Its Own Popularity?; R. K. Johnston, Evangelicals at an Impasse: Biblical Authority in Practice; K. S. Kantzer, ed., Evangelical Roots; K. S. Kantzer and S. N. Gundry, eds., Perspectives on Evangelical Theology; J. B. A. Kessler, Study of the Evangelical Alliance in Great Britain; J. C. King, Evangelicals; R. P. Lightner, Neoevangelicalism Today; G. M. Marsden, Fundamentalism and American Culture; Reforming Evangelicalism; Understanding Fundamentalism and Evangelicalism; P. C. McGlasson, Another Gospel; W. G. McLoughlin, ed., American Evangelicals; D. O. Moberg, Great Reversal: Evangelism and Social Concern; N. Murphy, Beyond Liberalism and Fundamentalism; R. H. Nash, New Evangelicalism; M. A. Noll, Between Faith and Criticism; J. I. Packer, ed., Anglican Evangelicals Face the Future; C. R. Padilla, ed., New Face of Evangelicalism; R. V. Pierard, Unequal Yoke: Evangelical Christianity and Political Conservatism; R. Quebedeaux, Young Evangelicals; B. L. Ramm, Evangelical Heritage; I. M. Randall, Study of the Spirituality of English Evangelicalism 1918–1939; T. C. Reeves, Empty Church; B. L. Shelley, Evangelicalism in America; R. J. Sider, ed., Chicago Declaration; T. L. Smith, Revivalism and Social Reform; J. R. W. Stott, Fundamentalism and Evangelism; R. E. Webber, Common Roots: A Call to Evangelical Maturity; R. E. Webber and D. Bloesch, eds., Orthodox Evangelicals; D. F. Wells, No Place for Truth; D. F. Wells and J. D.

Evangelicalism

Woodbridge, Evangelicals; S. E. Wirt, Social Conscience of the Evangelical; J. D. Woodbridge, M. A. Noll, and N. O. Hatch, Gospel in America.

Evangelism. The proclamation of the good news of salvation in Jesus Christ with a view to bringing about the reconciliation of the sinner to God the Father through the regenerating power of the Holy Spirit. The word derives from the Greek noun euangelion, goods news, and verb euangelizomai, to announce or proclaim or bring good news.

Evangelism is based on the initiative of God himself. Because God acted, believers have a message to share with others. "For God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son" (John 3:16). "But God demonstrates his own love for us in this: While we were still sinners, Christ died for us" (Rom. 5:8). Like a father who longs for the return of his lost son, a woman who searches diligently for a lost coin, and a shepherd who leaves the rest of his flock to find a lost sheep (Luke 15), God loves sinners and actively seeks their salvation. God is always gracious, "not wanting anyone to perish, but everyone to come to repentance" (2 Pet. 3:9).

God, in turn, expects his people to share in his quest to save the lost. In order to believe the gospel, people must first hear it and understand it (Rom. 10:14–15). Thus, God has appointed ambassadors, agents of his kingdom, to be his ministers of reconciliation in the world (2 Cor. 5:11–21).

A comprehensive definition of evangelism came out of the International Congress on World Evangelization (1974). According to the Lausanne Covenant,

To evangelize is to spread the good news that Jesus Christ died for our sins and was raised from the dead according to the Scriptures, and that as the reigning Lord he now offers the forgiveness of sins and the liberating gift of the Spirit to all who repent and believe. Our Christian presence in the world is indispensable to evangelism, and so is that kind of dialogue whose purpose is to listen sensitively in order to understand. But evangelism itself is the proclamation of the historical, biblical Christ as Saviour and Lord, with a view to persuading people to come to him personally and so be reconciled to God. In issuing the gospel invitation we have no liberty to conceal the cost of discipleship. Jesus still calls all who would follow him to deny themselves, take up their cross, and identify themselves with his new community. The results of evangelism include obedience to Christ, incorporation into his church and responsible service in the world.

The Message. In light of this statement, evangelism may be broken down into its component parts. First, there is the message. To be biblical, evangelism must have content and convey information about the true nature of spiritual things. It should address the nature of sin and the plight of the sinner (Rom. 3). It should stress the love of God and his willingness to be reconciled to the lost (John 3; 2 Cor. 5). It must include a clear statement about the centrality of Jesus Christ in God's plan of redemption: that God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself and that Christ died for our sins and was raised from the dead according to the Scriptures (Rom. 10; 1 Cor. 15; 2 Cor. 5). The evangelistic word must also contain the promise of forgiveness of sins and the regenerating gift of the Holy Spirit to all who repent of their sin and put faith and trust (i.e., believes) in Jesus Christ (John 3; Acts 2). In short, the evangelistic message is based on the Word of God; it seeks to tell the story that God has already acted out.

The Method. Good news can be told in a variety of ways. Scripture does not designate a single method of transmitting the gospel. In the New Testament believers shared their faith through formal preaching and teaching, in their personal contacts and chance encounters. Consequently, Christians have felt free to devise different ways of doing evangelism: personal, mass (i.e., revival campaigns), saturation (i.e., blanketing of a given area), friendship, etc. They have learned how to use various media in spreading the gospel, including the latest in printed and telecommunication fields. All of these means are allowable if they present the message clearly, honestly, and compassionately. Overaggressiveness, manipulation, intimidation, and a well-intentioned misrepresentation of the gospel message actually subvert effective evangelism, though they may appear to bring "results." Whereas there is a legitimate place for aggressiveness and even confrontation in evangelism, integrity and love should be the foundation on which all methods are built. Furthermore, sharers of the Good News should know their hearers well enough to speak to their needs in ways they can understand (1 Cor. 9:19–23). When it comes to evangelistic method, Paul's words still speak with authority and insight: "And pray for us, too, that God may open a door for our message . . . so that I may proclaim it clearly, as I should. Be wise in the way you act toward outsiders; make the most of every opportunity. Let your conversation be always full of grace, seasoned with salt, so that you may know how to answer everyone" (Col. 4:3–6).

The Goals. Finally, there are the goals of evangelism. Basically evangelism seeks to bring people into a new relationship with God through Jesus Christ. Through the power of the Holy Spirit it endeavors to awaken repentance, commitment, and faith. Its goal is nothing less than the conversion of the sinner to a radically new way of life. How, then, do we know when evangelism has taken place? When the message has been given? When the message has been adequately understood? When the hearer has been brought to the point of deciding for or against the message he or she has received? Theologically, of course, the results of evangelism are in the hands of the Spirit, not the evangelist. But practically, the bearer of the message determines to a large extent the scope of the hearer's response because he has stated the terms of the invitation. This means that though evangelism by definition concentrates on the need to respond to God in initial repentance and faith, its message must also contain something about the obligations of Christian discipleship.

In their enthusiasm for sharing the benefits of the gospel, evangelists dare not neglect the obligations that come with receiving it. In many evangelical circles, for example, people make a distinction between accepting Christ as Savior and accepting him as Lord. This often leaves converts with the impression that they can obtain the forgiveness of sins without committing themselves to obedience to Christ and service in his church. Such notions are not found in the NT and may be part of the reason that so many modern converts have so little staying power. They have been offered and have accepted "cheap grace" rather than the free but costly grace of the gospel. "Counting the cost" is an essential part of responding to the gospel message, not something that can be put off until a later time. Conversion to Jesus Christ entails more than the forgiveness of sins. It includes obedience to the commands of God and participation in the body of Christ, the church. As Jesus said, "Therefore go and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, and teaching them to obey everything I have commanded you" Matt. 28:19-20).

One way to maintain the connection between conversion and discipleship is to keep proclamation and demonstration together in evangelism. In the ministry of Jesus and in the life of the apostolic church, preaching and acting, saying and doing were always joined (e.g., Luke 4:18-19; Acts 10:36-38; Rom. 15:18-19). Proclaiming salvation without demonstrating its transforming power in the fruit of the Spirit and good works is as inadequate as showing the effects of new life in Christ without explaining their source. Announcing the good news of salvation without showing the love of Christ in personal and social concern is not evangelism in the style of the NT. In this holistic approach to evangelism we do not fail to distinguish between regeneration and sanctification, but do contend that the two should be held closely together. T. P. WEBER

See also CONVERSION; GOSPEL; REGENERATION; REVIVALISM.

Bibliography. W. J. Abraham, Logic of Evangelism; R. E. Coleman, Master Plan of Evangelism; H. M. Conn, Evangelism; J. D. Douglas, ed., Let the Earth Hear His Voice; R. L. Fox, Pagans and Christians; M. Green, Evangelism in the Early Church; E. G. Hinson, Evangelization of the Roman Empire; A. Johnston, Battle for World Evangelism; R. McMullen, Christianizing of the Roman Empire; J. I. Packer, Evangelism and the Sovereignty of God; M. L. Rudnick, Speaking the Gospel through the Ages: A History of Evangelism; J. R. W. Stott, Christian Mission in the Modern World; D. C. K. Watson, I Believe in Evangelism.

Evangelism, Gift of. See SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

Eve. Adam gave his wife the name Eve because she would become the mother of all the living (Gen. 3:20). The Hebrew word for Eve, ḥawwâ, is very similar to the word "living," ḥay (fem. ḥayyâ), and the LXX actually translated her name as Life (Zōē). Ḥawwâ is virtually identical to the Ugaritic word for life, ḥwt. Eve was created because it was "not good for the man to be alone," so God made "a helper suitable for him" (Gen. 2:18, 20). The word translated "suitable" is a compound preposition meaning "corresponding to" or "opposite" him. It expresses the complementary nature of a person equal to him and able to respond to him and even challenge him. The uniqueness of the husband-wife relationship is seen in that this compound preposition occurs nowhere else in the OT. The closest parallel is a preposition that describes antiphonal choirs standing opposite one another and responding to one another (Neh. 12:24).

Unfortunately, the joyful mutuality that marked this perfect relationship came to an end when Eve succumbed to the serpent's clever urging and ate the forbidden fruit (Gen. 3:1-6). Rather than obeying the simple command of God, she looked at the attractiveness of the fruit and its reward of "wisdom" and then shared the fruit with her husband. Sin now marred their relationship and the lives of their children. In 2 Corinthians 11:3 Paul warns the believers not to be deceived like Eve by the serpent's cunning but rather to stay true to the gospel of Christ. Although Eve's sinful act had led to death, it would be her offspring who would crush the serpent's head (Gen. 3:15). Christ's death and resurrection defeated the evil one and opened the way for Adam and Eve's descendants to have eternal life. At the birth of her first child, Eve acknowledged that the Lord was the author of life (Gen. 4:1).

H. M. WOLF

See also ADAM; WOMAN, BIBLICAL CONCEPT OF.

Bibliography. W. Foerster, TDNT 5:580-81; W. Kaiser Jr., Toward an Old Testament Theology; A. Kapelrud, TDOT 4:257-60.

Evening Prayer, Evensong

Evening Prayer, Evensong. In the Anglican Church evening prayer and evensong mean the same thing, referring to the evening service that is said or sung daily throughout the year. In origin this service is a conflation of the medieval services of vespers and compline. It is composed chiefly of Scripture—OT and NT lessons, biblical canticles (e.g., the Magnificat), biblical versicles, and responses with the Lord's Prayer. To these are added the Kyrie Eleison, creed, and prayers. In Roman Catholicism evening prayer is sometimes used to describe the evening office of vespers found in the new breviary (1971).

P. TOON

See also OFFICE, DAILY (DIVINE).

Everlasting Life. See ETERNAL LIFE.

Everlasting Punishment. See ETERNAL PUNISHMENT.

Evidences of Christianity. See APOLOGETICS.

Evil. The bad (moral evil) or the harmful (natural evil). Natural evil, although distinct from moral evil, is not separate from it.

According to the Bible, natural evil is the consequence of moral evil. At first, while still sinless, man is placed in an idyllic garden, where he lives in a happy relationship with his Creator, his wife, and his animals. Eternal life is a possibility. The "day" that he disobeys God, i.e., commits moral evil, he is covered with shame, confusion, and anxiety; is condemned by God; and is ejected from the garden. The man must bring forth the fruit of the earth, the woman the fruit of the womb, in agony (Gen. 3).

In the Old Testament. This view prevails throughout the OT (Ps. 1; Prov. 14:31; Mal. 4:1–6). Although Job was convinced for a time that natural suffering had come upon him without his deserving, at the end he humbles himself under the divine rebuke (Job 42:1–6). The prophets predict the Messiah's advent, whose righteous role shall return the natural order to the Edenic state (Isa. 11:1–9; Hos. 2:18). The experience of Job presents in biographical form what Psalm 91 states didactically: that catastrophe "will not come near you" (v. 7), that is, though natural evil exists in this sinful world, it shall not be able to harm the soul of the godly person.

In the New Testament. This same theme is caught up in the teaching of Christ, whose doctrine may be summarily stated in five points. First, sin and punishment are interrelated. His revelation of hell is most pertinent here (Matt. 10:28; 23:33; Luke 16:23). The Galileans on whom the tower fell (Luke 13:4–5), although no more sinful than others, were assumed to have been sinful and therefore serve to warn the rest of sinful humankind. Second, the cancellation of sin removes punishment. This is especially clear in the healing of the paralytic (Mark 2:3–5). Third, faith is necessary to receive this forgiveness and deliverance (Matt. 9:22; Mark 6:56; Luke 8:48; 17:19). Fourth, the purpose of some suffering is benign. This is revealed especially in the case of the man born blind (John 9:1–34), particular affliction coming upon him that its healing might be an occasion for the revelation of the glory of God in Christ. Fifth, the resurrection of the bodies of the righteous and the wicked is in order that each group should be placed in the natural state appropriate to its moral state (John 5:29).

The rest of the NT, especially Paul, maintains the same doctrine. "The wrath of God" is revealed against all unrighteousness (Rom. 1:18). "The wages of sin is death" (Rom. 6:23). The death here mentioned represents not only the ultimate natural evil of temporal life, but also of eternal existence, for it is set in contrast to the eternal life that comes through Christ. John closes the NT (Rev. 22:14–15) with an apocalyptic vision of the world to come in which there will be a place filled with nothing but moral evil and natural evil or suffering (hell) and a place filled with nothing but moral good and natural good or blessedness (heaven). Thus, the Bible represents God as permitting moral evil and its consequent, natural evil (cf. esp. Rom. 8:22–23), and restoring some persons to a state of moral goodness and natural blessedness. According to Paul, all this is with a view to revealing his power in vessels of wrath, no less than his grace in vessels of mercy (Rom. 9:22–23).

In Christian Thought. The extrabiblical development shows considerable variety. Augustine echoes the theodicy of Paul (City of God, esp. XI), as do Aquinas and Calvin. While the Pauline-Augustinian tradition sees this twofold purpose of evil, a tradition from Origen to Karl Barth sees only a benign purpose. The evil of humans is interpreted as functional to the good, and the wrath of God is an aspect of his love. This optimistic universalism, shared approximately by the philosopher Leibniz, is in stark opposition to the pessimism of Schopenhauer and von Hartmann, who find evil to be ultimate. The other philosophy of evil is embodied in the dualism of Zoroastrianism, wherein, however, the good principle conquers in the end time.

Those who deny the realism of the Bible, the optimism of universalism, or the pessimism of Schopenhauer are faced with irreducible "surd" evil. One group sacrifices God's goodness to his power; the other, his power to his goodness. The one affirms that God is certainly powerful, and since he does not prevent evil, he must not be altogether good. The other says that God is certainly good, and since he does not prevent evil, he must not be altogether powerful. He wants to eliminate evil and he is partly successful in overcoming it, but not completely. Plato found a recalcitrant matter outside of God that prevented the full expression of the highest Idea or the Good. E. S. Brightman internalized the recalcitrant element, which he called the "given," and saw a "finite God" struggling with himself. But whether it be a dualist like Plato, a mystic like Boehme, a pragmatist like William James, or limited theists such as Brightman and Berdyaev, they all solve the problem of evil by yielding belief in some of the attributes of God.

J. H. GERSTNER

See also EVIL, PROBLEM OF; SIN; THEODICY.

Bibliography. Augustine, City of God; Enchiridion; J. S. Candlish, Biblical Doctrine of Sin; S. T. Davis, ed., Encountering Evil: Five Options on Theodicy; J. Edwards, Great Christian Doctrine of Original Sin; N. Geisler, Roots of Evil; C. E. M. Joad, God and Evil; C. S. Lewis, Problem of Pain; J. Mueller, Christian Doctrine of Sin; R. A. Tsanoff, Nature of Evil; J. Wenham, Enigma of Evil.

Evil, Problem of. The issue of God and evil is a most important matter for a proselyte considering the claims of a given religion. One wants to know if the religion commits him or her to belief in a God who does evil or who fails to do good. On the other hand, the problem of evil is a question about the logical consistency of several propositions central to various theological systems. The phrase "the problem of evil" is actually a label for a series of such problems involving God and evil.

Historically the problem of evil has been raised in many forms. One of its initial statements in its more abstract form was by Epicurus, but the problem has reappeared in many forms all the way down to the present. In biblical literature, though the problem is explicitly covered in greatest detail in the book of Job, the particular question of why the righteous suffer is also treated in various portions of Scripture such as 1 Peter James 1, and Romans 5. The problem of evil, then, is a problem of both theological and philosophical interest as well as a matter of religious import, and it arises not only in Western religion and philosophy but also in various other world religions.

The problem of evil has been put to various uses in philosophical and nonphilosophical discussions. Four are particularly worthy of note. First, some have raised the problem merely to show that a particular theological system is internally self-contradictory and thereby to be rejected. It is claimed that such a system has no way to justify the existence of evil, as the system perceives of evil, in light of the claim that an all-loving, all-powerful God exists. A second and more frequent use of the problem is to argue not only that one theistic position is problematic in this way, but that all theistic positions are so deficient. In other words, many atheists have argued that theism and religion in general are not worthy of adherence because of an alleged inability of all theistic positions to solve their problem of evil. A third and corollary use is to argue from the existence of evil to the nonexistence of God. In such a case the critic is not primarily concerned about the overall consistency or inconsistency of any theological position. The critic simply uses the problem of evil to reject belief in any god whatsoever. Finally, there are those who use the problem of evil to argue specifically against the Judeo-Christian concept of God. They are not willing to become atheists altogether, but their claim is either that the Judeo-Christian God does not exist or that an acceptable account of God must differ from perceptions of him found in Judaism and Christianity.

Other intellectual problems arise in connection with the problem of evil. Since this problem arises within a theological system, it will take the particular shape of the system in which it arises. Of course, each system has its own peculiar understanding of human freedom, ethics, and metaphysics. Consequently, in the process of handling the problem of evil, one is confronted with such questions as how his system synthesizes its understanding of human freedom with its understanding of God's sovereignty.

Nature of the Problem. Generally theists and atheists alike have perceived the problem of evil to be a problem about the internal consistency of the following three propositions: "God is all-loving," "God is all-powerful," and "Evil exists in a world created by such a God." It is generally assumed that all theologians within the Judeo-Christian tradition have the same understanding of God and evil, and thus that one and only one problem of evil confronts such theists. Atheists are convinced that there is no way for a classical theist to solve the problem of evil. The problem as it is perceived can be portrayed in the following propositions, which form an argument for the inconsistency of theistic positions: (1) God is omnipotent; (2) God is wholly benevolent, i.e., totally disposed to will and do those things that promote the happiness of others; (3) evil consequences resulting from actions and events befall humankind; (4) the omnipotent and wholly benevolent being of 1 and 2 eliminates every evil insofar as he can; (5) there are no nonlogical limits to what an omnipotent being can do; (6) therefore, God eliminates every evil that is logically possible for him to remove. Propositions 1, 2, 4, 5, and 6 entail the negation of 3, and thus the set of six is said to be self-contradictory.

Though there is much truth in this general perception of the problem of evil, some important mistakes must be noted. Without a proper understanding of the nature of the problem any hope of resolving it is lost. The first mistake is thinking there is only one problem, of evil confronting all theistic positions. As a matter of fact, there is no such thing as the problem of evil, for there are many problems of evil. This is true in two different but very important senses. There is no one problem, because there are various kinds of problems of evil, and all are different. First, there is a religious problem. This is a problem about some concrete instance of evil that someone is actually experiencing. In view of the experienced affliction, the individual's personal relationship with God is strained. Someone caught in the throes of this problem asks such questions as, "Why is God allowing this to happen to me?" and "Can I continue to worship a God who does not remove the evil that is now besetting me?" Second, there is the philosophical/theological problem of evil. Normally this can be divided into two more specific problems, the problem of moral evil (evil produced by activities of moral agents) and the problem of natural evil (evil that occurs in the process of the functioning of the natural order). The philosophical/theological problem, as opposed to the religious, is an abstract problem. It is not about a specific evil, nor is it about someone's relationship to God. Instead, it is a general question about why there should be any evil in a world created by an all-loving, all-powerful God. Even if there were no God and no evil, such a question could be posed as follows: How would the existence of an all-powerful, all-loving God, if such a God should exist, square with the existence of evil in the world, if there should be such evil?

Evil, Problem of

Also to be considered are problems about the degrees of evil, the intensity and the gratuitousness of evil. That is, one can ask why God needs so much evil in the world to do whatever he is doing with evil. Could he not accomplish his ends with a lesser degree of evil? One could likewise ask why the evil that is present is as intense as it is. For example, whatever God wants to accomplish through someone's cancer, can he not do so without the pain being so intense or lasting so long? Finally, there is some evil that seems to serve no useful purpose whatsoever. Even if one can explain away the other evil in the world, how can one justify the ways of God to man in virtue of the apparent gratuitousness of so much evil? Answers to one kind of problem are not necessarily relevant to—or appropriate as—answers to another problem. For example, if someone experiencing the religious problem because of cancer asks why this should be happening, and if the response is that evil comes from the abuse of free will, the answer will not suffice. Free will is relevant to a problem of moral evil but inappropriate as an answer to someone suffering from cancer.

Even the philosophical/theological problem of evil is not just one problem. As noted, a problem of evil is always a problem that confronts some theological position. However, it should be obvious that not all theological positions even within Judaism or Christianity are identical. Thus, there will be as many philosophical/theological problems of evil as there are theological positions according to which (1) God is omnipotent, in some sense of "omnipotent"; (2) God is said to be benevolent in the sense of willing the removal of evil, in some sense of "evil"; and (3) evil, in the sense mentioned, is said to be present in the world. The point is that not all theological positions have identical perceptions of God and evil. Consequently, contrary to perceptions of atheists and even some theists, the same problem of evil cannot confront all theological systems. Each system has its own problem and requires its own answer.

The Problem of Internal Consistency. A second major point relevant to a proper understanding of the nature of a problem of evil is that a problem of evil in whatever form or system it arises is always a problem about the internal consistency of a theological position. Thus, the crucial question is not whether a theological position contradicts another theistic system or even whether it contradicts the atheist's views, but whether it contradicts itself. This point has important implications for both theists and critics of theism. For the theist, the implication is that he or she must so structure his or her theology as to contain views of God, evil, and human freedom, which, when put together, do not result in a contradictory system. In particular, he or she must be careful to avoid a system in which God is said to be both good and able to remove evil, despite the system's admission of the existence of evil. Such a system will most assuredly succumb to its problem of evil. The implication for the critic of theism is that he or she must specify a problem that actually arises within the views held by some theist. It is always possible to create a problem for the theist if the atheist is allowed to attribute some of his or her own views to the theist and then tell the theist there is a problem. Obviously there will be a problem, but not a problem of internal inconsistency.

Unfortunately, many atheistic attacks on theistic systems for their alleged inadequacy in handling evil amount to nothing more than a rejection of the theist's account of God, evil, or freedom. It is legitimate for an atheist to claim that the theistic account of these items is inadequate. It is illegitimate, however, for the atheist to claim that a theist cannot solve his problem of evil on such a basis. If the theist, on his or her own views, can resolve the problem of evil generated by his system, then his or her system is internally consistent, regardless of whether the atheist or other theists like the intellectual commitments of the system. Once one takes this matter of internal consistency seriously, he or she finds there are many theistic systems that can solve their own problem of evil, for they can be shown to be self-consistent. One might reject the system as a whole because of some inadequacy in its fundamental intellectual commitments, but such a rejection cannot be on grounds of any alleged internal inconsistency or any inability of the system to resolve its problem of evil.

Perception of God. A final point in clarifying the nature of the problem of evil is that while it is always an attack on a theological perception of God, it is not necessarily an attack on God himself. But if the theological position does reflect the true and living God, then the problem of evil that arises for that system is in fact an attack on God himself. Thus, one needs verification independent of the discussions on the problem of evil that a particular system's God is the true and living God. Consequently, any use of a problem of evil to argue ultimately to the nonexistence of God would be misguided unless it could be shown that the perception of God being attacked is the correct perception.

In response to the problem of evil, there have been many attempts to present answers. Such answers are known as theodicies or defenses, attempts to establish that God is just in spite of the evil present in the world. Generally speaking, the key premise in the argument about evil is that a good God removes every evil insofar as he can. The basic strategy of theodicists has been to suggest that while the premise is true, there is some key reason that God, though all-powerful and all-loving, still cannot remove the evil present in the world. Such a reason would justify the evil present in the world and resolve the theological position's problem of evil.

J. S. FEINBERG

See also EVIL; PAIN; THEODICY.

Bibliography. M. B. Ahern, Problem of Evil; O. F. Clarke, God and Suffering; M. C. D'Arcy, Pain and the Providence of God; A. Farrer, Love Almighty and Ills Unlimited; J. S. Feinberg, Theologies and Evil; P. T. Forsyth, Justification of God; N. Geisler, Roots of Evil; P. Green, Problem of Evil; J. Hick, Evil and the God of Love; H. E. Hopkins, Mystery of Suffering; C. S. Lewis, Problem of Pain; J. L. Mackie, "Evil and Omnipotence," in Philosophy of Religion, B. Mitchell, ed.; E. Madden and P. Hare, Evil and the Concept of God; H. J. McCloskey, "God and Evil," in God and Evil, N. Pike, ed.; R. Swinburne, Existence of God; J. Wenham, Enigma of Evil; J. S. Whale, Christian Answer to the Problem of Evil.

Evil One. See SATAN.

Evil Spirits. See DEMON, DEMONIZATION.

Evolution. Since the publication of Origin of Species by Charles Darwin in 1859, a storm of controversy has raged among theologians and scientists. Some proponents of Darwin's theory have elevated it as a new paradigm to be used to reinterpret the human experience. Other people have identified the theory of evolution as the work of the devil without any scientific merit. Most people stand somewhere between these two opinions. Scientifically, the mechanism of natural selection first proposed by Darwin (gradualism) is not able to account for biological problems such as the irreducible complexity of molecular systems and the gaps in the fossils as well as sequences in macromolecules. The phenomenon of punctuated equilibrium or punctualism describes the punctuated events of abrupt changes amid long periods in the geological record in which species remain virtually invariable. The emergence of punctualism in the mainstream of evolutionary thoughts is also accompanied by the philosophical resurgence of the intelligent design argument in the discussion of the nature of science. Proponents for the creation hypothesis argue that the presupposition of a Designer is a valid if not a more fruitful program in scientific investigation on origins, since the naturalistic alternatives cannot lead to any meaningful mechanistic explanations of these gaps. This article will attempt to examine seven views incorporating the scientific findings in their effort to relate to the interpretation of the Genesis account and still remain within a broadly defined Christian theological context. A critique of each of these views is also presented.

The Liberal View. Auguste Comte (1798–1851), a contemporary of Darwin, devised an evolutionary explanation of religion by showing three stages of development: (1) fetishism: separate will animating material subjects, (2) polytheism: many gods acting through inanimate things, (3) monotheism: a single, abstract will controlling everything in the universe. The liberals have extrapolated this view of religion in the form of progressive revelation to exegete the Bible. They believe that the revelation of God has progressed from the crude Old Testament God as a fearful, merciless tyrant who treats individuals as merely temporary members of social groups without personal significance. This idea in turn evolved during the shattering exilic experience of the Israelites through the anticipation of a personal God in the Psalms and finally culminated in Jesus Christ of the New Testament, the personal Savior and Lord of every Christian.

The rise of higher criticism also gave impetus to the liberal interpretation of the Bible. While challenging the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch, liberals also cast doubts on the originality and authenticity of the biblical records of creation and the flood because of their alleged similarities to the Babylonian versions in Enuma elish. The Bible has since been treated by liberal scholars as a great literary work full of human errors and outdated teachings despite its essential message of vital personal realization.

Evolution

Catholic theologian and anthropologist Pierre Teilhard de Chardin (1881–1955) incorporated the entire evolutionary concept into the biblical framework. The Christian message is reinterpreted according to evolution. Original sin is treated not as an act of disobedience of the first human couple, but rather the negative forces of counter-evolution—evil. This evil is a mechanism of the creation of an incompletely organized universe. God has been creating since the dawn of time through a continuous transformation from within the universe and individuals. The blood of Christ is a symbol of revitalization that is essential in the ascent of the creation and the progress of the world as represented by the cross of Christ. Accordingly, Christ is no longer the Savior of the world from the damnation of sins, but rather the culmination of evolution, giving direction and meaning to the world. Christianity, then, is primarily a faith in the progressive unification of the world in God. The mission of the church is the alleviation of human suffering rather than spiritual redemption of the world, the former being in direct harmony with the inevitable progress fostered by evolution.

Recent development of this view focuses on the role of experience rather than revelation in idealistic monism. The universe is a progressive manifestation of a universal consciousness, which is grounded on the experience of a conscious person. It is similar to pantheism proposed by the process theologians: the world exists as part of God under his constant influence. But the world also contributes to the novelty and richness of the divine experience. With an emphasis on an evolutionary framework, the universal consciousness undergoes five levels of change: (1) organelles, (2) cells, (3) multicellular segmentation, (4) multicellular individuals, and (5) society as an organism, with the culmination in the mystical body of Christ.

The Pre-Adamites Theories. These take two forms. The gap theory states that after the creation of the heavens and the earth and before the situation described in Genesis 1:2, a long period of time elapsed in which a great cataclysm desolated the earth. Jeremiah 4:23–26, Isaiah 24:1, and Isaiah 45:18 were cited as evidence of this cataclysmic judgment of God. This theory attributes early human fossils to pre-Adamites in the first creation in Genesis 1:1, who were destroyed before the rest of the creation events in Genesis 1. The two Adams theory states that the first Adam of Genesis 1 was the old Stone Age Adam, who has since been extinct, and the second Adam of Genesis 2 was the new Stone Age Adam, that who is the ancestor of mankind today. This theory suggests that the rest of the Bible is concerned with the fall and salvation of the new Stone Age Adam and his descendants. A variation of this position traced Adam to the Sumerians and suggested that not all of humankind are the descendants of Adam.

Fiat Creationism. This includes all of the literal views that insist on a twenty-four-hour creation day in Genesis 1. It demands a young earth of approximately ten thousand years of age and a universal deluge that accounts for most if not all of the sedimentary deposits and fossils of today. It rejects all of the scientific data pertaining to the concept of an ancient earth. It adopts essentially the chronology worked out by Archbishop Ussher (1581–1656) and John Lightfoot (1602–75) based on the assumption that biblical genealogies were intended to be used for the construction of chronology. Fiat creationists also reject any forms of macroevolutionary development of life by attributing the differences in related organisms today to variations of the original stocks created by God. They believe that evolution is the culmination of the atheistic offensive to undermine the trustworthiness of the Scriptures by destroying the creation account. Thus, any evolutionary compromise in the interpretation of Genesis 1 is detrimental to the Christian faith.

Theistic Evolutionism. Most proponents of this view allegorize the Genesis account to be a poetic representation of the spiritual truths of man's dependence on God his Creator and the symbolic acts of man's disobedience in the fall from God's grace. Theistic evolutionists accept the trustworthiness of the Scriptures. They also accept the processes of organic evolution as the ways God used to create humans. They believe that the Bible only tells us that God created the world but does not tell us how. Science provided a mechanistic explanation of life in terms of evolution. The two levels of explanation should complement instead of antagonize each other. By stressing the functional integrity (unity) of creation as one of the communicable attributes of God, it claims that the evolutionary pattern of cosmic history unites all natural processes of events, including the emergence of human beings. Despite the necessity to dispense with the historicity of the human fall, theistic evolutionists feel the fundamental Christian doctrines of original sin and the human need for redemption are unshaken by the incorporation of organic evolution into the Christian interpretation of life and origins. Some theistic evolutionists have a higher view of Genesis and accept the unique historical human couple as evolving hominids given human souls by direct divine intervention, or by God miraculously reviving a dead hominid with sudden chromosomal fusion and God's breath of life. This latter view treats Genesis 1 as God's proclamations laying out the laws of the universe in consecutive temporal order. However, these proclamations were later on fulfilled by the process of organic evolution in a different temporal order.

The "Creation Myth" of Neo-orthodoxy. Neo-orthodoxy puts much emphasis on the suprarationalistic or paradoxical aspect of Christian teaching and tends to ignore natural theology. Its view of creation may be illustrated by its treatment of the creation account as "myth." Langdon Gilkey defines "myth" most succinctly as a way of talking about God as a figure who transcends history in the dramatic sense of an agent within history. He further distinguishes between the anthropological and theological usages of myth. While anthropological myths are essentially fables, and thus untrue, theological myths are true in the sense that they are concerned with the ultimate or existential issues of human destiny, using symbols to describe the transcendent or the sacred. Therefore, in this view, the creation myth would have more religious significance for salvation than would the literal history of creation, for scientific or literal facts have no religious value. By emphasizing the religious meaning of creation and the fall and the existential realities of evil and sin, neo-orthodoxy, together with theistic evolution, affirms the need for redemption through a personal encounter with the Savior who atones for sin by his death and resurrection. In this view, the scientific process of evolution that gives rise to humans is insignificant in comparison with the religious meaning of the doctrine of creation.

"God in Creation" of the Theology of Hope. In criticizing the individualism of liberal pietism and the existentialism of neo-orthodoxy, this resurrection-centered theology stresses Christ's resurrection as the beginning and promise of the future. As "hoppers," Christians should confront societies with the claim of a city yet to come. The emphasis of the new heaven and new earth can also be found in the ecological doctrine of "God in Creation." God indwells all creation through his Spirit. The transfiguring indwelling of the triune God in creation is the goal of creation. The future of creation is the eternal rest of God, in which the whole creation will find bliss. Similar to theistic evolutionism, "God in Creation" also stresses the transforming power of God who guides creation to its goal and drives forward evolution, not through supernatural interventions. It criticizes the "other-worldliness" of orthodox theology in its dispute with evolutionary theory. God's self-transcendence is mutually related to his evolutive immanence in the world. To be distinguished from pantheism, which suggests that matter organizes itself, also transcends itself, and produces its own evolution, the God of creation is the uncreated God the Spirit who has creative energies. Evolution is in fact the continuous creation of God. Creation is an open system evolving into more possibilities and indeterminacy. The kingdom of glory is then the completion of the process of creation through the indwelling of God, a system that has finally been brought to completion and is therefore itself now closed. Human beings are both imago Dei (image of God), representing God to the creations, and imago mundi (image of the world), representing all other creatures to God. The enduring meaning of human existence lies in one's participation in the praises of creation to the eternal, inexhaustible God.

Progressive Creationism. This view stresses the complementarity between science and Scripture in the explanation of God's truth. Progressive creationists are willing to reinterpret the Scriptures if this is necessitated by the findings of modern science. Therefore, in light of the overwhelming evidence supporting the antiquity of the earth, most accept the traditional day-age theory of the creation account in Genesis. This view revolves around the usage of "day" in Genesis 1 as depiction of a period of time rather than a twenty-four-hour solar day. They find this interpretation exegetically sound and demanded by the antiquity of the earth. Progressive creationists are also cautious in their evaluation of the scientific theory of evolution. They only accept the microevolutionary theory that states that mutations selected by natural forces give rise to the diversification of varieties in a biological species as scientifically demonstrable. They are skeptical about macroevolution (from ape to man) and organic evolution (from molecule to man) because these theories are increasingly being divorced from the well-documented mechanism of natural selection. Therefore, to the progressive creationists, the present-day varieties of organisms are the result of the diversification process through microevolution from the prototypes originally created by God. There are also at least three versions of the day-age theory: (1) day-geological age, which assigns different geological eras to the creation days in Genesis 1; (2) modified intermittent day, in which each creative era is preceded by a twenty-four-hour solar day. (3) overlapping day-age; with each creative era delimited by the phrase, "There was evening and there was morning," and overlapping with each other. A variation of the progressive creationist view is the so-called Framework hypothesis: The creation account in Genesis is interpreted "historico-artistically" as a framework of seven days and used anthropomorphically to outline a theology of Sabbath with the first three creation days as the work of distinction and the last three, the work of adornment. The difficulties of the creation of heavenly luminaries after the creation of light, and the inconsistencies of the timing sequence of the creation of plants as recorded in Genesis 1 and 2 are resolved by the anthropomorphic use of “days.”

Evolution

A Critique. Liberal Evolutionism. Humanistic influence in theology with its overextended attitude of analytical criticism that attempts to remove all unreasonable and supernatural factors from the Bible has downgraded the Bible to be merely a great book of religion instead of the Word of God. The only message of the Bible with all its outgrown traditions is the human experience as exemplified by the Hebrew’s aspiration for personal deliverance culminated in the person of Jesus Christ. However, the search for this unformulated experience for a human’s inward salvation and love without regard for the historicity of the biblical account has degenerated into sentimentality. Liberal evolutionism has placed persons in an ethically relative box with no moral plumbline by which he or she can evaluate the conflicting moral values he or she observes in humanity.

With the emphasis on experience rather than revelation, idealistic monism and panentheism stress the immanence of God at the expense of his transcendence. It also ignores the gravity of human sin as alienation from God the Creator through an act of disobedience. Liberal evolutionism places its emphasis on the dominant philosophical paradigm of evolution. The lack of scientific mechanism to explain the paleontological and molecular evidences is slighted.

Pre-Adamite Theories. According to J. O. Buswell Jr., the gap theory is untenable because of two serious weaknesses: (1) it has no exegetical evidence in the Bible, (2) it was invented by Christian geologists to attempt to harmonize the apparent conflicts of the creation of light and vegetation before the appearance of the sun and the antiquity of human fossils. The reference to Isaiah 24:1; 45:18; and Jeremiah 4:23–26 as supports of a cataclysmic divine judgment on God’s creation before the events of Genesis 1:2 is far-fetched. The contexts of these passages clearly indicate that they are references to future events. The word “was” in Genesis 1:2, which was taken to mean “became” in the gap theory, is more exegetically justified to be translated as “was” since the context does not indicate otherwise. The word “replenish” in Genesis 1:28 should mean simply “to fill” instead of “fill over again” stipulated in the gap theory to depict a once occupied earth that was devastated. The theories of two Adams and the Adamic versus non-Adamic descent are not exegetically sound, and they seem to impinge on the fundamental concept of the unity of the human race (Acts 17:26) held by all anthropologists and orthodox theologians. The most serious challenge to these views are from Romans 5:12–21 and 1 Corinthians 15 (esp. vv. 21, 22). All humans sin in Adam, and they can be saved through Christ, the second Adam. If only some humans are descendants of Adam, who are we to decide which races or which nations? God wants all to be saved (2 Pet. 3:9) through Christ alone (Acts 4:12; 1 Tim. 2:5) by grace through faith (Eph. 2:8).

Fiat Creationism. The major hurdle facing the fiat creationists is the antiquity of the earth. Since the dominant atheistic view of evolution requires a vast amount of time, fiat creationists maintain that the acceptance of the ancient-earth concept is a compromise with atheistic evolution detrimental to the Christian faith. Therefore, they reject the principle of uniformitarianism (“the present is the key to the past”) and all of the dating methods that point to the antiquity of the earth in favor of universal cataclysm. However, due to the lack of visible evidence of the universal deluge and the intriguing patterns of the distribution of animals in different continents, the theory of a universal flood is still far-fetched. They have also ignored the vast amount of data supporting the observable microevolutionary processes in nature and the laboratory. The refusal to be open-minded to scientific inquiry because of the espousal of a particular interpretation of the Bible has impressed others as the continuation of the medieval obscurant mentality of the church in the Copernican revolution.

Theistic Evolutionism. If man is a product of the chance events of natural selection, theistic evolutionists have the problem of convincing the secular world of the biblical basis of humans as created in the image of God and of the first sin. The figurative interpretation of the Genesis account of creation seems to weaken these two fundamental doctrines of the Christian faith. By denying the historicity of the first Adam, this position also invites skepticism for the meaning of the cross of Christ, the second Adam (Rom. 5:12–21), as a historical event and thus endangers the whole structure of the Christian message.

The materials in Genesis 1:1–2:4 are formal and arranged in balanced structure with recurring formal phrases. This has led some theistic evolutionists to treat the formal structures as “poetic.” This interpretation, however, is untenable for two reasons. First, the creation account in Genesis 1:1–2:4 bears no resemblance to any known form of poetic arrangement. Second, the account has nothing of the emotional tone of poetry. The abundance of Hebrew poetry in biblical and extrabiblical Semitic literature provides no comparison with the Genesis account and thus does not lend itself to the support of the poetical interpretation of this passage. The commandment to honor the Sabbath day is rooted in the sequential events of the creation week (Exod. 20:8–11). A figurative interpretation would provide no factual basis for this commandment, and thus it would be untenable.

The eleven tablets each ending with “These are the names (generations, descendants) of . . .” found in the first thirty-six chapters of Genesis seem to depict an historical account of primeval and patriarchal life (Gen. 1:1–2:4; 2:5–5:2; 5:3–6:9a; 6:9b–10:1; 10:2–11:10a, 11:10b–27a; 11:27b–25:12; 25:13–19a; 25:19b–36:1; 36:2–9; 36:10–37:2). The NT also regards certain events of Genesis 1 as actually having taken place (e.g., see Mark 10:6; 1 Cor. 11:8–9).

The creation of Eve (Gen. 2:21–22) also constitutes an enigma for the theistic evolutionists who accept the naturalistic explanation of humanity as being genetically derived from a nonhuman ancestor. Furthermore, in Genesis 2:7 it is stated that “the LORD God formed the man from the dust of the ground and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living being” (NIV). Although the process of formation is not specified, it seems to convey the thought of “special creation” from inorganic material rather than “derived creation” through some previously living form. The Hebrew word for “living being” in Genesis 2:7 (NIV), nep̄hesh, is the same as the words translated “living creatures” or “living and moving thing” in Genesis 1:20–21, 24. The same word nep̄hesh is used in the translation of “living being” (Gen. 2:7). The difference between humans and beasts is that humans were created in God’s image whereas the beasts were not. Therefore, Genesis 2:7 seems to imply that humans became living beings just as other beasts. Also the curse in Genesis 3:19 stipulates that humans will return to dust because they are taken from dust and are dust. The interpretation that humans are derived from a preexisting living being is entirely inappropriate in light of these considerations.

As an exception to the evolutionary paradigm, one could postulate that God chose two of the evolving hominids to become Adam and Eve and to endow them with the image of God, just as he chose Noah and Abraham from the wicked generations in which they lived. God could also have created Adam from a dead hominid and Eve from Adam. Both of these scenarios require an extraordinary act of God. For many creationists, the extraordinary act that God utilizes to create man from the dust of the earth is as logical, if not more consistent, since no satisfactory natural mechanism is sufficient to account for the evolution of Adam and Eve. This should not mean that we bring in God for a supernatural event when we cannot see a natural cause. The transcendent God and his extraordinary act of bringing Adam and Eve into existence does not imply “God-of-the-gap” deism. This stipulation simply stresses the special importance attributed to the creation of man, who is created to “glorify God and enjoy him forever.” God’s providence does not preclude his using extraordinary acts not explainable by known natural means for a special purpose of his own. The act of creation ex nihilo itself demands a transcendent God performing an extraordinary act to put together the natural processes in his creation.

Theologically, natural selection does not explain the efficacy of the fall, for it leads to death. The fall was a moral predicament not necessitated by any natural processes. The unity of the human race as derived from a single source (Acts 17:26) and the origin of human sin from a single human couple (Rom. 5:12–21) necessitate the incarnation and the redemptive work of Christ. Christ is the second Adam who is to give life to the fallen human race through his obedience and atoning death. He is not the culmination of human evolution.

Theistic evolutionists also give too much credence to the as yet poorly formulated theory of organic evolution. In their efforts to reconcile the naturalistic and theistic approaches to the origin of life, they have inadvertently gotten themselves into the inconsistent position of denying the miracles of creation while maintaining the supernatural nature of the Christian message. The overworking of the multilevel structure of reality according to Bube’s dictum (i.e., there are many levels at which a given situation can be described; an exhaustive description on one level does not preclude meaningful descriptions on other levels) seems to run the danger of compartmentalizing reality into spiritual and physical realms that are independent of each other. This dualistic connotation seems to be implicit in the theistic evolutionist position of the human being, with a body that is a product of naturalistic evolution and a spiritual capacity that is given by God in a supernatural act.

The “Creation Myth” of Neo-orthodoxy. The major weakness of the existential emphasis on sin and the fall is the inconsistency of allowing God to act on a personal level through existential encounter while denying God’s action in history through creation. The religious truth, as revealed by a personal encounter with the incarnate Word through whom all of the Scripture should be interpreted, seems to be divorced from the historical truth of the Bible. The lack of interaction between the religious truth as expressed in mythical language and the historical truth as expressed in scientific language seems to imply that reality is comprised of several levels of truth that are independent of each other. This dualistic overtone seems to contradict the unity of God’s general revelation through nature and his special revelation through the Scripture.

“God in Creation” of the Theology of Hope. “God in Creation” focuses on the immanence of God at the expense of his transcendence. The emphasis on man being part of creation and the idea that the meaning of his existence will not be fulfilled without full participation in it awakens the ecological consciousness of Western civilization. However, while trying to distance from the pantheistic implications of process theology that God is also perfected by being intimately involved in the creation, the uncreated God in creation also has lost much of his sovereignty. Creation is an open system evolving into more possibilities and indeterminacy. The God of creation is no longer the God in history, who “chose us in him before the creation of the world to be holy and blameless. . . . We were chosen, having been predestined according to the plan of him who works out everything in conformity with the purpose of His will” (Eph. 1:4, 11). God ceased his initial creation at the end of the creation week. He is now sustaining his creation by his providence. The creation exists moment by moment only by the direct sustenance of God the Creator. In the context of the Scripture, there is no distinction between supernatural or natural, since we are to see his sustaining power in all things. A miracle is an extraordinary event that is accomplished by God as a sign of some purposes of his own (John 20:30–31). God is equally involved, however, by means of his providential control, which allows the probabilities determined by natural processes to work for his purposes.

Evolution

Second, God in creation does not focus on the effects of sin and the total depravity of sinners. Sin and the sinner is only subjectively identified within the person. Creation is good, but sin is an accident after human willfulness yielded to an objective evil force of Satan. Creation is cursed because of this historical act of disobedience (Gen. 3:17; Rom. 8:19–20). God is also re-creating those trusting in him in accordance with the likeness of Christ (2 Cor. 5:17, 1 John 3:2). Creation not only receives bliss at Christ’s second coming but also judgment when the dead will be resurrected unto life or condemnation (Rev. 20:11–15).

Progressive Creationism. Progressive creationists maintain that aside from the scientific data supporting the antiquity of the earth, there is adequate exegetical data to demonstrate that the days of Genesis 1 can be considered long indefinite periods of time, and the genealogies of the Bible were not intended and cannot be used for the construction of an accurate chronology.

That the creative day is taken to denote a period longer than a twenty-four hour solar day is supported by the following arguments: (1) The sun’s visible function of defining days and years did not begin until the fourth creative day when the sun was revealed. Therefore, the first four days were definitely not twenty-four hour solar days. (2) The citation of the fourth commandment, “Remember the Sabbath day by keeping it holy” (Exod. 20:8–11), to argue against the day-age interpretation is not necessarily valid since it is based on analogy but not identity. The establishment of a Sabbath year (Exod. 23:10–11; Lev.

25:3–7) seems to corroborate the interpretation that the substance of keeping the Sabbath is rest instead of the strict interpretation of “day.” People must rest for one day after six days of work, and land must rest for one year after six years of cultivation since God also worked in six creative periods and rested in the seventh. (3) The citation of “and there was evening and there was morning” found at the end of every creative narrative to support the twenty-four hour solar day interpretation is not conclusive. Since “day” can be taken to also mean a period of time of undesignated length (Gen. 2:4; Ps. 90:1–4) and periods of light as contrasted with darkness (Gen. 1:5), the components of “day” can similarly be interpreted figuratively (Ps. 90:5–6). Moreover, the evening and the morning make a night, not a day, if one wants to press the literal interpretation of these two items. (4) Events that transpired on the sixth day of creation as recorded in Genesis 2 seem to take up a considerable amount of time. The most important time consideration seems to be the Hebrew word happa’am translated in Genesis 2:23 as “at last” (RSV) or “now” (NIV, NASB) in Adam’s exclamation as he showed appreciation of the woman God made for him. This word seems to imply that Adam had waited a long time for a mate, and finally his desire was satisfied. This interpretation is supported by the usage of the word in the Old Testament in contexts of elapsed time (Gen. 29:34–35; 30:20; 46:30; Exod. 9:27; Judg. 15:3; 16:18).

As to the biblical genealogies, noted Old Testament scholar W. H. Green, a contributor to the famous Fundamentals papers, analyzed the genealogies of the Bible and concluded that they were not intended and cannot be legitimately used to construct a chronology. His conclusion has been corroborated by other biblical scholars. His major observations were that abridgment and omission of unimportant names form the pattern in the genealogies of the Bible; genealogies include significant names; and “father,” “son,” and “begot” were used in a broad sense.

The traditional day-age interpretation of creation assigns days to various geological periods. However, it is difficult to align the creative days to the actual fossil records. In addition, the creation of land plants that bear seeds and trees that bear fruits with seeds before the creation of land animals poses a problem, since many land plants with fruits and seeds depend on insects for pollination and fertilization. Both the modified intermittent day and overlapping day-age models overcome this problem by assuming the overlapping or contemporaneousness of the creation of the fruit-bearing land plants with some of the land animals. The current popular star formation model of the origin of the earth and the solar system can be nicely harmonized with the Genesis account. This theory (the “big bang” theory of the galaxies) depicts the universe as expanding from a superdense state that exploded 13 billion years ago and subsequently cooled down to form the interstellar products including the earth and the planets. The events in the first three creative eras seem to be consistent with the scientific model of a dark nebula containing water vapor that eventually cleared up as oxygen was given off by plants that underwent photosynthesis.

All of the three models allow for processes of change to take place after the creation of each prototype of living creatures. In the interpretation of God's rest in the seventh day, the overlapping day-age model assumes creation was ended at the conclusion of the sixth day (Gen. 1:31) and God is resting in the seventh. This agrees with the traditional view. However, the modified intermittent day model suggests that we are still living in the creative period initiated by the sixth creative solar day, that which intervenes between the sixth and seventh days. God is still creating through the changes and developments of the inorganic as well as the organic world. The seventh day, on which God absolutely rests (Heb. 4:1–11), will commence only at the inception of the new heavens and new earth (Rev. 21:1–8). This latter position seems to strain the interpretation of Genesis 2:1, which states, "Thus the heavens and the earth were completed in all their vast array." Since scientific models of the universe are only tentative hypotheses subject to revision with new findings, all the theological attempts of integrating science in interpreting Genesis must remain working sketches only.

The major problem of the day-age theories is the delayed creation of the heavenly luminaries until the fourth day after light has been created on the first day. There are suggestions that the Hebrew word 'asâ translated as "made two great lights . . . and . . . the stars" in Genesis 1:16 can be rendered as "has made." The verb from 'asâ used here connotes completed action. Thus the luminaries were made earlier and were made to be revealed on the fourth day. The Framework hypothesis resolves this problem by its historico-artistic interpretation of Genesis 1 and 2. However, it remains unclear at what point one can draw the boundary line between an allegorical account, where only the spiritual meaning prevails, and a historical-theological account, where both what actually transpired and its spiritual meaning are significant.

The hurdles faced by the progressive creationists are less insurmountable than those confronting the other models because there is a conscientious attitude in relating science to Scripture. Two of the more perplexing are: (1) How does the antiquity of humans fit in with the seemingly advanced civilization of Genesis 4? Despite the lack of artifacts associated with the early human fossils, physical anthropology suggests that humans have been on earth for perhaps millions of years. The large gap that exists between the first human and the advent of human civilization, which is dated to 9000 B.C. is a major problem. Attempts to ameliorate the difficulties include the alleged meager description of Cain and Abel's civilization and the postulate, based on Gen. 4:12, of lost civilization because of the prevalence of sin. It is possible that human culture was rediscovered at the advent of the Neolithic Age some eleven thousand years ago. (2) What is the extent of the Noachian deluge? Since there is a lack of visible evidence for a universal flood, most progressive creationists subscribe to some forms of local flood theories that suggest that the flood was confined to the Mesopotamian areas. The major argument of the local flood theory is that there is a sort of metonymy commonly employed by the ancient Near Eastern culture to speak of a considerable part as a whole (see Gen. 41:57; Deut. 2:25; 1 Kings 18:10; Ps. 22:17; Matt. 3:5; John 4:39; Acts 2:5). Therefore, the universality of the flood may simply mean the universality of experience of those who reported it. It is difficult to conceive how Moses would perceive the universal flood if he did not know the entire scope of the earth at his time.

Conclusion. In summary, liberal evolutionism casts doubts on the validity of human moral judgment. Among the evangelical views, fiat creationism seems to adhere to certain theological traditions that suppress the objectivity of science. Theistic evolutionists apparently concede important theological ground to the atheists and the liberals by allegorizing the Genesis account of creation and the fall or are inconsistent in applying the evolutionary paradigm. Neo-orthodoxy stresses religious redemption at the expense of the historical fall. "God in creation" puts humankind in the community of creation but slights the sovereignty and wrath of God over sin. The position of the progressive creationists seems to be able to maintain scriptural as well as scientific integrity.

P. P. T. PUN

See also ADAM; CREATION, DOCTRINE OF; SCIENTIFIC CREATIONISM; EARTH, AGE OF; EVE; GAP THEORY; MANKIND, DOCTRINE OF; SCIENCE AND THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. M. J. Behe, Darwin's Black Box: The Biochemical Challenge to Evolution; R. J. Berry, Adam and Ape: A Christian Approach to the Theory of Evolution; R. Bube, Human Quest; J. O. Buswell Jr., Systematic Theology of the Christian Religion; R. E. D. Clark, Universe: Plan or Accident?; Creation; D. Fischer, Origins Solution: An Answer in the Creation-Evolution Debate; L. Gilkey, Maker of Heaven and Earth; S. J. Gould, Panda's Thumb: More Reflections in Natural History; C. G. Hunter, Darwin's God; P. E. Johnson, Darwin on Trial; M. Lubenow, Bones of Contention; N. Macbeth, Darwin Retried; E. McCrady, Seen and Unseen: A Biologist Views the Universe; J. Moltmann, God in Creation; J. P. Moreland, Creation Hypothesis; H. M. Morris, Biblical Cosmology and Mod- ern Science; G. Morton, Foundation, Fall and Flood: A Harmonization of Genesis and Science; R. C. Newman and H. J. Eckelmann Jr., Genesis One and the Origin of the Universe; E. K. V. Pearce, Who Was Adam?; P. P. Pun, Evolution, Nature and Scripture in Conflict?; B. Ramm, Christian View of Science and Scripture; H. Ross, Creation and Time; Fingerprint of God; H. Van Till, Fourth Day; J. C. Whitcomb and H. M. Morris, Genesis Flood; E. J. Young, Studies in Genesis One.

Evolution

Exaltation of Jesus Christ. See STATES OF JESUS CHRIST.

Ex Cathedra. The phrase means “from the throne” and is used to describe certain statements or pronouncements made by the pope in his capacities as head of the church on earth and vicar of Christ on earth. Such utterances are accepted by Roman Catholics as infallible. However, there are no infallible criteria by which it is possible to determine when a statement is actually ex cathedra. Not all papal statements are regarded as of this particular kind. P. TOON

See also INFALLIBILITY.

Excommunication. The most extreme disciplinary measure of the church, excommunication is the exclusion of an irrevocably rebellious sinner from the communion of the faithful. In most periods of the church's history, excommunication has been understood primarily as a medicinal measure, to recall to repentance and obedience. A secondary purpose is to safeguard the community's purity. When excommunication is rightly understood, punishment has never been the object.

Excommunication is said to have originated with the teaching of Jesus on binding and loosing (Matt. 16:19; 18:18; John 20:23). The sinner is bound in his or her sinful alienation from God's people and loosed following repentance. Excommunication came to be seen, then, as responsibility of the true church derived from its Lord. The procedure for disciplining sinners and the three steps to be taken prior to excommunication were also delivered to the church by Jesus. The straying one is first to be corrected privately (Matt. 18:15), the object being his or her reclamation, not the purity of the community of believers. If he or she will not listen, he or she is to be corrected before witnesses (Matt. 18:16) whose task is to protect the offender (cf. Deut. 19:15), since the admonisher may be in error, or they might find the right reproof when he or she does not. Third, the unrepentant offender is to be brought before the society of believers (Matt. 18:17), who are to sever all ties with him or her if he or she remains obdurate.

Two related disciplinary practices are revealed in the writings of Paul. First, private sins are to be corrected privately; open sins are to be corrected publicly (1 Tim. 5:20; for an example see Gal. 2:14). Second, Paul excommunicated a particularly scandalous sinner as soon as he was informed of the offense, a sentence he requested the dilatory community of believers to confirm at a special meeting (1 Cor. 5:3–5). Paul's severity, however, is in the interests of the sinner's cure, not destruction (cf. 2 Thess. 3:14–15).

The practice of the church up to the sixth century emphasized the close connection between excommunication and repentance. A grave offender who wished to make peace with God presented himself or herself to the bishop, who, by a liturgical excommunication, assigned the category of “penitent” and prescribed a period of public penitential works. When these were completed, the bishop lifted the excommunication, and with other clergy received the penitent back into communion by the laying on of hands, an action Cyprian called the “peace.” The society of believers was also required to consent.

From the seventh century a form of excommunication developed apart from the sacrament of penance. The strict requirement that all excommunicated persons should be avoided was relaxed so that, by the fifteenth century, a clear distinction was made between excommunicates (the vitandi) who were to be shunned because of their flagrant offenses, and those less serious offenders (the tolerati) who were to be excluded only from the sacraments.

The Reformation recalled the church to a more biblical position on ecclesiastical discipline, which was of major concern to the second generation of Reformers, especially Martin Bucer and John Calvin. Calvin maintained that discipline according to the Word of the Lord is the “best help” to sound doctrine, order, and unity, and that banishing blatant sinners and the hopelessly rebellious is to exercise a spiritual jurisdiction invested by the Lord in the assembly of believers. To Calvin excommunication has a threefold purpose: first, “that God may not be insulted by the name of Christians being given to those who lead shameful and flagitious lives”; second, “that the good may not . . . be corrupted by constant communication with the wicked”; and third, “that the sinner may be ashamed, and begin to repent of his turpitude.” Mindful of the examples of Paul and the early church fathers, Calvin insisted that the whole assembly of believers should witness any excommunication.

The Council of Trent also addressed the problem of abuses in the practice of excommunication within the Roman Catholic Church. Bishops were asked not to allow themselves to be made tools of the state, excommunicating according to the wish of temporal rulers. They were also enjoined to be moderate in the use of excommunication, for the widespread use of the penalty for slight offenses provoked contempt.

The primary medicinal function of excommunication was reconfirmed.

Modern Catholic teaching on excommunication, incorporated in canon law (Codex Iuris Canonici, 1917, canons 2257–67), denies to the excommunicate the sacraments, Christian burial, ecclesiastical office, and revenue from ecclesiastical sources. He or she is not thereby deprived of divine grace, for that is forfeited only by mortal sin. Neither does he or she cease to be a Christian, since excommunication cannot remove the indelible character imprinted on the soul by baptism. He or she loses the rights of membership in the church but is not released from the obligations, acquired at baptism, of affiliation with it. A nonjuridical form of excommunication imposed on non-Catholics is a barrier to the acceptance by the Roman Catholic Church of intercommunion (full sharing in the Lord's Supper by separated Christians).

Formal excommunication is now rarely exercised in Protestant churches, although it is still countenanced by the revised canons (1969) of the Church of England.

F. S. PIGGIN

See also CHURCH DISCIPLINE.

Bibliography. J. Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion; F. E. Hyland, Excommunication: Its Nature, Historical Development and Effects; K. Lehnann and W. Pannenberg, Condemnations of the Reformation Era: Do They Still Divide?; R. P. McBrien, "Catholicism," NCE 5:704–7; E. Schweizer, Good News According to Matthew

Exemplarism. See ATONEMENT, THEORIES OF.

Exhortation. One of the fundamental elements of the Word of God throughout the history of the people of God. From the election of Abraham to the founding of the church, instruction in righteousness, the call to obedience, and exhortation have been part of God's address to his people. Torah (usually translated "law," but better understood as instruction and exhortation) is basically a call to the people to structure their community and order their worship in a way that will reflect their own distinctiveness and God's lordship.

Immediately after release from bondage in Egypt the Israelites were faced with questions of how to preserve their identity, how to organize community life and worship so as not to be contaminated by heathen worship, and how to secure their existence in a hostile environment. Early hortatory material seeks to meet those needs. Under the new covenant the church faced the same issues, and the paraenetic material of the NT is a response to those needs.

Exhortation underscores the social and community character of life in Christ. Faith is a social experience, breaking down barriers of alienation (Gal. 3:28; Eph. 2:14–15) and creating a unity through the common gift of the Spirit (Eph. 4:3). But while unity is a reality, it is also a "not yet" (Eph. 4:13). The NT church was a new phenomenon and struggled to work out its community life. The struggle was particularly intense in the Gentile world, where the members of the believing community had limited contact with the ethical monotheism of Judaism.

The NT writers, following the OT prophets, set forth the close relationship between the gift of salvation and the call to obedience. Logically the latter flows from the former, so that we have in several of the letters a natural division (e.g., Rom. 1–11, 12–15; Eph. 1–3, 4–6). The Reformation reinforced this logical formula by way of sola fidei and sola gratia. But experientially the two cannot be separated, as though we are saved by faith and then follow that faith up with obedience. While faith and obedience are not identical, such texts as Matthew 7:21; 25:31–46; James 1:21–22; 1 John 3:17 show that there is overlapping. The people of God are called to both faith and faithfulness.

The content of the NT exhortation reflects the newness of the kingdom of God. This is a kingdom of inverse values whose citizens are called to embrace paradox. They are to seek no public recognition (Matt. 6); they are to exalt concrete servanthood (John 13); they are to set themselves over against "the world" (Rom. 12:1–2). The center of exhortation in the church is the command to love, which gives fullness to the whole law. Without love every gift and virtue is meaningless (1 Cor. 13:1–3). Biblical perfection consists in indiscriminate love (Matt. 5:43–48). The care of the poor is the quintessence of love (Luke 4:18; James 1:27; 1 John 3:17–18) and Christian duty.

Alongside this social paraenetic are those who seek to preserve the identity and character of the church from the world with its principalities and powers, which always seek to subvert and undermine (cf. John 17:14–16; Rom. 12:1–2; Eph. 6:12–20).

R. W. LYON

Exhortation, Gift of. See SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

Existence. From the Latin existentia, Webster defines "existence" as the state or fact of having being, and Webster defines "being" as the state or fact of having existence. This illustrates nicely the fact that the concept of existence is so basic that it cannot be understood in simpler terms.

Nonexistent Things. Some things exist, e.g., you. That is to say, there is something—namely, you—and it has a certain property, existence. Some things, however, do not exist. That is to say, there is something, and it fails to have a certain property, existence. Thus, there are non-existent things. Proponents of this conclusion may try to dispel its contradictory air by saying that the existential quantifier and cognates of "existence" are used to express two unrelated concepts. For example, St. Anselm distinguished "existence-in-the-understanding" and "existence-in-reality." Thus, St. Anselm would read the conclusion to say that some things exist in the understanding but fail to exist in reality. Modern logicians, however, treat the existential quantifier and cognates of "existence" univocally. They also treat negations as denials of positive claims rather than as assertions that things lack certain features. This allows them to treat "x does not exist" as "it is false that x exists" and not "there is something, x, that fails to exist." This undermines the above linguistically based rationale for nonexistent things.

Existence

Modality. You and I exist; but we might not have. That is, we exist contingently. Square circles do not exist; but square circles cannot exist. Could there be a thing that, like you and me, exists but that, unlike you and me, must exist? Some philosophers argue that, e.g., numbers, propositions, properties, and God are candidates.

Dependence. Necessary things do not depend for their existence on anything other than themselves. Every contingent thing, on the other hand, does depend for its existence on something else. This thought might be understood as follows: every contingent thing is such that it would not have existed if something else had not existed and brought it into existence. Consider now, the cosmos, the collection of all contingent things, which is itself contingent. It cannot depend for its existence on a contingent being, since every contingent being is a member of the cosmos. Thus, there is at least one necessary being upon which the cosmos depends for its existence.

Existentialism. Existentialists famously assert that "existence precedes essence." If this slogan means that we have an essence only if we exist, then it is trivially true since we can't have anything unless we exist. It is more typically understood to mean that we can exist without an essence and that we can choose what our essence shall be. Christians have historically affirmed that the choices one makes affect the sort of character one possesses. But it is impossible for one to choose one's essence, for an essence is that set of properties a thing possesses that, were it to lose any of them, it would not exist. If I can choose my essence, then there must be a time at which I exist and fail to have an essence, which is impossible: I cannot at once exist and fail to have a set of properties required for my existence.

Relativism. Some things that exist do so because and only because of various interests we have and conventions we deploy, e.g., countries. If we had drawn the boundaries differently, some countries that exist would not have existed or some countries that don't exist would have existed. If we had drawn no boundaries at all, there would have been no countries at all. These are platitudes. But some people say that everything is like a country; everything that exists does so because and only because of various interests and conventions we deploy. One might wonder why anyone would say such a thing but, for present purposes, note that it is incompatible with the idea that God exists independently of our interests and conventions.

D. HOWARD-SNYDER

See also ESSENCE; EXISTENTIALISM.

Bibliography. J. Findlay, Meinong's Theory of Objects and Values; M. Heidegger, Being and Time; A. Meinong, "Theory of Objects," in Realism and the Background of Phenomenology, R. Chisholm, ed.; J. O'Leary-Hawthorne and A. Cortens, "Principle of Necessary Reason," in Faith and Philosophy, A. Plantinga, ed.; A. Plantinga, Nature of Necessity; R. Rorty, Objectivity, Relativism and Truth; J. Sartre, Being and Nothingness, H. Barnes, trans.

Existence of God, Arguments for. See GOD, ARGUMENTS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF.

Existentialism. The term embraces a variety of philosophies and attitudes to life that flourished in Germany from the time of the First World War and in France during and immediately after the Second World War. In the postwar period its influence was felt in Britain, North America, and in Western culture generally.

Definition. Although existentialism is associated with major philosophers such as Karl Jaspers (1883–1969) and Martin Heidegger (1889–1976), several of its leading advocates were writers, including Albert Camus (1913–60) and Jean-Paul Sartre (1905–80), whose interests embraced literature as well as philosophy. To them the novel or the play could be a more powerful means of depicting and analyzing existence than scholarly dissertations. Existentialism was concerned above all with the problems of human life in the modern, secular mass societies. Existentialist themes include personal existence as contrasted with impersonal existence, the absurdity of life and the quest for meaning and validity, human freedom (or the lack of it), choices and the will, individual isolation, anxiety, dread, and death.

Existentialism has been described as the attempt to philosophize from the standpoint of the actor rather than (as in previous schemes of philosophy) from that of the detached spectator. But the resultant philosophies varied considerably, depending on whether the philosopher in question believed in God or was an atheist.

Nineteenth-Century Origins. The origins of existentialism are frequently traced back to the nineteenth-century Danish philosopher Søren Kierkegaard (1813–55), the German philosopher and poet Friedrich Nietzsche (1844–1900), and the Russian novelist Fedor Dostoyevsky (1821–81). Whether any of these three could be called an existentialist in the modern sense of the term is questionable. But in different ways each anticipated ideas and themes in twentieth-century existentialism. All three questioned the accepted values and philosophies of their day, and all three were concerned with the need of the individual to discover truth that was valid in the struggles of personal existence.

Kierkegaard's earlier writings contained a series of attacks on the confusion and irrelevance of the idealism of G. F. W. Hegel (1770–1831) as a guide to life and to the truth about God. Hegel's philosophy dominated the first half of the nineteenth century. It purported to present the system of reality as the outworking of the ultimate Spirit. Kierkegaard responded in his Philosophical Fragments (1844) and the much larger Concluding Unscientific Postscript to the Philosophical Fragments (1846). The subtitle of the latter describes it as An Existential Contribution. To Kierkegaard, systems and existence were incompatible, mutually exclusive ideas. In later writings Kierkegaard turned his attack to the confusion and irrelevance of institutionalized Christianity.

Whereas Nietzsche and later atheistic existentialist thinkers taught that, since God does not exist, human beings must make up their own values, Kierkegaard taught exactly the opposite. Underlying all his writings is the conviction that God exists, that he has become incarnate in Jesus Christ, and that this belief is the most important of all beliefs for human existence. But whereas previous thinkers had given formal acknowledgment to the transcendence of God, Kierkegaard explored its radical significance. Since God is wholly other, he can never be identified with anything finite. Even in revelation God's divinity remains hidden from our sight and the capacity of our reason to grasp it. When people saw Jesus Christ on earth, they saw a man. His divinity remained hidden. The infinite cannot be changed into the finite, and the eternal cannot be reduced to the temporal. In the incarnation God was incognito. That his true identity can be seen only by the eyes of faith testifies to the paradox of the divine and human together.

For Kierkegaard the existence of God and the divinity of Christ cannot be perceived by the senses or proved by reason. The senses can grasp only what exists in time and space, and reason is capable of dealing only with the finite. Only from the standpoint of faith can one get a true view of God and the world. But this in turn requires the commitment of one's whole being to a life of discipleship, for the truth of existence is grasped only in the total commitment of faith. Kierkegaard has been strongly criticized for his alleged irrationalism. But in some respects he stands close to evangelical presuppositionalism with its faith commitment to the God of the Bible as the ground of life and thought.

Friedrich Nietzsche, on the other hand, was openly hostile to Christianity and religion in general. His main work, Thus Spake Zarathustra (1883–92), consisted largely of aphorisms and reflections, written in a bitterly ironic and intensely personal manner. In Joyful Science (1882) he declared that God is dead, and that humankind must learn to live without him. This meant a reevaluation of all values. Christian ethics and the Christian way of life must be rejected along with Christian theology. Nietzsche despised the Christian virtues. For him the ideal man, the superman (German Übermensch) is completely self-possessed. He has no fear of others, of himself, or of death. He is characterized by a will to power. Nietzsche believed that his philosophy was compatible with a scientific view of the world, but he believed that his values transcended science, for there was no meaning in life other than that which human beings give it. In a sense they are their own creators. If they are ever to rise above the flux of meaningless existence, they must choose a way of life that has meaning and dignity for them, even though it might bring suffering to themselves and to others. Although Nietzsche ridiculed theology and the metaphysical systems of others, he indulged in a theological system of his own, which revived the Greek notion of the eternal recurrence of all things.

Whereas Nietzsche claimed scientific justification for his views, including his doctrine of eternal recurrence, much of Dostoyevsky's work was devoted to attacking the pretensions of scientific humanism and urging the necessity of faith and of God as the basis of human freedom. Human beings seek freedom but are bound by the institutions of society. Dostoyevsky rejected the idea that humanity is bound by scientific laws and is thus totally determined by physical factors, whether we realize it or not. He also rejected the idea that everything is governed by reason. Reason does not exist apart from the minds of the reasoners. Truth is not something absolute and timeless; it depends upon the will. Freedom is both the supreme good and the supreme evil. If God did not exist, everything would be allowed. God appears to pose a threat to human freedom, but true, saving freedom is to be found in conditionless religious faith and commitment.

Twentieth-Century Existentialists. The themes sounded by Kierkegaard, Nietzsche, and Dostoyevsky have been taken up by twentieth-century existentialists, though no two existentialist thinkers share identical views. In some respects existentialism is characterized by a protest against theological and metaphysical systems into which human life is made to fit. But both Heidegger and Sartre have erected metaphysical systems of their own on the basis of their analysis of existence.

Existentialism

In common with others, Heidegger rejected the idea of a personal Creator who exists over and above the universe and upon whom the universe depends for its existence. Instead, he drew a distinction between Being and beings who participate in Being. His analysis of being-in-the-world, nothingness, time, dread, facticity, and destiny resulted in an elaborate ontology, reminiscent of pantheism and idealism, but replete with his own idiosyncratic vocabulary. Heidegger himself saw his thought as a return to pre-Socratic philosophy, which did not impose on Being the categories and structures that subsequent philosophies imposed. Heidegger was influenced by the phenomenology of his teacher Edmund Husserl (1859–1938), which insisted on discarding all preconceptions in the interests of insight. Heidegger's seminal but incomplete Being and Time (1927) investigated human existence in relation to being-in-the-world. Inauthentic existence consists in depersonalized, objective, anonymous existence, in which human beings are mere units in the totality of things. Authentic existence involves recognizing and responding to the possibilities of human existence by rising above the level of depersonalized existence through choice and openness to the future.

Sartre's atheistic existentialism also developed a complex ontology, full of Sartre's own private, technical jargon. It too was influenced by Husserl. His principal philosophical work was Being and Nothingness (1943). Sartre's lecture on Existentialism and Humanism (1946) made his ideas accessible to a wider public. To Sartre the world as a whole is absurd and meaningless. Human beings find themselves dumped into it, unable to turn to anyone for guidance but themselves. Since God does not exist, it is absurd to turn to the Bible or the church for divine help. It is equally absurd to resort to Christian ethics now that it has lost its foundation. Nevertheless, human beings have choices to make that determine their existence. In a sense, human beings create themselves, for the choices they make shape what will become of them. Sartre's slogan "Existence precedes essence" reverses the traditional view, which sees human beings as having a relatively fixed nature. Inevitably, they find themselves in a state of anxiety, for life is like a relentless conveyor belt, carrying one to the grave. Life is meaningless apart from the meaning that one chooses to give it. People crave freedom but are subject to remorseless social, political, and economic pressures. The free act of one individual means the curtailment of someone else's freedom. What is left is suicide as the ultimate act of freedom.

Comment. A distinction frequently drawn by existentialists is that between authentic and in-authentic existence. But there seems to be no consensus of agreement as to how to define these ideas, and it is questionable whether such a distinction is legitimate for an atheistic existentialist, since the idea of authentic existence implies that one form of existence is not merely preferable but right. However, it is difficult to see how anyone could say that one act is intrinsically better than another in a world devoid of ultimate meaning and values. Even the claim that authentic existence is characterized by the decision to choose rather than allow choices to be made for one is questionable, as the latter possibility could well be satisfying to one person, though not necessarily to another.

In the contemporary philosophical climate, interest in existentialism has been replaced by interest in deconstructionism (with its claims that language is a manipulative tool for superimposing meaning, which therefore needs deconstructing) and in social hermeneutics (e.g., Latin American liberation hermeneutics, black hermeneutics, and feminism). In the latter case, the concerns of different social groups have replaced the existentialist focus on the individual and abstract theorizing about the structure of existence. Sociopragmatic hermeneutics employs hermeneutics in the rhetorical power struggles of one social group against another. But in so doing it fails to rise above the manipulation and exploitation against which it protests. On the other hand, sociocritical hermeneutics investigates and evaluates the impact of language and literature on life and society with a view to effecting genuine change.

Existentialism and Theology. Existentialism has affected contemporary theology, notably in the teaching of Rudolf Bultmann (1884–1975), Paul Tillich (1886–1965), and Karl Barth (1886–1968). But none of these was a pure existentialist. In his seminal essay "New Testament and Mythology" (in Hans-Werner Bartsch, ed., Kerygma and Myth, 1953), Bultmann made use of Heidegger's terminology, especially his distinction between authentic and inauthentic existence, as a modern way of describing the distinction between the life of faith and life in the flesh in the context of his demythologizing program. But the philosophical framework of Bultmann's thought was a neo-Kantian view of God that affirmed God's transcendence but questioned human capacity to know God directly. Bultmann's approach to the New Testament was determined not by existentialism but by his form criticism and concern to interpret the New Testament in the context of his history of religion and his understanding of myth.

In his Systematic Theology (1951–63), Tillich also made use of existential categories, but he did so in the context of an ontology that revived the philosophy of being, advocated by Schelling and other nineteenth-century German idealists. The early writings of Karl Barth were indebted to Kierkegaard in their stress on the otherness of God and revelation through God's self-communication. But in his later work Barth downplayed his debt and moved away from Kierkegaard in favor of stressing the unity of God with humanity.

C. BROWN

See also BARTH, KARL; BULTMANN, RUDOLF; HEIDEGGER, MARTIN; KIERKEGAARD, SØREN; NEO-ORTHODOXY; TILLICH, PAUL.

Bibliography. W. Barrett, Irrational Man; H. J. Blackham, Six Existential Thinkers; D. Brown, Continental Philosophy and Modern Theology; R. Bubner, Modern German Philosophy; R. Bultmann, Essays: Philosophical and Theological; F. Copleston, Contemporary Philosophy: Studies of Logical Positivism and Existentialism; History of Philosophy; V. Descombes, Modern French Philosophy; M. Green, Introduction to Existentialism; A. P. Griffiths, ed., Contemporary French Philosophy; M. Heidegger, Being and Time; Introduction to Metaphysics; W. Kaufmann, ed., Existentialism from Dostoyevsky to Sartre; C. W. Kegley, ed., Theology of Rudolf Bultmann; J. Macquarrie, Existentialism; Existentialist Theology; J. P. Sartre, Being and Nothingness; Existentialism and Humanism; A. Thatcher, Ontology of Paul Tillich; A. C. Thiselton, New Horizons in Hermeneutics; Two Horizons.

Ex Nihilo, Creatio. See CREATION, DOCTRINE OF.

Ex Opere Operato. The historic Roman Catholic view of the way sacraments are effective is that they operate ex opere operato ("from the work done"). This position became official at the Council of Trent (1545–63). Canon VIII of the seventh session opposed the view that "grace is not conferred through the act performed, but that faith alone in the divine promise suffices for the obtaining of grace." The condition for the recipient is only that one does not place an obstacle (obex, sinful act or disposition) against the sacrament's administration. Grace is given by God when the sacrament is conferred rightly by the church. This ex opere operato working makes the sacraments unique conductors of divine grace.

The Reformers rejected this view. Calvin said it contradicted the nature of the sacraments. Protestants have stressed the need for faith to be present in the recipient for a sacrament to have validity. Sacraments are the instruments used by God to confirm the word of his promise to those who believe.

D. K. MCKIM

See also GRACE; OPUS OPERATUM; SACRAMENT.

Bibliography. D. Baillie, Theology of the Sacraments; G. C. Berkouwer, Sacraments; B. Leeming, Principles of Sacramental Theology; P. Schaff, Creeks of Christendom; R. Seeberg, Textbook of the History of Doctrines; P. Tillich, Complete History of Christian Thought.

Exorcism. To exorcize, exorkizō, is to charge under oath (e.g., Matt. 26:63, Jesus is adjured to tell the truth about his messianic status). It also refers to the expelling of a spirit or spirits from a person by means of ritual(s). Such rituals, taken from the term itself, involve oaths. They may also include the use of magical formulas and secret incantations. Though widely used today of Christian work in expelling demons, the NT does not use exorcism to describe Jesus' or his disciples' ministry. Rather than relying on ritual, they cast out (ekballō) demons by verbally exercising God's authority. The noun exorkistēs occurs only in Acts 19:13 of Jewish exorcists who use the name of Jesus in a botched exorcism.

A variety of formalized exorcism ceremonies have existed inside the church from early on. In the second and third centuries, rituals of exorcism were a common part of the baptismal process. The Roman Catholic Church has a well-established ritual. Lutherans and Anglicans once had exorcism rituals but abandoned or issued strict controls over them by the 1600s to prevent abuses. Among some contemporary Christian groups the form of demonic confrontation, the use of religious paraphernalia (water, oil, crucifix), prayer and fasting, and repetitive reading of key Bible passages all with the extensive use of formulaic language point to a ritual orientation even though no formalized procedure is being followed. A danger to be noted is that when Christians present Christian authority over the demonic as dependent on ritual, they may open the door to the rise of syncretism in the form of Christian magical thinking.

Rituals of exorcism are found in every world religion and especially in folk religious practices. Four components are almost universally involved: (1) the exorcist, (2) the victim, (3) the community, and (4) the ritual(s). The exorcist is thought to be a person with special powers. In Western cultures the victim may be troubled because of personal or family issues. In collective societies, however, extended family, clan, or tribal taboo violations or relational breakdowns are also considered as causative of possessive phenomena. This person exhibits stereotyped behaviors (e.g., self-mutilation) interpreted as being spirit-driven. Because of the antisocial behavior, this person often becomes a scapegoat for the community, which in turn provides support of the exorcistic process as a means of relieving tension. If the exorcism is unsuccessful, the community may go further and sanction the execution of the possessed as a witch, an act intended as a symbol of the rejection by the community of the antisocial person to appease the spirits who watch over the community. The ritual of exorcism is the actual ceremony in which the spirits are expelled, and the variations are innumerable, though they generally focus on the release of spiritual power. This may be accomplished by torture of the victim to make him or her an uninhabitable host to spirits, the application of specially prepared herbs; the use of magical formulas, chants, and incantations; an offering, or some type of animal sacrifice. The help or advice of friendly spirits may be enlisted through mediumistic channeling to deal with the spirit tormenting the victim. Understanding the functions of such rituals and the way they act as a social glue in the community is important for a cross-cultural worker. If these rituals are simply discarded and the social functions they serve remain unmet, rather than being abandoned, such practices will go underground and out of sight.

Exorcism

While it is important for the Christian worker to understand the function of exorcism in the local community, the fact that we are privileged to call on Christ's authority in dealing with spirits in a power encounter often provides an evangelistic breakthrough, which the local community recognizes as God's work among them.

A. S. MOREAU

See also DEMON, DEMONIZATION; PRINCIPALITIES AND POWERS; SATAN; SATANISM; SPIRITUAL WARFARE; WITCHCRAFT.

Bibliography. F. Goodman, How About Demons?; Possession and Exorcism in the Modern World; M. Kraft, Understanding Spiritual Power, S. Moreau, World of the Spirits.

Exorcist. See MINOR ORDERS.

Expediency. The character of an act in which any predetermined goal is sought by whatever means will enable one to achieve the goal most directly and advantageously with regard to the moral implications of these means.

The relationship between expediency and moral values may be set forth in different ways. According to utilitarians, the two areas coalesce; what is really expedient constitutes the right.

According to the Stoics and Kant, the two areas overlap. The good must always be followed for the sake of duty alone; but where no moral standard for conduct is applicable, expediency becomes the only sensible path to follow.

A third type of relationship between expediency and moral principles sets them apart as mutually exclusive guides to conduct and as usually in conflict. The expedient, therefore, must never be followed because it is expedient, but every act must be morally determined.

Christians generally have followed the second view and argued for an area of adiaphora where expediency has a place, but some have tended to hold to the third view. All Christians have insisted that, however inexpedient the right course of action may sometimes appear to be, in the overrul-ing providence of God the believer may know that the morally good always works out ultimately to his best advantage (Rom. 8:28).

K. S. KANTZER

See also ADIAPHORA, ADIAPHORISTS; CASUISTRY; ETHICAL SYSTEMS, CHRISTIAN; SITUATION ETHICS.

Experience, Theology of. Experience can be understood as a source of knowledge deriving from a direct perception or apprehension of reality. Experiential knowledge can be gained either externally or internally, presenting itself immediately either to the natural sense or to the inner world of the spirit. Experiencing something is to be distinguished from reflecting about it or hearing a report on it. The experience has greater force ("you should have been there") and provides a sense of certitude ("but I saw it") that reflection and reportage do not. The personal nature of experience, however, is an important qualifier, for experience can never be fully transmitted or represented. Moreover, apart from authentic reflection, experience, however vivid, remains arbitrary, unclear, and open to false claims. Experience and reflection must therefore be understood as complementary and interactive, although no easy formula spells out adequately their interrelation.

Encounters with the transcendent can be labeled religious experience. Defined thus, religious experience is essential to all religions, including Christianity. Within the history of Christianity, however, there have been certain movements that have distinguished themselves by stressing the primacy and authority of experience over other sources of knowledge, i.e., the church (tradition) and the Word (Scripture). In the modern period pietism, revivalism, the Holiness Movement, and Pentecostalism have all given preeminence to the experience of the believer. Such movements have not viewed themselves as being in opposition to the witness of Scripture or the true teaching of the church. They have challenged a recurring conceptualist orthodoxy and/or rigid scholasticism. Without the complementary life of the Spirit, the letter remains dead (2 Cor. 3:6).

At the beginning of the nineteenth century, liberal Protestant theology arose, understanding experience as the basis for Christian reflection. Friedrich Schleiermacher offered the classic formulation. Rather than emphasize God's action with regard to humankind, he sought to clarify Christianity in terms of humankind's experience of God. Remembering the pietism of his youth and reacting to the contemporary rationalistic and ethical reductions of religion seen in Hume and Kant, Schleiermacher wrote his On Religion: Speeches to Its Cultured Despisers (1799), arguing for the centrality of feeling in religion. Religion is not action (morality), nor is it metaphysics (theoretical knowledge). Rather, as he later characterized it, religion is based in the “feeling of absolute dependence.”

Schleiermacher (and those following his lead) has often been criticized for both his subjectivism and his pantheism—charges that are mistaken unless carefully qualified. A more trenchant critique has to do with his one-sided stress on religious feeling. There is throughout his discussion, despite occasional disclaimers, a false compartmentalization of human activity into feeling, doing, and thinking. The result is a downplaying and/or rejection of orthodox Christian thought, for ideas about God remain secondary for him and are ultimately unimportant.

A theology based in experience need not deny orthodox Christian reflection, however. Such a theology is chiefly distinguishable not by its sometimes liberal orientation, but by its Trinitarian emphasis on the Holy Spirit (on one’s experience of God in creation and redemption). Within present-day evangelicalism both those stressing a “charismatic” understanding of the Christian faith (e.g., John Wimber) and those focusing on a relational approach (e.g., Robert Schuler) can be said to be experiential theologians. Neither movement desires to ignore or reject the authority of the Word. Rather, both want to stress the fundamental and initiatory role of the Spirit, whether in creation (relational theology’s interest in our being fully human) or in re-creation (charismatic theology’s interest in a Spirit-filled life).

Experiential theology has important strengths. It has arisen historically within Christianity in reaction to a sterile intellectualism and/or a rote traditionalism. Moreover, its emphasis on the role of the Spirit continues to help the church attain a more balanced Trinitarian perspective. But there are also dangers: (1) Christian experience must never be viewed individually but nurtured and evaluated within the Christian community past and present. (2) Experience and reflection must not become isolated from each other. Word and Spirit must remain complementary expressions of the Trinity. (3) The Spirit who is experienced cannot be reduced to only the Spirit in creation, or Christianity risks degeneration into psychology (cf. Feuerbach’s critique). Neither can Christian theology be concerned only with the Spirit of redemption, for then Christianity risks isolationism and mysticism.

A biblically based theology of experience will stress the Spirit’s ongoing role in creation and redemption (cf. Acts 14:15–18; Rom. 8; Gal. 4:6–7). It will also recognize that a focus on the Spirit will open naturally and authentically into an emphasis on Christ the Word (1 Cor. 12:3; 1 John 4:2). Finally, an experiential theology will always be a corporate church theology (Rom. 12; 1 Cor. 12). R. K. JOHNSTON

See also HOLINESS MOVEMENT, AMERICAN; PENTECOSTALISM; PIETISM; REVIVALISM; SCHLEIERMACHER, FRIEDRICH DANIEL ERNST.

Bibliography. J. Edwards, Religious Affections; W. James, Varieties of Religious Experience; R. Johnston, “Of Tidy Doctrine and Truncated Experience,” CT (February 18, 1977); K. Lehmann, “Experience,” Sacramentum Mundi, 2:307–9; R. Otto, Idea of the Holy.

Expiation. See PROPITIATION.

External Calling. See CALL, CALLING.

Extra ecclesiam nulla salus. A Latin phrase literally meaning “outside the church there is no salvation.” It is attributed to Cyprian in the third century and is a companion to his other famous dictum, “You cannot have God for your Father unless you have the church for your Mother,” and to his analogy of the church as the ark outside of which it is impossible to be saved.

The phrase indicates the status of those who do not accept the discipline, hierarchy, or sacraments of the “true” church. Thus, it has particular application to schismatics. Augustine (e.g., Enchiridion 27.65) explicitly stated the concept. It was stridently affirmed by Boniface VIII in Unam Sanctam and defined in 1442 by the Council of Florence. It was applied during the Reformation against those who separated from Rome. But the principle was equally affirmed by the Protestants: Calvin cited Cyprian’s adage in Institutes of the Christian Religion (4.1.4) at the beginning of his theological treatment of the church’s significance in the believer’s life, insisting that neither forgiveness of sins nor salvation is available apart from the church.

During the last two centuries, Protestant liberals, post-Vatican Council II Catholics, and, more recently, some evangelicals have attempted to leave some room for the operation of salvific grace among those who are extra ecclesiam.

The most significant discussion has occurred in the Roman Catholic Church. With precedent in Pius IX’s 1854 concept of the “invincible ignorance” of those who are not culpable for their unawareness of the true church, and in Pius XII’s Mystici Corporis Christi, interpretations of Vatican Council II by Karl Rahner and others teach that those outside the visible limits of the Catholic Church may have an “implicit desire” for the Christian faith about which they are ignorant or which they explicitly reject: a person who genuinely “fears God and does what is right” would obviously wish to become a Christian if he or she recognized this as God’s will. This “implicit desire” is the link between the formula and those outside the church who transcend the church's visible limits but are within the hold of God's grace. Rahner referred to such people as "anonymous Christians," and their faith, which is real but unconscious and unadduced, seeks to be explicit in the creeds and sacraments of the church and in the membership of the church itself. Rahner would thus insist that there is only one means of salvation, which is in every case affected by the same Spirit of the one church, but membership in the visible church and adherence to its sacramental and institutional embodiment is not always necessary. This distinction often leads to models of stratification or degrees of membership within the one true church.

Extra ecclesiam nulla salus

Concepts of "invincible ignorance" and "implicit desire" are similar to ideas recently espoused by evangelicals, including Norman Geisler and Clark Pinnock. Pinnock has argued that adherents of other religions might be the recipients of the Spirit's work such that the God for whom they longed (Heb. 11:6) will eventually be known to them in the person of Christ, even if that is not realized until after death.

At issue is the relationship of the Spirit's work to the historical, sociological, visible, and apprehensible institution of the church, as well as one's conception of the nature of the church. Also, underlying Rahner's soteriology is a theological anthropology whereby the church is the sacramental bringer and fulfillment of that universal grace that is already a universal reality on an "interior level." The reality of religious pluralism in modern society has made the question of the validity of Cyprian's claim an important one for contemporary Christian soteriology. D. L. OKHOLM

Bibliography. W. M. Abbott, ed.; Documents of Vatican Council II; Augustine, Enchiridion; G. C. Berkouwer, Second Vatican Council and the New Catholicism, L. B. Smedes, trans.; C. Butler, Theology of Vatican Council 2; J. Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion; Cyprian, Letters; Unity of the Catholic Church;

N. Geisler, Christian Apologetics; D. Okholm and T. Phillips, Four Views on Salvation in a Pluralistic World; C. Pinnock, Wideness in God's Mercy; K. Rahner, Theological Investigations.

Extreme Unction. An anointing with oil of the sick used as a sacrament in the Roman Catholic Church. "Extreme" may refer to the fact that the unction is the last of the three sacramental unctions, the former at baptism and confirmation, or to the fact that it is administered when the patient is in extremis. The Council of Trent states that it was instituted by Christ. No reference is given, but it is said to be implied in Mark. Its sacramental status and effects are based on an interpretation of James 5:14–15. Oil, consecrated by the bishop, is the matter; unction with prayer by the priests the sign; the grace given on condition of repentance and faith is forgiveness of sins, renewed health, and strength of soul and also of body if God sees fit. Our Lord used varied means in healing the sick, but there is no actual record of his use of oil unless we infer it from apostolic practice in Mark 6:13. Was the use of oil medicinal or symbolical? The Roman Catholic Church makes the oil symbolic of the Holy Spirit. Prayer for the blessing of oil for the sick is found in the Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus (ca. A.D. 225) and in the Euchologion of Serapion (ca. A.D. 365). From the fifth century references to anointing are more frequent. The rite was included among the seven sacraments in the thirteenth century and its doctrine defined at Trent. Extreme unction was rejected by the Reformers, and Protestants rarely practice it today.

R. J. COATES

See also ANOINT, ANOINTING; SACRAMENT.

Bibliography. B. Cooke, Sacraments and Sacramentality; F. W. Fuller, Anointing of the Sick in Scripture and Tradition; J. Martos, Doors of the Sacred: A Historical Introduction to Sacraments in the Catholic Church.

Ff

Fairbairn, Andrew Martin (1838–1912). British theologian. Born into a strict Presbyterian family in Fife, he had little early schooling, but after taking classes at Edinburgh University and the Evangelical Union Academy, he was ordained and served Congregational churches in Bathgate and Aberdeen (1860–77). During visits to Germany, he sat under Dorner, Tholuck, and Hengstenberg, and thereafter his theology was broader than that of his Scottish contemporaries. He was subsequently principal of Airedale Theological College, Bradford (1877–86), and the first principal when Mansfield College, Oxford, was founded in 1886. The summer school he began there (modeled on the American pattern he had seen at Chautauqua and Yale) was criticized as a mere vehicle for the support of higher criticism, but Fairbairn was unrepentant, holding that through it “we know the New Testament as it was never known before.” Always he insisted that criticism involved construction. Neither Nicea nor Chalcedon interpreted God adequately in terms of the consciousness of Christ, he said, and now was the time to put this right, since the available material was fuller and richer than ever before.

Much of his viewpoint is reflected in his best-known book, Place of Christ in Modern Theology (1893), which quickly went through twelve editions. The Spectator hailed it as valuable and comprehensive, but a German review more perceptively noted the volume’s neglect of eschatological considerations in estimating the consciousness of Christ. Fairbairn clashed with J. H. Newman, declaring that the latter’s Grammar of Assent was “pervaded by the intensest philosophical scepticism.” Fairbairn’s mediating type of theology is less durable because of his preoccupation with controversies of his time. Fairbairn also took a leading part in organizing theological teaching in the Welsh universities and was one of the earliest fellows of the British Academy. J. D. DOUGLAS Bibliography. J. D. Douglas, ed., Who’s Who in Christian History; W. B. Selbie, Life of Andrew Martin Fairbairn.

Faith. Noun corresponding to the verb “believe,” for which the Hebrew is he’emîn, the hiphil form of ’āman, and the Greek (LXX and NT) pisteuō.

The latter is a key word in the NT, being the term regularly used to denote the many-sided religious relationship into which the gospel calls people—that of trust in God through Christ. The complexity of this idea is reflected in the variety of constructions used with the verb (a hoti clause, or accusative and infinitive, expressing truth believed; en and epi with the dative, denoting restful reliance on that to which, or to whom, credit is given; eis and, occasionally, epi with the accusative—the most common, characteristic, and original NT usage, scarcely present in the LXX and not at all in classical Greek—conveying the thought of a movement of trust going out to, and laying hold of, the object of its confidence). The Hebrew noun corresponding to ’āman (’emûnâ, rendered pistis in the LXX), regularly denotes faithfulness in the sense of trustworthiness, and pistis occasionally bears this sense in the NT (Matt. 23:23; Rom. 3:3, of God; Gal. 5:22; Titus 2:10, of man). The word ’emûnâ normally refers to the faithfulness of God, and only in Habakkuk 2:4 is it used to signify a person’s religious response to God. There, however, the contrast in the context between the temper of the righteous and the proud self-sufficiency of the Chaldeans seems to demand for it a broader sense that “faithfulness” alone—the sense, namely, of self-renouncing, trustful reliance upon God, the attitude of heart of which faithfulness in life is the natural expression. This is certainly the sense in which the apostolic writers quote the text (Rom. 1:17; Gal. 3:11; Heb. 10:38), and the sense which pistis, like pisteuō, regularly carries in the NT, where both words are used virtually as technical terms (John preferring the verb, Paul the noun) to express the complex thought of unqualified acceptance of, and exclusive dependence on, the mediation of the Son as alone securing the mercy of the Father. Both normally bear this whole weight of meaning, whether their grammatical object is God, Christ, the gospel, a truth, a promise, or is not expressed at all. Both signify commitment as following from conviction, even in contexts where faith is defined in terms of the latter only (e.g., compare Heb. 11:1 with the rest of the chapter). The nature of faith, according to the NT, is to live by the truth it receives; faith, resting on God's promise, gives thanks for God's grace by working for God's glory.

Faith

Some occasional contractions of this broad idea should be noticed:

1. James, alone of NT writers, uses both noun and verb to denote bare intellectual assent to truth (James 2:14–26). But here he is explicitly mimicking the usage of those whom he seeks to correct—Jewish converts, who may well have inherited their notion of faith from contemporary Jewish sources—and there is no reason to suppose that this usage was normal or natural to him (his reference to faith in 5:15, e.g., clearly carries a fuller meaning). In any case, the point he makes—namely, that a merely intellectual “faith,” such as the demons have, is inadequate—is wholly in line with the rest of the NT. For example, when James says, “Faith without deeds is dead” (2:26), he is saying the same as Paul, who says in essence, “Faith without works is not faith at all, but its opposite” (cf. Gal. 5:6; 1 Tim. 5:8).

2. Occasionally, by a natural transition, “the faith” denotes the body of truths believed (e.g., Rom. 1:5; Gal. 1:23; 1 Tim. 4:1, 6; Jude 3). This became standard usage in the second century.

3. From Christ himself derives a narrower use of “faith” for an exercise of trust that works miracles (Matt. 17:20–21; 1 Cor. 12:9; 13:2) or prompts the workings of miracles (Matt. 9:28–29; 15:28; Acts 14:9). Saving faith is not always accompanied by “miracle-faith,” however (1 Cor. 12:9), nor vice versa (cf. Matt. 7:22–23).

General Conception. Three points must be noted for the circumscribing of the biblical idea of faith:

Faith in God Involves Right Belief about God. The word faith in ordinary speech covers both credence of propositions (“beliefs”) and confidence in persons or things. In the latter case, some belief about the object trusted is the logical and psychological presupposition of the act of trust itself, for trust in a thing reflects a positive expectation about its behavior, and rational expectation is impossible if the thing's capacities for behavior are wholly unknown. Throughout the Bible trust in God is made to rest on the belief of what he has revealed concerning his character and purposes. In the NT, where faith in God is defined as trust in Christ, the acknowledgment of Jesus as the expected Messiah and the incarnate Son of God is regarded as basic to it. The writers allow that faith in some form can exist where as yet information about Jesus is incomplete (Acts 19:1–7; cf. Matt. 9:2, 22, 29; 15:28; Luke 7:50) but not where his divine identity and Christhood are consciously denied (1 John 2:22–23; 2 John 7–9); all that is possible then is idolatry (1 John 5:21), the worship of a man-made unreality. The frequency with which the Epistles depict faith as knowing, believing, and obeying “the truth” (2 Thess. 2:13; Titus 1:1; 1 Pet. 1:22) show that their authors regarded orthodoxy as faith's fundamental ingredient (cf. Gal. 1:8–9).

Faith Rests on Divine Testimony. Beliefs, as such, are convictions held on grounds, not of self-evidence, but of testimony. Whether particular beliefs should be treated as known certainties or doubtful opinions will depend on the worth of the testimony on which they are based. The Bible views faith's convictions as certainties and equates them with knowledge (1 John 3:2; 5:18–20), not because they spring from supposedly self-authenticating mystical experience, but because they rest on the testimony of a God who “does not lie” (Titus 1:2) and is therefore utterly trustworthy. The testimony of Christ to heavenly things (John 3:11, 31–32), and of prophets and apostles to Christ (Acts 10:39–43), is the testimony of God himself (1 John 5:9–12); this God-inspired witness is God's own witness (cf. 1 Cor. 2:10–13; 1 Thess. 2:13), in such a sense that to receive it is to certify that God is true (John 3:33), and to reject it is to make God a liar (1 John 5:10). Christian faith rests on the recognition of apostolic and biblical testimony as God's own testimony to his Son.

Faith Is a Supernatural Divine Gift. Sin and Satan have so blinded fallen humans (Eph. 4:18; 2 Cor. 4:4) that they cannot discern dominical and apostolic witness to be God's word, nor “see” and comprehend the realities of which it speaks (John 3:3; 1 Cor. 2:14), nor “come” in self-renouncing trust to Christ (John 6:44, 65), till the Holy Spirit has enlightened them (cf. 2 Cor. 4:6). Only the recipients of this divine “teaching,” “drawing,” and “anointing” come to Christ and abide in him (John 6:44–45; 1 John 2:20, 27). God is thus the author of all saving faith (Eph. 2:8; Phil. 1:29).

Biblical Presentation. Throughout Scripture, God's people live by faith; but the idea of faith develops as God's revelation of grace and truth, on which faith rests, enlarges. The OT variously defines faith as resting, trusting, and hoping in the Lord, cleaving to him, waiting for him, making him our shield and tower, taking refuge in him, etc. Psalmists and prophets, speaking in individual and national terms respectively, present faith as unwavering trust in God to save his servants from their foes and fulfill his declared purpose of blessing them. Isaiah, particularly, denounces reliance on human aid as inconsistent with such trust (Isa. 30:1–18). The NT regards the self-despairing hope, world-renouncing obedience, and heroic tenacity by which OT believers manifested their faith as a pattern Christians must reproduce (Rom. 4:11–25; Heb. 10:39–12:2). Continuity is avowed here, but also novelty; for faith, receiving God's new utterance in the words and deeds of Christ (Heb. 1:1–2), has become a knowledge of present salvation. Faith, so regarded, says Paul, first "came" with Christ (Gal. 3:23–25). The Gospels show Christ demanding trust in himself as bearing the messianic salvation. John is fullest on this, emphasizing (1) that faith ("believing on," "coming to," and "receiving" Christ) involves acknowledging Jesus not merely as a God-sent teacher and miracle worker (this is insufficient, John 2:23–24) but as God incarnate (John 20:28), whose atoning death is the sole means of salvation (John 3:14–15; 6:51–58); (2) that faith in Christ secures present enjoyment of "eternal life" in fellowship with God (John 5:24; 17:3). The Epistles echo this and present faith in various further relationships. Paul shows that faith in Christ is the only way to a right relationship with God, which human works cannot gain (see Romans and Galatians); Hebrews and 1 Peter present faith as the dynamic of hope and endurance under persecution.

History of Discussion. The church grasped from the first that assent to apostolic testimony is the fundamental element in Christian faith; hence the concern of both sides in the Gnostic controversy to show that their tenets were genuinely apostolic. During the patristic period, however, the idea of faith was so narrowed that this assent came to be regarded as the whole of it. Four factors together caused this: (1) the insistence of the anti-Gnostic fathers, particularly Tertullian, that the faithful are those who believe "the faith" as stated in the "rule of faith" (regula fidei), i.e., the Creed; (2) the intellectualism of Clement and Origen to whom pistis (assent on authority) was just an inferior substitute for, and stepping stone to, gnōsis (demonstrative knowledge) of spiritual things; (3) the assimilation of biblical morality to Stoic moralism, an ethic not of faith-full dependence but of resolute self-reliance; (4) the clothing of the biblical doctrine of communion with God in Neoplatonic dress, which made it appear as a mystical ascent to the supersensible achieved by aspiring love, having no link with the ordinary exercise of faith at all. Also, since the doctrine of justification was not understood, the soteriological significance of faith was misconceived, and faith (understood as orthodoxy) was regarded simply as the passport to baptism (remitting all past sins) and to a life-long probation in the church (giving the baptized opportunity to make themselves worthy of glory by their good works).

The scholastics refined this view. They reproduced the equation of faith with credence, distinguishing between fides informis ("unformed" faith, bare orthodoxy) and fides caritate formata (credence "formed" into a working principle by the supernatural addition to it of the distinct grace of love). Both sorts of faith, they held, are meritorious works, though the quality of merit attaching to the first is merely congruent (rendering divine reward fit, though not obligatory), and only the second gains condign merit (making divine reward due as a matter of justice). Roman Catholicism still formally identifies faith with credence and has added a further refinement by distinguishing between "explicit" faith (belief that knows its object) and "implicit" faith (uncomprehending assent to whatever it may be that the church holds). Only the latter (which is evidently no more than a vote of confidence in the teaching church and is compatible with complete ignorance of Christianity) is thought to be required of laypersons for salvation. But a mere docile disposition of this sort is poles apart from the biblical concept of saving faith.

The Reformers restored biblical perspectives by insisting that faith is more than orthodoxy—not fides merely, but fiducia, personal trust and confidence in God's mercy through Christ; that it is not a meritorious work, one facet of human righteousness, but rather an appropriating instrument, an empty hand outstretched to receive the free gift of God's righteousness in Christ; that faith is God-given and is itself the animating principle from which love and good works spontaneously spring; and that communion with God means not an exotic rapture of mystical ecstasy but just faith's everyday commerce with the Savior. Confessional Protestantism has always maintained these positions. In Arminianism there resides a tendency to depict faith as the human work upon which the pardon of sin is suspended—as, in fact, a person's contribution to his or her own salvation. This would be in effect a Protestant revival of the doctrine of human merit.

Liberalism radically psychologized faith, reducing it to a sense of contented harmony with the Infinite through Christ (Schleiermacher), or a fixed resolve to follow Christ's teaching (Ritschl), or both together. Liberal influence is reflected in the now widespread supposition that "faith," understood as an optimistic confidence in the friendliness of the universe, divorced from any specific creedal tenets, is a distinctively religious state of mind. Neo-orthodox and existentialist theologians, reacting against this psychologism, stress the supernatural origin and character of faith. They describe it as an active commitment of mind and will, humankind's repeated "yes" to the repeated summons to decision issued by God's word in Christ; but the elusiveness of their account of the content of that word makes it hard sometimes to see what the believer is thought to say yes to.

Faith

Clearly, each theologian's view of the nature and saving significance of faith will depend on the views he holds of the Scriptures and of God, humans, and their mutual relations. J. I. PACKER

Bibliography. D. M. Baillie, Faith in God; O. Becker and O. Michel, NIDNTT 1:587–606; G. C. Berkouwer, Faith and Justification; G. H. Box, HDCG 1:567–71; E. D. Burton, Galatians; B. Citron, New Birth; G. Ebeling, Nature of Faith; D. M. Emmet, Philosophy and Faith; J. Hick, Faith and Knowledge; J. G. Machen, What Is Faith?; B. B. Warfield, Biblical and Theological Studies; A. Weiser, TDNT 1:827–38.

Faith, Gift of. See SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

Faithfulness. Faithfulness characterizes God's loyalty to his covenant people and becomes a divine requirement pressing upon humans the need for a similar loyalty in their relationship with God. The Hebrew term 'āman (in various forms) conveys this notion with the meaning "firmness," "fixity," or "stability." The LXX introduced the idea of "trustworthiness," sometimes translating 'āman with alētheia, although the usual term (employed sixty-seven times in the NT) was pistos, from the frequent term pistos (faith).

Perhaps the most important OT theme in this regard is the connection between God's faithfulness and his covenant love (hesed). Deuteronomy 7:9 says, "Know therefore that the LORD your God is God; he is the faithful God, keeping his covenant of love to a thousand generations of those who love him and keep his commands" (cf. Gen. 24:27; Exod. 34:6). The stress on this found in the Psalms is especially noteworthy; "All the ways of the LORD are loving and faithful" (Ps. 25:10; cf. 40:10–11; 85:10; 88:11; 115:1; esp. 136), and this faithfulness of God becomes the basis of appeals for divine aid (Pss. 40:11; 54:5; 57:3; 69:13; 86:15–16; 143:11–12; esp. 89). In this connection it is God's faithfulness to his covenant people that enables the prophets to assure Israel of God's continuing trustworthiness in spite of impending disaster. Hosea eloquently uses a marriage metaphor to this end: "I will betroth you to me forever; I will betroth you in righteousness and justice, in love and compassion. I will betroth you in faithfulness" (Hos. 2:19–20; cf. Isa. 49:7; Jer. 32:41; Mic. 7:20).

Faithfulness is also to be found among God's people. In the OT, however, while God's loyalty to his people is a gracious act, human loyalty to God is a "dutiful response" (Verhey). This faithfulness is not required to sustain God's favor or covenant love; it is simply the only appropriate response open to humans. Hence, in numerous psalms faithfulness is paralleled to obedience to divine law (Pss. 111:7–8; 119:30). Also, the connection between faithfulness and hesed (steadfast love) appears here as well, but only as a feature of a person's relation to the covenant community (Prov. 3:3; 14:22; 16:6). It is incumbent on God's people, therefore, to exhibit a reciprocal faithfulness that reflects the trustworthiness already shown by God.

The NT affirms this completely. The faithfulness of God confirms the Christian in his calling (1 Cor. 1:9), especially in that God remains loyal to all his promises (Heb. 11:11; cf. 10:23). God faithfully preserves his people until Christ's second coming (1 Thess. 5:23) and offers strength in temptation (1 Cor. 10:13), before evil (2 Thess. 3:3), and in the turmoil of suffering (1 Pet. 4:19). The tenacity of God's faithfulness takes on dimensions of his OT covenant love that cannot be moved by humankind's erratic commitment: "if we are faithless, he will remain faithful, for he cannot disown himself" (2 Tim. 2:13). Since Jesus reflects this disposition of God, the Apocalypse gives pistos a titular significance for him: Jesus is the faithful and true one (Rev. 3:14; 19:11, pistos kai alēthinos).

Faithfulness also hallmarks the life of the Christian. Various leaders are given the approving description of being "faithful": Tychicus (Eph. 6:21; Col. 4:7), Epaphras (Col. 1:7; 4:12), Onesimus (Col. 4:9), and Timothy (1 Cor. 4:17). Hebrews is consistent in its Christology and presents Christ as the model of faithfulness (2:17; 3:2, 5–6), which in turn should give encouragement to the believer. For Paul, faithfulness is especially incumbent on the witness and minister. Paul himself had been deemed thus (1 Tim. 1:12), and from this he can explain his pastoral calling. Likewise, Timothy is exhorted to appoint teachers in whom faithfulness is a prominent characteristic. Ultimately, faithfulness to God and his people is a virtue generated by the Spirit (Gal. 5:22) that should be at the center of normative Christian experience.

In biblical theology, therefore, faithfulness lies at the heart of the covenant relationship. God pledges consistent fidelity to his promises, and this is why he expresses himself through covenants. God pledges a lasting relationship, and we are invited—indeed, called—to commit our lives with a commensurate faithfulness.

G. M. BURGE

See also GOD, DOCTRINE OF; LOVINGKINDNESS.

Bibliography. R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament; J. Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion; O. Michel, NIDNTT 1:593–606; A. D. Verhey, ISBE (rev.) 2:273–75; A. Weiser and R. Bultmann, TDNT 6:174–228.

Faith Healing. See HEAL, HEALING.

Fall of the Human Race. The fall denotes Adam and Eve's disobedience and commission of sin that brought tragic spiritual, physical, and social deprivation to the entire human race. Genesis 3 contains the record of the fall in stark simplicity. That the account is firmly historical (so Tertullian, Athanasius, Augustine, Calvin, et al.) is confirmed by Paul's juxtaposition of the "one man" Adam with Moses and with Christ (Rom. 5:12, 15–19; cf. 1 Cor. 15:20–22) and by the apostle's face-value acceptance of the reality of the tempter and the ensuing temptation (2 Cor. 11:3; 1 Tim. 2:14). In addition, Luke traces the genealogy of Jesus, the universal man, from Joseph through David to Adam.

Biblical Account. Genesis 1 and 2 depict the first couple as sinless persons created in the image of God for fellowship with their Creator. Adam and Eve were endowed with intellect, emotion, and a will, which, although inclined toward God, was free either to obey or disobey. God placed the first couple in the garden under a probationary arrangement whereby their obedience and loyalty to God would be tested. To be authentically human, Adam and Eve must have the opportunity to choose between loyalty to God or to self. The reward of obedience would be confirmation in holiness as spiritual children of God, and the wages of disobedience would be spiritual and physical death. In the state of probation Adam acted not only for himself but representatively for the entire race.

Adam's probation centered around two trees—the tree of life and the tree of the knowledge of good and evil (Gen. 2:9). God's command to Adam was clear. He could freely eat of every tree except the tree of the knowledge of good and evil; but should he eat of the latter, he would die (Gen. 2:16–17). Since no reason is given why Adam should not eat the fruit of the tree of knowledge, we may assume that it stood as a test of obedience. Through their choices made in respect of the trees, Adam and Eve were confronted with the will of God to which they must respond with a yes or no.

The two trees possessed no intrinsic potency but only symbolic import. The tree of life symbolized eternal life in fellowship with God (cf. Rev. 2:7; 22:2, 14). Had the first couple eaten obediently of the tree of life instead of the tree of knowledge, they would have secured everlasting life as the reward of their faith. If the fruit of the tree of knowledge was eaten in disobedience to God, it would impart experiential ethical knowledge. J. Gresham Machen avers that before the fall Adam knew only good, but by disobediently eating he would come to know evil, whereas the good would become but a distant memory. Clearly, God's prohibition against eating was a test of their loyalty and obedience. Would Adam and Eve submit to God's will, or would they assert their own will independently of the Creator?

Our first parents, who possessed everything for the realization of their destiny, were enticed by the serpent (Gen. 3:1). Rather than a figurative description for Satan (Buswell), the serpent was the instrument of the devil's dark working (Hodge, Berkhof). The real tempter, the devil (1 John 3:8; Rev. 12:9), in the guise of a serpent, beguiled Eve first to distrust God's goodness (Gen. 3:1–3) and then to disbelieve God's word (Gen. 3:4–5). The devil is the "father of lies" (John 8:44). Enticed by the serpent, Eve saw that the tree was "good for food," "pleasing to the eye," and "desirable for gaining wisdom" (Gen. 3:6). The attraction of the tree of knowledge could be likened to the material ("cravings of sinful man"), aesthetic ("lust of his eyes"), and intellectual ("boasting of what he has and does") aspects of the world's allurements (1 John 2:16). Seduced by Satan, Eve was struck with ambition, pride, and the quest for self-realization apart from God.

The fall of the first couple is narrated simply and briefly. Eve "took some [of the fruit] and ate it. She also gave some to her husband, who was with her, and he ate it" (Gen. 3:6). Various Jewish and Christian authorities interpret the tree of knowledge as the rise of sexual awareness and eating of the forbidden fruit as sexual intercourse. But since Eve and Adam each ate independently, and since God had earlier commanded them to be fruitful and multiply (Gen. 1:28; cf. 2:24), this interpretation must be rejected. More likely is the assertion that when faced with the choice of submitting to God's will or unlawfully asserting her own will, Eve chose the latter. First Eve and then Adam violated the divine command by eating the forbidden fruit, thus disclosing their decision to forge their future independently of God. Through this free act of the will sin entered the human family through Adam and Eve, the progenitors of the race.

The Results. The rest of Genesis 3 unfolds the disastrous consequences of the fall. First are the effects of sin on Adam and Eve, and by divine imputation, upon the race as a whole. Immediately following their willful transgression, Adam and Eve experienced guilt, evidenced by attempts to make garments to cover their nakedness. Efforts to hide themselves from the Lord's presence suggest that Adam and Eve suffered a breach in relationship with God, or spiritual death. The pair's evasive answers to God's interrogation and their casting of blame on the other further illustrate the depravity that had overcome their hearts. Finally, the fall resulted in physical death, or the dissolution of the body-soul unity (vv. 22–24). Adam and Eve were driven out of the garden and prevented from eating of the tree of life, by means of which they would have lived forever in that condition. The cherubim and flaming sword guarding the tree of life symbolize the barrier that now exists between sinful persons and a holy God.

Fall of the Human Race

Humankind after the fall suffers extensive spiritual deprivation. Although the image of God in man survives (Gen. 9:6), reason has lost its soundness (2 Cor. 4:4), the will no longer is free to choose God and the good (John 8:34), and sinners are spiritually blind (1 Cor. 2:14) and dead (Eph. 2:1, 5). Once able not to sin (posse non peccare), the unregenerate now are incapable of not sinning (non posse non peccare, Jer. 13:23; 2 Pet. 2:14). Paul outlines humankind's grim life of sin following the fall in Romans 1:21–32 and 3:9–18. In response to sinners' deliberate love for and practice of sin, God "gave them over" to the painful consequences of their rebellion (Rom. 1:24, 26, 28).

The results of the fall to Satan and the serpent follow (Gen. 3:14–15). Because the reptile served as the instrument of Satan's deception, God cursed it above all the creatures. The repulsion that people sense when confronted with a snake would seem to be a consequence of God's curse upon it. The prophecy then is given that Satan is doomed to be crushed. A perpetual enmity exists between the devil and the line of spiritual humanity that culminated in Christ. Satan would inflict injury on the people of God, but the seed of the woman would deliver a fatal wound on the archenemy of the saints. Christ's cross and resurrection struck a mighty blow upon Satan (Col. 2:15), but his final doom awaits the Lord's second advent (Rom. 16:20; Rev. 20:2).

The fall would have implications for the female (Gen. 3:16) as well. With the onset of sin and death as the law of human existence, women must bear children with the consequent pain of childbirth. In God's plan the woman would also experience psychosexual desire for her husband. The fall likewise affected the existence of the man (Gen. 3:17–19). The ground would offer resistance to cultivation efforts, exacting toil and sweat to make it produce. God foresaw that in a fallen world labor would serve as a brake upon sin. Moreover, in fulfillment of Genesis 2:17, man was condemned to death. Raised from the dust to live, man as sinner was now ordered to return to the same dust in death.

The fall's effects impinge even upon the inanimate creation, as God cursed the ground on which humans tread. Paul taught that since the rebellion, the entire material universe languishes in a state of dysfunction (Rom. 8:20–22). The effects of the fall of Adam and Eve are truly cosmic in scope.

Finally, the fall of Adam and humanity in him (Rom. 5:12, 15–19; 1 Cor. 15:21–22) impacted God who created the man and woman. God's act of making clothing of skins for Adam and Eve (Gen. 3:21) suggests that God began the long process of covering sin, first by the sacrifice of animals and then through the sacrifice of his own Son (2 Cor. 5:4).

The Fall and Theology. The historical reality and import of the fall have been denied in some circles. Judaism generally holds that Adam's transgression affected only Adam and that it resulted in physical, not spiritual, death. Pelagians likewise claim that Adam's sin had no impact on his offspring. Humans are born into the world, they argued, morally capable of obeying God and performing the good. Modern liberalism, postulating an evolutionary ascent of the human race, uniformly denies the historicity of Adam's fall and the hereditary transmission of sin. Neo-orthodox theologians such as Barth and Brunner argue that the Genesis account of the fall is a saga or legend rather than history. According to Barth, Adam is a general title for Everyman. We dare not ask how, when, or where the fall occurred. As an event in primal history (Urgeschichte), the fall conveys the fundamental truth that humans are subject to the law of sin and death. Augustine, the Reformers, and Reformed evangelicals aver that Adam's sin corrupted the entire human family (Rom. 5:12–21; 1 Cor. 15:21–22). Following Augustine, some hold that original sin and guilt transmitted from Adam to the human race by genetic mechanisms (seminal theory). Others, indebted to covenant theology, believe that Adam's sin was reckoned to the human race by divine imputation, much as Christ's righteousness was reckoned to those who believe (representative theory). B. DEMAREST

See also ADAM; DEPRAVITY, TOTAL; SIN.

Bibliography. G. C. Berkouwer, Sin; D. Bonhoeffer, Creation and Fall; E. Brunner, Scandal of Christianity; J. Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion; C. S. Lewis, Problem of Pain; M. Luther, Bondage of the Will; B. Ramm, Offense to Reason; H. S. Smith, Changing Conceptions of Original Sin; N. P. Williams, Ideas of the Fall and of Original Sin.

False Christs. This expression, formed on the analogy of "false apostles" (2 Cor. 11:13) and "false brothers" (2 Cor. 11:26), is derived from the Greek pseudochristoi and is used in Matthew 24:24 and Mark 13:22 to denominate those who falsely claim to be Israel's deliverer. Gamaliel alludes to a revolt (A.D. 6) led by a Judas of Galilee and to a certain Theudas who perished with four hundred followers (Acts 5:36–37). The military tribune (Acts 21:38) mentions a certain Egyptian who led four thousand daggersmen (sikarioi) to the Mount of Olives and bade his followers wait until, at his command, the Temple walls fell down, as in John's day when God directly intervened. When this did not happen, the Egyptian conveniently hid himself. The tribune erroneously thought that the Jewish leaders had identified Paul as the Egyptian and were exacting vengeance for his self-imposed exile. During the revolt against Rome, John of Giscala, leader of the Zealots, and Simon bar Gioras (i.e., son of the proselyte) opposed one another with ruinous consequences terminating in the debacle of A.D. 70. The last of the false Christs in the early Christian era was Simon bar Cochba (A.D. 132–35), to whom Rabbi Akiba said Numbers 24:17 referred.

In its broader application, as the phrase “in my name” (Matt. 24:5) suggests, the term “false Christs” suggests a problem prompted by consideration of the apparent contradiction between Jesus’ claims to lordship and the sometimes disappointing evidence of his sovereignty inside history. The temptation is to have the chasm bridged by more patent demonstrations of Jesus’ sovereignty rather than to live at the present time in constant faith that Jesus Christ’s purposes ripen most fully not in the present age but after history as we know it has drawn to a close.

F. W. DANKER

See also ANTICHRIST; SECOND COMING OF CHRIST.

Bibliography. G. R. Beasley-Murray, Commentary on Mark Thirteen; J. J. Collins, Scepter and the Star: The Messiahs of the Dead Sea Scrolls and Other Ancient Literature; J. Moffatt, HDCG 1:600–602.

Farrar, Frederic William (1831–1903). Anglican writer and theologian. Born in Bombay, son of a missionary clergyman, he was educated at London and Cambridge universities, and was greatly influenced by the thinking of S. T. Coleridge and F. D. Maurice. He was ordained in 1854 and was for more than twenty years a schoolmaster, in which field his pioneering methods led to his election (rare for a churchman) as a fellow of the Royal Society. He later became canon (1876) and archdeacon (1883) of Westminster.

In 1877 Farrar aroused controversy over a series of five sermons he preached in Westminster Abbey on the soul and the future life, in the course of which he challenged the doctrine of eternal punishment. The sermons were published as Eternal Hope (1878) and ran to eighteen editions before his death. E. B. Pusey, the Tractarian leader, was among many who replied, and Farrar to some extent modified his position in Mercy and Judgment (1881). While he could never quite discard his evangelical upbringing, it was Farrar who suggested that Charles Darwin be buried in Westminster Abbey, and he himself preached the funeral sermon on the scientist’s life and character. Farrar wrote a number of other books, notably a Life of Christ (1876), which proved immensely popular in America, and a Life of Saint Paul (1879), which also had a great impact on Victorian England. Some of Farrar’s more liberal views had a brief vogue among United Presbyterians in Scotland.

J. D. DOUGLAS

Bibliography. J. D. Douglas, ed., Who’s Who in Christian History; R. Farrar, Life of Frederic William Farrar.

Farrer, Austin Marsden (1904–1968). Administrator, pastor and preacher, NT scholar, philosopher, theologian, poet, and author. He did his undergraduate studies at Oxford University and was made a doctor of divinity by the university. He was the chaplain of Trinity College, Oxford (1925–60), and warden of Keble College, Oxford (1960–68). He delivered the Bampton Lectures in 1948 and the Gifford Lectures in 1957. His published works include sermons, devotional books, theology, philosophy of religion, and Bible commentaries.

These books reveal a man bringing together faith and reason and a philosopher-theologian-scholar who was concerned for matters of the heart as well as the mind. His sermons in particular show his concern for both theology and spirituality. For twenty-five years he and C. S. Lewis were Oxford dons together; they shared an affection and appreciation for one another. What Farrer said of Lewis could also be said of Farrer: He could think about all that he strongly felt, and he could feel the realities about which he thought. At the core of his theological understanding was the conviction that belief in God must be lived as well as thought; but without being thought it cannot be lived. Theology and practice cannot be separated.

Farrer, the son of a Baptist minister, converted to Anglicanism as a young man. For Farrer, to be Anglican was to be catholic. He avoided ecclesiastical party loyalties but described his understanding of Christianity as Reformed. His intention was to be orthodox in his theology and to center the faith on Christ.

Of Farrer’s many books, Glass of Vision is the most important for seeing the wide range of his thought.

S. N. GUNDRY

Bibliography. P. Curtis, Hawk Among Sparrows: A Biography of Austin Farrer; J. C. Eaton, Logic of Theism: Analysis of the Thought of Austin Farrer; J. C. Eaton and A. Loades, eds., For God and Clarity: New Essays in Honor of Austin Farrer; C. C. Hefling Jr., Jacob’s Ladder: Theology and Spirituality in the Thought of Austin Farrer.

Fast, Fasting. The act of total or partial abstinence from food for a limited period of time, usually undertaken for moral or religious reasons. Religious dicta concerning fasting range from Zoroastrianism, which forbade it, to Jainism, which teaches that the believer’s goal is a life of passionless detachment culminating ideally in death by voluntary starvation.

Nearly all religions promote or sanction fasting in some form or another. In primal religions it is often a means to control or appease the gods, a way to produce virility, or preparation for a ceremonial observance—such as initiation or mourning. The fast was used by the ancient Greeks when consulting oracles, by the American Indians to acquire their private totem, and by African shamans to make contact with spirits. Many Eastern religions use it to gain clarity of vision and mystical insight. Judaism, several branches of Christianity, and Islam all have fixed fast days and usually associate fasting with the discipline of the flesh or with repentance for sin. Islam undertakes the annual fast of Ramadan, an entire month when Muslims are obliged to abstain from all food and water from sunrise to sunset.

Fast, Fasting

In Judaism the day of atonement is the only public fast day prescribed by the law (Lev. 16:29–31; 23:26–32; Num. 29:7–11). However, the OT also refers to many special public and private fasts, usually coupled with prayer, to signify mourning (1 Sam. 31:13; 2 Sam. 1:12), to show repentance and remorse (2 Sam. 12:15–23; 1 Kings 21:27–29; Neh. 9:1–2; Joel 2:12–13), or to demonstrate serious concern before God (2 Chron. 20:1–4; Pss. 35:13; 69:10; 109:24; Dan. 9:3). Fasting that was not accompanied by genuine repentance and righteous deeds was denounced as an empty legal observance by the prophets (Isa. 58; Jer. 14:11–12).

Jesus himself fasted during his so-called wilderness experience as a part of the preparation for his formal ministry (Matt. 4:1–2; Luke 4:1–2). The Gospels report, however, that he spoke only twice about fasting—once to warn his disciples that it was to be a private act of simple devotion to God and once to indicate that it would be appropriate for his followers to fast after he left them (Matt. 6:16–18; 9:14–15; cf. Mark 2:18–20; Luke 5:33–35). It is clear that he did not stress fasting, nor did he lay down any rules concerning its observance as had John the Baptist and the Pharisees for their disciples.

The early Christian community did not emphasize fasting but observed it in connection with certain occasions of solemn commitment (Acts 13:2–3; 14:23). Moreover, Jewish Christians apparently followed the Jewish custom of fasting and prayer on Mondays and Thursdays until around the end of the first century when Wednesdays and Fridays were observed, probably in reaction against the Judaizers. Such fasts were usually concluded by midafternoon and were not universally enforced. Also, from the second century on, two intensive fast days were observed in preparation for Easter.

In the fourth century, when Christianity finally became the only recognized faith of the Roman Empire, the consequent institutionalization of the church led to a much greater stress on form, ritual, and liturgy. Fasting thus became increasingly linked with a legalistic theology and the concept of meritorious works. For example, the early church's two-day fast before Easter came, in the fourth century, to be a Lenten observance of forty fast days, which by the tenth century was obligatory upon the entire Western church. In addition, fasting was a common element of discipline in the early monastic communities from the second century onward. When the monastic way replaced martyrdom as the highest act of devotion of the Christian life in the fourth century, monastic practices such as fasting were also elevated in the eyes of the faithful.

The church of Rome added a number of fast days to the calendar of the Christian year during the Middle Ages. It adopted the days of the chief agricultural operations in Italy as obligatory fasts called ember days: the Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday following the first Sunday in Lent; Pentecost; and September 14. A fourth season of fasting from December 13 to Christmas was added later. Also during the Middle Ages the Eastern Orthodox Church added obligatory fast days beginning November 15 during Advent, from Trinity Sunday until June 29, and the two weeks prior to August 15.

The Protestant Reformers of the sixteenth century, with the exception of the Anglicans, rejected obligatory fast days along with much of the other prescribed ritual and formal religious acts of the Roman Church. The Anabaptists, more than any other reform group of the period, relegated fasting once more to the private sphere, leaving it up to the individual believer to determine its appropriateness for enhancing self-discipline and prayer.

The Roman Catholic Church maintained its church calendar of fast days until the twentieth century, when it was modified by several acts related to Vatican Council II. Moreover, the modern Catholic approach has been to link fasting to the call to love one's neighbor and to see it as a symbol of the Christian's identification with the poor and hungry of the world. In some Christian circles—Catholic and non-Catholic, evangelical and nonevangelical—there is the growing custom of meeting for a simple repast and giving the cost of the normal meal to relieve world hunger as a kind of modern-day version of fasting. Twentieth-century Pentecostal charismatics have written extensively about the benefits of the fast, nearly always linking it with prayer, as a means to deepen spiritual life and/or to obtain God's favor. Some charismatic leaders even claim that the course of history can be shaped by prayer and fasting.

As with any religious practice, there are dangers in fasting, especially when emphasized at the expense of other biblical teachings or misused for selfish ends. The Bible notes such abuses as fasting as a means of getting things from God, as a substitute for genuine repentance, as a mere convention and therefore an end in itself, and as an occasion for outward religiosity (Isa. 58; Zech. 7:5; Matt. 6:16). Moreover, there is psychological evidence that fasting lends itself to self-induced visions that sometimes prove harmful. On the other hand, there is biblical evidence that fasting and prayer practiced together can be a useful part of individual and congregational life, though the practice should never be allowed to degenerate into an empty formal observance or a device for attempting to manipulate God.

R. D. LINDER

Bibliography. J. L. Beall, Adventure of Fasting; A. Cott et al., Fasting: A Way of Life; D. Dewelt, What the Bible Says about Prayer and Fasting; H. Franke, Lent and Easter; A. M. Fulton, ed., Fasting Primer; D. Prince, Shaping History through Prayer and Fasting; E. N. Rogers, Fasting: The Phenomenon of Self-Denial; A. Wallis, God's Chosen Fast.

Fate, Fatalism. Fate, personified by the Greeks under the name of Moira, signified in the ancient world the unseen power that rules over human destiny. In classical thought fate was believed to be superior to the gods, since even they were unable to defy its all-encompassing power. Fate is not chance, which may be defined as the absence of laws, but instead a cosmic determinism that has no ultimate meaning or purpose. In classical thought as well as in Oriental religion, fate is a dark, sinister power related to the tragic vision of life. It connotes not the absence of freedom but the subjection of freedom. It is the transcendent necessity in which freedom is entangled (Tillich). Fate is blind, inscrutable, and inescapable.

Christianity substituted for the Hellenistic concept of fate the doctrine of divine providence. Whereas fate is the portentous, impersonal power that thwarts and overrules human freedom, providence liberates people to fulfill the destiny for which they were created. Fate means the abrogation of freedom; providence means the realization of authentic freedom through submission to divine guidance. Providence is the direction and support of a loving God, which makes life ultimately bearable; fate is the rule of contingency that casts a pall over all human striving. Whereas fate makes the future precarious and uncertain, providence fills the future with hope. Fate is impersonal and irrational; providence is supremely personal and suprarational.

Fatalism was present among the ancient Stoics, and it pervades much of the thought of Hinduism, Buddhism, and Islam. Modern philosophers who have entertained ideas akin to fate are Oswald Spengler, Herbert Spencer, John Stuart Mill, and Arthur Schopenhauer.

D. G. BLOESCH

See also PROVIDENCE OF GOD.

Bibliography. W. L. Craig, Only Wise God: The Compatibility of Divine Foreknowledge and Human Freedom; J. Den Boeft, Calcidius on Fate; W. C. Greene, Moira: Fate, Good and Evil in Greek Thought; R. Guardini, Freedom, Grace, and Destiny; J. Owens, Human Destiny: Some Problems for Catholic Philosophy; H. Ringgren, ed., Fatalistic Beliefs in Religion, Folklore, and Literature; P. Tillich, Courage to Be: Protestant Era.

Father, God as. There is nothing in the Bible to support the heathen notion of a literal divine fatherhood of clans or nations. Several passages of Scripture imply that God is the Father of angels and humans as their Creator (Job 1:6; 2:1; 38:7; Luke 3:38). But it is chiefly in connection with Israel, the Davidic king, and Messiah that references to the fatherhood of God occur in the OT. By the historical event of deliverance from Egypt, God created the nation of Israel and subsequently cared for them, establishing a special relationship with them. Allusions to his fatherly regard for them look back to this crisis as the time of the nation's origin. Their emancipation marked them off from other people as his adopted children. His care for them is frequently compared to that of a father (Deut. 1:31; 8:5; 14:1; 2 Sam. 7:14; Pss. 2:7; 89:26; Isa. 1:2; Hos. 11:1). On the other hand, a response of filial love expressed in obedience was required from them (Jer. 3:9; Mal. 1:6), and since it was so often refused, a more restricted conception of the fatherhood of God resulted. According to this deeper view, he is the Father of the God-fearing among the nation rather than of the nation as a whole (Ps. 103:13; Mal. 3:17).

This later mode of thought finds expression also in the literature of the intertestamental period (Jub. 1:24; Ps. Sol. 13:8; 17:30; Eccclus. 23:1, 4) and is endorsed by the teaching of Jesus. He gave largely increased prominence to the doctrine of the fatherhood of God. The number of instances of the word "Father" as applied to God in the Gospels is more than double the number found in the remaining books of the NT. In the Gospel of John alone 111 occur. Two points in connection with Jesus' use of this title are of special interest. (1) He never joins his disciples with himself in allusions to his relationship with the Father in such a way as to suggest that their relationship to God is of the same kind. He was aware of standing in an intimate and unparalleled relation. He claimed to be the preexistent eternal Son, equal with the Father, who became incarnate for the fulfillment of his purpose of salvation, being appointed by him sole mediator between God and humans (Matt. 11:27; John 5:22; 8:58; 10:30, 38; 14:9; 16:28). (2) When he speaks of God as the Father of others, he almost always refers to his disciples. While accepting the teaching of the OT that all persons are children of God by creation and receive his providential kindness (Matt. 5:45), he also taught that sin has brought about a change in people, necessitating rebirth and reconciliation to God (John 3:3; 8:42; 14:6). In accordance with this, the apostles teach that one becomes a child of God by faith in Christ and thus receives the Spirit of adoption (John 1:12; Rom. 8:15; Gal. 3:16; 4:5). Sonship leads to likeness and inheritance (Matt. 5:16; Rom. 8:17, 29; 1 John 3:2). The Father is revealed as sovereign, holy, righteous, and merciful. Prayer may confidently be offered to him in Jesus' name (Matt. 6:32; John 14:14; 17:11, 25).

Father, God as

W. J. CAMERON

See also ABBA; GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF; GOD, DOCTRINE OF; GOD, NAMES OF.

Bibliography. G. Dalman, Words of Jesus; P. T. Forsyth, God the Holy Father; R. Hammerton-Kelly, God the Father; J. Jeremias, New Testament Theology: The Proclamation of Jesus; J. S. Lidgett, Fatherhood of God; T. W. Manson, Teaching of Jesus; J. B. Metz and E. Schillebeeckx, eds., God as Father?; A. P. F. Sell, God Our Father; T. A. Smail, Forgotten Father.

Fathers, Church. Ecclesiastically, the fathers are those who have preceded us in the faith and are thus able to instruct us in it. In this sense, ministers and particularly bishops are often referred to as fathers. More particularly, however, the term has come to be applied to the first Christian writers of acknowledged eminence. Already in the fourth century it was used in this way of the teachers of the preceding epoch, and later all the outstanding theologians of at least the first six centuries have come to be regarded as fathers. This is the normal usage of the term today, although sometimes the patristic era is extended and Protestants may also speak of the Reformation fathers (e.g., Luther, Zwingli, and Calvin).

The question arises how a given author may be classified as a father. The mere survival of his work is not enough, for many heretical writings have come down to us, together with others of doubtful value. Four main characteristics have been suggested as necessary qualifications: first, substantial orthodoxy; second, holiness of life; third, widespread approval; and fourth, antiquity. It is allowed that fathers may be in error on individual points, as necessitated by the many disagreements, but they can still be counted and read as fathers so long as they satisfy these general requirements (cf. esp. the cases of Origen and Tertullian).

Various answers may be given to the question of patristic authority. From the Roman Catholic standpoint, the fathers are infallible where they display unanimous consent, although even in this regard Aquinas clearly ranks them below Scripture. Otherwise they may err but are always to be read with respect. Protestants naturally insist that the fathers too are subject to the supreme norm of Scripture, so that their statements or interpretations may call for rejection, correction, or amplification. On the other hand, they deserve serious consideration as those who have preceded us in faith and made a serious attempt to express biblical and apostolic truth. Their support is thus valuable, their opinions demand careful study, they are to be set aside only for good reason, and their work constitutes no less a challenge to us than ours to them.

To list the fathers is hardly possible in so brief a compass, nor is it easy to classify them except perhaps in terms of the broad distinction between Greek and Latin. Mention may be made of the immediate postapostolic fathers who have given us our earliest Christian literature outside the NT (e.g., Clement of Rome, Ignatius of Antioch, and Polycarp). The Alexandrian school (Clement and Origen) at the end of the second and early in the third century deserves notice, as do such writers as Irenaeus, Tertullian, Hippolytus, and Cyprian. The fourth century, which was already referring to the fathers, provides us with some of the greatest of all in men like Athanasius, Hilary, Basil, Gregory of Nyssa, Gregory of Nazianzus, Ambrose, Augustine, Chrysostom, and Jerome. Among others who may be mentioned are the Cyrils, Theodoret, the two popes Leo I and Gregory I, and at the very end of the patristic period John of Damascus and Isidore of Seville. But these are only a selection from the great company of writers who over a wide and complex front gave to the church its earliest magnificent attempt in theology.

G. W. BROMILEY

See also AMBROSE; AUGUSTINE OF HIPPO; CAPADOCIAN FATHERS; CHRYSOSTOM, JOHN; CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA; CYPRIAN; CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA; GREGORY I THE GREAT; HIPPOLYTUS; ORIGEN; TERTULLIAN.

Bibliography. B. Altaner, Patrology; G. W. Bromiley, Historical Theology; F. L. Cross, Early Christian Fathers; F. W. Farrar, Lives of the Fathers; J. N. D. Kelley, Early Christian Doctrines; G. W. H. Lampe, "Christian Theology in the Patristic Period," in History of Christian Doctrine, H. Cunliffe-Jones, ed.; J. Quasten, Patrology; A. Roberts and J. Donaldson, Ante-Nicene Fathers; H. Von Campenhausen, Fathers of the Greek Church; Fathers of the Latin Church.

Feasts and Festivals, Christian. See CHRISTIAN YEAR; FIXED FEAST; MOVABLE FEAST.

Feasts and Festivals, Old Testament. The general word for festival is mō'ēd (pl. mō'ādīm). The word signifies a place or a time that has been set apart for a particular purpose. In cultic usage it may form a compound ("tent of meeting," 'ōhel/mō'ēd) or have a designation of a time appointed for a religious festival. Festivals are characterized by several qualities: great joy, except for the day of atonement; special offerings and sacrifices (Lev. 23:37–38; Num. 28, 29); special prayers (Isa. 1:14–15); special ceremonies for each of the festivals, such as eating of unleavened bread or bringing of firstfruits. The Pentateuchal festivals are Sabbath; the New Moon; Passover; Weeks; the New Year; the Day of Atonement; and Tabernacles. The postexilic festivals are Purim and Hanukkah. All feasts are festivals, but not all festivals are feasts.

The word feast comes from the root hgg (to celebrate) and is related to the root hûg (to circle). The roots hgg and hûg are so closely related that it is difficult to ascertain to which the word “feast” is related. Though all festivals except for the Day of Atonement were times of celebration and rejoicing, only three festivals are designated as feasts. Each is a pilgrimage feast: (1) Passover, Unleavened Bread (Heb. pesah); (2) Firstfruits, Harvest, Weeks (Heb. šābū’ôt); (3) Tabernacles, Booths, Ingathering, Succoth (Heb. sukkôt).

Prescriptive Texts. The shortest regulation on the festivals is given in Exodus 23:14–17, where they are listed as the Feasts of Unleavened Bread, Harvest, and Ingathering. The requirement at each feast is that all males appear before the Lord. The times and offerings are not given. A more extensive regulation of the feasts is given in Exodus 34:18–23. The Feast of Unleavened Bread is to be celebrated for seven days in the month Abib. The Feast of Weeks is at the conclusion of the wheat harvest, and the Feast of Ingathering at the turning of the year. Again, each feast is an occasion at which all males must come before the Lord, but the location is not specified. From all appearances the feasts are agricultural feasts. Only in Deuteronomy is the place of assembly more specifically referred to as “the place he will choose” (16:16). In Deuteronomy 16:1–17 the three feasts are called Passover, connected with the Feast of Unleavened Bread (vv. 1–8, 16); the Feast of Weeks, celebrated seven weeks after the harvest of the first ears of grain (vv. 9–12); and the Feast of Tabernacles, which is also a harvest festival (vv. 13–15). The emphasis is very much on rejoicing (vv. 11, 14) because of the abundance of Yahweh’s blessings (vv. 10, 15, 17). Hence, the pilgrimage feasts are opportune times for bringing a gift in accordance with the blessing of Yahweh to the place which he will choose (vv. 16–17). In Leviticus the regulations are more clearly set forth pertaining to calendar, rituals, and offerings. The pilgrimage feasts are integrated into an extensive list of festivals that includes the Sabbath, the Feast of Trumpets, and the Day of Atonement. The regulations also speak of days of rest or “sacred assemblies,” when absolutely no work was to be done. For the development of the interpretation of the prescriptive texts and the practices in Judaism, see the Mishnaic tractate Mô’ed.

The Jewish Festival Calendar. Festival of the New Moon (Rōš Hōdeš). Held on the first of each month, the Festival of the New Moon was a minor festival. It was a day of gladness (Num.

10:10). Fasting was prohibited. There were prescribed sacrifices (Num. 28:11–15; cf. Ezek. 46:6–8). Work was permitted in Jewish practice (Babylonian Talmud, tractate Ḥagigah, 18a), but since it became customary to rest (Amos 8:5) or at least to refrain from heavy labor, it became an opportune time for special gatherings (1 Sam. 20:5–6; 2 Kings 4:23; Neh. 10:33). In order to celebrate the new moon uniformly in the diaspora, two witnesses had to appear before the high court in Jerusalem to testify that they had seen the crescent of the moon. Thus, the Jews throughout the diaspora were informed by beacons lighted on mountains or by runners.

Feast of Passover and Unleavened Bread (Pesah, Maššôt). This was held on the fourteenth through the twenty-first of Abib (Nisan). The Torah differentiates between the Passover as the first day of the celebration and the Feast of Unleavened Bread as the seven days that follow. The Passover ritual includes the slaughter of an unblemished one-year-old male sheep or goat (Exod. 12:5) that had been set aside on the tenth day (Exod. 12:3). The meat could be eaten only by circumcised males (Exod. 12:48) and by those who belonged to the family. The meat had to be eaten that evening, and whatever was left over had to be burned (12:10). For the next seven days, the people ate unleavened bread (12:15–20; cf. Lev. 23:6). The first and the seventh days were “sacred assemblies,” as no work could be performed (Lev. 23:7–8). Special sacrifices were offered (Lev. 23:8; Num. 28:19–24), and the firstfruits of the harvest were presented to the priests (Lev. 23:9–14).

The Passover liturgy has undergone extensive development. The NT gives a glimpse of Jesus’ practice with his disciples. Jesus had celebrated the feast from his youth (Luke 2:42) and had gone to Jerusalem as a pilgrim (John 2:13; 11:55). The ceremony of the Last Supper included a meal, a blessing over the bread and over the wine, and the singing of a hymn (Matt. 26:21–30), probably one of the Hallel psalms (115–118). The Mishnaic tractate Passover gives in great detail the celebration of the Passover. Today’s celebration can best be studied by looking at a Passover Haggadah of which traditional and contemporary versions exist.

The death of Christ at the passover season was deemed significant by the early church. Paul calls Christ “our passover” (1 Cor. 5:7). The command not to break a bone of the paschal lamb (Exod. 12:46) is applied by John to the death of Christ—“A bone of him shall not be broken” (John 19:36). The Christian must put away the “old leaven” of malice and wickedness, and replace it with “the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth” (1 Cor. 5:8).

Feast of Weeks (Šābū’ôt). Celebrated fifty days after the Sabbath of the Passover (Lev. 23:9–16, 21), this was one of the three pilgrimage feasts. A difference of interpretation arose with respect of the word "Sabbath" in Leviticus 23:15: "From the day after the Sabbath, . . . count off seven full weeks." The Sadducees took the word Sabbath to refer to the seventh day and hence decided that the Feast of Weeks always had to fall on Sunday. The interpretation of the Pharisees favored the general meaning of Sabbath in the sense of a holy convocation. Since the first day of the Feast of Unleavened Bread is a holy convocation, the Feast of Weeks fell fifty days later and hence could be celebrated on any day of the week. Special offerings were presented in the temple (Lev. 23:17–20), where the pilgrims were met with the Levitical singers (Mishnah, tractate Bikkurim 3:2–4). The custom of celebrating the giving of the law is an early medieval interpretation of Exodus 19:1, according to which the law was given on Mount Sinai in the third month after the Israelites left Egypt. In the Bible the feast is mentioned as having been observed in the times of Solomon (2 Chron. 8:12–13), Hezekiah (2 Chron. 31:2–3), and after the exile (Ezra 3:4; Zech. 14:16, 18–19).

Feasts and Festivals, Old Testament

The Festival of Trumpets. Celebrated on the first day (new moon) of the seventh month (Tishri), it is the festival on which the ram's horn (shofar) was blown (Lev. 23:23–25; Num. 29:1–6). The psalmist sang about it in these words:

Sound the ram's horn at the New Moon, and when the moon is full, on the day of our Feast;
this is a decree for Israel, an ordinance of the God of Jacob.

Ps. 81:3–4

Ezra read the Law to the people on the first day of the seventh month (Neh. 8:1–8). Nehemiah spoke of that day as a day of feasting (8:10). The festival was the beginning of a series of high holy days and was not equated with the new year (Rosh Hashanah) until postexilic times. The rabbis differed in their interpretation of its significance. Some identified it with the beginning of the world and others as the day on which humankind will be judged. Jewish liturgies reflect both traditions.

The shofar is the instrument blown during the festival. It became an important part of the ceremony, as is evident from the traditions (cf. tractate Rosh Hashanah in the Mishnah and Babylonian Talmud). Rabbi Josiah suggested that at the sound of the shofar the Creator rises from his throne of judgment and moves over to his throne of mercy (Lev. Rabbah 29:4).

The Day of Atonement. This fell on the tenth of the seventh month (Tishri; Lev. 23:26–32; Num. 29:7–11). It was a sacred assembly in which the Israelites humbled themselves before the Lord. Special sacrifices were presented as an atonement for the sins of the priests and the people (Lev. 16); "because on this day atonement will be made for you, to cleanse you. Then, before the LORD, you will be clean from all your sins" (Lev. 16:30). Special offerings were also presented (Num. 29:8–11). In the Year of Jubilee the blowing of the shofar solemnized the freeing of slaves (Lev. 25:9–10).

The Feast of Tabernacles (Sukkôt). This was held for seven days from the fifteenth through the twenty-first of the seventh month (Exod. 23:16–17; 34:22; Lev. 23:33–44). It was the third pilgrimage feast. The first day and the day after the feast were solemn assemblies. All Israelite families were required to live in booths made of branches of trees, including the poplar and palm (Lev. 23:40, 42). Because it was a harvest feast, special offerings were presented in the temple (Lev. 23:37–38). It was a feast marked by great joy (Deut. 16:13–15).

Hanukkah. The Feast of Lights, or Dedication, is celebrated for eight days beginning on the twenty-fifth of Kislev. The word Hanukkah comes from a Hebrew root meaning "to dedicate." The festival celebrates the dedication of the second temple on the twenty-fifth of the month Kislev (165/164 B.C.). Judas Maccabeus had subdued the Seleucid forces, marched into Jerusalem, and cleansed the temple (1 Macc. 4:36–57), which had been desecrated by Antiochus IV Epiphanes' sacrifice of a pig. The Jews celebrated it for eight days with great joy. Judas decreed it to be a perpetual observance (v. 59). The tradition developed of burning one additional light each day until eight lights had been lit on the eighth day. The Day of Dedication had become the Day of Lights. In Jesus' time the temple was all lit up with lamps. The lights and their reflections on the marble and gold of the temple made Jerusalem a magnificent sight to behold from the Mount of Olives in the evening. During one of the festivals Jesus was in Jerusalem and taught in the temple precincts (John 10:22–23).

Purim (Lots). This was celebrated on the fourteenth and fifteenth of Adar. The origin of the festival is given in the Book of Esther. Haman's plot to have the Jews of the Persian Empire executed was foiled by Esther the queen. King Ahasuerus (Xerxes, 485–465 B.C.) permitted the Jews to defend themselves on the thirteenth day of Adar. Haman had determined by "lots" to rid the kingdom of the Jews (Esth. 3:7). On the thirteenth and fourteenth of Adar the Jews were victorious in repelling their enemy, and thus they were saved. It was decreed to celebrate Purim as the festival of lots (probably from Akkadian puru, "stone"); it is characterized by eating and drinking and giving gifts (Esth. 9:20–22, 24, 26). There may be an allusion to Purim in John 5:1.

The Theology of the Feasts and Festivals. Each feast expresses a theological statement. The Passover is the feast of Yahweh's redemption of Israel from Egypt. He showed himself powerful and victorious over the enemies of his people (Exod. 12:17; 13:7–9, 14–16). The redemption from Egypt was viewed as an act of love (Exod. 19:4) and of covenantal loyalty (Pss. 105:6, 37, 42, 43; 111:9). The Feast of Weeks celebrates the gift of the land of Canaan, where the Israelites received the blessings of God in the form of rain and a plentiful harvest. By permitting the poor to glean the fields and to harvest the "corners" of the field, all of God's people had reason to rejoice before the Lord (Deut. 16:11–12). The celebration of the new moon was a reminder of God's goodness in giving another month of covenant life. The seventh new moon festival (today's New Year) not only marked the midpoint of the religious calendar; it also was the beginning of the special days (Atonement and Tabernacles). At later times it was associated with God's work of creation, his judgment of the world, and his mercy on Israel. The Day of Atonement was the only day on which the Israelites did not rejoice, but humbled themselves by fasting. Five days later they celebrated the Feast of Tabernacles. The Feast of Tabernacles is also a harvest festival, but its historical emphasis lies in the remembrance of the forty years in the wilderness, when Israel lived in tents. Hanukkah marked God's continued redemption of the people. They were forced to assimilate, and Judaism was in danger of abandoning its heritage had it not been for men, zealous for the law of God and the temple, who through victories in war were granted to free the temple and to consecrate it. Purim similarly speaks of God's providence and his continued care for his people, even when they are in the dispersion.

The Jews in the second temple period, when Jesus was on earth, had developed elaborate rituals and theological justifications of these ancient festivals. The festivals bound together Jews in Judea and Galilee and Jews and proselytes living in the diaspora. All celebrated the festivals. During the pilgrimage feasts they made efforts to be in Jerusalem. The diverse origins of the people are shown by Luke as he reports on the crowds present in Jerusalem during the Pentecost feast (Acts 2:5–11). Our Lord participated in the pilgrimages, and along the way he continued his ministry (Matt. 19:1–20:34). The apostle Paul expressed a desire to be in Jerusalem for the Feast of Pentecost (Acts 20:16).

The customs had developed extensively over the years after the exile until they were codified by Rabbi Judah the Prince in the Mishnah (ca. A.D. 200). They continued to show their dynamics in a development that formed a cohesive element for Jews all over the globe. The NT witnesses to one such development. In the OT there is no ritual of a pouring out of water associated with the Feast of Tabernacles, but it was practiced in the first century A.D. It is this custom of pouring out water on the last day of the Feast of Tabernacles as a symbolic prayer for rain that forms the background for Jesus' invitation to come to him and be satisfied with the living water of the Spirit (John 7:37–39).

Since Jesus' coming the relevance of the Jewish religious calendar has been reduced to a shadow of things to come. Jesus is portrayed as the Passover Lamb (1 Cor. 5:7–8). Christians celebrate the Lord's Supper instead of the Passover. With the destruction of the temple, pilgrimages and special temple offerings have come to an end. The death of Christ, particularly, is portrayed in the NT as the final sacrifice by which people can be reconciled to God (Heb. 7:27; cf. ch. 8). The apostle Paul clearly taught that the observance of Sabbaths, new moons, and festivals is not a criterion by which godliness is to be judged (Col. 2:16–17; cf. Rom. 14:5–6). Some have even concluded that all Sabbath observances have come to an end. Others posit that the word "Sabbaths" must be interpreted in a pharisaic sense as "solemn assemblies," i.e., the days of rest associated with the festivals. The practice of Sabbath observance lacks uniformity in the Christian community. The celebration of Easter has completely supplanted the observance of Passover. Recently a renewed interest in some Christian circles has been expressed in the celebration of the Passover. The unity experienced by God's people in the OT during the celebration of the feasts and festivals (Ps. 133:1) has not found expression in the Christian community, where unity has been more confessionally oriented.

W. A. VAN GEMEREN

Bibliography. A. P. Bloch, Biblical and Historical Background of the Jewish Holy Days; R. deVaux, Ancient Israel; G. F. Moore, Judaism; E. Rackman, Sabbath and Festivals in the Modern Age; H. Schauss, Guide to Jewish Holy Days; Jewish Festivals.

Febronianism. The name given by Roman Catholics to an eighteenth-century German theological movement begun by John Nicholas von Hontheim, bishop of Treves. Under the pen name of Justinus Febronius, Hontheim wrote tracts disputing the doctrine of papal infallibility. In 1763 he published a tract arguing that Christ gave Peter the keys of the kingdom to empower not Peter and his papal descendants but the church as a whole. Accordingly, Hontheim believed that all Christians could claim equal authority in deciding matters of faith and doctrine. A consequence of this position would be that any body of Christians, such as the bishops as a whole, wielded more power than the pope. This approach shifted infallibility to the church away from the pope, whose function became to preserve the church canon, not to alter it.

Febronianism

Hontheim's system would have drastically weakened papal authority. Therefore, many Roman Catholics considered it an extreme and entirely unacceptable form of Gallicanism. While Gallicanism must certainly have influenced Hontheim, its goals differed widely from those of Febronianism. Hontheim's purposes were apolitical; by reducing papal authority he wanted to reconcile the Protestant and Catholic views, not to increase the power of secular government.

The papacy opposed any form of Hontheim's ideas. Pope Clement XIII condemned the Febronian position, and Hontheim responded with an abridgment of his pamphlet in 1777. This compromise failed to satisfy the papacy, however. In 1778 Pope Pius VI forced Hontheim to make an outright retraction. Nevertheless, he published a restatement of his original beliefs in 1781. P. A. MICKEY

See also GALLICANISM.

Bibliography. Catholic Encyclopedia; New Catholic Dictionary; Protestant Dictionary.

Federal Theology. The name of Johannes Cocceius (1603–69) stands in the closest association with federal theology because of the prominence into which he brought it in the theological schools. But federal theology finds clear exposition in 1 Corinthians 15 and Romans 5. "As in Adam all die," writes Paul, "so in Christ all will be made alive" (1 Cor. 15:22). Adam, as the first man, was the natural head of the race, and represented all humankind as the human party to the covenant of works into which God entered with him. As the natural head, he stood in a federal (Lat. foedus, "covenant") relationship to all posterity. His obedience, had it been maintained, would have transmitted an entail of blessedness to them; his disobedience involved them with him in the curse God pronounced upon the transgressors of his law.

This argument is developed in Romans 5:15–21. The entire human race is summarized in the two Adams. The first Adam was the federal head of the race under the covenant of works; the second Adam, the Lord Jesus Christ, is the federal head of all believers under the covenant of grace. Thus, as the sin of Adam was legally and effectively our sin, so the obedience of Christ is legally and effectively the righteousness of all believers. The federal relationship in which Adam stood to the race was the ground of the imputation of his guilt to them and the judicial cause of their condemnation. And the law that condemned them could not justify them unless an adequate reparation should be made for the wrong done, a reparation they were incapable of making because of the corruption they inherited from Adam as their natural and federal head. To provide their salvation, the needed reparation had to be made by another who was not of federal connection with Adam and therefore was free from the imputation of his guilt. Federal theology represents these requirements as being met in Christ, the second Adam, in whom a new race begins. God had entered into covenant with him, promising him the salvation of all believers as the reward of his obedience. But the obedience required of him as the federal head of his people was more than the mere equivalent of that required of Adam. His representative obedience must include a penal death. And thus his resurrection victory is also the victory of the new humanity that has its source in him.

The various theological schools differ with regard to the implications of the imputation of Adam's guilt to his posterity. Pelagius (late fourth and early fifth centuries) denied that there was any necessary connection between the sin of Adam and that of his descendants. Cocceius himself did not found his federal theology on the doctrine of predestination after the manner of Calvin. The earlier Arminians held that humans inherited their natural corruption through Adam, but that they are not implicated in the guilt of Adam's first transgression. The later Arminians, however, particularly those of the Wesleyan following, admitted that humans' inborn corruption also involves guilt. Yet notwithstanding these and other modifications, there is a broad agreement between the Roman, Lutheran, and Reformed theologies that man's loss of original righteousness is the consequence of Adam's first sin as the covenant head of the race. "Nothing remains," writes Augustine, "but to conclude that in the first man all are understood to have sinned, whereby sin is brought in with birth and not removed save by the new birth." Any other view tends to break the analogy that is so clearly set forth in Romans 5:19: "For just as through the disobedience of the one man the many were made sinners, so also through the obedience of the one man the many will be made righteous." A real imputation of the righteousness of Christ as federal head of his people requires a real imputation of the guilt of Adam to his posterity. For, as Calvin argues against the Pelagian view, if the imputation of Adam's sin means no more than that Adam became our example in sin, then the strict application of Paul's analogy of the two Adams would mean no more than that Christ became the example of his people in righteousness and not the cause of their righteousness. Their vital union with Christ is the cause of their righteousness and also the guarantee of their growth in personal sanctification. G. N. M. COLLINS

See also COCCESIUS, JOHANNES; COVENANT THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. J. W. Baker, Heinrich Bullinger and the Covenant; J. W. Beardslee, Reformed Dogmatics; L. Berkhof, Manual of Reformed Doctrine; J. Calvin, Commentary on Romans; H. Heppe, Reformed Dogmatics; A. A. Hodge, Outlines of Theology; C. Hodge, Commentary on I Corinthians; D. A. Weir, Origins of Federal Theology in 16th Century Reformation Thought.

Feeling, Theology of. See EXPERIENCE, THEOLOGY OF.

Felix Culpa. See FORTUNATE FALL.

Fellowship. The basic meaning conveyed by the Greek term koinōnia is that of participation. Both fellowship and communion, as translations of this term, are to be understood in this light. There is normally no sense of abstraction in the use of the word, in either noun or verb form, but rather that of actual participation in that to which the term refers. It is striking that the noun does not appear in the Gospels. Perhaps the sense conveyed by the early church's use of the term is that which was only appropriate in the close-knit fellowship of its Spirit-filled membership. The verb form appears only twice in the Gospels, where it has no connotation of anything uniquely Christian (Matt. 23:30; Luke 5:10).

The sense of sharing and self-sacrifice that is inherent in the word is clearly evident in those references to financial support in the early church as koinōnia (verb: Rom. 12:13; 15:26; Gal. 6:6; Phil. 4:15; noun: 2 Cor. 8:4; 9:13; Heb. 13:16). It is clear in these passages that Paul viewed the contribution for the needy Jewish Christians in Jerusalem, taken up from the poverty-stricken Gentile Christians in the Hellenistic world, as the ultimate expression of fellowship among Christian people. It was more than simple sharing of material possessions by those taught with their teachers. For Paul it was a theological expression of the validity of his work among Gentiles, a sure sign that they had been completely accepted into God's work among the Jews. Friendship is a supreme expression of fellowship. The early church maintained this fellowship daily (Acts 2:42), as is evidenced in its communalism described in Acts 4 and 5.

But just as one may participate in wholesome activities with a fellow human being, he or she may also have fellowship with another's sins (1 Tim. 5:22), another's wickedness (2 John 11), and even with demons (1 Cor. 10:20–21). When this happens, it is a sure sign that Christ is not dwelling in the heart of the believer; light and darkness do not have fellowship with one another; just as Christ has no fellowship with Belial (2 Cor. 6:14–15). The true believer has fellowship in (i.e., participates in the implications of) the sufferings of Christ (Phil. 3:10; 1 Pet. 4:13), the sufferings of the apostles (2 Cor. 1:7), and the sufferings of fellow humans (Heb. 10:33).

The unity in the fellowship of the early church was not based upon uniformity of thought and practice, except where limits of immorality or rejection of the confession of Christ were involved. The capacity to fellowship with one with whom there were disagreements extended beyond the corporate church into the home itself. A believing wife was exhorted by Paul to remain married to an unbelieving husband as long as he was content to dwell with her, and likewise husband with wife (1 Cor. 7:12–16).

There is a sense in which the Lord's Supper constitutes a fellowship or participation in the blood and body of Christ (1 Cor. 10:16). This is perhaps one of the meanings of the fellowship of the Spirit (2 Cor. 13:14; Phil. 2:1) and one of the ways we become partakers (koinōnia) of the divine nature (2 Pet. 1:4) and of the glory that is to be revealed (1 Pet. 5:1). The communion between humans and God in the eating of the supper was probably based less on sacramental presuppositions than on the cultural/theological implications inherent in the experience of Jew and Gentile, male and female, slave and free (Gal. 3:28) sitting down together to eat and drink with him in his kingdom (Mark 14:25; Luke 22:30).

J. R. McRAY

Bibliography. S. Dawson, Fellowship with God and His People: The Way of Christ without Denominationalism; J. Eichler and J. Schattenmann, NIDNTT 1:635–44; F. Hauck, TDNT 3:804–9; G. W. H. Lampe, IDB 1:664–66; J. Wimber, Kingdom Fellowship: Living Together as the Body of Christ.

Fellowship Offering. See OFFERINGS AND SACRIFICES IN BIBLE TIMES.

Feminism, Feminist Theology. A theology arising out of feminism, a movement espousing political equality and social liberation of women. Feminism has its religious roots in women's leadership in nineteenth-century revival movements, and its secular roots in the women's suffrage movement. Evangelical women in the nineteenth century took a leadership role in many churches, including the giving of testimony, preaching, and the organization of anti-slavery, missionary, and volunteer societies. Women's suffrage and the right to equal educational opportunity, including a university education, became the focus of the women's movement until the franchise was won in the United States in 1920. Twentieth-century feminism arose in the postwar period with the publication of key feminist texts: Second Sex (1953) by Simone de Beauvoir in France, Feminine Mystique (1963) by Betty Friedan in the United States, and Female Eunuch (1971) by Germaine Greer in Australia. Women had worked in men's jobs in two world wars, and they had been emancipated from many of the burdens of child rearing by birth control and attempts to curb world population. The twentieth-century movement was undergirded at least in part by a new Marxist inspired understanding of the alienation and oppressiveness of much menial and household work, especially that done by many women. Noted also was the religious legitimization often given to this exploitation. By midcentury the modern "cult of domesticity" had culminated in an unprecedented isolation of women in their child-rearing and domestic tasks, and in the United States the civil rights movement of the 1960s and opposition to war combined to create a climate open to rethinking traditional mores. Thus, many women found in feminist thought that their experiences were being articulated for the first time. In spite of some of these unifying themes, feminism remains diverse. Key issues include the interpretation of gender and its repercussions, and the exposure and analysis of patriarchy. Looking first at gender issues, nineteenth-century movements gave weight to the Enlightenment-inspired notion of equality for all autonomous agents, including women. But these ideas were intermixed with religiously inspired notions of women's unique role, nature, and function, which nevertheless did not preclude certain leadership positions.

Feminism, Feminist Theology

Early twentieth-century feminism stressed the equality of the genders and the right of women to equal work and opportunity. Contemporary modifications of feminism have rediscovered the unique contributions of the genders. Carol Gilligan discusses the differences in women's moral reasoning in her book In Another Voice. She notes that women value relationships more than justice. Others like Virginia Held have developed a new feminist ethics that emphasizes more relation-oriented, nurturing values rather than the long-established male values of autonomy.

Behind these debates, however, is the deeper question of whence come gender differences. Late twentieth-century emphases on the different contributions of women to work, philosophy, moral reasoning, and theology are held in tension with the parallel insistence that all categories including gender are substantially, if not completely, social constructions of reality. The second key issue is patriarchy, defined as that evil manifest in language, institutions, family traditions, cultural practices, and work expectations that subjugates and dominates women and excludes them from the public sphere, and that caricatures women and precludes their entry into and participation in many roles and occupations. Patriarchy is deemed to affect the structures of every society in history, so that its evil is effected as often by the benevolent as the malevolent or misogynist. Patriarchy is understood as leading to androcentrism, the structuring of all life and narrative around the experiences of men, and the according of dignity and worth to men and not to women. Thus, contemporary feminism is multifaceted and subversive, attempting to root out and expose patriarchy in all its lingering disguises—deconstructing and reconstructing the androcentric texts, institutions, and metatheories of Western civilization.

Feminist theology emerged in relationship to feminism in the early 1960s and 70s, inspired by the struggles for the ordination of women that began at this time. Biblical passages and traditions that seemed to preclude ordination were re-examined and reinterpreted. Theological feminism has continued, however, to examine the tradition and the Scriptures, only to confirm that these are laced with a religiously legitimated, and thus most potent form of patriarchy. Women were blamed, for example, for the sin of Adam and the fall of the human race. And women's reproductive capacities were thought to be more animal-like and thus less spiritual than men's.

An important milestone in feminist theology was the 1960 Journal of Religion article by Valerie Saiving, which critiqued Reinhold Niebuhr's analysis of sin as pride. Saiving suggested that women are tempted not so much to pride as they are to give themselves away in self-sacrifice and self-effacement, and that the church has aided and abetted this often destructive sacrifice of the woman's self. Feminist theology has broadened from this somewhat respectful dialogue to a wholesale restructuring and reimagining of the traditional theological categories of sin, salvation, God, Christ, eschatology, and church. Today feminist theology is at least as diverse as its parent feminism. At one extreme is found post-Christian neopagan goddess worship. Radical Christian feminist theologians maintain a dialogue with the Christian Scriptures and tradition while denying the authority of either. More conservative churches battle over the roles of women in church leadership and in marriage, gender issues, and in the headship problem.

In this arena evangelical or reformist feminist scholarship argues that the demands of the gospel, especially in light of Galatians 3, call for a radical equality in church and in marriage. These scholars do careful textual and historical biblical criticism aimed at elucidating the cultural context of problematic texts, rediscovering women and feminist analogies in Scripture, and critiquing harmful and patriarchal traditions that have been built upon scriptural foundations. More radical feminist theology advocates a revolutionary change in the paradigms of systematic theology, focusing on language and the power of religiously legitimated images to bind and oppress. God must be reimagined without connotations of maleness and hierarchy. Christ as a male-divine savior is problematic and is replaced by various new Christologies: Christ the prototype of the new humanity or Christ the prophet of Sophia-God. New images and a new language are awaited as they arise organically from the experiences of women or from rediscovered women's voices in history.

Feminist theology owes much to the pioneering work of the Roman Catholic feminists: Rosemary Radford Ruether in church history, Elisabeth Schüssler Fiorenza in biblical studies, and Mary Daly in philosophical theology. Their works form the point of reference for most subsequent feminist theology of all types. These theologians would situate themselves as radical Christian feminists on the margins of the prophetic liberating strand of the Judeo-Christian tradition. They affirm the existence of a liberating strand within the biblical tradition and an egalitarian first-century Jesus community, but they are most adept at rooting out patriarchy and androcentrism in all its disguises in church, tradition, and Scripture.

Ruether, with many other feminist theologians, emphasizes that the beginning and end of the hermeneutical circle is women's experiences, and she traces the historical, philosophical, and social roots of the absence of these experiences in the development of theology. Scripture is normative only to the extent that it functions to uphold the full humanity of women. And she anticipates a new institution—independent solidarity of women—"women church." Similarly, Schüssler Fiorenza, in her detailed feminist analysis of first-century church and Scriptures, calls on women to read the biblical text with a "hermeneutics of suspicion," to use scholarly methods to read against the patriarchal grain of the text. Women must be read back into the texts from which they are absent.

Mary Daly, as also the English feminist theologian Daphne Hampson, has quite pointedly left the Christian church after attempting to work for reform within it. Daly's radical work is a philosophical deconstructing, reimagining of theological and cultural language—she combines withering criticism of the church with an unusual affirmation of God's transcendence and an attempt to recreate women's identity from a pure space beyond patriarchal infiltration.

Many feminist theologians have embraced a process metaphysics as a means of critiquing the perceived hopelessly patriarchal framework and essentialist presuppositions of traditional systematic theology. Catherine Keller, Marjorie Suchocki, and Sallie McFague, among others, have begun the task of restructuring Christian theology to emphasize the interconnectedness of all life and of that life with God.

Entering into dialogue with these voices are those who, while feminist, add a critical note to the thrust of mainline feminism. Third World women, womanists, and mujerista, many of whom recognize the advances gained by feminism and the women's movement, are much more ambivalent about the liberties to which Enlightenment-based feminism aspires. Their experience of living in traditional societies, although painful, was also the source and locus of a women's solidarity Western women are only beginning to reestablish.

Evangelical and reformed feminist groups continue to attempt a dialogue with historic Christian faith. But the feminist movement has become, at the turn of the century, an essentially radical and revolutionary movement, often deeply antagonistic to conservative or exclusive faith stances, and deliberately advocating an alternative worldview to a tradition that is deemed to be irredeemably patriarchal.

This confrontation is felt most strongly in the area of Scripture, toward which radical feminists adopt a stance that is inconsistent with an affirmation of its authority; Scripture becomes subject to human judgment and excision at all levels and is one among many possible sources of inspiration. Ironically, then, feminism can also be credited with bringing some texts to life in a new way, thus effecting a laudable transformation in our hearts and minds. But the wholesale rejection of many texts, and the subsequent reconstruction of theological categories intentionally goes beyond the boundaries of historic Christian faith.

Nevertheless, radical feminism shares with evangelicals—against the presuppositions of contemporary culture—a belief in sin and evil as the problem of the human condition, though for feminism patriarchy is the primary evil. And feminism rarely affirms that women are other than victims in the complex patterns of sin and idolatry.

Thus, while feminist theology can be understood as obfuscating many of the theological "forms of life" that constitute the basis of worship, repentance, and hope in Christ, it is also a voice of judgment that the church should heed. Feminism invites the church to recognize how culturally dependent and partisan are many of our proclamations of "truth" and gospel, and to listen to those aspects of the tradition and those partially hidden voices that have proclaimed God's ever-creating Spirit, the full humanity of women and other oppressed groups, and the immanence—as well as transcendence—and abounding love-in-community of the triune God of Scripture.

N. HOGGARD-CREEGAN

See also DALY, MARY; FEMINISM, CHRISTIAN; MCFAGUE, SALLIE; RUETHER, ROSEMARY RADFORD;

Feminism, Feminist Theology

SCHÜSSLER FIORENZA, ELISABETH; WOMAN, BIBLICAL CONCEPT OF.

Bibliography. A. Carr, Transforming Grace; C. Christ and J. Plaskow, eds., Womanspirit Rising; M. Daly, Beyond God the Father; E. S. Fiorenza, In Memory of Her; R. M. Groothuis, Women Caught in the Conflict; D. Hampson, Theology and Feminism; E. Johnson, She Who Is; C. Keller, From a Broken Web; G. Lerner, Creation of Patriarchy; A. Loades, ed., Feminist Theology; S. McFague, Models of God; R. R. Ruether, Sexism and God-Talk; L. Russell, Household of Freedom; D. Steichen, Ungodly Rage; P. Tribble, Texts of Terror; M. S. Van Leeuwen, ed., After Eden; J. van Wijk-Bos, Reformed and Feminist.

Feminism, Christian. Christian feminism is a diverse movement of women and men who advocate gender equality in society. A patriarchal social system in which men exercise either absolute or final authority over women is rejected. Christian feminism is comprised of varying shades of egalitarians, “reformists,” and “radicals.”

Evangelical egalitarian feminists hold a high view of Scripture and focus on equality and mutuality of men and women. The organization Christians for Biblical Equality represents egalitarianism. The reformist category contains a broad spectrum of views. Some may tend toward orthodoxy and egalitarianism or toward more radical views. Reformists tend to work within the church to stress women’s justice in society and/or apply a feminist hermeneutic of suspicion to biblical interpretation. The organization most reflective of “reformist feminism” is the Evangelical and Ecumenical Women’s Caucus. Radical Christian feminists redefine Christian terms and concepts. They consider themselves “Christian” because they derive either ideas or their original impetus from a very broadly defined “Christian tradition.” Many are active in the American Academy of Religion and in ecumenical bodies like the World Council of Churches.

Evangelical egalitarians and many reformists are often called “biblical feminists.” But radical Christian feminists may also identify themselves as reformists. An examination of theological emphases, feminist themes, and biblical interpretation is necessary to further define the various uses of the term “Christian feminist.”

The Rise of Christian Feminism. The first wave of secular feminism found its roots in the Enlightenment and in revivalism and evangelicalism (1830–1900). American evangelical women contributed to secular moral reform societies, antislavery, and temperance movements. Women pursued missions, preaching, teaching, and prophesying. And contributions of theologians such as A. J. Gordon and Charles Finney acknowledged greater biblical justification for women’s work on behalf of the church and society.

Eventually, three secular feminist traditions arose. Complementarian traditions emphasized and valued women’s difference from men. Enlightenment traditions highlighted individuality and women’s equality. Socialist traditions stressed justice and the reformation of societal structures. These traditions provide helpful insight into some versions of Christian feminism.

During the second wave of feminism (1960–), early religious thought was heavily influenced by Mary Daly’s Beyond God the Father. Rosemary Ruether, Letty Russell, Elisabeth Schüssler Fiorenza, and Phyllis Tribble were also influential. These women merged various strands of existentialism, Marxism, romanticism, and postmodernism with Christianity. Initially, existing Christian traditions were criticized, Scripture was examined, and women’s history was studied. Then old traditions were stated in new ways. Currently, radical Christian theology creates new theological methods and norms. Woman-Church, African-American Womanist theology, and many other diverse multicultural expressions of radical Christianity now abound as radicals reimagine Christianity and create their own spiritual traditions.

In the 1970s evangelicals began to investigate women’s history and experience, interpretive methodology, and the biblical basis for women’s roles in the church and home. In 1974 the Evangelical Women’s Caucus (now the Evangelical and Ecumenical Women’s Caucus) was created to support women’s equality and actively work for change within the church. At that time, evangelicals Letha Scanzoni and Nancy Hardestry in All We’re Meant to Be embraced a “hermeneutic of suspicion” in biblical interpretation. Controversy ensued over women’s ordination and equality in marriage and church. Paul Jewett in Man as Male and Female, following Karl Barth, proposed male and female together as the image of God. Then, in the early 1980s, the National Council of Churches produced the Inclusive-Language Lectionary. Consequently, language for God in some Christian circles took on feminine characteristics. Evangelicals divided over the emerging reformist and egalitarian feminist positions. Influential egalitarian writings in the 1970s and 1980s included P. Gundry’s Woman Be Free, Aída Spencer’s Beyond the Curse, and Gilbert Bilezikian’s Beyond Sex Roles. Women, Authority and the Bible edited by Alvera Mickelsen, which dealt with the issue of biblical authority and hermeneutics, resulted from an evangelical colloquium on women during 1984. In 1987, when positions shifted within the Evangelical Women’s Caucus to include sanction of homosexual lifestyles, Catherine Clark Kroeger and other egalitarians left to form Christians for Biblical Equality. At approximately the same time, evangelicals supporting male leadership in church and home founded The Council on Biblical Manhood and Womanhood. Evangelical controversy over the biblical nature and importance of “Christian feminism” has continued today.

Evangelical Feminism. For egalitarians, Scripture is either “infallible” and “inerrant” or “inspired, reliable, and the final authority for faith and practice.” Interpretation of many Old Testament passages on women is considered difficult due to the nature of differing biblical genres and the need to separate descriptive passages from biblical mandates. Though the Old Testament may at times describe the results of patriarchy, total biblical revelation is not believed to support male rule over women. The New Testament revelation demonstrates women’s equality amid a pagan society and affirms women in ministry.

Both male and female metaphors for God are considered critical to understanding the revealed behavior and characteristics of God. Egalitarians do not seek to remove male terminology for God from Scripture. And inclusive language for God as “mother” is not generally advocated. Neither is the Holy Spirit considered characteristically feminine in nature. Because God is Spirit, he is beyond gender. God remains the transcendent and immanent creator of humanity.

The image of God (imago Dei) in man and woman is traditionally viewed as highlighting the rationality, will, and dominion in every man and woman individually. But for many egalitarians, “man” consists of male and female in fellowship together. Thus, gender distinctions and complementariness between the sexes are reinforced by grounding human sexuality in the imago Dei. General descriptions of the new nature in Christ may stress the similarities between the sexes. But men and women are also considered biologically different and complementary. Though the definition of gender “roles” may be disputed, gender itself is defined in terms of male and female biology.

Egalitarians cite a disparity between doctrine and the experience of women in the church. Women may function with the same gifts and similar experience to men in the church without equal authority, payment, or opportunities for employment. One common illustration is given of the woman missionary who may not teach doctrine to men in her church but may teach doctrine on the mission field.

Reexamination of historic church doctrine and practices are common to determine if cultural patterns have inordinately limited women’s roles in church and society. Some argue that women held leadership roles in the early church and in the initial stages of other Christian movements and were only later denied such leadership.

Patriarchy includes the practice of male headship and authority over women. Patriarchy is not considered biblically justifiable but developed as the result of human sin after the fall. In the new nature in Christ, men and women work toward reversal of many male and female behavioral tendencies that create social inequity. So liberation from the effects of the fall is found in Christ. There is a new reality for community life in Christ without gender, social, and racial distinctives. In the new community of believers, men and women are joint heirs and there is no longer either male or female in Christ (Gal. 3:26–28).

Teaching and leadership in the church and home rest in God’s bestowal of spiritual gifts upon individuals not upon male/female role distinctions (Acts 2:1–21, 1 Pet. 2:9). Leadership is understood as empowerment of others for service and servanthood (1 Pet. 4:10–11). Authority and responsibility are mutually shared by men and women in a partnership of equals, not distributed through a formal hierarchy of gender roles. This does not mean all forms of organizational church government are generally rejected, but only hierarchy and subordination based on strictly male/female distinctions.

Egalitarians suggest sometimes traditional interpretations and definitions impacting women’s roles may be misunderstood or mistranslated. As a result, some reexamine the original cultural roots of definitions for “ordination,” “authority,” and “office.” For the same reason, kephale is translated as “source,” “origin,” or “preeminent” rather than “head” (1 Cor. 11:3, Eph. 5:23). Furthermore, in Ephesians 5:21 hupotasso is understood to affirm mutual submission not hierarchy.

First Corinthians 11:1–6; 14:34–40; and 1 Timothy 2:12–15 are considered difficult to interpret due to the cultural nature of the concepts and Greek language used. As a result, broader principles within the text are affirmed and the identification of differences between descriptive statements and biblical mandates for action is stressed.

Most egalitarians appeal to what they consider the whole of Scripture to further define the above passages as well as biblical doctrine on women. Therefore, the development of themes such as justice, gifts of the Spirit, equality, relationship, and redemption are integral to their holistic interpretation of Scripture. For many, Galatians 3:26–28 (“there is neither . . . male nor female . . . in Christ”) is considered the controlling Scripture by which most other Scripture on women’s equality is judged.

Some also develop interpretations with a basis in progressive revelation. Progressive revelation views the Old Testament and the New Testament as two separate stages in revelation. The New Testament is generally considered the final court of appeal. This format for biblical interpretation is believed to help set each biblical epoch and its literature within its revelatory and historical-cultural context.

As a result of this application of progressive revelation to biblical interpretation, many advance a type of creation-fall-redemption pattern for interpretation. This view states that at creation prior to the fall, there was equality not hierarchy. Genesis 2:21–25 is not believed to teach a hierarchical creation order. And ezer in Genesis 2:18 is defined as either “an equal” or “superlative helper.” So before the fall, Eve serves equally and in joint dominion with Adam over the earth. The effects of the fall play out in a tendency toward male domination of women. Genesis 3:16 is viewed as a prediction of the effects of the fall, not a prescription for hierarchical order. The stage of redemption reverses many of the effects of the fall including much damage to male/female relations. And redemption working within the new creation in Christ reestablishes the equality experienced prior to the fall.

Some use a developmental hermeneutic containing creation-redemption categories. Interpretive priority is given to redemptive categories. But the gospel and its ethical principles are considered normative. As the church matures throughout the centuries, women’s ministry is expected to progress beyond first-century practices.

Finally, interpretations will differ among egalitarians depending on (1) the nature of one’s systematic theology; (2) the place of one’s systematic theology in the interpretive process; (3) whether one holds to inerrancy or to a faith and practice view of biblical authority; (4) the use of grammatical-historical exegesis as the primary basis for most interpretation; and (5) how far one takes the “new hermeneutic” of the two horizons of author and reader. If one asserts that the “reader” can never culturally separate his or her own view from the author’s view or from the text, truth becomes culturally conditioned, subjectivity results, and relativism is implicated.

Reformists assert that the Bible in general supports the basic equality of the sexes. Even so, patriarchal ideas may exist in the Bible and must be removed. Inclusive language for God as “mother,” “she,” or Sophia may be acceptable. The imago Dei may be conceived of as maturity in conforming to Christ (Eph. 4:13) and as the fruit of the Holy Spirit. Some define original sin as “the desire to separate and dominate resulting in oppression.”

The gospel affirms spiritual equality in Christ and in the world. And Christ is considered the human paradigm and example. Liberation from patriarchy calls for equality, justice, and societal reform. Women may become full human beings by utilizing their spiritual gifts. Women’s history and experience as the oppressed is often emphasized so change may be encouraged.

A form of liberation theology utilizing a hermeneutics of suspicion is normative. In other words, since some biblical passages on women are known to reflect biased cultural opinions, anything in the Bible that does not reflect justice and equality may be at risk for rejection.

Radical Christian feminists believe Christian orthodoxy is oppressive. Because Scripture is supposedly written from a patriarchal mind-set, women must reinterpret Scripture for themselves. The Bible, Gnostic sources, neopaganism, Hinduism, and other alternative religious traditions may all contain “the word of God.” As a result, Scripture may be blended or syncretized with differing religious sources. Revelation from God comes mainly through individual prophecy and/or resides in prophetic communities.

Most picture God and the Holy Spirit in pantheistic terms. An encounter with God may become an encounter with themselves. God and/or the Holy Spirit may be delineated as “Mother,” “goddess,” or “Sophia,” or in any way that reflects a woman’s choice. Many reject male terms for God altogether in women’s religious practices.

Some try to replicate “the liberating tradition” of Jesus. But Jesus as the divine Redeemer is generally considered a myth. He is human, not the unique Son of God and Second Person of the Trinity. Jesus may differ from the christ. And the christ may represent the spirit within a messianic humanity or community.

Radical Christian feminism assumes humanity is capable of choosing good by creating nonoppressive societies. For many, evil is defined simply as “oppression.”

Patriarchy is considered all-pervasive. This means societal structures, language systems, written history, and theology all reflect primarily men’s experience. Women liberate themselves from men’s traditions by identifying and creating their own spiritual experience. Consequently, some use historical reconstructions to rewrite or expand biblical texts into stories, liturgy, or creative analyses that affirm women’s identity and promote new religious experience.

Alternative communities of worship may be emphasized. These communities may be comprised of men and women or only women. The Woman-Church provides an interim strategy for women’s religious practice until full liberation is attained. Goals envisioned for communities and society include (1) the eradication of all oppression; (2) the establishment of meaningful religious language for women and ongoing creation of women’s tradition; and (3) the creation of diverse, interdependent communities with partnership models of authority.

Feminist interpretation critiques societal goals and values, emphasizing pragmatic applications for women. Women’s experience is the basis for theology and description of the world. The hermeneutic of suspicion separates “the word of God” from patriarchal Scripture. The authoritative “word of God” reflects feminist concerns or goals. The rest of Scripture is either subordinated or rejected in light of feminist concerns in a canon within the canon method of interpretation. For example, Ruether seeks “the full humanity of women” through use of her progressive prophetic-messianic tradition. And Russell’s interpretative key focuses on the revelation of God’s promise for the mending and fulfillment of creation. For Fiorenza, authoritative texts are affirmed by the outside standard of the women church and its ideology. Additional interpretive standards include literary criticism (Trible) and hermeneutics of proclamation, remembrance, and creative actualization (Schüssler Fiorenza).

Relativism is normative. Truth is intuited, and/or resides in community experience. Some see truth and reality as fluid, shifting continually in interaction with others and their social world (Schüssler Fiorenza). Some presuppose a foundational dialectic of truth (Ruether and Russell).

Conclusion. Evangelicals must continue to engage “Christian feminist” themes, for all humanity has a vested interest in biblically defined justice, equality, experience, truth, and community. But because there is such great diversity in “Christian” feminist thought, the ultimate question becomes, “How far may we take feminist themes and theological emphases in light of biblical evidence?”

The answer to this question depends on one’s interpretative methodology. An overreliance on themes for the basis of theology may create circular arguments and/or import alien assumptions into the biblical text. And in the case of Christian feminism, contrasting theological emphases inevitably result from different assumptions regarding truth, biblical authority, and canonical inspiration.

B. TALBERT-WETTLER

See also FEMINISM, FEMINIST THEOLOGY; WOMAN, BIBLICAL CONCEPT OF; WOMEN, ORDINATION OF.

Bibliography. G. Bilezikian, Beyond Sex Roles; M. Evans, Woman in the Bible; E. S. Fiorenza, In Memory of Her; P. Gundry, Woman Be Free; G. Hull, Equal to Serve; P. Jewett, Man as Male and Female; C. Keener, Paul, Women and Wives; A. Mickelsen, ed., Women, Authority and the Bible; V. Mollenkott, Godding: Women, Men and the Bible; R. R. Ruether, Sexism and God-Talk; L. Russell, Feminist Interpretation of the Bible; L. Scanzoni and N. Hardesty, All We’re Meant To Be; A. Spencer, Beyond the Curse; W. Swartley, Slavery, Sabbath, War and Women; P. Trible, Sexuality of Rhetoric; R. Tucker and W. Liefeld, Daughters of the Church; M. S. Van Leeuwen, Gender and Grace; P. Young, Feminist Theology/Christian Theology.

Fénelon, Francois de Salignac de la Mothe (1651–1715). French archbishop and educator. Son of a marquis in the Dordogne, he studied at St. Sulpice Seminary in Paris and in 1675 was made priest. As director of the Catholiques Nouvelles, which sought to instruct women who were new or potential converts to Catholicism, he displayed charisma and deep psychological insights, but his was a severe regime, as reflected in Education of Daughters. A more tolerant mood was at first apparent after Louis XIV launched a repressive crusade against the Huguenots. The 1598 Edict of Nantes was revoked in 1685 and Calvinism outlawed. Most Huguenots left France, and Fénelon was among the leading churchmen sent into the provinces to convert those who remained. His tolerance level, however, was not high, and when his “loving persuasion” and attractive expositions met with little success, he recommended “salutary pressure” by the state against the recalcitrants.

In 1689 Fénelon became tutor to Louis XIV’s grandchildren, which service was rewarded in 1695 by appointment as archbishop of Cambrai, despite his criticism of the king’s lifestyle. A major reversal came, however, when he defended the mystical doctrines of Madame Guyon. She held that the soul must self-sacrificingly prove its love for God, unconcerned whether he cares or responds. Such views incurred the formidable opposition of J. B. Bossuet and L. A. de Noailles. In his Maxims of the Saints, Fénelon sought to distinguish between true mysticism and a Quietism accused of “idle basking in the Divine Presence.” He asserted that “pure contemplation is negative, being occupied with no sensible image, no distinct and name-able idea; it stops only at the purely intellectual and abstract idea of Being.” The king sided with Fénelon’s foes, as (belatedly) did Pope Innocent XII, and Fénelon was confined to his diocese.

Those final years saw Fénelon at his best. He trained worthy priests, encouraged preaching, and when his diocese was disrupted by the War of Spanish Succession (1702–13), he turned his palace into a refugee center, personally cared for the sick and wounded, and gave his episcopal income to famine relief. Many of his letters of spiritual counsel have been published. He also wrote much in defense of Rome against the Jansenists.

J. D. DOUGLAS

See also GUYON, MADAME; MYSTICISM.

Festivals. See CHRISTIAN YEAR; FEASTS AND FESTIVALS, OLD TESTAMENT.

Fideism. A theological term coined at the turn of the century by Protestant modernists in Paris (Menegoz, Sabatier) to describe their own thought, but since used pejoratively to attack various strands of Christian “irrationalism.” Fideists, following Kant (who argued that reason cannot prove religious truth), are said to base their understanding of the Christian faith upon religious experience alone, understanding reason to be incapable of establishing either faith’s certitude or credibility. Among others, Luther, Kierkegaard,

Fideism

Van Til, Schleiermacher, and Barth have been accused of fideism. The term, however, is used too imprecisely to be of much value. Certainly none of these theologians would deny the use of reason altogether. If helpful at all, the term functions to describe an excessive emphasis upon the subjective dimensions of Christianity.

R. K. JOHNSTON

See also EXPERIENCE, THEOLOGY OF.

Filioque. The term means “and from the Son” and refers to the phrase in the Western version of the Nicene Creed, which says that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son. Originally this was not in the confessions agreed to at Nicea (325) and Constantinople (381). It seems to have been first inserted at the local Council of Toledo (589) and in spite of opposition gradually established itself in the West, being officially endorsed in 1017. Photius of Constantinople denounced it in the ninth century, and it formed the main doctrinal issue in the rupture between East and West in 1054. An attempted compromise at Florence in 1439 came to nothing. Among the fathers, Hilary, Jerome, Ambrose, Augustine, Epiphanius, and Cyril of Alexandria may be cited in its favor; Theodore of Mopsuestia and Theodoret against it; with the Cappadocians occupying the middle ground of “from the Father through the Son.”

On the Eastern side two points may be made. First, the relevant verse in John (15:26) speaks only of a proceeding from the Father. Second, the addition never had ecumenical approval. Two points may also be made for the filioque. First, it safeguards the vital Nicene truth that the Son is consubstantial with the Father. Second, the Son as well as the Father sends the Spirit in John 15:26, and by analogy with this relationship to us we are justified in inferring that the Spirit proceeds from both Father and Son in the intratrinitarian relationship. Not to say this is to divorce the Spirit from the Son in contradiction of the passages that speak of him as the Spirit of Christ (cf. Rom. 8:9; Gal. 4:6).

G. W. BROMILEY

Bibliography. K. Barth, Church Dogmatics; J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines; H. B. Swete, History of the Doctrine of the Procession of the Holy Spirit; H. Thielicke, Evangelical Faith.

Final State. The theological term used for the two eternal destinies of heaven and hell. Jesus himself spoke often of both these eternal states, sometimes together: “And these will go away into eternal punishment, but the righteous into eternal life” (Matt. 25:46 NASB).

The OT is not so explicit in its teaching concerning eternal punishment as the final state of the wicked as is the NT. In at least one OT passage it is clearly taught: “Multitudes who sleep in the dust of the earth will awake: some to everlasting life, others to shame and everlasting contempt” (Dan. 12:2).

Although it is not easy to conceive of a final state of punishment, this eternal state is clearly the teaching of Scripture, especially of the NT. The NT does not teach either universalism or the annihilation of the impenitent. It teaches instead that after a “great white throne judgment,” everyone will be ushered into one of two final states: eternal heaven or eternal hell: “Then I saw a great white throne and him who was seated on it. . . . And I saw the dead, great and small, standing before the throne. . . . The dead were judged. . . . If anyone’s name was not found written in the book of life, he was thrown into the lake of fire” (Rev. 20:11–15; see also Matt. 25:41, 46; Luke 16:26). And Paul said, “They will be punished with everlasting destruction and shut out from the presence of the Lord and from the majesty of his power” (2 Thess. 1:9).

J. K. GRIDER

See also HEAVEN; HELL; JUDGMENT; JUDGMENT SEAT.

Finney, Charles Grandison (1792–1875). Between 1824 and 1832 Finney established the modern forms and methods of revivalism in America; he then spent the last forty years of his life constructing a theology of revival and Christian life.

Raised and educated in upstate New York, Finney settled down as a lawyer in Adams, New York, in 1820. The next year an intense experience of religious conversion induced him to prepare for the ministry of the church. He then studied under the local Presbyterian pastor in Adams and received ordination in the Oneida Presbytery (1824). For the next eight years he led revival meetings in upper New York state and in major cities from Wilmington to Boston, including New York City. Next (1832–36) came the pastorate of Chatham Street Chapel (Presbyterian) in New York City, where he initiated his pattern of lawyerlike theological lectures. He became professor at what was soon called Oberlin College in Ohio (1836) and, as he developed his belief in “Christian perfection,” became a Congregational minister. He remained at Oberlin until his death, serving as the second president (1851–66). He conducted a few revivals in the 1840s and 1850s, including one tour in Great Britain in 1859–60.

Finney’s Lectures on Revival (1835) sought to preach a “right view of both classes of truths,” namely, God’s sovereignty and free human agency. He detailed the means he believed God had established for humans to promote revival among both “backslidden Christians” and “unconverted sinners.” Christians needed to have “a burning love for souls,” to “grow in grace,” and to ask sinners to “give their hearts to God.” He expected revival to sweep America, bringing progress and social reforms—democracy, abolition of slavery, temperance, education, and eschewing of luxury and fashionable display. In Finney's Letters on Revival (1845) he confessed he had been too optimistic. He nonetheless wished to use Oberlin to prepare "a new race of revival ministers" and, as he explained in Lectures to Professing Christians (1837) and later writings, to awaken people to the attainable duty of practicing Christian perfection as commanded by Matthew 5:48.

C. T. MCINTIRE

See also HOLINESS MOVEMENT, AMERICAN; OBERLIN THEOLOGY; REVIVAL, SPIRITUAL; REVIVALISM.

Bibliography. C. G. Finney, Autobiography of Charles G. Finney; Lectures on Revivals of Religion; Memoirs; R. A. G. Dupuis and G. M. Rosell, eds., Memoirs of Charles G. Finney; R. A. Beltz, Charles G. Finney; W. R. Cross, Burned Over District: Enthusiastic Religion in Western New York, 1800–1850; V. R. Edman, Finney Lives On; M. L. Grandle, Finney's Doctrine of Sanctification; W. H. Harding, Charles G. Finney; K. J. Hardman, Charles Grandison Finney, 1792–1875; A. M. Hills, Life of Charles G. Finney; W. G. McLoughlin, Modern Revivalism: Finney to Billy Graham; E. Reese, Life and Ministry of Charles Finney; T. Smith, "The Doctrine of Sanctifying Christ: Charles G. Finney's Synthesis of Wesleyan and Covenant Theology," WITJ 13:92–113; T. L. Smith, Revivalism and Social Reform; G. F. Wright, Charles Grandison Finney.

Fire, Lake of. See LAKE OF FIRE.

Firstborn. Primogeniture, the exclusive right of inheritance belonging to the firstborn, is traceable back to patriarchal times. Ishmael, though the eldest son of Abraham, was not accounted a firstborn because his mother was a slave (Gen. 21:10). Esau bartered his birthright and thereby opened himself to the charge of profanity, for he had spurned his right of inheritance (Gen. 25:33).

The idea of firstborn in the NT is indicated by prōtotokos, which occurs eight times, most of them referring to Christ, sometimes historically, sometimes figuratively. That the term is a messianic title is suggested by the Greek of Psalm 89:27. The NT alludes to Christ as the firstborn in three aspects. (1) In Colossians 1:15 he is said to be the "firstborn over all creation," and Hebrews 1:6 also describes him by this word. The Arians used these passages as evidence that our Lord was a created being, but the proper understanding is implied by the context in Colossians, viz., that it refers to the preincarnate Christ. Moreover, the term declares Christ to be the Lord of creation, for as the firstborn he is the heir of the created order. (2) Colossians 1:18 and Revelation 1:5 use firstborn in a sense similar to the firstfruits of 1 Corinthians 15:20. Christ is the firstborn from the dead because he was the first to be raised. (3) Romans 8:29 teaches that Christ is the "firstborn among many brothers," which affirms that believers have joined the family of which Christ is the eldest Son. Hebrews 12:23 projects the idea so that all who believe are given the status of firstborn sons and therefore heirs of God.

D. H. WALLACE

See also CHRISTOLOGY; JESUS CHRIST; LOGOS; WORD, WORD OF GOD, WORD OF THE LORD.

Bibliography. K. H. Bartels, NIDNT 1:667–70; L. R. Helyer, "Arius Revisted: The Firstborn Over All Creation," JETS 31/1:59–67; W. Michaelis, TDNT 6:871–82.

First Day of the Week. See LORD'S DAY.

First Resurrection. See RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD.

Five Points of Calvinism. This term refers to the most popularly identifiable tenets of the theology of John Calvin (1509–64). The five-point structure did not arise as a result of an intentional attempt to present a comprehensive representation of Calvin's teachings. Rather, its origins developed within the historical discussions that occurred in Holland during the beginning of the seventeenth century.

The larger context of these discussions prior to and during this period concerned the nature of the will of God for the world. Debate had been sparked by Calvin's affirmation of the eternal decrees of God as the all-encompassing first and only cause for all things. One of the most vigorous opponents of this position was a Dutch seminary professor, James Arminius (1560–1609). It was the reaction of his followers that was to provide the occasion for the development of the five points.

The central point of contention for the Arminians (as Arminius's followers were called) was Calvin's doctrine of predestination. They viewed this position as fatalistic and believed that it thus compromised the integrity of the will of God and humans. Calvinistic predestination, they argued, first of all, restricted God to some "inward necessity." Second, it did not allow for an uncaused faith response from humanity as a free and responsible act.

By 1610 the Arminian's arguments had coalesced into "five articles of faith" presented to the Church of Holland as a form of "Remonstrance" or protest. Their goal was to have the official "Calvinistic" standards of the Church of Holland revised to reflect the doctrinal views of their Remonstrance. The Synod of Dort was convened, therefore, on November 13, 1618. After careful consideration, the eighty-four members rejected all five articles of the Remonstrance. Not content to simply reject each of the articles, the members desired to affirm the truth of Scripture and Calvinistic teaching. For better or worse, their published response to the Arminians' five points has been known as "the five points of Calvinism."

Five Points of Calvinism

These five points have since been popularly labeled by the acrostic TULIP. In response to the Arminians' qualified assent to humankind's depravity (Art. III), Dort affirmed humankind's Total depravity or inability to desire the good except for intervening and irresistible grace. Second, while the Arminians conditioned salvation of the elect on foreseen faith, Dort affirmed Unconditional election resting solely on God's sovereign will. To the Arminians' affirmation of universal atonement, Dort responded by qualifying Christ's death as intended to save only the elect. This point unfortunately has been labeled Limited atonement. Fourth, the Arminians asserted that God's Spirit can be effectively resisted with regard to salvation. Dort affirmed the Irresistibility of God's gracious call. Finally, to the Arminians' claim that saints could fall finally from grace, Dort affirmed the final Perseverance of God's elect to eternal salvation.

J. MITCHELL JR.

See also ARMINIANISM; ARMINIUS, JAMES; ATONEMENT, EXTENT OF; CALVIN, JOHN; CALVINISM; DEPRAVITY, TOTAL; DORT, SYNOD OF; ELECT, ELECTION; GRACE; PERSEVERANCE; PREDESTINATION; REMONSTRANTS.

Five Ways. Philosophical arguments by which Thomas Aquinas (1224?–74) sought to prove the existence of God (Summa Theologica). The Five Ways argue a posteriori, i.e., from the effects of God that are known, (1) that motion implies a first mover; (2) that a series of effects requires an uncaused first cause; (3) that contingent things, things whose existence is not self-explanatory, require a necessary being; (4) that the presence of imperfections implies a perfect standard; and (5) that a design in nature implies a designer. Aquinas's attempt to demonstrate formally God's existence through rational argument was a part of natural theology, making no appeal to special revelation (Scripture). He set out to show that the truth from nature was congruent with that from grace and did not supplant it.

The arguments were adopted by Melancthon, Calvin, F. Turretin, J. Edwards, and C. Hodge, and later by B. B. Warfield, all believing the real must be rational. The tide shifted with Kant's Critique of Pure Reason (1781). Kant argued that humankind's knowledge of the real (the noumena, of which God is a part) was impossible because human knowledge only extends to the perceived world (the phenomena). He argued that the idea of a perfect being entails only the idea of existence. Reason and its proofs are only mental constructs. Therefore, the existence of God per se is not proven. Kant's influence was profound. In his Church Dogmatics, Barth repudiates any rational defense of theism as futile at best. Bultmann, Kierkegaard, A. Kuyper, and C. Van Til believed the effort rationally to prove God's existence from the analysis of the world (our perceptions) must always fail because only by faith can one reach noumenal truth. J. W. Montgomery, F. Schaeffer, and C. Pinnock offer a revised form of the proofs yet more as suggestive than compelling. E. L. Mascall argues that the Five Ways are sound in He Who Is: A Study in Traditional Theism (1958) and Existence and Analogy (1967), and suggests that the proofs have been prematurely dismissed. Others have joined Mascall in defending all or part of the Five Ways: C. S. Lewis, Beyond Personality; J. Gerstner, Reasons for Faith; and C. F. H. Henry, God, Revelation, and Authority.

J. R. LINCOLN

See also GOD, ARGUMENTS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF.

Bibliography. T. Aquinas, Summa Theologica; G. K. Chesterton, St. Thomas Aquinas; I. Kant, Critique of Pure Reason; E. L. Mascall, Existence and Analogy; He Who Is: A Study in Traditional Theism; H. A. Meynell, Intelligible Universe; R. Swinburne, Existence of God; Is There a God?

Fixed Feast. A fixed feast differs from a movable feast within the various types of feasts celebrated in the Christian year. Easter is a movable feast because its historical development states that it may appear on various dates during the year. Christmas is a fixed feast because its historical development states that it must fall every year on December 25.

T. J. GERMAN

See also CHRISTIAN YEAR; MOVABLE FEAST.

Bibliography. N. M. Denis-Boulet, Christian Calendar.

Flacius, Matthias (1520–1575). Lutheran theologian born in the Adriatic peninsula of Istria. His Croatian name, Vlacic, was Latinized as Flacius and Illyricus was added to indicate his homeland, resulting in his being commonly called Matthias Flacius Illyricus. He studied with humanistic scholars in Venice (1536–39), and later, through the influence of his uncle, he attended the universities of Basel, Tübingen, and Wittenberg. While studying at Wittenberg he was converted to evangelical doctrine and subsequently became a professor at the institution (1544), lecturing on Hebrew, Aristotle, and the Scriptures. His opposition to the Augsburg Interim led him to leave Wittenberg and settle at the University of Jena. Here he helped to establish a center of conservative Lutheran doctrine.

Brilliant and controversial, Flacius became involved in many of the struggles that plagued later sixteenth-century Lutheranism. These included the adiaphoristic, the majoristic, and the synergistic controversies. Flacius and his supporters founded the Gnesio-Lutheran ("true Lutheran") faction, which attacked Melanchthon and his followers for being too conciliatory toward Roman Catholicism and proceeded to develop a Lutheran teaching not only in distinction from Catholicism but also in opposition to the doctrine of the more moderate Lutherans (the Philippists). In the most basic of these struggles, the adiaphoristic controversy, Flacius condemned his opponents for making concessions to Catholicism in the matter of church ceremonies. The “true Lutheran” view, he believed, held that nothing is an adiaphoron (a matter of indifference) if it touches on any aspect of Christian truth. By 1561 his constant polemics led to his dismissal from Jena. Subsequently he lived in Regensburg, Antwerp, Strasbourg, and Frankfurt.

In addition to his personal role in developing the Lutheran position, Flacius is well known for his books. These include the Clavis, or key to the Scriptures, which sets forth his hermeneutical principles, and a history of the church, the Magdeburg Centuries. The latter work, written by Flacius and six other Lutheran scholars, is a monumental attempt to present in thirteen volumes the story of the Christian church to the year 1308. The work is highly polemical, viewing history as a struggle between God and Satan in which the pope and the Roman Church represent Satan’s power on earth. The biased tone of these volumes led to an impassioned response from Cesare Baronius entitled the Annales ecclesiastici (1588–1607).

R. G. CLOUSE

See also ADIAPHORA, ADIAPHORISTS; MAJORISTIC CONTROVERSY; MELANCHTHON, PHILIP; MONERGISM; SYNERGISM.

Bibliography. J. D. Douglas, ed., Who’s Who in Christian History; H. W. Reimann, “Matthias Flacius Illyricus,” CTM 35:69–93.

Flesh. Certain obvious meanings, literal and figurative, are expressed throughout the Bible by the word “flesh.” The words šē’ēr and bāsār in the OT and sarx in the NT are translated as “flesh” in the KJV and describe the vehicle and circumstances of one’s physical life in this world. Thus, in Philippians 1:22–24 Paul contrasts abiding “in the flesh” with departing to be “with Christ.” Regularly, “flesh” is used along with “bones,” “blood,” or “body” (e.g., Prov. 5:11; 1 Cor. 15:50) to isolate for inspection the physical aspect of man’s nature. From its use for the outer covering of the body (Gen. 2:21), there arose a figurative sense of outward appearance and human standards (1 Cor. 1:26; Eph. 2:11). More important is the recognition of the contrast between two modes of being signified by the words “flesh” and “spirit” (Isa. 31:3; Jer. 17:5). By comparison with God, humankind is seen as sharing in a common flesh, and the expression “all flesh” customarily acknowledges the solidarity of the race (Gen. 6:12; Matt. 24:22; 1 Pet. 1:24). It is no distance from this to the use of “flesh” to mean “next of kin” (Lev. 18:6) or, more remotely, human ancestry (Rom. 4:1).

In the Old Testament. Here the first thing that becomes clear from the use of the word “flesh” is the outright opposition to anything that savors of Gnosticism. While there is general recognition that humans are psychical as well as physical—Psalm 63:1 shows man, in both aspects, longing for God—there is total absence of any suggestion that these are separable as far as a doctrine of human nature is concerned, or that “flesh” is lower in the scale of personality than “spirit.” In fact, human psychical capacities are more often than not instanced by reference to physical organs. Thus, Psalm 73:26 speaks of the end of earthly life and hope as the failing of “flesh” and “heart.” The unity of human personality in its psychophysical nature could not be seen more clearly than by recalling that, according to the Bible, the act of sexual intercourse is spoken of in Hebrew as “knowing” (Gen. 4:1), and the result of that act is that “they will become one flesh” (Gen. 2:24; Matt. 19:5; 1 Cor. 6:16). “To know” is not here used euphemistically but literally. Marriage, in God’s plan, is intended to bring two people into the deepest and most intimate knowledge of each other. This ultimate interpenetration of personalities is called becoming “one flesh.”

While there is nothing in the OT corresponding to the NT view of the “flesh” as the central and dynamic principle of fallen humanity, yet the OT, with its emphasis on “flesh personality,” offers the background against which the NT can paint its picture of human nature held in thrall by a dynamism that has captured the citadel of its essential unity. This, in turn, illuminates the constantly fleshly terms in which the holy life is expressed. In Genesis 17:13 God says that his covenant is “in your flesh,” and the prophets (e.g., Jer. 4:4) use the same symbol of circumcision to express a consecrated return to God. There can be no salvation that is not a salvation of “flesh,” and when Ezekiel looks forward to God’s act of regeneration, he declares that God will “remove from you your heart of stone and give you a heart of flesh” (36:26). Herein he implies what Paul states: that the flesh has become perverted, and that God plans for humanity that which we have learned to call the “resurrection of the body.”

In the New Testament. The NT doctrine of the flesh is chiefly but not exclusively Pauline. The “flesh” is a dynamic principle of sinfulness (Gal. 5:17; Jude 23). The unregenerate are “sinful flesh” (Rom. 8:3); they live “after the flesh” (Rom. 8:5). In them the flesh, with its “passions and desires” (Gal. 5:24), works “death” (Rom. 7:5). The flesh, producing “acts” (Gal. 5:19) in those who live “after the flesh” (Rom. 8:12), is characterized by “lust,” or evil “human desires” (1 John 2:16; Gal. 5:16; 1 Pet. 4:2; 2 Pet. 2:10), which enslaves the bodily members and also dominates the mind (Eph. 2:3), so that there is a complete mental affiliation called “the mind of the flesh” (Rom. 8:5, 7). Under these circumstances life is given to fleshly satisfactions (Col. 2:23) and is described as “sowing unto the flesh,” whence is reaped a harvest of fleshly corruption (Gal. 6:8). Such people are dominated by “sinful passions” (Rom. 7:5), unable to obey God’s law (Rom. 8:3) or to please God (Rom. 8:8). Even their religious practice is astray from God’s will because of fleshly thinking (Col. 2:18). They are “objects of wrath” (Eph. 2:3).

Flesh

Very different are those who have experienced God’s regeneration. They remain “in” the flesh, but they are no longer “after” the flesh (Gal. 2:20). They need to be watchful. For the fact of the flesh means dullness of spiritual perception (Rom. 6:19), and though Christians need pay none of the claims of the flesh (Rom. 8:12), yet they must remember that in their flesh there is nothing good (Rom. 7:18), and that if they should repose their trust there again (Gal. 3:3; Phil. 3:3), they would lapse into bondage (Rom. 7:25). They have become the recipients of a new principle of life sufficient to oust the old principle of death (Rom. 8:4, 9, 13; Gal. 5:16–17), “the life of Jesus” in their mortal bodies (2 Cor. 4:10–11).

We have thus traced the notion of the flesh from its pure conception in the Creator’s plan to the depths of its self-wrought corruption and to the re-creation in Christ. It remains to show how the work of Christ is expressed in the same terminology. Here also Christ redeemed us from the curse by becoming the curse himself: “The Word became flesh” (John 1:14). The sinlessness of Jesus is preserved by the careful statement that God sent his Son “in the likeness of sinful man” (Rom. 8:3; cf. Heb. 4:15), and the blessed truth is declared that the Son became one with us at the point of our need (Heb. 2:14) in order to deal with sin at the point of its strength. “Flesh” is constantly used to teach the genuine manhood of the Savior (Rom. 9:5; Heb. 5:7). Yet it is not his flesh as displayed in its perfection, but his flesh as “given” (John 6:51–56) that avails for the life of the world. It was by his being made “a sin offering” that he condemned sin in his flesh (Rom. 8:3). The flesh is the sphere and instrument of his redeeming work (Col. 1:22; 1 Pet. 3:18; 4:1). This was the sublime purpose of the incarnation (Heb. 10:5–20). Jesus took on flesh in order that in and by his flesh he might loose us from the bondage of the flesh and fulfill the prophecy by making us “a letter from Christ . . . written not with ink but with the Spirit of the living God, not on tablets of stone but on tablets of human hearts” (2 Cor. 3:3; cf. Ezek. 36:26).

J. A. MOTYER

See also MANKIND, DOCTRINE OF; SIN.

Bibliography. W. Barclay, Flesh and Spirit; O. Cullmann, Immortality of the Soul or Resurrection of the Dead?; W. D. Davies, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism; W. P. Dickson, St. Paul’s Use of the Terms Flesh and Spirit; R. Jewett, Paul’s Anthropological Terms; W. G. Kümmel, Man in the New Testament; J. A. T. Robinson, Body; E. Schweizer et al., TDNT 7:98–151; C. R. Smith, Biblical Doctrine of Man; W. D. Stacey, Pauline View of Man; A. C. Thiselton, NIDNTT 1:671–82.

Flood. The Genesis flood account is discussed most frequently in connection with the fossil record and the ongoing quest for Noah’s ark. Within the Bible itself, however, the flood event is a paradigmatic act of divine judgment and deliverance. Within the pre-patriarchal narrative of Genesis 1–11, the flood is the first act of universal judgment (chs. 6–8) which is followed by a second, the confusion of languages (ch. 11). Both are preceded by a description of human actions (6:5; 11:5) and the divine response (6:6—the first mention of divine grief; 11:6) and resolve to counteract human efforts (6:7; 11:7). Both are followed by covenantal blessings (ch. 9; ch. 12) as God’s gracious promises to individual families (those of Noah and Abram) establish the basis for life under his sovereign direction and provision in the aftermath of judgment. That the flood should be viewed as a punitive rather than a corrective act of God is suggested by Genesis 8:21, which states that human sinfulness was just as marked after the flood as before (6:5). The flood, however, also must be viewed as an act of divine grace in preserving the life of one righteous individual, Noah, and his family, reaffirming the original creation blessing with them (9:1; cf. 1:22) and establishing (or reestablishing, cf. Dumbrell) a covenant with all creation which included a promise never again to destroy the earth by a flood.

Either of these two aspects can be emphasized in later biblical texts alluding to the flood. Psalm 29:10 alludes to God’s sovereign control over the mighty flood waters as well as drawing on a Canaanite tradition of the deity’s subjugation of chaotic water forces, since it is the only text outside Genesis 6–11 to use the specific Hebrew term for the flood (mabbul). Isaiah 24:18 employs an expression similar to “the floodgates of heaven” (Gen. 7:11 and 8:2) to describe a future cataclysmic judgment (Isa. 24:5 may refer to the breaking of the Noahic covenant of Gen. 9). Another possible allusion to the Genesis flood as a paradigm of divine judgment is found in Job 22:16, a judgment which even the righteousness of Noah could not avert (Ezek. 14:14, 20; Heb. 11:7). The flood is also viewed in the NT as a time of careless disregard for impending doom (Matt. 24:37–39; Luke 17:26–27). In other passages, however, God’s covenantal faithfulness and grace are prominent: Isaiah 54:9 reaffirms God’s promise never again to be destructively angry with Israel; 1 Peter 3:20–21 even describes the flood waters as an instrument of salvation for which baptism is the “antitype.” The twin emphases of judgment and deliverance are brought together in 2 Peter 2:5.

Although not necessarily alluding specifically to the biblical flood, the flood motif is a frequently employed image of destruction, primarily resulting from divine judgment: 2 Sam. 5:20; 1 Chron. 14:11; Job 20:28; 22:11; 27:20; 38:34; Pss. 69:2, 15; 88:17; 124:4; Isa. 8:7–8; 59:19; Dan. 9:26; 11:10, 40; Hos. 5:10; Nah. 1:8; cf. Luke 6:48.

Since cleansing and redemption, not punishment and destruction, are God’s ultimate purpose, the flood waters which brought the primeval world to an end led to the recreation of the world out of the waters, analogous to the first creation of the world out of the waters of chaos (Anderson and Gage; cf. 2 Peter 3:5–6), Noah being portrayed after the flood as a new Adam, though in a fallen world. Similarly, the days leading up to the judgment which will conclude the present age are compared with the “days of Noah” (Matt. 24:27–39; Luke 17:26–27). The present earth also will be destroyed, though this time by fire, before the creation of the new heaven and new earth (2 Pet. 3:7, 13). It is the divine word, and not the mighty waters, that creates, preserves, destroys, and restores life. Thus Peter could regard Noah’s deliverance as a type of Christian redemption (Dumbrell), affirming the flood’s significance as an act of salvation as well as judgment.

R. L. SCHULTZ

Bibliography. B. W. Anderson, From Creation to New Creation: Old Testament Perspectives; P. C. Craigie, Psalms 1–50; W. J. Dumbrell, Covenant and Creation; W. A. Gage, Gospel of Genesis: Studies in Protology and Eschatology; G. V. Smith, “Structure and Purpose in Genesis 1–11,” JETS 20:307–19; D. A. Young, Biblical Flood: A Case Study of the Church’s Response to Extrabiblical Evidence.

Florovsky, Georges (1893–1979). Russian Orthodox theologian, patristic scholar, and ecumenical churchman. Florovsky was born of a highly educated priestly family in Odessa in the Ukraine. His intellectual talents were evident in his youth. Graduating from the University of Odessa in philosophy, he taught there until his family emigrated from Russia in 1920. After short stays in Bulgaria and Prague, in 1926 he settled in Paris, where he taught at St. Sergius Institute of Theology as professor of Patristics. In 1948 he became professor and later dean of St. Vladimir’s Theological Academy (later Seminary) in New York City. Florovsky vigorously improved the academic standards and made it more truly pan-Orthodox, admitting students of other Orthodox jurisdictions. His legacy was to establish Orthodox theological education on a level comparable to other educational institutions. In 1956 he was appointed professor at Harvard Divinity School, a position he held until his retirement in 1964 at age seventy. He then moved to Princeton University, where for eight years he was a visiting professor. He taught at Princeton Theological Seminary until his death.

Florovsky’s great theological contribution was in the area of an understanding of the fathers. As he explained it, since he was basically self-taught, he read the fathers in the original languages without reading critical commentaries. His neopatristic synthesis represents an understanding of patristics that finds the locus of the theological inspiration of the fathers in the Scripture alone. However, the fathers rationalized scriptural data in Greek philosophical categories. Florovsky termed this “Christian Hellenism,” which he saw as the direct opposite of Gnostic Hellenism. Gnosticism, for Florovsky, has no basis for free faith and no awareness of the impossibility of true thought outside the Creator. He uses “Gnosticism” as a category for diverse theological positions from deism to contemporary neo-orthodoxy and the teachings of existential Protestant theologians. His emphasis on the Scriptures as the basis of the Christian faith brought him close to evangelicals.

As an ecumenical participant in Faith and Order consultations and as a member of the Central Committee of the World Council of Churches, Florovsky was unyielding in his insistence on a biblical and christological base. His participation in international conferences spanned the critical formation period of the WCC. In later years the council moved away from the basic theological issues that Florovsky thought should define the discussions among various parts of Christendom to social issues that, although important, he felt were not the unique province of an ecumenical body. His writing on ecumenical themes helped define Orthodox participation in a wide theological discussion, and he maintained that Orthodox participation in the WCC was a form of missionary witness to the truth of Christianity.

J. J. STAMOOLIS

See also ORTHODOX TRADITION.

Bibliography. G. Florovsky, Bible, Church and Tradition: An Eastern Orthodox View; Christianity and Culture; Creation and Redemption; Ways of Russian Theology; A. Blane, Georges Florovsky: Russian Intellectual and Orthodox Churchman.

Followers of the Way. See CHRISTIANS, NAMES OF.

Foot Washing. A religious act in some segments of the Christian church based on the performance and command of Jesus at the Last Supper. The wearing of open sandals, the dry climate, and dusty roads made foot washing upon entering a home a familiar practice in Eastern hospitality. The custom was practiced at least as early as Abraham (Gen. 18:4; 19:2) and continued in the nation of Israel (Judg. 19:21). Usually it was performed by the person himself but at times by a servant. For the host to perform it was an unusual favor (1 Sam. 25:41). Failure to provide such amenities was a discourtesy (Luke 7:44).

Foot Washing

The practice was given special prominence by Jesus when he washed his disciples' feet (John 13:1–17). His statement that the disciples "also should wash one another's feet" (v. 14) gave added importance to the act.

While recognizing that Jesus' performance utilized the common custom, most interpreters understand that the explanation to Peter, "You do not realize now what I am doing" (John 13:7), reflected more than a forgotten courtesy. Jesus' washing of feet is usually explained as teaching the need for humility in the light of the disciples' obvious lack of self-abasement in the upper room (Luke 22:24–30). Yet the point of the matter lay elsewhere, for Jesus said that if he did not do so, Peter, not Jesus, would be the one deficient (John 13:8).

Spiritual cleansing was the primary emphasis in the act. Lack of cleansing was stated regarding Judas (John 13:10–11). All except Judas had been "bathed" (leloumenos—complete bath), but they still needed their feet washed (nipsasthai—partial washing). The complete bath represented salvation as symbolized by baptism. The washing of the feet symbolized the need that believers have for repeated cleansing from defilement through contact with a sinful world.

Many Christians have understood Jesus to have intended this act to be perpetuated on the basis of John 13:14–15. The practice of the pedilavium may be seen in the early church from 1 Timothy 5:10 and from patristic notices in Tertullian (De Corona 8) and Athanasius (Canon 66). The Synod of Toledo (694) prescribed it. It has been observed by Roman and Greek churches and in such Protestant groups as Brethren, Menonites, Waldensians, Winebrennarians, and some Baptists.

H. A. KENT JR.

Bibliography. R. D. Culver, ZPEB 2:588; H. A. Hoyt, This Do in Remembrance of Me; M. H. Shepherd Jr., IDB 2:308; J. R. Shultz, Soul of the Symbols; P. Tschackert, SHERK 4:339–40.

Foreknowledge. Scripture uses the term "fore-know" for God's prescience or foresight concerning future events. Foreknowledge is thus an aspect of God's omniscience. All things—past, present, and future; external and internal; material, intellectual, and spiritual—are open to God. The Lord knows all things (1 Sam. 2:3), or everything (1 John 3:20). Nothing in all creation is hidden from God's sight (Heb. 4:13). Israel is not hid from him (Hos. 5:3). He knows every secret sin (Ps. 90:8). His knowledge is too wonderful for us, encompassing words and thoughts and our total being (Ps. 139). He knows all the ways of all his creatures; not a sparrow falls to the ground without him (Matt. 10:29). He records our tears (Ps. 56:8). He knows the way of the righteous (Ps. 1:6) and is not ignorant, uncaring, or impotent when the wicked afflict his people (Ps. 94:1–11). His knowledge is complete, allowing for no confusion, obscurity, deficiency, or error. It is like the full light of day: "God is light; in him there is no darkness at all" (1 John 1:5).

Omniscience naturally includes prescience. God does not just know what is happening or has already happened. He knows what is still to happen. This comes out most plainly in Isaiah 40–66. God boldly announces the fall of Babylon and the liberation of his people. He challenges all comers to show comparable knowledge: "Tell us what the future holds" (41:23); "New things I declare; before they spring into being I announce them to you" (42:9). Nor is God's foreknowledge displayed only here; it underlies the element of foretelling in all prophecy. Micaiah tells Ahab his end (1 Kings 22:13–23). Elisha announces the relief of Samaria (2 Kings 7). Jeremiah and Ezekiel declare the ineluctability of the fall of Jerusalem (Jer. 9:11–16; Ezek. 4). Daniel offers visions of complex future events (ch. 11). Details about the coming Messiah include his Davidic descent (Isa. 11:1), his birth at Bethlehem (Mic. 5:2), and his death with the wicked and burial among the rich (Isa. 53:9). It is true that full knowledge of past and present, too, belongs to God alone, but perfect knowledge of the future is a particular mark of deity that arrogant humanity, having no true claim to such knowledge, consistently denies or disparages—e.g., in its handling of the predictive element in Scripture.

Foreknowledge stands in obvious relation to the divine eternity. God is "the high and lofty One" "who lives forever" (Isa. 57:15). "A thousand years in [his] sight are like a day that has just gone by" (Ps. 90:4, cf. 2 Pet. 3:8). Past, present, and future are all present to God. He sees the end from the beginning and the beginning at the end. Being part of creation, time does not limit or condition God. As Lord of time, he does not live or act in abstraction from it. He eternally "comprehends" it, being before, with, and after it. Having total knowledge of all that has been and is, he also has total knowledge of all that will be.

God's foreknowledge stands related to his will and power. What he knows, he does not know merely as information. He is no mere spectator. What he foreknows he ordains. He wills it. In his challenge to the gods in Isaiah 40 and the following chapters, he can "make known the end from the beginning, . . . what is still to come," because “my purpose will stand, and I will do all that I please” (46:10). Nor does he know merely because he wills. He knows because, willing, he has the power to do his will. “What I have said, that will I bring about” (46:11); “When I act, who can reverse it?” (43:13).

By reason of the totality of will and power in God’s prescience, the “pre” in the word has more than temporal meaning. With his prior knowledge of things, God is the presupposition of their being. As Augustine says, we know things because they are, but things are because God knows them. All that exists does so first and eternally in God’s knowledge. We must not press this to the point of saying that his foreknowledge is the cause of all things. God knows what is possible as well as actual but did not cause it. He also knows the devil and sin but plainly is not their cause. Furthermore, he knows the contingent decisions of human wills but causes them only insofar as they have their origin in him. Prescience is the presupposition of all things as the prescience of the God of will and power.

In regard to the decisions of human wills, a collision seems to arise between divine foreknowledge and human freedom. God plainly foreknows and foreordains everything. Nothing outside him restricts or conditions his own freedom. He is always free to be himself and to will and act as such. This rules out pantheism, dualism, and every form of Pelagianism. Nevertheless, Scripture no less plainly teaches human responsibility in moral decision (cf. Acts 4:27–28; Eph. 1:11; Rom. 8:29–30 for divine sovereignty; Deut. 30:19; 1 Kings 18:21; Acts 2:21 for human responsibility). Divine foreknowledge must not be confused with determinism or fatalism, difficult though the reconciling of prescience and human choice might be.

The task of putting the two biblical truths together has led on the one hand to some valid and important distinctions. Thus, God’s necessary knowledge of himself is distinguished from his free knowledge of creatures. His speculative or contemplative knowledge is distinguished from his practical or active knowledge. His knowledge of possibility is distinguished from his knowledge of actuality. His approving knowledge of good is distinguished from his disapproving knowledge of evil (cf. the “I never knew you” of Matt. 7:23). All things are not known to God in the same way.

Some more dubious differentiations have arisen on the other hand. Thus, Molina postulated a “middle” knowledge between God’s necessary and free knowledge—i.e., a knowledge of what is only conditionally future, of what might have happened, or might happen, given certain contingencies, decisions, or circumstances (cf. 1 Sam. 23:11–12; Matt. 11:21–22). Arminius, with a special focus on predestination, separated God’s foreknowledge from his foreordination.

God foreordains the salvation of all those who, freed by his Spirit, trust in Christ, and he foreknows who will make this decision and stick to it. On this view neither foreordination nor foreknowledge affects the individual decision but at the cost of breaking the chain of Romans 8:29–30, robbing foreordination of its point, and separating the knowledge of God from his will and power.

Perhaps a more fruitful approach is from the recognition that, whether in providence or predestination, divine prescience means that God is in fact the presupposition of all things, including our wills, choices, and decisions. Nothing we do can inform or surprise him or impose conditions on him. He knows us omnipotently as our Creator and Lord. Yet he does not destroy us with this knowledge, but with it originates and guarantees our authentic freedom. Only as sinners opposing God’s will do we experience his foreknowledge as burden and bondage. True freedom, however, does not imply the possibility of defying God but of serving him. We are foreknown and foreordained in the real self-determination that sees no problem in its being self-termination in and under the divine prescience.

G. W. BROMILEY

See also ELECT, ELECTION; SCIENTIA MEDIA.

Bibliography. K. Barth, Church Dogmatics; G. C. Berkouwer, Divine Election; R. Bultmann, TDNT 1:689–719; J. Daane, ISBE 1:336–37; W. Hasker, God, Time and Knowledge; P. Helm, “Timelessness and Foreknowledge” in Mind n.s. 84:516–27; J. Kvanvig, Possibility of an All-knowing God; P. Maury, Predestination; R. L. Purtill, “Foreknowledge and Fatalism” in ReIS 10:319–23; H. Schlier, TDNT 1:515–16; R. Swinburne, “Omniscient” in Coherence of Theism; G. Vos and G. W. Bromiley, ISBE 3:598–603.

Forensic Righteousness. Forensic righteousness refers to the legal condition of those who are justified as a result of God’s declaration that they are guiltless before his law. This concept has two aspects. First, it is a legal concept derived from the language of law courts and deals with a person’s standing before God and his law. God is understood to be the righteous Ruler, Lawgiver, and Judge who pronounces the justified one to be acquitted at the bar of his justice. It is therefore essentially a declarative act of God who judicially accounts the acquitted one to be in right standing before him.

The question arises, however, of how God can declare such of the ungodly. The apostle Paul responds that on the basis of God’s imputation of Christ’s righteousness (2 Cor. 5:21), he is then free to cause the righteous state he declares to be (Rom. 3:21–26).

It is in light of the historical life of Jesus Christ that we can affirm the second aspect: forensic righteousness is an objective and real righteousness accounted to each justified person through imputation. Confusion arises, however, when this righteousness is conceived of in ethical terms. Generally speaking, this is an error of merging justification with sanctification. Sanday and Headlam speak of a kind of “fictional” righteousness, in which a justified person is treated as if he or she were righteous, while in fact remaining unrighteous. V. Taylor, on the other hand, errantly proposes a real “imparted” righteousness that the justified person actually possesses. Finally, Roman Catholic theology emphasizes an “infused” righteousness merited by Christ and maintained by the believer’s good works. J. MITCHELL JR.

Forensic Righteousness

See also JUSTIFICATION; RIGHTEOUSNESS.

Bibliography. D. Guthrie, New Testament Theology; G. E. Ladd, Theology of the New Testament; J. Morris, Apostolic Preaching of the Cross; J. Murray, Redemption: Accomplished and Applied; G. Schrenk, TDNT 2:204–5.

Foreordination. See PREDESTINATION.

Forgiveness. Seven words in Scripture denote the idea of forgiveness: three in Hebrew and four in Greek. In the Hebrew OT they are kipper, “to cover”; nāsā’, “to bear”—take away [guilt]; sālah, “to pardon.” Nāsā’ is used of both divine forgiveness and human forgiveness. The other two are used only of divine forgiveness.

In the Greek NT the words for forgiveness are apolyein, charizesthai, aphesis, and paresis. Apolyein is found numerous times as “divorces,” e.g., a wife (Matt. 5:31), but only once to signify forgiveness (Luke 6:37). Paresis is found only once (Rom. 3:25) and suggests “putting aside” or “disregarding.” In order for the righteous God to do this, for “sins committed beforehand,” Christ Jesus had to be “displayed publicly as a propitiation” (Rom. 3:25 NASB). Charizesthai is used only by Luke (Acts 3:14; et al.) and Paul, and only by the latter in the sense of “to forgive sins” (2 Cor. 2:7; Eph. 4:32; Col. 2:13; 3:13; et al.). It especially expressed the graciousness of God’s forgiveness. Thus its use in Paul’s thought that God freely gives us “all things” (Rom. 8:32).

The most common NT word for forgiveness is aphesis. This noun is found fifteen times and is generally translated “forgiveness” (e.g., Matt. 26:28 RSV, NASB, NIV). It conveys the idea of “sending away” or “letting go.” The verb with the same meaning is found about forty times.

No book of religion except the Bible teaches that God completely forgives sin, but there it is frequently taught, for example, “I will heal their waywardness and love them freely” (Hos. 14:4); “God for Christ’s sake hath forgiven you [echarisato, graciously forgiven]” (Eph. 4:32 KJV); “Their sins and lawless acts I will remember no more” (Heb. 10:17). The initiative of this forgiveness is with God, especially in Paul’s use of charizesthai (2 Cor. 12:13; Col. 2:13). It is a ready forgiveness, as is shown in the prodigal son or “gracious father” parable (Luke 15:11–32).

There is only one sin for which the Father does not promise forgiveness: blasphemy against the Holy Spirit (Matt. 12:32; Mark 3:29). The contexts seem to suggest that this sin is attributing to unclean spirits the work of the Holy Spirit, but many interpreters (including Augustine) have understood it to include a deliberate persistence in such evil. This sin is also considered by some to be the unforgiving spirit (see Matt. 18:34–35). It might be the same as the “sin that leads to death” of 1 John 5:16.

There are to be no limitations whatever to the forgiveness of others. In Luke 17:4 it is to be “seven times in a day,” and until “seventy times seven” in Matthew 18:22, both of which probably signify limitlessness. It is to be an attitude of mind even before the offending party requests forgiveness, as is implied by Jesus’ “unless you forgive your brother from your heart” (Matt. 18:35).

For us to receive forgiveness, repentance is necessary (Luke 17:3–4). For the holy God to extend forgiveness the shedding of blood (Heb. 9:22) until no life is left (Lev. 17:11) is prerequisite—ultimately, the once-for-all (Heb. 9:26) spilling of Christ’s blood and his rising again (Rom. 4:25). J. K. GRIDER

Bibliography. E. M. B. Green, Meaning of Salvation; D. Guthrie, New Testament Theology; P. Lehmann, Forgiveness; H. R. Mackintosh, Christian Experience of Forgiveness; T. McComiskey, NIDNTT 2:137–45; E. B. Redlich, Forgiveness of Sins; V. Taylor, Forgiveness and Reconciliation.

Form Criticism. Form Criticism (German Formgeschichte, “form history”) is a method of approach which has been applied to biblical and non-biblical literature alike; within the Bible it has been applied to both Testaments (e.g., in OT, to the Pentateuch and Psalter), but pre-eminently to the Gospels. It endeavors to get behind the written Gospels and their literary sources to the oral stage of the Gospel tradition, and to classify and examine the various “forms” or types of story, utterance, etc., represented in that oral tradition.

The pioneer of this method was Martin Dibelius, whose Die Formgeschichte des Evangeliums appeared in 1919, followed in 1921 by Rudolf Bultmann’s independent study Die Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition.

Classification. The main division in form-classification of the Gospel material is that between narratives and sayings. Narratives have been subdivided into (a) pronouncement stories, (b) miracle stories, (c) stories about Jesus’ sayings into (a) wisdom sayings, (b) prophetic and apocalyptic sayings, (c) law-pronouncements and community-rules, (d) sayings introduced by "I," (e) parables.

Pronouncement stories (as Vincent Taylor calls them) partake of the character of both narratives and sayings. In them a particular situation gives rise to a pointed saying of Jesus (an "apophthegm," in Bultmann's terminology), for the sake of which the incident was remembered and recorded. Frequently the situation is controversial; something done by Jesus or his disciples is criticized, and Jesus replies to the criticism with a decisive pronouncement, e.g., "The sabbath was made for man, not man for the sabbath" (Mark 2:27). Dibelius called these narratives "paradigms" because they served as illustrations in early Christian preaching.

Pronouncement stories sometimes overlap other subdivisions, e.g., the incident of the paralytic of Capernaum (Mark 2:1–12) is a pronouncement story because it leads up to the saying "the Son of man has authority on earth to forgive sins" (Mark 2:10), but it might also be classified as a miracle story, more specifically a healing story. Healing stories can be readily recognized; all over the world they follow a recurrent form which stresses the intractability of the disease, the completeness of the cure, the effect on the spectators. But the fact that a story reproduces this stereotyped form tells us nothing about its historicity. This should be remembered not only in healing and other miracle stories, but in those other "stories about Jesus" (like the baptism, the temptation, the transfiguration, the resurrection appearances) sometimes called "myths" or "legends." The ascription of these designations to the Gospel stories may obscure the fact that form criticism theoretically makes a judgment about form, not about substance.

Similarly, the classification of sayings of Jesus according to form can throw little light on their authenticity; much more depends on the individual form critic's view of the person of Jesus.

Framework. Many form critics envisage the Synoptic tradition as consisting of unrelated incidents and sayings, woven into a continuous narrative by means of editorial summaries devoid of independent historical value. (It is allowed, however, that the passion narrative existed as a continuous record from earliest days, being repeated at every eucharistic meal, according to 1 Cor. 11:26). But Charles Harold Dodd ("The Framework of the Gospel Narrative," ExpT 43, 1931–32, 396–401) showed that the "editorial summaries" elsewhere in Mark, when put together, constitute a separate outline of the Gospel story, comparable to those outlines which can be reconstructed from the speeches in Acts and passages in the Epistles.

Life-setting. Again, many form critics explain the various elements in the Gospels as arising out of situations in the experience of the early church; e.g., the mission charge of Matthew 10 reflects the methods adopted by Jewish Christians who preached the Gospel throughout Palestine between A.D. 30 and 66, or the controversial incidents reflect disputes between legalist and liberal groups in the early Palestinian church, or between Christian and non-Christian Jews. But why then was this practice not carried out more widely and usefully? Why has the circumcision question, which bulked so largely in Christian debate around A.D. 50, not left a more distinct mark in the Gospels?

Early Christians, in fact, made a clear distinction between actual pronouncements of Jesus and their own judgments on disputed points (cf. 1 Cor. 7:10, 12, 25). After all, for three or four decades after A.D. 30 many people could still remember what Jesus had said and could have protested against the ascription to him of views which he had not expressed. There is justice in Vincent Taylor's observation: "If the Form-Critics are right, the disciples must have been translated to heaven immediately after the Resurrection" (The Formation of the Gospel Tradition, London, 1933, p. 41). This consideration holds good outside the church as well as within it: a strong point in early apostolic preaching is the appeal to the hearers' knowledge of the story of Jesus (Acts 2:22; 10:36).

No doubt a life-setting in the early church—in preaching, in fellowship meetings, in debate—explains why many sayings and incidents in the Gospels were put on record. When a question arose about divorce, for example, or paying the temple tax, it was natural to recall what Jesus had said on the subject; but such a setting in the life of the early church does not exclude an earlier setting in the life of Jesus.

Conclusion. The radical positions to which form criticism often seems to lead are the positions of certain form critics and not necessarily those of form criticism. Form criticism is of value not only because it provides a fresh classification for the study of our Gospel material, but also because it underlines (a) the inadequacy of documentary hypotheses alone to account for the composition of the Gospels, (b) the universal tendency in antiquity to stereotype the forms in which religious instruction was given, and (c) the fact that no discernible stratum of Gospel tradition knows any Jesus but the Messiah, the Son of God.

Form Criticism is not without its problems, however. (a) In spite of protestations to the contrary, form criticism has almost always been used to denigrate the value of the Gospel accounts as far as Jesus is concerned. It is almost universally proclaimed to be primary evidence for the early church, but not for Jesus himself. (b) If it is the universal human tendency to structure traditional material according to identifiable forms, why are there no "pure" forms available in the NT? Nothing seems to satisfy the theoretical criteria that define the forms. (c) Form Criticism relies far too heavily on modern parallels that on inspection turn out to be highly questionable.

Form Criticism

(d) Form Criticism turned out to be inadequate to explain all the complexities of the synoptic material and subsequently was supplemented by Redaction Criticism, which in turn was supplemented by Structuralism, Rhetorical Critics, and a host of other emphases. Trying to comprehend all that the NT text is trying to say by examining the form alone, in the end, proved to be too narrow a base on which to build an understanding of the synoptic material. F. F. BRUCE

See also BULTMANN, RUDOLF; DODD, CHARLES HAROLD; HIGHER CRITICISM.

Bibliography. R. Bultmann, History of the Synoptic Tradition; F. C. Burkitt, Gospel History and Its Transmission; M. Dibelius, From Tradition to Gospel; F. C. Grant, ed., Form Criticism; R. H. Lightfoot, History and Interpretation in the Gospels; E. Linnemann, Historical Criticism of the Bible; G. Maier, End of the Historical Critical Method; E. V. McKnight, What is Form Criticism?; E. B. Redlich, Form Criticism; B. Reicke, Roots of the Synoptic Gospels; E. F. Scott, Validity of the Gospel Records; R. H. Stein, Gospels and Tradition; Synoptic Problem: An Introduction; V. Taylor, Formation of the Gospel Tradition.

Formula of Concord. See CONCORD, FORMULA OF.

Fornication. In its more restricted sense, fornication denotes voluntary sexual communion between an unmarried person and one of the opposite sex. In this sense the fornicators (pornoi) are distinguished from the adulterers (moichoi), as in 1 Corinthians 6:9. In a wider sense porneia signifies unlawful cohabitation of either sex with a married person. In this meaning it is used interchangeably with moicheia, as in Matthew 5:32, where Christ says that anyone who divorces his wife except for porneia causes her to become the object of adultery (moicheuthēnai), since he who marries her commits adultery (moichatai). The same use of porneia in the sense of adultery (moichatai) is found in Matthew 19:9. In its widest sense porneia denotes immorality in general, or every kind of sexual transgression. In 1 Corinthians 5:1 porneia is rightly translated in the RSV by “immorality,” which term it properly uses also in 1 Corinthians 5:11, where the word stands without any further modification (cf. 6:18). The plural “fornications” (dia tas porneias) is best taken in the sense of “so much immorality” (1 Cor. 7:2; cf. RSV). While other sins must be overcome by spiritual crucifixion of the flesh (Gal. 5:24), the sin of immorality (porneia) is one from which the Christian must flee in order to keep pure (1 Cor. 6:18). Since God’s close relation to his people is regarded as a marriage bond (Eph. 5:23–27), all forms of apostasy are designated in Scripture as adultery, and this indeed very fittingly, as the pagan cults were usually connected with immorality (Jer. 3:2, 9; Hos. 6:10; Rev. 2:21;

19:2). The use of the verb porneuein and of the noun pornos (and pornē) is similar to that of the abstract porneia. It proves the greatness of divine grace in Christ Jesus that our Lord permitted Rahab (Matt. 1:5; Heb. 11:31) and other fornicators to be numbered in his genealogy.

J. T. MUELLER

See also ADULTERY.

Bibliography. H. Reisser, NIDNTT 1:497–501.

Forsyth, Peter Taylor (1848–1921). Evangelical theologian hailed as a modern prophet by both his admirers and critics. Born in Aberdeen, Scotland, Forsyth entered Aberdeen University in 1864, graduating with first-class honors in classics. He spent a semester at the University of Göttingen in 1870 studying under Albrecht Ritschl. Having been called to the Congregational church in Shipley, Yorkshire, he was ordained in 1876. In 1904 he became chairman of the Congregational Union of England and Wales. He spent his last twenty years as principal of Hackney College, a Congregational theological seminary. In 1907 he gave the Lyman Beecher lectures at Yale University.

Forsyth sought to relate the gospel to the modern mind without surrendering its unique claims. In contrast to much traditionalist orthodoxy he accepted the findings of historical criticism, but unlike liberal theology he believed that criticism must be subjected to the scrutiny of a higher norm—the gospel. Against the more conservative evangelicals he contended that there was a need for a fresh restatement of the biblical faith, but he had marked reservations concerning apologetics, which seeks to build on a criterion held in common with unbelief. He based his theology on Holy Scripture but appealed always to the pivotal center of Scripture—the gospel of redeeming grace.

In Forsyth’s view the heart of evangelical faith lies in the message of the cross. Soteriology was even more important for him than Christology, the atonement more crucial than the incarnation. He rejected the crude theories of the atonement fashionable in orthodox circles of his time in which Jesus was portrayed as being punished by an angry God. The truth of the atonement is that God himself in the person of his Son entered into our sufferings, identifying himself with our pain and anguish. Christ’s confession of the holiness of the Father is the ground of forgiveness and the new life in Christ. Forsyth saw the cross of Christ as the creative moral crisis of history, the point where divinity and humanity, time and eternity, judgment and grace met for a new creation.

This Christocentric stance led Forsyth to combat humanitarianism, in which human virtue was praised over divine grace, as well as an evolutionary naturalism in which the human ascent to divinity overshadowed God’s descent to sinful humanity in Jesus Christ. Forsyth was especially critical of the liberal theology that portrayed God exclusively as love. In his view love, grace, and judgment are all to be seen as aspects of God's holiness.

Forsyth also pioneered in the area of spirituality. He declared that the best documents are human sacraments. It is holy souls who furnish the most potent argument for the gospel, apart from the gospel itself. Whereas Augustine had rediscovered the lost truth of salvation by grace and Luther justification by faith, the emphasis in our time should be justification by holiness (i.e., by the holy God) and for holiness (life in communion with God).

Yet Forsyth was highly critical of the often vague spirituality associated with a theology of experience. The gospel is not a projection of innate spirituality but a transforming reality that profoundly alters spiritual and ethical life. Our focus should not be on cultivating piety in order to raise ourselves to divinity; instead, we should acquaint ourselves with God's saving work of redemption in Jesus Christ. Our spirituality should stress ethical obedience rather than detachment from the world for the purpose of inward purification.

Forsyth saw prayer not as meditation or contemplation on the ground of being but as supplication and intercession before a holy God. He made a prominent place for importunity in the life of prayer, even speaking of wrestling with God in prayer. He believed that God is glorified not only when we submit to his will but also when we resist his will in order to discover more fully his ultimate design for our lives.

Though warning against the idolization of the preacher and calling for a rediscovery of the sacraments in both evangelical and liberal Protestantism, he nonetheless subordinated the sacraments to the proclaimed Word. He regarded the sacraments as the visible Word and saw them as channels and not merely symbols of grace. Yet he attacked the doctrine of baptismal regeneration and the traditional understanding of the Lord's Supper as a sacrifice. It is not the absence of the sacraments that damns; it is their contempt.

Forsyth is highly relevant for our time, when theological authority is being eroded and when the battle for social justice tends to overshadow the hope for the righteousness of the kingdom of God. Forsyth is widely regarded as a forerunner of the neo-orthodoxy of Karl Barth and Emil Brunner.

D. G. BLOESCH

Bibliography. P. T. Forsyth, Cruciality of the Cross; Justification of God; Person and Place of Jesus Christ; Soul of Prayer; Work of Christ; W. L. Bradley, P. T. Forsyth: The Man and His Work; R. M. Brown, P. T. Forsyth: Prophet for Today; G. O. Griffith, Theology of P. T. Forsyth; T. Hart, ed., Justice the True and Only Mercy: Essays on the Life and Theology of Peter Taylor Forsyth; A. M. Hunter, P. T. Forsyth: Per Crucem ad

Lucem; S. J. Mikolaski, ed., Creative Theology of P. T. Forsyth; D. G. Miller, B. Barr, and R. S. Paul, P. T. Forsyth: The Man, the Preacher's Theologian, Prophet for the Twentieth Century; J. H. Rogers, Theology of P. T. Forsyth.

Fortitude. See CARDINAL VIRTUES, SEVEN.

Fortunate Fall. The concept of "fortunate fall" or felix culpa (happy crime) is an ancient one, rooted in early Christian liturgy, medieval and Reformed theology, and ultimately in the biblical text. It expresses the believer's confidence in God's beneficial control of evil. On the evening before the victorious celebration of Easter, churches using the Roman Missal sang these words from the Exsultet: O felix culpa, quae talem ac tantum meruit habere redemptorem! ("O happy crime, which merited such and so great a Redeemer!") The author of these words is unknown, but they may go back as early as the fifth century. The same concept was expressed much later in the fifteenth-century English carol, "Adam Lay Ybounden":

Ne had the apple taken been,
The apple taken been,
Ne had never our lady
A-been heavene queen.

Blessed be the time
That apple taken was.
Therefore we moun singen
Deo Gracias!

Augustine said, "God judged it better to bring good out of evil than to suffer no evil to exist" (Enchiridion 8.27). The church's major theologians continued this insight down to the Reformation, which placed a renewed emphasis upon it. According to Musculus, "Through Christ we are more happily restored after the fall than we had been when created" (H. Heppe, Reformed Dogmatics, 304). The Reformed held that "God resolved . . . to use Adam's fall as a means to a new and higher revelation of His nature" (ibid., 371).

Similarly in Scripture, Joseph says: "You intended to harm me, but God intended it for good" (Gen. 50:20). Paul affirms: "Where sin increased, grace increased all the more" (Rom. 5:20), and "In all things God works for the good of those who love him" (Rom. 8:28).

D. F. KELLY

See also EVIL, PROBLEM OF; FALL OF THE HUMAN RACE; PROVIDENCE OF GOD; THEODICY.

Fosdick, Harry Emerson (1878–1969). American Protestant minister and one of the most influential clergymen of the first half of the twentieth century, Fosdick was among the major popularizers of modern theological liberalism.

Fosdick, Harry Emerson

Born in Buffalo, New York, the son and grandson of Baptist schoolteachers, he renounced his childhood evangelical faith in 1896 while an undergraduate at Colgate University after reading Andrew Dickson White's powerful attack on biblical Christianity entitled History of the Warfare of Science with Theology in Christendom. This set Fosdick on the road that led him from what he called "scriptural obscurantism" to the theological liberalism that he eventually embraced.

Fosdick's professors at Colgate University and Union Theological Seminary (New York), where he earned his A.B. and B.D. degrees respectively in 1900 and 1904, convinced him that he need not give up his goal of the Christian ministry along with his evangelical theology. Instead, learned theologians like William Newton Clarke led Fosdick to embrace the new liberalism with its stress on the evolution of divine revelation and human goodness.

In November of 1903 Fosdick was ordained by the Madison Avenue Baptist Church and took a Baptist pastorate in Montclair, New Jersey, in 1904. While there he was appointed professor of practical theology at Union Seminary, a post he held from 1908 to 1946. From 1918 to 1924 he served as regular "guest minister" of the First Presbyterian Church in New York. In this position he became the lightning rod in the early years of the fundamentalist-modernist controversy when in 1922 he preached and later published an attack on the fundamentalists entitled "Shall the Fundamentalists Win?" In response, conservative Presbyterians and Baptists dubbed him "the Moses of modernism" and "the Jesse James of the theological world"—and in 1924 Fosdick left his guest pastorate under fire. However, Fosdick's friend J. D. Rockefeller Jr. offered him the pulpit of his own family's congregation, the Park Avenue Baptist Church in New York. Fosdick finally accepted only after Rockefeller agreed to build him a new and larger edifice and to change the membership requirements to make the church, in effect, interdenominational. Thus, in 1926 Fosdick was installed as the pastor of what soon became the famed Riverside Church, which he served until his retirement in 1946. During that period he was the nation's most influential Protestant preacher.

Fosdick spent his last years writing and lecturing. In his autobiography, published in 1956, he expressed confidence that liberalism was the final and supreme expression of Christianity and that it would survive the criticisms of the neo-orthodox theologians. During the last decade of his life, however, he became more conservative in his general outlook, stressed that he had always been a moderate "evangelical liberal," and searched the Bible once more for those spiritual verities he was certain it contained.

A dynamic preacher and a polished writer, Fosdick used his thirty books, his weekly radio ministry, and his popular pulpit to discredit traditional nineteenth-century Protestantism with its emphasis on evangelism, its uncritical use of the Bible, and its lack of interest in scientific educational theory. In place of these he attempted to incorporate into Christian thinking biblical criticism, insights from the psychology of religion, the teachings of evolution, and the values expressed in modern political and social movements, while accenting the ethical rather than the doctrinal aspects of the Christian faith. Fosdick also stressed the personal peace and power of religion—as in his enormously popular On Being a Real Person (1943)—but always took care to keep his counsels within the parameters of Christian theology albeit in its liberal form. Moreover, he greatly influenced American preaching through his "problem-centered" homiletical style.

Like most theological liberals, Fosdick contributed little to a realistic understanding of institutional power, social structures, or human depravity. It appears that few of his works will withstand the critique of the neo-orthodox and conservative theologians or the test of time. Only his autobiography, Living of These Days (1956), remains to provide an insightful link to that now bygone era when a dynamic liberalism was king of Western theology.

R. D. LINDER

See also FUNDAMENTALISM; LIBERALISM, THEOLOGICAL.

Bibliography. H. E. Fosdick, Living of These Days: An Autobiography; Modern Use of the Bible; W. K. Caughen, Impact of American Religious Liberalism; W. R. Hutchison, Modernist Impulse in American Protestantism; R. M. Miller, Harry Emerson Fosdick; J. R. Scroggs, Baptist Preachers with Social Consciousness: A Comparative Study of Martin Luther King, Jr. and Harry Emerson Fosdick.

Foucault, Michel. See POSTMODERNISM.

Fourfold Sense of Scripture. See INTERPRETATION OF THE BIBLE.

Four Spiritual Laws, The. An evangelistic aid written by Bill Bright, president of Campus Crusade for Christ. Originally prepared for the staff of his worldwide evangelistic organization, the laws have since been given wide circulation, with well over twenty-five million printed copies being distributed by 1980. The laws attempt to distill the essence of the gospel and to present it simply, yet convincingly, to the non-Christian.

Bright believes there are spiritual laws that govern one's relationship with God, just as there are similar physical laws controlling the universe. In his pamphlet he supports these laws with scriptural texts, diagrams, brief explanations, a suggested prayer of personal commitment, and preliminary counsel for the person having newly received Christ as Savior and Lord.

The four laws Bright formulates are: (1) God loves you and offers a wonderful plan for your life (John 3:16; 10:10). (2) Man is sinful and separated from God. Thus he cannot know and experience God's love and plan for his life (Rom. 3:23; 6:23). (3) Jesus Christ is God's only provision for man's sin. Through him you can know and experience God's love and plan for your life (John 14:6; Rom. 5:8; 1 Cor. 15:3–6). (4) We must individually receive Jesus Christ as Savior and Lord; then we can know and experience God's love and plan for our lives (John 1:12; 3:1–8; Eph. 2:8–9; Rev. 3:20).

Bright's schematic has proved a useful aid for Christians who desire to communicate the gospel to others but lack the necessary skills. The simple outline has been used by the Holy Spirit to bring large numbers into personal faith. Moreover, it has been a corrective within the church in two regards. By giving priority through its first law to God's grace toward humankind, the fourfold presentation has countered evangelism based on fear of divine judgment. By calling people to personal decision, the laws have also challenged a church willing to rest content at times with only an intellectual knowledge of Christianity.

Despite their proven utility, the laws also have their limitations. Their impersonality and structure fail to speak convincingly to many. Moreover, in an age when advertising has made increasing numbers suspicious of promotions (particularly when sold aggressively), this prepackaged presentation has sometimes proved offensive. Last, Bright's fourfold summary of the gospel lacks sufficient biblical focus on the costly, ethical demands of the Christian faith. The message of John is quoted but not that of 1 John; Paul is referred to but not James.

R. K. JOHNSTON

Bibliography. B. Bright, Have You Heard of the Four Spiritual Laws?; R. Quebedeaux, I Found It! The Story of Bill Bright and Campus Crusade; "Door Interview: Bill Bright," Wittenburg Door (February–March 1977).

Fox, George (1624–1691). Founder of the Society of Friends, otherwise known as Quakers. Son of a Leicestershire weaver, he had evidently little formal education or regular occupation, but at the age of eighteen he left home in search of enlightenment. After many painful experiences that made him regard his fellow human beings less trustingly, he tells of having found one who spoke to his condition. In 1646 he announced his reliance on the "Inner Light of the Living Christ." He rejected outward sacraments, paid clergy, even church attendance, and taught that truth is to be found primarily not in Scripture or creed but in God's voice speaking to the soul. So emerged the "Friends of Truth." Fox taught the priesthood of all believers and advocated a simple lifestyle for his colleagues, who later included William Penn. The Friends traveled widely in England. Their anti-clerical views, disrespect of authority, and refusal to take oaths often led to arrest and imprisonment. At Derby in 1650 Fox was charged with blasphemy; then it was that the term Quakers was born in a magisterial jibe after Fox had urged the bench to "tremble at the word of the Lord." Persecution was stepped up after the monarchy was restored in 1660, and altogether Fox served eight jail sentences with a total of six years. His travels extended also to the Netherlands, the West Indies, and America (notably Maryland and Rhode Island). Whenever he could, he established local congregations. Fox was also a true pacifist, and his use of group silence was a brake on impetuous conduct. Later he moved his base from northwest England to London, where he spent his final years crusading against social evils, fighting for religious toleration and the promotion of education. His famous Journal gives valuable insights into the turbulent conditions in England during the latter half of the seventeenth century.

J. D. DOUGLAS

See also FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF.

Bibliography. D. Gwyn, Apocalypse of the Word: The Life and Message of George Fox; R. M. Jones, George Fox, Seeker and Friend; V. Noble, Man in Leather Breeches: The Life and Times of George Fox; H. E. Wildes, Voice of the Lord.

Franciscan Order. One of the four thirteenth-century orders of mendicant (begging) friars (Franciscan, Dominican, Carmelite, Augustinian) established to meet the urgent challenge of spiritual decline, urban growth, and the rapid spread of heresy (especially in southern France and northern Italy). It was founded by Francis of Assisi and formally approved by Innocent III in 1210. Unlike earlier monasticism, the friars lived active lives within the world as preachers and ministers to the needy.

Francis's deep suspicion of formal organization and learning and his extreme view of poverty (even physical contact with money was to be avoided) became the center of bitter conflicts within the order. Early on, tension arose between the Zealots, who advocated strict observance of the founder's rule, and those factions (the Laxists, the Community) who favored various accommodations to reality. Under papal auspices the order was fully organized by 1240 as one international body with only clerics eligible for office (another departure from the spirit of Francis, who favored laity), and provision was made for property to be held in trusteeship to get around the prohibition against ownership. During the years 1257–74 tensions abated under the conciliatory minister general Bonaventure, who established a moderate balance between structure and vitality. As an outstanding scholar, he also represented the increasing influx of Franciscans into the world of learning within the urban-based universities.

Franciscan Order

Following the death of Bonaventure, a bitter debate ensued over the nature of apostolic poverty. The extreme view of the Spirituals (formerly the Zealots) was rejected by Pope John XXII, who in 1322 officially approved corporate ownership of property, arguing that Christ and the apostles as leaders of the church had owned property. Spirituals who fled became known as Fraticelli. Even outstanding figures such as the minister general Michael of Cesena and William of Ockham went into exile and denounced the pope.

Difficult conditions of plague, warfare, and papal schism during the century and a half before the Reformation led to a general decline within the order, but another movement for restoration of the strict rule emerged—the Observants. They were opposed by the more moderate Conventuals, who preferred urban residence to remote hermitages. Failure to unite these factions led Pope Leo X in 1517 to officially separate the order into two independent branches—the Friars Minor of the Regular Observants (strict) and the Friars Minor Conventuals (moderate). Given their reforming instincts, the Observants soon divided into several factions—Discalced (shoeless), Recollects, Reformed, and Capuchins (pointed cowl). The latter played a significant role in the Counter-Reformation and by 1619 had gained complete autonomy. Again, internal division and the external challenge of the Enlightenment and revolutionary Europe weakened the order until mounting pressure led Pope Leo XIII in 1897 to unite all Observant branches (except the Capuchins, who retained their independence).

Alongside the Order of Friars Minor, with the three independent branches of Observants, Conventuals, and Capuchins, there emerged two other Franciscan orders—the Second Order of nuns (Poor Clares), founded by Francis and his follower Clare in 1212, and the Third Order (Tertiaries) of mainly laypersons.

The Franciscans, along with their rivals the Dominicans, represented a new spiritual force within the thirteenth-century church. As advocates of the simpler apostolic life of poverty and preaching, they struck a responsive chord among the growing number of townspeople who had become alienated from the monastic and hierarchical establishment. Nonetheless, instead of becoming rebellious heretics, the friars were obedient servants of the established church. Like the town, the university became a major focus of their activity as they sought to prepare intellectually for their worldwide mission—confronting infidel, heretic, and indifferent alike with the truth of Christianity. Virtually every outstanding scholar of that age was a friar—including Bonaventure, John Duns Scotus, and William of Ockham among the Franciscans. Contrary to the spirit of Francis, however, the order became aggressively associated with the repressive Inquisition and the anti-Jewish activities of the Western church during its effort to consolidate Christian society.

R. K. BISHOP

See also FRANCIS OF ASSISI; MONASTICISM; MYSTICISM; SCHOLASTICISM.

Bibliography. R. Brooke, Coming of the Friars; J. Cohen, Friars and the Jews; J. Heft, John XXII and Papal Teaching Authority; I. Herscher, Franciscan Literature: A Checklist; H. Holzapfel, History of the Franciscan Order; I. Lazaro, Franciscan History: The Three Orders of St. Francis of Assisi; L. Little, Religious Poverty and the Profit Economy in Medieval Europe; F. Morales, ed., Franciscan Presence in the Americas; J. Moorman, History of the Franciscan Order from Its Origin to the Year 1517; W. J. Short, Franciscans.

Francis of Assisi (1182–1226). The universally admired founder of the Order of Friars Minor (Franciscans). Born Francesco Bernardone, son of a wealthy cloth merchant from Assisi, he was a popular, high-spirited youth, much inspired by chivalric ideals of the troubador and the knight. In his early twenties he experienced a gradual but profound religious conversion, expressed in a number of dramatic gestures, such as the exchanging of clothes with a beggar and kissing the diseased hand of a leper. After he had sold family merchandise to finance the rebuilding of a local church, his enraged father, disgusted by the son's unworldly instincts, brought him to judgment before the bishop's court. Here Francis freely renounced his inheritance and, in a memorable act, stripped off his clothes as well to signify total abandonment to God.

Francis spent the next several years living as a hermit in the vicinity of Assisi, ministering to the needy, repairing churches, and attracting a small band of followers to his simple rule. Pope Innocent III's approval of the fledgling order in 1210 was a major triumph; rather than being rejected as yet another threatening, heretical movement, the "little brothers" were embraced as a powerful current of reform within the established church.

Following a preaching mission in the Islamic East (including a remarkable audience with the sultan in Egypt), Francis returned home in 1219 to face a crisis. The movement now numbered some five thousand adherents, and pressure was mounting to establish a more formal organization. Distressed by this drift away from earlier spontaneity and simplicity, Francis increasingly withdrew to live out his mission by personal example. Intense meditation on the suffering of Christ led to the famous experience of the stigmata—signs in his own flesh of the wounds of his Master. And although he was more a preacher than a writer; in 1223 he completed a second rule (adapted as the official rule of the order) and about 1224 his most famous piece, "Canticle of the Sun," a paean of praise for God and his creation. Ill and nearly blind, he was finally brought back to Assisi from his remote hermitage and died on October 3, 1226. He was canonized by his friend Gregory IX in 1228, and his body was soon moved to the newly constructed basilica bearing his name.

The key to Francis's life was his uncompromising attempt to imitate Christ of the Gospels through absolute poverty, humility, and simplicity. He loved nature as God's good handiwork and had a deep respect for women (such as his beloved mother and his follower Clare). At the same time, his willing obedience to the papacy and the priesthood allowed them to embrace this otherwise radical reformer and saint.

R. K. BISHOP

See also FRANCISCAN ORDER; MONASTICISM; MYSTICISM.

Bibliography. D. W. H. Arnold, Francis: A Call to Conversion; M. Bishop, St. Francis of Assisi; L. Boff, St. Francis: A Model for Human Liberation; G. K. Chesterton, St. Francis of Assisi; L. Cunningham, St. Francis of Assisi; O. Englebert, Saint Francis of Assisi; A. Fortini, Francis of Assisi; J. Green, God's Fool: The Life and Times of Francis of Assisi; J. H. Smith, Francis of Assisi.

Francke, August Hermann (1663–1727). One of the foremost leaders of pietism. Francke studied at Erfurt, Kiel, and Leipzig, and taught at Leipzig (1685–87 and 1689–90). His teaching was well received by some but also aroused opposition. Through the influence of P. J. Spener he became professor at the recently founded University of Halle in 1692 and taught theology there from 1698 until his death. Halle became a center of pietism. Francke's students carried his influence to various parts of Germany and to Scandinavia and Eastern Europe. Francke also pastored a nearby congregation. In 1695 he founded an orphanage, the first of several educational and charitable institutions funded entirely by contributions. He was active in supporting foreign mission work in India. His writings include exegetical, practical, and polemical works, a copious correspondence, and a few hymns.

Francke had been raised a Lutheran, but he followed the pietistic line of thinking and so departed from orthodox Lutheranism. The essence of pietism was its stress on religious experience for the assurance of salvation. Francke had had a sudden conversion experience. As did many of the pietists, he generalized his own experience as though it should be the same for all Christians. Accordingly he placed a great deal of importance on the feeling of sorrow and terror at sin and the feeling of being forgiven by God. Such experience would necessarily be decisive for the life of the individual and would become apparent in many good works. He saw the conversion experience as especially necessary for leadership among Christians.

Orthodox Lutherans opposed this stress on experience or feeling as the assurance of salvation. For Lutherans the assurance of salvation was in the means of grace (the gospel, absolution, baptism, the Lord's Supper). From the Lutheran perspective, Francke was replacing the gospel with the law by finding the assurance of salvation in humankind instead of in the Word of God. Stressing experience instead of the Word, Francke also deemphasized the importance of purity of doctrine and so tended to disregard the doctrinal differences between the Lutherans and the Reformed. Pietism in general crossed confessional lines.

J. M. DRICKAMER

See also EXPERIENCE, THEOLOGY OF; PIETISM; SPENER, PHILIPP JAKOB.

Bibliography. C. Bergendoff, Church of the Lutheran Reformation; F. E. Stoeffler, Rise of Evangelical Pietism.

Freedom, Christian. See LIBERTY, CHRISTIAN.

Freedom, Free Will, and Determinism. There are three basic positions concerning human choices: determinism, indeterminism, and self-determination. Determinism is the belief that all human actions are the result of antecedent factors or causes. Naturalistic determinists, such as Thomas Hobbes and B. F. Skinner, argue that human behavior can be fully explained in terms of natural causes. Theistic determinists, such as Martin Luther and Jonathan Edwards, trace human actions back to God's controlling hand. The opposite position to determinism is indeterminism. On this view there are no causes for human actions, antecedent or otherwise. The final position is self-determinism, or free will. This is the belief that people determine their own behavior freely, and that no causal antecedents can sufficiently account for their actions.

Determinism. The belief that human actions are the result of antecedent causes has been formulated naturalistically and theistically. The naturalistic view sees human beings as part of the machinery of the universe. In such a world every event is caused by preceding events, which in turn were caused by still earlier events, ad infinitum. Since humans are part of this causal chain, their actions are also determined by antecedent causes. Some of these causes are the environment and a person's genetic make-up. These are so determinative of what a person does that no one could rightly say that a given human action could have been performed otherwise than it in fact was performed. Thus, according to determinism, Bob's sitting on the brown chair rather than the blue sofa is not a free choice but is fully determined by previous factors.

Freedom, Free Will, and Determinism

A contemporary example of naturalistic determinism is B. F. Skinner, the author of Beyond Freedom and Dignity and About Behaviorism. Skinner believes that all human behavior is completely controlled by genetic and environmental factors. These factors do not rule out the fact that human beings make choices; they do, however, rule out the possibility that human choices are free. For Skinner, all human choices are determined by antecedent physical causes. Hence, a person is viewed as an instrumental cause of his or her behavior. He or she is like a knife in the hands of a butcher or a hammer in the grip of a carpenter; he or she does not originate action but is the instrument through which some other agent performs the action.

A philosophical argument often given for determinism can be stated as follows. All human behavior is either completely uncaused, self-caused, or caused by something external. Now human behavior cannot be uncaused, for nothing can happen without a cause—nothing cannot cause something. Human behavior cannot be self-caused either, for each act would have to exist prior to itself to cause itself, which is impossible. Thus, the only alternative is that all human behavior must be completely caused by something external. Naturalistic determinists maintain that such things as heredity and environment are the external causes, whereas theistic determinists believe that God is the external cause of all human behavior.

There are several problems with this argument. First, the argument misinterprets self-determination as teaching that human acts cause themselves. Self-determinists, for example, do not believe that the plays in a football game cause themselves. Rather, they maintain that the players execute the plays in a football game. Indeed, it is the players who choose to play the game. Thus, the cause of a football game being played is to be found within the players of the game. Self-determinists would not deny that outside factors, such as heredity, environment, or God, had any influence. They would, however, maintain that any one of the people involved in the game could have decided not to play if he or she had chosen to do so.

Second, the argument for determinism is self-defeating. A determinist must contend that both he or she and the nondeterminist are determined to believe what they believe. Yet the determinist attempts to convince the nondeterminist that determinism is true and thus ought to be believed. On the basis of pure determinism, however, "ought" has no meaning. For "ought" means "could have and should have done otherwise." But this is impossible according to determinism.

A way around this objection is for the determinist to argue that he or she was determined to say that one ought to accept his or her view. His opponent can respond, however, by saying that he or she was determined to accept a contrary view. Thus, determinism cannot eliminate an opposing position. This allows the possibility for a free will position.

Third, and finally, if naturalistic determinism were true, it would be self-defeating, false, or be no view at all. For in order to determine whether determinism was true, there would need to be a rational basis for thought; otherwise no one could know what was true or false. But naturalistic determinists believe that all thought is the product of nonrational causes, such as the environment, thus making all thought nonrational. On this basis no one could ever know if determinism was true or not. And if one argued that determinism was true, then the position would be self-defeating, for a truth claim is being made to the effect that no truth claims can be made. Now if determinism is false, then it can be rationally rejected and other positions considered. But if it is neither true nor false, then it is no view at all, since no claim to truth is being made. In either case, naturalistic determinism could not reasonably be held to be true.

Another form of determinism is theistic determinism. This is the view that all events, including human behavior, are caused (determined) by God. One of the more famous advocates of this view was the Puritan theologian Jonathan Edwards. He maintained that the concept of free will or self-determinism contradicted the sovereignty of God. If God is truly in control of all things, then no one could act contrary to his will, which is what self-determinism must hold. Hence, for God to be sovereign, he must cause every event, be it human or otherwise.

Edwards also argued that self-determinism is self-contradictory. For if a person's will were in equilibrium or indifferent to any given event or decision, then his or her will would never act. Just as a scale cannot tip itself unless an outside force upsets the balance, so a person's will could never act unless God moved it. Thus, to speak of human acts as self-caused would be like speaking of nothing causing something. But since every event must have a cause, self-determinism, which denies this, must be self-contradictory.

During Edwards's own day, some thinkers objected to his view on the grounds that it ran contrary to the biblical evidence that supported human freedom (e.g., Prov. 1:29–31; Heb. 11:24–26). Edwards responded in his Freedom of the Will that human freedom is not the power to do what one decides but rather what one desires. The cause of human desires is God, and people always acts in accordance with them. Thus, freedom is not uncaused, which is nonsensical, but caused by God.

Like naturalistic determinism, theistic determinism may be objected to on several grounds. First, to view freedom as that which one desires is inadequate. People do not always do what they desire; no one desires to carry out the garbage or clean a dirty oven. Further, people often desire to do what they do not decide to do, such as taking revenge on someone for wronging them.

Second, according to self-determinism, Edwards's position evidences a misunderstanding of free will. The acts of free human beings are not uncaused but self-caused. To say they are self-caused is not to say that they arise out of nothing or exist prior to themselves. Such would be an uncaused or self-caused being, which is nonsensical. Self-determinism maintains, however, that human exercise of freedom is self-caused becoming, which is not contradictory. In other words, persons exist and can freely cause their own actions (not their own being).

Third, Edwards's argument suffers from a faulty view of humanity. Human beings are not like a machine (scale) that cannot be moved until some outside force tips it in one direction or another. Rather, one is a person created in the image of God as a personal living soul (Gen. 1:26–27; 2:7), and he or she retains this image even after the fall (Gen. 9:6; 1 Cor. 11:7). This image includes the ability to make choices and act upon them. Hence, since the person is personal, it is at best inadequate to illustrate his or her behavior by impersonal, mechanical models, such as a scale.

And fourth, Edwards is mistaken when he argues that human freedom is contrary to God's sovereignty. God sovereignly gave each person his or her freedom by creating him or her a free creature, and God sovereignly continues to allow us to exercise our freedom by sustaining us moment by moment in existence (Col. 1:17). Thus, the sovereignty of God is not thwarted by human freedom but glorified through human freedom. For God gave humanity free will, he sustains humanity so it can act freely, and he brings about all his purposes without violating free will. As the Westminster Confession puts it, "Although in relation to the foreknowledge and decree of God, the first cause, all things come to pass immutably and infallibly, yet by the same providence he ordereth them to fall out, according to the nature of second causes, either necessarily, freely, or contingently" (V, ii).

Indeterminism. This view contends that human behavior is totally uncaused. There are no antecedent or simultaneous causes of man's actions. Hence, all of man's acts are uncaused; any given human act could have been otherwise. Some indeterminists extend their view beyond human affairs to the entire universe. In support of the indeterminacy of all events, Heisenberg's principle of uncertainty is often invoked. This principle states that it is impossible to predict where a subatomic particle is and how fast it is moving at any given moment. Thus, it is argued, since subatomic events are inherently unpredictable, how much more so are complex human acts. From this they conclude that human and nonhuman events are uncaused. Two noted exponents of indeterminism are William James and Charles Peirce.

There are at least three problems with this view. First, Heisenberg's principle does not deal with causality but with predictability. Heisenberg maintained that the movement of subatomic particles was unpredictable and unmeasurable; he did not maintain that their movement was uncaused. Thus, this principle cannot be used to support indeterminism. Second, indeterminism unreasonably denies the principle of causality, namely, that every event has a cause. Simply because one does not know what the cause is, is not proof that an event is not caused. Such lack of knowledge only reflects our ignorance. Third, indeterminism strips humans of any responsible behavior. If human behavior is uncaused, then no one could be praised or blamed for anything he or she did. All human acts would be nonrational and nonmoral; thus, no act could ever be a reasonable or responsible one.

Indeterminism is unacceptable for a Christian. For if indeterminism is true, then either the existence of God or any causal connection between God and the universe would have to be denied. But clearly a Christian could not hold this, for the Christian position is that God created the world and providentially sustains it and intervenes in its affairs (Matt. 6:25–34; Col. 1:15–16).

Self-determinism. In this view a person's acts are caused by himself or herself. Self-determinists accept the fact that such factors as heredity and environment often influence one's behavior. They deny, however, that such factors are the determining causes of one's behavior. Inanimate objects do not change without an outside cause, but personal subjects are able to direct their own actions. As previously noted, self-determinists reject the notions that events are uncaused or that they cause themselves. Rather, they believe that human actions can be caused by human beings. Two prominent advocates of this view are Thomas Aquinas and C. S. Lewis.

Many object to self-determinism on the grounds that if everything needs a cause, then so do the acts of the will. Thus, it is often asked, What caused the will to act? The self-determinist can respond to this question by pointing out that it is not the will of a person that makes a decision but the person acting by means of his or her will. And since the person is the first cause of his or her acts, it is meaningless to ask what the cause of the first cause is. Just as no outside force caused God to create the world, so no outside force causes people to choose certain actions. For humans are created in God's image, which includes the possession of free will.

Freedom, Free Will, and Determinism

Another objection often raised against self-determinism is that biblical predestination and foreknowledge seem to be incompatible with human freedom. The Bible does clearly teach, however, that even fallen man has freedom of choice (e.g., Matt. 23:37; John 7:17; Rom. 7:18; 1 Cor. 9:17; 1 Pet. 5:2; Philem. 14). Further, the Bible teaches that God predestines in accordance with his foreknowledge (1 Pet. 1:2). Predestination is not based on God's foreknowledge (which would make God dependent upon human choices) nor is it independent of God's foreknowledge (since all of God's acts are unified and coordinate). Rather, God knowingly determines and determinately knows those who will accept his grace as well as those who will reject him.

A further argument for free will is that God's commandments carry a divine "ought" for humans, implying that they can and should respond positively to his commands. The responsibility to obey God's commands entails the ability to respond to them by God's enabling grace. Furthermore, if humans are not free, but all their acts are determined by God, then God is directly responsible for evil, a conclusion that is clearly contradicted by Scripture (Hab. 1:13; James 1:13–17).

Therefore, it seems that some form of self-determinism is the most compatible with the biblical view of God's sovereignty and human responsibility.

N. L. GEISLER

Bibliography. Augustine, Free Choice of the Will; On Grace and Free Will; D. and R. Basinger, eds., Predestination and Free Will; A. Farrer, Freedom of the Will; B. Holbach, System of Nature; W. James, Pragmatism; M. Luther, Bondage of the Will; R. Taylor, Metaphysics.

Freewill Offering. See OFFERINGS AND SACRIFICES IN BIBLE TIMES.

Frei, Hans Wilhelm (1922–1988). Yale theologian, highly regarded interpreter of Karl Barth and contemporary theology, Frei is generally recognized as the first of the so-called Yale, or narrative, theologians; and he is considered postliberal due to his theological criticism of traditional liberalism. Frei combined historical, theological, and literary interests in his work, which concentrated on hermeneutics, Christology, and theological method.

In Eclipse of Biblical Narrative Frei argued that biblical scholarship since the seventeenth century took a wrong turn, confusing the text's meaning with its (historical) reference, instead of maintaining the text's literal sense and the inseparable relationship between a text and its meaning. Frei maintained that the biblical text is to be treated as realistic and historylike, not simply as critically or factually historical in its reference, and it is not reducible to a meaning that is other than the text's narrative.

What Frei portrayed theologically and historically regarding biblical narrative, he applied to Christology through the use of literary and hermeneutical themes. He addressed the question of Jesus' presence to the Christian faith through an exploration of how we understand Jesus' identity in Identity of Jesus Christ. Frei maintained that Jesus' identity is rendered by the narrative itself: it is the narrative, not what is behind or before the Gospels, not the myth of a Christ figure, that supplies faith with Jesus' identity.

Frei's observations regarding narrative have earned him the title "narrative theologian," which he regarded as a dubious honor. His concentration on narrative was determined more by the focus of his work—the effort to understand the history of hermeneutics—than by his convictions about the relationship of narrative to human understanding. Frei recognized and honored the narrative expression of the story that is centered in Jesus Christ on its own terms.

Frei's historical assessment of biblical interpretation has won the praise of many evangelicals, but his corresponding tentativeness concerning modern affirmations of truth and historicity are regarded as troubling. Frei forged perceptive historical and theological ties in the shifting intellectual climate of contemporary theology and provided an influential reassessment of contemporary types of theology.

J. P. CALLAHAN

Bibliography. H. W. Frei, Eclipse of Biblical Narrative; Theology and Narrative; Types of Christian Theology; G. Green, ed., Scriptural Authority and Narrative Interpretation.

Friend. See CHRISTIANS, NAMES OF.

Friends, Society of. Known also as Quakers, the Society of Friends can best be understood through the lives of the early leaders. The founder was George Fox, whose youth saw the rule of Charles I and his marriage to a French princess who was a Roman Catholic, the Petition of Right, Archbishop Laud's harsh rules for Non-conformists, the Puritan emigration to America, and the meetings of the Long Parliament. His public career coincided with the defeat and execution of Charles I, the Puritan Commonwealth under Cromwell, the Stuart Restoration and the rule of James II, the Bill of Rights, and the "Glorious Revolution" of 1688. Some of his contemporaries were Locke, Hobbes, Milton, Dryden, Bunyan, Cromwell, Newton, Harvey, Baxter, and Ussher.

In 1647 Fox experienced a profound change in his religious life. In 1652 he said that he had a vision at a place called Pendle Hill; from that point on, he based his faith on the idea that God could speak directly to any person.

Some of the first converts of Fox were called "Friends" or "Friends in Truth." The term Quaker was described by Fox as follows. "The priest scoffed at us and called us Quakers. But the Lord's power was so over them, and the word of life was declared in such authority and dread to them, that the priest began trembling himself; and one of the people said, 'Look how the priest trembles and shakes, he is turned a Quaker also.'" According to Fox, the first person to use the term was Justice Bennet of Derby. Among the early converts were English Puritans, Baptists, Seekers, and other Nonconformists. The work spread to Ireland, Scotland, and Wales.

Quakerism took on certain characteristics, such as simplicity in the manner of living, encouraging women to be ministers, spiritual democracy in meetings, absolute adherence to truth, universal peace and brotherhood regardless of sex, class, nation, or race. Quakers refused to remove their hats to those in authority and used the singular "thee" and "thou" in their speech, while the common people were supposed to address their betters as "you." In turn, they influenced the thought and social ethics of the English-speaking world far out of proportion to their numbers. Fox was imprisoned eight times during his life, but he pioneered care for the poor, aged, and insane, advocated prison reform, opposed capital punishment, war, and slavery, and stood for the just treatment of American Indians.

George Fox died in 1691, and the movement went into a quiet period. The center shifted to America. The first Friends to visit America were Mary Fisher and Anne Austin, who arrived in Massachusetts in 1656. They were sent away by the magistrates, but others arrived after them. In 1659 William Robinson and Marmaduke Stephenson were hanged on Boston Common, as was Mary Dyer the following year.

Probably the best-known historical figure in the Society of Friends was William Penn. Born in 1644 he became a Quaker in 1667 and was an embarrassment to his father, Admiral Penn. King Charles II gave young William a grant of land in America to repay a debt to his father, and thus was launched Pennsylvania, a "holy experiment." By 1700 Friends were meeting in all of the colonies.

Penn's tolerant policies attracted immigrants from many places. Difficulties arose from the fact that the Quakers wanted only to be at peace, while the British expected them to support the colonial wars against the French and Indians. A similar situation arose when the colonists revolted against the British in 1776.

A division occurred in the Society of Friends about 1827, with one group supporting the views of Elias Hicks, who believed that one should follow the inner light. The other group was influenced by the evangelical movement and put great emphasis on belief in the divinity of Christ, the authority of the Scriptures, and the atonement.

Friends were also active in the antislavery movement. John Woolman, Anthony Benezet, Lucretia Mott, and John Greenleaf Whittier were involved in such activities as the underground railroad and the Colonization Society. Benjamin Lundy's ideas were presented in Genius of Universal Emancipation.

The tradition of caring for others carried on through the American Civil War, and the American Friends Service Committee was formed in 1917. The purpose of the organization was to provide young conscientious objectors with alternative service opportunities during wartime. A red and black star was chosen to symbolize the group.

The Society of Friends are optimistic about the purposes of God and the destiny of humankind. Their ultimate and final authority for religious life and faith resides within each individual. Many, but not all, seek for this truth through the guidance of the inner light. They believe that they are bound to refuse obedience to a government when its requirements are contrary to what they believe to be the law of God, but they are willing to accept the penalties for civil disobedience. They practice religious democracy in their monthly meetings. After discussion of an issue, for example, the clerk states what appears to be the mind of the group; but if a single Friend feels that he cannot unite with the group, no decision is made. Their stand for religious toleration is symbolized by the inscription on the statue of Mary Dyer across from Boston Common: "Witness for Religious Freedom. Hanged on Boston Common, 1660."

The Society of Friends has no written creed, and as a result, various emphases within the group gradually drifted apart philosophically while still calling themselves Quakers.

At the present day those of a more evangelical persuasion are banded together in the Evangelical Friends Alliance and represent a significant minority, about 25 percent. The largest segment, representing about 40 percent are theologically middle-of-the-road. The liberal faction is the smallest of the three, comprising about 15 percent of the total, aligned together in the Friends General Conference. Other smaller factions make up the rest of the 112,000-member group.

J. E. JOHNSON

See also FOX, GEORGE.

Friends, Society of

Bibliography. M. H. Bacon, Quiet Rebels; H. Barbour, Quakers in Puritan England; W. C. Braithwaite, Beginnings of Quakerism; Second Period of Quakerism; A. N. Brayshaw, Quakers: Their Story and Message; H. H. Brinton, Friends for Three Hundred Years; R. M. Jones, Later Periods of Quakerism; J. D. Marietta, Reformation of American Quakerism; E. Russell, History of Quakerism; D. E. Trueblood, People Called Quakers; W. R. Williams, Rich Heritage of Quakerism.

Friends of God (Ger. Gottesfreunde). A fourteenth-century group of mystics located chiefly in the Rhineland and Switzerland, who took their name from John 15:4, 15. Initially formed by laymen in Basel about 1339–43 with thoughts seen two centuries earlier in Bernard of Clairvaux, the movement stressed the transforming personal union of souls with God and a lifestyle characterized by prayer and austerity. It saw three stages in man's religious development: beginning, growth, and perfection. The perfect man, true friend of God, views justification by faith as a priority, thus anticipating the Reformation. Despite esoteric tendencies and traces of pantheism, the Friends mostly remained within the church while condemning its corruption. One sympathizer, Nicholas of Basel, was burned in 1395. Others included Meister Eckhart, H. Suso, and J. Tauler, but the movement's chief author was Rulman Merswin, a wealthy Strasbourg banker. He and his wife renounced the world in 1347, received an indulgence from Pope Clement VI, acquired the former Benedictine monastery of Gruner Worth in 1367 and retired there themselves after gifting it to the Knights of St. John. Merswin claimed to have received guidance from correspondence with an evidently legendary "Friend of God from the Highlands." The movement had links with the Brethren of the Common Life in the Netherlands.

J. D. DOUGLAS

See also MYSTICISM.

Bibliography. A. G. Seesholtz, Friends of God.

Fullness of Time. The expression appears twice in the NT: Galatians 4:4 and Ephesians 1:10. These two verses encompass the totality of God's redemptive plan in history, or Heilsgeschichte (history of salvation, holy history).

Galatians 4:4 refers to the period before Christ's birth. Israel had waited centuries for a Messiah. The exile had come, the return had happened, Persia had fallen, Greece had fallen, the Seleucid oppression had come and gone, and finally Rome had arisen. Where was the redemption? Why did Israel still groan? These questions could be asked whether one looked for Israel's spiritual purification or political restoration. Paul uses this expression (which literally indicates the time set for a child's maturity) to indicate that only when history had "matured" to the proper point was God ready to act. Traditionally this maturity has been seen as a combination of the widespread Greek language and culture with the Roman political pacification and transportation system making the spread of the gospel easier. One could add the socially oppressive situation in Palestine and the existence of legally protected Jewish synagogues around the Mediterranean. Paul, however, is thinking of something deeper. Just as in Genesis 15:16 God was not ready to act, so God patiently waited until the inward and outward aspects of history were "just right" before he sent his Son. There was no accident, but God worked through and controlled history (cf. Matt. 13:11, 16–17; Mark 1:15).

In Ephesians 1:10, however, Paul is looking in the other direction. He realizes that redemption was accomplished at the cross, but it is marked out in history. The "mystery" (Rom. 16:25–26; Eph. 1:9; 3:4–5; Col. 1:26), which is this plan to unite all things in Christ, is being worked out in the church as the gospel spreads, people are joined to Christ, and the gospel transforms the social situation of the world. But Paul was deeply aware that the "already" of the foretaste he saw happening even in his ministry was combined with the "not yet" of rejection and endless frustration around him (cf. Rom. 8:18–25). The result was not despair, but a realization that God also had a time when this age will come to full ripeness or maturity, and his plan or purpose is the revelation of Jesus Christ as head over all things, a position he potentially holds since the ascension but will actualize only in his parousia (second coming).

P. H. DAVIDS

Bibliography. O. Cullmann, Christ and Time; J. M. Egan, Fullness of Time: Essays in Biblical Chronology; G. E. Ladd, Theology of the New Testament; C. L. Mitton, Ephesians; E. Sauer, From Eternity to Eternity.

Fundamentalism. A movement that arose in the United States during and immediately after the First World War in order to reaffirm orthodox Protestant Christianity and to defend it militantly against the challenges of liberal theology, German higher criticism, Darwinism, and other isms regarded as harmful to American Christianity. Since then, the focus of the movement, the meaning of the term, and the ranks of those who willingly use the term to identify themselves have changed several times. Fundamentalism has so far gone through four phases of expression while maintaining an essential continuity of spirit, belief, and method.

Through the 1920s. The earliest phase involved articulating what was fundamental to Christianity and initiating an urgent battle to expel the enemies of orthodox Protestantism from the ranks of the churches.

The series of twelve volumes called Fundamentals (1910–15) provided a wide listing of the enemies—Romanism, socialism, modern philosophy, atheism, Eddyism, Mormonism, spiritualism, and the like, but, above all, liberal theology, which rested on a naturalistic interpretation of the doctrines of the faith, and German higher criticism and Darwinism, which appeared to undermine the Bible's authority. The writers of the articles were a broad group from English-speaking North America and the United Kingdom and from many denominations. The doctrines they defined and defended covered the whole range of traditional Christian teachings. They presented their criticisms fairly, with careful argument, and in appreciation of much that their opponents said.

Almost immediately, however, the list of enemies became narrower and the fundamentals less comprehensive. Defenders of the fundamentals of the faith began to organize outside the churches and within the denominations. The General Assembly of the northern Presbyterian Church in 1910 affirmed five essential doctrines regarded as under attack in the church: the inerrancy of Scripture, the virgin birth of Christ, the substitutionary atonement of Christ, Christ's bodily resurrection, and the historicity of the miracles. These were reaffirmed in 1916 and 1923, by which time they had come to be regarded as the fundamental doctrines of Christianity itself. On a parallel track, and in the tradition of Bible prophecy conferences since 1878, premillenarian Baptists and independents founded the World's Christian Fundamentals Association in 1919, with William B. Riley as the prime mover. The premillennialists tended to replace the miracles with the resurrection and the second coming of Christ, or even premillenarian doctrine as the fifth fundamental. Another version put the deity of Christ in place of the virgin birth.

The term fundamentalist was perhaps first used in 1920 by Curtis Lee Laws in the Baptist Watchman-Examiner, but it seemed to pop up everywhere in the early 1920s as an obvious way to identify someone who believed and actively defended the fundamentals of the faith. The Baptist John Roach Straton called his newspaper The Fundamentalist in the 1920s. The Presbyterian scholar J. Gresham Machen disliked the word and only hesitatingly accepted it to describe himself, because, he said, it sounded like a new religion and not the same historic Christianity that the church had always believed.

Through the 1920s the fundamentalists waged the battle in the large northern church denominations as nothing less than a struggle for true Christianity against a new non-Christian religion that had crept into the churches themselves. In his book Christianity and Liberalism (1923),

Machen called the new naturalistic religion "liberalism," but later followed the more popular fashion of calling it "modernism."

Even though people like Harry Emerson Fosdick professed to be Christian, fundamentalists felt they could not be regarded as such because they denied the traditional formulations of the doctrines of Christianity and created modern, naturalistic statements of the doctrines. The issue was as much a struggle over a view of the identity of Christianity as it was over a method of doing theology and a view of history. Fundamentalists believed that the ways the doctrines were formulated in an earlier era were true and that modern attempts to reformulate them were bound to be false. In other words, the fundamentals were unchanging.

Church struggles occurred in the Methodist Episcopal Church, the Protestant Episcopal Church, and even in the southern Presbyterian Church, but the grand battles were fought in the northern Presbyterian and northern Baptist denominations. Machen was the undisputed leader among Presbyterians, joined by Clarence E. Macartney. Baptists created the National Federation of the Fundamentalists of the Northern Baptists (1921), the Fundamentalist Fellowship (1921), and the Baptist Bible Union (1923) to lead the fight. The battles focused on the seminaries, the mission boards, and the ordination of clergy. In many ways, however, the real strongholds of the fundamentalists were the Southern Baptists and the countless new independent churches spread across the South and Midwest, as well as the east and west.

In politics fundamentalists opposed the teaching of Darwinian evolution in public schools, leading up to the famous Scopes trial (1925) in Dayton, Tennessee. William Jennings Bryan, a Presbyterian layman and three times candidate for the American presidency, was acknowledged leader of the antievolution battle.

Late 1920s to the Early 1940s. By 1926 or so, those who were militant for the fundamentals had failed to expel the modernists from any denomination. Moreover, they also lost the battle against evolutionism. Orthodox Protestants, who still numerically dominated all the denominations, now began to struggle among themselves. During the depression of the 1930s, the term fundamentalist gradually shifted meaning as it came to apply to only one party among those who believed the traditional fundamentals of the faith. Meanwhile, neo-orthodoxy associated with Karl Barth's critique of liberalism found adherents in America.

In several cases in the North, fundamentalists created new denominations to carry on the true faith in purity apart from the larger bodies they regarded as apostate. They formed the General Association of Regular Baptist Churches (1932), the Presbyterian Church of America (1936), renamed the Orthodox Presbyterian Church, the Bible Presbyterian Church (1938), the Conservative Baptist Association of America (1947), the Independent Fundamental Churches of America (1930), and many others. In the South, fundamentalists dominated the huge Southern Baptist Convention, the southern Presbyterian Church, and the expanding independent Bible church and Baptist church movements, including the American Baptist Association. Across the United States fundamentalists founded new revival ministries, mission agencies, seminaries, Bible schools, Bible conferences, and newspapers.

Fundamentalism

During this period the distinctive theological point that the fundamentalists made was that they represented true Christianity based on a literal interpretation of the Bible, and that de facto this truth ought to be expressed organizationally separate from any association with liberals and modernists. They came to connect a separatist practice with the maintenance of the fundamentals of the faith. They also identified themselves with what they believed was pure in personal morality and American culture. Thus, the term fundamentalist came to refer largely to orthodox Protestants outside the large northern denominations, whether in the newly established denominations, in the southern churches, or in the many independent churches across the land.

Early 1940s to the 1970s. Beginning in the early 1940s the fundamentalists, thus becoming redefined, divided gradually into two camps. There were those who voluntarily continued to use the term to refer to themselves and to equate it with true Bible-believing Christianity. There were others who came to regard the term as undesirable, having connotations of divisive, intolerant, anti-intellectual, unconcerned with social problems, even foolish. This second group wished to regain fellowship with the orthodox Protestants who still constituted the vast majority of the clergy and people in the large northern denominations—Presbyterian, Baptist, Methodist, and Episcopalian. They began during the 1940s to call themselves “evangelicals” and to equate that term with true Christianity. Beginning in 1948 a few called themselves neoevangelical.

Organizationally this split among largely northern fundamentalists was expressed on one hand by the American Council of Christian Churches (1941), which was ecclesiastically separatist in principle, and on the other by the National Association of Evangelicals (1942), which sought to embrace orthodox Protestants as individuals in all denominations. The term fundamentalist was carried into the 1950s by the ACCC as well as by a vast number of southern churches and independent churches not included in either body. It was proudly used by such schools as Bob Jones University, Moody

Bible Institute, and Dallas Theological Seminary, and by hundreds of evangelists and radio preachers. The International Council of Christian Churches (1948) sought to give the term worldwide currency in opposition to the World Council of Churches.

The term fundamentalist took on special meaning in contrast with evangelical or neoevangelical, rather than merely in contrast with liberalism, modernism, or neo-orthodoxy. Fundamentalists and evangelicals in the 1950s and 1960s shared much; both adhered to the traditional doctrines of Scripture and Christ; both promoted evangelism, revivals, missions, and a personal morality against smoking, drinking, theater, movies, and card-playing; both identified American values with Christian values; both believed in creating organizational networks that separated themselves from the rest of society. Fundamentalists, however, believed they differed from evangelicals and neoevangelicals by being more faithful to Bible-believing Christianity; more militant against church apostasy, communism, and personal evils; and less ready to cater to social and intellectual respectability. They tended to oppose evangelist Billy Graham, not to read Christianity Today, and not to support Wheaton College or Fuller Theological Seminary. Instead, they favored their own evangelists, radio preachers, newspapers, and schools. Fundamentalists tended to differ greatly among themselves and found it difficult to achieve widespread fundamentalist cooperation.

Meanwhile people in North America and Great Britain who were neither fundamentalist nor evangelical tended to regard both as fundamentalist, noting their underlying similarities.

Late 1970s and the 1980s. By the late 1970s and in particular by the 1980 campaign of Ronald Reagan for the American presidency, fundamentalists entered a new phase. They became nationally prominent as offering an answer for what many regarded as a supreme social, economic, moral, and religious crisis in America. They identified a new and more pervasive enemy, secular humanism, which they believed was responsible for eroding churches, schools, universities, the government, and, above all, families. They fought all enemies which they considered to be offspring of secular humanism—evolutionism, political and theological liberalism, loose personal morality, sexual perversion, socialism, communism, and any lessening of the absolute, inerrant authority of the Bible. They called Americans to return to the fundamentals of the faith and the fundamental moral values of America.

Leading this phase was a new generation of television and print fundamentalists, notably Jerry Falwell, Tim LaHaye, Hal Lindsey, and Pat Robertson. Their base was Baptist and southern, but they reached into all denominations. They benefited from three decades of post-World War II fundamentalist and evangelical expansion through evangelism, publishing, church extension, and radio ministry. They tended to blur the distinction between fundamentalist and evangelical. Statistically, they could claim that perhaps one-fourth of the American population was fundamentalist-evangelical. However, not all fundamentalists accepted these new leaders, considering them to be neofundamentalists.

The fundamentalists of the early 1980s and 1990s were in many ways very different people from their predecessors, and they faced many different issues. But they continued important traits common to fundamentalists from the 1920s through the early 1980s. They were certain that they possessed true knowledge of the fundamentals of the faith and that they therefore represented true Christianity based on the authority of a literally interpreted Bible. They believed it was their duty to carry on the great battle of history, the battle of God against Satan, of light against darkness, and to fight against all enemies who undermined Christianity and America. Faced with this titanic struggle, they were inclined to consider other Christians who were not fundamentalists as either unfaithful to Christ or not genuinely Christian. They called for a return to an inerrant and infallible Bible, to the traditional statement of the doctrines, and to a traditional morality they believed once prevailed in America. To do all this, they created a vast number of separate organizations and ministries to propagate the fundamentalist faith and practice.

C. T. McINTIRE

See also EVANGELICALISM; FUNDAMENTALS, THE.

Bibliography. J. Barr, Fundamentalism; J. A. Carpenter, Revive Us Again: The Reawakening of American Fundamentalism; G. W. Dollar, History of Fundamentalism in America; J. Falwell, E. Dobson, and E. Hindson, eds., Fundamentalist Phenomenon; N. F. Furniss, Fundamentalist Controversy, 1918–1931; L. Gasper, Fundamentalist Movement, 1930–1956; J. D. Hunter, American Evangelicalism; R. Lightner, Neo-Evangelicalism; G. M. Marsden, Fundamentalism and American Culture; Reforming Fundamentalism; J. I. Packer, “Fundamentalism” and the Word of God; C. A. Russell, Voices of American Fundamentalism; E. R. Sandeen, Roots of Fundamentalism; D. F. Wells and J. D. Woodbridge, eds., Evangelicals.

Fundamentals, The. A series of twelve volumes of articles published in Chicago between 1910 and 1915 as a witness to the central doctrines and experiences of Protestant Christianity and as a defense against numerous modern movements, cults, and criticisms of orthodoxy.

Fundamentals, subtitled “A Testimony to the Truth,” is associated with the founding of fundamentalism as a restatement of orthodox Christianity against the liberal theology and modernism of the time. Three million individual copies of the volume were distributed free to English-speaking Protestant ministers, missionaries, and workers around the world. They were financed anonymously by “two Christian laymen,” Lyman and Milton Stewart, wealthy California oil capitalists who donated the income from interest on some of their securities investments.

Fundamentals originated out of and was editorially controlled by persons in the Bible school, revival, and independent church movements associated with the Bible Institute of Los Angeles and Moody Bible Institute. But the authors were a broad selection of Presbyterians, Anglicans, Baptists, Independents, and others, from England, Scotland, and Canada, as well as the United States. As a group they represented the last of Victorian orthodoxy; all but nine of the thirty-seven most prominent were deceased by 1925, and of those, only six stood with the fundamentalists in the church battles of that decade.

The eighty-three articles covered these main themes: (1) a statement and apologetic defense of main Christian doctrines (e.g., God, revelation, the incarnation, the atonement, the resurrection, the Holy Spirit, inspiration); (2) a defense of the Bible against German higher criticism; (3) a criticism of movements considered non-Christian (e.g., Romanism, Eddyism, Mormonism, rationalism, Darwinism, socialism); (4) an emphasis on evangelism and missions; (5) a sample of personal testimonies by people telling how Christ worked in their lives.

Fundamentals, especially in the first seven or eight volumes, was an attempt to be broad and well-rounded, doctrinal as well as experiential, educational and intelligently apologetic, and tolerant and considerate of those they criticized. Their aim was to help equip Protestant workers in their ministries to understand the new situation in Christianity when alternatives to and departures from orthodoxy were both numerous and successful.

A look at how two or three themes were treated will illustrate Fundamentals. Many articles are devoted to a defense of Scripture against German higher criticism. Dyson Hague, lecturer at Wycliffe College, Toronto, had read the Germans carefully and appreciated their attempts to understand the authorship, literary forms, and sources of the biblical texts. In an appeal even to the critics themselves he pointed out that their scholarship depended upon the a priori of naturalism and that there were valid alternative treatments of the higher critical questions. Professor James Orr from Glasgow carefully distinguished between Darwinism and evolutionary theory. Darwinism, he said, unwarrantably opposed a scientific theory to the biblical accounts; by contrast some form of evolutionary theory may describe how God created the living creatures, including humans.

Fundamentals, The

C. T. MCINTIRE

See also FUNDAMENTALISM.

Bibliography. W. R. Hutchison, Modernist Impulse in American Protestantism; G. M. Marsden, Fundamentalism and American Culture; E. R. Sandeen, Roots of Fundamentalism.

Gg

Gadamer, Hans-Georg (b. 1900). The German philosopher Hans-Georg Gadamer was the student of Martin Heidegger and is an acclaimed Plato scholar. In 1960 he published his major contribution to philosophical hermeneutics, Truth and Method (the German subtitle included Fundamental Features of a Philosophical Hermeneutic), a book that has had a prodigious impact on scholarship. Gadamer shares some of Heidegger's views but is more systematic than Heidegger. Gadamer seeks to move away from rationality, more specifically the scientific method, as a sieve for understanding truth and to discover truth in the nonrational areas of life. Gadamer believes that scientific method is flawed as the chief method in the process of interpretation, or hermeneutics. There is a truth that science cannot discover but that art can discover. Gadamer suggests that he is not describing a method but simply stating "what is the case." The investigation of the nature of art opens the door to a realm of truth that transcends method. Gadamer's chief concern relates to the question, "How is understanding possible?" Gadamer is critical of the idea that one can achieve understanding by pure reason—the ideal of the Enlightenment. Descartes' emphasis on method, according to Gadamer, was a step in the wrong direction—a step away from the classical Greek ideal of practical wisdom (sophia).

Rationality is community-relative according to Gadamer's philosophy. That is not to say that truth is relative, since Gadamer states that "the possibilities of rational proof and doctrine do not fully exhaust the sphere of knowledge." In other words, while the method used to discern truth may be subject to one's own experiences or horizons, the truth is nevertheless an objective entity. Some behavior may be rational in a given community but irrational if applied outside that community because the new community does not accept the behavior.

In terms of ontology, those who look at the art of another and those who celebrate a festival that reenacts an original event are not experiencing an inferior "copy" of the original art or event. Gadamer uses music, art, architecture, literature, and drama to demonstrate that these things are "never simply past." Experience is the key to understanding art, music, drama, and literature. Similarly, when one plays a game, whether chess, football, or some other game, each game is new, different, and reveals an existential experience that cannot be repeated and cannot be explained simply by using scientific method.

One of Gadamer's key concepts is that of the "horizon." A horizon is the context or environment that a person brings to an event or that surrounds the event. A temporal horizon exists that is more expansive than originally conceived by an artist. When one "experiences" the beauty of a piece of art, it demonstrates that the encounter with art is an "unfinished process." Even the artist may see something new at a later time. Likewise, the meaning of a given text always transcends its author. In terms of hermeneutics, then, not only does a text need to be interpreted, but one's own context must be placed into the equation. This is a "fusion" of two horizons, the horizon of an original piece of art, or music, or text, and the horizon of the one interpreting the art, music, or text. Therefore, pure reason alone is not an adequate tool for interpreting historical data, which is a primary concern for hermeneutics.

For Christians, Gadamer's hermeneutical method is inadequate as a key outlook governing the interpretation of historical documents. Gadamer's existential approach, especially what remained from his influence from Heidegger, is one-sided and tends to minimize the objective nature of historical events.

One application of Gadamer's hermeneutical outlook for Christianity is that it stands to reason that science is not the final word on truth. Christian truth does not have to be proved scientifically in order to be true, because there is a truth in art that science is inadequate to reveal. Christian worship is an example of a Christian tradition that contains rational and nonrational elements. Christianity has a nonrational element that, like art, is experienced. Christianity cannot be reduced simply to a system of beliefs but is also relational in nature. There is truth in Christianity that science cannot discover. But it should also be pointed out that science can corroborate the claims of Christianity.

E. ADAMS

See also EXISTENTIALISM; HEIDEGGER, MARTIN.

Bibliography. H.-G. Gadamer, Philosophical Apprenticeships; Relevance of the Beautiful; Truth and Method, G. Barden and J. Cumming, eds.; R. K. Brown, Authorial Intention Model of Hermeneutics: A Gadamerian Critic; M. R. Foster, Gadamer and Practical Philosophy: The Hermeneutics of Moral Confidence; D. C. Hoy, Critical Circle: Literature, History, and Philosophical Hermeneutics; D. P. Michelfelder and R. E. Palmer, eds., Dialogue and Deconstruction: The Gadamer–Derrida Encounter; R. E. Palmer, Philosophy of Hans-Georg Gadamer; H. J. Silverman, ed., Gadamer and Hermeneutics; A. C. Thiselton, Two Horizons; B. R. Wachterhauser, ed., Hermeneutics and Truth; J. C. Weinsheimer, Gadamer's Hermeneutics: A Reading of Truth and Method.

Gaebelein, Arno Clemens (1861–1945). A central figure in the development of the fundamentalist movement in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Gaebelein was born in Thuringia (now part of East Germany) and emigrated to the United States in 1879 at the age of eighteen. While working in a wool mill in Lawrence, Massachusetts, this same year he received his call to the ministry and diligently studied the Bible and ancient languages. In 1881 he was asked to become the assistant at Louis Wallon's German Methodist Episcopal Church on Second Street in New York City. He boarded with Wallon's father, who gave him his first taste of premillennial eschatology. Following successful pastorates in Baltimore, Harlem, and Hoboken, Gaebelein returned to New York and began the Hope of Israel Movement, a mission dedicated to the Jewish people and their needs. Our Hope magazine (1894–1957) originated as an arm of this missionary enterprise to teach Christians about the Jewish people, to foster prophetic study, and to combat anti-Semitism. As Gaebelein's national—and later worldwide—ministry as a Bible teacher and conference speaker grew, Our Hope expanded into an influential Bible study magazine. It attracted readers from a broad spectrum of denominations and vocations.

Gaebelein was most famous in the realm of prophecy. C. I. Scofield, who asked him to contribute in this area to the Scofield Reference Bible, stated in a letter to Gaebelein: "I sit at your feet when it comes to prophecy." Gaebelein was adept at more than prophecy, however, writing nearly fifty books and scores of pamphlets on a variety of biblical topics. Known as an irenic spirit and calming influence in a movement that progressively gained a reputation for divisiveness and invective, Gaebelein never lost his love for the Jewish people. Under his editorship Our Hope firmly denounced Adolf Hitler and provided readers with up-to-date details of the plight of the Jews during the Holocaust, in contrast to the many other periodicals of that time that doubted the truth of the reports coming out of Germany. Gaebelein died on Christmas day in 1945, believing that the Jewish state he had supported for over fifty years would soon be established in Palestine.

D. A. RAUSCH

Bibliography. A. C. Gaebelein, Half a Century: The Autobiography of a Servant; Y. S. Ariel, On Behalf of Israel: American Fundamentalist Attitudes Toward Jews, Judaism, and Zionism; J. D. Douglas, ed., Who's Who in Christian History; D. A. Rausch, Arno C. Gaebelein 1861–1945; "Our Hope: An American Fundamentalist Journal and the Holocaust," FH 12:89–103; Zionism within Early American Fundamentalism, chs. 6, 8.

Gallican Articles, Four (1682). Drawn up at a specially convened assembly of the French bishops at Paris in March 1682, these articles sought to delineate as clearly as possible the respective powers of popes, kings, and bishops in the French Catholic Church. The immediate occasion for this gathering was a dispute that had broken out between the French king Louis XIV and Pope Innocent XI, concerning the right of nomination to vacant bishoprics and the disposition of their revenues. The 1682 assembly adopted four proposals drafted by Bossuet, bishop of Meaux, on the basis of an earlier pronouncement of the theological faculty at the Sorbonne. These articles declared: (1) that popes have no control over temporal matters, that kings are not subject to any ecclesiastical authority in civil affairs, that kings could not legitimately be deposed by the church, and that their subjects could not be released from their political allegiance by any papal decree; (2) that the papacy is subject to the authority of general councils of the church, as decreed by the Council of Constance (1414–18); (3) that papal authority must be exercised with due respect for local and national church usages and customs; (4) that, though the pope has "the principal part in questions of faith," pending the consent of a general council, his judgments are not irreformable.

The articles—a classic expression of Gallicanism, i.e., French national Catholicism—were ordered by Louis XIV to be taught in all French universities; but since they were not acceptable to the papacy, a number of French bishoprics remained vacant for years. In 1693 Pope Alexander VIII allowed the French king to retain the revenues from vacant bishoprics in return for abandonment of the Gallican Articles, but they continued to be taught in France throughout the eighteenth century.

N. V. HOPE

See also GALLICANISM.

Bibliography. S. Z. Ehler and J. B. Morrall, Church and State through the Centuries; A. Galton, Church and State in France, 1300–1907; W. H. Jervis, Gallican Church.

Gallic Confession (1559). French Protestant statement of religious belief. Protestantism began to take hold during the second and third quarters of the sixteenth century, mainly under the sponsorship of Calvin's Geneva. In 1555 a congregation was organized in Paris, holding regular services and having a formal organization; and during the years immediately following, similar groups sprang up elsewhere in France. In May 1559 representatives of these congregations met in Paris under the moderatorship of François de Morel, the local pastor, for their first national synod, at which a system of church discipline was approved. This assembly received from Geneva a draft confession of faith in thirty-five articles and expanded it into forty. These articles began with the Triune God, revealed in his written Word, the Bible. Then they affirmed adherence to the three ecumenical creeds—Apostles', Nicene, and Athanasian—"because they are in accordance with the Word of God." Then they proceeded to expound basic Protestant beliefs: human's corruption through sin, Jesus Christ's essential deity and vicarious atonement, justification by grace through faith, the gift of the regenerating Holy Spirit, the divine origin of the church and its two sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper, and the place of the political state as ordained by God "for the order and peace of society." They asserted the doctrine of predestination in a moderate form.

This revamped confession was adopted by the synod, and in 1560 a copy was presented to King Francis II with a plea for tolerance for its adherents. At the seventh national synod, held at La Rochelle in 1571, this Gallic Confession was revised and reaffirmed. It remained the official confessional statement of French Protestantism for over four centuries.

N. V. HOPE

See also CONFESSIONS OF FAITH.

Bibliography. A. C. Cochrane, Reformed Confessions of the Sixteenth Century; P. Schaff, Creeds of Christendom.

Gallicanism. A French movement with the intent of diminishing papal authority and increasing the power of the state over the church. It was viewed as heretical by the Roman Catholic Church. Its earliest exponents were the fourteenth-century Franciscans William of Ockham, John of Jandun, and Marsilius of Padua. Marsilius's writings helped to cause the schism in the church that resulted in two rival popes (1275–1342). Conciliarism, an early form of Gallicanism, was the attempt to patch up the breach between the opposing factions in the Catholic church. In the conciliar spirit a church council's authority would prevail over the edicts of any pope. The Council of Constance (1414–18) adopted conciliarism as a stance, hoping that it would permit the election of a pope acceptable to both Catholic factions. John Gerson (1363–1429) and Peter d'Ailly (1350–1420) were influential figures in the development of Gallicanism during the early fifteenth century.

Thus far Gallicanism had remained an ecclesiastical affair, but in 1594 Pierre Pithou brought it into the secular political arena. Pithou, a Parisian lawyer, wrote Liberties of the Gallican Church that year. The Gallican Liberties, as Pithou's proposals came to be called, infringed on the traditional rights of the papacy in favor of increased governmental power over the church. The liberties explicitly claimed royal authority to assemble councils and make church law. They crippled communication between the pope and his bishops in France: the bishops were made subject to the French sovereign, they were prevented from traveling to Rome, papal legates were denied visits to the French bishops, and any communication with the pope without express royal consent was prohibited. Furthermore, publication of papal decrees in France was made subject to royal approval, and any papal decision could lawfully be appealed to a future council.

In 1663 the Sorbonne endorsed Gallicanism. Bossuet drew up the Gallican Articles, published by the Assembly of the Clergy in 1682. These attempted to clarify the theological justification of the Gallican Liberties by appealing to the conciliar theory and reasoning that Christ gave Peter and the popes spiritual authority but not temporal. In support of the conciliar theory Bossuet attributed direct authority from Christ to the ecclesiastical councils. He declared that papal decisions could be reversed until they were ratified by the whole church, and he advocated faithfulness to the traditions of the Church of France (significantly, not the Church of Rome). The Gallican Articles became an obligatory part of the curriculum in every French school of theology, and the movement flourished during the seventeenth century. The French Revolution struck a fatal blow to Gallicanism near the end of the next century by forcing the French clergy to turn to Rome for help when they, along with the government, came under attack. Eventually the movement died out.

P. A. MICKEY

Gallicanism

See also BOSSUET, JACQUES BÉNIGNE; FEBRONIANISM; GALRICAN ARTICLES, FOUR.

Bibliography. A. Barry, "Bossuet and the Gallican Declaration of 1682," CHR 9:143–53; F. P. Drouet, NCD 6:262–67; C. B. du Chesnay, NCE; J. A. Hardon, Modern Catholic Dictionary; C. J. Jaenen, Role of the Church in New France; W. H. Jervis, Gallican Church and the Revolution.

Gap Theory. The gap or reconstruction theory is a scheme to reconcile the long geologic ages in the earth's history with the Genesis creation account. It basically advocates that the first two verses of Genesis 1 describe a condition that lasted an indeterminate length of time and preceded the six days of creation in Genesis 1:3–31. Creation (1:1) was followed by a catastrophe (1:2), which in turn was followed by a re-creation (1:3–31). All the needed geologic ages in earth's pre-Adamic history may be found either between 1:1 and 1:2 or during 1:2.

Early expressions of the view can be traced to Episcopius (d. 1643), a theologian who taught at the University of Leiden in the Netherlands, and to the scientist J. G. Rosenmüller (d. 1815). In nineteenth-century England it was espoused by the theologian Thomas Chalmers, geologist William Buckland, biblical scholar John Pye Smith, and church historian J. H. Kurtz. In the United States the view was widely disseminated by G. H. Pember, Harry Rimmer, H. C. Thiessen, and the first edition of the Scofield Reference Bible (1909).

For many today the day-age theory has replaced the gap theory as the best explanation of the geologic ages and Genesis 1. Others have adopted flood catastrophism. Criticism of the gap theory has arisen from various circles, and summaries may be found in the works of Allis, Ramm, and Young cited below. In essence the criticism involves (1) the improbability that only one verse (Gen. 1:1) deals with the original creation while so many sentences are devoted to a secondary or re-creation process; (2) the lack of solid exegetical evidence to support the rendering of the Hebrew verb "was" in Genesis 1:2 as "became;" (3) the sense of "formless" and "empty" meaning nothing more than "uninhabited;" (4) elaborate theories of angelology and demonology derived from Isaiah 14 and Ezekiel 28 and inserted in Genesis 1:2 being unjustified; and (5) such a theory turning the entire field of geology over to the geologists since the Bible yields no reference to earth's earliest formation.

A. F. JOHNSON

See also CREATION, DOCTRINE OF; EVOLUTION.

Bibliography. O. T. Allis, God Spake by Moses; B. Ramm, Christian View of Science and Scripture; D. A. Young, Christianity and the Age of the Earth.

Gehenna. The Greek transliteration of the Aramaic gehinnām, which itself goes back to the Hebrew gê hinnôm: "Valley of Hinnom" (also "valley of the son [sons] of Hinnom"; cf. 2 Kings 23:10; 2 Chron. 28:3). Original reference was to a valley southwest of Jerusalem. Near where this valley joined the Kidron Valley, on the south and east, was Topheth, early site of Baal worship and the abominable practice of sacrifice of children to Molech (cf. 2 Kings 16:3 and 21:6 for involvement respectively of Ahaz and Manasseh; and 2 Kings 23:10 for condemnation by Josiah, the reformer king). In Jeremiah 7:32 and 19:6 is the prophecy that this place of shame will become the place of punishment by God.

Because of such associations, by the first century B.C., gehenna came to be used metaphorically for the hell of fire, the place of everlasting punishment for the wicked. This understanding is discernible in Jewish apocalyptic literature (e.g., 2 Esdr. 7:36). Talmudic literature abounds in references to gehenna with fascinating opinions—e.g., that the depth of gehenna is immeasurable or that the sinner is relegated to a depth commensurate with his or her wickedness. References to a fiery hell are found in both Philo and Josephus and also in the Qumran literature.

Of the twelve occurrences of gehenna in the NT, eleven are in the Synoptic Gospels and one in James. All the Synoptic references are to words of Jesus and have the same meaning as above. In addition to the word itself, scholars agree that there are several occurrences of the concept, e.g., Matthew 25:41 and Revelation 20:4. Gehenna shares some common ground with Hades/Sheol; however, the latter is more consistently the interim abode of both good and bad souls after death prior to judgment, while gehenna is the final and everlasting place of punishment for the wicked following the last judgment.

The numerous references to gehenna tell forcefully against a doctrine of universalism. Attempts to soften or ignore this material concerning the lot of those who refuse to repent of sin constitute distortion of the biblical witness.

V. CRUZ

See also ETERNAL PUNISHMENT; HADES; HELL; SHEOL.

Bibliography. H. Bietenhard, NIDNTT 2:205–10; L. Blau, Jewish Encyclopedia; H. Buis, Doctrine of Eternal Punishment; L. Morris, Biblical Doctrine of Judgment.

General Revelation. See REVELATION, GENERAL.

Generation, Eternal. See ETERNAL GENERATION.

Genetic Engineering. See EUGENICS.

Genevan Catechism (1537). This catechism by John Calvin was published in French in 1537 as Instruction and Confession of Faith According to the Use of the Church of Geneva; it was also published in Latin the following year. Along with a confession of faith and articles on church government that appeared in 1537, the catechism was part of Calvin's original program for the perfecting of the reformation and organization of the church during his first period in Geneva.

The catechism was in fifty-eight sections, and its treatment included the following topics: the knowledge of God, the difference between false and true religion, man, free will, sin and death, salvation, the law of God (including the Ten Commandments), the aim of the law, faith, election and predestination, justification and sanctification, sanctification and obedience to the law, repentance and regeneration, faith and good works, the Apostles' Creed, hope, prayer (including the Lord's Prayer), sacraments, baptism, the Lord's Supper, church pastors and their power, human traditions, excommunication, and the magistrate. The confession of faith that was appended was actually shorter than the catechism and was an extract from the catechism. Both documents restated doctrines that appeared earlier in Calvin's Institutes of the Christian Religion (1536) and were intended as summaries of the faith to which the Genevan community was expected to pledge itself. The catechism was really a manual of theology and was thus too lengthy and profound for the instruction of children. When Calvin returned from exile in 1541, this catechism was replaced by a new catechism in question and answer form. The significance of the 1537 catechism is that it was the first systematic exposition of Calvinist thought in the French language.

A. H. FREUNDT JR.

See also CALVINISM; CATECHISMS.

Bibliography. J. Calvin, Catechism, 1538, F. L. Battles, trans.

Gerhard, Johann (1582–1637). Considered the third most important theologian in the history of Lutheranism, next to Martin Luther and Martin Chemnitz. His pastor, Johann Arndt, encouraged him to study theology, and he studied at Wittenberg, Jena, and Marburg. As a young man he was already a successful administrator, serving as superintendent of Heldburg and then of Coburg. His academic inclinations and his poor health led away from this strenuous administrative work to a more sedate theological professorship at Jena in 1616. He taught there until his death, in spite of many requests to teach elsewhere. He received numerous requests for advice.

Gerhard wrote in many theological fields, including exegesis, dogmatics, history, polemics, and sermonic and devotional material. His sermons were well received by hearers and readers. His devotional writings show that Lutheran orthodoxy was not at all dead but was conducive to vibrant Christian faith. The best known and most influential of his works was his multivolume dogmatics, Loci Theologici.

Gerhard was no innovator as far as the content of Christian doctrine was concerned. He faithfully followed the doctrinal stance of the Lutheran confessions, believing it to be thoroughly biblical. In Loci Theologici he drew heavily on exegesis and historical theology in the presentation of doctrine and also showed the practical use of each doctrine. He organized theology according to the synthetic method, as indicated by the word Loci ("topics"). Each doctrine was taken up in turn, and all the Bible said on each topic was considered. There was no attempt to turn theology into a philosophical system. Each doctrine was brought into relation to other doctrines, especially to the main doctrine, the gospel of the forgiveness of sins because of Jesus' death on the cross.

In Gerhard's day Aristotelian terminology came back into fashion in academic circles and he introduced such terminology into Lutheran theology, especially analysis in terms of causes. Gerhard was careful not to let this influence the content of his theology, however. Later seventeenth-century Lutheran theologians followed Gerhard in continuing to use these terms.

J. M. DRICKAMER

See also LUTHERAN TRADITION.

Bibliography. Concordia Cyclopaedia; R. D. Preus, Theology of Post-Reformation Lutheranism; H. Schmid, Doctrinal Theology of the Evangelical Lutheran Church.

German Christians. The term "German Christian" (Deutsche Christen) is not exclusively associated with those nationalistic, racist state-church forces closely related with Adolf Hitler's NSDAP (socialistic, national German party of labor). Rather, two strands of German Christians are to be distinguished: (1) the state-church movement of 1927 onward under the leadership of S. Leffler and J. Leutheuser, which sought to establish a national church beyond confessional particularities and differences; (2) the Protestant movement within the state church seeking to establish a rigidly run, centralized, and national Lutheran church (Reichskirche) as opposed to the Landeskirchen (decentralized local state churches). The latter was established in 1932 under the leadership of J. Hossenfelder, incorporating earlier anti-Judaic efforts of the League for a German Church. This latter movement enjoyed strong support from Hitler's NSDAP party in 1933 and thus achieved a position of leadership among many of the church's regions within the German federation.

German Christians

One faction among these German Christians (e.g., E. Hirsch) believed the contemporary political situation to be God's way of bringing about a unified national German church under one national bishop, thus "completing Luther's Reformation" (R. Krause; against this notion, cf. the Barmen Declaration of 1934, article one). Characteristic among German Christians was the rejection of the Old Testament, a de-Judaized version of the New Testament, and the eradication of all "servile elements" in Christianity (see the Barmen Declaration of 1934, article four; for a rejection of this position).

Its first leader (when officially associated with A. Hitler's totalitarian regime) was F. von Bodelschwingh, who was soon replaced, however, by Reichsbischof L. Müller, who was in turn replaced by H. Kerrl in 1935.

While its influence declined already in 1934, partially on account of the Confessing Church and its Barmen Declaration (Barmen Synod, May 1934), the German Christians continued their centralized efforts in support of a totalitarian state and nationalistic, racial Christianity until the organization was dissolved with the end of World War II in 1945.

H. F. BAYER

See also BARMEN, DECLARATION OF; CONFESSING CHURCH.

Bibliography. A. Cochrane, Church's Confession under Hitler; P. B. Means, Things That Are Caesar's; C. S. Macfarland, New Church and the New Germany; E. Mowrer, Germany Puts the Clock Back; O. Piper, Recent Developments in German Protestantism; K. Scholder, Churches and the Third Reich.

Ghost, Holy. See HOLY SPIRIT.

Gifts, Spiritual. See SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

Gilkey, Langdon Brown (b. 1919). Born into a prominent religiously liberal family, Gilkey entered Harvard a naturalistic humanist. After graduation (1940) he taught English in China until the Japanese imprisoned him (1943). The war and his internment dispelled his confidence in humanity's goodness. Through Reinhold Niebuhr's writings he rediscovered a Christianity that recognized the sinful human condition and believed that faith in God must lead to love for one's neighbor. Returning from China, Gilkey studied theology under Niebuhr and Paul Tillich at Union Theological Seminary, New York. After completing the Ph.D. (1954), he taught at Vanderbilt (1954–63) and the University of Chicago Divinity School (1963–89), where he assumed the Shailer Mathews Chair in Systematic Theology. A leader in the American academy, Gilkey's career reflects the academy's transition from neo-orthodoxy to revisionism and pluralism.

Gilkey's early works evidence left-wing neo-orthodoxy (Niebuhr and Tillich). He treats revelation as a symbolic expression of humanity's existential relation to God that provides the framework for understanding the ultimate questions of meaning and hope in this world. Maker of Heaven and Earth (1959), for instance, demonstrates the illuminating power of Christian revelation over against alternative views such as naturalism, pantheism, and dualism. Shantung Compound (1966) powerfully illustrates the realities of sin and the need for God's grace.

Beginning with "Cosmology, Ontology, and the Travail of Biblical Language" (Journal of Religion [1961]: 194–205), Gilkey's critique of neo-orthodoxy helped move the academy toward liberalism or revisionism. This influential article argues that the modern scientific cosmology has stripped biblical language of any specifiable objective historical reference; consequently, G. E. Wright's form of neo-orthodox biblical theology reduces God's revelatory acts and words into the subjective insight of the Israelites. While studiously ignoring other neo-orthodox proposals, such as Barth's analogy of faith and revelatory historical events as Geschichte, Gilkey calls for a theological ontology that is accessible for all humans. Naming the Whirlwind (1969) fulfilled this request. Here Gilkey argues that a dimension of ultimacy is present in contemporary human experience, and therefore God-talk is credible and meaningful for the common person.

Gilkey's subsequent works, such as Reaping the Whirlwind (1976), Message and Existence (1981), Religion and the Scientific Future (1970), and "Plurality and its Theological Implications" (1988) are decidedly revisionist. Believing that Christianity must be constantly reinterpreted into contemporary possibilities, his theological reflection is public and correlational: beginning with contemporary experience and criteria for intelligibility he establishes the meaningfulness of Christian symbols. As a result, he views Scripture as a fallible and erring human response to revelation, and reinterprets its historical referents symbolically. So creation ex nihilo refers not to a beginning but means that God is the sole ground of all there is. God is redefined as that self-limited ground of human freedom that lures humans to a future open even for itself. Jesus is not the only way to salvation, nor is the salvation present in other religions grounded in him. A pluralist, Gilkey calls for believers to view their faith as "a relative apprehension of absolute meaning."

T. R. PHILLIPS

Bibliography. L. B. Gilkey, "Introduction: A Retrospective Glance at My Work" in Whirlwind in Culture: Frontiers in Theology—in Honor of Langdon Gilkey, D. W. Musser and J. L. Price, eds.; G. Langdon, "Plurality and Its Theological Implications," in Myth of Christian Uniqueness, John Hick and Paul Knitter, eds.; J. L. Rike, "Langdon Gilkey," in New Handbook of Christian Theologians, D. Musser and J. Price, eds.; J. Shea, Religious Language in a Secular Culture: A Study in the Thought of Langdon Gilkey; B. Walsh, Langdon Gilkey: Theologian for a Culture in Decline.

Gill, John (1697–1771). Baptist minister, theologian, and biblical scholar. Born in Kettering, Northamptonshire, England, he attended the local grammar school where he learned Latin and Greek. With a tremendous thirst for knowledge, he later taught himself other subjects, including Hebrew, theology, and philosophy. In 1716 he made a profession of faith in the local Particular (Calvinistic) Baptist Church and soon began preaching. In 1719 he became pastor of the church at Horsleydown, Southwark, in London, a congregation he served until his death. In addition, from 1729 to 1756 he lectured on Wednesday evenings in Great Eastcheap. He was also one of the Lime Street lecturers (1730–31). A diligent student, he read widely, particularly in Puritan and Reformed authors and in rabbinic literature. He was recognized in 1745 for his scholarship in biblical literature, Oriental languages, and Jewish antiquities by an honorary D.D. degree from Marischal College, Aberdeen University.

Gill was a very prolific and controversial writer, and although his style was somewhat prolix and ponderous, his writings were appreciated in the Particular Baptist circles among which he became a prominent authority. He defended staunch Baptist principles and what he believed to be orthodox Calvinism against contemporary heterodoxical views on the Trinity, the person of Christ, and the five points of Calvinism. He actually espoused an extreme form of Calvinism, teaching the doctrines of the eternal justification and adoption of the elect and of an eternal covenant of grace. Believing that an elect person is passive in conversion as well as regeneration, he denied that grace should be freely offered to unconverted sinners; it was not his practice to address them or to urge acceptance of the gospel.

Gill's principal writings include Doctrine of Justification by the Righteousness of Christ Stated and Defended (1730), Doctrine of the Trinity Stated and Vindicated (1731), Doctrine of God's Everlasting Love to His Elect and Their Eternal Union to Christ (1732), Cause of God and Truth (1734–38), Necessity of Good Works unto Salvation Considered (1739), Exposition of the New Testament (3 vols., 1746–48), Exposition of the Old Testament (6 vols., 1748–63), Doctrine of Predestination Stated and Set in Scripture-Light (1752), Doctrine of the Saints' Final Perseverance Asserted and Vindicated (1752), Dissertation Concerning the Antiquity of the Hebrew Language, Letters, Vowel-Points and Accents (1767), Body of Doctrinal Divinity (2 vols., 1767), and Body of Practical Divinity (1770). Some of these are still valued and occasionally appear in reprints, such as his biblical expositions and divinity volumes. He was little interested in the evangelical awakening of the eighteenth century, and the influence of Gill and his fellow Hyper-Calvinists explains why this revival was slow in having an effect upon the Particular Baptists.

A. H. FREUNDT JR.

See also CALVINISM; REFORMED TRADITION.

Bibliography. J. W. Brush, "John Gill's Doctrine of the Church," in Baptist Concepts of the Church, W. S. Hudson, ed.; J. Rippon, Brief Memoir of the Life and Writings of the Late Rev. John Gill, D.D.; P. Toon, Emergence of Hyper-Calvinism in English Nonconformity, 1689–1765.

Gladden, Washington (1836–1918). A popularizer of liberal theology and one of the most well-known advocates of the social gospel at the turn of the twentieth century in the United States. An ordained Congregationalist minister, Gladden served lengthy pastorates in Springfield, Massachusetts, and Columbus, Ohio. He also lectured widely and authored more than thirty-five books. Theologically Gladden was in the vanguard of liberalism. He emphasized God's loving care as a Father for his children. He regarded the atonement as "the reconciliation of suffering with love" that brought us Christ's victory over evil and his love for God. And under the influence of Horace Bushnell, he regarded all of nature romantically as the arena of God's imminent activity. Such works as Who Wrote the Bible? (1891) adapted evolutionary views of Christian origins and human potential to the higher criticism of Scriptures.

Gladden was a tireless champion of social reform. His interests focused on the economic sphere, where he argued against industrial exploitation of workers and for the rights of unions. He felt that education could improve the lot of laborers in order to equip them for fuller participation in the economy. He once urged his denomination to refuse a gift from the Standard Oil Company as tainted money. Much more than most of his contemporaries, Gladden preserved the social activism that had characterized nineteenth century American Christianity in general. But he did not preserve its basically orthodox theology. It was the kingdom of God, understood in social terms, with a renewed America bringing it to fruition, that occupied his concern. Gladden was also the author of hymns, including the well-known "O Master, Let Me Walk with Thee."

M. A. NOLL

See also LIBERALISM, THEOLOGICAL; SOCIAL GOSPEL.

Bibliography. W. Gladden, Recollections; J. H. Dorn, Washington Gladden: Prophet of the Social Gospel; R. T. Handy, ed., Social Gospel in America: 1870–1920; C. H. Hopkins, Rise of the Social Gospel in American Protestantism: 1865–1915; R. D. Knudten, Systematic Theology of Washington Gladden.

Glorification. This refers especially to the time when, at the parousia, those who died in Christ and the living believers will be given resurrection bodies—a final and full “redemption of our bodies” (Rom. 8:23), preparatory for and suited to the final state of Christian believers. As a theological term it is a synonym for immortality—when immortality is thought of as the glorification believers will receive, and not, as erroneously thought of, as simply the continued existence of both the believers and the finally impenitent.

Glorification, therefore, is only for believers, and it consists of the redemption of the body. At that time “the perishable” will “clothe itself with the imperishable,” and “the mortal,” the body, “with immortality” (1 Cor. 15:53). Then death, the Christian’s last enemy (1 Cor. 15:26), will be swallowed up in victory (1 Cor. 15:54).

The finally impenitent will be resurrected, but this is a second resurrection, to damnation—the “second death” (Rev. 2:11). Scripture does not refer to this second resurrection as either immortality or glorification.

Our special glory seems to consist, in part, in the hope we hold to: that we will be glorified. Paul also seems to teach that after the believers are glorified, the whole created world will undergo a fundamental renewal: “For the anxious longing of the creation waits eagerly for the revealing of the sons of God. For the creation was subjected to futility, . . . in hope that the creation itself will be set free from its slavery to corruption into the freedom of the glory of [or glorification of] the children of God” (Rom. 8:19–21 NASB). J. K. GRIDER

See also HEAVEN.

Glory. The principal word in the Hebrew for this concept is kābôd, and in the Greek doxa, which is derived from dokeō, “to think” or “to seem.” These two meanings account for the two main lines of significance in classical Greek, where doxa means opinion (what one thinks for one’s self) and reputation (what others think about that person), which may shade into fame or honor or praise.

In the Old Testament. Since kābôd derives from kābēd, “to be heavy,” it lends itself to the idea that the one possessing glory is laden with riches (Gen. 31:1), power (Isa. 8:7), position (Gen. 45:13), etc. To the translators of the LXX it seemed that doxa was the most suitable word for rendering kābôd, since it carried the notion of reputation or honor that was present in the use of kābôd. But kābôd also denoted the manifestation of light by which God revealed himself, whether in the lightning flash or in the blinding splendor that often accompanied theophanies. Of the same nature was the disclosure of the divine presence in the cloud that led Israel through the wilderness and became localized in the tabernacle. So doxa, as a translation of kābôd, gained a nuance of meaning that it did not possess before. At times kābôd had a deeper penetration, denoting the person or self. When Moses made the request of God, “Show me your glory” (Exod. 33:18), he was not speaking of the light-cloud, which he had already seen; rather, he was seeking a special manifestation of God that would leave nothing to be desired (cf. John 14:8). Moses had a craving to come to grips with God as he was in himself. In reply, God emphasized his goodness (Exod. 33:19). The word might be rendered in this instance “moral beauty.” Apart from this the eternity of God as a subject of human contemplation might be depressing. This incident involving Moses is the seed plot for the idea that God’s glory is not confined to some outward sign that appeals to the senses, but is that which expresses his inherent majesty, which may or may not have some visible token. Isaiah’s vision of him (6:1–7) included both the perception of sensible features and the nature of God, particularly his holiness (cf. John 12:41). The intrinsic worth of God, his ineffable majesty, constitutes the basis of warnings not to glory in riches, wisdom, or might (Jer. 9:23), but in the God who has given all these and is greater than his gifts. In the prophets the word glory is often used to set forth the excellence of the messianic kingdom in contrast to the limitations of the present order (Isa. 60:1–3).

In the New Testament. In general doxa follows rather closely the pattern established in the LXX. It is used of honor in the sense of recognition or acclaim (Luke 14:10), and of the vocalized reverence of the creature for the Creator and Judge (Rev. 14:7). With reference to God, it denotes his majesty (Rom. 1:23) and his perfection, especially in relation to righteousness (Rom. 3:23). He is called the “glorious Father” (Eph. 1:17). The manifestation of his presence in terms of light is an occasional phenomenon, as in the OT (Luke 2:9), but in the main this feature is transferred to the Son. The transfiguration is the sole instance during the earthly ministry, but later manifestations include the revelation to Saul at the time of his conversion (Acts 9:3–9) and to John on the Isle of Patmos (Rev. 1:12–20). The fact that Paul is able to speak of God’s glory in terms of riches (Eph. 1:18; 3:16) and might (Col. 1:11) suggests the influence of the OT upon his thinking. The display of God's power in raising his Son from the dead is labeled glory (Rom. 6:4).

Christ is the effulgence of the divine glory (Heb. 1:3). By means of him the perfection of the nature of God is made known to men. When James speaks of him as "our glorious Lord" (2:1), his thought seems to move along the lines of the revelation of God in the tabernacle. There the divine presence was a gracious condescension but also an ever-present reminder of God's readiness to mark the sins of his people and to visit them with judgment. So the readers of James' epistle are admonished to beware of partiality. The Lord is in the midst of his people as he was of old.

The glory of Christ as the image of God, the Son of the Father, was veiled from sinful eyes during the days of his flesh but was apparent to the men of faith who gathered around him (John 1:14).

Even as the preincarnate Son had dwelt with the Father in a state of glory (with no sin to mar the perfection of the divine mode of life and intercourse), according to his own consciousness (John 17:5), so his return to the Father can properly be called an entrance into glory (Luke 24:26). But more seems to be involved here than a sharing with the Father of what he had enjoyed in ages past. God now gives him glory (1 Pet. 1:21), in some sense as a reward for the faithful, full completion of the Father's will in relation to the work of salvation (Acts 3:13; Phil. 2:9–11). So it is that both the taking up of Christ from the earth (1 Tim. 3:16) and his return (Col. 3:4; Titus 2:13) and the representations of his presence and activity as the future judge and king (Matt. 25:31) are also associated with a majesty and radiance that are largely lacking in the portrayals of Jesus in the days of his humiliation.

While the contrast is valid, therefore, between the sufferings of Christ and the glories to follow (1 Pet. 1:11), John's Gospel reveals a further development, namely, that the sufferings themselves can be viewed as a glorification. Jesus was aware of this and expressed himself accordingly. "The hour has come for the Son of Man to be glorified" (John 12:23). This word "hour" in the fourth Gospel points regularly to the death of Christ. Jesus was not seeking to invest the cross with an aura of splendor it did not have, in order to conjure up a psychological antidote to its pain and shame. Rather, glory properly belongs to the finishing of the work the Father had given him to do, since that work represented the perfect will of God.

Eschatological glory is the hope of the Christian (Rom. 5:2). In this future state he will have a new body patterned after Christ's glorified body (Phil. 3:21), an instrument superior to that with which he is presently endowed (1 Cor. 15:43). Christ within the believer is the hope of glory

(Col. 1:27). He is also the chief ornament of heaven (Rev. 21:23).

A somewhat specialized use of the word is that which it has in the doxologies, which are ascriptions of praise to God for his worth and works (e.g., Rom. 11:36).

On several occasions glory is used as a verb (kauchaomai) where the meaning is to boast, as in Galatians 6:14.

E. F. HARRISON

See also BOASTING.

Bibliography. S. Aalen, NIDNTT 2:44–52; I. Abrahams, Glory of God; L. L. Belleville, Reflections of Glory: Paul's Polemical Use of the Moses-Doxa Tradition in II Corinthians 3:1–18; E. C. E. Owen, "Doxa and Cognate Word," JTS 33:132–50, 265–79; A. M. Ramsey, Glory of God and the Transfiguration of Christ.

Glory, Theology of. See THEOLOGIA GLORIAE.

Glossolalia. See TONGUES, SPEAKING IN.

Gnesio-Lutherans. See ADIAPHORA, ADIAPHORISTS; FLACIUS, MATTHIAS.

Gnosticism. Prior to the first half of the twentieth century, such early heresiologists (defenders of Christianity against heresy) as Irenaeus, Tertullian, Hippolytus, and Epiphanius were our principal sources of information concerning the Gnostics. These heresiologists were scathing in their denunciations of the Gnostics, who were perceived as leading Christians astray by the manipulation of words and the twisting of scriptural meanings. Of particular interest to Gnostic interpreters were the stories of Genesis, the Gospel of John, and the epistles of Paul. They used the biblical texts for their own purposes. Indeed, Gnostics such as Heracleon and Ptolemaeus were the first commentators on the fourth Gospel. But Irenaeus likens such interpretations to someone who takes apart a beautiful picture of a king and reassembles it into a picture of a fox (Adversus Haereses 1.8.1).

The heresiologists regarded Gnosticism as the product of the combination of Greek philosophy and Christianity. For instance, after detailing the Gnostic heretics, Tertullian announces: "What indeed has Athens to do with Jerusalem? What concord is there between the Academy and the Church? What between heretics and Christians? . . . Away with all attempts to produce a mottled Christianity of Stoic, Platonic, and dialectic composition" (On Prescription Against Heretics 7). The heresiologists' view concerning Gnosticism was generally regarded as acceptable even at the end of the nineteenth century, when Adolf Harnack defined Gnosticism as the "acute secularizing of Christianity."

Gnosticism

The history of religion school, of which Hans Jonas is a contemporary exponent, has challenged this definition. According to Jonas, Gnosticism is a general religious phenomenon of the Hellenistic world and is the product of the fusion of Greek culture and Oriental religion. The “Greek conceptualization” of Eastern religious traditions—i.e., Jewish monotheism, Babylonian astrology, and Iranian dualism—is viewed as the basis for Gnosticism. While R. M. Wilson and R. M. Grant reject such a broad definition and affirm instead a primary basis in Hellenistic Judaism or Jewish apocalyptic, the advantage of Jonas’s view is that it recognizes the broad spectrum within Gnosticism. The weakness is that the definition encompasses almost everything within the concept of Hellenistic religions.

The breadth of Gnostic orientations, however, has been confirmed by the discovery of a Gnostic library at Nag Hammadi in Egypt. In the thirteen ancient codices are included fifty-two tractates of which six represent duplicates. The tractates are of various types and orientations. A large number clearly present a Christian Gnostic perspective, the most familiar being the three so-called Valentinian gospels: the Gospel of Thomas (composed of a series of brief sayings of Jesus), the Gospel of Philip (a collection of sayings, metaphors, and esoteric arguments), and the Gospel of Truth (a discourse on deity and unity reminiscent of the language of the Fourth Gospel but definitely bent in the direction of Gnostic mythology and possibly related to the Gospel of Truth by Valentinus noted in Irenaeus). Also among the Christian Gnostic tractates are the Apocryphon of James, the Acts of Peter and the Twelve Apostles, the Treatise on the Resurrection, the long collection known as the Tripartite Tractate, and three editions of the Apocryphon of John (the fascinating story of creation that involves a reinterpretation of the Genesis accounts).

But not all the tractates reveal a pseudo-Christian orientation. The Paraphrase of Shem seems to reflect a Jewish Gnostic perspective. The Discourse on the Eighth and the Ninth is patently a Hermetic treatise. The longest tractate in the library (132 pages) bears the designation Zostrianos and purports to be from Zoroaster. One of the interesting features of this library is the presence of two editions of Eugnostos the Blessed, which seems to be a non-Christian philosophical document that has apparently been “Christianized” in a redacted tractate called the Sophia of Jesus Christ. Finally, the presence of a segment from Plato’s Republic among these documents gives further witness to the syncretistic nature of Gnostic thinking. As a result of Gnostic borrowing, readers will sense a certain fluidity in the Gnostic designations.

Types of Gnosticism. Despite a fluidity within Gnosticism, however, Jonas identifies two basic patterns or structures of Gnostic thought. Both are mythological structures that seek to explain the problem of evil in terms of its relationship to the process of creation.

Iranian. This branch of Gnosticism developed in Mesopotamia and reflects a horizontal dualism associated with Zoroastrian worship and is epitomized in its later Gnostic form of Manichaeism. In this pattern, light and darkness, the two primal principles or deities, are locked in a decisive struggle. This struggle has been positionalized by the fact that, since light transcends itself and shines beyond its own realm, light particles were subjected to capture by its jealous enemy, darkness. In order to launch a counterattack and recapture its lost particles, therefore, light gives birth to (or “emanates”) a series of subordinate deities that are emanated for the purpose of doing battle. In defense, darkness likewise sets in motion a comparable birthing of subdeities and arranges for the entombment of the light particles in a created world. This cosmic realm becomes the sphere of combat for the protagonists. The object of the struggle is the winning of the human beings who bear the light particles and the effecting of their release from the prison of this world so that they may reenter the sphere of heavenly light.

Syrian. This type arose in the area of Syria, Palestine, and Egypt and reflects a much more complex vertical dualism. In this system the ultimate principle is good, and the task of the Gnostic thinkers is to explain how evil emerged from the singular principle of good. The method employed is the identification of some deficiency or error in the good.

The Valentinian solution to the problem of evil is that the good god (the ultimate depth) with his consort (silence) initiates the birthing process of (or “emanates”) a series of paired deities. The last of the subordinate deities (usually designated as Sophia, wisdom) is unhappy with her consort and desires, instead, a relationship with the ultimate depth. This desire is unacceptable in the godhead and is extracted from Sophia and excluded from the heavenly realm (plērōma). While Sophia is thus rescued from her lust, the godhead has lost a portion of its divine nature. The goal, therefore, is the recovery of the fallen light.

But the excluded desire (or lower Sophia) is unaware of its fallen nature, and depending on the various accounts, either it or its offspring, the Creator, begins a “demiurgical” or birthing process that partially mirrors the “emanating” process in the plērōma and ultimately results in the creation of the world. The upper godhead (plērōma) by its divine messenger (often called Christ or the Holy Spirit) tricks the Creator-Demiurge into breathing into man the breath of life, and thus the light particles are passed to a light-man. The defense strategy of the lower godhead (realm of the Demiurge) is that the light-man is entombed in a body of death, which, under the direction of the Demiurge, has been formed by its pseudosubdeities, also known as "the fates" or identified with the realm of the planets.

The Garden of Eden story is then transformed so that the biblical tree of the knowledge of good and evil becomes a vehicle of knowledge (gnōsis) established by the heavenly or pleromatic realm. But the tree of life becomes a vehicle of bondage and dependence established by the demiurgical realm. The divine messenger from the plerōma encourages man to eat from the tree of knowledge; and in so eating, man discovers that the jealous Creator-Demiurge (often linked with misspelled forms of Yahweh such as Yaldabaoth or Yao) is not in fact the ultimate God but really an enemy of God. Man, as a result of divine help, thus comes to know more than the Creator. In anger the Creator casts man into an earthly body of forgetfulness, and the pleromatic realm is forced to initiate a process of spiritual awakening through the divine messenger.

The divine messenger is frequently identified with the figure of the Christian's Jesus Christ, but such identification has some very significant alterations. Since the divine realm is basically opposed to the creation of the lower realm, bodies at best are part of the created process and therefore need only to be regarded as vehicles that the divine may use for its own purposes. The divine messenger Christ, for the purpose of modeling the divine perspective, "adopted" the body of Jesus at a point such as at the baptism and departed at a point such as just prior to the crucifixion. It is the risen "Jesus" or Christ, devoid of bodily restrictions, that, based on the modeling, has power to awaken man from his sleep of forgetfulness. This assumption of the body of Jesus by the divine messenger is generally termed as "adoptionism" and is related to docetism, wherein Christ merely appears to be a man.

Gnostics are those set within a world where they are the spiritual persons (pneumatikoi) who possess the light particles and need only to be awakened in order to inherit their destinies. In the world there are also said to be psychic persons (psychikoi), who are a grade lower and need to work for whatever salvation they may be able to attain. The Gnostics often identified such psychics with Christians and understandably irritated the Christian heresiologists such as Irenaeus. The third division of this view of humanity is composed of material persons (hylikoi or sarkikoi), who have no chance to inherit any form of salvation but are destined for destruction. Accordingly, it should be obvious that such a view of anthropology is very deterministic in orientation.

The Valentinian goal is reentry into the plerōma, which is often symbolized by terms such as "union" or "unity." In documents such as the Gospel of Philip, however, the use of the term "bridal chamber" may suggest a sacrament of union. Such expressions highlight the fact that in many Gnostic documents sexually suggestive terminology is employed. For some Gnostics sexual interests may be attached to a spiritual alternative within an ascetic lifestyle that seems to issue in warnings not to fragment further the light particles in one's self through conjugation or sexual intercourse. For others, however, such as the followers of Marcus, spiritual awareness was apparently transferred through copulative activity outside of marriage.

At death the Gnostics, who had experienced awakening, shed the rags of mortality as they ascended through the realms of the fates (or planets). Thus, passing through the purgatory of the planets, they came at last to the limit (horos) or border (sometimes called the "cross") where, devoid of all that constitutes evil, they are welcomed into the eternal realm. The concept of purgatory in the Roman Catholic tradition is not unrelated to the purging pattern in Gnostic thought.

The above description is a pattern for understanding the Syrian type of Gnostic structure. While this structure should provide a helpful model for readers in interpreting Gnostic documents, it is imperative to recognize the syncretistic nature of Gnosticism and the wide variety of forms that are evident. The Sethians, for example, used Seth as their human figurehead, whereas the Ophites concentrated on the role of the serpent in giving knowledge. The vast possibilities for variation in structure make Gnostic studies both an intriguing and exercising enterprise.

The Gnostics obviously used sources such as Platonic dualism and Eastern religious thought, including ideas derived from Christianity. Their use of sources, however, often resulted in an attack upon those sources. For example, the Gnostics employ the concept of wisdom (the goal of Greek philosophy) in such a way that it is made the cause of all evil in the world. Such an ingenious attack on the concept of wisdom is far more hostile than Paul's statements in 1 Corinthians 1:22–2:16.

In addition to the Valentinian system and its many related forms, Hermetic literature provides a somewhat similar vertical-structured dualism. This arose in Egypt, and most of the writings seem to be generally unrelated to Christianity or Judaism, although the principal tractate of the Corpus Hermeticum known as Poimandres may not be totally unlike the thought world of the fourth Gospel. Hermetic literature thus raises the problem of Gnostic origins.

The Problem of Dating. Because of the methodological problems concerning Gnostic origins, it is imperative to mention briefly Mandaeism. In the 1930s many scholars were referring to Mandaeism as being pre-Christian, in spite of the fact that the documents used in the interpretive process were obtained from the small contemporary sect in Persia. There is of course no doubt that the traditions of this baptismal sect (which refers to John the Baptist) come from a much earlier time. But how long before the rise of Islam—which considered Mandaeans a valid religious group possessing both sacred writings and a prophet prior to Mohammed—is totally unknown. The matter of dating is, therefore, extremely problematic in the entire study of Gnosticism. Some documents like the Hermetic materials seem to evidence very few influences from Christianity, whereas a few documents, such as the Sophia of Jesus, may be Christianized redactions of earlier non-Christian documents. But the question that still remains to be answered is: When did Gnosticism arise? Clearly by the middle of the second century A.D. Gnosticism had reached its flowering. But contrary to Schmithals (Gnosticism in Corinth), the opponents of Paul in Corinth were hardly Gnostics. Were the opponents described in Colossians or Ephesians Gnostics? Were the opponents in the Johannine letters Gnostics? It is hard to read the NT and gain any secure feeling at the present that canonical writers were attacking the Gnostic devotees or mythologizers. G. L. BORCHERT

See also HERMETIC LITERATURE; MANDAEANS.

Bibliography. G. L. Borchert, "Insights into the Gnostic Threat to Christianity as Gained through the Gospel of Philip," in New Dimensions in New Testament Study, R. N. Longenecker and M. C. Tenney, eds.; F. C. Burkitt, Church and Gnosis; W. Foerster, Gnosis: A Selection of Gnostic Texts; R. M. Grant, Gnosticism and Early Christianity; R. M. Grant, ed., Gnosticism: A Source Book of Heretical Writings from the Early Christian Period; H. Jonas, Gnostic Religion; B. Layton, Gnostic Scriptures; E. Pagels, Gnostic Gospels; S. Pétremont, Separate God; J. Robinson, ed., Nag Hammadi Library in English; W. Schmithals, Gnosticism in Corinth; Paul and the Gnostics; D. M. Scholer, Nag Hammadi Bibliography 1948–1969; R. M. Wilson, Gnosis and the New Testament; Gnostic Problem; E. Yamauchi, Pre-Christian Gnosticism.

God, Arguments for the Existence of. The arguments for the existence of God constitute one of the finest attempts of the human mind to break out of the world and go beyond the sensible or phenomenal realm of experience.

Certainly the question of God's existence is the most important question of human philosophy. It affects the whole tenor of human life, whether man is regarded as the supreme being in the universe or whether it is believed that man has a superior being that he must love and obey, or perhaps defy.

There are three ways one can argue for the existence of God. First, the a priori approach argues from a conception of God as a being so perfect that his nonexistence is inconceivable. Second, the a posteriori approach gives evidence from the world, from the observable, empirical universe, insisting that God is necessary to explain certain features of the cosmos. Third, the existential approach asserts direct experience of God by way of personal revelation. This approach is not really an argument in the usual sense, because one does not usually argue for something that can be directly experienced.

The A Priori Approach. This approach is the heart of the famous ontological argument, devised by Anselm of Canterbury though adumbrated earlier in the system of Augustine. This argument begins with a special definition of God as infinite, perfect, and necessary.

Anselm said that God cannot be conceived in any way other than "a being than which nothing greater can be conceived." Even the fool knows what he means by "God" when he asserts, "There is no God" (Ps. 14:1). But if the most perfect being existed only in thought and not in reality, then it would not really be the most perfect being, for the one that existed in reality would be more perfect. Therefore, concludes Anselm, "no one who understands what God is, can conceive that God does not exist." In short, it would be self-contradictory to say, "I can think of a perfect being that doesn't exist," because existence would have to be a part of perfection. One would be saying, "I can conceive of something greater than that which nothing greater can be conceived"—which is absurd.

The ontological argument has had a long and stormy history. It has appealed to some of the finest minds in Western history, usually mathematicians like Descartes, Spinoza, and Leibniz. However, it fails to persuade most people, who seem to harbor the same suspicion as Kant that "the unconditioned necessity of a judgment does not form the absolute necessity of a thing." That is, perfection may not be a true predicate, and thus a proposition can be logically necessary without being true in fact.

The A Posteriori Approach. Popular mentality seems to appreciate the a posteriori approach better. The ontological argument can be made without ever appealing to sensation, but the cosmological and teleological arguments require a careful look at the world. The former focuses on the cause, while the latter stresses the design of the universe.

The Cosmological Argument. This has more than one form. The earliest occurs in Plato (Laws, Book X) and Aristotle (Metaphysics, Book VIII) and stresses the need to explain the cause of motion. Assuming that rest is natural and motion is unnatural, these thinkers arrived at God as the necessary Prime Mover of all things. Thomas Aquinas used motion as his first proof in the Summa Theologica (Q.2, Art.3). Everything that moves has to be moved by another thing. But this chain of movers cannot go on to infinity—a key assumption—because there would then be no first mover and thus no other mover. We must arrive, therefore, at a first mover; Aquinas concludes, “and this everyone understands to be God.”

This argument from motion is not nearly as cogent for our scientific generation, because we take motion to be natural and rest to be unnatural, as the principle of inertia states. Many philosophers insist that the notion of an infinite series of movers is not at all impossible or contradictory.

The most interesting—and persuasive—form of the cosmological argument is Aquinas’s “third way,” the argument from contingency. Its strength derives from the way it employs both permanence and change. Epicurus stated the metaphysical problem centuries ago: “Something obviously exists now, and something never sprang from nothing.” Being, therefore, must have been without beginning. An Eternal Something must be admitted by all—theist, atheist, and agnostic.

But the physical universe could not be this Eternal Something because it is obviously contingent, mutable, subject to decay. How could a decomposing entity explain itself to all eternity? If every present contingent thing/event depends on a previous contingent thing/event and so on ad infinitum, then this does not provide an adequate explanation of anything.

Hence, for there to be anything at all contingent in the universe, there must be at least one thing that is not contingent—something that is necessary throughout all change and self-established. In this case “necessary” does not apply to a proposition but to a thing, and it means infinite, eternal, everlasting, self-caused, self-existent.

It is not enough to say that infinite time will solve the problem of contingent being. No matter how much time you have, dependent being is still dependent on something. Everything contingent within the span of infinity will, at some particular moment, not exist. But if there was a moment when nothing existed, then nothing would exist now.

The choice is simple: one chooses either a self-existent God or a self-existent universe—and the universe is not behaving as if it is self-existent. In fact, according to the second law of thermodynamics, the universe is running down like a clock or, better, cooling off like a giant stove. Energy is constantly being diffused or dissipated, that is, progressively distributed throughout the universe. If this process goes on for a few billion more years—and scientists have never observed a restoration of dissipated energy—then the result will be a state of thermal equilibrium, a “heat death,” a random degradation of energy throughout the entire cosmos and hence the stagnation of all physical activity.

Naturalists from Lucretius to Sagan have felt that we need not postulate God as long as nature can be considered a self-explanatory entity for all eternity. But it is difficult to hold this doctrine if the second law is true and entropy is irreversible. If the cosmos is running down or cooling off, then it could not have been running and cooling forever. It must have had a beginning.

A popular retort to the cosmological argument is to ask, “If God made the universe, then who made God?” If one insists that the world had a cause, must one not also insist that God had a cause? No, because if God is a necessary being—this is established if one accepts the proof—then it is unnecessary to inquire into his origins. It would be like asking, “Who made the unmakeable being?” or “Who caused the uncausable being?”

More serious is the objection that the proof is based on an uncritical acceptance of the “principle of sufficient reason,” the notion that every event/effect has a cause. If this principle is denied, even if it is denied in metaphysics, the cosmological argument is defanged. Hume argued that causation is a psychological, not a metaphysical, principle, one whose origins lay in the human propensity to assume necessary connections between events when all we really see is contiguity and succession. Kant seconded Hume by arguing that causation is a category built into our minds as one of the many ways in which we order our experience. Sartre felt that the universe was “gratuitous.” Bertrand Russell claimed that the question of origins was tangled in meaningless verbiage and that we must be content to declare that the universe is “just there and that’s all.”

One does not prove the principle of causality easily. It is one of those foundational assumptions that is made in building a worldview. It can be pointed out, however, that if we jettison the idea of sufficient reason, we will destroy not only metaphysics but science as well. When one attacks causality, one attacks much of knowledge per se, for without this principle the rational connection in most of our learning falls to pieces. Surely it is not irrational to inquire into the cause of the entire universe.

The Teleological or Design Argument. This is one of the oldest and most popular and intelligible of the theistic proofs. It suggests that there is a definite analogy between the order and regularity of the cosmos and a product of human ingenuity. Voltaire put it in rather simplistic terms: “If a watch proves the existence of a watchmaker but the universe does not prove the existence of a great Architect, then I consent to be called a fool.”

God, Arguments for the Existence of

No one can deny the universe seems to be designed; instances of purposive ordering are all around us. Almost anywhere can be found features of being that show the universe to be basically friendly to life, mind, personality, and values. Life itself is a cosmic function—that is, a very complex arrangement of things both terrestrial and extraterrestrial must obtain before life can subsist. The earth must be just the right size, its rotation must be just right, its distance from the sun must be within certain limits, its tilt must be correct to cause the seasons, its land-water ratio must be a delicate balance. Our biological structure is very fragile. A little too much heat or cold and we die. We need light, but not too much ultraviolet. We need heat, but not too much infrared. We live just beneath an airtight shield protecting us from millions of missiles every day. We live just ten miles above a rock screen that shields us from the terrible heat under our feet. Who created all these screens and shields that make our earthly existence possible?

Once again we are faced with a choice. Either the universe was designed or it developed all these features by chance. The cosmos is either a plan or an accident!

Most people have an innate repugnance to the notion of chance because it contradicts the way we ordinarily explain things. Chance is not an explanation but an abandonment of explanation. When a scientist explains an immediate event, he operates on the assumption that this is a regular universe where everything occurs as a result of the orderly procession of cause and effect. Yet when the naturalist comes to metaphysics, to the origin of the entire cosmos, he abandons the principle of sufficient reason and assumes that the cause of everything is an unthinkable causelessness, chance, or fate.

Suppose you were standing facing a target and you saw an arrow fired from behind you hit the bull's eye. Then you saw nine more arrows fired in rapid succession all hitting the same bull's eye. The aim is so accurate that each arrow splits the previous arrow as it hits. Now an arrow shot into the air is subject to many contrary and discordant processes—gravity, air pressure, and wind. When ten arrows reach the bull's eye, does this not rule out the possibility of mere chance? Would you not say that this was the result of an expert archer? Is this parable not analogous to our universe?

It is objected that the design argument, even if valid, does not prove a creator but only an architect, and even then only an architect intelligent enough to produce the known universe, not necessarily an omniscient being. This objection is correct. We must not try to prove more than the evidence will allow. We will not get the 100 percent Yahweh of the Bible from any evidence of natural theology. However, this universe of ours is so vast and wonderful we can safely conclude that its designer would be worthy of our worship and devotion.

Many object that the theory of evolution takes most of the wind out of the design argument. Evolution shows that the marvelous design in living organisms came about by slow adaptation to the environment, not by intelligent creation. This is a false claim. Even if admitted, evolution only introduces a longer time-frame into the question of design. Proving that watches came from a completely automated factory with no human intervention would not make us give up interest in a designer, for if we thought a watch was wonderful, what must we think of a factory that produces watches? Would it not suggest a designer just as forcefully? Religious people have been overly frightened by the theory of evolution.

Even the great critics of natural theology, Hume and Kant, betrayed an admiration for the teleological argument. Hume granted it a certain limited validity. Kant went even further: “This proof will always deserve to be treated with respect. It is the oldest, the clearest and most in conformity with human reason. . . . We have nothing to say against the reasonableness and utility of this line of argument, but wish, on the contrary, to commend and encourage it.”

The Moral Argument. This is the most recent of the theistic proofs. The first major philosopher to use it was Kant, who felt that the traditional proofs were defective. Kant held that the existence of God and the immortality of the soul were matters of faith, not ordinary speculative reason, which, he claimed, is limited to sensation.

Kant reasoned that the moral law commands us to seek the summum bonum (highest good), with perfect happiness as a logical result. But a problem arises when we contemplate the unpleasant fact that “there is not the slightest ground in the moral law for a necessary connexion between morality and proportionate happiness in a being that belongs to the world as a part of it.” The only postulate, therefore, that will make sense of man's moral experience is “the existence of a cause of all nature, distinct from nature itself,” i.e., a God who will properly reward moral endeavor in another world. In a godless universe man's deepest experience would be a cruel enigma.

In his Rumor of Angels, Peter Berger gives an interesting negative version of the moral argument, which he calls “the argument from damnation.” Our apodictic moral condemnation of such immoral men as Adolf Eichmann seems to transcend tastes and mores; it seems to demand a condemnation of supernatural dimensions. Some deeds are not only evil but monstrously evil; they appear immune to any kind of moral relativizing. In making such high-voltage moral judgments, as when we condemn slavery and genocide, we point to a transcendent realm of moral absolutes. Otherwise, all our moralizing is pointless and groundless. A “preaching relativist” is one of the most comical of self-contradictions.

Most modern thinkers who use the moral argument continue Kant’s thesis that God is a necessary postulate to explain moral experience. Kant thought the moral law could be established by reason, but he called in God to guarantee the reward for virtue. Modern thinkers do not use God so much for the reward as for providing a ground for the moral law in the first place.

The moral argument starts with the simple fact of ethical experience. The pressure to do one’s duty can be felt as strongly as the pressure of an empirical object. Who or what is causing this pressure? It is not enough to say that we are conditioned by society to feel those pressures. Some of the greatest moralists in history have acquired their fame precisely because they criticized the moral failings of their group—tribe, class, race, or nation. If social subjectivism is the explanation of moral motivation, then we have no right to criticize slavery or genocide or anything!

Evolutionists attack the moral argument by insisting that all morality is merely a long development from animal instincts. Men gradually work out their ethical systems by living together in social communities. But this objection is a two-edged sword: if it kills morality, it also kills reason and the scientific method. The evolutionist believes that the human intellect developed from the physical brain of the primates, yet he assumes that the intellect is trustworthy. If the mind is entitled to trust, though evolved from the lower forms, why not the moral nature also?

Many people will go part way and accept moral objectivism, but they want to stop with a transcendent realm of impersonal moral absolutes. They deny that one must believe in a Person, Mind, or Lawgiver. This seems reductive. It is difficult to imagine an “impersonal mind.” How could a thing make us feel duty bound to be kind, helpful, truthful, and loving? We should press on, all the way to a Person, God, the Lawgiver. Only then is the moral experience adequately explained.

The Question of Validity. How valid are all these theistic proofs? This question raises issues in a number of fields: logic, metaphysics, physics, and theory of knowledge. Some thinkers like Aquinas feel that the proofs reach the level of demonstration. Others like Hume say that we should just suspend judgment and remain skeptics. Still others like Pascal and Kant reject the traditional proofs but offer instead practical grounds or reasons for accepting God’s existence. Pascal’s famous wager is an appeal to pragmatism; it makes sense, in view of the eternal consequences, to bet on the existence of God.

Paul seems to demand a high view of the theistic proofs when he says that unbelievers are “without excuse.” “What may be known about God is plain to them, because God has made it plain to them. For since the creation of the world God’s invisible qualities—his eternal power and divine nature—have been clearly seen, being understood from what has been made” (Rom. 1:19–20).

Paul was not necessarily affirming that the arguments are deductive, analytical, or demonstrative. If someone rejected a proposition of high probability, we could still say that he was “without excuse.” The arguments, in their cumulative effect, make a very strong case for the existence of God, but they are not logically inexorable or rationally inevitable. If we define proof as probable occurrence based on empirically produced experiences and subject to the test of reasonable judgment, then we can say the arguments prove the existence of God.

If God truly exists, then we are dealing with a factual proposition, and what we really want when we ask for proof of a factual proposition is not a demonstration of its logical impossibility but a degree of evidence that will exclude reasonable doubt. Something can be so probable that it excludes reasonable doubt without being deductive or analytical or demonstrative or logically inevitable. We feel that the theistic proofs—excluding the ontological argument—fall into this category.

Natural theology, however, can never establish the existence of the biblical God. These proofs may make one a deist, but only revelation will make one a Christian. Reason operating without revelation always turns up with a deity different from Yahweh, the Father of Our Lord Jesus Christ. One can confirm this easily by comparing Yahweh with the deities of Aristotle, Spinoza, Voltaire, and Thomas Paine. A. J. HOOVER

See also APOLOGETICS; DOUBT, RELIGIOUS; NATURAL THEOLOGY; REASON; REVELATION, GENERAL.

Bibliography. J. Baillie, Our Knowledge of God; D. Bairne, Reality of Time and the Existence of God; D. Burrill, Cosmological Argument; G. H. Clark, Christian View of Men and Things; R. E. D. Clark, Universe: Plan or Accident?; H. H. Farmer, Towards Belief in God; R. Hazelton, On Proving God; J. Hick, Existence of God; D. Hicks, Philosophical Basis of Theism; A. J. Hoover, Case for Christian Theism; S. Jaki, Road of Science and the Ways to God; C. E. M. Joad, God and Evil; J. Maritain, Approaches to God; E. L. Mascall, Openness of Being; G. Mavrodes, Rationality of Belief in God; A. Plantinga, ed., Ontological Argument; H. Ross, Fingerprint of God; Creator and the Cosmos; R. C. Sproul, If There Is a God, Why Are There Atheists?; R. Swinburne, Coherence of Theism; Existence of God; Is There a God?; A. E. Taylor, Does God Exist?

God, Attributes of. God is an invisible, personal, and living Spirit, distinguished from all other spirits by several kinds of attributes: metaphysically God is self-existent, eternal, and unchanging; intellectually God is omniscient, faithful, and wise; ethically God is just, merciful, and loving; emotionally God detests evil, is long-suffering, and is compassionate; existentially God is free, authentic, and omnipotent; relationally God is transcendent in being, immanent universally in providential activity, and immanent with his people in redemptive activity.

The essence of anything, simply put, equals its being (substance) plus its attributes. Since Kant's skepticism of knowing anything in itself or in its essence, many philosophers and theologians have limited their general ways of speaking to the phenomena of Jewish or Christian religious experience. Abandoning categories of essence, substance, and attribute, they have thought exclusively in terms of Person-to-person encounters, mighty acts of God, divine functions, or divine processes in history. God is indeed active in all these and other ways but is not silent. Inscripturated revelation discloses some truth about God's essence in itself. Conceptual truth reveals not only what God does, but who God is.

Biblical revelation teaches the reality not only of physical entities, but also of spiritual beings: angels, demons, Satan, and the triune God. The Bible also reveals information concerning attributes or characteristics of both material and spiritual realities. In speaking of the attributes of an entity, we refer to essential qualities that belong to or inhere in it. The being or substance is what stands under and unites the varied and multiple attributes in one unified entity. The attributes are essential to distinguish the divine Spirit from all other spirits. The divine Spirit is necessary to unite all the attributes in one being. The attributes of God, then, are essential characteristics of the divine being. Without these qualities God would not be what he is—God.

Some have imagined that by defining the essence of God human thinkers confine God to their concepts. That reasoning, however, confuses words conveying concepts with their referents. Does a definition of water limit the power of Niagara Falls? The word God has been used in so many diverse ways that it is incumbent upon a writer or speaker to indicate which of those uses is in mind.

God Is an Invisible, Personal, Living, and Active Spirit. Jesus explained to the Samaritan woman why she should worship God in spirit and in truth. God is spirit (John 4:24). The noun pneuma occurs first in the sentence for emphasis. Although some theologies consider "spirit" an attribute, grammatically in Jesus' statement it is a substantive. In the pre-Kantian, first century world of the biblical authors, spirits were not dismissed with an a priori, skeptical assumption.

As a spirit, God is invisible. No one has ever seen God or ever will (1 Tim. 6:16). A spirit does not have flesh and bones (Luke 24:39).

As spirit, furthermore, God is personal. Although some thinkers use "spirit" to designate impersonal principles or an impersonal absolute, in the biblical context the divine Spirit has personal capacities of intelligence, emotion, and volition. It is important to deny of the personal in God any vestiges of the physical and moral evil associated with fallen human persons.

In transcending the physical aspects of human personhood, God thus transcends the physical aspects of both maleness and femaleness. However, since both male and female are created in God's image, we may think of both as like God in their distinctively nonphysical, personal male and female qualities. In this context the Bible's use of masculine personal pronouns for God conveys primarily the connotation of God's vital personal qualities and secondarily any distinctive functional responsibilities males may have.

Christ's unique emphasis upon God as Father in the Lord's Prayer and elsewhere becomes meaningless if God is not indeed personal. Similarly, the great doctrines of mercy, grace, forgiveness, imputation, and justification can only be meaningful if God is genuinely personal. God must be able to hear the sinner's cry for salvation, be moved by it, decide and act to recover the lost. In fact, God is superpersonal, tripersonal. The classical doctrine of the Trinity coherently synthesizes the Bible's teaching about God. To place the name of God upon a baptismal candidate is to place upon the candidate the name of the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit (Matt. 28:19).

The unity of the one divine essence and being emphasized in the NT concept of a personal spirit implies simplicity or indivisibility. Neither the Trinitarian personal distinctions nor the multiple attributes divide the essential unity of the divine being. And that essential, ontological oneness is not torn apart by the incarnation or even the death of Jesus. Relationally or functionally (but not essentially) Jesus on the cross was separated from the Father who imputed to him the guilt and punishment of our sin.

In view of the indivisibility of the divine Spirit, how then are the attributes related to the divine being? The divine attributes are not mere names for human use with no referent in the divine Spirit (nominalism). Nor are the attributes separate from each other within the divine being so that they could conflict with each other (realism). The attributes all equally qualify the entirety of the divine being and each other (a modified realism). Preserving the divine simplicity or indivisibility, God's love is always holy love, and God's holiness is always loving holiness. Hence it is futile to argue for the superiority of one divine attribute over another. Every attribute is essential; one cannot be more essential than another in a simple, nonextended being.

God as spirit, furthermore, is living and active. In contrast to the passive ultimates of Greek philosophies the God of the Bible actively creates, sustains, covenants with his people, preserves Israel and the Messiah's line of descent, calls prophet after prophet, sends his Son into the world, provides the atoning sacrifice to satisfy his own righteousness, raises Christ from the dead, builds the church, and judges all justly. Far from a passive entity like a warm house, the God of the Bible is an active architect, builder, freedom fighter, advocate of the poor and oppressed, just judge, empathetic counselor, suffering servant, and triumphant deliverer.

As an invisible, personal, living spirit, God is no mere passive object of human investigation. Such writers as Pascal, Kierkegaard, Barth, and Brunner have helpfully reminded Christians that knowing God is not like studying soils. However, these writers go too far in claiming that God is merely a revealing subject in ineffable personal encounters and that no objective, propositional truth can be known of God. Members of a creative artist's family may know him not only with passionate, personal subjectivity, but also objectively through examination of his works, careful reading of his writings, and assessment of his résumé. Similarly, God may be known not only in passionate subjective commitment, but also by thought about his creative works (general revelation), his inspired Scripture (part of special revelation), and theological résumés of his nature and activity. Knowledge of God involves both objective, conceptual validity and subjective, personal fellowship.

We have considered the meaning of asserting that God is spirit: the divine being is one, invisible, personal, and thus capable of thinking, feeling, and willing, a living and active being. There are, however, many spirits. The subsequent discussion of the divine attributes is necessary to distinguish the divine Spirit from other spirit-beings.

While considering the meaning of each attribute, it is well to be aware of the relation of the attributes to the being of God. In the Scriptures the divine attributes are not above God, beside God, or beneath God; they are predicated of God. God is holy; God is love. These characteristics do not simply describe what God does, they define what God is. To claim that recipients of revelation can know the attributes of God but not the being of God leaves the attributes ununified and belonging to nothing. The Scriptures do not endorse worship of an unknown God but make God known. The attributes are inseparable from the being of God, and the divine Spirit does not relate or act apart from the essential divine characteristics. In knowing the attributes, then, we know God as he has revealed himself to be in himself.

This is not to say that through revelation we can know God fully as God knows himself. But it is to deny that all our knowledge of God is equivocal, something totally other than we understand by scripturally revealed concepts of holy love. Much of our knowledge of God's attributes is analogical or figurative, where Scripture uses figures of speech. Even then, however, the point illustrated can be stated in nonfigurative language. So all our understanding of God is not exclusively analogical. The revealed, nonfigurative knowledge has at least one point of meaning the same for God's thought and revelationally informed human thought. Some knowledge of God, then, is called univocal, because when we assert that God is holy love, we assert what the Bible (which originated, not with the will of man, but God) asserts. We may be far from fully comprehending divine holiness and divine love, but insofar as our assertions about God coherently convey relevant conceptually revealed meanings, they are true of God and conform in part to God's understanding.

The divine attributes have been differently classified to help in relating and remembering them. Each classification has its strengths and weaknesses. We may distinguish those attributes that are absolute and immanent (Strong); incommunicable or communicable (Berkhof); metaphysical or moral (Gill); absolute, relative, and moral (Wiley); or personal and constitutional (Chafer). Advantages and disadvantages of these groupings can be seen in those respective theologies. It is perhaps clearer and more meaningful to distinguish God's characteristics metaphysically, intellectually, ethically, emotionally, existentially, and relationally.

Metaphysically, God Is Self-existent, Eternal, and Unchanging. Other spirits are invisible, personal, one, living, and active. How does the divine Spirit differ? Significant differences appear in several respects, but we first focus upon the metaphysically distinctive characteristics of God.

First, God is self-existent. All other spirits are created and so have a beginning. They owe their existence to another. God does not depend upon the world or anyone in it for his existence. The world depends on God for its existence. Contrary to those theologians who say we cannot know anything about God in himself, Jesus revealed that God has life in himself (John 5:26). The ground of God's being is not in others, for there is nothing more ultimate than himself. God is uncaused, the one who always is (Exod. 3:14). To ask who caused God is to ask a self-contradictory question in terms of Jesus' view of God. Another term conveying the concept of God's self-existence is “aseity.” It comes from the Latin a, meaning “from,” and se, meaning “oneself.” God is un-derived, necessary, nondependent existence. Understanding that God is noncontingent helps to understand how God is unlimited by anything, or infinite, free, self-determined, and not determined by anything other than himself contrary to his own sovereign purposes.

God, Attributes of

God is eternal and omnipresent (ubiquitous). God’s life is from within himself, not anything that had a beginning in the space-time world. God has no beginning, period of growth, old age, or end. The Lord is enthroned as King forever (Ps. 29:10). This God is our God forever and forever (Ps. 48:14). Although God is not limited by space or time, or the succession of events in time, he created the world with space and time. God sustains the changing realm of succeeding events and is conscious of every movement in history. The observable, changing world is not unimportant or unreal (maya in Hinduism) to the omnipresent Lord of all. No tribe, nation, city, family, or personal life is valueless, however brief or apparently insignificant. God’s eternal nature is not totally other than time or totally removed from everything in time and space. The space-time world is not foreign or unknown to God. History is the product of God’s eternally wise planning, creative purpose, providential preservation, and common grace. God fills space and time with his presence, sustains it, and gives it purpose and value. The omnipresent and ubiquitous one is Lord of time and history, not vice versa. God does not negate time but fulfills it. In it his purposes are accomplished.

In Christianity, then, eternity is not an abstract timelessness, but the eternal is a characteristic of the living God who is present at all times and in all places, creating and sustaining the space-time world and accomplishing his redemptive purposes in the fullness of time.

God is unchanging in nature, desire, and purpose. To say that God is immutable is not to contradict the previous truth that God is living and active. It is to say that all the uses of divine power and vitality are consistent with his attributes such as wisdom, justice, and love. God’s acts are never merely arbitrary, although some may be for reasons wholly within himself rather than conditioned upon human response. Underlying each judgment of the wicked and each pardon of the repentant is his changeless purpose concerning sin and conversion. Unlike the Stoic’s concept of divine immutability, God is not indifferent to human activity and need. Rather, we can always count upon God’s concern for human righteousness. God changelessly answers prayer in accord with his desires and purposes of holy love. Hence, although speaking in terms of human experience God is sometimes said in Scripture to repent, it is in fact the unrepentant who have changed and become repentant or the faithful who have become unfaithful.

God is the same, though everything else in creation becomes old like a garment (Ps. 102:25–27). Jesus shared that same unchanging nature (Heb. 1:10–12) and vividly exhibited it consistently throughout his active ministry in a variety of situations.

The immutability of God’s character means that God never loses his own integrity or lets others down. He “does not change like shifting shadows” (James 1:17). God’s unshakable nature and Word provide the strongest ground of faith and bring strong consolation (Heb. 6:17–18). God is not a man that he should lie (Num. 23:19) or change his mind (1 Sam. 15:29). The counsel of the Lord stands forever (Ps. 33:11). Though heaven and earth pass away, God’s words will not fail (Matt. 5:18; 24:35).

Intellectually, God is Omniscient, Faithful, and Wise. God differs from other spirits not only in being but also in knowledge. God’s intellectual capabilities are unlimited, and God uses them fully and perfectly.

God is omniscient. God knows all things (1 John 3:20). Jesus has this attribute of deity also, for Peter says, “Lord, you know all things; you know that I love you” (John 21:17). God knows all inward thoughts and outward acts of humanity (Ps. 139). “Nothing in all creation is hidden from God’s sight. Everything is uncovered and laid bare before the eyes of him to whom we must give account” (Heb. 4:13). Isaiah distinguished the Lord of all from idols by the Lord’s ability to predict the future (Isa. 44:7–8, 25–28). Clearly the Lord’s knowledge of the future was communicable in human concepts and words. In the context Isaiah made predictions concerning Jerusalem, Judah, Cyrus, and the temple. These concepts were inspired in the original language and are translatable in the languages of the world.

How can God know the end from the beginning? In a way greater than illustrated in a person’s knowledge of a memorized psalm, Augustine suggested. Before quoting Psalm 23 we have it all in mind. Then we quote the first half of it and we know the part that is past and the part that remains to be quoted. God knows the whole of history at once, simultaneously because not limited by time and succession, but God also knows what part of history is past today and what is future, for time is not unreal or unimportant to God (Confessions XI, 31).

The belief that God knows everything—past, present, and future—is of little significance, however, if God’s knowledge is removed from human knowledge by an infinite, qualitative distinction. The frequent claim that God’s knowledge is totally other than ours implies that God’s truth may be contradictory of our truth. That is, what may be true for us is false for God or what is false for us may be true for God. Defenders of this position argue that because God is omniscient, God does not think discursively line upon line, or use distinct concepts connected by the verb "to be" in logical propositions. This view of divine transcendence provided an effective corrective in the hands of Barth and Bultmann against the continuity modernism alleged between the highest human thought and God's thought. And that influence finds additional support from the Eastern mystics who deny any validity to conceptual thinking in reference to the eternal. Relativists from many fields also deny that any human assertions, including the Bible's, are capable of expressing the truth concerning God.

From a biblical perspective, however, the human mind has been created in the divine image to think God's thoughts after him, or to receive through both general and special revelation truth from God. Although the fall has affected the human mind, this has not been eradicated. The new birth involves the Holy Spirit's renewal of the person in knowledge after the image of the Creator (Col. 3:10). Contextually, the knowledge possible to the regenerate includes the present position and nature of the exalted Christ (Col. 1:15–20) and knowledge of God's will (Col. 1:9). With this knowledge Christians can avoid being deceived by mere "fine-sounding arguments" (Col. 2:4). They are to strengthen the faith they were taught in concepts and words (Col. 2:7). And the content of the word of Christ can inform their teaching and worship (Col. 3:16).

In these and many other ways the Scriptures presuppose an informative revelation from God, verbally inspired and Spirit illumined, to minds created and renewed in the divine image for the reception of this divine truth. Insofar as we have grasped the contextual meaning given by the original writers of Scripture, our scripturally based assertions that God is spirit, God is holy, or God is love are true. They are true for God as he is in himself. They are true for the faith and life of Christians and churches.

The propositional truth that the Bible conveys in indicative sentences that affirm, deny, contend, maintain, assume, and infer is fully true for God and for humankind. Of course God's omniscience is not limited to the distinctions between subjects and predicates, logical sequence, exegetical research, or discursive reasoning. But God knows the difference between a subject and a predicate, relates to logical sequence as much as to temporal sequence, encourages exegetical research and revelationally based discursive reasoning. Although God's mind is unlimited and knows everything, it is not totally different in every respect from human minds made in his image. As omniscient then, God's judgments are formed in the awareness of all the relevant data. God knows everything that bears upon the truth concerning any person or event. Our judgments are true insofar as they conform to God's by being coherent or faithful to all the relevant evidence.

God is faithful and true. Because God is faithful and true (Rev. 19:11), his judgments (Rev. 19:2) and his words in human language are faithful and true (Rev. 21:5; 22:6). There is no lack of fidelity in God's person, thought, or promise. God is not hypocritical and inconsistent.

We may hold unswervingly to our hope because he who promised is faithful (Heb. 10:23). He is faithful to forgive our sins (1 John 1:9), sanctify believers until the return of Christ (1 Thess. 5:23–24), strengthen and protect from the evil one (2 Thess. 3:3), and not let us be tempted beyond what we can bear (1 Cor. 10:13). Even if we are faithless, he remains faithful, for he cannot disown himself (2 Tim. 2:13).

Not one word of all the good promises God gave through Moses failed (1 Kings 8:56). Isaiah praises the name of God, for in perfect faithfulness God did marvelous things planned long ago (Isa. 25:1). Passages like these convey a basic divine integrity in both life and thought. No contrast can be drawn between what God is in himself and what God is in relation to those who trust him. God does not contradict his promises in his works or in other teaching by dialectic, paradox, or mere complementarity. God knows everything, and nothing can come up that was not already taken into account before God revealed his purposes.

Because God is faithful and consistent, we ought to be faithful and consistent. Jesus said, "Simply let your 'Yes' be 'Yes,' and your 'No,' 'No'" (Matt. 5:37). Paul exhibited this logical authenticity in his teaching about God. "As surely as God is faithful," he said, "our message to you is not 'Yes' and 'No'" (2 Cor. 1:18). Those who imagine that talk about God in human language must affirm and deny the same thing at the same time and in the same respect (in dialectic or paradox) have a different view of the relation between the divine mind and the godly person's mind than did Paul. Because God is faithful, we must be faithful in our message about him. Since God cannot deny himself, we ought not to deny ourselves in speaking to God.

Knowing the connection between personal and conceptual faithfulness in God, we know that the idea that faithful persons ought not to contradict themselves did not originate with Aristotle. He may have formulated the law of noncontradiction in a way that has been quoted ever since, but the ultimate source of the challenge to human fidelity in person and word is rooted in God himself. The universal demand for intellectual honesty reflects in the human heart the ultimate integrity of the Creator's heart.

God, Attributes of

God is not only omniscient and consistent in person and word, but also perfectly wise. In addition to knowing all the relevant data on any subject, God selects ends with discernment and acts in harmony with his purposes of holy love. We may not always be able to see that events in our lives work together for a wise purpose, but we know that God chooses from among all the possible alternatives the best ends and means for achieving them. God not only chooses the right ends but also for the right reasons, the good of his creatures and thus his glory.

Although we may not fully understand divine wisdom, we have good reason to trust it. After writing on the great gift of the righteousness that comes from God, Paul exclaims, "To the only wise God be glory forever through Jesus Christ! Amen." (Rom. 16:27). He had earlier alluded to the incomprehensible depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God (Rom. 11:33).

The interrelation of the attributes is already evident as the divine omniscience is aware not only of what is but also of what ought to be (morally); divine faithfulness and consistency involve moral integrity and no hypocrisy; and wisdom makes decisions for action toward certain ends and means in terms of the highest values. It is not so strange then when we read that the fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge (Prov. 1:7).

Ethically, God Is Holy, Righteous, and Loving. God is distinct from and transcendent to all his creatures, not only metaphysically and epistemologically, but also morally. God is morally spotless in character and action, upright, pure, and untainted with evil desires, motives, thoughts, words, or acts. God is holy, and as such is the source and standard of what is right. God is free from all evil, loves all truth and goodness. He values purity and detests impurity and inauthenticity. God cannot approve of any evil, has no pleasure in evil (Ps. 5:4), and cannot tolerate evil (Hab. 1:13). God abhors evil and cannot encourage sin in any way (James 1:13–14). Christians do not stand in awe of the holy as an abstraction, but of the Holy One (Isa. 40:25). The Holy One is not merely an object of emotional fascination, but of intellectual hearing and volitional obedience.

Holiness is not solely the product of God's will, but a changeless characteristic of his eternal nature. The question Plato asked therefore needs to be reworded to apply to the Christian God: "Is the good good because God wills it? Or does God will it because it is good?" The question relates not to God's will or to some principle of goodness above God, but to God's essence. The good, the just, the pure, the holy is holy, not by reason of an arbitrary act of the divine will, nor of a principle independent of God, but because it is an outflow of his nature. God always wills in accord with his nature consistently. He wills the good because he is good. And because God is holy, he consistently hates sin and is repulsed by all evil without respect of persons. The Holy Spirit is called holy not only because as a member of the divine Trinity he shares the holiness of the divine nature, but because the Spirit's distinctive function is to produce holy love in God's redeemed people. We are to seek to be morally spotless in character and action, upright, and righteous like the God we worship.

God is just or righteous. God's justice or righteousness is revealed in his moral law expressing his moral nature and in his judgment, granting to all, in matters of merit, exactly what they deserve. His judgment is not arbitrary or capricious, but principled and without respect of persons. OT writers frequently protest the injustice experienced by the poor, widows, orphans, strangers, and the godly. God, in contrast, has pity on the poor and needy (Ps. 72:12–14). He answers, delivers, revives, acquits, and grants them the justice that is their due. In righteousness God delivers the needy from injustice and persecution. Eventually God will create a new heaven and a new earth in which righteousness will dwell (Isa. 65:17).

God's wrath is revealed as sinners suppress his truth and hold it down in unrighteousness (Rom. 1:18–32), both Jews and Gentiles (Rom. 2:1–3:20). In the gospel a righteousness from God is revealed, a righteousness that is by faith from first to last (Rom. 1:17; 3:21). Believers are justified freely by God's grace that came by Jesus Christ, who provided the sacrifice of atonement (Rom. 3:25). Hence, like Abraham, those who are fully persuaded that God can do what he has promised (Rom. 4:21) find their faith credited to them for righteousness (Rom. 4:3, 24). God in his justice graciously provides for the just status of believers in Christ. Righteousness in God is not unrelated to mercy, grace, and love.

In mercy God withholds or modifies deserved judgment, and in grace God freely gives undeserved benefits to whom he chooses. All of these moral characteristics flow from God's great love. In contrast to his transcendent self-existence is his gracious self-giving, agape love. He who lives forever as holy, high, and lofty also lives with him who is contrite and lowly in spirit (Isa. 57:15).

It is not that God is lacking something in himself (Acts 17:25), but that God desires to give of himself for the well-being of those loved, in spite of the fact that they are unlovely and undeserving. God not only loves but is in himself love (1 John 4:8). His love is like that of a husband toward his wife, a father toward his son, and a mother toward her unweaned baby. In love God chose Israel (Deut. 7:7) and predestined believing members of the church to be adopted as sons through Jesus Christ (Eph. 1:4–5). God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son, that whoever believes in him shall not perish but have eternal life (John 3:16).

Love cares for the aged, the oppressed, the poor, the orphans, and others in need. The loving God of the Bible is not unmoved by people with real needs (or impassible). The God of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Job, Jeremiah, Jesus, Judas, Peter, and Paul suffered, indeed was long-suffering. In empathy God enters through imagination into the feelings of his creatures. Beyond that, God incarnate entered through participation into our temptations and sufferings. As H. W. Robinson has said, "The only way in which moral evil can enter into the consciousness of the morally good is as suffering." In all Israel's distress God was distressed (Isa. 63:9). What meaning can there be, Robinson asks, in a love that is not costly to the lover? The God of the Bible is far from apathetic in regard to the vast suffering of people in the world. In love God sent his Son to die that ultimately suffering might be done away and righteousness restored throughout the earth as the waters cover the seas.

Since love involves commitment for the well-being of others, a responsible commitment, a faithful commitment, it is not classed as primarily emotional. Love is a settled purpose of will involving the whole person in seeking the well-being of others.

Emotionally, God Detests Evil, Is Long-suffering, Compassionate. A. H. Strong says God is devoid of passion and caprice. Indeed, God is devoid of caprice, injustice, or emotions out of control. We have earlier sought to negate any passions unworthy of God. Strong rightly adds, there is in God no selfish anger. However, God is personal and ethical, and both senses call for healthy emotions or passions. One who delights in justice, righteousness, and holiness for the well-being of his creatures can only be repulsed by the injustice, unrighteousness, and corruption that destroy their bodies, minds, and spirits. Hence, the Bible frequently speaks of God's righteous indignation at evil. Righteous indignation is anger aroused, not by being overcome by emotions selfishly but by injustice and all the works of fallen "flesh." God detests evil.

Jesus and the Scriptures in general speak more often of God's wrath at injustices such as persistent mistreatment of the poor and needy than of love and heaven. Although the Lord is slow to anger, he will in no way leave the guilty unpunished, but will pour out his fury upon them (Nah. 1:3). None can withstand his indignation, which is poured out like fire and shatters rocks before him (Nah. 1:6). Apart from understanding God's wrath against evil, it is impossible to understand the extent of divine love in the incarnation, the extent of Christ's suffering on the cross, the propitiatory nature of his sacrifice, the prophetic Scriptures speaking of the great day of God's wrath, the great tribulation, or the book of Revelation.

God is patient and long-suffering. Properly jealous for the well-being of the objects of his love, God is angry at injustice done to them but suffers without losing heart. Long-suffering with evildoers, God, without condoning their sin, graciously provides them with undeserved temporal and spiritual benefits. God promised the land to Abraham, but the iniquity of the Amorites was not yet full (Gen. 15:16). After over four hundred years of long-suffering restraint, God in the fullness of time allowed the armies of Israel to bring just judgment upon the Amorites' wickedness. Later Israel worshiped the golden calf and deserved divine judgment like other idolators. But God revealed himself at the second giving of the law as "the LORD, the LORD, the compassionate and gracious God, slow to anger, abounding in love and faithfulness" (Exod. 34:6). The psalmist could write, "But you, O Lord, are a compassionate and gracious God, slow to anger, abounding in love and faithfulness" (Ps. 86:15). However, the day of God's grace has an end. Eventually, without respect of persons, God's just judgment fell upon Israel for Israel's pervasive evils. God's long-suffering is a remarkable virtue, but it does not exclude or contradict God's justice.

Although theologians in the Thomistic tradition have taught the impassibility of God, the Scriptures do not hesitate to call God compassionate. Because of his great love, we are not consumed, for his compassions never fail (Lam. 3:22). Even after Israel's captivity, God will again have compassion on Israel (Mic. 7:19). The God of the Bible is not an apathetic God, but one who deeply cares when the sparrow falls. Jesus beautifully displayed this divine-human compassion for the hungry (Matt. 15:32), the blind (Matt. 20:34), the sorrowing (Luke 7:13). And Jesus taught the importance of compassion in the account of the good Samaritan (Luke 10:33) and that of the father's concern for his lost son (Luke 15:20).

The incarnate Christ felt what humans feel in all respects but did not yield to the temptations involved. As God in literal human experience, Jesus wept with those who wept and rejoiced with those who rejoiced. He remembered the joyful glory he had with the Father before the foundation of the world (John 17:5, 13). The divine-human author of our salvation, however, was made perfect or complete through suffering in this life (Heb. 2:10). Because he himself suffered, he can help those who suffer and are tempted (Heb. 2:18). The God revealed in Jesus Christ is no apathetic, uninvolved, impersonal first cause. The Father disclosed by Jesus is deeply moved by everything that hurts his children.

Existentially, God Is Free, Authentic, and Omnipotent. The modern concerns for freedom, authenticity, and fulfillment should not be limited to humankind. Biblical writers seem even more concerned that God be understood to be free, authentic, and fulfilled.

God, Attributes of

God is free. From all eternity God is not conditioned by anything other than himself contrary to his purposes. Good things, as we have seen, are purposed with divine pleasure and enduement. Evil things are permitted with divine displeasure. But God is self-determined either way. Self-determination is that concept of freedom that emphasizes that personal thought, feeling, and volition are not determined by external factors but by one's self.

God is not free to approve sin, to be unloving, to be unwise, to ignore the hard facts of reality, to be unfaithful to what is or ought to be, to be uncompassionate or unmerciful. God cannot deny himself. God is free to be himself—his personal, eternal, living, intellectual, ethical, emotional, volitional self.

God is authentic, authentically himself. The God who in Christ so unalterably opposed hypocrisy is himself no hypocrite. We have emphasized his intellectual integrity or faithfulness above. Here we emphasize his integrity ethically, emotionally, and existentially. God is self-conscious, knows who he is and what his purposes are (1 Cor. 2:11). He has a keen sense of identity, meaning, and purpose.

God knows that he is the ultimate being, that there are in reality none to compare with him. In calling upon people to turn from idols, therefore, God in no way is asking something of us not in accord with reality. In steadfastly opposing idolatry he seeks to protect people from ultimate concerns destined to disillusion and disappoint. God desires our worship for our sakes, that we not succumb eventually to despair as one after another of our finite gods lets us down.

In the next place, God is omnipotent (Mark 14:36; Luke 1:37). God is able to do whatever he wills in the way in which he wills it. God does not choose to do anything contrary to his nature of wisdom and holy love. God cannot deny himself, and God does not choose to do everything by his own immediate agency without intermediate angelic and human agents. Although God determines some things to come to pass unconditionally (Isa. 14:24–27), most events in history are planned conditionally, through the obedience of people or their permitted disobedience to divine precepts (2 Chron. 7:14; Luke 7:30; Rom. 1:24). In any case, God's eternal purposes for history are not frustrated, but fulfilled in the way he chose to accomplish them (Eph. 1:11).

It is said that there are accents in Paul which the Church has hesitated to assume. Where the Church has thus hesitated she has impoverished herself and blurred her outlook on God's activity. Hesitation where Paul was bold has caused the Church often to make only a problem of God's rule and man's responsibility. She thus undermines either the Providence of God or human responsibility. They do not exist together in the Scripture as something problematic. They both reveal the greatness of Divine activity, in that it does not exclude human activity and responsibility but embraces them and in them manifests God on the way to the accomplishment of His purposes.

(Berkouwer, 98)

God has not only the strength to effect all his purposes in the way in which he purposes them, but also the authority in the entire realm of his kingdom to do what he will. God is not a subject of another's dominion, but is King or Lord of all. By virtue of all his other attributes—his wisdom, justice, and love, for example—God is fit for the ruling of all that he created and sustains. God is a wise, holy, and gracious sovereign. As just, the power of God itself cannot punish sinners more than they deserve. To whom much is given, of him much shall be required; to whom little is given, of him little shall be required. But in the bestowing of undeserved benefits and gifts God is free to dispense them as he pleases (Ps. 135:6). Having permitted sin, God is great enough to limit its furious passions and to overrule it for greater good, as at Calvary (Acts 4:24–28). God can defeat the nations and demonic hosts that rage against him. No one can exist independent of divine sovereignty. The attempt to go one's own way independent of God is sinful insolence on the part of creatures who in him live and move and have their being. Only a fool could say that there is no God, when God sustains the breath the atheist uses to deny divine dominion over him.

Relationally, God Is Transcendent in Being, Immanent Universally in Providential Activity, and Immanent with His People in Redemptive Activity. As transcendent, God is uniquely other than everything in creation. God's distinctness from the being of the world has been implied in previous discussions of God's attributes metaphysically, intellectually, ethically, emotionally, and existentially. God's being is eternal, the world's temporal. God's knowledge is total, human knowledge incomplete. God's character is holy, humanity's character fallen and sinful. God's desires are consistently against evil yet long-suffering and compassionate; human desires fluctuate inconsistently and often intermingle evil with the good. God's energy is untiring and inexhaustible; the world's energy is subject to depletion through entropy. Hence, God is over and above persons in the world in all these respects.

The incomparable divine transcendence involves a radical dualism between God and the world that ought not be blurred by a resurgent monism and pantheism. Although made like God and in the divine image, humankind is not (like Christ) begotten of God or an emanation from God of the same divine nature. The ultimate goal of salvation is not reabsorption into the being of God but unbroken fellowship with God. The unity Christians seek is not a metaphysical unity with God but a relational unity, a oneness of mind, desire, and will. To seek to be as God in a biblical perspective is not deeper spirituality but rebellious idolatry or blasphemy. Christians may respect nature as a divine creation but not worship nature as divine. Christians may respect the founders of the world's religions but cannot bow to any guru as the divine manifest in human form. Only Jesus Christ is from above; all others are from below (John 8:23). Because God is separate from the world, Christians cannot bow to any earthly power as God, whether that power be economic, political, religious, scientific, educational, or cultural. The inestimable benefit of bowing to a transcendent Lord of all is that it frees one from every finite, fallen tyranny.

A biblical theist not only believes that the one living God is separate from the world, as against pantheism and panentheism, but also that God is continuously active throughout the world providentially, in contrast to deism. God is not so exalted that he cannot know, love, or relate to natural law in the world of everyday experience. A study of divine providence as taught in Scripture shows that God sustains, guides, and governs all that he created. The nature psalms reflect upon God's activity in relation to every aspect of the earth, the atmosphere, vegetation, and animal (e.g., Ps. 104). God also preserves and governs human history, judging corrupt societies and blessing the just and the unjust with temporal benefits like the sunshine, rain, food, and drink. Through God's universal providential activity the cosmos holds together and his wise purposes of common grace are achieved.

But God is immanent in the lives of his people who repent of their sin and live by faith to accomplish the goals of his redemptive grace. "For this is what the high and lofty One says—he who lives forever, whose name is holy: 'I live in a high and holy place, but also with him who is contrite and lowly in spirit, to revive the spirit of the lowly and to revive the heart of the contrite'" (Isa. 57:15). Just as persons may be present to one another in varying degrees, God may be present to the unjust in one sense and to the just in a richer way. A person may simply be present as another rider on a bus, or much more significantly as a godly mother who has prayed daily for you all of your life. God is graciously present in forgiving love with the converted, who by faith have been propitiated, reconciled, and redeemed by Christ's precious blood. They become his people, he becomes their God. God dwells in them as his holy place or temple. The relational oneness of thoughts, desires, and purposes grows through the years. That unity is shared by other members of Christ's body who are gifted to build each other up to become progressively more like the God they worship, not metaphysically, but intellectually, ethically, emotionally, and existentially.

Summary. In summary, God is a living, personal Spirit worthy of whole-soul adoration and trust (because of his many perfect attributes), separate from the world yet continuously active in the world.

Unlimited by space, God nevertheless created and sustains the cosmos, scientific laws, geographical and political boundaries.

Beyond time, God nevertheless actively relates to time, to each human life, home, city, nation, and to human history in general.

Transcendent to discursive knowledge and conceptual truth, God nevertheless intelligently relates to propositional thought and verbal communication, objective validity, logical consistency, factual reliability, coherence and clarity, as well as subjective authenticity and existential integrity.

Unlimited by a body, God is nevertheless providentially related to physical power in nature and society, industrially, agriculturally, socially, and politically. God knows and judges human stewardship in the use of all the earth's energy resources.

God transcends every attempt to achieve justice in the world but righteously relates to every good endeavor of his creatures personally, economically, socially, academically, religiously, and politically.

Although free from unworthy and uncontrolled emotions, God is caringly related to the poor, the unfortunate, the lonely, the sorrowing, the sick, the victims of prejudice, injustice, anxiety, and despair.

Beyond all the apparent meaninglessness and purposelessness of human existence, God personally gives significance to the most insignificant life.

G. R. LEWIS

See also GOD, DOCTRINE OF; IMPASSIBILITY OF GOD; REVELATION, GENERAL; REVELATION, SPECIAL.

Bibliography. H. Bavinck, Doctrine of God; G. C. Berkouwer, Providence of God; D. Bloesch, Essentials of Evangelical Theology; J. M. Boice, Sovereign God; E. Brunner, Christian Doctrine of God; J. O. Buswell Jr., Systematic Theology of the Christian Religion; L. S. Chafer, Systematic Theology; S. Charnock, Existence and Attributes of God; B. W. Fairley, Providence of God; C. F. H. Henry, God, Revelation and Authority; J. Lawson, Comprehensive Handbook of Christian Doctrine; G. R. Lewis, "Categories in Collision?" in Perspectives on Evangelical Theology, K. Kantzer and S. Gundry, eds.; G. R. Lewis, Decide for Yourself: A Theological Workbook; Testing Christianity's Truth Claims; T. V. Morris, Our Idea of God; T. V. Morris, ed., Concept of God; J. I. Packer, Knowing God; W. W. Stevens, Doctrines of the Christian Religion; A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology; H. Thieliicke, Evangelical Faith; O. C. Thomas, Introduction to Theology; A. W. Tozer, Knowledge of the Holy; H. O. Wiley, Christian Theology.

God, Attributes of

God, Doctrine of. The most fundamental teaching of the Bible and Christian theology is that God exists and is ultimately in control of the universe. This is the foundation on which all Christian theologizing is built.

The Biblical Concept of God. Existence. Questions concerning the reality of God are not discussed in the Scriptures; his existence is everywhere assumed. The opening passage that reveals God as Creator and Sovereign of heaven and earth sets the pattern for the remainder of the Bible in which God is considered foundational for a proper view of life and the world. The biblical question is therefore not does God exist, but who is God and how is he to be known?

The Scriptures do recognize the existence of a professed atheism. But such atheism is considered primarily a moral rather than an intellectual problem. The fool who denies God (Ps. 14:1) does so not from philosophical reasons (which are, in any case, incapable of disproving the absolute except by affirming such), but from the practical choice (sometimes tacit) to live without considering God (Ps. 10:4). The Scriptures recognize a willful and therefore culpable "suppressing" of the knowledge of God (Rom. 1:18).

Knowledge of God. According to the Scriptures, God is known only through his initiative in disclosing himself through revelation. Human attempts to reason to God by various means including the so-called proofs of God are inevitably limited to the realm of created existence. While providing strong evidence for the probable existence of a god, they do not yet attain to the knowledge of the transcendent God of Scripture (1 Cor. 1:21). As a person is truly known only through self-disclosure, God, who alone knows himself, must disclose himself by his Spirit (1 Cor. 2:10–11). In so doing he makes himself the object of human knowledge.

Something of God's reality and power are revealed in his creation (especially in human beings) and in the preservation of the universe (Acts 17:29; Rom. 1:20). To the extent that human reason yields a concept of a god, it is undoubtedly related to this general or natural revelation. But the entrance of sin and its alienating effect blinds people from truly seeing God through this means (Rom. 1:18; Eph. 4:18). Apart from faith this natural knowledge of God inevitably results in false gods of idolatry (Rom. 1:21–25). Moreover, the Bible indicates that even prior to the fall man's knowledge of God was derived not solely from the natural revelation surrounding him in creation, but from a direct personal communication with God.

Thus, while God communicates himself to humans through acts in creation and history, his primary means of revelation is through the Word, for human knowledge is fundamentally a conceptual matter. Even God's actions are not left as mute works but are accompanied by the interpretive Word to give their true meaning. The revelation of God climaxed in the person of Jesus Christ, who was not simply the bearer of the revelatory Word, but the divine Word person. In him "all the fullness of the deity" dwelt in bodily form (Col. 2:9; cf. Heb. 1:1–3). Thus, in his mighty acts as Creator and Redeemer and in his revealed words, God by his Spirit reveals himself to give a true knowledge of himself to those who in faith open themselves to this divine self-disclosure.

The revelation of God does not totally exhaust his being and activity. He remains the incomprehensible one that humans cannot totally fathom, both in his essence and ways (Job 36:26; Isa. 40:13, 28; cf. Deut. 29:29). Finitude cannot comprehend infinity, nor can human thought patterns, which are associated with the created environment, completely grasp the transcendent realm of God.

On the basis of this limitation of human reason some strains of mystical theology have denied the possibility of knowing or defining God. He could be experienced, but this was only in a state of ecstasy that transcended conceptual thought. Modern rationalism has also argued for the unknowability of God. Such an equation of the incomprehensibility of God with unknowability is valid only on the premise that human knowledge of God is derived through human reason. But the incomprehensible God of the Scriptures is the God who reaches out to people with the revelation of himself. The knowledge thus derived, although limited according to his good pleasure, is nevertheless a true knowledge of his being and work.

In giving us a knowledge of himself, God gives his Word a finite form compatible with human creatureliness. Despite this necessary accommodation to the limitations of human understanding, the revealed knowledge of God is nevertheless an authentic knowledge of God. Theories that use the difference between God and man to deny the possibility of a genuine communication of true knowledge do not do justice to at least two biblical facts: (1) the truth that God created man in his own image, which certainly includes a likeness sufficient for communication; (2) the omnipotence of God, which implies that he can make a creature to whom he can truthfully reveal himself if he so wills. To be sure, there remains a hiddenness in relation to the total comprehension of God. But God himself does not remain hidden, for he has given true though partial knowledge of himself through self-revelation understandable to man. And since this knowledge is divinely imparted truth and not merely human ideas arising out of experience, it can include knowledge of God in himself as well as knowledge of his relationships to creation.

The nature of our knowledge of God has been the subject of much discussion in Christian theology. Some have emphasized the negative character of our knowledge—e.g., God is infinite, nontemporal, incorporeal. Others, notably Aquinas, have advocated an analogical knowledge that is similar to God's knowledge and yet dissimilar because of his infinite greatness. Suffice it to say that even the negative (such as infinite) conveys a positive concept of greatness, and, while the position of analogy may be used to acknowledge a distinction in depth and breadth of understanding, there is finally a sense in which man's knowledge of divine things is the same as God's. Analogical or metaphorical language must bear some univocal point of knowledge with its referent for it to be considered appropriately analogous. Significantly, the Scriptures view the problem of a true knowledge of God as moral rather than noetic.

Definition of God. From the biblical viewpoint it is generally agreed that it is impossible to give a strict definition of the idea of God. Defining, which means limiting, involves the inclusion of the object within a certain class or known universal and the indication of its distinguishing features from other objects in that same class. Since the biblical God is unique and incomparable (Isa. 40:25), there is no universal abstract category of the divine. Studies in comparative religions reveal that "god" is, in fact, conceived in the most different ways. Attempts to provide a general definition that encompasses all concepts of the divine, such as Anselm's "that than which nothing greater is conceivable," or "the supreme Being," do not convey much of the specific characteristics of the God of Scripture. Instead of a general definition of God, therefore, the Bible presents descriptions of God as he has revealed himself. These are conveyed through express statements as well as through the many names by which God identifies himself. Fundamental to the nature of God, according to the biblical description, are the truths that he is personal, spiritual, and holy.

God Is Personal. Over against any abstract neutral metaphysical concept, the God of Scripture is first and foremost a personal being. He reveals himself by names, especially the great personal name Yahweh, "I AM WHO I AM" (cf. Exod. 3:13–15; 6:3; Isa. 42:8), and climactically in the person of Jesus, who is God in human flesh (John 1:14). He knows and wills self-consciously in accord with our concept of personality (1 Cor. 2:10–11; Eph. 1:11). The centrality of God's personality is seen in the fact that while he is the Creator and Preserver of all nature, he is encountered in Scripture not primarily as the God of nature, as in pagan religions, but rather as the God of history, controlling and directing the affairs of man. The central place of the covenant by which he links himself in a personal relationship to humankind is further indication of the scriptural emphasis on the personal nature of God. Nowhere is the personhood of God more evident than in his biblical description as Father. Jesus constantly spoke of God as "my Father," "your Father," and "the heavenly Father." Beyond the unique Trinitarian relationship of the divine Son with the Father, which certainly involves personal traits, the fatherhood of God speaks of him as the source and sustainer of his creatures who personally cares for them (Matt. 5:45; 6:26–32) and the one to whom people can turn in believing trust. His nature as the God of self-giving love is only meaningful if he is personal.

God's personhood is described by Scripture in both masculine and feminine (e.g., Isa. 66:13) terms, although masculine terms predominate, e.g., "Father," "King," "Lord," along with the sole use of masculine personal pronouns (no feminine pronouns are used). Scripture clearly teaches that God's person transcends both human maleness and femaleness. However, as there are no neuter personal pronouns, the masculine pronouns, along with the predominant masculine names and imagery, also manifest important biblical truths of God as the transcendent Creator and sovereign Lord.

The personhood of God has been called into question on the basis of our use of the word person with respect to human beings. Human personhood involves limitation that allows relationship with another person or the world. To be a person means to be an individual among individuals. All of this cautions us against an erroneous anthropomorphizing of God. Biblically, it is more proper to see the personhood of God as having priority over that of man and therefore to understand human personhood theomorphously, i.e., a finite replica of the infinite divine person (cf. Gen. 1:26–27). Historically, the concept of "person" stems largely from the theological attempt to understand the meaning of person in relation to the three members of the Trinity and the unified person of Christ as both God and man. Despite the final incomprehensibility of God's suprahuman personhood, the Scriptures portray him as a real person who gives himself in reciprocal relationship to us.

The biblical concept of the personhood of God refutes all abstract philosophical ideas of God as merely First Cause or Prime Mover as well as all naturalistic and pantheistic concepts. Modern equations of God with immanent personal relations (e.g., love) are also denied as inadequate.

God Is Spiritual. The Scriptures declare that God is "spirit," which basically denotes life and power (John 4:24). His spiritual nature, which is described in various ways, points to the reality of God as the Absolute Power and Life-Giver. The weakness of the forces of the world, including men and beasts, which are but flesh, are contrasted to God, who is spirit (cf. Isa. 31:3; 40:6–7).

God, Doctrine of

As spirit, God is the living God. He is the possessor of an infinite life in himself (Ps. 36:9; John 5:26). Matter is activated by spirit, but God is pure spirit. He is fully life. As such he is the source of all other life (Job 33:4; Ps. 104:30; 1 Tim. 6:13). The spiritual nature also prohibits any limitations of God derived from a materialistic conception. For this reason images of God are prohibited (Exod. 20:4; Deut. 4:12, 15–18). He cannot be restricted to any particular place or in any sense be brought under human control as a physical object. He is the invisible transcendent living power from whom all derive existence (Acts 17:28).

God Is Holy. One of the most fundamental features of God's being is expressed by the word holy. He is the incomparable God, "the Holy One" (Isa. 40:25; cf. Hab. 3:3). The word holy, which in both Hebrew and Greek has the root meaning of separateness, is used predominantly in Scripture for a separateness from sin. But this is only a secondary meaning derived from the primary application to God's separateness from all creation, i.e., his transcendence. "He is exalted over all the nations." Therefore, "holy is he" (Ps. 99:2–3). He is "the high and lofty One . . . whose name is holy," and he lives "in a high and holy place" (Isa. 57:15). In his holiness God is the transcendent Deity.

The transcendence of God expresses the truth that God in himself is infinitely exalted above all creation. The concept of revelation presupposes a transcendent God who must unveil himself to be known. Transcendence is further seen in God's position as Creator and Sovereign Lord of the universe. As the former he distinguishes himself from all creation (Rom. 1:25), and in his sovereignty he evidences his transcendent supremacy.

The transcendence of God is frequently expressed biblically in terms of time and space. He exists before all creation (Ps. 90:2), and neither the earth nor the highest heavens can contain him (1 Kings 8:27). A certain anthropomorphic sense must be recognized in such expressions lest God's transcendence be conceived in terms of our time and space, as though he lives in a time and space like ours only beyond that of creation. On the other hand, it is biblically incorrect to conceive of God in his transcendence as existing in a realm of timeless nowhere-ness outside of creation. In a manner that exceeds our finite understanding, God exists in his own infinite realm as transcendent Lord over all creaturely time and space.

God's transcendent holiness is biblically balanced with the teaching of his immanence, which signifies that he is wholly present in his being and power in every part and moment of the created universe. He is "over all and through all and in all" (Eph. 4:6). Not only does everything exist in him (Acts 17:28), but there is no place where his presence is absent (Ps. 139:1–10). His immanence is seen especially in relation to humans. The Holy One who lives in a high and holy place also dwells with the "contrite and lowly in spirit" (Isa. 57:15). This dual dimension of God is seen clearly in the description "the Holy One of Israel" as well as in the name Yahweh, which describes both his transcendent power and his personal presence with and for his people.

The biblical teaching of both God's transcendence and immanence counters the human tendency throughout history to emphasize one or the other. A one-sided transcendence is seen in the Greek philosophers' concept of the ultimate ground of being as well as the later deists of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. The various forms of pantheism throughout history give evidence of the opposite emphasis on immanence. The attractiveness of these exaggerations to sinful man is in the fact that in both man no longer stands before God in any practical sense as a responsible creature.

The Trinity. Crucial to the biblical doctrine of God is his Trinitarian nature. Although the term trinity is not a biblical word as such, Christian theology has used it to designate the threefold manifestation of the one God as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. The formulated doctrine of the Trinity asserts the truth that God is one in being or essence who exists eternally in three distinct co-equal "persons." While the term person in relation to the Trinity does not signify the limited individuality of human persons, it does affirm the personal relationship, particularly of love, within the triune Godhead.

The doctrine of the Trinity flows from the self-revelation of God in biblical salvation history. As the one God successively reveals himself in his saving action in the Son and the Holy Spirit, each is recognized as God himself in personal manifestation. It is thus in the fullness of New Testament revelation that the doctrine of the Trinity is seen most clearly. God is one (Gal. 3:20; James 2:19), but the Son (John 1:1; 14:9; Col. 2:9) and the Spirit (Acts 5:3–4; 1 Cor. 3:16) are also fully God. Yet they are distinct from the Father and each other. The Father sends the Son and the Spirit (John 15:26; Gal. 4:4). This unified equality and yet distinctness is seen in the triadic references to the three persons. Christian baptism is in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit (Matt. 28:19). Likewise, all three are joined in the Pauline benediction in a different order suggesting the total equality of persons (2 Cor. 13:14; cf. Eph. 4:4–6; 1 Pet. 1:2).

Although the Trinity finds its clearest evidence in the New Testament, suggestions of a fullness of plurality are already found in the Old Testament revelation of God. The plural form of the name of God (Elohim) as well as the use of plural pronouns (Gen. 1:26; 11:7) point in this direction. So also do the identity of the angel of the Lord as God (Exod. 3:2–6; Judg. 13:21–22) and the hypostatization of the Word (Ps. 33:6; 107:20) and Spirit (Gen. 1:2; Isa. 63:10). The Word is not simply communication about God, nor is the Spirit merely divine power. They are rather the acting God himself.

As the product of the self-revelation of God, the Trinitarian formulation is not intended to exhaust his incomprehensible nature. Objections to the doctrine come from a rationalism that insists on dissolving this mystery into human understanding, i.e., by thinking of the oneness and threeness in mathematical terms and human personality. Attempts have been made to draw analogies of the Trinity from nature and the constitution of man. The most notable of these is Augustine's trinity of lover, the object of love, and the love that binds the two together. While this argues strongly for a plurality within God if he is eternally a God of love apart from creation, it along with all other suggestions from the creaturely realm proves finally inadequate to explain the divine being.

The doctrine of the Trinity developed out of the church's desire to safeguard the biblical truths of the God who is the transcendent Lord over all history and yet who gives himself in person to act within history. The natural human tendencies toward either a nonhistorical divine transcendence or the absorption of the divine into the historical process are checked by the orthodox concept of the Trinity. The first is the ultimate error of the primary distortions of the Trinity. Subordinationism, which understands Christ as less than God, and adoptionism, which viewed him only as a human endowed for a time with God's Spirit, both denied that God truly entered history to confront man in person. Modalism or Sabellianism makes the persons of Christ and the Holy Spirit to be only historical roles or modifications of the one God. This error likewise tends to separate man from God; he is encountered not directly as he is in person, but as a role player who remains hidden behind a mask.

The Trinitarian doctrine is thus central to the salvation kerygma of Scripture, according to which the transcendent God acts personally in history to redeem and share himself with his creatures. Origen rightly drew the conclusion that the believer "will not attain salvation if the Trinity is not complete."

The Doctrine in History. The history of Christian thought reveals persistent problems concerning the nature of God and his relation to the world. These involve the related issues of transcendence/immanence, personal/nonpersonal perspectives, and the knowability of God. The earliest Christian theologians, who attempted to interpret the Christian faith in terms of Greek philosophical categories, tended toward an emphasis on the abstract transcendence of God. He was the timeless, changeless Absolute who was the final and adequate cause of the universe. Little could be predicated of him, and his attributes were defined primarily in the negative. He was the uncaused (possessing aseity), absolutely simple, infinite, immutable, omnipotent Being, unlimited by time (eternal) and space (omnipresent).

Although Augustine's view was more balanced with a view of the personal, immanent, condescending God in the revelation of Christ, this philosophical understanding of God dominated until the Reformation, reaching its climax in Thomas Aquinas and the medieval scholastics. Aquinas held that philosophical human reason could attain to the knowledge of the existence of God. His stress, however, was on the transcendence of God and how little he could be known.

With an emphasis on biblical rather than philosophical categories, the Reformers brought more recognition of the immanence of God within human history but maintained a strong emphasis on his transcendence, as evidenced in the definition of the Westminster Confession of Faith.

Reaction to the traditional Protestant and Catholic understanding of God with its stress on the transcendence of God came with the rise of liberal theology in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. The combination of new philosophies (e.g., Kant, Hegel) making the human mind supreme for true knowledge, scientific advances that seemed to substantiate human abilities, and a new historical perspective that tended to relativize all tradition, including the Scriptures, led to a new understanding of ultimate reality. Because, as Kant argued, human reason could no longer establish the existence of a transcendent God, God became increasingly identified with the ideals of human experience. Talk of religious dependency (Schleiermacher) or ethical values (Kant, Ritschl) became talk of God. There was an almost exclusive emphasis on the immanence of God, with a tendency to see an essential kinship between the human and divine spirit.

World events including two world wars and the rise of totalitarian regimes brought the collapse of old liberalism with its immanentistic understanding of God and the reassertion of divine transcendence. Led by Karl Barth, theology sought to return not to the earlier philosophical concepts of God but to the categories of the Judeo-Christian Scriptures. Based upon a radical separation between eternity and time, the transcendence of God was exaggerated to the point that a direct revelation of God in human history was denied. According to this neo-orthodox theology God did not speak directly in Scripture. As a result of this denial of a direct cognitive communication, with the consequent skepticism of any knowledge of God in himself, the accent on transcendence was gradually lost. A transcendent God who did not reveal himself objectively in human history was too elusive. Consequently, the religious experience of man, usually interpreted according to existential philosophy, became increasingly viewed as the key to theological knowledge. God was understood primarily as the meaning he holds for the "existential experiences" of man.

This movement can be traced from Barth, whose theology maintained a strong divine transcendence, to Bultmann, who, while not denying God's transcendence, nevertheless focused almost entirely on God in the human existential experience, and finally to Tillich, who denied entirely the traditional God "out there" in favor of an immanent God as the "ground" of all being. Thus, the transcendence of God has been lost in much of contemporary thought that seeks to do theology in the existential philosophical framework. Divine transcendence is simply equated with the hidden self-transcendence of human existence.

Other contemporary theologians seek to reconstruct theology in terms of the modern scientific evolutionary understanding of the universe. Such process theology, based on the philosophy of A. N. Whitehead, sees the fundamental nature of all reality as process or becoming rather than being or unchanging substance. Although there is an abstract eternal dimension of God that provides the potential for the process, he also is understood to encompass all changing entities in his own life and therefore to be in the process of change himself. As the universe is dynamic and changing, actualizing its potentialities, so also is God.

The wide variety of contemporary formulations of God that tend to define God in ways in which he is no longer the personal Creator and sovereign Lord of human history are the direct result of denying a knowledge of God through his cognitive self-revelation in the Scriptures and the sinful human propensity to autonomy.

Influenced by some of the same forces behind process theology, i.e., the modern understanding of reality as dynamic and relational, and the concern for human freedom, some contemporary evangelicals propose a so-called "open view" of God. While clearly denying his dependence on creation (as in process theology), God's relationship with his creatures is said to be more like a loving Father who works with rather than controls human beings. The central emphases on: (1) the knowledge of God in his dynamic relatedness to the world rather than the knowledge of who he is in himself, and, (2) human freedom, led the open view of God to reinterpret traditional attributes of God associated with his sovereign providence, e.g., immutability and omniscience including his knowledge of the future. These changes run into difficulty with certain scriptural data. Moreover, it is not at all evident that this new view solves traditional theological problems, such as the existence of evil and the relationship of God's sovereignty and human freedom, more adequately than the classic understanding of God.

R. L. SAUCY

See also GOD, ARGUMENTS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF; GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF; GOD, NAMES OF; REVELATION, GENERAL; REVELATION, SPECIAL.

Bibliography. K. Barth, Church Dogmatics; H. Bavinck, Doctrine of God; G. Bray, Doctrine of God; E. Brunner, Christian Doctrine of God; S. Charnock, Existence and Attributes of God; W. Eichrodt, Theology of the Old Testament; E. J. Fortman, Triune God; C. F. H. Henry, God, Revelation and Authority; C. Hodge, Systematic Theology; H. Kleinknecht et al., TDNT 3:65-123; G. Lewis and B. Demarest, Integrative Theology; T. V. Morris, Our Idea of God; T. V. Morris, ed., Concept of God; R. Nash, Concept of God; T. Oden, Living God; H. P. Owen, Christian Theism; J. I. Packer, Knowing God; G. L. Prestige, God in Patristic Thought; J. Schneider and C. Brown, NIDNTT 2:66-84; R. Swinburne, Christian God; H. Thielicke, Evangelical Faith; O. Weber, Foundations of Dogmatics.

God, Names of. The Divine Names as Vehicles of Revelation. Efforts to find the origins and significance of the Hebrew divine names in other ancient Near Eastern cultures have yielded generally disappointing results. One of the major reasons for this is that the ancient Hebrew theology invested these names with a uniqueness that renders investigation outside the narratives of the OT incapable of exploring fully their historical and religious significance.

Basic to ancient Hebrew religion is the concept of divine revelation. While God is conceived of as revealing his attributes and will in a number of ways in the OT, one of the most theologically significant modes of the divine self-disclosure is the revelation inherent in the names of God.

This aspect of divine revelation is established in the words of Exodus 6:3, "I appeared to Abraham, to Isaac and to Jacob, as God Almighty, but by my name the Lord [Yahweh] I did not make myself known to them." According to classical literary criticism, the verse teaches that the name Yahweh was unknown to the patriarchs. Thus, an ideological conflict exists between the Priestly author and the earlier Yahwist, who frequently put the name Yahweh on the lips of the patriarchs.

However, the words “by my name Yahweh I did not make myself known to them” have a somewhat hollow ring if the name Yahweh is understood only as an appellative. The reason for this is that Moses asks in Exodus 3:13, “What is his name?” (mah-šēmô). M. Buber has demonstrated that the syntax of this question does not connote an inquiry as to the name of God but an inquiry into the character revealed by the name. He says, “Where the word ‘what’ is associated with the word ‘name’ the question asked is what finds expression in or lies concealed behind that name” (Revelation and the Covenant, 48). J. Motyer also concludes, “In every case where mâ is used with a personal association it suggests enquiry into sort or quality or character, whereas mî expects an answer instancing individuals, or, as in the case of rhetorical questions, calling attention to some external feature” (Revelation of the Divine Name, 19).

Exodus 14:4 also supports the view that the name Yahweh embodies aspects of God’s character. It says, “and the Egyptians will know that I am Yahweh.” It is hardly likely that the intent of this assertion is that they would learn only the name of the Hebrew God.

In the light of these observations, the use of the concepts of the name of God in the early narratives of the book of Exodus is far broader than simply the name by which the Hebrew God was known. It has a strong element of divine self-disclosure within it.

The corpus of divine names compounded with ’el and a descriptive adjunct also support this concept. The very fact that the adjunctive element is descriptive is an indication of its value as a source of theological content.

Typical of this type of name is ’el rō’î (“God who sees”; Gen. 16:13) and ’el ’ôlām (“God eternal”; Gen. 21:33). These ’el names sometimes emerge from a specific historical situation that illuminates their significance.

The Meaning of the Divine Names. Yahweh, Jehovah (LORD). Efforts to determine the meaning of the tetragrammaton (YHWH) through historical investigation have been rendered difficult by the paucity of informative data relative to the various forms of the name ya in historical sources outside the OT. For this reason the investigation has generally followed philological lines. G. R. Driver suggested that the form ya was originally an ejaculatory cry, “shouted in moments of excitement or ecstasy,” that was “prologued to ya(h)wá(h), ya(h)wá(h)y, or the like.” He suggested further that the name Yahweh arose from the consonance of an extended form of ya with the “imperfect tense of a defective verb.” Thus, he saw the origin of the name in a popular etymology and asserted that its original form was forgotten (ZAW 46:24).

Mowinckel proposed the theory that the tetragrammaton should be understood as consisting of the ejaculatory element and the third person pronoun hû’, meaning “O He!”

Another approach to the problem is to understand the tetragrammaton as a form of paronomasia. This view takes account of the broad representation of the name ya in extrabiblical cultures of the second millennium B.C. The name Yahweh is thus understood as a quadriliteral form, and the relationship of the name to hāyâ (“to be”) in Exodus 3:14–15 is not intended to be one of etymology but paronomasia.

The most common view is that the name is a form of a trilateral verb, hwy. It is generally regarded as a 3 p. Qal stem imperfect or a 3 p. imperfect verb in a causative stem. Another suggestion is that it is a causative participle with a y preformative that should be translated “Sustainer, Maintainer, Establisher.”

With regard to the view that the tetragrammaton is an elongated form of an ejaculatory cry, it may be pointed out that Semitic proper names tend to shorten; they are not normally prolonged.

The theory that the name is paronomastic is attractive, but when appeal is made to the occurrences of forms of ya or yw in ancient cultures, several problems arise. It is difficult to explain how the original form could have lengthened into the familiar quadriliteral structure. Mowinckel’s suggestion is attractive but speculative. It is also difficult to understand how the name Yahweh could have such strong connotations of uniqueness in the OT if it is a form of a divine name that found representation in various cultures in the second millennium B.C.

The derivation of the tetragrammaton from a verbal root is also beset with certain difficulties. The root hwy on which the tetragrammaton would be based in this view is unattested in West Semitic languages before the time of Moses, and the form of the name is not consonant with the rules that govern the formation of lāmed he’ verbs as we know them.

It is evident that the problem is a difficult one. It is best to conclude that the use of etymology to determine the theological content of the name Yahweh is tenuous. If one is to understand the theological significance of the divine name, it can be only by determining the theological content with which the name was invested in Hebrew religion.

Jah, Yah. This shorter form of Yahweh occurs twice in Exodus (15:2; 17:15). The former passage is echoed in Isaiah 12:2 and Ps. 118:14. It also occurs numerous times in the formula halē-lûyâ (“praise yah”). Its use in early and late poetic passages and its formulaic function in the Hallel psalms suggest that this form of yahweh is a poetic stylistic device.

God, Names of

The compounding of yah with Yahweh in Isaiah 12:2 (yah yhw) indicates a separate function for the form yah, but at the same time an identification of the form with Yahweh.

Yahweh Šēbā'ōt ("Lord of Hosts"). The translation "He creates the heavenly hosts" has been suggested for this appellation. It is based on the assumption that Yahweh functions as a verbal form in a causative stem. This conclusion is rendered difficult by the fact that the formula occurs in the expanded form yhw 'ēlōhē šēbā'ōt ("Yahweh God of hosts"), which attributes the function of a proper name to Yahweh. The word šēbā'ōt means "armies" or "hosts." It is best to understand Yahweh as a proper name in association with the word armies.

Elohim. The root of Elohim is El ('ēl). The form 'ēlōhīm is a plural form commonly understood as a plural of majesty. While the word occurs in Canaanite ('l) and Akkadian (ilu[m]), its etymology is uncertain. In the OT the word is always construed in the singular when it denotes the true God. In the Pentateuch the name 'ēlōhīm connotes a general concept of God; that is, it portrays God as the transcendent being, the Creator of the universe. It does not connote the more personal and palpable concepts inherent in the name Yahweh. It can also be used to apply to false gods as well as to judges and kings.

El. El has the same general range of meaning as Elohim. It is apparently the root on which the plural form has been constructed. It differs in usage from Elohim only in its use in theophoric names and to serve to contrast the human and the divine. Sometimes it is combined with yah to become Elyah.

El Elyon ("God Most High"). The word 'elyôn, an adjective meaning "high," is derived from the root 'lh ("to go up" or "ascend"). It is used to describe the height of objects (2 Kings 15:35; 18:17; Ezek. 41:7) as well as the prominence of persons (Ps. 89:27) and the prominence of Israel as a nation (Deut. 26:19; 28:1). When used of God it connotes the concept of "highest."

The name El Elyon occurs only in Genesis 14:18–22 and Psalm 78:35, although God is known by the shorter title Elyon in a significant number of passages.

The word 'elyôn has a superlative connotation. In each case in which the adjective occurs, it denotes that which is highest or uppermost. In Deuteronomy 26:19 and 28:1 the superlative idea is apparent in the fact that Israel is to be exalted above the nations. The use of the word in 1 Kings 9:8 and 2 Chronicles 7:21 may not seem to reflect a superlative idea, but there is, as C. F. Keil suggests, an allusion to Deuteronomy 26:19 and 28:1, where the superlative idea exists. The superlative is also evident in the use of the word in Psalm 97:9, where it connotes Yahweh's supremacy over the other gods.

El Shaddai. The etymology of šadday is obscure. It has been connected with the Akkadian šadū ("mountain") by some. Others have suggested a connection with the word "breast," and still others have seen a connection with the verb šādad ("to devastate"). The theological significance of the name, if it can be understood fully, must be derived from a study of the various contexts in which the name occurs.

The name Shaddai frequently appears apart from El as a divine title.

El-Eloe-Yisrael. This appellation occurs only in Genesis 33:20 as the name of the altar that marked the place of Jacob's encounter with God. It denotes the unique significance of El as the God of Jacob.

Adonai. The root 'dn occurs in Ugaritic with the meanings "lord and father." If the word originally connoted "father," it is not difficult to understand how the connotation "lord" developed from that. The basic meaning of the word in the OT is "lord."

Critical to the understanding of the meaning of the word is the suffix ay. It is commonly suggested that the ending is the first person possessive suffix on a plural form of 'ādōn ("my lord"). This is plausible for the form 'ādōnāy, but the heightened form 'ādōnāy, which also appears in the Masoretic Text, is more difficult to explain, unless it represents an effort on the part of the Masoretes "to mark the word as sacred by a small external sign."

Attention has been drawn to the Ugaritic ending -ai, which is used in that language "as a reinforcement of a basic word." However, it is doubtful that this explanation should be applied in all cases. The plural construction of the name is evident when the word occurs in the construct as it does in the appellation "Lord of lords" ('ādōnē hā'ādōnīm) in Deuteronomy 10:17. And the translation "my Lord" seems to be required in such vocative addresses as "O Sovereign LORD, what can you give me?" (Gen. 15:2; see also Exod. 4:10).

It appears, then, that it is best to understand the word as a plural of majesty with a first person suffixual ending that was altered by the Masoretes to mark the sacred character of the name.

Other Divine Names. The name Baali occurs only once, in Hosea 2:16 (KJV; "My Baal," RSV; "my master," NIV) in a play on words. The word means "my husband," as does 'išī, the word with which it is paired.

Ancient of Days is an appellation applied to God in Daniel 7. It occurs with other depictions of great age (v. 9) to create the impression of noble venerability.

Abba is an alternate Aramaic term for "father." It is the word that Jesus used to address God in Mark 14:36. Paul pairs the word with the Greek word for "father" in Romans 8:15 and Galatians 4:6.

The 'ālep that terminates the form 'abbā' functions as both a demonstrative and a vocative particle in Aramaic. In the time of Jesus the word connoted both the emphatic concept, "the father," and the more intimate "my father, our father."

While the word was the common form of address for children, there is much evidence that in the time of Jesus the practice was not limited only to children. The childish character of the word ("daddy") thus receded, and 'abbā' acquired the warm, familiar ring we may feel in such an expression as "dear father."

The Theological Significance of the Divine Names. Yahweh. The parallel structure in Exodus 3:14-15 supports the association of the name Yahweh with the concept of being or existence. It says, "I AM has sent me to you" (v. 14; "The LORD . . . has sent me to you" (v. 15). The name "I AM" is based on the clause "I AM WHO I AM" found in 3:14, which, on the basis of the etymology implied here, suggests that Yahweh is the 3. p. form of the verb 'ehyeh (I am).

The clause 'ehyeh 'āšer 'ehyeh has been translated in several ways, "I am that I am" (KJV), "I am who I am" (RSV, NIV), and "I will be what I will be" (RSV margin). Recently the translation "I am (the) One who is" has been suggested. The latter translation has much in its favor grammatically and fits the context well.

The main concern of the context is to demonstrate that a continuity exists in the divine activity from the time of the patriarchs to the events recorded in Exodus 3. The Lord is referred to as the God of the fathers (vv. 13, 15, 16). The God who made the gracious promises regarding Abraham's offspring is the God who is and who continues to be. The affirmation of v. 17 is but a reaffirmation of the promise made to Abraham. The name Yahweh may thus affirm the continuing activity of God on behalf of his people in fealty to his promise.

Jesus' application of the words "I am" to himself in John 8:58 not only denoted his preexistence but associated him with Yahweh. Jesus was the fulfillment of the promise given to Abraham, the fulfillment of which Abraham anticipated (John 8:56).

In the Pentateuch, Yahweh denotes that aspect of God's character that is personal rather than transcendent. It occurs in contexts in which the covenantal and redemptive aspects of God predominate. Cassuto says, "The name YHWH is employed when God is presented to us in His personal character and in direct relationship to people or nature; and 'ēlōhīm, when the Deity is alluded to as a Transcendental Being who exists completely outside and above the physical universe" (Documentary Hypothesis, 31). This precise distinction does not always obtain outside the Pentateuch, but Yahweh never loses its distinct function as the designation of the God of Israel.

The name Yahweh Sabaoth appears for the first time in Israel's history in connection with the cult center at Shiloh (1 Sam. 1:3). It is there that the Tent of Meeting was set up when the land of Canaan had been subdued by the Israelites (Josh. 18:1). The name apparently had its origin in the period of the conquest or after the conquest. It does not occur in the Pentateuch.

It is possible that the name was attributed to Yahweh as a result of the dramatic appearance to Joshua of an angelic being called the "commander of the army of Yahweh" at the commencement of the conquest (Josh. 5:13-15). The name would thus depict the vast power at Yahweh's disposal in the angelic hosts.

The association of this name with the ark of the covenant in 1 Samuel 4:4 is significant in that Yahweh is enthroned above the angelic figures known as the cherubim (2 Sam. 6:2). Because the name was associated with the ark of the covenant, David addressed the people in that name when the ark was recovered from the Philistines (2 Sam. 6:18). The name is often associated with the military activities of Israel (1 Sam. 15:2-3; 2 Sam. 5:10).

The almighty power of Yahweh displayed in this name is manifested in the sphere of history (Pss. 46:6-7; 59:5). His power may be displayed in the life of the individual (Ps. 69:6) as well as the nation (Ps. 80:7). Sometimes he is simply referred to as "the Almighty."

The military connotation of the name was not lost, even in the eighth century, for Isaiah appeals to that name to depict the hosts of heaven that accompany Yahweh in his intervention in history (Isa. 13:4).

Elohim. This is the more general name for God. In the Pentateuch, when used as a proper name, it most commonly denotes the more transcendental aspects of God's character. When God is presented in relation to his creation and to the peoples of the earth in the Pentateuch, the name Elohim is the name most often used. It is for this reason that Elohim occurs consistently in the creation account of Genesis 1:1-2:22 and in the genealogies of Genesis. Where the context takes on a moral tone, as in Genesis 2:4-4:26, the name Yahweh is used.

Throughout Genesis and the early chapters of Exodus 'ēlōhīm is used most often as a proper name. After Exodus 3 the name begins to occur with increasing frequency as an appellative, that is, "the God of," or "your God." This function is by far the most frequent mode of reference to God in the book of Deuteronomy. When used in this fashion the name denotes God as the supreme deity of a person or people. Thus, in the frequent expression "Yahweh your God," Yahweh functions as a proper name, while “God” functions as the denominative of deity.

God, Names of

The appellative ’ēlōhîm connotes all that God is. As God he is sovereign, and that sovereignty extends beyond Israel into the arena of the nations (Deut. 2:30, 33; 3:22; Isa. 52:10). As God to his people he is loving and merciful (Deut. 1:31; 2:7; 23:5; Isa. 41:10, 13, 17; 49:5; Jer. 3:23). He establishes standards of obedience (Deut. 4:2; Jer. 11:3) and sovereignly punishes disobedience (Deut. 23:21). As God, there is no one like him (Isa. 44:7; 45:5–21).

The same connotations obtain in the use of the shorter form ’ēl. He is the God who sees (’ēl rō’î; Gen. 16:13) and he is ’ēl, the God of Israel (Gen. 33:20).

As El Elyon, God is described in his exaltation over all things. There are two definitive passages for this name. In Psalm 83:18 Yahweh is described as “the Most High over all the earth,” and Isaiah 14:14 states, “I will ascend above the tops of the clouds, I will make myself like the Most High.”

However, in the majority of cases the attributes of this name are indistinguishable from other usages of El or Elohim. He fixed the boundaries of the nations (Deut. 32:8). He effects changes in the creation (Ps. 18:13). El Shaddai occurs most frequently in the book of Job, where it functions as a general name for the deity. As El Shaddai, God disciplines (Job 5:17); he is to be feared (Job 6:14); he is just (Job 8:3); he hears prayer (Job 8:5–6); and he creates (Job 33:4).

This name occurs six times in the patriarchal narratives. In most of those instances it is associated with the promise given by God to the patriarchs. Yet the name is often paired with Yahweh in the poetic material and thus shares the personal warmth of that name. He is known for his steadfast love (Ps. 21:7) and his protection (Ps. 91:9–10).

The root of Adonai means “lord” and, in its secular usage, always refers to a superior in the OT. The word retains the sense of “lord” when applied to God. The present pointing of the word in the Masoretic Text is late; early manuscripts were written without vowel pointing.

In Psalm 110:1 the word is pointed in the singular, as it usually is when it applies to humans rather than God. Yet Jesus used this verse to argue for his deity. The pointing is Masoretic, and no distinction would be made in the consonantal texts. Since the word denotes a superior, the word must refer to one who is superior to David and who bears the messianic roles of king and priest (v. 4).

The name Abba connotes the fatherhood of God. This is affirmed by the accompanying translation ho patēr (“father”), which occurs in each usage of the name in the NT (Mark 14:36; Rom. 8:15; Gal. 4:6).

The use of this name as Jesus’ mode of address to God in Mark 14:36 is a unique expression of Jesus’ relationship to the Father. Jeremiah says, “He spoke to God like a child to its father, simply, inwardly, confidently. Jesus’ use of abba in addressing God reveals the heart of his relationship with God” (Prayers of Jesus, 62).

The same relationship is sustained by the believer with God. It is only because of the believer’s relationship with God, established by the Holy Spirit, that he or she can address God with this name that depicts a relationship of warmth and filial love.

In a sense the relationship designated by this name is the fulfillment of the ancient promise given to Abraham’s offspring that the Lord will be their God and they his people (Exod. 6:7; Lev. 26:12; Jer. 24:7; 30:22).

T. E. MCCOMISKEY

SEE ALSO ALPHA AND OMEGA; GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF; GOD, DOCTRINE OF.

Bibliography. W. F. Albright, From Stone Age to Christianity; W. Eichrodt, Theology of the Old Testament 1:178–227; H. Kleinknecht et al., TDNT 3:65–123; L. Koehler, Old Testament Theology; J. A. Motyer, Revelation of the Divine Name; G. Oehler, Theology of the Old Testament; M. Reisel, Mysterious Name of Y.H.W.H.; H. H. Rowley, Faith of Israel; J. Schneider et al., NIDNTT 2:66–90; H. Schultz, Old Testament Theology 2:116–79; T. Vriezen, Outline of Old Testament Theology.

Godliness. The manner of life that is centered on God, with special reference to devotion, piety, and reverence toward him. It can be defined as the conjunction of an attitude of devotion to God and of the consequent right conduct.

The idea of godliness is in many ways typically Hellenistic, with its emphasis on reverence and devotion to God. Its closest OT equivalent is the “fear of God,” which has as its central meaning a life of active obedience to the law (cf. Lev. 19:14; 25:17; Job 1:1; Ps. 128:1; Jer. 32:40).

The Greek word corresponding to godliness or piety is eusebeia. Its original meaning was the appropriate attitude to that which inspires reverence and awe, from social structures to God himself. It derives from a word meaning “to step back,” or “to keep a distance.” In its application to religious devotion it is connected to awe, reverence, and trepidation before God and, as such, is characteristic of Greek religiosity (Acts 17:23). This is very far from the idea of obedience to God’s law and probably explains the almost total absence of the word and its cognates from the LXX.

This word group is largely absent from the NT, probably for the same reason. The words are principally confined to the book of Acts (3:12; 10:2, 7; 17:23), where they seem to refer to piety in general, without a specifically Christian content; the Pastoral Epistles; and 2 Peter, where they are given specifically Christian content. The fact that these words occur almost exclusively in these letters suggests that it may have taken some time for these Hellenistic ideas to be integrated to Christian thought.

In the Pastoral Epistles eusebeia denotes a particular manner of life and comes close to the OT idea of "the fear of God." However, it does not focus upon the law, but on the individual believer's faith in Christ (1 Tim. 3:16). The secret of the godly life is the revelation of God in Jesus Christ; godliness is basically following him in this life (Titus 2:12). It is thus presented as a Christian goal, to be earnestly sought after (1 Tim. 2:2; 4:7-8), even if it leads to persecution (2 Tim. 3:12). Godliness and sound doctrine are closely related. True doctrine is described as being "godly teaching" (1 Tim. 6:3) and "truth that leads to godliness" (Titus 1:1), while an appearance of godliness without true Christian content is characteristic of evil men (2 Tim. 3:5). It is important to note that godliness is directly connected to proper respect for the family (1 Tim. 5:4).

The usage of 2 Peter is similar to this. Godliness is one of a list of Christian virtues (1:6-7); it is related to the power of God (1:3). The use of "godly lives" in 3:11 suggests a reference to specific acts of piety.

Godliness is thus the honoring of God as Creator and Redeemer that is born of faith in Jesus Christ and expresses itself in daily living. It is the manifestation of faith in life and includes respect for the orders of creation, such as the family. As such, it is a criterion for soundness of doctrine and should characterize all Christians.

F. Q. GOUVEA

See also ETHICS, BIBLICAL; HOLINESS; SPIRITUALITY.

Bibliography. A. Bowling, TWOT 1:399-401; W. Foerster, TDNT 7:168-96; W. Günther, NIDNTT 2:90-95; J. I. Packer, Quest for Godliness: The Puritan Vision of the Christian Life.

Gogarten, Friedrich (1887-1967). German theologian. Gogarten was educated in the theological tradition of German idealism, writing his earliest book on the religious thought of Fichte. However, his was an uneasy liberalism, and he soon took issue with the idea that Jesus Christ represented the "source in us" in favor of one who stands over against us. He concluded that liberalism had taught us to look at all things as man's doing, but man's works have no permanence to them. They not only begin, they also end: "We have all entered so deeply into the human as to have lost God."

When Gogarten lectured before the assembly of Friends of the Christian World, he left no doubt but that he had undertaken a new theological course. William Shafer recalls that "with Gogarten there stepped into the banqueting hall of the Wartburg Martin Luther . . . ready to fling his ink bottle at the head of the Devil."

Gogarten associated himself with a young Swiss pastor, Karl Barth, who was similarly disengaging himself from the earlier theological idealism and charting a course that would be variously described as "crisis theology," "dialectical theology," and "neo-orthodoxy." Gogarten's polemic advocated rethinking the Christian faith along historical rather than metaphysical lines. History implied for him the process of interaction in which being and meaning are re-created.

The nature of Christian responsibility consisted for Gogarten in receptivity (being-from-the-other), activity (being-for-the-other), and openness to "the absolute mystery which presses upon man's consciousness of responsibility for the world." Barth criticized Gogarten for courting the notion of history as a second source of revelation, and Gogarten countered with the charge that Barth held an abstract dialectic, lacking historical tangency. Gogarten vigorously defended Bultmann in the demythologizing controversy, but his criticisms of Bultmann were eventually picked up by such so-called post-Bultmannians as Gerhard Ebeling and Ernst Fuchs.

M. A. INCH

See also DEMYTHOLOGIZATION; NEO-ORTHODOXY.

Bibliography. F. Gogarten, Demythologizing and History: Reality of Faith; T. Runyon Jr., HCT 427-44; L. Shiner, Secularization of History: An Introduction to the Theology of Friedrich Gogarten.

Golden Rule. Jesus states what has come to be described as the Golden Rule: "In everything, do to others what you would have them do to you, for this sums up the Law and the Prophets" (Matt. 7:12; cf. Luke 6:31). The negative form was widely expressed in Judaism. The famed first-century rabbi Hillel was reported to have taught, "Whatsoever you would that men should not do to you, do not that to them."

Similar references are found elsewhere in the literature of antiquity. Tzu Kung inquired of Confucius: "Is there any one word that can serve as a principle for the conduct of life?" To which the sage replied: "Perhaps the word 'reciprocity': Do not do to others what you would not want others to do to you" (Analects 15:23).

One ought not to draw too simple a comparison between these references to reciprocity and the Golden Rule. Each has its own particular setting and significance. Reciprocity can degenerate to unbridled self-interest, where one hopes to secure good treatment by his behavior toward others. Jesus' teaching stands in stark contrast to such travesty when read in conjunction with the account of the good Samaritan (Luke 10:25-37).

M. A. INCH

Golden Rule

Bibliography. P. Bertocci and R. Millard, Personality and the Good; L. H. DeWolf, Responsible Freedom; N. Geisler, Ethics: Alternatives and Issues; T. B. Maston, Biblical Ethics; J. Noss, Man's Religions; B. Ramm, Right, the Good and the Happy.

Gomarus, Francis (1563–1641). Dutch Calvinist theologian. Born at Bruges, Gomarus studied at Strasbourg, Neustadt, Oxford, and Cambridge before taking his doctorate at Heidelberg in 1594. In 1586 he became pastor of the Dutch community at Frankfurt, and in 1594 was appointed professor of theology at Leiden. Here he emerged as a staunch upholder of Calvinistic orthodoxy; and after James Arminius joined him on the Leiden faculty in 1603, controversy developed between them. The main point in dispute between Gomarus and Arminius was this: Arminius maintained that in the work of salvation, man in some sense cooperates with God, whereas Gomarus held that in this work God and God alone is active. When the pro-Arminian Conrad Vorstius was appointed to succeed Arminius in 1610, Gomarus resigned his chair in protest. In 1611 he became minister of the Reformed congregation at Middleburg; from 1614 to 1618 he taught at the French Protestant seminary at Saumur; and from 1618 until his death he occupied a professorial chair at Groningen.

In 1610 the Arminian group published Remonstrance, a manifesto expounding their theological viewpoint. Thereupon the Gomarists replied with a Counter-Remonstrance. This controversy dragged on till 1618, when the Synod of Dort was called to settle the dispute. This synod pronounced against the Arminians, asserting in its decrees the so-called five points of Calvinism: total depravity, unconditional election, limited atonement, irresistible grace, and the final perseverance of the saints. But Gomarus, who played a prominent role at Dort, was unable to persuade the synod to endorse his supralapsarianism—i.e., the idea that God's decree of election preceded the fall of man and contemplated man's fallen estate as part of the divine plan of predestination.

N. V. HOPE

See also ARMINIUS, JAMES; DORT, SYNOD OF; SUPRALAPSARIANISM.

Bibliography. A. W. Harrison, Beginnings of Arminianism; P. Schaff, Creeks of Christendom.

Good, the Good, Goodness. The word good is the most comprehensive term used when praising excellence of something. To speak about a good book or good food is to use "good" in typically nonmoral ways. However, good conveys a moral sense when someone says, "He is a good man," or "She did a good deed/work." The man is being lauded for his excellent moral character and the woman for her effort in fulfilling a human need. As in these examples, the morally good refers to various aspects of personhood that include deeds, character traits, motives, intentions, desires, and needs. When an action is commended because of "transpersonal" factors, such as its conformity to principles, the term right is most often employed. The relationship between the right and the good has been the most persistent problem in ethics. The solution lies in the hotly contested search for the criteria or standards of goodness and has centered around the most compelling of all human questions, "What is the good?"

An answer to this question rests upon one's philosophical assumptions and/or religious beliefs. This has fostered a host of often clashing distinctions such as objective vs. subjective good, temporal vs. eternal good, greater vs. lesser good, real vs. apparent good, material vs. spiritual good, common vs. individual good, immutable vs. mutable good, good as an end vs. good as a means. Classical thinkers such as Socrates, Plato, and Aristotle tried to clarify and unify these various facets of the good. Their ideas greatly influenced Augustine and Thomas Aquinas who, with compelling rigor, related these discussions about the good to the Christian faith.

Both Augustine and Aquinas attempted to link the material and spiritual good by proposing the idea of "grades of goodness," with God being the highest good (summum bonum) and the source of all lesser goods. Moral evil (concupiscence) is present when one desires a lesser (nonmoral) good as an end in itself. But when the desire for a lesser good is a means to love God (caritas), then the "mutable adheres to the immutable" and it becomes a blessing (moral good). With their theocentric focus, these theologians took an important step in unifying the concept of the good. Nevertheless, because of their dependence upon Greek ideas, they were unable to affirm the goodness of some things, such as physical pleasures, especially sexual passion. Thus, the integration they sought tended to evaporate. Also their notion that human effort was involved in achieving the highest good was later to be dramatically challenged by Luther and the other Reformers.

God Is All Good. While the classical theologians failed to fully integrate the concept of the good, they did underscore its proper source and reference. For the Christian the meaning and unity of the good rests completely and absolutely in God as revealed by the Word. Declarations that God is good, acts with goodness, and is the source of all good abound throughout Scripture and are usually tied to human gratitude and praise (e.g., 2 Chron. 5:13; 7:3; Pss. 25:8; 100:5; 106:1; Jer. 33:11; Nah. 1:7; Mark 10:18). The identity of the good with God is profoundly expressed by Amos in his unconventional use of the oft-repeated priestly teaching or call to worship, "Seek the LORD and live.” He quotes this phrase three times, but on the third he substitutes the word “good” for “the LORD” and admonishes the people to “seek good, not evil, that you may live” (Amos 5:4, 6, 14). To seek God is to seek the good.

God’s absolute goodness was no more powerfully affirmed than when Jesus was confronted by the man who flippantly addressed him as good and assumed he would redefine its meaning. Rather, Jesus insisted that God is perfect goodness and that God alone decides and, in fact, has already determined (in Scripture and in Jesus himself) what is the good (cf. Matt. 19:16–22; Mark 10:17–22). The tragic fall of the first human pair when they ate from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil lay precisely in their rebellious attempt to be above God and assume God’s sole prerogative to determine what is good and what is evil (Gen. 3:4–7).

God’s Good Gifts. The Christian’s unique understanding of the good is shaped by the Bible’s unparalleled presentation of the Triune God, who acts by creating the world and by establishing an everlasting covenant of fellowship with that world. Already in the opening verses of Genesis the meaning of the good (tôb, agathos, kalos) is clarified. The phrase “and God saw that it was good (or pleasing)” is a postlude to each day’s creative activity (Gen. 1:4, 10, 12, 18, 21, 25, 31; cf. 1 Tim. 4:4). Each declaration of goodness accents God’s orderly design and fashioning of the universe, resulting in the interdependence of its structures and in the grouping of all life after its kind. The meaning of the good as the harmonious ordering and agreement among the parts is highlighted in Adam and Eve who, as physical and psychological beings, are created in total accord with their environment (note the linguistic relationship between ’ādām and ’ādāmā meaning “earth”). Thus, the natural elements of the earth are “pleasing to the eye and good for food” (Gen. 2:9).

Because of this ordered agreement between the created self and the created world, the good is closely associated in Scripture with the desirable or the “pleasing.” For instance, good figs are ripe ones, i.e., figs that are pleasing to eat (Jer. 24:2); honey is good because it is sweet on the tongue (Prov. 24:13); some women are good to look at, meaning they are pleasing to men (Gen. 6:2). The natural goods of life, however, are not simply limited to those things that agree with the physical senses. Wisdom, for example, is good because it finds accord with the soul.

Because the things pleasing to the body are often necessities for human life or even social status, they become economically valuable. Consequently, “goods” can refer to one’s possessions, property, or wealth (Luke 6:30 κῖβ). These goods often constitute a part of God’s promises. The Promised Land is a good land, i.e., a land flowing with milk and honey (Exod. 3:8). While the Lord “is good to” those who wait upon him (Lam. 3:25), God’s goodness is also granted to all people (Ps. 145:9). It is possible to overindulge in God’s good gifts with the result that too much honey causes one to vomit (Prov. 25:16), or to grow fat and serve other gods (Deut. 31:20). Furthermore, one may deprive others of the natural goods to which they are entitled. In these contexts the good conveys a religiomoral meaning and pinpoints the moral excellence of who a person is and what a person does.

Being and Doing Good. The idea of the good as friendly agreement between the parts emerges from the theological conviction that God relates to humans in a covenantal way, i.e., in an ordered or commanded relationship between various parties (Gen. 6:18; 1 Sam. 20:8). The good person is the one who lives in fellowship with the Lord and acts in accord with God’s dictates for assuring human community (Mic. 6:8). The one who does good is of God (3 John 11), and thus the faithful are exhorted to choose good (Isa. 7:15); cling to the good (Rom. 12:9); diligently seek good (Prov. 11:27); love good (Amos 5:15); learn to do good (Isa. 1:17); and imitate good (3 John 11). The good, however, is only possible by divine aid, since no one does good, but only evil continually (Rom. 3:12). As Jesus insisted, persons must be made good before they are able to produce good fruit (Matt. 12:33–35). According to Paul, Christians have been created in Christ Jesus for good works (Eph. 2:10). Then they become ones who love what is good (philagathos, Titus 1:8) and are able to distinguish good from evil (Heb. 5:14); to prove what is good (Rom. 12:2); to overcome evil with good (Rom. 12:21); to do good to those who hate them (Luke 6:35); and to be rich in good deeds (Matt. 5:16; 2 Cor. 9:8; 1 Tim. 6:18; 2 Tim. 2:21; 3:17; Titus 2:14). Goodness is a fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22) and is closely tied to love (Matt. 19:16–19; Heb. 10:24). For this reason Christians are never to seek their own good, but the good of others, especially that of the community or the “common good” (cf. 1 Cor. 10:24 with 12:7).

Throughout Scripture the good is embodied in procedures of justice, deeds of kindness, and acts of liberation, all of which serve the poor and lowly in society (Isa. 1:17; Mic. 6:8). In these contexts the good becomes the right and is essentially linked to the practical goods of life. Goodness as justice guarantees that legal structures will be impartial in the distribution of natural goods that fulfill human existence (Amos 5:15; Mic. 3:1–4; 2 Cor. 8:12–14). Kindness is the personal distribution of these goods when the justice within structures fails (Isa. 59:14–15; Mark 14:6–8). Freedom as a good permits others to make choices necessary for their overall well-being (Jer. 34:8–22; Luke 4:18). To those who do good to others, God will bestow good upon them, and they shall have life (Jer. 32:39–42; John 5:29).

Good, the Good, Goodness

For the Christian, then, the right and the good are not finally at odds. The good as the right points to the necessary criteria for distributing natural goods. Nevertheless, these goods make the right worth pursuing. Since all good comes from God, goodness is, as Karl Barth correctly states, “the sum of everything, right, friendly and wholesome” (Church Dogmatics 2/2:708).

D. J. MILLER

See also ETHICAL SYSTEMS, CHRISTIAN; ETHICS, BIBLICAL; GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF.

Bibliography. T. Aquinas, Summa Theologica; Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics; Augustine, City of God; E. Beyreuther, NIDNTT 2:98–107; W. Eichrodt, Theology of the Old Testament; A. Gewirth, Reason and Morality; W. Grundmann et al., TDNT 1:10–18; 2:536–37; R. M. Hare, Language of Morals; C. F. H. Henry, Christian Personal Ethics; P. Lehmann, Ethics in a Christian Context.

Good Friday. The Friday before Easter Day. Its origins as a special holy day go back to the development of Holy Week in Jerusalem in the late fourth century. In the East it came to be called “Great” and in the West “Good” Friday. It is observed in the Western nations in many ways. For example, in Roman Catholicism the liturgy of the day, used between 3:00 P.M. and 8:00 P.M., has three parts—readings and prayers, adoration of the cross, and Holy Communion with bread consecrated a day beforehand. The Eucharist is not celebrated on this day. Anglicanism observes the day in a variety of ways, including the use of the Roman liturgy, a three-hour service (noon to 3:00 P.M.), or a simple service of morning or evening prayer. Some Protestant denominations celebrate the Lord’s Supper.

P. TOON

See also CHRISTIAN YEAR; HOLY WEEK.

Good News. See GOSPEL.

Good Works. See WORKS.

Gore, Charles (1853–1932). For a time, as bishop of Oxford, the most influential leader in the Anglican Church. He worked toward bringing a reconciling and more liberal outlook to the Oxford Movement, which sought to restore the High Church ideals of seventeenth-century Anglicanism.

Gore is characterized as a “liberal catholic.” To him this was Anglicanism at its best. He noted three marks of catholicism as apostolic succession, high sacramentalism, and a common rule of faith. Gore’s liberalism is seen in his concern to give reason wide reign whether in philosophy or science, historical criticism, or the spiritual experience of humankind.

National notoriety came when Gore edited and contributed to Lux Mundi (1889). The Oxford Anglican contributors to this volume wished to bring the catholic faith into line with modern scholarship and moral problems. Gore’s essay “The Holy Spirit and Inspiration” rooted authority for the church in the Holy Spirit’s guidance. The Spirit acts in the church to help Scripture, reason, and tradition interpret each other. The impact of this for Gore was that the church could be completely open to the new findings of biblical criticism. These views led to Gore’s break with the older generation of conservative High Church leaders.

Gore’s views were expanded in his Bampton Lectures, Incarnation of the Son of God (1891), and his Dissertations on Subjects Connected with the Incarnation (1895). In these the kenosis or self-emptying of Christ became the key to the incarnation, the central doctrine of Christianity for Gore. This meant that during his “incarnate and mortal life” Jesus, out of his “self-restraining love,” voluntarily limited himself so that his divine functions and powers, such as omniscience, were not exercised. Gore believed this was scriptural and permitted the Son of God, without ceasing to be God, to enter fully into human experience. Presupposed in all Gore’s thought was the basic unity of nature and grace in which Jesus Christ is both creator and redeemer. In Jesus the Godhead’s creative intention reached its highest fruition.

Gore’s literary output was large after he resigned his bishopric in 1919. His Reconstruction of Belief (1926) was a single-volume publication of three earlier works. His strong social views were summarized in Christ and Society (1928).

D. K. MCKIM

See also LIBERALISM, THEOLOGICAL; OXFORD MOVEMENT.

Bibliography. J. Carpenter, Gore: A Study in Liberal Catholic Thought; G. Crosse, Charles Gore: A Biographical Sketch; J. C. Davies, “Charles Gore,” Theol 25:259–67; P. E. Hughes, ed., Creative Minds in Contemporary Theology; T. A. Langford, In Search of Foundations: English Theology 1900–1920; J. K. Mozley, Some Tendencies in British Theology from the Publication of ‘Lux Mundi’ to the Present Day; G. L. Prestige, Life of Charles Gore; A. M. Ramsey, From Gore to Temple.

Gospel. The English word gospel (from the Anglo-Saxon god-spell, i.e., God-story) is the usual NT translation of the Greek euangelion. According to Tyndale, the renowned English Reformer and Bible translator, it signified “good, mery, glad and joyfull tydinge, that maketh a mannes hert glad, and maketh hym synge, daunce, and leepe for joye” (Prologue to NT). While his definition is more experiential than explicative, it has touched that inner quality that brings the word to life. The gospel is the joyous proclamation of God's redemptive activity in Christ Jesus on behalf of humans enslaved by sin.

Origin. Euangelion (neut. sing.) is rarely found in the sense of "good tidings" outside of early Christian literature. As used by Homer it referred not to the message but to the reward given to the messenger (e.g., Odyssey xiv. 152). In Attic Greek it always occurred in the plural and generally referred to sacrifices or thank offerings made in behalf of good tidings. Even in the LXX euangelion is found for sure but once (2 Kings 4:10: Eng. versions, 2 Sam.), and there it has the classical meaning of a reward given for good tidings. (In 2 Kings 18:22, 25, euangelion should undoubtedly be taken as fem. sing. in harmony with vv. 20 and 27, where this form is certain.) Euangelion in the sense of the good news itself belongs to a later period. Outside of Christian literature the neuter singular first appears with this meaning in a papyrus letter from an Egyptian official of the third century A.D. In the plural it is found in a calendar inscription from Priene about 9 B.C. It is not until the writings of the apostolic fathers (e.g., Didache 8:2; 2 Clement 8:5) that we sense a transition to the later Christian usage of euangelion as referring to a book that sets forth the life and teaching of Jesus (Justin, Apology i. 66).

Against this background the frequency with which euangelion occurs in the NT (more than seventy-five times) with the specific connotation of "good news" is highly informative. It suggests that euangelion is quite distinctively a NT word. Its true significance is therefore found, not by probing its linguistic background, but by observing its specific Christian usage.

This is not to deny, of course, that the basic concept has its rightful origin in the religious aspirations of the nation Israel. Some seven centuries before Christ the prophet Isaiah had delivered a series of prophetic utterances. With vivid imagery he portrayed the coming deliverance of Israel from captivity in Babylon. A redeemer shall come to Zion preaching good tidings unto the meek and liberty to the captives (Isa. 60:1-2). "How beautiful on the mountains are the feet of those who bring good news" (Isa. 52:7). Jerusalem itself is pictured as a herald whose message is good tidings (Isa. 40:9).

Jesus saw in these prophecies a description of his own mission (Luke 4:18-21; 7:22). They expressed that same sense of liberation and exultation that was the true characteristic of his messianic proclamation. What was at first simply a literary allusion came easily to represent the actual message that was being proclaimed. Euangelion was the natural result of the LXX's euangelizein. Thus, Mark could write that Jesus came into Galilee "proclaiming the euangelion of God" (Mark 1:14).

Euangelion in the Gospels. Upon examining the four Gospels, we find that the word euangelion is used only by Matthew and Mark. The concept, however, is not foreign to Luke. He uses the verb form twenty-six times in Luke-Acts and the noun twice in the latter book. In the fourth Gospel there is no trace of either verb or noun.

In all but one instance, Matthew further describes euangelion as the gospel "of the kingdom." This gospel is not to be distinguished from what Mark calls the "gospel of God" (many manuscripts read "the gospel of the kingdom of God") and summarizes in the words, "The time has come. The kingdom of God is near" (Mark 1:14-15). On the other occasion, Matthew writes, "this gospel" (Matt. 26:13)—the context indicating that Jesus is alluding to his coming death. The phrase "preaching the good news of the kingdom" is twice used in summary statements of the ministry of Jesus (Matt. 4:23; 9:35). This gospel is to be preached throughout the entire world prior to the consummation of the age (Matt. 24:14; cf. Mark 13:10).

The way in which Mark uses euangelion is suggested by his opening words, "The beginning of the gospel about Jesus Christ, the Son of God." Here euangelion is a semitechnical term meaning "the glad news that tells about Jesus Christ." Where Luke writes, "for the sake of the kingdom of God" (Luke 18:29), the Markan parallel is "for me and the gospel" (Mark 10:29). This gospel is of such tremendous import that for its sake a person must be willing to enter upon a life of complete self-denial (Mark 8:35). In the long ending of Mark, Christ commands his disciples to "preach the good news to all creation" (Mark 16:15).

The Gospel According to Paul. Over against the six occasions (discounting parallels) on which euangelion is used by the Gospel writers, it is found a total of sixty times in the writings of Paul. Euangelion is a favorite Pauline term. It is evenly distributed throughout his epistles, missing only in his note to Titus.

Paul's ministry was distinctively that of the propagation of the gospel. Unto this gospel he was set apart (Rom. 1:1) and made a minister according to the grace of God (Eph. 3:7). His special sphere of action was the Gentile world (Rom. 16:16; Gal. 2:7). Since Paul accepted the gospel as a sacred trust, it was necessary that in the discharge of this obligation he speak so as to please God rather than people (1 Tim. 2:4). The divine commission had created a sense of urgency that made him cry out, "Woe to me if I do not preach the gospel!" (1 Cor. 9:16). For the sake of the gospel Paul was willing to become all things to all people (1 Cor. 9:22-23). No sacrifice was too great. Eternal issues were at stake. Those whose minds were blinded and did not obey the gospel were perishing and would ultimately reap the vengeance of divine wrath (2 Cor. 4:3; 2 Thess. 1:9). On the other hand, to those who believed, the gospel had effectively become the power of God unto salvation (Rom. 1:16).

Because Paul on occasion speaks of his message as “my gospel” (Rom. 2:16; 2 Tim. 2:8), and because in his letter to the Galatians he goes to some pains to stress that he did not receive it from man (Gal. 1:11–24), it is sometimes maintained that Paul’s gospel should be distinguished from that of apostolic Christianity in general.

This does not follow. First Corinthians 15:3–5 sets forth with crystal clarity the message of primitive Christianity. Paul, using terms equivalent to the technical rabbinic words for the reception and transmission of tradition, refers to this message as something he had received and passed on (v. 3). In v. 11 he can say, “Whether, then, it was I or they, this is what we preach, and this is what you believed.” In Galatians, Paul tells how he laid before the apostles at Jerusalem the gospel he had preached. Far from finding fault with the message, they extended to him the right hand of fellowship (Gal. 2:9). What Paul meant by his earlier remarks is that the charges against his gospel as a mere human message were completely fraudulent. The revelation of the full theological impact of the Christ-event was God-given and stemmed from his encounter on the Damascus road. Thus, he speaks of “my gospel,” meaning his own personal apprehension of the gospel. On other occasions he can speak freely of “our gospel” (2 Cor. 4:3; 1 Thess. 1:5).

For Paul the euangelion is preeminently the “gospel of God” (Rom. 1:1; 15:16; 2 Cor. 11:7; 1 Thess. 2:2, 8–9). It proclaims the redemptive activity of God. This activity is bound up with the person and work of God’s Son, Christ Jesus. Thus, it is also the “gospel of Christ” (1 Cor. 9:12; 2 Cor. 2:12; 9:13; 10:14; Gal. 1:7; 1 Thess. 3:2; Rom. 15:16, 19 indicate that these are interchangeable terms). This gospel is variously expressed as “the gospel of our Lord Jesus” (2 Thess. 1:8), “the glorious gospel of the blessed God” (1 Tim. 1:11), “the gospel of his Son” (Rom. 1:9), and “the gospel of the glory of Christ” (2 Cor. 4:4). It is a gospel of salvation (Eph. 1:13) and peace (Eph. 6:15). It proclaims the hope of eternal life (Col. 1:23). It is “the word of truth” (Eph. 1:13; Col. 1:5). Through this gospel, life and immortality are brought to light (2 Tim. 1:10).

The Apostolic Preaching. If we wish to investigate more closely the specific content of the primitive gospel, we will do well to adopt the basic approach of C. H. Dodd (Apostolic Preaching and Its Developments). While Dodd refers to the message as kerygma, he is ready to admit that this term is a virtual equivalent of euangelion. (Kerygma stresses the manner of delivery; euangelion, the essential nature of the content.)

There are two sources for the determination of the primitive proclamation. Of primary importance are the fragments of pre-Pauline tradition that lie embedded in the writings of the apostle. These segments can be uncovered by the judicious application of certain literary and formal criteria. While at least one purports to be the actual terms in which the gospel was preached (1 Cor. 15:3–5), others take the form of early Christian hymns (e.g., Phil. 2:6–11), summaries of the message (e.g., Rom. 10:9), or creedal formulas (1 Cor. 12:3; 1 Tim. 3:16).

A second source is the early Petrine speeches in Acts. These speeches (on the basis of their Aramaic background, freedom from Paulinism, and the general trustworthiness of Luke as a historian) can be shown to give reliably the gist of what Peter actually said and not what a second generation Christian thought he might have said.

These two sources combine to set forth one common apostolic gospel. In briefest outline, this message contained: (1) a historical proclamation of the death, resurrection, and exaltation of Jesus, set forth as the fulfillment of prophecy and involving man’s responsibility; (2) a theological evaluation of the person of Jesus as both Lord and Christ; (3) a summons to repent and receive the forgiveness of sins.

It will be noticed that the essential core of this message is not the dawn of the messianic age (as Dodd implies)—although this is most certainly involved—but that sequence of redemptive events that sweeps the hearer along with compelling logic toward the climactic confession that Jesus is Lord.

The gospel is not the product of a bewildered church pondering the theological significance of Good Friday. It is rather the result of a natural development that had its origins in the teachings of Jesus himself. The Passion sayings of Jesus—far from being “prophecies after the event” (cf. R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament, 1:29)—are undeniable evidence that Jesus laid the foundation for a theology of the cross. In his teaching regarding his own person Jesus furnished what R. H. Fuller has aptly termed “the raw materials of Christology” (Mission and Achievement of Jesus). The resurrection was the catalyst that precipitated in the minds of the disciples the total significance of God’s redemptive activity. It released the gospel!

This gospel is power (Rom. 1:16). As an instrument of the Holy Spirit it convicts (1 Thess. 1:5) and converts (Col. 1:6). It cannot be fettered (2 Tim. 2:9). Although it is good news, it is strenuously opposed by a rebellious world (1 Thess. 2:2). Opposition to the message takes the form of opposition to the messenger (2 Tim. 1:11–12; Philem. 13). Yet those who proclaim it must do so boldly (Eph. 6:19) and with transparent simplicity (2 Cor. 4:2)—not with eloquence lest the cross of Christ be robbed of its power (1 Cor. 1:17). To those who refuse the gospel, it is both foolishness and a stumbling block (1 Cor. 1:18–31), but to those who respond in faith it proves itself to be “the power of God for . . . salvation” (Rom. 1:16).

R. H. MOUNCE

Bibliography. W. Barclay, New Testament Wordbook; V. Becker, NIDNTT 2:107–15; M. Burrows, “The Origin of the Term ‘Gospel,’” JBL 44:21–33; W. K. L. Clarke, Divine Humanity; G. Friedrich, TDNT 2:705–37; A. Har-nack, Constitution and Law; R. H. Mounce, Essential Nature of New Testament Preaching; R. H. Strachan, “The Gospel in the New Testament,” IB 7.

Gospel, Social Implications of. Christians agree that the gospel influences our understanding of human relationships in every dimension, usually summarized by the word social. Theologically the social implications of the Christian message correspond with attitudes toward creation, sin, and the restoration of God’s intended order for the world. And while the gospel is inherently social as well as personal, the nature of individual, cultural, political, and economic relationships associated with the gospel is not as clearly defined.

The Christian Gospel. Early Christian attitudes toward the various cultures in which it first existed appear to represent a sense of involvement and mission (1 Cor. 8–9), responsibility or accountability toward social order (Rom. 13; 1 Tim. 2:1–7), as well as a sense of detachment toward social circumstances (1 Cor. 7; 1 John 2:7–17). Common displays of love toward both the good and evil are characteristic of our heavenly Father and are to be mirrored in our conduct as well, including willingness to be wronged, to love rather than hate enemies, and to pray for those who persecute us (Matt. 5:38–48). Christian identity represents the unique sense of being “in” the world but not necessarily “of” the world in a manner that corresponds to the incarnation (John 14–17).

In keeping with the broader biblical testimony regarding the poor, orphaned, and widowed (and the accompanying economic destitution, Deut. 15; Ruth; Isa. 1), exploitation of the weak is to be avoided and the practice of mercy should characterize God’s people. The law of Moses encompassed wide-ranging matters of personal identity, fair legal treatment, the common supply of food for all, and liberality especially toward the poor (Deut. 15:11). The implication of God’s gifts to his people involve every dimension of human relationships as well as our care for the physical world and animals (Deut. 16–26).

In the New Testament there is a strong interest in the poor but opposition to the rich (Luke’s gospel, James’s epistle). Serving the hungry, thirsty, stranger, naked, sick, and imprisoned distinguish the righteous from the wicked (Matt. 25:31–46). In James 2:14–26 pious words of personal interest are meaningless without the necessary social involvement Christian faith requires. And the early Christian community practiced a distinctive merger of personal and social witness (Acts 2:37–5:11).

In Paul’s letters the sense of involvement but detachment is represented in the appeal to citizenship, both political and spiritual (Phil. 3), and our identity as the strangers and aliens from which a Christian ethic is developed—an identity that seeks consistency with the age of the resurrection in contrast to the present age (Col. 3). God’s people are earthly citizens but long for a heavenly city (Heb. 11; 1 Peter 2)—an identity that involves personal conversion as well as converting our relationship with our social circumstances. In this way, if Christians suffer, it should be for doing what is right according to the pattern of Jesus’ suffering rather than for evil doing, all the while acknowledging the passing nature of the present age (1 Peter 3–4).

History of the Gospel as Social. The circumstances of Christianity’s relationship with culture have shifted significantly in Christian history, especially with the growing acceptance of Christianity as a cultural force from Constantine through early modernity. Instead of enduring the charge of disloyalty (typical in the first and second centuries), Christianity was employed as a culturally affirming force and marked the opportunity for Christian moral influence in political and social structures (leading to the assertion of temporal power with the medieval papacy). The medieval union of Christianity and social interests was justified theologically by the relationship of nature and grace, which in turn reinforced the stability of Western culture, law, government, and economy. Monastic detachment from dominant culture offered a contrast to this theme of power; it fostered missiological, educational, and social dimensions of the Christian gospel that included the significant role of friars in European cities.

Rejecting the association of temporal authority with the papacy, the Protestant Reformation signaled a revision of the social implications of the gospel, both by renewing a personal interest in the redemptive nature of the gospel and reaffirming the inherent social dimensions of Christian existence in the world. Luther viewed temporal authority as a divinely instituted restraining force, and the Christian’s love of neighbor necessitated participation in both temporal and spiritual kingdoms. Calvin envisioned the Christianization of social structures in order to further the gospel, where holiness necessarily correlates with both personal and social existence. Thus, the gospel was a particular expression of God’s providential and common care for creation (including civilization). These themes define the differing roles concerning sanctification within Protestant theology.

Gospel, Social Implications of

Protestant attitudes toward the social implications of the gospel were built upon the perceived continuity between the Old Testament's interest in society and the New Testament's emphasis upon the personal dimensions of the gospel. In contrast, anabaptists rejected the church-culture union that dominated late medieval and Reformation Christianity; they challenged the assumptions of dominant Christian culture and advocated an alternative community of disciples and were thus ostracized or eliminated (literally) for both religious and political reasons.

Evangelical Social Concern. Evangelicalism's history of interest in the social influence of the gospel continued the Protestant interest in social involvement and responsibility in ways that resembled its pietistic heritage of concern for practical or personal religion. From George Whitefield's itinerant ministry of gospel preaching and raising support for his Georgia orphanage, to John Wesley and the Holiness tradition's concern over slavery, alcohol, and the need for prison and education reforms, evangelicalism regarded the gospel as inherently social and defended this theological conviction practically.

Nineteenth-century revivalism maintained the socially transforming nature of the gospel within human society (the gospel as the source of reform for individuals, communities, and governments), but there existed an increasing tendency to dismiss the social as worldly and stress the individual (what has been appropriately termed a "great reversal" of evangelical interests in the social implications of the gospel). Early twentieth-century fundamentalism justified this distinction between the individual and the social in terms of God's purpose for the present world in light of eschatological expectations: fundamentalists tended to be pessimistic about the ultimate influence of the gospel in society, while a lingering optimism was coopted by the social gospel movement. Represented by Walter Rauschenbusch, the social gospel involved applying Jesus' teaching to society (in its economic and cultural institutions), especially in the setting of industrialized and urbanized American life. In the prophets and the preaching of Jesus the dynamic concept of the kingdom of God as a means of relating personal Christian identity with one's immediate social circumstances was "rediscovered."

Evangelicalism was further polarized by the association of the social gospel with liberalism and doctrinal conservatism and evangelism with fundamentalism, which meant that many socially concerned evangelicals were ostracized while many fundamentalists rejected social interest as liberal. Carl Henry's 1946 volume Uneasy Conscience of Modern Fundamentalism heralded conservatives' revived interest in a biblically justifified social concern. This was followed by Ronald Sider's theological justification for transforming culture and the countercultural position of Jim Wallis, the formation of organizations such as Evangelicals for Social Action, and publications such as Sojourners and The Other Side. The Lausanne Covenant (1974) also signaled evangelical concern for the relationship of Christian witness and social responsibility (Stott). During the 1970s, political and social renewal influenced modern fundamentalism in such movements as the Moral Majority under the leadership of Jerry Falwell, which embodied an effort to confront the decline of Christian influence in American culture through political and judicial leverage in society.

Conclusion. The continual struggle over the relationship of the personal and social dimensions of the gospel (and the degree to which one fulfills or inhibits the other) has led evangelicalism through a complicated history of engagement, withdrawal, and renewed interest in the social implications of the gospel. The same tensions have led contemporary Christian theology to consider the social liberation of the gospel (especially emerging from Asia, Africa, and Latin America), stressing God's predisposition toward the poor; and an interest in social justice has been grounded in the gospel's claims for justice for people of color, women, and the urban poor in North America.

There is a Christian rationale for both constructive social involvement as an expression of the gospel as well as a sense of detachment toward dominant culture. While the gospel is inherently social, it does not necessarily provide its own economic, political, or social substitute to dominant societies. Instead, the influence of the gospel modifies both the rationale and practice of citizenship, responsibility within culture and family, primarily through a uniquely Christian identity.

J. P. CALLAHAN

Bibliography. P. Berger, Heretical Imperative; D. Bloesch and R. Webber, Orthodox Evangelicals; D. Dayton, Discovering an Evangelical Heritage; J. Falwell, ed., Fundamentalist Phenomenon; S. Hauerwas and W. Willamon, Resident Aliens; G. Marsden, Fundamentalism and American Culture; M. Marty, Modern American Religion; W. Meeks, First Urban Christians; Moral World of the First Christians; P. Misner, Social Catholicism in Europe; D. Moberg, Great Reversal; Wholistic Christianity; R. Mouw, Political Evangelism; H. R. Niebuhr, Christ and Culture; R. Niebuhr, Moral Man and Immoral Society; W. Rauschenbusch, Theology for the Social Gospel; R. Sider, Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger; T. L. Smith, Revivalism and Social Reform; J. R. W. Stott, Lausanne Covenant; J. Wallis, Agenda for Biblical People; R. Webber, Secular Saint; J. H. Yoder, Politics of Jesus.

Government. The Biblical Witness. From a biblical point of view government is one of the means God has established to rule his creation through human stewardship. In this general context government is similar to all other forms of human stewardship, including the responsibilities of parents, employers, teachers, artists, and so forth; each has a responsibility for administering part of God's creation under the authority of God (see, e.g., 1 Peter 2:13–3:17; 5:1–7).

The call from God to any human steward is a call to obedience in particular realms of responsibility according to the normative law of God. The responsibility of governmental authorities is distinguishable from that of parents, teachers, or pastors, and therefore the governor must learn to know and fulfill the peculiar responsibilities of government. In doing so, the public official is obliged as a steward and servant to respond in obedience to God's universal dominion over the earth.

This general framework of human stewardship under God's dominion is evident, for example, in God's choosing of Moses and David for government responsibility (Exod. 3:11–12; 18:13–26; Deut. 17:14–20; 1 Sam. 16:12–13; 2 Sam. 7:1–29), in his challenges to Israel's governors through the prophets (1 Sam. 13:11–14; Isa. 10:1–4; Jer. 22:1–30; Dan. 2:20–23; 4:34–37; Zech. 7:8–14), and in NT teaching about governmental authority at many points (John 18:33–37; 19:7–11; Rom. 13:1–7; Col. 1:15–16; Rev. 11:15–19).

The particular character and purpose of government is illuminated in biblical texts from early in the OT through to the end of the NT, though none of those texts is a treatise on government comparable to Greek, Latin, or modern European political essays. We learn about God's purpose for government in diverse biblical contexts where at one time God gives directions for Israel's entrance into the Promised Land, or at another time challenges the misuse of power by Israel's kings, or at another time instructs Christians about their proper obligations to government in a given situation. From these texts we do not obtain a political philosophy, but we do learn much about the normative meaning of justice and injustice, the peculiar tasks of earthly governors, and the proper relationship between governors and the governed. With respect to government the Bible is truly a light on our path (Ps. 119:105).

One of the things we learn from the Scriptures about the nature of government is that it has broad tasks of distribution and retribution for the sake of the entire community or society over which it governs (see, e.g., Exod. 21; Lev. 25; Deut. 24:1–22). Today we would call this a "public" responsibility. Society today is a diversity of families, businesses, schools, associations, churches, and so forth. Governments are called to look after the general public health and welfare of the whole society, but that does not give them the authority to disrupt or destroy the proper responsibilities that God has given to parents, pastors, teachers, employers, and other stewards. Rules and regulations for sanitation, transportation, contracts, and the punishment of crimes, for example, are all public laws that belong to the proper domain of government.

This domain of public responsibility, then, must be fulfilled as a trust from God, a stewardship of justice for the sake of the whole society. When justice is not done by the government to everyone who is subject to its authority, then the abuse of power manifests itself in that realm of responsibility. The proper use of public authority or the abuse of that authority shows up especially clearly when it comes to the use of force. From the beginning of the biblical witness God reveals that the use of force against another human being is wrong (Gen. 9:5–6; Exod. 20:13; 21:12–27). It deserves punishment by a God-appointed governor so that proper retribution can be made and so that justice can be affirmed as the basis of all interrelationships in society. One of the central responsibilities of government, then, is to restrain the use of force and to punish those who use violence against their neighbors.

When government itself uses force in illegal ways or in ways that do not restrain violence but only encourage it, then it displays irresponsibility and lack of obedience to God's norm of justice. Most of the political ideologies of the modern world contain elements that allow or even encourage governments to use force for purposes that are not just from a biblical point of view. Christians, therefore, should work not only to encourage governments to restrain and punish the violence perpetrated by individuals in society but also to encourage governments themselves to act justly and not be instigators of unjust violence through oppression, war, and self-aggrandizement.

Finally, we should remind ourselves regularly that biblical revelation shows government to be one of the means of God's self-revelation. God has revealed himself not only as father, shepherd, husband, counselor, gardener, brother, and friend, but also as king, judge, governor, and Lord. Government, then, is not simply a human good that we have at our disposal for keeping some measure of peace and order on earth. Government is more than a this-worldly affair that may be discounted as less than important in God's overall plan for the creation. Government is as important in God's self-revelation as family life, farming, worship, and every other aspect of creational life that was made in and through and for Jesus Christ to reveal the glory of God (see Pss. 93; 94:1–3; 95:3; Isa. 9:6–7; Col. 1:16; Heb. 1:8–14; Rev. 1:5, 8; 19:11–21).

Christian Responses in History. The biblical witness about government and its place in God's plan for his human creatures has been much in dispute among biblical believers themselves.

Government

Whether it was Israel under the authority of Moses or under one of Israel's kings; whether during the fragmented period of the judges or in the period of exile; whether during Jewish or Christian persecution at the hands of the Romans—all these circumstances led to considerable difference of opinion about the responsibility of God's people with respect to the proper role of government.

After three hundred years of uncertain existence and persecution following the first coming of Christ, Christians were rather quickly given a protected place in the ancient Roman world when the emperors themselves became Christians. First Constantine and then one successor after another began to "Christianize" Rome. Was this God's providential blessing of protection for Christians, or was it the beginning of the fall from grace as Christians began to depend on the Roman imperial order for their life and security in this world? Could biblical teaching about the lordship of Christ be accommodated to the earthly sovereignty of an emperor? Does the church exist by the grace of imperial (or any other) authority, or does earthly government exist by the grace of Christ?

Before the end of the first millennium after Christ, Christians had established two divergent "empires" in the East and West. The Eastern one followed more closely the older Roman tradition of imperial sovereignty shepherding the church, while the West eventually developed a pattern of ecclesiastical sovereignty over feudal estates. All the while a minority within both traditions opposed this earthly entanglement and pride of the church, and sought a life of piety undefiled by earthly power, wealth, and property.

By the time of the Reformation in the sixteenth century, protesters within the Western church had gained sufficient power to challenge the very existence of a Roman ecclesiastical dominance over politics and culture. Most of the Anabaptists drew strength from the long tradition of protest within the church and appealed for a total separation of church from state. Whatever government is within God's plan, it certainly exists "outside the perfection of Christ," they argued.

The Calvinists and Lutherans, on the other hand, adapted much more readily to the newly emerging centralized state structures in which they sought a relative freedom for the church within a political order that would protect the homogeneous orthodoxy of society (orthodoxy being defined by a Lutheran or Calvinist creed). The Roman Catholic Church did not accept Calvinist, Lutheran, or Anabaptist reinterpretations of either ecclesiastical or political orders. In the East very little changed.

In the West most of the newly emerging states gradually took shape in ways that led to a de facto separation of political power from ecclesiastical establishment, though not many Catholics and Protestants actually accepted the Anabaptist interpretation of this reality. Thus, what we have today are largely "secular" states and a host of divergent opinions among Christians about how they should be related to those political authorities. The modern states are not simply disconnected from churches; in most cases they are based on ideologies that claim no relation to or dependence upon a biblical view of reality. Modern liberal, socialist, and communist ideologies all claim to be rooted in nothing more than the sovereignty and independence of human will and reason.

Many Christians, therefore, spend their time trying to weigh or even justify the relative merits of one of these ideologies from a biblical viewpoint. Others accept the incompatibility of biblical Christianity with modern political establishments and seek a purer Christian life and witness apart from political engagement. Still others try to recover one of the earlier Catholic or Protestant traditions of life and thought as a basis for reforming or engaging in political life. And finally there is a large number of Christians who simply ignore or remain apathetic about government and politics, treating that realm as inconsequential for their Christian witness. In the realm of politics and government today, there appears to be very little agreement among Christians about the nature and task of government from a biblical viewpoint. Not only do the Eastern Orthodox, Roman Catholic, and various Protestant traditions continue to unfold with degrees of allegiance to past political viewpoints, but today, especially in the Third World, new interpretations of political life are emerging, many of them influenced by biblical as well as modern ideological influences.

Key Issues and Questions for Our Day. Considering the diversity of "Christian" approaches to political life in the light of the biblical witness, a few issues seem to stand out as most important for our consideration today.

First, Christians should not expect to find in biblical revelation some kind of ideal or unchanging model of government (or the state) by which to evaluate their responsibility in contemporary reality. Nowhere in the Bible does God put forward an ideal of monarchy or republicanism or some other political system as the unchanging truth for our aspiration. The search for a divine ideal comes from the Greek tradition of philosophy, not from biblical revelation. What we do find in the Bible is instance after instance of instruction and example regarding God's normative demand of justice. God's command to do justice required different responses when Israel was wandering in the wilderness, or when it had entered Canaan, or when it was sent into exile. A modern state is quite different from an ancient empire, and the contemporary problems of urban culture, nuclear weapons, environmental destruction, and greatly expanded human populations will require responses different from those offered in the sixteenth or eleventh or fifth centuries after Christ. Rather than debate about competing ideals, Christians should turn to a critical assessment of their political traditions and ideologies in the light of a deeper understanding of biblical revelation about justice.

Second, the character of the modern state is a phenomenon that requires a thorough understanding of political and economic history, and thus the kind of education that we give our children is crucial. It is not possible to read passages from the OT or NT about “government” and then simply impose them on the contemporary situation without careful interpretation. The Roman world in which Christianity arose, for example, had a very limited notion of “citizenship.” Most people in that world were simply “subjects”—subject to a supposedly divine authority vested in the emperor. There were no political parties, no free newspapers, no separation of church and state. Most modern governments are tied to specific state constitutions and traditions of party or military government. The very idea of the state is relatively new, being unknown in the medieval period or even in ancient Greece, where the polis was more like a miniature religious kingdom than like a modern state. Without a grasp of the state’s character and the modern ideologies that shape it, we cannot begin to consider a biblical view of it.

And finally, we must consider in a fresh way the meaning of the contemporary “global village.” The world is rapidly becoming a closely interconnected network of communications systems, trade relations, military dangers, and environmental limits. The modern state system is itself showing its limits. Biblical revelation about the lordship of Christ over the whole earth, about the earth being God’s footstool, about the challenge to Christ’s sovereignty by Antichrist with a global design—all these dimensions of biblical revelation have direct bearing on the political life and governments of our day. The demand for justice is increasingly the demand for global justice, and Christians should be leading the way to an understanding of what the proper human stewardship of government means in response to Christ the King.

J. W. SKILLEN

Bibliography. R. H. Bainton, Christian Attitudes toward War and Peace; O. Cullmann, State in the New Testament; A. F. Holmes, ed., War and Christian Ethics; R. E. M. Irving, Christian Democratic Parties in Western Europe; R. Mouw, Politics and the Biblical Drama; H. E. Runner, Scriptural Religion and Political Task; T. G. Sanders, Protestant Concepts of Church and State; J. W. Skillen, ed., Christians Organizing for Political Service; Confessing Christ and Doing Politics; International Poli- tics and the Demand for Global Justice; W. Ullmann, Medieval Political Thought; J. H. Yoder, Politics of Jesus.

Government, Church. See CHURCH GOVERNMENT.

Government, Gift of. See SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

Governmental Theory of the Atonement. See ATONEMENT, THEORIES OF.

Grace. Like many other familiar terms, the word grace has a variety of connotations and nuances that need not be listed here. For the purposes of this article its meaning is that of undeserved blessing freely bestowed on humans by God—a concept that is at the heart not only of Christian theology but also of all genuinely Christian experience. In discussing the subject of grace, an important distinction must be maintained between common (general, universal) grace and special (saving, regenerating) grace if the relationship between divine grace and the human situation is to be rightly understood.

Common Grace. Common grace is so called because it is common to all humankind. Its benefits are experienced by the whole human race without discrimination between one person and another. The order of creation reflects the mind and the care of the Creator, who sustains what he has made. The eternal Son, through whom the universe was made, is “sustaining all things by his powerful word” (John 1:1–4; Heb. 1:2–3). God’s gracious provision for his creatures is seen in the sequence of the seasons, of seedtime and harvest. Thus, Jesus reminded his hearers that God “causes his sun to rise on the evil and the good, and sends rain on the righteous and the unrighteous” (Matt. 5:45). The Creator’s sustaining care for his creation is what is meant when we speak of divine providence.

Another aspect of common grace is evident in the divine government or control of human society. It is true that human society is in a state of sinful fallenness. Were it not for the restraining hand of God, indeed, our world would long since have degenerated into a self-destructive chaos of iniquity, in which social order and community life would have been an impossibility. That a measure of domestic, political, and international harmony is enjoyed by the generality of humankind is due to the overruling goodness of God. Paul actually teaches that civil government with its authorities is ordained by God and that to resist these authorities is to resist the ordinance of God. He even calls secular rulers and magistrates ministers of God, since their proper concern is the maintenance of order and decency in society. Insofar as they bear the sword for the punishment of wrongdoers in the interests of justice and peace, theirs is a God-given authority.

Grace

And, significantly, the state of which the apostle was proud to be a citizen was the pagan and at times persecuting state of imperial Rome, at the hands of whose rulers he would be put to death. (See Rom. 13:1–7.)

It is due, further, to common grace that one retains within himself or herself a consciousness of the difference between right and wrong, truth and falsehood, justice and injustice, and the awareness that one is answerable or accountable not merely to one's fellow persons but also and ultimately to God, the Maker. Humans in short, each have a conscience and are each endowed with the dignity of existing as a responsible being. One is duty-bound lovingly to obey God and to serve others. The conscience is the focus within each person, as a being formed in the image of God, not only of self-respect and of respect for others but of respect for God.

To common grace, then, we must thankfully attribute God's continuing care for his creation, as he provides for the needs of his creatures, restrains human society from becoming altogether intolerable and ungovernable, and makes it possible for humankind, though fallen, to live together in a generally orderly and cooperative manner, to show mutual forbearance, and to cultivate together the scientific, cultural, and economic pursuits of civilization.

Special Grace. Special grace is the grace by which God redeems, sanctifies, and glorifies his people. Unlike common grace, which is universally given, special grace is bestowed only on those whom God elects to eternal life through faith in his Son, our Savior Jesus Christ. It is to this special grace that the whole of the Christian's salvation is owed: "All this is from God, who reconciled us to himself through Christ," Paul writes of the believer's re-creation in Christ (2 Cor. 5:18). God's regenerating grace is dynamic. It not only saves but also transforms and revitalizes those whose lives were previously broken and meaningless. This is graphically illustrated by the experience of Saul the persecutor, who was dramatically changed into Paul the apostle, so that he was able to testify: "By the grace of God I am what I am, and his grace to me was not without effect. No, I worked harder than all of them [the other apostles]—yet not I, but the grace of God that was with me" (1 Cor. 15:10). All is thus ascribed to the grace of God, not merely the Christian's conversion but also the whole course of his ministry and pilgrimage. For the sake of convenience, the theme of special grace will now be developed under a number of customary theological heads or aspects, as prevenient, efficacious, irresistible, and sufficient.

Prevenient grace is grace that comes first. It precedes all human decision and endeavor. Grace always means that it is God who takes the initiative and implies the priority of God's action on behalf of needy sinners. That is the whole point of grace: it does not start with us, it starts with God; it is not earned or merited by us, it is freely and lovingly given to us who have no resources or deservings of our own. "This is love," John declares: "not that we loved God, but that he loved us and sent his Son as an atoning sacrifice for our sins"; consequently, "we love because he first loved us" (1 John 4:10, 19). God, in fact, showed his prior love for us by graciously providing this redemption precisely when we had no love for him: "God demonstrates his own love for us in this," says Paul: "While we were still sinners, Christ died for us," so that "when we were God's enemies, we were reconciled to him through the death of his Son" (Rom. 5:8, 10; cf. 2 Cor. 8:9). God took action, moreover, when we were powerless (Rom. 5:6), without any ability to help ourselves or to make any contribution toward our salvation. The sinner's state is one of spiritual death, that is to say, of total inability, and his only hope is the miracle of new birth from above (John 3:3). That is why the apostle reminds the Ephesian believers that salvation came to them when they were "dead" in sins, from which there follows only one conclusion, namely, that it is by grace that they were saved. Both now and for all eternity the Christian will be indebted to "the incomparable riches of [God's] grace, expressed in his kindness to us in Christ Jesus"; for, Paul insists, "by grace you have been saved, through faith—and this not from yourselves, it is the gift of God—not by works, so that no one can boast" (Eph. 2:5–9). But for the prevenience, or priority, of divine grace, all would be lost.

Efficacious grace is grace that effects the purpose for which it is given. It is efficacious simply because it is God's grace. What is involved here is the doctrine of God: what God purposes and performs cannot fail or come to nothing; otherwise he is not God. The indefectibility of redeeming grace is seen not only in the turning of sinners from darkness to light but also in the bringing of them to the consummation of eternal glory. "All that the Father gives me will come to me," Jesus declared; "and whoever comes to me I will never drive away. . . . And this is the will of him who sent me, that I shall lose none of all that he has given me, but raise them up at the last day" (John 6:37, 39; cf. 17:2, 6, 9, 12, 24). There is no power in all the universe that can undo or frustrate the work of God's special grace: "My sheep listen to my voice; I know them, and they follow me," says the Good Shepherd. "I give them eternal life, and they shall never perish; no one can snatch them out of my hand" (John 10:27–28). All, as we have seen, from beginning to end, is owed to the grace of Almighty God (2 Cor. 5:18, 21). The whole of our redemption is already achieved and sealed in Christ: "For those God foreknew he also predestined to be conformed to the likeness of his Son. . . . And those whom he predestined, he also called; those he called, he also justified; those he justified, he also glorified" (Rom. 8:29–30). That the grace of God in Christ Jesus is efficacious, that it achieves now and for evermore the redemption it was designed to achieve, should be a source of the utmost confidence, strength, and security to Christians. The fact that "God's solid foundation stands firm, sealed with this inscription: 'The Lord knows those who are his'" (2 Tim. 2:19), should fill Christians with unshakable assurance. Since the grace of redemption is the grace of God, we may be absolutely certain "that he who began a good work in you will carry it on to completion until the day of Christ Jesus" (Phil. 1:6). God's special grace is never in vain (1 Cor. 15:10).

Irresistible grace is grace that cannot be rejected. The conception of the irresistibility of special grace is closely bound up with what has been said above concerning the efficacious nature of that grace. As the work of God always achieves the effect toward which it is directed, so also it cannot be resisted or thrust aside. No doubt it is true that most persons blindly struggle against the redemptive grace of God at first, just as Saul of Tarsus fought against the goads of his conscience (Acts 26:14); subsequently, however, he understood that God had not only called him through his grace but had set him apart before he was born (Gal. 1:15), indeed that those who are Christ's were chosen in him before the foundation of the world (Eph. 1:4). As creation was irresistibly effected through the all-powerful word and will of God, so also the new creation in Christ is irresistibly effected through that same all-powerful word and will. The Creator God is one and the same with the Redeemer God. This in effect is what Paul is affirming when he writes: "For God, who said, 'Let light shine out of darkness' [that is, at creation; Gen. 1:3–5], made his light shine in our hearts to give us the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Christ [that is, in the new creation]" (2 Cor. 4:6). The regenerating work of God in the believing heart, precisely again because it is God's work, can no more be resisted than it can come to nothing.

Sufficient grace is grace that is adequate for the saving of the believer here and now and hereafter to all eternity. As with the other aspects of special grace, its sufficiency flows from the infinite power and goodness of God. Those who draw near to him through Christ he saves "fully and completely" (Heb. 7:25 Phillips). The cross is the only place of forgiveness and reconciliation, and it is fully so; for the blood of Jesus shed there for us cleanses from all sin and from all unrighteousness (1 John 1:7, 9), and he is the propitiation not for our sins only but also "for the sins of the whole world" (1 John 2:2). Moreover, as we face the trials and afflictions of this present life, the Lord's grace continues to be unfailingly sufficient for us (2 Cor. 12:9). He has promised, "I will never fail you nor forsake you." "So," the author of the Letter to the Hebrews points out, "we say with confidence, 'The Lord is my helper; I will not be afraid. What can man do to me?'" (Heb. 13:5–6; cf. Ps. 118:6).

The fact that many who hear the call of the gospel fail to respond to it with repentance and faith, and continue in their unbelief, does not imply that there is any insufficiency in Christ's atoning sacrifice of himself on the cross. The fault rests entirely with them, and they are condemned because of their own unbelief (John 3:18). It is inappropriate to speak of divine grace in terms of quantity, as though it were sufficient only for those whom God justifies, or as though for its sufficiency to exceed these limits would mean a wastage of grace and to that extent an invalidation of Christ's self-offering. God's grace is boundless. How could it be anything else, seeing it is the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, God himself incarnate? That is why it is all-sufficient. No matter how much we draw from it, the river of divine grace is always full of water (Ps. 65:9). Quantitative notions of God's saving grace make the universal offer of the gospel unreal for those who reject it and leave them rejecting something that is not even there for them to reject. And this in turn leaves no ground for their condemnation as unbelievers (John 3:18). More biblical is the distinction that has been propounded between the sufficiency and the efficiency (or efficaciousness) of special grace (though it would be foolish to imagine that this dissolves the mystery of God's gracious dealings with his creatures), according to which this grace is sufficient for all but efficient (or efficacious) only for those whom God justifies by faith.

It is important always to remember that the operation of God's grace is a deep mystery that is far beyond our limited human comprehension. God does not treat people as though they were puppets with no mind or will of their own. Our human dignity as responsible persons under God is never violated or despised. How could it be, since this dignity is itself given by God? By Christ's command the gospel of divine grace is freely proclaimed throughout the whole world (Matt. 28:19; Acts 1:8). Those who turn away from it do so of their own choice and stand self-condemned as lovers of darkness rather than light (John 3:19, 36). Those who thankfully receive it do so in full personal responsibility (John 1:12; 3:16), but then they give all the praise to God because their whole redemption is, in some wonderful way, due entirely to the grace of God and not at all to themselves. Confronted with this marvelous but mysterious reality, we can do no more than exclaim with Paul: "Oh, the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God!

Grace

How unsearchable his judgments, and his paths beyond tracing out! . . . For from him and through him and to him are all things. To him be the glory forever! Amen” (Rom. 11:33, 36).

P. E. HUGHES

See also GRACE, MEANS OF.

Bibliography. H. W. Cassirer, Grace and Law: St. Paul, Kant, and the Hebrew Prophets; A. C. Clifford, Atonement and Justification: English Evangelical Theology 1640–1790; H. Conzelmann and W. Zimmerli, TDNT 9:372–415; H. H. Esser, NIDNTT 2:115–24; E. Jauncey, Doctrine of Grace; J. Moffatt, Grace in the New Testament; C. H. Pinnock, Grace of God, the Will of Man: A Case for Arminianism; C. R. Smith, Biblical Doctrine of Grace; T. F. Torrance, Doctrine of Grace in the Apostolic Fathers; P. S. Watson, Concept of Grace; N. P. Williams, Grace of God.

Grace, Means of. The means of grace, or media through which grace may be received, are various. The primary means of grace is that of Holy Scripture, from which our whole knowledge of the Christian faith is derived and the chief purpose of which is to communicate to us the saving grace of the gospel of Jesus Christ (John 20:31; 2 Tim. 3:15). Preaching, which is the proclamation of the dynamic truth of the gospel, is, as the teaching and practice of Christ himself and his apostles show, a means of grace of the utmost importance (Luke 24:47; Acts 1:8; Rom. 1:16; 10:11–15; 1 Cor. 1:17–18, 23). Similarly, personal witness and evangelism are means for bringing the grace of the gospel to others.

If the above are essentially means of saving grace, there are also means of continuing or strengthening grace. The exposition of Holy Scripture for the instruction and edification of Christian believers is one such means, as also is the private study of the Bible. Another is prayer, in which the Christian communes with God, experiences his presence, and opens himself to his purpose and his power. Another is fellowship with other Christians in worship and witness. And yet another is participation in the sacrament of the breaking of bread, which Christ instituted and commanded his followers to observe (Acts 2:42).

It is of particular importance that the means of grace should be rightly received, and to be rightly received they must be received with faith and gratitude; otherwise, instead of being means of grace, they become means of condemnation. Thus, the purpose of Christ's coming was not to judge but to save the world. The person, however, who in unbelief rejects Christ and his teaching is not saved but judged by Christ (John 12:47–48). The gospel must not only be heard; it must also be believed (John 5:24; Rom. 10:9–14; 1 John 5:13).

Similarly, the sacrament of the breaking of bread (known also as the Lord's Supper, Holy Communion, or the Eucharist) was instituted by Christ as a means of grace, and it is indeed such to all who thankfully receive it with faith in the Savior who died for sinners on the cross. Such persons truly eat Christ's flesh and drink his blood (John 6:35, 52–58). But those who receive in an unworthy manner are “guilty of sinning against the body and blood of the Lord,” and to them the sacrament becomes a means of condemnation, so that, in receiving it, they eat and drink judgment upon themselves (1 Cor. 11:27–29). Accordingly, it is erroneous to imagine that this sacrament—or for that matter, baptism, or the hearing of the gospel, or church attendance—is automatically a means of grace to any who partake of it, without regard to their disposition of faith or unbelief, as though the mere reception sufficed to guarantee the imparting of grace. That is why Paul speaks of the ministers of the gospel as being, in their witness and in their suffering, those who spread the fragrance of the knowledge of Christ—fragrance, however, which to those who are perishing through unbelief is “the smell of death,” while to those who are being saved through faith it is “the fragrance of life” (2 Cor. 2:14–16).

P. E. HUGHES

See also BAPTISM; GRACE; LORD'S SUPPER.

Grain Offering. See OFFERINGS AND SACRIFICES IN BIBLE TIMES.

Great Awakenings. The theological significance of America's first two Great Awakenings lies in the effect that intense revivalism had upon the shape of Christian thinking. The First Great Awakening (ca. 1735–43) is associated with the labors of the Dutch Reformed clergyman Theodore Frelinghuysen, the Presbyterian Gilbert Tennent, the Congregationalist Jonathan Edwards, and especially the itinerant Anglican George Whitefield—all Calvinists whose theological commitments provided a definite shape for their work. The Second Great Awakening (ca. 1795–1830) was more diffuse, with origins in the frontier west under the leadership of Methodist, Baptist, and Presbyterian itinerants, and in the settled East with the Congregational ministers of New England and the special efforts of Yale President Timothy Dwight. The culminating theological figures of the Second Great Awakening were Yale divinity professor Nathaniel William Taylor, the driving organizational genius Lyman Beecher, and the dominant evangelist Charles Grandison Finney—all men who were far less Calvinistic than leaders of the earlier awakening and more closely attuned to the democratic assumptions of the new United States.

The soteriology of the First Awakening was exemplified in the practice of George Whitefield and the thought of Jonathan Edwards. Whitefield regularly preached that salvation belonged completely to God and that humans did not possess the natural capacity to turn to Christ apart from God's saving call. A Connecticut farmer, Nathan Cole, described what such preaching was like when he went to hear Whitefield on October 23, 1740: "My hearing him preach gave me a heart wound; by God's blessing, my old Foundation was broken up, and I saw that my righteousness would not save me; then I was convinced of the doctrine of Election: and went right to quarrelling with God about it; because that all I could do would not save me; and he had decreed from eternity who should be saved and who not."

Edwards provided a more systematic exposition of Augustinian and Calvinistic views in his many theological works. His Freedom of Will (1754) argued that the "will" was an expression of the whole person that always followed the heart's strongest motive. Original Sin (1758) showed how the heart's ultimate motives were selfish and turned from God because of humanity's participation in Adam's fall, until God's sovereign grace brought about a change in the heart. His Religious Affections (1746) suggested that true spirituality was an overflow of the redeemed heart and not a product of emotional or willful exertion. Edwards's rejuvenation of a basically Calvinistic soteriology was the longest-lived theological result of the First Awakening.

The First Awakening also influenced theologies of the church and of society. Under Edwards's leadership many New England Congregationalists and middle colony Presbyterians moved toward an ideal of a "pure church," the conviction that only professed believers should participate in the Lord's Supper or take their places as full members of a local congregation. This conviction, which grew out of the revival's heightened sense for the purity and holiness of God, overturned the Halfway Covenant and the yet more liberal ecclesiology of Edwards's grandfather, Solomon Stoddard, who had invited virtually all in a community to the Lord's Supper. The First Awakening had other ecclesiological effects, for it stimulated the efforts of Separate Congregationalists and Baptists to organize churches that were entirely distinct from New England governments. Edwards and the New Light party that shared his ideas did not feel that such a step was necessary, but Baptists and Separate Congregationalists believed that Edwards's own preaching on the church led inevitably in that direction.

The First Awakening also brought to an end the Puritan conception of society as a beneficial union of ecclesiastical and public life. The leaders of the Awakening called for purity in the churches, even if it meant destroying Puritanism's historically close association between church and state. On the other hand, opponents of the Great Awakening valued that connection so highly that they were willing to dilute the church's spiritual requirements to preserve the bond. The result was a series of competing theologies of public life, no one of which enjoyed the general acceptance of the older Puritan synthesis.

In the years between 1740 and 1800 the theology of the First Awakening underwent considerable change. In the first place, the heirs of Jonathan Edwards modified his thought to bring it closer to the Enlightenment principles of fairness, justice, and equity that became so important in America. More important, however, was the effect of the American Revolution. The warfare and public disruption of the times were difficult for the churches. But the revolution's assumptions about human values posed even more difficulties for traditional Calvinism. The patriotic spirit encouraged more confidence in human capacities, less willingness to concede an absolute sovereignty to any being, including God, and a greater optimism about the human ability to overcome the evils of personal and public life.

The Second Great Awakening stimulated religious life on an unprecedented scale at the turn of the nineteenth century and beyond. It breathed new life into exhausted denominations and provided the impetus for the creation of many newer bodies. It also had important theological consequences for ideas of salvation, church, and society.

Particularly in the work of Nathaniel Taylor the soteriology of the Second Awakening moved away from that of Whitefield and Edwards. Taylor's conviction that individuals always possessed a "power to the contrary" when facing moral choices led him to a full belief in human free will. While Edwards and Whitefield had stressed the inability of sinful people to save themselves in order to preserve God's sovereignty in salvation, Taylor and the leading revivalists on the frontier tended to stress more the ability God had bestowed on all people to come to Christ. This more Arminian approach to salvation received reinforcement from the increasing influence of Methodists in American life, even though many of the early American Methodists did not express quite the confidence in native human capacities that Taylor or Finney did. Taylor's soteriology was partially grounded in psychology, the conviction that the will was an independent arbiter that chose among options presented to it by the mind and emotions. A reading of Scripture that was shaped by the Scottish philosophy of common sense and its presuppositions concerning innate human ability also influenced Taylor's view of salvation.

The Second Awakening also had a great impact on ecclesiology. Under the libertarian influence of the Revolutionary age, individual Christians insisted that the Bible and the Bible only, free from traditional interpretations, was the standard for organizing churches. So it was that following the Bible only, Disciples, Free Will Baptists, Calvinistic Methodists, Universalists, "Christians," and other new groups employed private interpretation of Scripture to break from historical denominations and start their own. The more democratic spirit of the early United States also lay behind the great success of voluntarism. Voluntary societies, separate from the denominations and organized for a specific goal, were a product of the Second Awakening's energetic efforts to Christianize and reform America. The theology of the church that underlay this voluntarism took seriously the universal spiritual unity of the church but did not have as much room for the place of systematic theology or cohesive Christian thinking in the church.

Great Awakenings

Finally, the Second Awakening contributed to a theology of society that emphasized the potential of America and the promise of a millennial hope. As a result of the many conversions, the widespread revivals, and the great success of voluntary societies, many American Christians felt that God had poured special blessings on the United States. This vision nerved Christians to great feats of Christian service, due in no small part to the conviction that such a special outpouring of God's Spirit was a herald for the end of the age.

America's two early awakenings were more important as theological events than were later revivals in the United States. The First Awakening stimulated a brief revival of Calvinism, which, especially in the works of Jonathan Edwards, has been a fruitful source of study ever since. The Second Awakening was even more important, for it encouraged a revivalistic, aggressive, democratic theology that shaped all American Protestantism through the 1870s, provided one of the major sources of fundamentalism, and contributed an enduring legacy to modern evangelicalism.

M. A. NOLL

See also DWIGHT, TIMOTHY; EDWARDS, JONATHAN; FINNEY, CHARLES GRANDISON; HALFWAY COVENANT; NEW ENGLAND THEOLOGY; REVIVALISM; STODDARD, SOLOMON; TAYLOR, NATHANIEL WILLIAM; WHITEFIELD, GEORGE.

Bibliography. J. B. Boles, Great Revival, 1787–1805; C. Cherry, Theology of Jonathan Edwards; F. H. Foster, Genetic History of the New England Theology; E. S. Gaustad, Great Awakening in New England; J. Gillies, Historical Collections of Accounts of Revival; J. Haroutunian, Piety Versus Moralism: The Passing of the New England Theology; N. O. Hatch, Sacred Cause of Liberty: Republican Religion and the Millennium in Revolutionary New England; D. G. Mathews, "The Second Great Awakening as an Organizing Process, 1780–1830," AQ 21:23–43; P. Miller and A. Heimert, eds., Great Awakening: Documents Illustrating the Crisis and Its Consequences; I. H. Murray, Revival and Revivalism: The Making and Marring of American Revivalism, 1750–1858; H. S. Smith, Changing Conceptions of Original Sin: A Study of American Theology Since 1750.

Great Commission. This biblical injunction embodies the command of the Lord to carry and proclaim his gospel to all nations. Both the OT (Isa. 45:22; cf. Gen. 12:3) and NT (Matt. 9:37–38; 28:19; Acts 1:8) teach this. The message to be carried includes the historical events of the incarnate Christ's life, particularly his crucifixion (1 Cor. 15:3; Col. 2:14–15), his resurrection and ascension (Luke 24:46–48; Rom. 4:25; 1 Cor. 15:3–4; Eph. 1:20–23), and his second coming (Acts 3:19–21).

The love that Christ poured out for his people in his death and resurrection (2 Cor. 5:14–21) is the motive for proclaiming the gospel. He who is the author of life (Acts 3:15) and the Lord of glory (1 Cor. 2:8) and the one who has all authority in heaven and on earth commands his people to go and make disciples of all nations (Matt. 28:18–19).

Christ is the great example of carrying out the commission. He went around doing good (Acts 10:38), proclaiming his message of redemption (Mark 10:45), and seeking and saving the lost (Luke 19:10). Just as he taught and preached the good news of the kingdom (Matt. 4:23), so his disciples should teach and proclaim Jesus and his resurrection (Acts 4:2).

This gospel is to be carried to all peoples, starting from Jerusalem and Judea and nearby Samaria and extending to the ends of the earth (Luke 24:47–48; Acts 1:8). The message is for all kinds of people, first for the Jew (Acts 2:5–11) and then for the Gentile (Acts 13:46; Rom. 1:16). The message of the commission, seen applied from the time of the fall of Adam (Gen. 3:15; 4:26) through the period before the cross (Rom. 3:25; Gal. 3:8–9), is to be proclaimed throughout this present age to the second coming of Christ (Matt. 24:14).

The Holy Spirit's indwelling and power are essential for the commission to be effective (Luke 24:49; Acts 1:8), for it is the Holy Spirit who convicts of sin (John 16:8), who is the author of regeneration (Titus 3:5), and who enables people to confess Jesus as Lord (1 Cor. 12:3).

The method in carrying out the Great Commission involves preaching (2 Tim. 4:2) and teaching the Word (Matt. 28:20), with accompanying good works extended to all people (Acts 9:36; Gal. 6:9–10; Eph. 2:10) for the glory of God (1 Cor. 10:31).

W. H. MARE

Bibliography. I. W. Batdorf, IDB 1:663; D. M. Howard, Great Commission Today; J. H. Kane, ZPEB 1:927–28; N. Lewis, Priority One: What God Wants; K. H. Rengstorf, TDNT 4:461.

Great Schism. See SCHISM, GREAT.

Great Tribulation. See TRIBULATION.

Grebel, Conrad (ca. 1498–1526). Organizer of the first Free Church congregation. He was born in Zurich, at that time a solidly Roman Catholic city. It is believed that young Grebel studied at the Latin School called the Carolina from his eighth to his sixteenth year. He then attended the University of Basel in 1514–15; the University of Vienna in 1515–18 (with a royal scholarship his wealthy father extracted from the Austrian emperor); and finally the University of Paris in 1518–20 (this time with a royal scholarship from the king of France). He later secured a papal grant to attend the University of Pisa, but this plan fell through. He was a brilliant humanist scholar, knew Greek, wrote Latin well, but lived a secular and rather wild life. In 1521 he came to know and love ardently a girl named Barbara, and in spite of the vigorous opposition of his parents, he married her on February 6, 1522, while his father was out of the city.

Grebel had long been an admirer of Zwingli and was in the inner circle of humanist scholars who gathered around the Zurich Reformer. Some months after his marriage, Grebel was converted to the gospel of God's free grace, coupled with earnest discipleship, as taught by Zwingli. At first Grebel was an earnest and enthusiastic disciple of Zwingli, but by the fall of 1523 he had grown critical of Zwingli for his allowing the Zurich Council of the "200" to determine the tempo of the Reformation. And by the fall of 1524 Grebel had developed the major features of his own theological position. He and his followers (now called Mennonites) held to sola Scriptura with warmth; the Free Church concept; believer's baptism; a life of earnest obedience to the NT (called Christian discipleship); the rejection of the civil oath on the word of Christ; the rejection of all force and violence, including participation in the military; the concept of a suffering church coupled with the "believer's cross"; a simple and plain meetinghouse; religious toleration (no persecution of religious nonconformists); and the saved status of infants and children without any baptismal ceremony.

Grebel founded the first modern Free Church and inaugurated believer's baptism on January 21, 1525, after he and his followers faced fines and imprisonment for disrupting the religious unity of Zurich's new evangelical religious movement under Zwingli. He spent some time in prison, evangelized earnestly in northern Switzerland, and died of the plague in the summer of 1526, a year and a half after founding his biblicist church.

J. C. WENGER

See also MENNONITES; ZWINGLI, ULRICH.

Bibliography. H. S. Bender, Conrad Grebel; J. L. Ruth, Conrad Grebel of Zurich; J. C. Wenger, Conrad Grebel's Programmatic Letters.

Gregory I the Great (540–604). Pope whose papacy is generally considered the beginning of the medieval period. Gregory was born to a wealthy and pious Roman family. About the age of thirty he was appointed urban prefect of Rome; shortly afterward he resigned to devote himself to religious works. With his inherited wealth he established seven monasteries, including one on his family estate in Rome, which he entered as a monk. In 577 he became one of the seven deacons responsible for administering the Roman Church. Two years later he became papal nuncio to Constantinople, the most important diplomatic assignment in the church. Upon returning to Rome a few years later, he resumed monastic life but in 590 was elected to the papacy.

Gregory is especially significant for his role in increasing the power and authority of the papacy. He firmly believed the Roman pope was Peter's sole successor and therefore supreme head of the universal church, a view not accepted in some areas. In numerous ecclesiastical disputes he asserted the papacy's supremacy over the whole church. His efforts were not always successful, but by his death the authority of the papal office had been greatly enhanced. Equally significant was Gregory's assertion of political authority for the papacy. Italy was in turmoil due to the expansion of the Lombards. The emperor in Constantinople paid little heed to Italy's pleas for assistance, and Gregory, fearing that Rome would be overrun if he did not take action, became deeply involved in counteracting the Lombard threat. His actions foreshadowed the political involvements of later medieval popes.

A different side of Gregory's character is seen in his pastoral and evangelistic concerns. He strongly believed that the church must never lose sight of the spiritual needs of individuals. He vastly increased the benevolent work of the church, supported in large part by his careful administration of vast estates owned by the church. His practical book on pastoral care, Pastoral Rule, had enormous influence for centuries. He also exhibited a deep concern for the evangelization of unbelievers. In 596 he commissioned Augustine of Canterbury to bring the Christian faith to England. He also encouraged missionary efforts among Jews, although he rejected forced conversions.

Theologically Gregory owed much to his study of the church fathers, especially Augustine. He held a high view of Scripture as the Word of God, emphasizing its importance not only for doctrinal truth but for individual spiritual nourishment. At the same time his teachings included many elements that would become standard in later Roman Catholic theology, including the sacrificial nature of the Mass and the dogma of purgatory.

J. N. AKERS

See also PAPACY.

Bibliography. P. Batiffol, St. Gregory the Great; C. Butler, Western Mysticism; B. Colgrave, Earliest Life

Gregory I the Great

of Gregory the Great; F. H. Dudden, Gregory the Great; G. R. Evans, Thought of Gregory the Great; F. W. Kellest, Pope Gregory the Great and His Relation with Gaul; N. Sharkey, St. Gregory the Great's Concept of Papal Power; A. Snow, St. Gregory the Great; C. E. Straw, Gregory the Great: Perfection in Imperfection.

Gregory of Nazianzus. (ca. 329–ca. 389). One of the Cappadocian fathers, Gregory was born of aristocratic Christian parents near Nazianzus, where his father, also named Gregory, was bishop. In Athens he studied rhetoric with Basil, the future bishop of Caesarea, and Julian, the future emperor. Soon after his return to Nazianzus (ca. 358), Gregory, at Basil's invitation, assumed the monastic life in Pontus. Here he collaborated with Basil in the preparation of the Philocalia (selections from the writings of Origen) and the Moralia (monastic rules). Ordained priest against his will (ca. 362), Gregory assisted his father in Nazianzus until the latter's death in 374. Soon thereafter Gregory sought the monastic life at Seleucia in Isauria (375). Basil, in a jurisdictional dispute, had earlier (372) prevailed upon Gregory to accept the bishopric at Sasima, an insignificant village in Cappadocia. Gregory, however, never assumed his duties there.

In 379 Gregory took charge of the small Nicene community in Constantinople. His eloquent sermons in the Church of the Resurrection, which gave him the name "the theologian," were instrumental in defeating Arianism and establishing the Nicene confession in Christ's full deity as orthodox. During the Council of Constantinople (381) Gregory was elected bishop of Constantinople, but he resigned when his election was disputed. He retired to Nazianzus and then to his estate at Arianzus, where he died.

Gregory's Orations constitute his most significant writings. Of these, the five "Theological Orations" (Orat. 27–31), preached at Constantinople in 380, are the best known. In them Gregory defends the divinity of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Oration 2 is a treatise on the priesthood, which influenced John Chrysostom's On the Priesthood and Gregory I's Pastoral Rule. Of his many letters, two (101 and 102) are important treatises against Apollinaris. The Councils of Ephesus (431) and Chalcedon (451) adopted Epistle 101 as a statement of orthodoxy. Some four hundred poems are also extant.

Theologically Gregory's significance lies in his clarification of the trinitarian and christological doctrines. While maintaining against the Arians the essential unity of the three divine persons and therefore their equality, Gregory provided the terminology necessary to express the real distinctions between Father, Son, and Spirit, thereby safeguarding the Trinity from Sabellian tendencies. The distinctive property of each person refers to the origin of each: the Father is unbe-gotten (agenēsia), the Son is begotten (gennēsia), the Spirit proceeds (ekporeusis). Against the Apollinarian denial of Christ's human soul Gregory insisted upon the complete manhood of Christ, for salvation is incomplete if the Son's incarnation is incomplete. Salvation is essentially deification, the complete participation of human nature in the divine; therefore, in Christ there must be two complete natures inseparably united in one person.

W. C. WEINRICH

See also BASIL THE GREAT; CAPPADOCIAN FATHERS; GREGORY OF NYSSA.

Bibliography. T. R. Martland, "A Study of Cappadocian and Augustinian Trinitarian Methodology," ATR 47:252–63; J. F. Mitchell, "Consolatory Letters in Basil and Gregory Nazianzen," Hermes 96:299–318; H. Musurillo, "The Poetry of Gregory of Nazianzus," Thought 45:45–55; B. Otis, "The Throne and the Mountain: An Essay on St. Gregory Nazianzus," CJ 56:146–65; J. Pelikan, Christianity and Classical Culture; R. R. Ruether, Gregory of Nazianzus; H. von Campenhausen, Fathers of the Greek Church; J. W. C. Wand, Dortons and Councils.

Gregory of Nyssa (ca. 335–ca. 394). One of the Cappadocian fathers, Gregory was born into a famous Christian family (father, Basil the elder; sister, St. Macrina; brothers, Basil of Caesarea and Peter of Sebaste). Although educated for the church's service, he chose a career in rhetoric, and he may have married. If so, upon his wife's death, Gregory retired to Basil's monastery in Pontus, where he dedicated himself to asceticism and theological study. In 372 Basil, wishing to strengthen the orthodox position in Cappadocia, consecrated Gregory bishop of Nyssa. Arian opposition, aided by the emperor Valens, led to Gregory's removal from Nyssa (376), but he triumphantly returned upon Valens's death (378). At the Council of Constantinople (381) Gregory vigorously defended the Nicene cause, and Emperor Theodosius I named him a standard of orthodoxy and touchstone of ecclesiastical fellowship in Pontus. Little is known of Gregory's later life, although on occasion he was in Constantinople—to preach funeral orations for Princess Pulcheria (385) and Empress Flacilla (386) and to attend a council there (394).

Theological controversy determined much of Gregory's writing. His Against Eunomius represents a detailed refutation of Arianism's subordination of the Word. In To Ablabius Gregory defends the trinitarian doctrine against tritheistic misinterpretations. He argues against Apollinaris for a full incarnation in the treatise Antirrheticus. Gregory's Catechetical Oration presents a systematic treatment of Christian doctrine for the instruction of catechumens. His exegetical works show the influence of Origen's allegorical method and include Life of Moses and homilies on the Song of Songs, Ecclesiastes, the Lord's Prayer, and the Beatitudes. Gregory's On Virginity and Life of St. Macrina are classics of Christian asceticism. Sermons, orations, and letters also remain.

Gregory ensured the triumph of Nicene orthodoxy by his detailed working out of Basil's distinction between ousia, the Godhead in which Father, Son, and Spirit share, and hypostasis, the individuality of each. The distinction between divine persons is maintained by their immanent mutual relations, while the true unity is seen by the oneness of attributes and external operation. A clear distinction between the two natures in Christ characterizes Gregory's Christology. He held the idea of the communication of attributes and the status of Mary as theotokos. Gregory's debt to Origen is visible in his universalist belief in the salvation of all things (apokatastasis), although he rejected Origen's view of the soul's pre-existence. Gregory's anthropology was an important contribution to Christian mysticism. Created in God's image, a person's soul is like unto God's nature, enabling one intuitively to know God and through purification to become like God.

W. C. WEINRICH

See also BASIL THE GREAT; CAPPADOCIAN FATHERS; CONSTANTINOPLE, FIRST COUNCIL OF; GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS.

Bibliography. J. F. Callaghan, "Greek Philosophy and the Cappadocian Cosmology," DOP 12:31-57; H. F. Cherniss, Platonism of Gregory of Nyssa; A. S. Dunstone, Atonement in Gregory of Nyssa; T. A. Goggin, Times of Saint Gregory of Nyssa as Reflected in the Letters and the Contra Eunomium; R. E. Heine, Perfection in the Virtuous Life: A Study in the Relationship between Edification and Polemical Theology in Gregory of Nyssa's De vita Moysis; J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines; G. B. Ladner, "The Philosophical Anthropology of St. Gregory of Nyssa," DOP 12:59-94; J. Pelikan, Christianity and Classical Culture; J. Quasten, Patrology; J. H. Srawley, "St. Gregory of Nyssa on the Sinlessness of Christ," JTS 7:434-41; H. von Campenhausen, Fathers of the Greek Church.

Gregory Palamas (1296-1359). Greek Orthodox mystic and theologian. Born and educated in Constantinople, in 1318 he entered the monastic life at Mt. Athos in Greece, where he became known for his asceticism and his emphasis on mystical exercises. After periods at several other monasteries, he returned to Mt. Athos in 1331 and began the first of his numerous writings. In 1347 he was appointed archbishop of Thessalonica, a position he held until his death.

Palamas is best known for his pivotal role in the hesychast controversy, which had lasting effects on Eastern Christianity. The hesychast ("quiet") movement stressed certain spiritual exercises, which, hesychasts contended, brought one into communion with the divine light that had shone on the Mount of Transfiguration. While the concept of mystical communion with the divine light had appeared in Eastern Christianity before, the hesychasts raised it to greater significance. Their practices included inducing a trancelike state by holding the breath and gazing intently at the navel. The movement was centered at Mt. Athos, and Palamas was its most noted advocate.

The hesychasts were attacked by Barlaam, a former Roman Catholic monk who had joined the Greek Church. He and his supporters mocked the practices of the hesychasts and contended that the theology of mystical communion with God was faulty because God could not be known directly. Palamas answered that communion with the divine light was not equivalent to communion with the essence of God; the divine light was an activity of God that was inseparable from God and proceeded from him, but was not his essence.

The controversy was examined by a series of synods that eventually affirmed the views of Palamas. The Greek Church thus rejected the scholasticism of the Roman Church and established the emphasis on the mystical vision of the divine light that has been part of Greek Orthodox theology since then.

J. N. AKERS

See also HESYCHASM; MYSTICISM; ORTHODOX TRADITION; PHILOKALIA.

Bibliography. G. Palamas, Triads; V. Lossky, Mystical Theology of the Eastern Church; J. Meyendorff, Byzantine Legacy in the Orthodox Church; St. Gregory Palamas and Orthodox Spirituality; Study of Gregory Palamas; G. C. Papademetriou, Introduction to St. Gregory Palamas.

Griffith Thomas, William Henry (1861-1924). Anglican scholar and theologian. Griffith Thomas was born in Oswestry, Shropshire, England, on June 2, 1861, where he grew up in difficult circumstances with his grandfather, relating only incidentally with his widowed mother. On March 23, 1878, he had a remarkable conversion experience, similar to Wesley and Augustine, about which he said, "My soul was simply overflowing with joy, and since then I have never doubted that it was on that Saturday night that I was born again, converted to God."

While working with an uncle in Clerkenwell, he attended King's College, London, where he became a lifelong friend of theologian Henry Wace. He was ordained a deacon in the Church of England in 1885 and in 1889 was appointed senior curate at St. Aldate's Church, Oxford, where he ministered for seven years. It was at Oxford that Griffith Thomas finished his academic training (B.D., 1895; D.D., 1905). From 1896 to 1905 he served at St. Paul's, Portman Square, London, where he published Methods of Bible Study (1902) and Catholic Faith (1904). He became professor of Old Testament literature and exegesis, later, in 1910, also of systematic theology, at Wycliffe College, Toronto, where he ministered until his death on June 2, 1924. He traveled and lectured extensively throughout the world and delivered the Stone Lectures at Princeton Theological Seminary at the invitation of B. B. Warfield, published as Holy Spirit of God (1913). In 1924 he, Lewis Sperry Chafer, and A. B. Winchester cofounded the Evangelical Theological College (later Dallas Theological Seminary), but he died before he could assume the post of Professor of Theology. Griffith Thomas wrote extensively in journals, magazines, and books, and his concern was to create “a deeper love and desire for God as revealed in His Word” in his readers. To achieve this end, he wrote scholarly works in simple terms so that he could be understood. His books are singularly lacking in heavy academic jargon.

Griffith Thomas, William Henry

Thirteen of Griffith Thomas’s major works are still in print, the most significant being Principles of Theology: An Introduction to the Thirty-nine Articles (1930; reprinted 1979), a work that was complete upon his death in 1924 but not published until later.

Acknowledging his debt to E. A. Litton and T. P. Boulton, Griffith Thomas moves through the Thirty-Nine Articles expounding the faith in simple, nontechnical terms. He believed that “by historical and theological right real Anglicanism is evangelicalism in a pure form.” In introducing the articles, Griffith Thomas placed heavy stress on the doctrine of revelation. His conviction was that “no ministry can ever be of service to men which does not start here, in the definite, conscious, blessed possession of the Word of God.” Indeed, when he was ordained in 1885, Frederick Temple charged him to read from his Greek New Testament daily, which he did, a chapter a day, for the rest of his life.

The Thirty-Nine Articles to Griffith Thomas were not just ideas. He said about them, “It is essential to remember that theology is not merely a matter of intellect, but also of experience. Theology is concerned with spiritual realities and must include experience, as well as ideas.” All of this was to be understood christologically, because to Griffith Thomas Christianity is Christ—he wrote a book with that title in 1909. His exposition is typically evangelical and Anglican with two distinctive doctrinal twists—he adopts a moderate dispensational, pretribulational premillennialism and follows a “Keswick” line on the doctrine of sanctification.

The highest tribute that could be paid to a churchman was spoken by James M. Gray shortly after Griffith Thomas’s death— “[Griffith Thomas] was a man of God who always and everywhere lived the life he professed.”

W. A. ELWELL

Bibliography. M. G. Clark, William Henry Griffith Thomas (1861–1964): Minister, Scholar, Teacher; T. H. Cragoe, HET 67–82; J. M. Gray, “What Dr. Griffith Thomas Meant to Us,” Sunday School Times, June 28, 1924.

Groningen Theology. A theological movement that takes its name from the theological faculty of the University of Groningen in the city of that name in the Netherlands. About 1830 four young men were appointed professors of theology at Groningen. Led by Petrus Hofstede de Groot, they were strongly influenced by (1) a stream of mysticism that had run through the Dutch church for centuries, (2) the Platonism taught by the brilliant philosopher and teacher at Utrecht, Philip Willem van Heusde, and (3) Dutch nationalism. Convinced that much of the earlier theology and life of the church was out of touch with the needs of the day, these men believed that a “new construction was necessary,” that they should devote themselves to the task, and that they should be guided in their efforts by the NT. They met together each Friday to read the NT and in 1835 began a theological society in which they were joined by others. In 1837 the society was holding monthly meetings, began the publication of a periodical, Waarheid in Liefde (Truth in Love), and found its influence spreading rapidly. In 1855 Hofstede de Groot published De Groninger Godgeleerden in hunne eigenaardigheid (Groningen Theologians in Their Distinctiveness), in which the twenty-five years of service he and his colleagues had given the University of Groningen was celebrated. By then the Groninger Theologie had come to be known as a distinct school of thought in the life of the nation.

Its central doctrine was that God had revealed himself in all of creation and supremely in Jesus Christ so that humankind may be conformed to his image. While God had been active among all men and women, his work is seen especially in Israel and in the life of Jesus. With little regard for the orthodox Christology of the church, with its insistence that Jesus is both God and man, the Groningen theology emphasized God’s revelation in Jesus as an example to be followed. It claimed that Jesus had one spiritual nature that is shared by both God and humankind. It denied the doctrines of the Trinity and the atonement but accepted the miracles of Jesus as signs of his special mission. In his person, words, and works are seen the nature of God, the holy Father of humankind. In Christ, God shows us ourselves, our depravity, and our destiny as his unsaved people. Faith in Christ saves from guilt and the dominion of sin, God’s forgiving love is experienced, and the faithful are filled with his Spirit. Christ founded the church, preserves and perfects it, and will cause it to triumph in the end. “It will be the nursery of light and warmth for every science and all art; it will conquer hearts for Christ in house and school and society.”

The Groningen theology sought to infuse new life into the theology of the church at a time when the older orthodoxy seemed moribund and rationalism was undermining the faith of many. While helping to preserve an interest in religion in sectors of Dutch society, its foundation was that of humanism—e.g., it preferred Erasmus to Luther; it had an antipathy to church confessions; and it failed in an adequate theological interpretation of the Christian faith. It disclaimed indebtedness to Schleiermacher for its religious orientation, but it was remarkably similar to his thinking in many respects. M. E. OSTERHAVEN

Bibliography. J. H. Mackay, Religious Thought in Holland During the Nineteenth Century; S. D. van Veen, SHERK 5:80–81, 314–15.

Groote, Gerard (1340–1384). Dutch mystic who was the moving spirit behind the Brethren of the Common Life and the Devotio Moderna. Born into a wealthy family, he studied in Germany and France, proved himself a versatile scholar with wide-ranging interests, and for a time taught at Cologne. After his conversion in 1374, he returned to his native Deventer. Finding self-discipline a problem, he entered a Carthusian monastery. In 1379 he was made deacon and, though never ordained priest, became a missionary preacher in the Utrecht diocese and beyond, with much acceptance by the common people. He denounced abuses in the church while upholding its traditional teaching and seeking reform from within. The establishment predictably reacted adversely to his criticism and withdrew his license to preach. He retired to Deventer, founded the Brethren of the Common Life, but died of the plague before many of his ideas had been implemented.

In his sermons and writings Groote stressed poverty, the communal (but not cloistered) life, commitment to Christ, and the necessity of being the church in the world. The Brethren were also concerned actively in the furtherance of education. Much of Groote's thinking is reflected in the work of his most famous follower, Thomas à Kempis, author of Imitation of Christ, a book earlier attributed to Groote himself. J. D. DOUGLAS

See also BRETHREN OF THE COMMON LIFE; DEVOTIO MODERNA; THOMAS À KEMPIS.

Bibliography. A. Hyma, Brethren of the Common Life; E. F. Jacob, “Gerard Groote and the Beginnings of the ‘New Devotion’ in the Low Countries,” JEH 3:40–57; T. P. Van Zijl, Gerhard Groote: Ascetic and Reformer.

Grotius, Hugo (1583–1645). Dutch jurist, statesman, theologian, and historian who was born at Delft and educated at the University of Leiden.

After practicing law for a time and holding public office, in 1613 he was appointed pensionary of the city of Rotterdam, a post that carried with it a seat in the States General of Holland and later in the States General of the United Netherlands. This position brought him into Dutch politics at a time of intense struggle between the Calvinists and the Arminians. As a leader of the Arminians when the Calvinist side won, he was sentenced to life imprisonment (1618). In 1621 he escaped from prison in a book chest and made his way to France. He returned to Holland briefly in 1631, but most of the remainder of his life was spent in Paris, where he served for a time (1634–45) as Swedish ambassador.

Grotius is remembered as the “father of international law” on the basis of his De Jure Belli et Pacis (Concerning the Law of War and Peace), which appeared in 1625. This work contains an impressive knowledge of legal authorities, the classics, the Scriptures, and the church fathers, as well as the seventeenth-century scientific outlook, used to prove that there is a common law between nations that is valid in times of peace and war. Consequently, the rule of right reason and of law can be applied to the actions of sovereign states. The faith of Grotius in the orderliness of the world is basic to his work in both jurisprudence and theology. There is, he believed, a law of nature that even God cannot alter.

Grotius was an ardent student of religion who wrote on theology, scriptural interpretations, and church government. One of his most popular books, On the Truth of the Christian Religion (1627), was intended as a missionary manual for those who had contact with pagans and Muslims. It presented the evidences for the Christian faith based on natural revelation. Another work, De Satisfactione Christi (1617), espoused the governmental theory of the atonement. This view regarded God as the ruler of the world who could in a sense relax the law that death followed sin and allow Christ to suffer as a penal example so that sin could be forgiven and yet the fundamental law of the universe be upheld. Grotius also published commentaries on the NT, treating it on a level with other literature and applying rules of textual criticism to it. In works such as Via ad Pacem Ecclesiasticum (1642), he expressed a desire for the unity of the church and was willing to make such extensive concessions to restore union with Rome that he was accused of converting to Roman Catholicism. The reason for his irenic approach was his desire as a Christian and a statesman to bring peace and unity to a world torn by religious wars. R. G. CLOUSE

Bibliography. H. Bull et al., eds., Hugo Grotius and International Relations; E. Dumbauld, Life and Legal Writings of Hugo Grotius; W. S. M. Knight, Life and Works of Hugo Grotius; J. ter Meulen, Concise Bibliography of Hugo Grotius.

Guardian Angel. See ANGEL.

Guilt. The state of a moral agent after the intentional or unintentional violation of a law, principle, or value established by an authority under which the moral agent is subject. The law may have been established by the head of a social order as a part of a greater legal system. It may have been established by God in his effort to lead and protect the highest well-being of humankind. Or the law may have been established by one's own authority and integrated into his or her own personal code of ethics.

In the Bible. When limited to its theological distinction, guilt is that state of a moral agent after the intentional or unintentional violation of a law (cf. Lev. 4:2–3, 13, 22, 27; 5:2, 3, 15) or principle established by God.

The Bible shows a progressive development in the concept of guilt. Early in the book of the law personal responsibility was not necessary for one to have been considered guilty. The priest's sins brought guilt upon the people (Lev. 4:3). Even the common citizen's sin could bring guilt upon the whole land (Deut. 24:4). Individual personality and individual responsibility were undeveloped, with the individual merged into the body of the clan. A man's family, even if totally unaware of his sin, bore his guilt, and they and even his animals were subject to equal punishment with him (Josh. 7).

By the time of the prophets, however, we see a notable advance in the concept of sin and its consequent guilt in that they have become more clearly ethical and personal. The emphasis is less on ritual correctness and more on motive, inner spirit, and personal attitude (Isa. 1; 57:15; 58:1–12; Mic. 6:8). The idea of personal responsibility had arrived. The people could no longer hold an adage claiming that when their fathers ate sour grapes, their children's teeth were set on edge. When their teeth were on edge, they were reaping the results of personally having eaten sour grapes. They had to pay the natural consequences of their actions, and they would pay additionally by being punished (2 Kings 14:6; Ezek. 18:29–32).

Jesus recognized even broader and deeper implications in guilt. He was concerned not only with the act and the inner attitude (Matt. 5:21–22), but he saw degrees of guilt dependent on knowledge and motive (Luke 11:29–32; 12:47–48). He made it clearer that the law had been made for man's benefit (Mark 2:27), and that which made him guilty not only brought suffering to the offender and possibly another human being, but it brought pain to the heart of God. Jesus, God incarnate, was already paying a price for the guilty people's sins even as he grieved over the city of Jerusalem (Matt. 23:37–39).

Their guilt and others' guilt was not only in the violation of rules, but in the violation of persons, whether the injury was to others or to themselves. The weight or seriousness of guiltiness is in its cost in terms of human injury. Jesus paid the ultimate price on the cross. Since God loves humankind, any injury to a human is an affront to God.

Management of Guilt. The word guilt carries with it the concept of deserved punishment or payment due, or even payment by punishment. This was established in the first judgments on human behavior and attitude that declared a person guilty (Gen. 4:11–15) and was early incorporated into the written law (Lev. 4). The concept of payment was significant in the atoning death of Christ on the cross for the individual and collective sins of humankind, and the concept of payment is significant today among some religious sects in the form of flagellation as payment for their own sins. Current theological and psychological literature shows abundant evidence of the inner need to punish even one's self, atoning for the violations of one's own accepted ethical code. But inner psychodynamic forces make it possible for another to pay in his behalf. Though it is not widely discussed in secular literature, modern clinical studies help us understand the psychological mechanism that makes it possible for a person to accept a vicarious atoning payment for one's sin.

Clouding the modern understanding of guilt is the common but erroneous use of the words "guilt" and "guilt feeling" as though they were interchangeable. Guilt is an after-the-fact reality or state that may or may not be accompanied by guilt feeling. Indeed, some remnants of humanity have enacted the most heinous crimes with no testable trace of any feelings of guilt.

Guilt feeling is a painful conglomerate of emotions that usually includes anxiety in anticipation of punishment; shame, with its sense of humiliation, dirtiness, and the need to hide; and grief, or depression, for the diminished sense of worth, dignity, and self-esteem. Though a source of intense emotional pain, the feelings of guilt do have value. They serve as an internal alarm system that alerts us to a keener awareness that we have violated our own value system. They correct us, goading us toward more constructive behavior or attitude.

But since it is such an intense source of pain, people commonly draw from about three dozen methods of escaping, evading, or killing the pain of the guilty conscience, most of which bring further injury to human personality. The most constructive, healthy response of humankind to the pain of guilt is repentance and acceptance of the grace of forgiveness offered by God through the person of Jesus Christ.

W. G. JUSTICE JR.

Bibliography. H. Hanse, TDNT 2:828; C. Houselander, Guilt; W. G. Justice, Guilt and Forgiveness; Guilt: The Source and the Solution; C. Maurer, TDNT 8:557–58; H. F. Rall, ISBE 2:1309–10; E. V. Stein, Beyond Guilt; Guilt: Theory and Therapy.

Guilt Offering. See OFFERINGS AND SACRIFICES IN BIBLE TIMES.

Gutiérrez, Gustavo (b. 1928). Peruvian theologian and father of Latin American liberation theology. Born a mestizo of Quechuan ancestry, his identification with the poor is a characteristic of his life and thought. He was educated in the disciplines of medicine, philosophy, psychology, and theology, which provided the scholarly foundation for his commitment to the liberation of the poor. During the 1960s, Gutiérrez broke from traditional Roman Catholic theology through his encounter with Marxist social analysis and the continual violence so common in Latin America. In Brazil he encountered the basic ecclesial communities and an episcopate actively opposed to the military dictatorship. As his ideas on liberation developed, Gutiérrez presented them to other theologians and church leaders at various conferences, including the influential Medellín conference in 1969. The outcome was the publication of his influential volume Theology of Liberation in 1971. His subsequent works treat the issues of spirituality, suffering of the poor, and contrasts between development and liberation.

The central concern for Gutiérrez was to develop “a new way of doing theology.” This emphasis on praxiological concerns emerges from the context of a revolutionary ferment in Latin America (Núñez C. and Taylor). Liberation theology begins not with the biblical text, the hallmark of evangelical theology, but with the situation of sociopolitical oppression in Latin America as its “text,” seeking to establish a “permanent cultural revolution” (Núñez C.). For Gutiérrez, the theology that emerges from this “text” is a product of the community that has accepted “the gift of the Word of God.” It is the nature of liberation theology to encounter the political structures based on the presupposition of a fundamental relationship between faith and politics. As a result, Gutiérrez views salvation, not in the ahistorical sense, but as the encounter with God in history and the accompanying social transformation. The product of this liberation is a spirituality that combines the solidarity of the community with the victory over suffering and a commitment to the poor. In contrast to liberation theology, an evangelical response to the poor is based on the recognition that the church’s social responsibility is inextricably linked to the written revelation of God (Núñez C.).

C. D. MCCONNELL

See also LIBERATION THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. G. Gutiérrez, On Job: God-talk and the Suffering of the Innocent; Theology of Liberation; We Drink from Our Own Wells: The Spiritual Journey of a People; R. M. Brown, Gustavo Gutiérrez; M. H. Ellis and O. Maduro, Future of Liberation Theology: Essays in Honor of Gustavo Gutiérrez; E. A. Núñez C., Liberation Theology; E. A. Núñez C. and W. D. Taylor, Crisis in Latin America: An Evangelical Perspective.

Guyon, Madame (1648–1717). French mystic and quietist. Born Jeanne Marie Bouvier de la Mothe, at Montargis, France, she was educated in a convent and desired to enter a religious order. But in 1664 she was compelled by her mother to marry Jacques Guyon, an invalid twenty-two years her senior. This unhappy marriage ended with Guyon’s death in 1676. After being widowed, Madame Guyon entered more deeply into a life of religious devotion. Influenced by the writings of the Spanish quietist Miguel de Molinos (1640–96), she took as her spiritual director a Barnabite friar, François La Combe, with whom she toured parts of France, Switzerland, and Italy for five years (1681–86) propagating her beliefs. The pair being suspected of heresy, La Combe was arrested in 1687 and imprisoned for life; Madame Guyon was arrested in 1688, but after eight months she was released from prison through the intervention of Madame de Maintenon, King Louis XIV’s wife. In 1695 Madame Guyon was again arrested for alleged heresy and spent six years in prison at Vincennes and later in the Bastille. She was eventually released in 1703 and spent the final fourteen years of her life at Blois, at the estate of her son-in-law.

Madame Guyon was an exponent of mystic quietism. She maintained that a true Christian must pray and strive for spiritual perfection, a state of inner blessedness that consists of a wholly disinterested love of God, submits implicitly to his will, and is indifferent to all outward things, even to the church and its sacraments. Her major writings were Short and Easy Method of Prayer, Autobiography, and Song of Songs.

N. V. HOPE

See also QUIETISM.

Bibliography. J. M. B. de la M. Guyon, Madame Guyon: An Autobiography; T. C. Upham, Life, Religious Opinions and Experiences of Madame de la Mothe Guyon.

Hh

Hades. In the LXX, Hades (Gr. hadēs) is virtually synonymous with the Hebrew Sheol, the place-name of the abode of the dead. Thus the word has in itself no doctrine of reward or punishment: see, e.g., Acts 2:27; Revelation 20:13. It appears, however, in Matthew 16:18 as the locus of opposition to the church, and this leads on to Matthew 11:23 (Luke 10:15) and Luke 16:23, where Hades is the place of punishment of the wicked dead. This NT development is to be noted. The OT only begins to suggest a diversity of eternal destiny. However, when the Lord Jesus Christ brings life and immortality to light (2 Tim. 1:10), he reveals both eternal gain and eternal loss. Even Hades, otherwise equivalent to Sheol, cannot resist this further significance. This simultaneous maturing of truth is ignored by every attempt to divest the NT of its grim, but dominical, doctrine of eternal punishment.

J. A. MOTYER

See also HELL; SHEOL.

Bibliography. L. Morris, Biblical Doctrine of Judgment; J. A. Motyer, After Death: "Final State," Basic Christian Doctrines, C. F. H. Henry, ed.

Halfway Covenant (1662). A major attempt by the American Puritans to preserve a Christian commonwealth in the New World. The "Puritan way" in Massachusetts had begun with close co-operation between church and society. Voting was open to all church members, but to no others. To become a church member an individual had to testify publicly that God had worked "savingly" in the heart. In Massachusetts's early years the system worked well. A steady stream of people came forward to testify to the "new birth," and as church members these converted people set the tone for the whole society.

Soon, however, difficulties arose. Children of the earliest settlers were not experiencing God's grace and hence not becoming church members. The Puritan leaders faced a serious problem. In the Puritans' Reformed theology the converted had the privilege of offering their infant children for baptism as a seal of God's covenanting grace. Now many of those who had been baptized as infants, but who were not making public profession of their own faith, were expressing the desire to have their children baptized. The Puritan leaders wanted to preserve the church for the professed believers, but they also wanted to keep as many people as possible under the influence of the church. Their solution was to create a "halfway" covenant relating just to church membership. Individuals from the second New England generation could bring their third generation children for baptism and halfway membership. But no one in the second or third generation could participate in the Lord's Supper or exercise other privileges of church membership unless they testified that God had done a gracious work in their heart.

Puritans thought they had preserved both the integrity of the church and a broad Christian influence in society. As it happened, the church in Massachusetts did prolong its impact through the halfway system. It also may have diluted its spiritual character. At least that is what Jonathan Edwards, America's greatest evangelical theologian, thought in the next century. His active opposition to the practice helped bring about its death in the second half of the eighteenth century.

M. A. NOLL

See also COVENANT THEOLOGY; FEDERAL THEOLOGY; PURITANISM.

Bibliography. J. F. Cooper, "Half-Way Covenant" in Dictionary of Christianity in America, D. G. Reid, et al., eds.; P. Miller, New England Mind: From Colony to Province; E. S. Morgan, Visible Saints; R. G. Pope, Half-Way Covenant; W. Walker, Creeds and Platforms of Congregationalism.

Hallelujah. The Hebrew term halēlū-yâ, "praise the Lord," from a root meaning "to boast," "to praise," was transliterated into Greek as allēouia and modified in English versions to alleluia(h). It is a liturgical expression urging worshipers to indulge in one of the highest forms of devotion that can be offered to God. The term is restricted to songs of praise in Scripture, occurring twenty-four times in the Psalter and four times in Revelation. In its usage it extolled God's power in creation, in the liberation of the Israelites from Egyptian bondage, and in the blessings that he showers upon believers. In corporate worship this invocation or shout was uttered predominantly at the feasts of Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles, although it obviously had a constant place in private devotions as well.

In the synagogue period the "Egyptian Hallel" (Pss. 113–18) was recited as part of the domestic Passover ceremony, the first two psalms preceding the meal and the remainder sung at the conclusion (cf. Matt. 26:30). Psalms 135–36 were sung on the Sabbath, while the "Great Hallel" (Pss. 120–36, or 135–36, or 145–50) was sung at the morning services. The NT closes with a heavenly choir thundering "Hallelujah," a word that has become a permanent part of Christian worship.

R. K. HARRISON

Halloween (All Hallows Eve). The name given to October 31, the eve of the Christian festival of All Saints Day (November 1). How there came to be a feast of all the saints on November 1 is not known, but its observance seems to date back to the eighth century. The pagan festival of Halloween originated with the pre-Christian Druids of Gaul and Britain. The Druids believed that on this night ghosts and witches were most likely to wander about. The lighting of bonfires and feasting on Halloween also date back to Druid activities. Pagan peoples of western Europe also believed that their god (called the Devil by Christian observers) became incarnate in human or animal form (in Britain the bull, the dog, and the cat). Gradually, Druid practices were merged with the Roman fall festival in honor of the goddess Pomona and the Christian feast day.

There has always been vigorous debate as to how far Christians should participate in what is essentially a pagan festival. Some argue that it has been sufficiently separated from its origins to render it a harmless once-a-year diversion. Others argue that it will always retain some connection with its beginnings and in the light of today's renewed, morbid interest in the occult, it should be avoided altogether. Why give Satan a subtle entry into one's Christian walk with the Lord?

H. F. Vos

See also ALL SAINTS DAY.

Bibliography. A. Hibbard, Family Celebrations at Thanksgiving and Alternatives to Halloween; R. Linton, Halloween through Twenty Centuries; R. H. Schaffler, ed., Halloween: Its Origin, Spirit, Celebration and Significance.

Hands, Laying on of. See LAYING ON OF HANDS.

Happiness. The English word happiness denotes both a favorable station or quality of life (e.g., "good fortune, prosperity"), and an emotional state of being (e.g., "contentment, joy"). The two are not unrelated, but in biblical thought happiness is primarily associated with one's disposition and character rather than one's emotive responses to occurrences and events. Even as the experiences and circumstances of life tend to dictate human emotional response, so happiness is always the by-product of a higher value.

The Bible roots these higher values which yield the benefit of happiness in the Hebrew wisdom tradition. Biblical wisdom understands only two paths through the maze of life, "the way of the righteous" and "the way of the wicked" (Ps. 1:6; cf. "the narrow gate" contra "the broad way" of Jesus' teaching, Matt. 7:13–14). The Bible commends the way of the righteous, a lifestyle of doing what is right, just, and fair (Prov. 3:1–5). The fundamental characteristic of biblical wisdom is "the fear of the Lord." Succinctly stated, the fear of the Lord is a composite response of attitude and will shaping human behavior in conformity with the commandments of God. True happiness is the by-product of this type of relationship with God more than an emotive response to situation or circumstance. It is the disposition of a righteous life centered in a relationship with God that permits one to enjoy happiness as a state of well-being.

Theological Issues. The words "happy" and "happiness" are conventional renderings for the Hebrew root (ʾāšar) ("be fortunate, happy") in the Old Testament and the Greek makarios ("blessed, fortunate, happy") in the New Testament. Theologically, true happiness for human beings is rooted in the activity of God. Moses described the nation of Israel as "a happy people" because they were delivered from slavery in Egypt by the saving acts of God (Deut. 33:28–29). The righteous person is "happy" by virtue of the knowledge that God has forgiven individual sins and transgressions (Ps. 32:1–2). In one sense, the righteous simply mirror divine happiness because God "delights" (Heb. hps) in his work of showing mercy and forgiving sins (Micah 7:18–20).

It is this divine activity of showing mercy and forgiving sins that permits the righteous person to engage in a lifestyle of "happy" activities. The Bible promotes a happiness that stems from one's disposition and quality of spiritual life, quite independent of one's emotional state of being. The divinely ordained activities of a "happy lifestyle" include

- willful trust in God as Maker, Redeemer, and Sustainer of life (Pss. 34:8; 40:4; 85:12; Prov. 16:20)
- heartfelt worship of this God who hears prayer, forgives sins, gives good things to those who trust in him, and even disciplines and instructs those he loves (Pss. 65:4; 84:4–5; 94:12)

Happiness

- zealous pursuit of the knowledge of this God through the study of and obedience to his Word, his written revelation (Pss. 112:1; 119:1–2)
- responsible stewardship of all divinely granted spiritual and material resources, especially with respect to maintaining justice for the weak and the poor (Pss. 41:1; 106:3; Prov. 14:21)

The disciplined practice of these activities of the happy lifestyle promoted in the Old Testament fosters “happiness” in an emotional sense, a state of contentment or well-being. This is true because the activities of happiness inform the emotions of happiness by bringing divine perspectives to bear on the human experience. Although true happiness may include the experience of material prosperity (cf. Ps. 128:1–2), it is not conditioned by this circumstance.

The apostle Paul knew how to be content in every situation because he understood the “happiness” of trusting in Christ Jesus (Phil. 4:11–13). Likewise, true happiness cannot be held hostage by the uncertain and sometimes negative character of life experiences. Happiness for the Christian cannot be defined merely by the absence of sorrow or the experience of joy. God’s providential superintending of human events enables the righteous to find happiness and even joy in trial and suffering because such experiences confirm that God is supremely great and absolutely good (Rom. 8:28; James 1:2, 12; 1 Pet. 4:13). Finally, true happiness does not value the wealth of possessions but rather the depth of relationships, echoing the design of original creation (Creator to creature, spouse to spouse, parent to child, person to person; cf. Pss. 127:5; 144:15; 146:5; Phil. 3:8–9).

The teaching of the New Testament essentially confirms the Old Testament understanding of happiness. Jesus equates “happiness” (Greek makarios; cf. JB, “happy”; NIV, “blessed”) with righteous attitudes and ethical behavior patterns in the Beatitudes of his Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5:3–10). Similarly, blessing or happiness is closely linked to a faith relationship with God, not pleasurable experiences or fortuitous circumstances in life. In fact, the apostle Paul was made happy by those events and experiences imbued with spiritual significance, like repentance leading to spiritual renewal and the ministry of the local church in the lives of fellow Christians (2 Cor. 7:9, 13). Elsewhere the New Testament identifies songs of praise as one appropriate demonstration of this spiritual happiness (James 5:13).

Jesus also introduces an eschatological dimension to happiness (e.g., Matt. 5:3). True happiness is not postponed until the kingdom of heaven is fully established upon earth. Rather, it is completed or fulfilled in the kingdom of the heavenly Father that Jesus inaugurates (cf. Matt. 5:12, 19–20; 13:43). This eschatological aspect of biblical happiness stems in part from the basic meaning of the Greek term makarios (“blessed, happy”). Originally the word meant freedom from daily cares and worries. This kind of happiness, complete freedom from the cares of life, will only be realized in the eschaton when the kingdom of heaven fully occupies the created order. All this makes prayer an integral component of happiness during the interim, since God is a loving Father who looks to the needs of his children (Matt. 6:30, 32–34). Through petitions offered in prayer the prospects for biblical happiness are increased because “our Father in Heaven” graciously responds by giving us “our daily bread” (Matt. 6:9, 11).

Psychological Issues. Modern psychology links happiness to mental health and emotional well-being. Happiness is often regarded as an expression of joy, one of the two primary poles of human emotion (contra sorrow). Psychology also recognizes that any definition of happiness must be comprised of the dual components of disposition (i.e., a general liking of one’s life pattern and circumstance) and occurrence (certain feelings or emotions conditioned by circumstance). The social science understanding of happiness intersects with biblical theology at several key points and offers practical instruction on the nature and pursuit of happiness.

- Happiness must be a reality-based experience; it is not rooted in illusion or fantasy.
- Happiness does not exclude pain or grief.
- Happiness as a disposition is largely a matter of volition or choice, not circumstance or situation.
- Prospects for happiness are greatest for those persons in the process of self-actualization (i.e., those actively engaged in efforts directed at realizing their full potential).
- Rigidity may be a barrier to happiness. The possibilities for happiness are greatly increased when there is opportunity to learn through experience, the openness to change, and the flexibility to adapt to new circumstances.
- Love is the most important psychological necessity for every human being. Happiness is always connected with love.

C. DAVIS AND A. E. HILL

See also HEDONISM; JOY.

Bibliography. C. E. Arnold, ABD 3:1022–23; G. Bertram and F. Hauck, TDNT 4:364–70; H. Cazelles, TDOT 1:445–48; L. H. Durand, Psychology of Happiness;

R. Harries, Prayer and the Pursuit of Happiness; A. E. Hill, ISBE 3:1011–12; H. G. Link and U. Becker, NIDNTT 1:206–18; V. J. McGill, Idea of Happiness; F. B. Minirth and P. D. Meier, Happiness Is a Choice.

Hardening, Hardness of Heart. The action of hardening one's heart or the state of hardness of heart is the action or state of persistent and sometimes hostile rejection of the Word of God. This involves not simply a refusal to hear the Word but a refusal to respond in submission and obedience. The rejection may also extend to those who convey the Word, whether prophets, apostles, or the Logos himself, Jesus Christ. The objects of hardening may be individuals (e.g., Pharaoh in Exod. 4:21; 7:13, 22; 8:15, 19; 10:1) or whole communities of peoples or nations (most importantly Israel in Isa. 6:10–11; 29:9–14; Rom. 11:7–25; 2 Cor. 3:14; but also Gentiles in Josh. 11:20; Eph. 4:18). There is no one technical word or phrase for hardening in Scripture, rather a variety of words and phrases are used to describe the same phenomenon.

Most theological discussions are concerned with identifying the agent of the hardening, and opinion is divided between God as the sole agent (strict Calvinism) and man as solely responsible (Arminianism). Variations would be that God provides the opportunity for hardening or that he hardens on the basis of his foreknowledge of man's sin. Usually the attempt is made to tie hardening to reprobation or preterition, and thus the phenomenon is seen as directly concerning an individual's eternal destiny.

In Scripture both God and man are listed as agents of hardening. In the case of Pharaoh, he is said to harden his own heart (Exod. 8:15). But God is also said to harden Pharaoh's heart (Exod. 4:21; 10:1), and Paul's comment on the incident is that God hardens whom he will and has mercy on whom he will (Rom. 9:18). Scripture warns against hardening, implying responsibility on the part of the hearers (Ps. 95:8; Heb. 3:8, 15; 4:7). Noteworthy is the different rendering of Isaiah 6:9–10 in the Masoretic Text and the LXX and the consequent usage of the passage in the NT. The former makes God the agent working through the instrument of the prophet, preventing repentance in Israel (see John 12:40). The LXX sees the people themselves as the agents refusing repentance (see Matt. 13:15 and Acts 28:27).

Hardening, therefore, is a complex phenomenon involving both divine and human agency. But instead of being the manifestation of predetermined reprobation, hardening is primarily presented in Scripture as a means of God's accomplishment of his purposes for history. Such can be seen in the case of Pharaoh through which God accomplished Israel's deliverance (cf. Josh. 11:20). It is also the case in the present hardening of Israel (Rom. 11:7–25) through which God is bringing salvation to the Gentiles. In such activity God's sovereignty must be clearly seen. In each case, hardening results in a manifestation of mercy and grace.

Hardening is lifted only by God (2 Cor. 3:15–16; 4:3–6). Scripture expects the present hardening of Israel to be followed by new covenant ministries of the Spirit in which the hard heart of the nation is replaced by a new heart of faith and obedience (Jer. 31:33–37; Ezek. 36:26–37:28; Rom. 11:25–32).

C. BLAISING

See also ELECT, ELECTION; REPROBATION; SIN.

Bibliography. U. Becker, NIDNTT 2:153–56; D. A. Carson, Divine Sovereignty and Human Responsibility; S. Fisk, Divine Sovereignty and Human Freedom; A. Kuyper, Work of the Holy Spirit; L. J. Kuyper, "Hardness of Heart according to Biblical Perspective," SJT 27:459–74; G. Molin, Encyclopedia of Biblical Theology 2:1136–42.

Harnack, Adolf (1851–1930). German theologian and church historian. The son of a noted Luther scholar, Harnack was educated at Dorpat and Leipzig and occupied positions at Leipzig, Giessen, and Marburg before going to Berlin in 1891. He was a prolific and influential scholar, and controversy swirled around him because of his unorthodox views, but the government backed him against critics in the church. In 1905 he assumed the prestigious directorship of the Prussian State Library and in 1911 helped found and presided over the Kaiser Wilhelm Society for Fostering Scholarship. After the war he alienated many supporters by accepting the Weimar Republic and also suffered the defection of his leading pupil, Karl Barth.

Harnack's principal contributions were in NT studies and patristics. Major works available in English include History of Dogma (7 vols., 1894–99), Mission and Expansion of Christianity in the First Three Centuries (2 vols., 1904–5), Constitution and Law of the Church in the First Two Centuries (1910), Luke the Physician (1907), Sayings of Jesus (1908), Acts of the Apostles (1909), and Date of the Acts and of the Synoptic Gospels (1911). His historical scholarship broke new ground and in some respects actually undermined the views of contemporary liberal biblical critics.

After an intellectual journey from orthodoxy through the historical-critical approach of the Tübingen School to Ritschlian liberalism, Harnack came to see religion in practical terms as reconciling culture and Christian faith, and properly ordering life. The unity of gospel and culture had been lost in the Enlightenment, but the power and revelation of God brought by Jesus—that gospel which is the eternal life in the midst of time—provides men with freedom and responsibility in all things and serves as the foundation of moral culture.

His most distinctive idea was that dogma in the early church was the natural outgrowth of the search for standards for membership, and this obscured the essential nature and practical thrust of Jesus' teachings. To penetrate back to these one must recognize that Jesus and the disciples were as timebound in their thoughts and actions as we are today, and must separate the "kernel" of the gospel, that which is permanently valid, from the "husk" of the changing forms of life and thought in which it was given. In the theological best-seller What Is Christianity? (1901) he argues that the kernel of Jesus' message is the kingdom of God, where the victory over evil provides the inner link with God and gives ultimate meaning to life. Here is demonstrated the fatherhood of God and the infinite worth of the human soul, and Christians follow Jesus' example of the "higher righteousness" governed by the law of love, which exists independent of religious worship and technical observance.

Although love is the new life already begun, it is a highly individualistic approach to life and service that does not require one's active involvement in effecting political, social, and economic change. Such a theology left Christians at the mercy of the establishment and enabled Harnack to join with other intellectuals in giving unqualified support to the German war effort in 1914.

R. V. PIERARD

See also LIBERALISM, THEOLOGICAL; RITSCHL, ALBRECHT.

Bibliography. G. Bromiley, Historical Theology: An Introduction; C. Brown, NIDCC 452; H. Cremer, Reply to Harnack on the Essence of Christianity; P. D. Feinberg, DCE 282; G. W. Glick, Reality of Christianity: A Study of Adolf von Harnack as Historian and Theologian; H. R. Mackintosh, Types of Modern Theology; W. Pauck, Harnack and Troeltsch: Two Historical Theologians; M. H. Rumscheidt, Revelation and Theology: An Analysis of the Barth-Harnack Correspondence of 1923; M. H. Rumscheidt, ed., Adolf von Harnack; A. von Zahn-Harnack, Adolf von Harnack.

Harris, Howel. See CALVINISTIC METHODISM.

Hartshorne, Charles (b. 1897). American philosopher at Chicago, Emory, and Texas, who was the most influential proponent of the process theology movement of the 1960s and 70s. Developing the metaphysical thought of Alfred North Whitehead, his theology was more philosophically than biblically or confessionally based. Standing in the tradition of natural theology, Hartshorne developed a complete philosophical theology, detailing a process conception of God.

Following Whitehead, Hartshorne held to the primacy of events over things, becoming over being. Consequently, he argued that change rather than constancy is the underlying principle of reality, and thus that reality is a process of becoming, not a static universe of objects. Objecting to classical theism's rigid distinction between creator and created, Hartshorne argued that if temporality and creativity are ultimately real, then God himself must be in process and in some sense God must be dependent upon the free decisions of creatures. Rather than being immutable and static, God's nature is endlessly adaptable and changeable, for God is both the originator and a participant in the process of cosmic evolution.

Hartshorne has often been accused of being a pantheist. In reality, however, he is a panentheist. While he does identify God and the universe, he also claims that God is more than, and even exists beyond, the universe. This is seen in his bipolar understanding of God's nature. In his "primordial" nature, God is eternal and transcendent mind. As such, God contributes the novel possibilities for each succeeding event. Yet, in his "consequent" nature, God is changing and growing as he experiences the process of temporality. In his consequent nature God is an immanent constituent of the world. Thus God is both necessary and contingent, eternal and temporal. And God is both the eternal a priori for all eventuation and the sum of the actual occasions in which the divine nature takes concrete existence.

While Hartshorne's metaphysic seeks to take history seriously, in the end it under-emphasizes the seriousness of human sin, for it absolutizes or almost divinizes the historical process itself, including sin. The same can be said for revelation. All reality is included within God, and thus all reality is equally revelatory. Thus no special or unique status is appointed to scriptural revelation.

M. WILLIAMS

See also PANENTHEISM; PROCESS THEOLOGY; WHITEHEAD, ALFRED NORTH.

Bibliography. C. Hartshorne, Divine Relativity; Logic of Perfection; Man's Vision of God and the Logic of Theism; Reality as Social Process; L. S. Ford, Two Process Philosophers: Hartshorne's Encounter with Whitehead; A. Gragg, Charles Hartshorne.

Hate. The Hebrew is sāne' and the Greek miseō. Both words have as their basic meaning strong opposition to love. The direct opposite of hating is loving.

In the OT and the LXX the word is used when two are enemies of each other (e.g., Gen. 26:27; 2 Sam. 5:8; 1 Kings 22:8).

God is said to hate. All sin is hated by him because he is absolutely holy and altogether apart from it in his person. Special note should be made of the fact that God hates false worship

(e.g., Deut. 12:31; 16:22; Jer. 44:4). Idolatry is an abomination to God (Hos. 9:15). The hatred of God speaks of his total opposition and aversion to sin.

Those who claim God as theirs are said to hate evil also (Ps. 97:10). This hatred of evil by the righteous is because of their relation to and love for God (Exod. 18:21; Ps. 119:104; Isa. 33:15). Such hatred of what God himself hates is the result of implicit faith in him, loving what he loves, and despising what he despises. Throughout Scripture the unrighteous love evil and hate the good, and the righteous love good and hate the evil.

God's rejection, in his sovereign wisdom, of Esau as the one through whom the Chosen Seed should come is described as "hate" (Mal. 1:2–3; cf. Rom. 9:13). This "hate" means not a passionate aversion to Esau but a refusal to choose him in the sense in which Jacob was chosen. It certainly stresses the free choice of God and the mystery of divine election.

Christ often reminded his own disciples of the hatred which would come to the people of God. It was present when he was on earth and would continue in the future (John 15:18–23).

The contrast between love and hate seems to reach a climax in the writings of John. Therein, the one who does evil hates the light and refuses to come to it for fear his evil deeds will be revealed (John 3:20). Since the world hates God the Son, it also hates God the Father (15:23). Because the people of God love the Father and the Son, the world hates them as well (15:18; 17:14). One who hates the believer lives in the very sphere of darkness and not light (1 John 2:9, 11; 3:15; 4:20).

The Lord Jesus exhorted his disciples to love all men, even those who hated them (Luke 6:27). They were never to repay hatred with hatred. People of God are to have a strong dislike, a hatred, for evil, but a deep, abiding love for God and righteousness. Hatred, as a malicious attitude, must never characterize the believer. This is not compatible with the Christlike spirit. It is one of the works of the flesh (Gal. 5:20). A true indication of how much one loves God is how much he hates evil.

R. P. LIGHTNER

Bibliography. W. Foerster, TDNT 2:811–15; O. Michael, TDNT 4:683–94; G. Van Groningen, TWOT 2:874.

Hauerwas, Stanley (b. 1940). Methodist theologian and ethicist at Duke Divinity School, Hauerwas is among the most significant shapers of post-liberal theology. He is a severe critic of traditional liberalism, usually provocative in his writings, and maintains the significance of narrative for Christian ethics.

Instead of following the influence of the Enlightenment by seeking to ground morality in terms of individuals, reason, isolated facts and actions, Hauerwas is influenced by Alasdair Mac-

Intyre and argues that virtues are rooted in a particular narrative. In Peaceable Kingdom Hauerwas describes ethics as learning God's story of our sinfulness, the world as God's gift, that in God's story we are convicted and forgiven sinners. Thus Christian ethics is unique to its story, and Hauerwas denies continuity between Christian and non-Christian morality.

Narrative is crucial to address the subject of character, and character is most adequately displayed within communities shaped by the biblical narrative. Hauerwas's most popular work, Resident Aliens, was done with William Willimon; it called for the church's faithfulness to be the church, admitting that culture cannot be escaped but that the church must live a dislocated or "alien" existence. Their proposal revisits an Anabaptist form of the church as an alternative to the influential models of Christ in relation to culture offered by H. Richard Niebuhr.

In Character and the Christian Life Hauerwas explored the subject of virtues (working with Aristotle and Thomas Aquinas), as traditionally associated with Catholic moral theology, but he brought these themes into conversation with explicitly Protestant ethics (through a contrast between Bultmann and Barth) and a distinctly Protestant discussion over justification and sanctification. His appeal to virtues corresponds with his observations about narratives (which show the connectedness of our identity and thus display character).

He has addressed the most troubling issues faced in contemporary culture, education, and Christian faith, such as how to understand the suffering and death of children, the limits of modern medicine, and the Christian conviction about God's goodness. His Unleashing Scripture censured both liberalism and fundamentalism for acquiescing the church's rightful, theological use of Scripture to critical and academic captivity. Typically Hauerwas is considered sectarian in his insistence upon a unique Christian story and ethic, yet this emphasis is also what helps us understand what distinguishes his work as a Christian theologian.

J. P. CALLAHAN

Bibliography. S. Hauerwas, Against the Nations: War and Survival in a Liberal Age; Better Hope; Christian Existence; Community of Character; God, Medicine, and Suffering; Suffering Presence; Vision and Virtue; S. Hauerwas with R. Bondi and D. Burrell, Truthfulness and Tragedy; S. Hauerwas with L. G. Jones, eds., Why Narrative?; S. Hauerwas with A. MacIntyre, eds., Changing Perspectives in Moral Philosophy; J. Gustafson, Theology and Christian Ethics; A. MacIntyre, After Virtue; P. Nelson, Narrative and Morality; H. R. Niebuhr, Christ and Culture.

Head, Headship. As the determinative and most prominent part of the body, the head (Heb. rōš; Gk. kephalē) frequently represents the whole man (Gen. 49:26; 2 Sam. 15:30; Isa. 43:4, LXX; Acts

Head, Headship

18:6). Figuratively, "head" is used to designate the summit of a mountain (Gen. 8:5), a leader (Judg. 10:18), the source of a road (Ezek. 21:19, 21), and, generally, any position of superiority (Deut. 28:13; Isa. 7:8). The theologically significant uses of the term are confined almost exclusively to Paul.

In 1 Corinthians 11:3 Paul designates God as "the head of Christ." The Arians appealed to this text to establish their doctrine of the ontological subordination of the Son to the Father. Taking kephalē to mean source or origin, others have found support here for the view, developed by the Cappadocian fathers and maintained in the Orthodox Church, that the Father is the cause or source of the Godhead, the Son and the Spirit deriving their personal subsistences from him. The Western fathers and most Protestant theologians argue that as "Christ" is the designation not of the second person of the Trinity, the eternal Son of God, but of the incarnate Son, the God-man, Paul means no more than that the incarnate Son of God is subject to the Father in his mediatorial office.

Paul ascribes to Christ a double headship. First, he is the head of all things (Eph. 1:10, 22) and head over every power and authority (Col. 2:10). Christ's headship over creation is by virtue of his being its creator, its sustainer, its ruler, its restorer, and himself its end and purpose (Eph. 1:10, 23; Col. 1:15–19). With these assertions Paul emphatically excludes the existence of anyone or anything outside of the authority of Christ and thus establishes the necessity of the church being subject to Christ alone (Col. 2:8–10, 16–20).

Second, Christ's headship over all things is exercised with a view toward the church over which he is the head in a special sense (Eph. 1:22–23). The special character of Christ's headship over the church is indicated by the designation of the church as the body of Christ. The relationship between these two metaphors of head and body poses a problem. The metaphor of the head sometimes occurs without any thought of a body attached to the head (1 Cor. 11:3). The metaphor of the body is sometimes used without a view to Christ's headship, indeed with the head represented only as part of the body (12:14–27). Even in certain texts where head and body occur together, the church is represented as the whole body, that is, not as the trunk of the body without the head (Eph. 4:16). Apparently Paul is working with two separate metaphors, Christ the head and the church the body, and has at several points in Ephesians and Colossians brought them together.

Paul employs the concept of Christ's headship over the church to indicate that Christ is the source of the church's life, indeed that its life is in actuality a participation in his own (Eph.

1:22–23; 5:23; Col. 2:19); that the union between Christ and the church is profoundly personal and spiritual (Eph. 5:28–32); that Christ loves his church and is concerned for its welfare (5:29–30); that he is the provider of all things needful for its growth and vitality (4:7–16); that he is the Lord of the church and believers his subjects (5:23–24); and that believers united to Christ form a unity themselves (4:15–16). The headship of Christ is a particularly rich Pauline theme and incorporates aspects of each of Christ's offices: prophet, priest, and king.

Christ's relationship to the church is depicted further in the ascription to him in the NT of the phrase from Psalm 118:22, "the head of the corner" (Gr. kephalē gōnias or akrogōniaios; Matt. 21:42; Acts 4:11; Eph. 2:20; 1 Pet. 2:6–7). Whether the phrase refers to the keystone above the door or, as is more probable, to the cornerstone of the foundation, it suggests the fundamental dependence of the church upon Christ.

In Protestant theology in general and Reformed theology in particular the doctrine of Christ's headship over the church occupied an important place in the polemics of church polity. This headship is appealed to as the chief bulwark of the spiritual freedom of the church from either the authority of the pope or that of the magistrate.

The idea of headship is also employed by Paul to describe the relationship between husband and wife. In 1 Corinthians 11:3 kephalē is normally understood to designate a position of superiority or rule. Others have suggested that it ought to be translated "source" or "origin." In this case, Paul would be pointing to the fact that, while man originates immediately from the creative act of Christ, woman is brought forth out of the man (cf. Gen. 2:18–25). In any case, for Paul the headship of the male in the home and the church does involve a superiority of rank and authority (1 Cor. 11:7–9; Eph. 5:22–24).

R. S. RAYBURN

Bibliography. J. Ainslie, Doctrine of Ministerial Order in the Reformed Churches of the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries; J. Bannerman, Church of Christ; K. Barth, Church Dogmatics; J. R. Bartlett, "Use of the Word Rōsh as a Title in the Old Testament," VT 19:1–10; S. Bedale, "Meaning of kephalē in the Pauline Epistles," JTS new series 5:211–15; J. A. Fitzmyer, "Another Look at kephalē in 1 Corinthians 11:3," NTS 35:503–11; W. Grudem, "Does kephalē (Head) Mean 'Source' or 'Authority over' in Greek Literature?" TJ 6 n.s. (1985), 38–59; W. Grudem and J. Piper, eds., Recovering Biblical Manhood and Womanhood: A Response to Evangelical Feminism; K. Munzer and C. Brown, NIDNTT 2:156–63; H. Schlier, TDNT 3:673–81.

Headlam, Arthur Cayley (1862–1947). English theologian. Son of an Anglican clergyman and descendant of Oliver Cromwell, he was born in County Durham and educated at Oxford where he became a fellow of All Souls' College in 1885. He was ordained in 1889, rector of Welwyn (1896–1903), professor of dogmatic theology at King's College, London (1903–18), and professor of divinity at Oxford (1918–23) before consecration as bishop of Gloucester (1923–45).

While firmly within the mainstream of Anglicanism and often associated with conservative viewpoints, he steadily refused to be identified with any ecclesiastical party, and his ecumenical tendencies were reflected in Doctrine of the Church and Christian Reunion (1920). Headlam accepted the validity of ministry and sacrament in England's historic Nonconformist churches and warmly encouraged relations with the Eastern Orthodox, Lutherans, and Old Catholics. A man of plain (and sometimes abrasive) speaking who disliked fudging and appreciated candor in others, Headlam was one of the most influential bishops of his era.

He was also a formidable scholar who had traveled in the Near East with William Ramsay. An early publication in collaboration with William Sanday was the highly acclaimed and durable commentary on Romans (1895). Later works included St. Paul and Christianity (1913), Life and Teaching of Jesus the Christ (1923), and Christian Theology (1934). Headlam also edited the prestigious Church Quarterly Review (1901–21). His last work, Fourth Gospel as History (1948), published posthumously, contains a biographical essay by Agnes Headlam-Morley.

J. D. DOUGLAS

Heal, Healing. The restoration of health (Ps. 41:3), the making whole or well whether physically, mentally, or spiritually. The Bible indicates that God's highest will for man is for him to "enjoy good health . . . even as your soul is getting along well" (3 John 2). Healing is a prominent topic in the Bible. Sickness is cured by the supernatural intervention of God with or without the use of earthly means. God himself proclaimed, "I am the LORD, who heals you" (Exod. 15:26), and Scripture clearly teaches that God heals all of man's diseases (Ps. 103:3). In the OT the word used most commonly to denote healing is rāpā', in the LXX iaomai frequently stands for rāpā', and in the NT healing is normally expressed by the words therapeuō and iaomai.

The Bible presents two basic views concerning healing and sickness.

1) In the OT Yahweh alone was the source of healing, just as he was considered the source of sickness. Summarizing the basic OT attitude concerning sickness and healing, Deuteronomy 32:39 portrays God as the direct dispenser of sickness and disease as punishment for man's sin (see also Num. 12:9–15; 2 Chron. 21:18–19; 26:16–21), while healing is a reward for obedience, a manifestation of God's forgiveness, mercy, and love (e.g., Gen. 20:17; Ps. 41:5). This applied not only to individuals but also to entire nations (e.g., Exod. 23:22–25; Lev. 26:14–21; Num. 16:47; Deut. 7:15).

2) The second view of healing and sickness is not as prominent in the OT, although it is demonstrated in the book of Job, in certain healing stories, and in the Psalms. It is the motif upon which Jesus based his teachings. This view accepts sickness as the consequence of the universal corrupt nature of man caused by original sin (Gen. 2:17; 3:19; Rom. 5:12–21). Thus as a result of the fall of man through Adam, mankind became naturally susceptible to disease. In the NT sickness and Satan continue to be closely related (Matt. 12:22–28; Luke 13:16; however, Jesus' teachings, like the book of Job, demonstrate that sickness is not always divine punishment for man's individual sins (although this remains possible, John 5:14), nor is it normative for God to use sickness as punishment. Before Jesus healed a blind man his disciples asked, "Rabbi, who sinned, this man or his parents, that he was born blind?" 'Neither this man nor his parents sinned,' said Jesus, 'but this happened so that the work of God might be displayed in his life'" (John 9:1–3; cf. 11:4). Yet God does work through sickness to discipline and chasten his children (Heb. 12:6; Prov. 3:7–8, 11–12) and even to assist in developing faith, humility, and character, as in the case of Job and Paul (Job 40:4; 42:6; 2 Cor. 4:17). Nevertheless, sickness is basically an evil that contradicts and hinders God's will and desire for man.

In the healing ministry of Christ faith was a dominant factor. Normally faith on the part of the sufferer or by someone on his behalf was a prerequisite for healing and was assumed to be present, not initiated, by the healing itself (e.g., Matt. 8:13; 9:2, 22, 29; 15:28). Illustrating this, Mark 6:5–6 and Matthew 13:58 expressly record that Christ could not heal in Nazareth due to the people's lack of faith, and in Matthew 17:20 a healing was delayed because of a lack of faith. James 5:15 emphasizes that it is the prayer of faith that brings healing.

The most controversial theological aspect of divine healing is its relationship to the atonement. One view maintains that the privilege of physical healing is governed by the will and sovereignty of God—i.e., God heals whomever he wills. Most supporters of divine healing, however, believe that physical healing, like salvation, is an inheritance of every believer through the atoning death of Christ. Using Matthew 8:16–17 to interpret Isaiah 53:4, this view concludes that Christ bore man's bodily as well as his spiritual suffering on the cross. Thus one receives his physical healing by faith just as he receives his salvation.

Heal, Healing

Because of faith's integral part in divine healing, some supporters of the doctrine believe the use of medical means and the supernatural are mutually exclusive. Since the root cause of sickness is sin and the only cure of sin is spiritual, they believe the only cure for sickness is spiritual. Any medical attempt at helping would imply a lack of faith in God's healing power. John Alexander Dowie's 1895 sermon entitled "Doctors, Drugs and Devils; or the Foes of Christ the Healer" illustrates this view that medical means are Satan's instruments to defeat the believer's exercise of true faith. The Bible, however, does not support this radical position. In both the OT and NT the medical means of the day were utilized (e.g., 2 Kings 20:2-11; Luke 10:34; 1 Tim. 5:23) unless they were connected with paganistic practices (e.g., Asa sought a physician who was the equivalent of a pagan magician, 2 Chron. 16:12). The Jews of the dispersion believed "the Lord created medicines out of the earth, and a prudent man will have no disgust at them" (Sir. 38:1-15). Matthew 9:12 shows that Christ himself considered it normal for people to consult physicians.

The healing ministry of Jesus was continued through his commissioning and sending out of the twelve (Matt. 10:1-5; Mark 6:7-13; Luke 9:1-6) and the seventy (Luke 10:9). The book of Acts and the epistles provide clear evidence of the continuance of divine healing throughout the apostolic church, and James 5:14-16 placed the healing of the sick through the prayer of faith as a permanent provision and promise of the "righteous man." There is also abundant evidence through the early church fathers (e.g., Irenaeus, Origen, Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Augustine) to verify the continued widespread practice of divine healing after the time of the apostles. Pope Innocent I described anointing and prayer for the sick as a right which every sick believer should expect. By the ninth century a significant decline in the practice of divine healing had begun. During the pre-Reformation period the practice of healing continued, but only in isolated instances, as with Bernard of Clairvaux or the Waldensians. Luther and the English Reformers renewed the practice in their ministries, and in the post-Reformation period such groups as the Brethren, Mennonites, Quakers, Moravians, and Wesleyans practiced the doctrine. In the nineteenth century a healing revival exploded in Europe under the leadership of Dortha Trudel, Otto Stockmayer, Johannes Blumhardt, and William Boardman. In America during the nineteenth century the Holiness Movement began a distinctive divine healing ministry with such leaders as Charles Cullis, Carrie Judd Montgomery, A. B. Simpson, A. J. Gordon, R. A. Torrey, and John Alexander Dowie. Divine healing also became a major doctrine of the modern Pentecostal and charismatic movements.

From Genesis to Revelation, from the early church to the twentieth century, the record demonstrates that physical healing by divine intervention has been the experience of many of God's people.

P. G. CHAPPELL

See also HOLINESS MOVEMENT, AMERICAN; PENTECOSTALISM; SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

Bibliography. K. M. Bailey, Divine Healing, the Children's Bread; W. E. Boardman, Great Physician (Jehovah Rophi); F. F. Bosworth, Christ the Healer; H. Bushnell, Nature and the Supernatural; R. K. Carter, Atonement for Sin and Sickness; "Faith Healing" Reviewed after Twenty Years; R. A. DiOrio, Called to Heal; E. Frost, Christian Healing; A. J. Gordon, Ministry of Healing; R. K. Harrison, ISBE (rev.) 2:640-47; M. T. Kelsey, Healing and Christianity in Ancient Thought and Modern Times; R. Lawrence, Christian Healing Rediscovered; F. MacNutt, Healing; M. Maddocks, Christian Healing Ministry; R. L. Marsh, "Faith Healing": A Defense; D. Müller, NIDNTT 2:163-72; A. Murray, Divine Healing; L. J. Ogilvie, Why Not? Accept Christ's Healing and Wholeness; J. C. Peddie, Forgotten Talent; F. W. Pullen, Anointing of the Sick; A. Sanford, Healing Light; O. Stockmayer, Sickness and the Gospel; R. A. Torrey, Divine Healing; C. P. Wagner, ed., Signs and Wonders Today; B. B. Warfield, Counterfeit Miracles; J. Wilkinson, Bible and Healing.

Healing, Gift of. See SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

Heart. Biblical Psychology. Hebrew and Christian views on the nature of man were developed in a religious setting; there is no systematized or scientific psychology in the Bible. Nevertheless, certain fundamental conceptions are worthy of note: (1) In the OT there is no very marked emphasis on individuality but, rather, on what is frequently now termed corporate personality. Yet (2) A. R. Johnson has shown that a fundamental characteristic of OT anthropology is the awareness of totality. Man is not a body plus a soul, but a living unit of vital power, a psychophysical organism. (3) The Hebrews thought of man as influenced from without—by evil spirits, the devil, or the Spirit of God—whereas in modern psychology the emphasis has tended to be placed on dynamic factors operating from within (though at the present time, fresh interest is being evoked in the study of environmental forces as factors influencing human behavior). (4) The study of particular words in the OT and NT affords a comprehensive view of the underlying Hebrew and Christian conceptions of man.

In the OT. In the English versions several Hebrew expressions are translated "heart," the main words being leb and lebāb. In a general sense, heart means the midst, the innermost or hidden part of anything. Thus, the midst (or heart) of the sea (Ps. 46:2); of heaven (Deut. 4:11); of the oak (2 Sam. 18:14).

In the physiological sense, heart is the central bodily organ, the seat of physical life. Thus, Jacob's heart "fainted" (Gen. 45:26); Eli's heart "trembled" (1 Sam. 4:13).

But, like other anthropological terms in the OT, heart is also used very frequently in a psychological sense, as the center or focus of man's inner personal life. The heart is the source, or spring, of motives; the seat of the passions; the center of the thought processes; the spring of conscience. Heart, in fact, is associated with what is now meant by the cognitive, affective, and volitional elements of personal life.

The book of Proverbs is illuminating here: The heart is the seat of wisdom (2:10; etc.); of trust (or confidence) (3:5); diligence (4:23); perverseness (6:14); wicked imaginations (6:18); lust (6:25); subtlety (7:10); understanding (8:5); deceit (12:20); folly (12:23); heaviness (12:25); bitterness (14:10); sorrow (14:13); backsliding (14:14); cheerfulness (15:13); knowledge (15:14); joy (15:30); pride (16:5); haughtiness (18:12); prudence (18:15); rage (19:3); envy (23:17).

In the NT. The NT word is kardia. It, too, has a wide psychological and spiritual connotation. Our Lord emphasized the importance of right states of heart. It is the pure in heart who see God (Matt. 5:8); sin is first committed in the heart (5:28); out of the heart proceed evil thoughts and acts (15:19); forgiveness must come from the heart (18:35); men must love God with all their heart (22:37); the word of God is sown, and must come to fruition, in the heart (Luke 8:11–15).

Paul's use of kardia is on similar lines. According to H. W. Robinson, Christian Doctrine of Man, in fifteen cases heart denotes personality, or the inner life, in general (e.g., 1 Cor. 14:25); in thirteen cases, it is the seat of emotional states of consciousness (e.g., Rom. 9:2); in eleven cases, it is the seat of intellectual activities (e.g., 1:21); in thirteen cases, it is the seat of the volition (e.g., 2:5). Paul uses other expressions, such as mind, soul, and spirit, to augment the conception of man; but, on the whole, it may be said that the NT word kardia reproduces and expands the ideas included in the OT words leb and lebāb.

The Gospel of the New Heart. Since the heart is regarded as the center or focus of man's personal life, the spring of all his desires, motives, and moral choices—indeed, of all his behavioral trends—it is not surprising to note that in both Testaments the divine appeal is addressed to the "heart" of man.

The subject is too broad to allow full treatment here; but the leading ideas may be outlined thus. The evil imagination, according to the rabbis, is located in the heart (Gen. 6:5); the heart is engraven with sin; it is deceitful and desperately sick (Jer. 17:1–10); but it can be cleansed (Ps. 51:10) and renewed (Ezek. 36:26), and can be made to bear the impress of the divine law (Jer.

31:33). God searches the heart (Rom. 8:27); he shines in our hearts with the light of the knowledge of his glory in the face of Jesus Christ (2 Cor. 4:6); it is the pure in heart who obtain the beatific vision (Matt. 5:8). The important point is that, whether in Old or New Testaments, or in rabbinic teaching, it is in the heart, in the innermost recesses of his being, that man is illumined, cleansed, renewed, by attention to the Word of God. It is an inward renewal, a new birth, a regeneration.

Conclusion. In view of modern trends in psychology, it is instructive to note this emphasis on the heart in early Hebrew and Christian literature. True, these early writers tended to think of man as influenced from without; but they saw clearly that it is in the heart of man that moral and spiritual battles must be fought and won. Hence the Psalmist's prayer (Ps. 19:14): "Who can discern his errors? Forgive my hidden faults. . . . May the words of my mouth and the meditation of my heart be pleasing in your sight, O LORD, my Rock and my Redeemer." O. R. BRANDON

See also MANKIND, DOCTRINE OF.

Bibliography. R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament; R. Jewett, Paul's Anthropological Terms; A. R. Johnson, Vitality of the Individual in the Thought of Ancient Israel; K. Rahner, Theological Investigations; T. Sorg, NIDNTT 2:180–84; W. D. Stacey, Pauline View of Man; F. Baumgärtel, et al., TDNT 3:605–14; L. S. Thornton, Common Life in the Body of Christ.

Heaven. The most frequently used Hebrew word for heaven in the OT is šamayim, signifying "heaved up things" or "the heights." In the Greek NT it is ouranos, which denotes "sky" or "air." These words refer to the atmosphere just above the earth (Gen. 1:20, etc.); to the firmament in which the sun and moon and stars are located (1:17, etc.); to God's abode (Ps. 2:4, etc.); and to the abode of the angels (Matt. 22:30). The OT has no word for universe, and to express the idea there is the frequent "heaven and earth." We read of "the heaven and the heaven of heavens" (Deut. 10:14), and of a man's being "caught up into the third heaven" (2 Cor. 12:2), but such references are probably to be thought of metaphorically.

Although some, like Plato, imagine heaven to be a disembodied state where naked minds contemplate the eternal, unchanging ideas, in the Bible this is not so. According to Paul, the whole person survives. Even the body is raised again, so that, if it is no longer flesh and blood (1 Cor. 15:50), it nevertheless has a continuity with the present body, a sameness in form if not in material element (see Matt. 5:29, 30; 10:28; Rom. 8:11, 23; 1 Cor. 15:53). So there is nothing in the Bible (nor in the main creeds of the church) about disembodied spirits in the next world existing in vacuo. Yet there is no eating nor drinking (Rom.

Heaven

14:17), nor appetite of sex (Matt. 22:30; Mark 12:25; Luke 20:35). Feasting there is evidently to be understood symbolically, according to Matthew 26:29 where Jesus speaks of that day when he will drink the fruit of the vine “new” with the disciples in his Father’s kingdom. In heaven the redeemed will be in the immediate presence of God and will forever feed on the splendor of God’s majesty, beholding the Father’s face. In the present life men “see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face” (1 Cor. 13:12). And the sons of God will see Christ “as he is” (1 John 3:2). The childlike in faith, even as the angels do now, will “always behold the face” of the Father (Matt. 18:10). They will not so much glory in the presence of Supreme Reason, as the Greeks anticipated, but in the wonder of the All-Holy One (Isa. 6:3; Rev. 4:8). And this God is a Father, in whose house (John 14:2) the redeemed will dwell, where “they will be his people,” and where “God himself will be with them” (Rev. 21:3).

There will be activities in heaven to engage man’s highest faculties. For one thing, there will be governmental ministries. The “spirits of righteous men made perfect” (Heb. 12:23) will be in the “the heavenly Jerusalem, city of the living God” (12:22), and men are to assist in governing the whole. Thus in the parable of the nobleman the good servant, who has been “trustworthy in a very small matter” on earth, is in heaven to be given authority over ten cities (Luke 19:17). In Matthew the servant who had been given five talents and who had gained five talents more is told “Well done, good and faithful servant! . . . I will put you in charge of many things. Come and share your master’s happiness!” (25:20–21). Perhaps new songs are to be written and sung (Rev. 5:9). The “redeemed from the earth,” too, are to learn a “new song” (14:3). And the kings of the earth are to “bring their splendor into it” (21:24). So while there is to be on the part of the redeemed a continuous worship in heaven, it seems to be in the sense that all activities engaged in will be for the sole glory of God and will therefore partake of the nature of worship.

J. K. GRIDER

See also FINAL STATE.

Bibliography. J. S. Bonnell, Heaven and Hell; P. J. Kreeft, Heaven: The Heart’s Deepest Longing; R. Lewis, New Vision of Another Heaven; A. T. Lincoln, Paradise Now and Not Yet: Studies in the Role of the Heavenly Dimension in Paul’s Thought with Special Reference to His Eschatology; D. L. Moody, Heaven; K. Schilder, Heaven: What Is It?; B. Siede et al., NIDNTT 2:184–96; W. M. Smith, Biblical Doctrine of Heaven; H. B. Swete, Ascended Christ; P. Toon, Heaven and Hell: A Biblical and Theological Overview; G. von Rad et al., TDNT 5:497–547.

Heavenlies, The. This phrase (en tois epourani-ois) occurs five times in Ephesians (1:3, 20; 2:6; 3:10; 6:12) and nowhere else in the NT. It is translated “in the heavenly places” (KJV, RSV, NASB) and “in the heavenly realms” (NIV). The “heavenlies” is the spiritual sphere where God, Christ, the spiritual powers, and believers exist together. Believers, while they live in the physical world, at the same time are seated with the risen Christ in the heavenlies, where they are enjoying their spiritual blessings and are engaged in the real battle for their souls with the demonic powers.

The Greek adjective used means “heavenly” and is used here substantively (cf. John 3:12; Heb. 8:5; 9:23). Some translate “with/among the heavenly beings/things,” but the phrase most likely denotes a spatial concept—“places.” Ephesians 1:20 and 2:6 speak of being “seated” in the heavenlies, which implies a location, and 3:10 and 6:12 make sense only if “heavenlies” describes a place. The phrase appears to be a formula and its meaning is therefore probably consistent. Although “heavenlies” is a spatial concept, it is a spiritual and not a physical place. The plural “places” may be due to Semitic influence (e.g., the use of “heavens,” in the plural), or it may have been used to emphasize the vastness of the spiritual arena.

God raised Christ to sit at this right hand in the heavenlies (Eph. 1:20; cf. Ps. 110:1; Heb. 8:1; 9:24; 1 Pet. 3:22). God also raised believers with Christ so that, while they are living on earth, at the same time they are also seated with Christ in the heavenlies (Eph. 2:6), enjoying their spiritual blessings given by God (1:3; the blessings are enumerated in 1:4–14). This is not a Platonic dualism, for both the physical and spiritual realms are real and there is no necessary correlation between the two realms. It is also not a bodily dualism with part of man on earth and part in the heavenlies. It is an “in Christ” dualism. Ephesians 1:3 and 2:6 say that we are “in the heavenlies” because we are “in Christ.” We are therefore “in the heavenlies” in the same sense that we are “in Christ.” This is also not to say that Paul’s eschatology is fully realized. It is partially realized, but there is still a future element (cf. 1:14, 21; 2:7; 4:30; 5:5, 27; 6:8).

The heavenlies are also the arena of the real battle for believers’ lives because it is here that the spiritual powers exist (Eph. 3:10). The believers’ real battle is not fought against the things of this world but rather against the spiritual forces who are in the heavenlies (2:6; cf. Job 1:6; Rev. 12:7).

Our real battle is not fought on earth: the real battle is a spiritual battle against spiritual foes. But we have won the victory because Christ is now in control of all (Eph. 1:21–23; cf. Acts 4:12; 1 Cor. 15:24; Eph. 1:10; 6:9; Phil. 2:10; Col. 1:16–20; 1 Pet. 3:22). We have our spiritual blessings and are now seated with Christ in the heavenlies.

W. D. MOUNCE

See also PRINCIPALITIES AND POWERS.

Bibliography. A. T. Lincoln, "Re-examination of 'The Heavenlies' in Ephesians," NTS 19:468–83; R. M. Pope, "Studies in Pauline Vocabulary: 'Of the Heavenly Places,'" ExpT 23:365–68; H. Traub, TDNT 5:538–43.

Heavens, New. See NEW HEAVENS AND NEW EARTH.

Heave Offering. See OFFERINGS AND SACRIFICES IN BIBLE TIMES.

Hedonism. From the Greek hēdonē, pleasure. Hedonism comprises all those ethical theories that identify the moral goal as happiness, pleasure. The ancient Cyrenaics assumed that accurate foresight of the pleasurable or painful results of actions constituted wisdom; later they emphasized present pleasure as the result always to be sought. Epicureans modified this, cultivating a total life of pleasure against merely momentary pleasures: "pleasure through prudence" ensuring subtlety, variety, permanence, to satisfy a rational being. Neither "pure" nor "modified" hedonism provided truly moral guidance.

"Psychological hedonism" held that pleasure/pain governs all choices (Bentham); desiring anything and finding it pleasurable are inseparable (Mill). Certainly, any object must attract (move with anticipated pleasure) before it can be chosen: yet desire for some object must precede pleasure in its attainment; pleasure itself, even a pleasant thing, is not always chosen, since that would yield no moral guidance.

"Egotistic hedonism" (Hobbes) held that, general happiness being an abstraction, each should seek only his own; or, that each seeking his own would promote general happiness. But the idea that even refined selfishness always promotes the general good contradicts all experience.

"Altruistic hedonism" (the very influential Utilitarianism) held that each should seek the greatest happiness of the greatest number (Mill), intellectual identification with others (Sidgwick); or emotional sympathy (Hume), making others' happiness necessary to one's own. But if pleasure be the goal, why should others' pleasure deny one's own? To appeal to justice and unselfishness introduces nonhedonist considerations. And can pleasure be so totaled and shared out?

In general, hedonism is criticized for identifying happiness with pleasure; for arguing that because what one chooses must attract, therefore pleasure itself is the only goal, the object as well as the accompaniment of choice; for ignoring that a person can pursue many things (artistic excellence, freedom, faith) while indifferent to pleasures they might bring; for ignoring the truly moral question: with what ought I to be pleased, to what extent, at what cost? Also, for reducing morality to feeling, omitting its rational, ethical, social aspects; for providing no criteria to distinguish pleasures, higher from lower, worthy from unworthy, animal from spiritual, or to reconcile contradictory pleasures, or one person's with another's. Further, pleasure being intensely individualistic, society has no common center of feeling for pleasure or pain. Hedonism finds no place for sacrifice, disinterestedness, or duty. Obligation being dissolved into desire, morality descends to expediency, the pursuit of the comfortable. Attempts to evaluate pleasure goals led on to (non-hedonist) "value theory."

Nevertheless moral life does involve feeling. Promises of "reward" run all through Scripture, and Christianity, inheriting the idea that a loving God created man sentient, has never dispensed with hedonist considerations. It holds that right conduct will yield ultimate satisfaction, that love will ever promote the happiness of others. Sixteen times Jesus pronounces certain attitudes and qualities "happy," and he describes life under divine rule in the language of feasting, wine, pearls, treasure, joy. Paul, too, expects Christians to be happy (Phil. 4:4–9; note 1 Cor. 7:40).

Augustine expounded Christian "eudaemonism" (Gr. eudaimonia, happiness): morality being the pursuit of the good, what will obtain happiness, then what matters is where men seek it. There is no happiness in the satisfaction of every random desire, in things impermanent or in things of less value than the soul, but only in man's chief good—God. To love and enjoy God is happiness indeed. Ambrose and Aquinas include "felicity" in man's final end. Butler thought man's nature leads him to seek the greatest happiness possible; due concern and reasonable effort toward happiness is virtuous. "It deserves consideration whether men are at liberty . . . to make themselves miserable without reason than to make other people so." So Kant, convinced that man was made to require happiness within his ultimate end, posited God and immortality to reconcile the demands of duty with the inescapable need for happiness.

Most modern Christians are hedonist enough to expect happiness to follow dedication, though they translate pleasure into "blessing" and assume that God's love means divine concern to shelter, comfort, and reward the good. A mature Christian hedonism, while energetic for the happiness of others, would never make its own happiness a goal, but only a reward, if God so wills, for life devoted to disinterested service of Christ; while in “happiness” it would include total spiritual welfare, with felt divine acceptance.

Hedonism

R. E. O. WHITE

See also HAPPINESS.

Bibliography. Augustine, Moral Behavior; Sermons; P. B. Edwards, Pleasures and Pains: A Theory of Qualitative Hedonism; J. C. B. Gosling, Case for Hedonism Reviewed; W. R. Matthews, ed., Butler's Sermons and Dissertation upon Virtue; D. D. Raphael, British Moralists 1650–1800.

Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich (1770–1831). German philosopher. He was born the son of a civil servant at Stuttgart, and nothing about his early life or schooling would indicate the great influence he would have. Upon his graduation from the University of Tübingen in 1793, his certificate commended his good character and fair knowledge of theology and philology, as well as his inadequate grasp of philosophy. After being a resident tutor for aristocratic families, Hegel accepted a teaching position at the University of Jena in 1801. Here he came under the influence of Schelling, with whom he worked in editing the Critical Journal of Philosophy. At Jena he also wrote his first major work, Phenomenology of Spirit. Unfortunately, a military battle in 1807 forced the university to close, so Hegel briefly worked as an editor of a daily paper. In 1808 he became headmaster of a school in Nuremberg, where his philosophical work continued to blossom on his own time. In 1816 he began teaching philosophy at the University of Heidelberg. Finally, in 1818, he became a professor of philosophy at the University of Berlin, where he became famous and influential.

Hegel was the most influential of the German idealists. In his view, only mind is real; everything else is the expression of mind. Philosophy became a kind of theology for Hegel, because he saw all reality as an expression of the Absolute, who is God. All that exists is the expression of divine mind, so that the real is rational and the rational is real.

In terms of method, Hegel sought to accentuate what he considered to be contradictions in people's thinking in order to expose the weaknesses of their views. He thought that error is caused by either incompleteness of thought or abstraction. By his exposing “contradictions,” people could see the incompleteness of their thoughts and be driven to an understanding of the particular and the real. Hegel thought of history itself as a forum in which the contradictions and inadequacies of finite thought and action are exposed, allowing the infinite mind of the Absolute to reach higher levels of cultural and spiritual expression.

According to Hegel, the state is man's highest social achievement. While he emphasized family love, he viewed the state as a higher and more universal expression of family love. The state provides the actuality of the ethical ideal; the mind of the nation is the divine, “the actual God,” knowing and willing itself. The fact that the state imposes its will by force did not bother Hegel, who considered war beneficial. War prevents stagnation in history and preserves the health of nations. Two different nations could both be right and could both be divine expressions; war decides which “right” has to give way to the other.

Hegel divided religion into four different stages—four ways of gaining knowledge of the Absolute. First is natural religion, or animism, in which man worshiped trees, streams, and animals. The second stage represents God in human form, with temples built and statues honored. This stage also involves the development of self-consciousness in humans. Historic Christianity provides the third stage. Through the incarnation God is present in the world—God and man together. Hegel valued the ethical teachings of Jesus, especially those of the Sermon on the Mount. Jesus did not distinguish enemies and friends; he broke down inequalities. With Jesus, morals were a spontaneous expression of life—a participation in divine life. The fourth stage is the highest; it is Hegel's reformulation of Christian beliefs into concepts of speculative philosophy.

Hegel saw God manifested in the world in many ways. History itself is a study of divine providence. Through divine action, “contradictions” between antithetical movements or cultures are repeatedly resolved into a higher synthesis. God expressed himself fully in the incarnation, for here his presence was not restricted beyond the world. Nevertheless, in the incarnation God was too bound to a particular setting. A more general philosophical religion is necessary. God is love, so that while negation and opposition are historically necessary between theses and antitheses, reconciliation and synthesis are always essential. The dialectical movements of history are expressions of God's providence throughout time.

Interpretations of Hegel vary widely. Many consider his philosophized Christianity heretical, thinly veiled pantheism. For others, Hegel's system is a sincere attempt to articulate Christian truth in philosophical language. His influence has been far-reaching, extending to Marx's historical dialectic on one hand and Kierkegaard's concern for self-awareness and passion on the other.

P. DE VRIES

See also BAUR, FERDINAND CHRISTIAN; STRAUSS, DAVID FRIEDRICH; TÜBINGEN SCHOOL.

Bibliography. G. W. F. Hegel, Lectures on the Philosophy of Religion; Phenomenology of Spirit; Philosophy of Right; Science of Logic; D. E. Christensen, ed., Hegel and the Philosophy of Religion; F. Copleston, History of Philosophy; C. Elder, Appropriating Hegel; J. N. Findlay, Hegel: A Reexamination; A. C. MacIntire, Hegel: A Collection of Critical Essays; H. R. Mackintosh, Types of Modern Theology; J. M. E. McTaggart, Studies in Hegelian Cosmology; G. R. G. Mure, Introduction to Hegel; T. Rockmore, Before and after Hegel; G. Rupp, Christologies and Culture; P. Singer, Hegel; R. C. Solomon, From Hegel to Existentialism; W. T. Stace, Philosophy of Hegel; E. Wyschogrod, Spirit in Ashes: Hegel, Heidegger and Man-Made Mass Death; J. Yerkes, Christology of Hegel.

Heidegger, Martin (1889–1976). A central figure in contemporary existentialist thought as well as a prime mover for new directions in hermeneutics. He was born in Baden, Germany. Early in his philosophical career he was a disciple of Husserl, being trained in Husserl's phenomenological method. When Heidegger wrote his most influential book, Being and Time, in 1927, he dedicated it to Husserl. Nevertheless, he later developed his own phenomenological method. Husserl had emphasized systematic, scientific, unchanging knowledge. He sought ideas and truth above the flux of historical change. In contrast, Heidegger concentrated on disclosing being within its historical expressions. His goal was to lay open what is hidden within the temporality of our existence. In 1933 Heidegger renounced Husserl. That same year he became the first National Socialist rector of the University of Freiburg. In this position he publicly gave enthusiastic support of the Third Reich. Extreme nationalism, as well as a belief in the superiority of the German language and culture, characterized his life.

In Being and Time, Heidegger characterizes everyday existence as inauthentic. We find ourselves thrown into our world, our mental universe. Each of us has his own world; for each of us our self and our world are inseparable. As a result, genuine being remains undiscovered. We give our attention to the pressing experience of everyday cares and events. Each human becomes merely a member of the crowd, hidden in the rat race of crises and moods. According to Heidegger, there is one and only one mood that leads humans to genuine self-knowledge and away from self-betrayal: that mood is dread. Instead of focusing on particular objects in our world, we should develop a sense of nothingness by facing the structure of our finite being-in-the-world. We develop the sense of nothingness by facing death: wholeness is found in "being-to-death." Death comes to us as individuals; by facing death we do not lose ourselves in the crowd. Also, our life develops a unity as we focus on its ending.

Heidegger sees human beings as primarily historical. We are necessarily related to the historical facts in which we find ourselves. To be authentic, I must resolve to make my historical situation vitally my own and not just be inflicted by historical circumstances. I owe this resolution to myself, but I can never fully realize it and am thus condemned to live with a sense of guilt. My destiny is to be authentically present, to freely play the role into which I have been cast (though not of my own choice). Why should I do this? I am this performance and nothing else. To live in the prospect of my own death is to realize that there is no substance, no deeper self. Humans are what they culturally interpret themselves to be. Humans are essentially self-interpreting beings; there is no bottom substance, for we are interpretation all the way down. Therefore, hermeneutics, the discipline of interpretation, is the central human task. Unfortunately, we seek to escape its challenge by clinging to facts and everyday activities.

While Heidegger was not a theologian, he expressed a deep religious concern in his writings. First, there is a constant focusing on our finitude and death. An awareness of death leads to authentic existence, though apart from any godly relationship. Second, Heidegger provided a constant religious critique of the contemporary world: we are too concerned with factual details and not concerned enough with true being. Because our age focuses on research and planning, we see our tasks in terms of limited, neat, manageable functions. He provides a biting religious critique of our neglect of genuine understanding and knowledge. Third, he nevertheless attacked Christianity for contributing to our self-betrayal. He believed that Christianity did not redeem but destroyed genuine culture. Along with other movements Christianity has made truth a matter of propositions rather than of existence. Fourth, Heidegger gives central importance to language: "Language is the house of Being." For him, the best of language is not found in logical or theological propositions but in the disclosures of poets. He sought to reorient theological and philosophical talk away from the modern scientific ideal.

Heidegger's influence on contemporary philosophy and theology is phenomenal. He deeply influenced strains of neo-orthodox thought, especially in the work of Bultmann and Tillich. His concept of hermeneutics has also generated new movements in that field. Under Heidegger's influence some have dropped grammatical-historical hermeneutics in favor of a more poetical, open-ended disclosure of being.

P. DE VRIES

See also BULTMANN, RUDOLF; EXISTENTIALISM; NEO-ORTHODOXY; TILlich, PAUL.

Bibliography. H. J. Blackham, Six Existentialist Thinkers; J. Collins, Existentialists: A Critical Study; M. Greve, Martin Heidegger; M. King, Heidegger's Philosophy: A Guide to His Basic Thought; H. Kuhn, Encounter with Nothingness; T. Langan, Meaning of Heidegger; J. Macquarrie, Existentialist Theology; Martin Heidegger; M. Murray, ed., Heidegger and Modern Philosophy; J. M. Robinson, Later Heidegger and Theology;

Heidegger, Martin

T. Sheahan, ed., Heidegger: The Man and the Thinker; G. Steiner, Martin Heidegger; A. Thiselton, Two Horizons; L. Versengi, Heidegger, Being and Truth; J. Wild, Challenge of Existentialism; E. Wyschogrod, Spirit in Ashes: Hegel, Heidegger and Man-Made Mass Death; M. Zimmerman, ed., Thought of Martin Heidegger.

Heidelberg Catechism (1563). Catechisms usually have three functions: instruction for all ages, preparatory training for confirmation, and the statement of a confessional position. The Heidelberg Catechism fulfills these three functions.

The Palatinate, south and west of Mainz, became Lutheran in 1546 under Elector Frederick II, but soon Calvinist ideas spread into the area and a series of acrimonious theological disputes broke out over the issue of the “real presence” in Holy Communion. When Frederick III the Pious (1515–76) inherited the area, he was aware of the disputes and studied both sides of the “real presence” argument. He came to the conclusion that Article XI of the Augsburg Confession was popish and opted for a Calvinist position. To foster his position, even though he was opposed by other Lutheran princes who pressured him to support the Peace of Augsburg, which did not recognize the Reformed position, Frederick staffed the theological faculty of the Collegium Sapientiae in Heidelberg, his capital, with those of Reformed persuasion, and he began to reform the worship of the churches in the Palatinate. In an effort to reconcile the theological parties, to bring about reform, and to defend himself against the Lutheran princes, Frederick asked the theological faculty to draw up a new catechism that could be used in the schools as a manual of instruction, a guide for preaching, and a confession of faith. Although many of the theological faculty were involved, as was Frederick himself, the two commonly acknowledged architects of the catechism were Caspar Olevianus and Zacharias Ursinus. The German text, with a preface by Frederick III, was adopted by a synod in Heidelberg on January 19, 1653. It was translated into Latin at the time of its publication.

The catechism is important for at least three reasons. (1) It came to be translated into numerous languages and was adopted by many groups, making it the most popular of Reformed statements. (2) Although born in the midst of theological controversy, it is irenic in spirit, moderate in tone, and devotional and practical in attitude. It espouses Reformed theology, as dictated by Frederick III, but Lutheran ideas were not slighted. The avoidance of polemics in the catechism, except for question 80, the use of clear language, and a sense of fervency helped to allay somewhat the theological controversies of that time and to guarantee an acceptance among the Reformed outside the Palatinate. (3) The organization of the catechism is most unusual. The 129 questions and answers are divided into three parts patterned after the book of Romans. Questions 1–11 deal with mankind’s sin and misery, questions 12–85 are concerned with the redemption in Christ and faith; the last questions stress man’s gratitude, expressed in action and obedience, for God’s love. The questions are further structured so that the whole catechism can be covered in fifty-two Sundays. In addition, the catechism provides an exposition of the Reformed view of the Apostles’ Creed and the Ten Commandments. The use of the first person singular encourages the catechism to be a personal confession of faith.

The Reformed theological perspective is found (1) in the doctrine of the sacraments, particularly the Eucharist, where believers are partakers in the true body and blood of Christ through the working of the Holy Spirit; (2) in the centrality of Scripture as authority; (3) in good works as the Christian response to divine grace; and (4) in the church as the true source of Christian discipline. The issue of predestination is found in question 54, where election is affirmed but reprobation and limited atonement are not. An example of Lutheran concepts is found in the section on man’s sinful condition.

R. V. SCHNUCKER

See also CATECHISMS; URSINUS, ZACHARIAS.

Bibliography. K. Barth, Heidelberg Catechism; H. Hoeksema, Heidelberg Catechism; H. Ott, Theology and Preaching; Z. Ursinus, Commentary on the Heidelberg Catechism; C. Van Til, Heidelberg Catechism.

Heilsgeschichte. A German word most often translated as “salvation history.” Broadly speaking it refers to the entire spectrum of biblical events and their scriptural interpretations through which, in Christian understanding, God is bringing redemption to the world.

A. J. Greig has established that the term does not occur before 1841, when it was coined by J. C. K. von Hofmann. In Hofmann’s time it would have seemed oxymoronic. By “Heil” he meant the blessedness that only transcendence can bestow; “Geschichte” in Enlightenment thought is the realm of pure immanence, from which the material presence of transcendence is barred. Seeing the two realms in organic connection had been ruled out by Kantian philosophy. This separation was increasingly embraced in nineteenth-century German theology. Hofmann’s coinage defied this trend.

In the twentieth century the term was subjected to wide usage, and its meaning depends on the author using it. Following Hofmann directly or indirectly, O. Procksch, J. Behm, M. Albertz, O. Cullmann, G. Ladd, and many others used it to signal a critical realist approach to biblical data and claims. While the Bible speaks of spiritual realities, they insisted, it does so in connection with temporal events and historical persons because it is through these means that God brought his saving will in Christ to pass.

Others like G. von Rad and R. Bultmann defined the word quite differently; for them it denoted the interior, psychological, or existential response to God's dealings with his people through the centuries, apart from the actual historical phenomena which the Bible claims grounded the faith of biblical characters. The temporal reality of such saving "events" as God's dealings with Abraham or his bodily resurrecting of Jesus may be doubted; what matters is the personal spiritual experience to which Scripture generally points.

Some scholars (e.g., A. Schlatter, J. G. Machen, B. Reicke) have modeled salvation-historical outlooks while making little or no use of the word Heilsgeschichte. Others (e.g., L. Goppelt) have used the word with a meaning substantially different from those in the mainstream of salvation-historical scholarship.

In the end, the term can helpfully denote a watershed between two major categories of biblical interpreters. One group's view of biblical history affirms Heilsgeschichte in its true sense: the material reality and continuing relevance of both the words and events to which Scripture attests. The other group (e.g., W. Wrede, H. Räisänen) sees history as effectively sealed off from sure knowledge of material divine influence along the lines laid down by Scripture; we can speak of Heilsgeschichte only in the sense of "Religionsgeschichte," the history of man's own attempt to articulate the experience of a divine reality that transcends his ken.

R. W. YARBROUGH

Bibliography. O. Cullmann, Salvation in History; L. Goppelt, Theology of the New Testament; A. J. Grieg, SJT 87:118–33; H. Räisänen, Beyond New Testament Theology; W. Wrede, "Task and Methods of 'New Testament Theology,'" in Nature of New Testament Theology, R. Morgan, ed.

Heim, Karl (1874–1958). German Lutheran theologian. His professional career spanned more than fifty years. After teaching at Halle and Münster, he was appointed at the age of forty-six to the faculty of theology at Tübingen, where he spent the rest of his life, producing several important works.

Heim was a sensitive and perceptive observer of the modern world as well as a committed churchman. This sensitivity and commitment produced a tension which he was able to harness in a creative manner. He was persuaded that the church could not retreat from the challenge that the twentieth-century's scientifically oriented worldview presented to it. On the contrary, if it was to retain its credibility, the church must enter into dialogue with the world outside and must direct its energies to answering the world's questions.

In his own work Heim attempted to uncover the intellectual bedrock of this scientifically oriented worldview. This attempt left him convinced that science and its attendant worldview were not equipped to answer the deepest existential questions of man and that the reality of a personal God belongs to a dimension which is different from everything accessible to scientific investigation. He therefore felt that modern man had two choices open to him: skepticism or a decision of faith. The world's conceptual scheme could lead only to an empty skepticism, but faith in Jesus Christ would lead to intellectual and spiritual wholeness.

During the traumatic years of the 1930s and early 40s, his sympathies were with the confessional church. Several of his works have been translated into English, including God Transcendent (1935) and Christian Faith and Natural Science (1953).

J. D. SPICELAND

Bibliography. I. Haolmstrand, Karl Heim on Philosophy, Science, and the Transcendence of God; C. Michaelson, HCT 273–94.

Heir. See INHERITANCE.

Hell. Belief in hell requires belief in supernaturalism. Such a view of reality has been overshadowed by antisupernaturalism in our day: Only our five senses can be trusted to tell us what is real and hell is beyond these five. Hell is not a part of the natural realm, which is the only real realm, and therefore must be denied. Truth, we are told, is discovered only by science and since hell can't be proven by the scientific method it must be rejected. Generally speaking the word "hell" is used in Scripture to refer to a place of future punishment for the wicked dead. However, there are other meanings also. There are times when the word is used to refer to the grave or to the place of the dead. Also, "hell" is used to speak of the place of disembodied spirits without any implication of either their bliss or torment.

One Hebrew word and two Greek words are each translated "hell" in the English translations of the Bible. These constitute the main teaching on the subject of hell and damnation. The Greek tartaroō appears once and is translated "cast down to hell" in the KJV (2 Pet. 2:4). In the Greek mind, Tartarus was below Hades, and in it divine punishment was endured comparable to that in Hades.

The Hebrew šē'ōl is variously translated as "the grave," "hell," and "the pit." The word appears only once outside the OT, in Jewish Elephantine papyri, where it means "grave." The derivation or etymology of the word is uncertain. In the OT it is used to refer to the grave several times (Job 17:13; Ps. 16:10; Isa. 38:10). It is also used for the place where the dead, both good and bad, abide (e.g., Gen. 37:35; Num. 16:33; Job 14:13; Ps. 55:15; Prov. 9:18). Darkness, gloom, forgetfulness, and distance from God are also implied in the word (Ps. 6:5; Isa. 38:18).

Hell

Jacob, at death, went down into Sheol (Gen. 37:35), but so did the wicked Korah and Dathan (Num. 16:30). Such teaching has led to the view that Sheol had two compartments—an upper and lower level. It is thought that Christ delivered the righteous in the upper level at the time of his resurrection (Eph. 4:9–10; 1 Pet. 3:19). Those who reject the two-compartment view of Sheol generally hold that Sheol had a double meaning. The word originally meant simply “the grave.” Later it was more specialized and used to refer to hell. Hell does seem to be more in view in the later passages, but a few of the earlier ones seem to have this idea also.

The Greek word hadēs parallels the Hebrew Sheol. In the LXX, which is the Greek translation of the OT, “Hades” usually appears as the rendering of “Sheol.”

Hades is used in the NT to refer to the underworld, the region of the departed. It defines the intermediate state between death and the future resurrection. Of the eleven times the word is used in the NT, it is rendered as “hell” by the KJV with one exception (1 Cor. 15:55, where “grave” appears).

On the one hand, Hades seems to be the gathering place of all souls (see Acts 2:27, 31, where it is the Greek translation of “Sheol” in Ps. 16:10). In Luke 16:23–26 all the dead are located in the underworld, but the word “Hades” itself is used only of the place where the wicked are punished.

Wherever the righteous dead went before Christ’s resurrection—Hades or heaven—we know from Paul’s testimony that to be absent from the body is now to be present with Christ (2 Cor. 5:8). Those who die in the Lord in this age go immediately into the presence of the Lord. Those who die without Christ go to Hades, where there is torment (Luke 16:19–31). They will later be brought from Hades to appear before the great white throne of judgment, after which they will all be cast into the lake of fire and experience eternal damnation (Rev. 20:11–15).

Gehenna, from the Greek geenna, is the eternal abode of the wicked. Whereas Hades is the intermediate state, Gehenna is eternal hell. Wherever it is used in the NT, it always means the place of eternal damnation.

The valley of Hinnom south of Jerusalem was the place where human sacrifices were offered to the pagan god Moloch in the days of Ahaz and Manasseh (2 Kings 16:3; 21:6). The dead bodies were thrown and burnt there. The prophets warned of judgment to come because of such sins (Jer. 7:32; 19:6 cf. Isa. 31:9; 66:24), and because of these threats, the valley came to be a symbol for eternal judgment.

The scriptural teaching of hell goes beyond these three words, however. Frequently, especially in the Gospels, hell is seen as “eternal punishment” (Matt. 25:41 NASB); “everlasting destruction” (2 Thess. 1:9); “everlasting contempt” (Dan. 12:2); “unquenchable fire” (Matt. 3:12; cf. 5:22; 18:9), “damnation” (Matt. 23:33 KJV), “fiery furnace” (Matt. 13:42, 50), “blackest darkness” (Jude 13), a “fiery lake of burning sulfur” (Rev. 21:8), a place “prepared for the devil and his angels” (Matt. 25:41).

In the history of the church a number of non-Christian religious groups have embraced universalism—the belief that all will eventually go to heaven—or annihilationism—the belief that at death the wicked cease to exist. Today a number of evangelical churchmen embrace variations of the above. Terms such as “biblical universalism,” “qualified universalism,” and “conditional immortality” are used to describe their views.

R. P. LIGHTNER

See also ETERNAL PUNISHMENT; GEHENNA; HADES.

Bibliography. H. Bietenhard, NIDNTT 2:205–10; W. Crockett, ed., Four Views of Hell; G. R. Habermas and J. P. Moreland, Immortality: the Other Side of Death; R. L. Harris, TWOT 2:892–93; J. Jeremias, TDNT 1:146–49; 657–58; R. A. Killen, WBE 1:778–79; R. G. Rayburn, WBE 1:418.

Helps, Gift of. See SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

Helvetic Confessions. The First Helvetic Confession (Confessio Helvetica prior) is the same as the Second Confession of Basel. The First Confession of Basel was written in 1534 and had acceptance only in Basel and Mühlhausen. This fact of limited acceptance was characteristic of the Swiss in the 1520s–30s; they had no common confession.

Pope Paul III’s call for a general council, the desire for some accommodation with the Lutherans, and the need for a common Swiss confession in preparation for the council prompted the magistrates of the Swiss cities to send delegates to Basel in 1536 to draw up a new confession. Johann Bullinger, Oswald Myconius, Simon Grynäeus, and Leo Jud were asked to prepare the confession. Their efforts to effect an accommodation with the Lutherans did not succeed. The first draft appeared to be too Lutheran to some, and to others the doctrine of the “real presence” in the Lord’s Supper was too Zwinglian. In the end, the twenty-seven articles of the first Reformed creed of “national” authority was not accepted by the Lutherans, although Luther viewed it with favor; and it was rejected by Strasbourg under Capito's leadership, and by Constance.

The issue of the "real presence" in the Lord's Supper was basically resolved for the Swiss in 1549 when Calvin and Farel visited Bullinger and they worked out the Zurich Consensus. From this point on the Zwinglian movement and the Calvinists were effectively one.

The Second Helvetic Confession began as Bullinger's personal confession written in Latin in 1562. Peter Martyr Vermigli read it shortly before his death and agreed with it—a good sign for its ultimate acceptance in the Reformed faith. In 1564 the plague broke out in Zurich, Bullinger's wife and three daughters died from it, and Bullinger contracted the disease but recovered. While the plague raged, he revised his 1562 confession and set it with his will to be delivered to the city magistrate in the event of his death.

Frederick III the Pious had come under attack for his Reformed position as seen in his church reforms in the Palatinate and in the publishing of the Heidelberg Catechism. He was accused by his Lutheran allies of being a heretic. So in 1565, in order to defend himself, he asked Bullinger to supply him with a clear exposition of the Reformed faith. Bullinger sent him a copy of his 1564 confession. Frederick was so pleased, he asked for and got permission from Bullinger to translate the confession into German. This was done prior to Frederick's appearance at the Imperial Diet in Augsburg in 1566.

At the same time the Swiss again felt the need for a new common confession, and a conference was called to meet in Zurich. Bullinger's confession was considered and a few changes were made in it, to which Bullinger consented. It was published in German and Latin on March 12, 1566, and had the approval of Berne, Biel, Geneva, The Grisons, Mühlhausen, Schaffhausen, and St. Gall. This Second Helvetic Confession (Confessio Helvetica posterior) was soon translated into a number of languages ranging from French to Arabic and was adopted by the Scots in 1566, the Hungarians in 1567, the French in 1571, and the Poles in 1578. The same month in which the confession was adopted at Zurich, Frederick III appeared before the Diet and so defended his position that he was not tried for heresy.

Due to its origin as Bullinger's personal confession, which followed the order of the twenty-seven articles of the First Helvetic Confession, the Second Helvetic Confession is really a theological treatise with thirty chapters and over twenty thousand words. This lengthy scholarly statement shows the consistency of the Reformed position with that of the Greek and Latin church fathers. Although the confession accepts the ecumenical creeds, it does not accept the primacy of Rome. Scripture is given primacy, and this is shown by the fact that the first two chapters emphasize that belief. Scripture is God's Word, which has precedence over the church fathers, councils, and church tradition. Chapters 3–5 deal with God, his unity, his trinity, the problem of idols, images, and with God's proper worship. The doctrine of providence and creation are the topics of chapters 6–7, while chapters 8–11 cover the fall, free will, predestination—where election to reprobation is not mentioned—and Christ as the true God-man and only Savior of the world. The next five chapters generally cover the way of salvation and the new life in Christ. Chapter 12 discusses the law of God; 13 the gospel of Christ; 14 the repentance and conversion of mankind; 15 justification of faith; 16 faith and good works where good works are done out of gratitude for God's grace and not for merit. Chapters 17–21 present the Reformed position on the church, the role of the ministry, and the two sacraments, baptism and the Lord's Supper. The last nine chapters cover church ordinances; 22 is on religious and ecclesiastical meetings; 23 deals with prayers and singing; 24 with holy days and fasting; 25 catechizing and visiting the sick; 26 burial; 27 rites and ceremonies; 28 possessions of the church; 29 marriage and celibacy; and 30 the magistracy, where the taking up of arms is affirmed but only in self-defense and as a last resort.

The Heidelberg Catechism and the Second Helvetic Confession are the two most widely adopted and authoritative of the Reformed statements of faith.

R. V. SCHNUCKER

See also BULLINGER, JOHANN HEINRICH; CONFESSIONS OF FAITH.

Hengstenberg, Ernst Wilhelm (1802–1869). German exegete, editor and orientalist. Born in Fröndenberg, the son of a Lutheran pastor, he studied at Bonn where his theological interests were complemented by courses in classical philology, philosophy, and Arabic, in which he earned a doctorate. A short stint at Basel followed; then he graduated in theology at Berlin with a dissertation that upheld the truth of Protestantism against rationalism, especially in the context of Old Testament issues. His later position as professor of theology at Berlin linked him with scholars such as Tholuck, Strauss, and Neander, but his vigorous orthodoxy brought also the hostility of the university authorities. He was known also as a guide and counselor to students, and his influence was to extend further when in 1827 he became founding editor of the Evangelische Kirchenzeitung. This journal sought to counter the widespread liberalism of contemporary theological faculties, leading Hengstenberg's enemies to redouble their efforts to discredit him. Said K. F. K. Kahn later, "The opinion of the world during the last forty years has associated with Hengstenberg's name all that it finds condemnatory in the revival of a former faith—Pietism, a dead orthodoxy, obscurantism, fanaticism, Jesuitism, sympathy for every influence for retrogression.” While the Kirchenzeitung was known to change its views as religious thinking developed, Hengstenberg never wavered in his crusade against the rationalistic spirit, fearlessly taking issue with all who denied the divinity of Jesus Christ or unduly exalted human reason.

Hengstenberg, Ernst Wilhelm

His first major work, later translated into English as Christology of the Old Testament (4 vols., 1854–58), responded to those who denied prophecy and miracles, and sought to restore the validity of the Old Testament. Other volumes in English translation included commentaries on the Psalms (3 vols., 1845–48), Revelation (2 vols., 1851–52), Ecclesiastes (1860), the Gospel of John (1865), and Ezekiel (1869), and History of the Kingdom of God under the Old Testament (2 vols., 1871–72). A two-volume biography by J. Bachmann appeared in German (1876–79).

J. D. DOUGLAS

See also HEILSGESCHICHTE.

Henry, Carl Ferdinand Howard (b. 1913). Evangelical theologian. Henry was born on January 22, 1913, in New York City and grew up on a Long Island farm. He received his M.A. from Wheaton College (Illinois) and B.D. from Northern Baptist Theological Seminary, both in 1941. He received his Th.D. from Northern Baptist in 1942 and stayed on as professor until 1947 when he left to study at Boston University, receiving his Ph.D. in 1949. In 1950 he began teaching at the newly founded Fuller Theological Seminary in Pasadena, California. He both taught at Fuller and was editor of Christianity Today from 1955 to 1968, when he resigned to become editor-at-large, in part because of editorial differences with the board.

After a year of research at Cambridge University (1968) Henry taught at Eastern Baptist Theological Seminary but resigned in 1974 over differences with the school about the infallibility of Scripture and the nature of evangelicalism. From 1974 to 1986 Henry was lecturer-at-large for World Vision International and from 1974 until this day he is a visiting professor at Trinity Evangelical Divinity School.

One of America's foremost evangelical thinkers, Henry has written a staggering 700 articles and numerous books. In all of them there is the same insistence upon clarity of understanding and rigor of thought that sorts out error and defends historic Christian truth. He is prophetic in his pronouncements concerning the decline of evangelicalism in America, saying that by the year 2000 Christianity could become “a wilderness cult in a secular society with no more public significance than the ancient Essenes in their Dead Sea caves.” This theme recurs in Frontiers in Modern Theology (1966), Evangelicals at the Brink of Crisis (1967), Plea for Evangelical Demonstration (1971), Evangelicals in Search of Identity (1976), and Christian Mindset in a Secular Society (1984). He is equally vigorous in his denunciations of modern secular society in Twilight of a Great Civilization (1988) and Toward a Recovery of Christian Belief (1990).

Henry's magnum opus is his six-volume God, Revelation and Authority (1976–83), which covers the broad theological spectrum, rejecting existential and dialectical theologies, while defending propositional revelation, the infallibility of Scripture, and traditional Christian doctrines from the Trinity to the final judgment.

Probably the most influential evangelical theologian of our time, Henry has continued to point out to contemporary Christians what must never be forgotten—the world is passing away, but the Word of God endures forever.

W. A. ELWELL

See also EVANGELICALISM.

Bibliography. C. F. H. Henry, Confessions of a Theologian; G. Fackre, HCT 583–607; B. E. Patterson, Carl F. H. Henry; R. A. Purdy, HET 260–275.

Heresy. The word “heresy” is derived from the Greek hairesis, which originally meant an action or belief chosen from among several options but in time came to mean an unorthodox opinion held by a group—sometimes even a majority—within the church. The concept of “heresy” is grounded in the conviction that there exists one revealed truth, and that other opinions are intentional distortions or denials of that truth. In the absence of such conviction, “heresy” becomes little more than bigoted persecution. But the Christian belief that truth has been revealed means that heresy becomes, not merely another opinion, but false teaching which leads people away from God's revelation.

Throughout its history, Christian orthodoxy has been forced to define itself in response to heretical teaching. During the second century, two movements—Gnosticism and Montanism—forced the church to define its source of authority, by beginning the process of canonizing the books which comprise the New Testament, a task which took more than a century. In the early fourth century, the teachings of Arius concerning the nature of Christ proved attractive to many Christians in the East, and even to some in the West, necessitating a half-century long debate in the church, which was shaped by the creed adopted at the Council of Nicea (A.D. 325) and culminated with the Council of Constantinople (A.D. 381). This defining process continued in the debate between Augustine and Pelagius in the late fourth and early fifth centuries. The medieval church was plagued by movements that were declared heretical, especially in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries as the need for reform became increasingly obvious. Protestantism itself was condemned as a heresy by Roman Catholicism's Council of Trent (1545–63) until the second Vatican Council (1962–65).

In the twentieth century, many churchmen (until recently, more often clergy than laity) have questioned whether truth can be discerned with sufficient clarity to justify the contemporary use of the concept of "heresy." One of the characteristics of postmodernism is its assertion of the subjectivity and moral equivalency of competing religious opinions, excepting, of course, orthodoxy, which is often considered no better than bigotry. Because Christianity's historic truth claims rest on authoritative Scriptures that speak of the objective reality of God's redemptive acts in history, especially Jesus Christ, objective revealed truth is an inherent Christian doctrine. Consequently, despite contemporary disparagement of the concept, heresy represents the very real error of departure from that truth.

K. W. RICK

See also ARIUS, ARIANISM; AUGUSTINE OF HIPPO; CHURCH DISCIPLINE; CONSTANTINOPLE, FIRST COUNCIL OF; CREED, CREEDS; EXCOMMUNICATION; GnosticISM; MONTANISM; NICEA, COUNCIL OF; PELAGIUS, PELAGIANISM; POSTMODERNISM; SCHISM; SECT, SECTARIANISM; TRENT, COUNCIL OF; VATICAN COUNCIL II.

Bibliography. H. O. J. Brown, Heresies: The Image of Christ in the Mirror of Heresy and Orthodoxy from the Apostles to the Present; D. Christie-Murray, History of Heresy; C. FitzSimons Allison, Cruelty of Heresy; R. P. G. Hanson, Tradition in the Early Church; W. Lourdaux and D. Verhelst, eds., Concept of Heresy in Middle Ages; J. Oswald Sanders, Heresies, Ancient and Modern; G. L. Prestige, Fathers and Heretics; H. E. W. Turner, Pattern of Christian Truth.

Hermas, Shepherd of. See APOSTOLIC FATHERS.

Hermeneutic, New. See NEW HERMENEUTIC.

Hermeneutics. See INTERPRETATION OF THE BIBLE.

Hermetic Literature. This title designates a body of writings associated with Hermes Trismegistos, whom a popular account quoted by Lactantius equates with the fifth Mercury, called Thoth by the Egyptians. Although a man, he was very ancient, and his vast learning earned him the title Trismegistos (Thrice-great). He wrote many books on the knowledge of divine things, speaking of one God as Father, as Christians do (Divine Institutes i. 6). The Greek Hermes was thus assimilated into the Egyptian god Thoth, Hermes was associated with astrology in Alexandrine cults (Clement of Alexandria Stromateis vi. 4), and Festugière has shown the place of Hermes Trismegistos in Egyptian magical literature.

Of religious works, a corpus of eighteen Greek tractates, including the notable Poimandres, has been preserved; another, Asclepius, survives in Latin, while M. Puech announces a Coptic version found with Christian Gnostic works at Chenoboskion, where two more Hermetic opuscula have been found (Coptic Studies in Honor of W. E. Crum, 91ff.); and Stobaeus and others quote fragments of other works.

Most of these writings belong, by common consent, roughly to the second and third centuries A.D. They are mystical, deeply influenced by Platonic and Stoic thought, but not always self-consistent. The use of the LXX seems indubitable, and the cosmogony of Poimandres presupposes Genesis 1–2. The Logos figures largely, and there are striking parallels of language with John's Gospel: direct borrowing either way is improbable, though Christianity perhaps influenced some Hermetica.

There is no evidence of a Hermetic "church." The literature represents one aspect of the movement of Gnostic personal religion as the Christian mission began. It is therefore essentially syncretistic. Whatever John and Hermes had in common, they could never share the cross of the personal Logos.

A. F. WALLS

See also GnosticISM; LOGOS.

Bibliography. C. H. Dodd, Bible and the Greeks; Fourth Gospel; R. Reitzenstein, Poimandres.

Herrnhut. See ZINZENDORF, NIKOLAUS LUDWIG VON.

Hesychasm. In the koinē, hēsychazō meant "to be quiet, be at rest, remain silent." Originally it designated certain Christian monastics who, though in communities, lived quietly in private cells, such as Macarius of Egypt (d. ca. 400) and John Climacus (ca. 580–650). By the eleventh century, hesychasm referred to a contemplative movement in Eastern Orthodoxy known as "the way of stillness and repose." As it developed, this hesychastic mysticism found its focus in spiritual exercises designed to produce a beatific vision that could actually be seen with the physical eye. This vision consisted of an infusion of the "eternal, uncreated, divine light"—supposedly the same theophanic light that enveloped Jesus on the Mount of Transfiguration. The hesychasts believed the light to be communicable, gradually transforming the seeker, until at length he partook of the divine nature himself.

Hesychasm

Some church historians believe that hesychasm had its origins in the so-called mystical interpretation of the Pauline “in Christ” formulation. This view sees Christ and the Holy Spirit as one, having a body compounded of divine light and glory which also dwells in and around the believer as air does around the physical man. Thus a mystical union with Christ is established when one is regenerated by the Holy Spirit. Apparently this hermeneutic emerged from the Alexandrian school of Christian thought and informed the theory and practice of monastic groups in Sinai and Asia Minor. A Studite mystic, Simeon the New Theologian (940–1022), adopted these early hesychastic traditions, many still in oral form, and gave them such significant theological and practical impetus that he has been called the father of hesychasm. The doctrine of the divine light became a cardinal doctrine of Eastern Orthodox faith, but not without a struggle. By the fourteenth century, the monastic community on Mt. Athos had become the mecca of hesychasm.

Adherents came to be known by noninitiates as “navel-souls” or “navel-gazers,” although they protested that their spiritual exercises were but aids to the mystic encounter. Assuming a contemplative posture similar to modern yogic practice, with head pitched forward, chin on chest and gaze directed toward the region of the navel, the hesychast sought the light. The posture, he claimed, enabled him to examine the state of his inner “heart.” With breath carefully controlled, he repeated the “Jesus Prayer”: “Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy on me a sinner.”

A Calabrian monastic theologian, Barlaam, about 1337, accused the hesychasts of heresy, charging that their view of the divine, uncreated light required a source in the very essence of God. The hesychasts replied that the light had its origin in the divine energy or operation, and not in the absolute essence of the transcendent God. The explanation appeared to Barlaam to indicate a belief in two gods: one transcendent and superior, the other immanent and inferior. He argued that man’s knowledge of God was indirect at best, and that a mystical reception of the light could be only symbolic. Hesychasm was championed by the Mt. Athos leader, Gregory Palamas (1296–1359), who defended the distinction between the transcendent God, in essence unknowable and ineffable, and the immanent activity of divine energies or operations communicated to the seeking mystic by means of grace. The “divine and uncreated light” he maintained, was an operation of the divine energy and not a direct communication of God’s essence. In defense of a real communication between God and man, he declared that man “will experience the divine once the passions of the soul in accord with the body have been changed and sanctified though not deadened.” After considerable conflict, the views of Palamas were finally accepted by the Councils of Constantinople in 1341, 1347, and 1351.

Hesychasm teaches that the unregenerate human condition resembles the sleep of death, where no remembrance of God is possible. This state is called “prelest.” In prelest, the fallen human being mistakes the “mirage” world in which he lives for the real world, and thus can never have a holistic relationship with himself or God. The “sleeping” self needs to be awakened through the process of contemplation and spiritual exercises. The Jesus Prayer is still widely used in Eastern Orthodoxy, although the physical exercises are generally discouraged. Hesychasm influenced the Bulgarian and Russian Orthodox Churches profoundly and experienced a revival in Russia in the nineteenth century.

R. C. KROEGER

See also BEATIFIC VISION; GREGORY PALAMAS; MYSTICISM; ORTHODOX TRADITION; PHILOKALIA; SIMEON THE NEW THEOLOGIAN; UNIO MYSTICA.

Bibliography. J. Gregerson, Transfigured Cosmos: Four Essays in Eastern Orthodox Christianity; V. Lossky, Mystical Theology of the Eastern Church; J. Meyendorff, Byzantine Hesychasm; St. Gregory Palamas and Orthodox Spirituality; G. Palamas, Triads.

Hibbert Lectures. A series established from 1878 and named for Robert Hibbert (1770–1849), a Jamaican merchant and slave owner, who was a graduate of Cambridge University. The lectures were part of the Hibbert trust, which he founded in 1847 for “the spread of Christianity in its most simple and intelligible form” and of “the unfettered exercise of the right of private judgment in matters of religion.” The intention being to benefit the Unitarian ministry, the aims of his trust were antitrinitarian, and its participants must be “heterodox.” In 1902 the trust also founded the Hibbert Journal as a “Review of Religion, Theology, and Philosophy,” which amply fulfilled the resolve of the editors to treat philosophical and religious subjects from a liberal point of view.

J. D. DOUGLAS

Hick, John Harwood (b. 1922). Widely acknowledged as one of the most influential contemporary philosophers of religion, Hick was born in Scarborough, Yorkshire, England, on January 20, 1922, and was trained at Edinburgh (MA, 1948; D.Litt., 1975), Oxford (D.Phil., 1950) and Cambridge (Ph.D., 1964). After a brief pastorate, he taught at Cornell, Princeton, Birmingham (U.K.) and Claremont; after retirement (1992) he returned to Birmingham as a Fellow of the Institute for Advanced Research in the Humanities. While Hick highlights his early conversion to a form of evangelical Christianity, his philosophical work has consistently radically reinterpreted Christian doctrine.

Even in Faith and Knowledge (1957), Hick defines revelation not as divinely revealed propositions but as an uncompelled religious way of experiencing the world. More precisely, the locus of revelation are events, which are humanly and thus fallibly interpreted as revealing God's presence. A realist, Hick argues that all experience has this structure of "experiencing-as" and thus is interpretive. Given the world's religious ambiguity, Hick proposes that these religious and non-religious visions can only be falsified or verified eschatologically.

In Evil and the God of Love (1966), Hick rejects an Augustinian view of humanity's original righteous state and subsequent fall for an Irenaean soul-making model. In this paradigm God places immature persons in a harsh and challenging environment and at epistemic distance from himself so they can freely develop into the moral children of God by learning to value fellowship and love. God's goal that humans freely attain perfection will be fulfilled in an afterlife. In Death and Eternal Life (1976) Hick uses the insights of Hinduism, Buddhism, and Christianity to argue all humans will eventually become morally perfect, even if that requires a series of lives in other worlds.

Currently Hick is the best known advocate for normative religious pluralism. Repudiating salvation solely through Jesus Christ because it condemns the vast majority of the world's population, Hick in Interpretation of Religion (1989) argues that the great post-axial faiths experientially relate to the same Ultimate Reality, but in differing ways. He uses Kant's noumenal/phenomenal distinction to explain how these conflicting religious claims are valid responses to the same God. While the cultural and historical setting of these traditions have produced varying conceptions of the Real, there is a common soteriological structure, namely, turning humans from self-centeredness to a new orientation to the Real. Using this soteriological criterion, Hick acknowledges a rough parity among the major religions, which indicates that none is unique or superior to others.

Consistent with his normative pluralism, Hick has sought to undermine the classical understanding of Christ's uniqueness in Myth of God Incarnate (1977) and other works. He now reinterprets Jesus in terms of an inspiration Christology, as a human who was obedient to God. While still identifying himself as a Christian, Hick believes that Jesus is unique only for Christians since other traditions have their own independent and equally valid access to God.

Some interesting autobiographical material may be found in Four Views on Salvation in a

Pluralistic World, eds. D. L. Ockholm and T. R. Phillips. T. R. PHILLIPS

Bibliography. G. D'Costa, John Hick's Theology of Religions: A Critical Evaluation; R. D. Geivett, Evil and the Evidence for God: The Challenge of John Hick's Theodicy; H. Hewitt, ed., Problems in the Philosophy of Religion: Critical Studies of the Work of John Hick; T. R. Mathis, Against John Hick: An Examination of His Philosophy and Religion.

Hierarchy. A system of church government by a priesthood that has the following characteristics: (1) the priesthood is distinct from the laity and has the exclusive right to administer sacraments and govern the church; (2) the priesthood claims an unbroken line of descent from Christ and the apostles and stands as their representatives in the church; (3) the priesthood has a worldwide ordering of ranks or levels of authority (such as pope, bishops, priests).

Such a hierarchical system of church government is most fully developed within the Roman Catholic Church, where the hierarchy is divided into two parts: The hierarchy of order has authority to perform spiritual functions such as administering the sacraments and absolving sins; it consists of bishops (including the pope in his role as a bishop), priests, deacons, and several lesser offices (subdeacons, acolytes, etc.) instituted by the church. The hierarchy of jurisdiction (or pastoral government), on the other hand, has authority over church discipline and establishes rules of conduct and belief. This aspect of the hierarchy consists of the pope, bishops, cardinals, legates, and other lesser officers. Bishops thus belong to both aspects of the hierarchy.

The Church of England (the Protestant Episcopal Church in the U.S.) is partially hierarchical, since it claims direct succession from the apostles and has bishops, priests, and deacons. The Methodist churches have only a vestige of hierarchical structure with bishops, elder (or presbyters), and deacons, but no claim to apostolic succession and a much less sharp distinction between clergy and laity.

Most other Protestant churches do not have a hierarchical government but emphasize the NT teaching that all believers are priests before God (1 Tim. 2:5; Heb. 7:23–28; 10:19–20; 1 Pet. 2:9). Furthermore, they would claim that there is no present-day equivalent to the unique office of apostle (John 14:26; Acts 1:2, 26; 1 Cor. 9:1; 15:7–9; 2 Cor. 12:12; Gal. 1:1; 1 Thess. 2:6; Rev. 21:14; the title is not applied to Timothy or any of Paul's assistants); that the place of the apostles is now taken not by people but by the NT books which the apostles wrote or authorized (John 14:26; Eph. 2:20; Heb. 1:1–2; 1 Cor. 14:37; 2 Cor. 13:2–3, 10; 2 Thess. 3:14; Jude 3); and that the term "bishop" (or "overseer") in the NT is simply a synonym for "elder" (Acts 20:17, 28; 1 Tim. 3:1–2 with 5:17–19; Titus 1:5–7; 1 Pet. 5:2).

Hierarchy

W. A. GRUEDEM

See also BISHOP; CHURCH GOVERNMENT; CHURCH OFFICERS; PAPACY.

Bibliography. J. H. Crehan, "Hierarchy in the Early Church," Catholic Dictionary of Theology 2:15–19; K. Mörsdorf, "Hierarchy," Sacramentum Mundi 3:27–29.

High Church Movement. A phenomenon found in some of the major Protestant churches but particularly used of a school of thought in the Church of England (Anglicanism). The "High" normally refers to a high view of the continuity of the church through history, and thus of its visibility; therefore, a particular denomination may claim to be a part of the continuing one, holy, catholic, and apostolic church. With this emphasis on visibility and continuity there usually exists a view of the two gospel sacraments, baptism and the Lord's Supper, which sees them as important and even indispensable means of grace. Further, regular reception, after due preparation, of the Lord's Supper is encouraged. Other "signs" of being "High" include an emphasis on duly ordained and educated clergy, respect for Catholic tradition (especially the ecumenical creeds), and a search for good liturgy. Within Lutheranism (from the seventeenth century) and within Methodism (from the nineteenth century) such an ethos or movement has often been found, although it has not necessarily been called "High Church."

In Anglicanism, where the term has been much used, it is important clearly to distinguish between the High Church movement and the Tractarian (or Anglo-Catholic) movement. The former is much older than the latter. It originated in the seventeenth century and represented then the opposite end of the spectrum to Puritanism (which wanted to make the Church of England more like the church in Geneva or Scotland, i.e., Calvinist). High Churchmen emphasized that the Church of England was a full member of the historical, continuing, and visible church of God, that its bishops could trace their "descent" back to the earliest times, that its liturgy contained original Catholic principles, that its sacraments were efficacious, and that its doctrine accorded with basic Catholic doctrine, being in harmony with that of the early centuries of the church. High Churchmen of distinction included such names as Lancelot Andrewes (1555–1626), bishop of Winchester; George Herbert (1593–1633) the poet; Jeremy Taylor (1613–67), writer on spirituality; William Laud (1573–1645), archbishop of Canterbury; and Henry Hammond (1605–60), a biblical commentator.

The term "Low Church" was used from the eighteenth century to describe the mentality of those who were latitudinarian or broad-minded in their attitude to doctrine, tradition, and liturgy. Only later was it used as a synonym for evangelical; at first Low Churchmen called "evangelicals" by such names as "enthusiasts."

When the Tractarian movement was born in 1833, the largest grouping in the Church of England was High Church and there was a strong but small evangelical party. Tractarians came from both High Church and evangelical ranks, but it was soon recognized that Tractarianism was not just an enthusiastic High Church movement. It was something more than this, for while the High Church movement had always opposed Roman Catholicism, both in doctrine and ritual, Tractarianism (led by John Henry Newman) spoke favorably of it and in some ways imitated it. Thus there was some tension between the enthusiastic Tractarians and some of the representatives of the old High Church movement (e.g., as represented by Christopher Wordsworth [1807–85], bishop of Lincoln). However, by the end of the nineteenth century the High Church movement had been absorbed by the Tractarian or Anglo-Catholic movement, and thus Tractarianism, the High Church movement, and Anglo-Catholicism functioned as rough equivalents, as they do to this day in Anglicanism.

In recent decades there has been a move by evangelical Anglicans to recapture some of the ideals of the old High Church movement, and in this search they have been joined by evangelicals from other denominations. C. S. Lewis has often been the author to guide people in the search for that approach to worship, doctrine, and tradition represented by the High Church movement at its best (in the seventeenth century). Thus some people are happy to be called High Church evangelicals.

P. TOON

See also ANGLO-CATHOLICISM; LAUD, WILLIAM; LOW CHURCH; OXFORD MOVEMENT.

Bibliography. P. E. More and F. L. Cross, eds., Anglicanism; S. Neill, Anglicanism; R. Webber and D. Bloesch, eds., Orthodox Evangelicals.

Higher Criticism. Higher Criticism, depending on how it is defined, can designate either an essential foundational step in the interpretation of any text or an approach to the Bible that treats it exclusively as a flawed human book. Originally, higher criticism, in distinction to lower or textual criticism, referred to the scientific investigation of biblical documents with regard to matters such as their authorship, composition, historical period (socio-cultural background), and purpose. As such, higher criticism consciously applies the canons of reason to the investigation of the text, utilizing a number of distinguishable but interrelated methods (see Soulen).

During the past two centuries, however, high criticism has come to be identified largely with the “historical-critical method,” which is grounded in an historical criticism which asserts that reality is uniform and universal and that one’s present experience supplies an objective criterion for determining what could or could not have happened in the past. This anti-supernaturalist stance has led to a biblical criticism that seeks to explain the biblical books solely in terms of human processes unaided by divine revelation or inspiration and that is marked by a negative criticizing of content as error-filled, primitive, legendary, contradictory, or reflecting human prejudices unworthy of contemporary respect. With the post-Enlightenment breakdown of the “protective shield” of divine revelation, such new solutions to long-noted “problems” in the biblical text could be suggested. (For example, Gen. 14:14, which describes Abraham as passing through “Dan” on the way to Damascus, most likely an anachronistic use of its later name [cf. Judg. 18:29], is taken as evidence of a post-Mosaic origin of the book of Genesis.) Thus higher criticism often is associated with a destructive undermining of biblical authority rather than an objective analysis and evaluation of the biblical literature.

Several complementary methods have been developed to analyze the origin and growth of biblical compositions. Three methods are designed to analyze the preliterary presuppositions which influenced the author (cf. Steck): Form criticism examines contemporary linguistic conventions, ranging in length from simple formulae to the literary genre of individual textual units to the structural features of entire books, which determined the shape of biblical writings. Tradition criticism examines the intellectual world of the author—his theological, religion-historical ideological concepts. Historical criticism is interested in determining the historical setting and social realities which gave rise to a text. Though originally directed to the oral stage of composition, today they are used in the analysis of written texts, as well.

Three additional methods were developed to study the development of the text: Transmission history (sometimes subsumed under tradition criticism in Anglo-American biblical criticism but distinct in German) studies the oral transmission of individual passages from their earliest oral form, through their combination into larger complexes, until their oldest written form. Literary and redaction criticism are paired methods: literary criticism (sometimes called source criticism due to its association with Pentateuchal source divisions) is an analytical approach, breaking down larger textual units into their component parts (fragments, redactional additions, independent units), on the basis of indications of compositional complexity (i.e., abrupt transitions, shifts in style, distinctive vocabulary, and theology); redaction criticism is a synthetic approach, tracing and explaining the gradual components of these parts into a unified intentional whole, its canonical final form.

Each of these methods was developed and refined in Germany over a half-century of time, between the final decades of the nineteenth century and World War II, by scholars such as R. Bultmann, H. Gunkel, M. Noth, J. Wellhausen, and W. Wrede, and applied eventually to both Old and New Testament literature. Though these methods originally were developed as a means of reconstructing a literary and religious history of ancient Israel or early Christianity, this historical enterprise never was carried out completely, and the historical aspect of the individual methods often is downplayed in contemporary biblical criticism. (Thus “form history” or “Formgeschichte” usually is called “form criticism” now.) Because of the philosophical and ideological foundations and negative conclusions drawn by those applying these methods, evangelical theologians often have adopted an anti-critical attitude toward them (Linnemann) which is justified by what they consider to be the uncritical application of these methods by many evangelicals. (It is common nowadays in evangelical commentaries for authors to speak of the complex compositional history of biblical books, extending over centuries, with a series of authors, disciples, and editors contributing to the final literary product.) Viewing the various methods as branches of a tree whose roots are poisoned and fruit is bitter, they reject the entire historical-critical enterprise as antithetical to an evangelical doctrine of Scripture.

However, it is possible to see these and other interpretive methods as neutral tools that can be employed beneficially or destructively in the analysis of specific phenomena in the text. In accepting the biblical claim that biblical literature is both divine and human work (Heb. 1:1; 2 Pet. 1:20–21)—not a mixture but an inseparable unity, analogous to the divine and human natures of Jesus Christ—the evangelical theologian is compelled to investigate the human means (human languages, institutions, and culture) that God employed in revealing his nature, purposes, and demands to individuals and groups (Wenham). According to Armerding, “the tools of criticism, in the hands of a scholar committed to the views of Scripture taken by Christ and the apostles, can be used to great advantage in gaining a better understanding of the OT” (or NT). The methods of higher criticism are being adopted and adapted by evangelicals, purged of these presuppositions and historical concerns, and employed in investigating the “human words” through which the divine Word is communicated (e.g., form criticism has become, in the hands of evangelicals, genre criticism).

Higher Criticism

Since World War II, numerous additional methods have been developed, many of them derived from outside the traditional theological disciplines, i.e., from the social sciences and linguistic and literary studies. S. L. McKenzie and S. R. Haynes divide them into two categories: those which can be integrated into the traditional higher critical methods, thus "expanding the tradition" (social-scientific, canonical, and rhetorical criticism), and those which cannot, thus "overturning the tradition" (structural, narrative, reader-response, poststructuralist, and ideological criticism). The former are deemed compatible with higher critical methods primarily because they are rooted in history; the latter are ahistorical. These newer methods dominate contemporary biblical criticism and some of them, like the traditional methods of higher criticism, are being employed with considerable enthusiasm by evangelical theologians, especially canonical and narrative criticism (see R. B. Dillard and T. Longman).

Despite this positive, though qualified, evaluation of higher critical methods, it must be emphasized that higher criticism has had a profound and largely negative affect on theology over the past century. A diversity of biblical theologies have replaced a unified biblical theology; it has become commonplace to speak of the theology of hypothetical biblical sources or corpora (usually posited on the basis of literary- or redaction-critical analysis), such as the theology of the Yahwist, the Deuteronomist, Second Isaiah, "Q" (in the Gospels), or of the Deutero-Pauline letters. In analyzing the Bible "like any other book," divine revelation has been eclipsed by an emphasis on the text as an (exclusively) human product which is no longer inspired but simply inspiring. Historical books are viewed not as offering accurate reporting and divinely authorized interpretations of past events but as factually inaccurate, often fanciful, propagandistic political documents. Prophetic books do not serve as a witness to the unique ability of Israel's God to announce his plans for the nations in advance but as a record of forced and flawed human efforts to justify what already has happened. The Gospels are presented not as complementary presentations of the "Good News" to diverse audiences but as a reflection of the emphases and concerns of later Christian communities. That such texts deserve less allegiance and demand less obedience from those Christians and denominations who accept the results of higher criticism is easy to understand. Hence it is essential that evangelical theologians who seek to enrich their exegetical methodology by adapting higher critical methods not simply be swept along by scholarly fads or uncritically accept higher conclusions as theologically innocuous. In seeking to master Scripture, such scholars may cease to hear and heed the voice of the God who speaks to us uniquely through Scripture!

R. L. SCHULTZ

See also BULTMANN, RUDOLF; ENLIGHTENMENT, THE; LIBERALISM, THEOLOGICAL; TÜBINGEN SCHOOL.

Bibliography. C. E. Armerding, Old Testament and Criticism; D. A. Black and D. S. Dockery, eds., New Testament Criticism and Interpretation; G. Bray, Biblical Interpretation Past and Present; R. J. Coggins and J. L. Houlden, eds., Dictionary of Biblical Criticism; R. B. Dillard and T. Longman III, Introduction to the Old Testament; R. A. Harrisville and W. Sundberg, Bible in Modern Culture: Theology and Historical-Critical Method from Spinoza to Küsemann; E. Linne-mann, "Historical-Critical and Evangelical Theology" Journal of the Adventist Theological Society 5:19-26; I. H. Marshall, ed., New Testament Interpretation; S. L. McKenzie and S. R. Haynes, eds., To Each Its Own Meaning: An Introduction to Biblical Criticisms and Their Application; S. Neill and N. T. Wright, Interpretation of the New Testament 1861-1986; G. Osborne, "Historical Criticism and the Evangelical," JETS 42:92-210; A. Rowe, "Are There Distinctively Christian Approaches to Biblical Studies?" Evangel 16:41-46; R. Soulen, Handbook of Biblical Criticism; O. H. Steck, Old Testament Exegesis: A Guide to the Methodology; G. J. Wenham, "Place of Biblical Criticism in Theological Study" Themelios 14/3:84-89.

High Priest. See PRIESTS AND LEVITES.

Hilary of Poitiers (ca. 315-368). French bishop, sometimes called the Athanasius of the Western Church. Of his early life little is known. Jerome, who wrote his biography ca. 391, says Hilary was born into a pagan family in Poitiers and converted from Neoplatonism to faith through philosophical studies ca. 350. By 355 Hilary was bishop of Poitiers. He did not then know the Nicene Creed and its origins, but had reached the same orthodox conclusions independently through Bible study.

His commentary on Matthew (ca. 350-53) takes its Christology rather from Novatian and Tertullian, and follows Paul in its strong emphasis on justifying faith. He was still very much a Western theologian until confronted by a resurgence of Arianism when with other bishops his pro-Nicene stand led to exile in Phrygia. From this period dates his major work, De Trinitate, called by Jerome Contra Arianos. The homo-ousios is acknowledged, stress placed on the eternal generation (rather than on the eternity) of the Son, and a parallel drawn between the union of the Word with flesh and the union of the Word made flesh.

Hilary strongly repudiated Arianism and called its imperial sponsor (Constantius) "Antichrist." He sought to be a bridge-builder (as indeed was Athanasius), with the Semi-Arians, thus laying himself open to misunderstanding. Meanwhile the Council of Sirmium had produced an Arian creed, called by Hilary “the blasphemy of Sirmium.” Returning to Poitiers ca. 361, he continued to rally fellow bishops in Gaul and Italy against the heresy he considered responsible for the church’s troubles.

Hilary was also the first Western writer to compose hymns in Latin, but these were generally above the intellectual capacity of ordinary believers. Pius IX pronounced Hilary a Doctor of the Church in 1851.

J. D. DOUGLAS

Bibliography. B. Altaner, Patrology.

Hinnom, Valley of. See GEHENNA.

Hippolytus (ca. 170–ca. 236). A Greek-speaking presbyter in the church at Rome, Hippolytus led a schism against Bishop Callistus. He and a later bishop of Rome, Pontianus, were exiled to Sardinia during the persecution of the emperor Maximin (235). Pontianus and Hippolytus were apparently reconciled before dying in Sardinia and were both reckoned martyrs.

Hippolytus wrote several important documents. The Refutation of All Heresies (sometimes cited as Philosophumena) deals principally with Gnostic sects and traces their errors to philosophy. The Apostolic Tradition is the fullest source on the organizational and liturgical customs of the ante-Nicene Church—covering baptism, eucharist, ordination, and love feast. The Commentary on Daniel is the earliest commentary from the Orthodox Church; it sets forth a chiliastic eschatology. The Against Noetus opposes an early form of modalism. A statue of Hippolytus, presumably prepared during his lifetime, bears an inscription listing his writings and giving a table for calculating the date of Easter.

Hippolytus’s views were sharpened by his controversy with Callistus. Besides their personal differences (Callistus a former slave with little formal education and Hippolytus a cultured free man) and rivalry for the episcopate, the two men disagreed doctrinally on two important points. Hippolytus championed the Logos Christology and distinguished the Father and Christ to such an extent that Callistus called him a “ditheist”; Callistus and his predecessor Zephyrinus emphasized the divine unity to such an extent that Hippolytus saw no difference between their views and the modalism of Sabellius. Hippolytus took a rigorist view on church discipline, denying reconciliation to the church to those guilty of major sins, and leaving their forgiveness to God; Callistus took a laxer view, and was ready to grant the church’s forgiveness, especially in cases of sexual sins.

E. FERGUSON

Bibliography. R. H. Connolly, So-Called Egyptian Church Order and Derived Documents; G. Dix, Treatise on the Apostolic Tradition of St. Hippolytus of Rome; B. S. Easton, Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus; J. J. von Dollinger, Hippolytus and Callistus; C. Wordsworth, Hippolytus and the Church of Rome.

Historical Theology. Theologically, it is concerned with understanding specific doctrinal affirmations, themes, and practices according to their own grammar and use; historically, it is concerned with the concrete shape of doctrines in their circumstances. Rather than merely a chronicle of what Christians have thought about specific doctrines, historical theology seeks to identify the historically influenced and influential character of the Christian faith as well as the theological character of the faith’s historical identity.

Historical Tensions. Christian doctrine has both constant and contingent dimensions. Historical theology labors to understand the relationship and tension between the substance of the faith and the shifting circumstances in which the faith appears. The most traditional apology for historical theology is the maxim “Novelty is heresy” (Eusebius).

Theology that was orthodox was grounded in the constancy of Christian faith. History was not simply a dimension of, or the setting for, theology, but all theology that was Christian was also historical. Historical theology accounted for supposed contradictions in theologians and the need to understand how the faith governed Christian identity and could be maintained and employed in differing settings.

For example, the development of trinitarian thought growing out of the faith of the early church and its use of biblical texts, through the controversy of Arius, and differing ways of understanding God and the human being, led to a confident and regulative confession of trinitarian thought with the council of Nicea (A.D. 325). While Christian theology affirms the normative influence of Nicea, this confirmation does not end the need to further demonstrate christological and trinitarian faith in the face of challenges from the shifting cultural, political, and intellectual contexts.

Models and Methods. Early and medieval conceptions of theology’s history were governed by the presumption that history was to be understood in light of God’s providence. The seeming differences in expressing the genuine Christian faith (geographical, political, philosophical, and cultural) were accounted for by an optimistic view of the historical nature of the faith. Jaroslav Pelikan suggested that in order to account for the problem of doctrinal change theologians stressed either a dogmatic or dialectical solution. The dogmatic principle identified a summation of the present faith and finds agreeable ancestors. The dialectic approach attempted to critically compare theological differences and ideally resolve (seeming) contradictions by demonstrating the equivocal use of terms.

Within Eastern Orthodoxy there is a stress upon the living tradition of faith: by the power of God, and in spite of human frailty, there is thought to be an uninterrupted tradition held by the Orthodox church throughout the centuries, as the church itself is a witness to the unchanging truth in a changing world (Breck and Meyendorff, Legacy of St. Vladimir).

Protestant ideas of historical theology have been dominated by the tension between Scripture and tradition and the relationship between the Bible and the church. The Reformer's challenges to differing authorities in the sixteenth century (Bible and/or tradition, Roman or local authority) included appeals to historical continuity and wrestled with seeing God's providential hand in a church which was in need of reform. And the Anabaptist rejection of the half-way measures of the Reformers was based on the contention that reform had failed to reverse the historical decline the church had experienced in its union with culture. This model is used by other primitivist movements that regard their particular church to be a restoration of apostolic and primitive Christianity instead of dependent on the history of Christendom (Littell, Origins of Sectarian Protestantism).

Modern Study of Historical Theology. Perhaps the most influential modern practitioner of historical theology was F. C. Baur, not because of his particular views on early Christianity but because of his concern to understand dogma—the essential assertions of the Christian faith—as the intersection of the church's history and its contemporary faith. Building on the influence of Hegel's historicism, Baur contended that dogma was subject to history, it developed, and it was therefore historically contingent.

The modern study of history also introduced the strongest challenge to historical theology—turning history against theology as a way to discipline the church because of its supposedly extravagant claims (e.g., Harnack, History of Dogma). Ernst Troeltsch asserted that Christian faith was best understood within the general history of human ideas. Theology was merely the historical shape that faith took in culture, and it seemed that dogma—the supposedly constant cast of Christian faith—experienced change and historical development.

In the nineteenth century an awareness of historicity was addressed by employing organic, developmental, and temporal metaphors to Christian doctrine—it unfolded over time as the embryo matured. John Henry Newman argued for normative aspects of development (the preservation of type) and how faithful development could be understood (the continuity of principles), and Philip Schaff suggested that the nature of Protestantism should be understood in its development of the tenets concerning justification by faith and sola scriptura. Whereas there was agreement that Christian doctrines have a history and cannot be understood apart from their history, developmental metaphors also allowed for the disavowal of any change in the nature of Christian faith itself.

Conclusion. Historical theology acknowledges the need for doctrinal discipline—offering evaluations of right belief and exposing our ways of believing. This is accomplished by attending to, but not necessarily overcoming, the tension of continuity and change in Christian doctrine. Historical theology characteristically relies upon the relationship of God's providence and human history, and it struggles to understand the faith in this relationship.

J. P. CALLAHAN

See also BIBLICAL THEOLOGY MOVEMENT; DOGMATICS; SYSTEMATIC THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. K. Barth, Protestant Theology in the Nineteenth Century; D. Bebbington, Patterns in History; G. Bromiley, Historical Theology; Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History; V. A. Harvey, Historian and the Believer; P. C. Hodgson, Formation of Historical Theology; G. A. Lindbeck, Nature of Doctrine; C. T. McIntire, ed., God, History, and Historians; J. H. Newman, Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine; R. Niebuhr, Faith and History; J. Orr, Progress of Dogma; P. Schaff, Principle of Protestantism as Related to the Present State of the Church; P. Toon, Development of Doctrine in the Church; E. Troeltsch, Social Teaching of the Christian Churches and Groups; Writings on Theology and Religion, R. Morgan and M. Pye, trans. and eds.; H. U. von Balthasar, Theology of History; A. von Harnack, What Is Christianity?

Historie and Geschichte (Ger. "history"). Biblical theologians use these two archaic German words to make a distinction between that which can be known about a person or event in history (historie), and the significance which that event or person carries (geschichte). This application is most often made in studies about the historical Jesus.

Historie (historische, adj.) refers to persons or events of the past which are external or objective and can be verified by the acceptable means of historical inquiry (e.g., the fact of the existence of a noteworthy man named Jesus who lived in first century Palestine). Geschichte (geschichtliche, adj.) refers to internal, nonverifiable significance ascribed to a historical person or event, which cannot be demonstrated by historical inquiry and may or may not be true (e.g., the assertion that the historical man Jesus was the Son of God).

German theologian Martin Kähler in his So-called Historical Jesus and the Historic Biblical Christ, published in 1896, was perhaps the first to make this kind of distinction. He used historie and geschichte to distinguish between the Jesus of history, who was the object of contemporary historical investigation, and the biblical Christ whose significance was found in the preaching of the disciples and the early church and as the object of the Christian faith. The English translation used the words historical and historic to emphasize the distinction Kähler made. While not rejecting the historical (historische) Jesus as irrelevant, as some theologians had, Kähler saw the significance of the historic (geschichtliche) Christ as found in the enduring influence he had among those who proclaimed Christ as Lord. Some theologians have likewise used historie and geschichte to distinguish between that which is known through historical investigation and the variety of ways of understanding an event and its significance in history.

Later scholars have made significant departures from the precedent set by Kähler in defining the use of these two words. Some argue that even the distinction itself is open to serious question. For example, is the virgin birth or Jesus' walking on water historie or geschichte? These events are presented in the Gospels as events in history (historie), but how can ordinary historical criteria be found to evaluate them? But to dissolve them into "meaning" (geschichte) would be to make them myths or legends, which must run counter to the New Testament's claims. In this case the conceptual separation of event from meaning creates a problem, rather than solving anything. In the minds of some, the distinction was invented precisely to allow the removal of "embarrassing" things, such as the virgin birth, from history, while still allowing them to be talked about as meaningful at a different level. This way of thinking, however, cannot be supported from the New Testament documents.

P. W. HASBROUCK and J. J. SCOTT JR.

Bibliography. J. D. Godsey, ed., Karl Barth's Table Talk; M. Kähler, So-called Historical Jesus and the Historic Biblical Christ, C. E. Braaten, trans.; R. N. Soulen, Handbook of Biblical Criticism; A. Van Harvey, Handbook of Theological Terms.

History of Religion School. An influential movement among German academic theologians and biblical scholars stretching from about 1890 till 1930. Its precursors lie much earlier, in the historicism and idealism of the German Enlightenment; its after-effects persist to the present day. It was not a "school" in the sense of having one particular genius at its helm but was rather a loosely linked group of like-minded professors with ties, direct or indirect, to Albert Eichhorn or the University of Göttingen and scholars there like Paul de Lagarde, H. Gunkel, J. Wellhausen, W. Bousset, and R. Reitzenstein.

The movement defies precise delineation, in part because its key ideas vary among its proponents, in part because even scholars who used the term (religionsgeschichtliche Schule) would sometimes deny that such a school actually existed. Such protestations, however, were likely attempts to dissociate from the more radical positions of some in the school. E. Troeltsch (who himself could scoff at the name in some contexts) gave systematic expression to its key tenets in the useful English essay "Dogmatics of the 'Religionsgeschichtliche Schule.'"

Two key features permeate the outlook and its methods. First is the conviction that Christianity definitely did not arise out of organic links with Old Testament history and viewpoints; rather, pagan religions provided decisive impetus. Earliest Christianity was syncretistic in nature in vital respects. Second, despite their professional status as theological professors, leaders in the movement embraced a "purely historical" approach which by definition ruled out the presence of the theological (divinely revealed or transcendently caused) within the historical. For W. Wrede, e.g., this means that Paul did not preach Christ crucified because he was convinced of Jesus' bodily resurrection in accordance with Old Testament prophecy (cf. Rom. 1:1-4) but because through the influence of pagan religion: "Paul believed in such a celestial being, in a divine Christ, before he believed in Jesus" (Wrede's emphasis). For the same reason Wrede, typical of others in the movement, called for an end to the notion of an authoritative New Testament canon; from now on "New Testament theology" is simply a "history of early Christian religion."

Among the most influential legacies of the history of religion approach is R. Bultmann's New Testament theology, in which the biblical idea of salvation history is scrapped, Jesus (who was in any case not divine) and his teachings disappear from center stage, and existentialism is called in to give the gospel its meaning. Through Bultmann and influential followers like H. Koester, history of religion analysis is still very much alive, even if only tacitly.

The insight that Christianity requires interpretation as a historically conditioned phenomenon is beyond cavil. What is disputable is whether an animus against the Old Testament, revelation, incarnation, resurrection, and other cardinal verities furnishes a suitable platform for a fair assessment of the "history" of the "religion" called Christianity.

R. W. YARBROUGH

Bibliography. W. G. Kümmel, New Testament: The History of the Investigation of its Problems; E. Troeltsch, American Journal of Theology 17:1-21.

History of Salvation. See HEILSGESCHICHTE.

Hocking, William Ernest (1873–1966). American Protestant scholar of philosophy and religion. Hocking taught at Andover Newton Theological School, Yale, and Harvard. It was his conviction that philosophy, if it is to be a worthwhile pursuit, must not be limited to academic circles. It must help to clarify and resolve issues in the wider world, including the world of religion, his area of special interest. He was a prolific writer, producing eighteen books, including Meaning of God in Human Experience (1912), Human Nature and Its Remaking (1918), Re-thinking Missions (1932), and Living Religions and a World Faith (1940), and some two hundred journal articles. In Re-thinking Missions he argued that missionaries should not limit themselves to evangelism—they should also be actively engaged in providing social work and medical services. This view, which was somewhat more controversial than it is now, involved him in the liberal-conservative debates of the time.

His philosophical system is called objective idealism. In it he stresses the “other mind” of God. His work was both influenced by, and in turn influenced, the existentialist movements of European thought. He taught that the “I” and the “Thou” are inseparable, which was a fundamental revision of the views of Descartes. He also believed that man experiences God not only in the universal, but also in the particular, in sensation.

He was a widely traveled individual who was a perceptive and critical observer of other cultures. He lectured in England, Scotland, the Netherlands, Germany, Syria, China, and other countries.

J. D. SPICELAND

See also IDEALISM.

Bibliography. W. E. Hocking, Meaning of God in Human Experience; Meaning of Immortality in Human Experience; Science and the Idea of God; What Man Can Make of Man; L. S. Rouner, ed., Philosophy, Religion, and the Coming World Civilization.

Hodge, Archibald Alexander (1823–1886). Eldest son and successor of theologian Charles Hodge. He continued the Calvinist tradition begun at Princeton Theological Seminary by Archibald Alexander, after whom he was affectionately named. Nurtured in a genuinely pious home, which he vividly described in Life of Charles Hodge (1880), A. A. Hodge graduated from Princeton in 1841 and Princeton Seminary in 1846. He was then ordained by the Presbyterian Church as a missionary to Allahabad, India. Although he and his wife were forced by illness to return with their two daughters after less than three years' service, his experience contributed to his lifelong involvement in advocating missions.

Following his return, Hodge served several pastorates in Maryland, Virginia, and Pennsylvania. He wrote Outlines of Theology (1860) from his preaching on doctrinal themes at Sunday evening services. Although catechetical in form, the lectures were well received due to Hodge's power as a speaker. He defended natural theology, contrasted systems of thought such as Augustinianism and Pelagianism, and analyzed broad theological themes. Because of its clarity and precision, Outlines was translated into several languages and widely used as a theological text. In 1864 Hodge was called as professor of didactic theology at Western Seminary in Pittsburgh. While there, he published monographs titled Atonement (1867) and Exposition of the Confession of Faith (1869), and also pastored North Presbyterian Church.

In 1877 Princeton Seminary called Hodge to assist his father, whose health was failing. In his inaugural address Hodge affirmed his commitment to systematic theology and biblical preaching, which together are to nourish vital piety. After his father died in 1878, the younger Hodge succeeded him as professor of didactic and polemical theology, a position he held until his death eight years later.

Even though Hodge was not as prominent as his father in Presbyterian ecclesiastical affairs, he worked with Charles A. Briggs of Union Seminary on publishing eight articles on higher criticism in the Presbyterian Review. In 1881 Hodge and Benjamin B. Warfield upheld Princeton's opposition to post-Enlightenment biblical criticism in their article “Inspiration.” Affirming plenary verbal inspiration of the original autographs, Hodge and Warfield defined the doctrine of inerrancy, which dominated Presbyterianism in the 1890s.

In Popular Lectures on Theological Themes, published posthumously in 1887, Hodge attempted to integrate his defense of Calvinism with cultural analysis. As nineteenth century thinkers mounted campaigns for religious neutrality in public life, Hodge argued that only a Reformed theological base could provide a sufficient cultural foundation for traditional American values and institutions such as family, law, education, and economics. Without Christian theism, which he believed was best expressed in Reformed theology, American life and its institutions would be drastically altered into a relativistic secular culture.

W. A. HOFFECKER

See also BIBLE, INERRANCY AND INFALLIBILITY OF; BIBLE, INSPIRATION OF; HODGE, CHARLES; PRINCETON THEOLOGY, OLD; WARFIELD, BENJAMIN BRECKINRIDGE.

Bibliography. L. A. Loetscher, Broadening Church; M. A. Noll, Princeton Theology, 1812–1921; C. A. Salmond, Princeton: Charles and A. A. Hodge; G. S. Smith, Seeds of Secularization.

Hodge, Charles (1797–1878). The most influential American Presbyterian theologian of the nineteenth century. He was educated at Princeton College, Princeton Seminary, and during a two-year tour of German theological institutions from 1826 to 1828. He taught biblical literature at Princeton Seminary from 1822 to 1840, when he became Archibald Alexander's successor as professor of exegetical and didactic theology, a position which he held until his death. Hodge used his position as editor of the Biblical Repository and Princeton Review (founded 1825) to expound his own version of orthodox Calvinism and to attack theologies which deviated from it, such as the New Haven theology of N. W. Taylor, the revivalism of Charles Finney, and the Mercersburg theology of John W. Nevin. Hodge wrote widely on church politics (including the Presbyterian schism of 1837 and reunion of 1868), popular piety (including his 1841 exposition for the American Sunday School Union, Way of Life), books of the Bible (including commentaries on Romans, Ephesians, 1 and 2 Corinthians), and on contemporary affairs (including discussion of the Civil War and an attack on Darwinism). But he is most remembered for his Systematic Theology, a three-volume, two-thousand-page work published in 1872–73. He was hard-working, earnest, prolific, and the most complex of the conservative theologians who shaped education at Princeton Seminary from 1812 to 1929.

Hodge's theology grew out of his commitment to an authoritative Bible, his respect for Reformed confessions and for the European Reformed theologians of the seventeenth century, and his belief in the necessity of living piety. He regularly employed the thought forms of inductivist science and the categories of Scottish commonsense philosophy. Yet except for the introductory remarks of his Systematic Theology, these philosophical assumptions were not as influential as they were for other Princeton theologians. Hodge's Calvinism exalted God as the source of salvation and of all good. It was the basis for his belief that the Catholic Church and the Oxford Movement overestimated the saving power of the church, that Charles Finney and Horace Bushnell, in their different ways, underestimated the affect of sin upon native human capacities, and that the New England theologians overindulged modern assumptions about sin and grace at the expense of biblical convictions. Although Hodge was known best in his own day as a polemicist and as a popular exponent of Calvinistic spirituality, he has received more attention in recent years for his efforts to defend the authority of the Bible in opposition to the early findings of higher criticism.

M. A. NOLL

See also HODGE, ARCHIBALD ALEXANDER; PRINCETON THEOLOGY, OLD; WARFIELD, BENJAMIN BRECKINRIDGE.

Bibliography. C. Hodge, Systematic Theology; A. A. Hodge, Life of Charles Hodge; Way of Life; W. A. Hofecker, Piety and the Princeton Theologians; M. A. Noll, ed., Princeton Theology 1812–1921; W. Thorp, ed., Lives of Eighteen from Princeton; D. Wells, ed., Reformed Theology in America.

Hofman, Melchior. See MELCHIORITES.

Hofmann, Johann Christian Konrad von (1810–1877). German Lutheran theologian, leader of the Erlangen School. Born in Nuremberg and educated in Erlangen (1827–29) and Berlin (1829–32), he began his theological career as a lecturer at Erlangen (1838–42). He was called to Rostock as professor in 1842 and from there back to Erlangen in 1845, where he was the dominant figure until his death. He espoused what has come to be known as the heilsgeschichtliche (salvation history) approach to biblical theology, stressing the history of the people of God, the inspiration of Scripture, and Jesus Christ as the goal of and key to the meaning of history. In his view, the purpose of biblical theology is to expound the history of salvation as contained in the books of the OT and NT.

Hofmann was active in the promotion of missionary work and general evangelical piety. His two great works were his Weissagung und Erfüllung im Alten und Neuen Testament (1841–44) and Der Schriftbeweis (1852–56). He began a commentary on the NT (Die heiligen Schriften des Neuen Testaments, 1862–78), which he never completed. The only one of his writings that has been translated into English is his Biblische Hermeneutik (1880), published in 1959 as Interpreting the Bible. Although he identified himself with Lutheran confessionalism as well as with the major concerns of evangelical life and theology, his conviction that the Bible did not teach the doctrine of Christ's substitutionary atonement caused him to be opposed by many orthodox Christians of his day.

W. W. GASQUE

See also CULLMANN, OSCAR; HEILSGESCHICHTE.

Holiness. The religious term par excellence. A close connection is to be found everywhere between religion and the holy. At the heart of religion is the numinous, the vastly mysterious (the mysterium tremendum—Otto), the supernaturally threatening. All are contained in the idea of "the holy." Holiness, in a great variety of expressions, is the inmost core of religious faith and practice.

In the OT. In the OT holiness is spoken of primarily in relation to God, e.g., "the LORD our God is holy” (Ps. 99:9). Holiness refers to his essential nature; it is not so much an attribute of God as it is the very foundation of his being. “Holy, holy, holy is the LORD Almighty” (Isa. 6:3). Thrice holy, intensely holy is the Lord. Holiness, accordingly, is the background for all else declared about God.

Holiness

The first use of the word “holy” in the OT (Exod. 3:5) points to the divine sacredness. God spoke to Moses from the burning bush—and said “Do not come any closer. . . . Take off your sandals, for the place where you are standing is holy ground.” The holy is God’s inviolable sacredness. It is only after this encounter with the holy God that Moses is given the name of God as the Lord (Yahweh), the one who will graciously deliver Israel from Egypt. The Redeemer is first of all the holy God. At Mount Sinai, after this deliverance and preparatory to the giving of the law, the sacredness of God is again vividly shown forth: the Lord “descended on it in fire . . . and the whole mountain trembled violently” (Exod. 19:18). The Israelites are not allowed to come up the mountain “or he will break out against them” (Exod. 19:24). Thus memorably is all Israel, like Moses earlier, confronted with the elemental divine holiness.

Holiness bespeaks also the majesty and awesomeness of God. He is majestic in holiness (Exod. 15:11), and the very being of God is such as to provoke awe and fear. Jacob at Bethel, in a dream beholding the exalted Lord, awakens to cry, “How awesome is this place! This is none other than the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven” (Gen. 28:17). The primary response to God’s majestic holiness is wonder, awe, even dread. So does the psalmist proclaim: “Worship the Lord in the splendor of his holiness; tremble before him, all the earth” (Ps. 96:9). His majestic presence calls for the response of worship and reverence. It also makes for awe and trembling.

Holiness then denotes the separateness, or otherness, of God from all his creation. The Hebrew word for holy, qādōš, in its fundamental meaning contains the note of that which is separate or apart. God is totally other than the world and man: “I am God, and not man, the Holy One among you” (Hos. 11:9). This separateness, or otherness, is first of all that of his very “Godness,” his essential deity. God is not in any way (as in many religions) to be identified with anything else in all of creation. Second, it signifies God’s total apartness from all that is common and profane, from everything unclean or evil.

Hence, holiness in relation to God refers climactically to his moral perfection. His holiness is manifest in total righteousness and purity. The holy God will show himself holy in righteousness (Isa. 5:16). His eyes are too pure to look upon evil (Hab. 1:13). This moral, or ethical, dimension of God’s holiness becomes increasingly significant in the witness of the OT.

Everything associated with God is also holy. The second use of the word for “holy” in the OT is found in the expression “a sacred assembly” (Exod. 12:16), an assembly called by God to celebrate his “pass over” (12:13) of Israel. The Sabbath instituted by the Lord is “a holy Sabbath” (16:23); the heaven above is God’s “holy heaven” (Ps. 20:6); God sits on his “holy throne” (47:8), Zion is God’s “holy hill” (2:6). God’s name is especially holy and never to be taken in vain (Exod. 20:7; Deut. 5:11).

Accordingly, God’s covenant people, chosen by him, are a holy people: “You are a people holy to the LORD your God. The LORD your God has chosen you out of all the peoples who are on the face of the earth” (Deut. 7:6). Israel is a separated people—separated unto the Lord—and therefore is holy not first of all because of any virtue but simply because of its set-apartness. But Israel is also called to holiness, thus to be a consecrated people: “I am the LORD your God; consecrate yourselves and be holy, because I am holy” (Lev. 11:44). Hence, the word holiness in relation to the people of God contains both the negative sense of separation and the positive sense of consecration. All in all, the mark of holiness is the highest expression of the covenant relationship between a holy God and his people.

Whatever is connected with the religious cultus (worship, sacrifice, etc.) is also holy. There are, e.g., holy days (in addition to the holy Sabbath), holy priests, holy anointing oil, holy first fruits, holy utensils. Ceremonial cleansing and purity are required of everything—priests, vehicles of worship, the congregation itself—that participates in the cultic activity. Furthermore, the call to holiness (as in Lev. 11:44) may be put totally in terms of not eating unclean foods. Thus, in the OT there is marked stress on ritual holiness.

There is, however, also an increasingly strong emphasis on holiness in the moral, or ethical, sphere. A central feature of the Day of Atonement is that of inward cleansing: “before the LORD, you will be clean from all your sins” (Lev. 16:30). Also there are many expressions elsewhere in the OT relating to the need for inner holiness. For example, in reply to the question, “Who may stand in his holy place?” the answer is given: “He who has clean hands and a pure heart” (Ps. 24:3–4). In the OT, even as the holiness of God is more and more understood to have moral content, so it is with holiness in relation to the people of God.

In the NT. The NT bears further witness to many of the aforementioned matters regarding holiness. In regard to God himself, for all that is said about his grace and love, there is no less emphasis on his holiness. The God of love is the Holy Father (John 17:11), Jesus Christ is the Holy One of God (Mark 1:24; John 6:69), and the spirit of God is the Holy Spirit. Indeed, the OT declaration "Our God is holy" stands forth all the more markedly with the triune God fully disclosed in the NT. Likewise, such previously noted aspects of divine holiness as sacredness, majesty, awesomeness, separateness, and moral perfection are all to be found in the NT record. Also, God's people are called to holiness: "Be holy, because I am holy" (1 Pet. 1:16).

It is the ethical dimension of holiness that the NT highlights. Holiness moves beyond any idea of a nation outwardly holy by virtue of divine election, and demonstrating such holiness through ritual and ceremony, to a people who are made inwardly holy. Basic to this is the witness of Jesus himself, the Holy One of God, who also as the Son of Man lived out a life of complete holiness, righteousness, and purity. He "committed no sin; nor was any deceit found in his mouth" (1 Pet. 2:22). As a result of his work of redemption, believers in him are declared righteous, but also enter into true righteousness and holiness: "We have been made holy through the sacrifice of the body of Jesus Christ" (Heb. 10:10).

Holiness (hagiōsynē) in the NT, accordingly, belongs to all believers. A common term for all believers is holy ones (hagioi), usually translated as "saints." "Saints," therefore, does not refer to persons preeminent in holiness, but to believers generally: all true believers are holy through Christ. This is the central meaning of such a statement as "in Christ Jesus" is "our righteousness, holiness and redemption" (1 Cor. 1:30). Holiness in the NT is an internal reality for all who belong to Christ.

In addition, holiness in the sense of transformation of the total person is now envisioned. So, e.g., does Paul write: "May God himself, the God of peace, sanctify you [i.e., make you holy] through and through . . . spirit, soul and body" (1 Thess. 5:23). Since God is totally holy, his concern is that his people likewise become completely holy. Hence, holiness is not only an internal reality for the believer but also that which is to be perfected: "Let us purify ourselves from everything that contaminates body and spirit, perfecting holiness out of reverence for God" (2 Cor. 7:1).

Believers, as the saints of God, are "a chosen people, a royal priesthood, a holy nation" (1 Pet. 2:9). The holy nation is no longer Israel but the church, nor is holiness any longer that to which a people is set apart and consecrated, but that which has now become an inward reality and in which they are being gradually transformed. The final goal: "to present her [the church] to himself [Christ] as a radiant church, without stain or wrinkle or any other blemish, but holy and blameless" (Eph. 5:27).

In Church History. In the history of the church, holiness has been viewed from many perspectives. In the Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox traditions several may be noted: (1) Ascetic. The pursuit of holiness by fleeing the world (forsaking secular occupation, marriage, worldly goods), hence limited to the few; holiness to be achieved by prayer vigils, fasting, self-mortification; the saints, or the religious, being those who thereby have gained a higher level of holiness. (2) Mystical. Holiness to be attained not so much by fleeing the world as by rising above it, a ladder of holiness with various stages such as purgation, illumination, and contemplation until there is spiritual absorption in God. The barrier to holiness is not so much human sin as human finitude, one's bondage to the creaturely and temporal. (3) Sacramental. Holiness imparted through the supernatural grace of the sacraments; hence sacramental (unlike ascetic and mystical) holiness is available to all. Moreover, this objective infusion of holiness, though of a lesser degree than that attainable by ascetic or mystic, is given objectively without all the struggle involved.

Classical Protestantism (sixteenth century) was largely a movement away from ascetic, mystical, and sacramental views of holiness into a more biblical perspective. Soon, however, a number of diverging emphases were to emerge: (1) Disciplinary. A stress on ecclesiastical discipline and obedience to God's commandments as the way of holy living; the cultivation of a serious, often austere, life viewed as the mark of a God-fearing and truly holy man (e.g., Scottish Presbyterians, English Puritans). (2) Experimental. A reaction in various ways against rigid orthodoxy, formalism, and the externals of faith—institution, ritual, creed (in some cases, even the Scriptures)—to get into the spiritual; the holy viewed as the inner life to be cultivated and practiced (variously, Anabaptists, Quakers, Lutheran pietists). (3) Perfectionist. Total holiness, "entire sanctification," possible not through works but by faith; in addition to the holiness given in initial faith and growth in holiness there is the call of God to complete holiness through the eradication of sin and the gift of perfect love (Wesley, later holiness movements).

From the preceding brief review of certain perspectives (Catholic, Orthodox, Protestant) on holiness, the need for a truly biblical and reformed understanding is apparent. Such renewed understanding could be one of the most significant theological undertakings of our time.

J. R. WILLIAMS

See also GODLINESS; SANCTIFICATION; SPIRITUALITY.

Bibliography. C. Brown and H. Seebass, NIDNTT 2:223–38; O. R. Jones, Concept of Holiness; A. Koeberle, Quest for Holiness; A. Murray, Holy in Christ; S. Neill, Christian Holiness; R. Otto, Idea of the Holy; J. C. Ryle, Holiness; S. Taylor, Holy Living.

Holiness Movement, American. Originating in the United States in the 1840s and 50s, this was an endeavor to preserve and propagate John Wesley's teaching on entire sanctification and Christian perfection. Wesley held that the road from sin to salvation is one from willful rebellion against divine and human law to perfect love for God and man. Following Wesley, Holiness preachers emphasized that the process of salvation involves two crises. In the first, conversion or justification, one is freed from the sins he has committed. In the second, entire sanctification or full salvation, one is liberated from the flaw in his moral nature that causes him to sin. Man is capable of this perfection even though he dwells in a corruptible body marked by a thousand defects arising from ignorance, infirmities, and other creaturely limitations. It is a process of loving the Lord God with all one's heart, soul, and mind, and it results in the ability to live without conscious or deliberate sin. However, to achieve and then remain in this blessed state requires intense, sustained effort, and one's life must be marked by constant self-renunciation, careful observance of the divine ordinances, a humble, steadfast reliance on God's forgiving grace in the atonement, the intention to look for God's glory in all things, and an increasing exercise of the love which itself fulfills the whole law and is the end of the commandments.

In the midnineteenth century several factors converged that contributed to the renewal of the Holiness emphasis, among them the camp meeting revivals that were a common feature in rural America, the Christian perfectionism of Charles Finney and Asa Mahan (the Oberlin theology), the "Tuesday Meeting" of Phoebe Palmer in New York, the urban revival of 1857-58, and protests within the Methodist churches about the decline of discipline which resulted in the Wesleyan Methodist secession in 1843 and Free Methodist withdrawal in 1860. These two became the first denominations formally committed to Holiness. After the Civil War a full-fledged Holiness revival broke out within the ranks of Methodism, and in 1867 the National Camp Meeting Association for the Promotion of Holiness was formed. From 1893 it was known as the National Holiness Association (NHA) and in 1971 was renamed the Christian Holiness Association. Until the 1890s Methodists dominated the movement and channeled its enthusiasm into their churches.

The increasing number of Holiness evangelists, many of whom were unsanctioned by their superiors, a flourishing independent press, and the growth of nondenominational associations gradually weakened the position of mainline Methodism in the movement. By the 1880s the first independent Holiness denominations had begun to appear, and tensions between Methodism and the Holiness associations escalated. The gap between the two widened as Methodist practice drifted steadily toward a sedate, middle-class American Protestantism, while the Holiness groups insisted they were practicing primitive Wesleyanism and were the true successors of Wesley in America. The small schismatic bodies gradually coalesced into formal denominations, the largest of which were the Church of God, Anderson, Indiana (1880), Church of the Nazarene (1908), and Pilgrim Holiness Church (1897—merged with the Wesleyan Methodists in 1968 to form the Wesleyan Church). The polity of these bodies was a modified Methodism in that there was generally somewhat more congregational autonomy, and the "second blessing" of entire sanctification was an integral part of their theology. Most operated with a strict perfectionist code of personal morality and demanded from their adherents plain dress and abstinence from "worldly" pleasures and amusements. Also, nearly all of them allowed women to be ordained to the ministry and occupy leadership positions.

The Holiness movement quickly spread beyond the bounds of Methodism. A Mennonite group, the United Missionary Church (formerly Mennonite Brethren in Christ and since a merger in 1969 called the Missionary Church), adopted the doctrine of entire sanctification and Holiness standards of personal conduct. The Brethren in Christ (founded 1863) was of mixed Pennsylvania German pietist and Mennonite origins, but it also took on Wesleyan perfectionism. Four Quaker yearly meetings that had been influenced by Holiness doctrines came together in 1947 to form the Evangelical Friends Alliance. The Salvation Army also has had a firm commitment to Holiness. The Christian and Missionary Alliance with its emphasis on Christ as Savior, sanctifier, healer, and coming King has an affinity with the Wesleyan movement, and its two most prominent thinkers, A. B. Simpson and A. W. Tozer, are widely read in Holiness circles, but it never accepted the doctrine of the eradication of sin.

The growth of the independent churches was related to the decline of the Holiness emphasis within Methodism, and after World War II denominationalism turned the originally evangelistic NHA into a council of Holiness churches. But numerical growth and material prosperity led inexorably to compromise with contemporary culture, and the relaxation of personal discipline was reflected in the wearing of fashionable dress and jewelry and secular entertainments such as participation in athletics and television viewing. As a result, several conservative splinter groups seceded from the Holiness denominations and joined together in an interchurch organization in 1947 known as the Interdenominational Holiness Convention. This now sees itself as the defender of pristine Wesleyanism.

Pentecostalism is an offshoot of the Holiness movement. It teaches that speaking in tongues is the evidence one has received the second blessing. At a Bible school in Topeka, Kansas, founded by a Holiness evangelist the "gift of the Spirit" came to a student in 1901, and the practice of glossolalia quickly spread. The Pentecostal revival made its greatest inroads in areas where Holiness movements were already prospering, and it attracted far more non-Methodists than had the earlier forms of perfectionism. Besides the emphasis on the baptism of the Holy Spirit, Pentecostalism recognized divine healing and demanded highly puritanical standards of personal conduct. Like the Holiness groups the Pentecostals were theological conservatives, and they comprised an important addition to the Arminian wing of Protestant conservatism in the period when the fundamentalist movement was gathering steam.

Some Holiness denominations, most notably the Church of the Nazarene, flatly reject the use of tongues, while others, the largest being the Church of God, Cleveland, Tennessee, and the Pentecostal Holiness Church, teach both glossolalia and entire sanctification. Denominationalism soon took hold in Pentecostalism, and before long it had more adherents than its parent in such bodies as the Assemblies of God, the black Church of God in Christ, and the International Church of the Foursquare Gospel.

More difficult to characterize is the Keswick movement which originated in Britain in 1875 at a "Convention for the Promotion of Practical Holiness" in the Lake District town of that name. Speakers at the annual Keswick conferences emphasized the "deeper life" instead of holiness, believing that the tendency to sin is not extinguished but is counteracted by victorious living through the Holy Spirit. The predominance of Reformed Anglicans along with like-minded Free Church evangelicals in the movement prevented the Wesleyan-Arminian view of sanctification from establishing a foothold.

In Germany the Holiness concept was institutionalized in the Gemeinschaftsbewegung (Fellowship Movement) which came into existence under the influence of Keswick and Methodist evangelists from Britain and the United States. Several societies were founded, the most important being the German Evangelization Association (1884), Gnadau Association (1888), and Blankenburg Alliance Conference (1905), which cultivated a deeper holiness among members of the territorial churches.

The Holiness movement contributed to a deepening of the spiritual life in a materialistic age, and it was a welcome contrast to the sterile intellectualism and dead orthodoxy that characterized so many churches at the time. However, it has been criticized for suggesting that a "second blessing" can provide some Christians with a higher kind of sanctification than that which flows from one's justifying faith. P. T. Forsyth said it is "a fatal mistake to think of holiness as a possession which we have distinct from our faith and conferred upon it. That is a Catholic idea, still saturating Protestant pietism." Other objections include the tendency to identify holiness with quietistic self-abasement and even loss of personality, an otherworldly asceticism that calls for the rejection of all secular culture as sinful, confining the grace of God to stereotyped forms of religious experience, an overemphasis on feeling, and claiming with overweening confidence the special action of the Holy Spirit in one's life and direct inspiration in the details of thought and action.

R. V. PIERARD

See also CHARISMATIC MOVEMENT; KESWICK CONVENTION; METHODISM; OBERLIN THEOLOGY; PENTECOSTALISM; PERFECTION, PERFECTIONISM; WESLEYAN TRADITION.

Bibliography. E. L. Blumhofer, Assemblies of God; A. Clarke, Commentary on the Holy Bible; R. H. Coats, HERE 6:743–50; D. W. Dayton, American Holiness Movement: A Bibliographic Introduction; NIDCC, 474–75; M. E. Dieter, Holiness Revival of the Nineteenth Century; W. J. Hollenweger, Pentecostals; C. E. Jones, Guide to the Study of the Holiness Movement; Perfectionist Persuasion: The Holiness Movement and American Methodism; J. L. Peters, Christian Perfection and American Methodism; P. Scharpf, History of Evangelism; T. L. Smith, Called unto Holiness; V. Synan, Holiness-Pentecostal Movement; H. O. Wiley, Introduction to Christian Theology.

Holiness of God. See GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF; GOD, DOCTRINE OF.

Holiness of the Christian. See GODLINESS.

Holl, Karl (1866–1926). German historian and theologian who made an important contribution to the study of Martin Luther. He rose to the prestigious rank of professor of history at Berlin University in 1906 where he became a leading expert on Luther. Had he never written a word about Luther's theology, Holl would still be an important Luther scholar, for he understood the need to clarify the Luther canon until it could be counted as reliable. This he did until he was able to discard several Luther works as not genuine, while several hitherto unknown works were proved to have been written by Luther.

Holl's knowledge of Luther's writings led him to analyze Luther's theology. He stressed that the foundation of Luther's faith was a "religion of conscience." By this Holl meant that Luther responded to something which arose from deep inner feelings with which he felt impelled to deal. Those experiences, said Holl, are central to Luther's theology, for Luther felt that he was standing alone in his sins before God. From this confrontation with God, said Holl, came Luther's theology.

This focus on Luther's personal experience with God as the foundation of his theology was a contribution because Holl clarified the basic reasons for Luther's rebellion against the church: an honest man who could do nothing but what his conscience bade him do, and an honest theologian who could think only what his conscience bade him think in spite of the church's teachings. But Holl's explanation of the means by which Luther reached his theological conclusions as a result of his personal experiences is controversial. He tends to stress that Luther's personal experiences and logic, rather than a rediscovery of biblical teachings, led Luther to this theology.

J. E. MENNELL

Bibliography. K. Holl, Cultural Significance of the Reformation; What Did Luther Understand by Religion?

Holocaust, The. Auschwitz, the Polish site of one of the largest Nazi concentration camps, has become a symbol of the mass murders and horrors of the Holocaust. Just as one of the many Nazi death camps represents in popular imagination the entire system of mass deportation, deprivation, degradation, and destruction of humans carried out by German conquerors throughout Europe during World War II, so "Holocaust," the term usually used to describe Nazi persecution, imprisoning, and pitiless eradication of six million Jews between 1933 and 1945, has become a paradigm for the extremes of human suffering and of evil, in institutionalized and personal manifestations, during the twentieth century. In the first half of this century, labeled "the Era of Violence" by New Cambridge Modern History, two pinnacles of destruction dominate: the Holocaust and the atom bomb.

Scholars have probed the inadequate, indifferent responses of bystanders, both in Germany and abroad, to the Nazi persecution of the Jews. The Allied governments have been criticized for not focusing bombing raids on Auschwitz and its railroad lines during the war against Germany. Even Jewish organizations in America have been faulted for failing to do enough to save Jews in Europe. The greater burden of responsibility, however, falls upon Christian churches, especially in Germany, because of their apathy or sins of omission before and during the Holocaust; in addition, certain Christian teachings, historical attitudes, and actions nurtured a Christian anti-Judaism that contributed to the popular attitudes susceptible to strident anti-Semitic movements before 1933. Sinister shadows in the German Lutheran legacy were shaped by the virulent anti-Semitic remarks of Martin Luther in 1543 and by the anti-Semitism passionately proclaimed by Adolf Stoecker, who by 1874 became court preacher in Berlin. Moreover, the traditional Christian doctrine of the cursed Jews, linked to the guilt of deicide, was sometimes interpreted by the public as an encouragement of anti-Semitic policies and acts. In the post-Holocaust rethinking of Roman Catholic theology, the Second Vatican Council recognized the pernicious effects of this teaching in its 1965 statement that what happened in Christ's passion cannot be blamed on all the Jews then living, without distinction, nor upon the Jews of today. Protestants have also reappraised their teachings on Jews. In 1980 the Rhineland Synod of the German Evangelical [Protestant] Church overwhelmingly adopted a path-breaking document: "Resolution on the Renewal of the Relationship between Christians and Jews." Describing the Holocaust as a turning point and initial motivation, the declaration acknowledges "the co-responsibility and guilt of Christianity in Germany with respect to the Holocaust." It goes on to assert that the continuing existence of the Jewish people and the creation of the state of Israel are signs of God's faithfulness to his people. Affirming that both Jews and Christians are witnesses of God to the world and to each other, the resolution maintains that the church cannot exercise its witness to the Jewish people as it does to the nations of the world. Thus, the document also touches on the sensitive issue of Christian mission to the Jews, an activity which some Jews in the post-Holocaust era link to an attempt at spiritual genocide. They ask: Do Christians really want a world free of Jews (Judenrein in Nazi terminology)? At least one evangelist, Billy Graham, refrains from singling out Jews as Jews for evangelistic purposes.

Although Christian anti-Judaism contributed to ripening German antagonism toward Jews, the primary burden of guilt for the Holocaust falls upon Adolf Hitler, who made racial anti-Semitism the cornerstone of his policies, as well as the leaders of the Nazi party and their functionaries, who made the machinery of destruction function so effectively. Concentration camp doctors, trained as healers, became killers, as they supervised inhuman medical experiments and selected people for extermination. Technicians introduced a new killing device, Zyklon B gas, administered in chambers camouflaged as shower rooms. Even in the 1930s Jews, viewed as vermin by the Nazis, were given the worst treatment in concentration camps. During the 1940s the annihilation of Jews and other prisoners became the primary goal of six eastern European killing centers, inaugurating the industrialization of mass murder: Auschwitz, Belzec, Chelmno, Maidanek, Sobibor, and Treblinka. They were supplemented by a vast network of concentration camps, specializing in slave labor under the most deplorable physical and psychological conditions. Of an estimated eleven million civilians who died or were killed in these camps, six million were Jews. Thus, by 1945 the Nazis had eliminated two thirds of the European Jews (a figure representing almost one third of world Jewry).

Accelerated political and racial anti-Semitism in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, as well as the economic and social chaos following World War I in Germany, created conditions conducive to Nazi extremist propaganda. After Hitler was appointed German chancellor on January 30, 1933, the Nazi regime's policies toward Jews evolved and intensified through four stages:

1933–1935. Sporadic economic and professional harassment included an economic boycott of Jewish businesses (April 1, 1933), the elimination of Jews from civil service posts (April 7, 1933) and from leading professions.

1935–1938. Legal disabilities culminated in the September 1935 Nuremberg laws, depriving Jews of German citizenship and prohibiting intermarriage. "Aryanization" of Jewish property and wealth also began.

1938–1941. Deportations and pogroms started with "Crystal Night" (November 9, 1938). Jewish businesses were expropriated and Jews sent to concentration camps.

1941–1945. The planned program of physical destruction of Jews began with the June 1941 German invasion of Russia, when Jews were systematically killed by mobile killing units and gas vans in Russia. After the Wannsee conference in Berlin on January 20, 1942, extermination camps (with gas chambers and crematoria) became centers of the killing operations.

"The final solution" of the Jewish problem was the Nazi phrase used at the Wannsee conference, held to coordinate with top government officials suitable treatment for the Jews. Both "Holocaust" (derived from the Greek word for a sacrifice wholly consumed by fire) and the Hebrew word šō'ā (variously used in the Bible for disaster, destruction, darkness, or emptiness) are current designations for the mass annihilation of Jews in Europe. These two words surfaced in Israel as descriptions of the Nazi program against Jews; šō'ā was first applied in 1940, and "holocaust" was initially used between 1957 and 1959.

Worldwide revulsion against the Holocaust has had effects on the contemporary human rights movement, leading to the UN Genocide Convention, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and many national and international human rights groups. The resisters to Nazism and those courageous individuals like Raoul Wallenberg, who acted to save Jews, also provide historical models for current human rights activists. Many Christians as individuals helped Jews escape, but institutionalized Christianity failed both by silence and by lack of open, fearless, and concerted action to aid the oppressed. The German Protestant Confessing Church focused its public efforts on the plight of baptized Jews, not on the persecution of Jews as Jews.

Of the many memorials and museums dedicated to the Holocaust, Yad Vashem in Israel and the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C., are among the most influential. Not only do these institutions educate the general public, but they also provide materials, facilities, and conferences for scholarly researchers.

Holocaust studies have been multidisciplinary, expanding perspectives in psychology, medicine, law, sociology, political science, literature, history, and theology. In addition to the inevitable ethical questions, new questions of theodicy have been raised, the Jewish roots of Christianity are being probed, and the uniqueness versus the universality of the event has been debated. The special wisdom and grace of the survivors have surfaced in stories that instruct us all. R. ZERNER

See also ANTI-SEMITISM.

Bibliography. Y. Bauer, History of the Holocaust; Holocaust in Historical Perspective; M. Bergman and M. Jucovy, eds., Generations of the Holocaust; E. Berkovits, Faith after the Holocaust; J. Blatter and S. Milton, Art of the Holocaust; A. A. Cohen, Tremendum; L. S. Dawidowicz, War against the Jews, 1933–1945; T. Des Pres, Survivor: An Anatomy of Life in the Death Camps; H. L. Feingold, Politics of Rescue: The Roosevelt Administration and the Holocaust, 1938–1945; E. Fleischner, Auschwitz: Beginning of a New Era?; H. Friedlander, Origins of Nazi Genocide: From Euthanasia to the Final Solution; P. Friedman, Their Brothers' Keepers; D. P. Gushee, Righteous Gentiles of the Holocaust: A Christian Interpretation; R. Hilberg, Destruction of the European Jews; C. Klein, Anti-Judaism in Christian Theology; H. Krystal, ed., Massive Psychic Trauma; L. L. Langer, Holocaust and the Literary Imagination; I. Leitner, Isabella; R. J. Lifton, Nazi Doctors: Medical Killing and the Psychology of Genocide; F. Littell and H. G. Locke, eds., German Church Struggle and the Holocaust; R. L. Rubenstein, After Auschwitz; Cunning of History: The Holocaust and the American Future; R. Ruether, Faith and Fratricide; B. L. Sherwin and S. G. Ament, Encountering the Holocaust: An Interdisciplinary Survey; J. Sloan, ed., Notes from the Warsaw Ghetto: The Journal of Emmanuel Ringelblum; J. Weiss, Ideology of Death: Why the Holocaust Happened in Germany; E. Wiesel, Night; L. Yahil, Holocaust.

Holy Communion. See LORD'S SUPPER.

Holy Ghost. See HOLY SPIRIT.

Holy of Holies. See TABERNACLE, TEMPLE.

Holy Saturday. Part of Holy Week, which culminates with Easter Sunday, the celebration of the rising of our Lord Jesus Christ, from the tomb, after he died on the cross. It deals in a specific sense with the remembrance of the period of time during which Jesus lay in the tomb and borders on his rising. In a sense it celebrates the entire paschal mystery in a reflective mood.

Holy Saturday

T. J. GERMAN

See also CHRISTIAN YEAR; EASTER; HOLY WEEK.

Bibliography. L. Bouyer, Paschal Mystery: Meditations on the Last Three Days of Holy Week.

Holy Spirit. In the NT, the third person of the Trinity; in the OT, God's power.

The OT. In the OT the spirit of the Lord (rûah yhw; LXX, to pneuma kyriou) is generally an expression for God's power, the extension of himself whereby he carries out many of his mighty deeds (e.g., Judg. 14:6–20; 1 Sam 11:6). As such, "spirit" sometimes finds expression in ways similar to other modes of God's activity, such as "the hand of God" (Ps. 19:1; 102:25); "the word of God" (Ps. 33:6; 147:15, 18); and the "wisdom of God" (Exod. 28:3; 1 Kings 3:28; Job 32:8). The origins of the word "spirit" in both Hebrew (rûah) and Greek (pneuma) are similar, stemming from associations with "breath" and "wind," which were connected by ancient cultures to unseen spiritual force, hence "spirit" (cf. John 3:8—note the association with air in English; e.g., "pneumatic," "respiration," etc.). The KJV uses the term "Holy Ghost" for "Holy Spirit" based on an obsolete usage of the word "ghost" (from Middle English and Anglo-Saxon, originally meaning "breath," "spirit"—cf. the German Geist). Thus it is understandable that God's creative word (Gen. 1) is closely akin to God's creative breath (Gen. 2:7). Both ideas are identified elsewhere with God's spirit. As an agent in creation, God's spirit is the life principle of both men and animals (Job 33:4; Gen. 6:17; 7:15).

The primary function of the spirit of God in the OT is as the spirit of prophecy. God's spirit is the motivating force in the inspiration of the prophets—that power which moved sometimes to ecstasy but always to the revelation of God's message, expressed by the prophets with "thus saith the Lord." Prophets are sometimes referred to as "men of God" (1 Sam. 2:27; 1 Kings 12:22; etc.); in Hosea 9:7 they are literally "men of the Spirit." The general implication in the OT is that the prophets were inspired by the spirit of God (Num. 11:17; 1 Sam. 16:15; Mic. 3:8; Ezek. 2:2; etc.).

The phrase "Holy Spirit" appears in two contexts in the OT, but is qualified both times as God's holy spirit (Ps. 51:11; Isa. 63:10–11, 14), such that it is clear that God himself is the referent, not the Holy Spirit who is encountered in the NT. The OT does not contain an idea of a semi-independent divine entity, the Holy Spirit. Rather, we find special expressions of God's activity with and through men. God's spirit is holy in the same way his word and his name are holy; they are all forms of his revelation and, as such, are set in antithesis to all things human or material. The OT, especially the Prophets, anticipates a time when God, who is holy (or "other than/separate from" people; cf. Hos. 11:9) will pour out his spirit on men and women (Isa. 11:1–2; Ezek. 37:14; Joel 2:28–32), who will themselves become holy. The Messiah/Servant of God will be the one upon whom the spirit rests (Isa. 11:1–5; 42:1–7; 63:1–6) and will inaugurate the time of salvation (Ezek. 37:14–28; cf. Jer. 31:31–34).

Intertestamental Judaism. Within intertestamental Judaism several significant developments shaped the idea of "Holy Spirit" as it was understood in NT times. After the OT prophets had proclaimed the coming of the Spirit in the messianic age of salvation, Judaism had developed the idea that the spirit of prophecy had ceased within Israel with the last of the biblical prophets (Syriac Bar. 85:3; 1 Macc. 4:46; 14:41; etc.; cf. Ps. 74:9). Consequently, there arose from time to time a hope of the dawning of the new age, especially within the apocalyptic movement, which generally pointed to a supposed Messiah and/or prophetic reawakening of some kind (cf. Acts 5:34–39). The Qumran community is illustrative of this, since it understood itself to be involved in the fulfillment of Israel's messianic hope as the "preparers of the way of the Lord" (Isa. 40:3; cf. 1QS 8. 14–16). The Qumran literature also shows increased identification of the spirit of prophecy with "God's Holy Spirit" (1QS 8. 16; Zadokite Documents II. 12). The phrase "the Holy Spirit" occasionally occurs in Judaism (4 Ezra 14:22; Ascension of Isa. 5:14, etc.), but, as in the rabbis, it generally meant "God's spirit of prophecy." Thus, the messianic expectation of Judaism, which included the eschatological outpouring of God's spirit (e.g., 1 Enoch 49:3, citing Isa. 11:2; cf. Sybilline Oracle III, 582, based on Joel 2:28–32), was bound up with the conviction that the Spirit had ceased in Israel with the last of the prophets; the Holy Spirit was understood as God's spirit of prophecy, which would be given again in the new age to a purified Israel in conjunction with the advent of a Messiah.

The concept of the Holy Spirit was broadened through the Wisdom Literature, especially in the personification of wisdom as that idea came into contact with the idea of Spirit. As early as Proverbs 8:22–31 and Job 28:25–28 wisdom is presented as a more or less independent aspect of God's power (here as agent in creation) and is credited with functions and characteristics that are attributed to the Holy Spirit in the NT. Wisdom proceeded from the mouth of God and covered the earth as a mist at creation (Sir. 24:3); she is the breath of the power of God (Wisd. Sol. 7:25); and by means of his wisdom God formed man (Wisd. Sol. 9:2). The Lord poured out wisdom upon all his works, and she dwells with all flesh (Sir. 1:9–10). Moreover, wisdom is full of spirit and indeed is identified with the Spirit (Wisd. Sol. 7:22; 9:17; cf. 1:5). Thus the Jews of NT times were familiar with the background of these ideas as they are variously expressed in the NT, ideas which use these background concepts but move beyond them to some unexpected conclusions. Indeed, Jesus taught that his messiahship and the corresponding outpouring of the Spirit were firmly rooted in OT understanding (Luke 4:18–19, citing Isa. 61:1–2), and, similar to intertestamental Judaism, understood the messianic Spirit of the Lord to be the Holy Spirit (Matt. 12:32), that spirit which had foretold through the prophets that the coming Messiah would inaugurate the age of salvation with the pouring out of the Spirit on all flesh. Jesus developed the idea of the Holy Spirit as a personality (e.g., John 15:26; 16:7–15), specifically as God working in the church.

The NT. The NT teaching of the Holy Spirit is rooted in the idea of both the spirit of God as the manifestation of God's power and the spirit of prophecy. Jesus, and the church after him, brought these ideas together in predicating them of the Holy Spirit, God's eschatological gift to man. When Mary is "overshadowed" by the power of the Most High—a phrase standing in parallel construction to "the Holy Spirit" (Luke 1:35; cf. 9:35)—we find echoes of the OT idea of God's spirit in the divine cloud which "overshadowed" the tabernacle so that the tent was filled with the glory of the Lord (Exod. 40:35; Isa. 63:11–14 identifies God's presence in this instance as "God's Holy Spirit"). Luke records Jesus' power to cast out demons "by the finger of God," an OT phrase for God's power (Exod. 8:19; Ps. 8:3; Luke 11:20). This power is identified as the "Spirit of God" (Matt. 12:28), i.e., the Holy Spirit (Matt. 12:32). At Jesus' baptism the spirit came upon him (Mark 1:10; "the Spirit of God," Matt. 3:16; "the Holy Spirit," Luke 3:21), and he received God's confirmation of his divine sonship and messianic mission (Matt. 3:13–17). Jesus went up from the Jordan full of the Holy Spirit (Luke 4:1) and after the temptation began his ministry "in the power of the Spirit" (Luke 4:14). Taking up the message of John the Baptist, Jesus proclaimed the coming of the kingdom of God (Matt. 4:17; cf. 3:1)—a coming marked by the presence of the Holy Spirit (Matt. 12:28–32) as the sign of the messianic age of salvation (Luke 4:18–19; Acts 10:38; etc.).

From the beginning of his ministry Jesus identified himself with both the victorious Messiah-king and the suffering servant figures of OT prophecy (Isa. 42:1–7; cf. Mark 10:45), ideas which Judaism had kept separate. Jesus further defined the role of God's Messiah as proclaiming God's favor, God's salvation, in the new age—a message stressed far beyond that of "judgment of the nations," which the Jews had come to expect. At the synagogue in Nazareth (Luke 4:16–21) when Jesus identified himself with the Messiah promised in Isaiah 61:1–2 he stopped short of reading the "words of judgment" of Isaiah 61:2 (even though Isa. 61:2, "comfort to those who mourn," is part of Jesus' teaching at Matt. 5:4). This emphasis is made again when John the Baptist asks whether Jesus is indeed the one who was to come (Luke 7:18–23). Indeed, even though John the Baptist proclaimed Jesus to be the one who would "baptize in the Holy Spirit in fire" as aspects of the new age (salvation and judgment, respectively—Luke 3:15–17; note the clear judgment connections of "baptism with fire" in 3:17), Jesus' own focus was on the positive, salvific aspect of the new age as represented in the baptism with the Holy Spirit (Acts 1:5; 11:16).

Jesus understood the Holy Spirit as a personality. This comes out especially in John's Gospel, where the Spirit is called the "Paraclete," i.e., the Comforter (Counselor, Advocate). Jesus himself was the first Counselor (Paraclete, John 14:16), and he will send the disciples another Counselor after he is gone, i.e., the Spirit of truth, the Holy Spirit (14:26; 15:26; 16:5). The Holy Spirit will dwell in the believers (John 7:38; cf. 14:17), and will guide the disciples into all truth (16:13), teaching them "all things" and bringing them "to remembrance of all that [Jesus] said" to them (14:26). The Holy Spirit will testify about Jesus, as the disciples must also testify (John 15:26–27).

In Acts 2:14–21 Peter interpreted the Pentecost phenomena as the fulfillment of Joel's prophecy of the outpouring of the spirit upon all flesh in the messianic age (Joel 2:28–32). The outpouring of the spirit upon all flesh was accomplished for the benefit of Jew and Gentile alike (Acts 10:45; 11:15–17), and individual converts had access to this gift of the age of salvation through repentance and baptism into the name of Jesus Christ (2:38). This, according to Peter, put the converts in contact with the promise of Joel's prophecy, the gift of the Holy Spirit: "The promise is for you . . . , for all whom the Lord our God will call" (2:39; Joel 2:32). The apostles and others carried out their ministries "full of the Holy Spirit" (Acts 4:31; 6:5; 7:54; etc.), and the Holy Spirit—identified in Acts 16:7 as the Spirit of Jesus—directed the mission of the fledgling church (9:31; 13:2; 15:28; 16:6–7). The salvific aspects of the new age practiced by Jesus—notably healing and exorcism—were carried out by the early church through the power of the Holy Spirit. Visions and prophecies occurred within the young church (9:10; 10:3; 10:10–16; 11:27–28; 13:1; 15:32) in keeping with the Acts 2 citation of Joel 2:28–32. The experience of the early church confirmed that the messianic age had indeed come.

Holy Spirit

Paul taught that the Holy Spirit, poured out in the new age, is the creator of new life in the believer and that unifying force by which God in Christ is “building together” the Christians into the body of Christ (Rom. 5:5; 2 Cor. 5:17; Eph. 2:22; cf. 1 Cor. 6:19). Romans 8 shows that Paul identified the spirit, the spirit of God, and the spirit of Christ with the Holy Spirit (cf. the spirit of Christ as the spirit of prophecy in 1 Pet. 1:10–12), and that these terms are generally interchangeable. If anyone does not have the spirit of Christ, he does not belong to Christ (Rom. 8:9); but those who are led by the spirit of God are sons of God (8:14). We all have our access to the Father through one spirit (Eph. 2:18), and there is one body and one spirit (4:4). We were all baptized by one spirit into one body, and we were all given the one spirit to drink (1 Cor. 12:13). The believer receives the spirit of adoption or “sonship” (Rom. 8:15)—indeed, the spirit of God’s own Son (Gal. 4:6)—by whom we cry, “Abba, Father,” that intimate address of filial relationship to God pioneered by Jesus, the unique Son of God (Mark 14:36).

The believers are being built together into a dwelling place of God in the spirit (Eph. 2:22). To each one was apportioned grace according to the measure of the gift of Christ (4:7; cf. Rom. 12:3), and Christ has given different ones to be prophets, apostles, evangelists, pastors, and teachers (Eph. 4:11) for the edification of the body. Similarly, the Spirit gives different kinds of spiritual gifts for different kinds of service (1 Cor. 12:4–5; 7), all for the common good. The way of love is to be followed in all things; indeed, the fruit of the spirit is love, joy, peace, etc. (Gal. 5:22–23). All of this is because God has initiated the new covenant (Jer. 31:31–34; Ezek. 37:14, 26) in the hearts of men by means of his eschatological spirit (2 Cor. 3:6–18). In this new age the spirit is the earnest of our inheritance (2 Cor. 1:22; 5:5; Eph. 1:14), a “firstfruits,” the seal of God (2 Cor. 1:22; Eph. 1:13; 4:30). These phrases point out the “already vs. not yet” tension of the new age: the new age has dawned, and the eschatological spirit has been poured out, yet all of creation awaits the final consummation. Even though the spirit bears witness with our spirit that we are sons of God (Rom. 8:16) and we truly have the firstfruits of the spirit (8:23), we await the adoption as sons (8:23) at the final consummation. Until that time Christians have the Comforter, the Spirit who intercedes on behalf of the saints according to the will of the Father (8:27).

Patristic and Medieval Theology. In the patristic period we encounter little that moves beyond the biblical ideas of the Holy Spirit. The apostolic fathers reflect the NT idea that the spirit is operative in the church, inspiring prophecy and otherwise working within individuals (Barnabas 12:2, Ignatius, Phil. 7:1). Itinerant Christian prophets are dealt with as a present reality in the Didache, but as time passes, such charismata are treated as theoretical. The view that the spirit of OT prophecy is one and the same Holy Spirit that inspired the apostles is periodically encountered (Justin, Dialogues 1–7; 51; 82; 87; etc.; Irenaeus, Against Heresies II, 6.4; III, 21.3–4), and the apostles emerge as the “Spirit-bearers” (pneumatophoroi)—a designation given to the OT prophets (Hos. 9:7, LXX). The Holy Spirit is credited with empowering the church—even with inspiring certain noncanonical writings—as late as the fourth century.

Even though the “trinitarian” formula of Matthew 28:19 is found in the apostolic fathers, the word “Trinity” is first applied to the Godhead by Theophilus of Antioch (To Autolytus 2:15). Tertullian clearly taught the divinity of the Holy Spirit, an idea that was later to occupy the church in discussion for a thousand years. Tertullian wrestled with the problem of the tension between the authority of the Spirit in the church versus apostolic tradition and Scripture as received revelation. He espoused Montanism for a time, a system which placed primary importance on the current inspiration of the Spirit in the body. The church, however, rejected Montanism in favor of the objective authority of apostolic tradition as reflected in Scripture, and it eventually died out. The church’s stand against the Montanist heresy was largely responsible for the demise of Christian prophecy and other charismata. The Muratorian Canon (lines 75–6) states that the number of prophets is settled, and even the Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus, which elevates charismatic leadership above ecclesiastical structure, restricts the term “prophet” entirely to the canonical prophets. In the late fourth century John Chrysostom could speak of the spiritual gifts as belonging to an age in the past.

In the period immediately prior to Nicea the church was preoccupied with the famous “christological controversies” and paid scant attention to a doctrine of the Holy Spirit. The Nicene Creed confesses faith in the Holy Spirit but without any development of the idea of the Spirit’s divinity or essential relationship to the Father and the Son. This question became a major issue within the church in the late fourth century and following, and the Council of Constantinople added to the words of the Nicene Creed, describing the Holy Spirit as “the Lord and Giver of Life, proceeding from the Father, to be worshiped and glorified together with the Father and the Son.” A controversy developed around the source of the Spirit, specifically concerning whether he ought not also be confessed as “proceeding from the Son.” Following Augustine’s teaching, the phrase filioque (“and the Son”) was added by the Western church to the above creed at the Council of Toledo in 589. The Eastern church rejected the filioque doctrine, and the creed constituted confessional grounds for the split between East and West which had already taken place in practice.

Although other aspects of the Spirit were occasionally discussed, the procession of the Spirit continued to occupy theologians in the West. Anselm of Canterbury brought the debate into the era of scholasticism and, although reason as proof of doctrine was unevenly received, filioque remained the standard of the church. Peter Lombard argued from Scripture for filioque, and the fourth Lateran Council again espoused trinitarianism and filioque. Although Aquinas rejected reason as a means to know the distinctions of the Divine Persons, he affirmed that the Spirit proceeds from the special relationship that exists between the Father and the Son. Such discussions as this continued into the fifteenth century, when the Council of Florence again attempted to unite the Western and Eastern churches. The filioque idea was reaffirmed and, although a cosmetic change of wording was made in an attempt to satisfy the Eastern church, the Greek Orthodox Church rejected the substance of the creed. The position of the Roman Catholic Church has remained essentially unchanged, and the rift between East and West over this issue remains to the present.

The Reformation. Although other aspects of the Spirit's work were of importance in medieval theology—including sanctification and illumination—it was not until the Reformation that the work of the Spirit in the church was truly rediscovered. This was due at least in part to the rejection of Rome's dogma of church tradition as the guarantor of correct Scripture interpretation and formation of true doctrine. This reaction led to a Reformation stress on the idea of sola Scriptura and the work of the Spirit in salvation independent of the Catholic Church's "unbroken succession back to Christ." While Luther rejected "enthusiasm" (the subjective claim of direct guidance by the Spirit independent of Scripture or church structure), he stressed Spirit over structure and understood the Spirit to be at work through the Word (the gospel), primarily in preaching, and the sacraments, and therefore in salvation. The Spirit works in salvation by influencing the soul to reliance, by faith, on Christ. Faith is itself a mystical gift of God whereby the believers mit Gott ein Kuche werden (become kneaded into one cake with God). Without the grace and work of the Spirit man is incapable of making himself acceptable to God or of having saving faith (cf. Bondage of the Will, 1525). This is accomplished by the Holy Spirit through the Word of God. Salvation is thus a gift bestowed by the grace of God, and Luther implies that the Word (the gospel) as preached is primarily the efficacious Word of God after the Spirit works upon the heart of the hearer. For Luther, the Word is the main sacrament, for faith and the Holy Spirit are conveyed through the preaching and the teaching of the gospel (Rom. 10:17); baptism and the Lord's Supper are signs of the "sacrament of the Word," in that they proclaim the Word of God. Luther favored the preached Word over the written Word, but did not hold the two to be mutually exclusive. To be Christian the preaching of the church had to be faithful to the Scripture; but to be faithful to Scripture, the church had to preach.

The Word—primarily the incarnate Logos—is God's channel for the Spirit. Man brings the Word of the Scripture to the ear, but God infuses his Spirit into the heart; the word of Scripture thus becomes the Word of God (Lectures on Psalms; Epistle to the Romans). No one can rightly understand the Word of Scripture without the working of the Spirit; where the Word is, the Spirit inevitably follows. The Spirit does not operate independent of the Word. Luther resisted the enthusiasts' sharp distinction between inward and outward Word. On the other hand, he rejected the Roman Catholic idea that the Spirit is identified with church office and that the sacraments are effective in and of themselves (ex opere operato). Thus the Spirit makes Christ present in the sacraments and in Scripture; only when the Spirit makes Christ present in the word is it God's own living Word. Otherwise the Scripture is letter, a law—it merely describes, it is only history. But as preaching, the Word is gospel (as opposed to law); the Spirit makes it so. The Spirit is not bound to the Word; he exists in God's eternal glory, away from the Word and our world. But as revealing Spirit he does not come without the Word.

Melanchthon followed Luther with few exceptions. Although allowing more room for man's response to the gospel than did Luther, he still stressed the primary work of the Spirit in salvation. Melanchthon showed more flexibility than Luther in the issue of the real presence in the Lord's Supper (cf. the Wittenberg Concord) but was in basic agreement with Luther as seen in the Augsburg Confession and its Apology. Zwingli departed from Luther and Melanchthon over the work of the Spirit in the sacraments, denying the necessity of baptism and asserting the largely commemorative significance of the Lord's Supper. The radical Reformers, too, were at odds with Luther and Melanchthon, and taught the priority of immediate revelation over Scripture. Lutherans and Catholics alike were condemned by the Schwärmer (fanatics) for their dependence upon the letter of Scripture instead of making the Bible subject to tests of religious experience.

Calvin taught that the Spirit works in regeneration to illumine the mind to receive the benefits of Christ and seals them in the heart. By the Spirit the heart of a man is opened to the penetrating power of the Word and sacraments. Calvin went beyond Luther in asserting that not only is the preached Word the agent of the Spirit, but the Bible is in its essence the Word of God (Genevan Catechism). The Spirit works in the reading of Scripture as well as in the preaching of the Word, and the Word—preached or read—is efficacious through the work of the Holy Spirit. The divine origin of Scripture is certified by the witness of the Spirit; the Scripture is the Word of God given by the Spirit's guidance through limited human speech. Thus the exegete must inquire after God's intention in giving Scripture for us (e.g., in the modern application of the OT; Institutes of the Christian Religion 2.8.8). The highest proof of Scripture derives from the fact that God in person speaks in it, i.e., in the secret testimony of the Spirit (Institutes of the Christian Religion 1.7.4). We feel the testimony of the Spirit engraved like a seal on our hearts with the result that it seals the cleansing and sacrifice of Christ. The Holy Spirit is the bond by which Christ unites us to himself (Institutes of the Christian Religion 3.1.1). Although Calvin rejected rational proofs as a basis for authenticating Scripture, interconfessional battles later caused the rigidifying of Reformed thought, and a tradition of scholastic proofs was developed to overcome the subjectivism of Calvin's authentication theory (cf. the Canons of Dort).

Holy Spirit

A seventeenth century reaction to strict Calvinism arose in Holland among the followers of James Arminius. Arminius rejected strict predestination, allowing for man's freedom to reject God's offer of grace. The Arminian position was denounced by the Synod of Dort but had great influence in England. John Wesley grew up in early-eighteenth-century England within this climate of Arminianism and through him Methodism was given its distinctive Arminian character. For Wesley, God acts in cooperation with, but not in violation of, free human response in the matter of saving faith. God does not merely dispense upon man justifying grace, nor does man simply acquire such grace by believing. There is rather a unified process of God's giving and man's receiving. The Holy Spirit convicts of sin and also bears witness of justification. Thereafter the Holy Spirit continues to work in man in sanctification, such that the believer feels in his heart the mighty workings of the Spirit of God. God continually "breathes" upon man's soul, and the soul "breathes unto God"—a fellowship of spiritual respiration by which the life of God in the soul is sustained. Sanctification—the renewal of man in the image of God, in righteousness and true holiness—is effected by the Spirit through faith. It includes being saved from sin and being perfected in love. Works are necessary to a continuance of faith, and "entire sanctification," perfection, is the goal of every believer.

The Modern Period. While seventeenth-century radical Puritanism produced the Quakers with their emphasis on subjective experience of the Holy Spirit (the Inner Light of George Fox)—such that Scripture is only a secondary source of knowledge for faith and practice (Robert Barclay, Apology)—eighteenth-century Methodism expressed a more balanced approach to the work of the Spirit. The focus of later Methodism on the work of the Spirit after conversion as an experience of divine grace has found development in the modern Holiness Movement, represented by churches in the Christian Holiness Association.

Another development that can be traced to Methodism's stress on sanctification is the twentieth-century reawakening of Pentecostalism. Stemming from earlier emphases upon "second experience," Pentecostalism has placed great importance upon the "baptism of the Holy Spirit," which is seen as the completion of a two-stage process of salvation. Since the inception of this modern movement at the turn of the century, speaking in tongues has been proclaimed as the main sign of Spirit baptism, although other "gifts of the Spirit"—notably healing—are also emphasized. From its fundamentalist/biblicist beginning the Pentecostal movement has grown into what is loosely called the charismatic movement, which now touches all of Protestantism and has made inroads into Roman Catholicism. This movement generally proclaims a distinct experience of "Spirit baptism" and, as a rule, focuses on speaking in tongues as the manifestation of that experience.

One of the most significant twentieth-century developments in understanding the Holy Spirit was made in the teaching of Karl Barth. Barth was a Reformed theologian who was largely responsible for the introduction of neo-orthodoxy, the so-called dialectical or crisis theology. Barth and others broke with classical liberalism in the first decades of the twentieth century, denying liberalism's theology of pious religious self-consciousness, its man-centeredness (Schleiermacher; Ritschl; Feuerbach). Barth emphasized the "infinite qualitative distinction" between man and God, and prophetically proclaimed God's nein to all of man's attempts at self-righteousness. Barth's Letter to the Romans sounded this note of man's "crisis"—the acknowledgment that what man knows of God, God has himself revealed. Barth developed his idea of God's self-revelation in terms of the doctrine of the Word of God (Church Dogmatics 1/1 and 1/2). First and most importantly, Jesus is the incarnate Logos, the Word of God. The Word of God is subsequently found in the preaching of the gospel, and "among the words of Scripture" (cf. Luther's doctrine of Spirit and Word). The Word of God is God himself in Holy Scripture. Scripture is holy and the Word of God, because by the Holy Spirit it became and will become to the church a witness to divine revelation. This witness is not identical to the revelation; it is not itself revelation, but the witness to it. Faith in Jesus as the Christ, specifically in Jesus' resurrection, is effected through the work of the Holy Spirit. The subjective "in Spirit" is the counterpart to the objective "in Christ." God's grace is manifested both in the objective revelation of God in Christ and man's subjective appropriation of this revelation through the Spirit. According to Scripture, God's revelation occurs in our enlightenment by the Holy Spirit to a knowledge of God's Word. The outpouring of the Spirit is God's revelation. In this reality we are free to be God's children and to know, love, and praise him in his revelation. The Spirit as subjective reality of God's revelation makes possible and real the existence of Christianity in the world. For, Barth observes, "where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is freedom" (2 Cor. 3:17); God in his freedom discloses himself to man and so makes man free for him (Evangelical Theology, 53–5).

Concluding Observations. This sketch shows some of the diversity in the development of Christian thinking about the Holy Spirit. It is ironic that God's eschatological gift to man has so often been a point of contention and division among Christians. Since the road ahead appears no less difficult than the way we have come, we would do well to be humbly mindful of God's sovereignty and of our weakness.

Because God in Christ has initiated the messianic age with its outpouring of the Spirit, man's relationship to God has been forever changed. No longer can the law be used as a means of exclusion and oppression of the disenfranchised: Jesus has preached the messianic gospel of release to the captive, sight to the blind, and good news to the poor; the new law of life has been written on the hearts of men. Thus we must abhor any new legalism which uses the Scripture to exclude and oppress—this is to turn the good news of Christ into "the letter that kills." We must, rather, recognize the "God-breathed" character of Scripture, and the "Spirit that makes alive." Only so will the Scripture be profitable. Conversely, the Spirit cannot be claimed as the mark of an elite, as that which distinguishes and divides. The gospel of Jesus Christ includes the message that the Holy Spirit has been poured out on all flesh. All abuses of Scripture and the Spirit must hear God's message: "The promise is for you and your children and for all who are afar off—for all whom the Lord our God will call." T. S. CAULLEY

See also BAPTISM OF THE SPIRIT; CHARISMATIC MOVEMENT; GOD, DOCTRINE OF; SPIRITUAL GIFTS; TONGUES, SPEAKING IN.

Bibliography. C. K. Barrett, Holy Spirit and the Gospel Tradition; F. D. Bruner, Theology of the Holy Spirit; J. D. G. Dunn, Baptism in the Holy Spirit; Jesus and the Spirit; M. Green, I Believe in the Holy Spirit; G. S. Hendry, Holy Spirit in Christian Theology; A. I. C. Heron, Holy Spirit; G. T. Montague, Holy Spirit: Growth of a Biblical Tradition; L. Morris, Spirit of the Living God; C. F. D. Moule, Holy Spirit; P. D. Opsahl, ed., Holy Spirit in the Life of the Church; R. Pache, Person and Work of the Holy Spirit; J. I. Packer, Keep in Step with the Spirit; M. Ramsey, Holy Spirit; E. Schweizer, Holy Spirit; E. F. Scott, Spirit in the New Testament; H. B. Swete, Holy Spirit in the Ancient Church; Holy Spirit in the New Testament; H. Watkins-Jones, Holy Spirit from Arminius to Wesley; J. Williams, Holy Spirit: Lord and Lifegiver.

Holy Week. The week preceding Easter, observing in a special manner the passion and death of Jesus Christ. It may also be called the Greater Week in remembrance of the great work performed by God during that week or the Paschal Week in reference to the coming resurrection. Athanasius of Alexandria used the phrase "Holy Week" in the fourth century. It is sometimes referred to as the week of remission, because confession is one of the experiences asked of some Christians in preparation for the celebration of Easter. Eastern Christians sometimes call it the week of salvation.

In the early development of Holy Week only Good Friday and Holy Saturday were designated as holy days. Some areas referred to a triduum of three days, including Easter Sunday morning within Holy Week. Holy Thursday officially became a holy day in the fourth century. Wednesday was added to commemorate the plot of Judas to give Jesus over to his enemies. The other days of the week were added by the middle of the fourth century. In general, most of the Holy Week observances originated in Jerusalem and were adopted by Europe. Before the Council of Nicea the great feast which was celebrated was the Christian Passover on the night of Holy Saturday.

After the medieval period Holy Week lost quite a bit of its appeal. Pius XII attempted to give it central importance to the church in the 1950s. It is now considered by many to be the heart of the Catholic Church's yearly celebration of the events of the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ. The central mystery of redemption is relived during Holy Week.

Holy Thursday, or Maundy Thursday, as part of Holy Week is properly called "Thursday of the Lord's Supper." It commemorates the changing of bread and wine into the body and blood of Jesus Christ. Mass on Holy Thursday is celebrated in the evening.

Good Friday is the anniversary of the crucifixion of our Lord; it is a day of sorrow. Its full title is "Friday of the passion and death of the Lord." The liturgical section includes (1) the reading service, (2) the veneration of the cross, (3) the

Holy Week

Communion service. The service of the stations of the cross is optional.

Holy Saturday is usually a quiet day of prayer and reflection in preparation for the celebration of the resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ on Easter Sunday.

T. J. GERMAN

See also ASH WEDNESDAY; EASTER; GOOD FRIDAY; HOLY SATURDAY; MAUNDY THURSDAY.

Bibliography. L. Bouyer, Paschal Mystery: Meditations on the Last Three Days of Holy Week; J. G. Davies, Holy Week: A Short History; J. G. Davies and Joint Liturgical Group, Holy Week Services; J. Gaillard, Holy Week and Easter; C. Howell, Preparing for Easter; W. J. O'Shea, Meaning of Holy Week; M. Tierney, Holy Week: A Commentary.

Homoousios. The word became an important theological term when it was employed by the Council of Nicea in 325 to describe the relationship between the Son of God and the Father. Later it was used to describe the relationship of the Holy Spirit to the Father and the Son and thus was instrumental in the developing doctrine of the Trinity. Homoousios literally means same (homo) in substance (ousia) or, as it is sometimes translated, consubstantial.

However, in order to determine precisely what is meant when it is asserted that the Son is homoousios with the Father, one needs to know the sense of sameness and of substance that is being appealed to. It is clear that the fathers at Nicea did not think of homoousios from the standpoint of Aristotle's category of primary ousia, in which ousia is considered simply as an individual thing. In that sense, to say that the Father and the Son are homoousios would be to say that these are simply different terms representing the same single reality, expressing no difference, being numerically identical. There is evidence that the use of homoousios was condemned at the Synod of Antioch in 268, because Paul of Samosata employed it precisely with this monarchian sense.

Neither did the fathers make complete use of Aristotle's secondary category in which ousia is taken as a genus to which various species belong. The Arians seemed to understand the orthodox view in this sense, for they objected that a doctrine of homoousios would have the illogical result of proposing a division of the indivisible divine substance. The fathers did use many analogies of relationships in this second category (such as man and mankind), but they also used analogies that express a much closer relationship than members of a genus (such as the relationship of rays to the sun or a river to a spring). At any rate, they were careful to point out the limitations of such analogies when applied to the Godhead.

In the teaching of Nicene and post-Nicene orthodoxy the essential relationship between the Father and the Son (and this was applied by extension to the Holy Spirit also in the post-Nicene period) was seen as one in which the Son derives his ousia from the Father, so that they are not numerically the same, and so that the Father is properly the source of the Son's being. Nevertheless, it was asserted that in this (eternal) derivation, the Son is and remains homoousios with the Father, so that what the Father is and has is exactly what the Son is and has. Thus there exists (in the classic statement of Archibald Robertson) a "full and unbroken continuation of the Being of the Father in the Son." While this use of homoousios still leaves many questions unanswered, the use of the term was regarded as a necessary one in that it seemed to express better than any other term an essential part of the biblical description of the Father-Son relationship in such a way as to decisively refute the Arian doctrine that the Son was a created being, wholly other from the Father, having his own beginning.

C. BLAISING

See also CHRISTOLOGY; HYPOSTATIC UNION; NICEA, COUNCIL OF.

Bibliography. Athanasius, Defense of the Nicene Council; J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Creeds; Early Christian Doctrines; G. C. Stead, Divine Substance.

Homosexuality. Sexual desire directed toward members of one's own sex. Female homosexuality is frequently called lesbianism, from the Island of Lesbos, where the Greek poetess Sappho (reputedly homosexual) lived ca. 600 B.C. Traditionally homosexuality was the sin for which Sodom was destroyed by divine judgment, hence the popular term "sodomy." This interpretation depends upon uncertain translation, while Ezekiel 16:49–50 and Sirach 16:8–9 give other reasons for the judgment. The assumption of homosexuality in Sodom dates from the Greek occupation of Palestine, when "the Greek sin" seriously endangered Jewish youth and strong scriptural warning was necessary.

Homosexuality had been condemned in both Leviticus (18:22; 20:13), where it is abhorrent to God, defiling, punishable by death, and in Deuteronomy (23:18), where it is forbidden to bring the hire of harlot or homosexual ("dog") into the house of God in payment of religious vows, both being abhorrent to God. It is usually assumed that the male cult prostitutes common in heathen shrines but forbidden in Israel (Deut. 23:17), though sometimes prevalent (1 Kings 14:24; 15:12; 22:46; 2 Kings 23:7), were homosexual.

Some hold that tolerance (and institutionalizing) of homosexual prostitution contributed much to the decay of Greek youth and army. Roman law punished it severely as early as the third century B.C., later protecting minors and forbidding the use of premises on pain of death—even by burning. Rome's concern was probably more military than moral.

Such laws show the practice ancient and widespread. Today, it has been claimed, 4 to 5 percent of white adult males are homosexual, 10 to 20 percent bisexual, the remainder heterosexual; but innumerable gradations must be recognized: a "six point scale" of degrees of homo-, bi-, and heterosexuality oversimplifies the situation.

Early Christian reaction is expressed by Paul: homosexuals will not "inherit the kingdom of God" (1 Cor. 6:9–10); because of idolatry God gave the heathen up "to shameful lusts. Even their women exchanged natural relations for unnatural ones. In the same way the men also abandoned natural relations with women and were inflamed with lust for one another. Men committed indecent acts with other men, and received in themselves the due penalty for their perversion" (Rom. 1:26–27). Here the association with idolatry, the unnaturalness of the practice, and the divine judgment that abandons individuals to it (an echo of Sodom?) are all significant. The Sodom story recurs in Jude 7 ("unnatural lust") and 2 Peter 2:6–7 ("lust of defiling passion"), perpetuating the tradition that homosexuals were under divine ban.

The Didache extends the commandments to forbid corrupting of boys; Athenagoras classes pederasty with adultery. Perhaps influenced by the Roman attitude, Christian canon law laid down penalties ranging from nine years' penance to permanent excommunication. On the whole, the church treated homosexuality as a sin needing spiritual cure rather than a crime for magistrates to punish—unless linked with heresy, when the punishment was death. Earthquakes threatening Byzantium ("Sodom") were blamed upon homosexuals.

In Britain from the sixteenth century the law prescribed (though rarely exacted) death. The jurist William Blackstone (eighteenth century) wrote: "Homosexuality, the crime against nature, one which the voice of nature and reason and the express law of God determine to be capital. Of which we have a signal instance long before the Jewish dispensation, in the destruction of the cities by fire from heaven, so that this is a universal not merely a provincial precept." In the nineteenth century imprisonment was substituted.

In recent decades the prevalence of blackmail and suicide and the difficulties of detection and punishment ("sending homosexuals to prison resembles sending alcoholics to a brewery") led to reconsideration. Private acts by consenting adults of responsible age without duress are commonly no longer crimes. Some interpret this change as tacit public approval or indifference. Tolerance of homosexuals has greatly increased, within and outside the churches (and within the Christian ministry), largely through (misnamed) "gay" protestation, publicity, clubs, and by uninhibited discussion of the condition's causes.

Causes of Homosexuality. The attempt to understand causes is very recent, and important to a Christian judgment.

1. Since the individual's earliest sexual curiosity and experience is usually with his own body, then with others of the same sex, a puberty phase of homosexual interest is normal. Some adult homosexual interest may therefore merely be arrested development, due to extreme shyness, introversion, disfigurement, fear of rejection, only-child inability to socialize, or some physical deficiency. This arrested-development explanation makes many heterosexual men treat homosexuals with contempt, as "just kids."

2. Similarly, after normal heterosexual outturning to the other sex has taken place, an unhappy love affair, an illness, pathological fear of the opposite sex, or the like may lead to regression, a return to the furtive but safer relief of early puberty.

3. Environmental causes include artificial all-male society in one-sex school, army, or prison; a wrong relationship between, or with, parents, or with any oversexed adult; male resentment, or protest, against aggressive, predatory, overdominating women, or by women against similar men; unfortunate conflict in childhood and/or puberty with relatives, guardians, or teachers who repressed, scorned, terrified, or disgusted the growing mind.

4. Constitutional causes include genetic or hormone factors that condition the individual from birth to respond sexually to his or her own sex; there seems no doubt that in some cases the homosexual disposition can be inborn, prenatal in origin, wholly involuntary.

5. Vicious causes include unbridled sensuality, flagrant exhibitionism, and the mischievous desire to shock; exploitation by the depraved of the young, the timid, the mentally unstable, for carnal indulgence; duress, bribery, or blackmail.

Even so slight an analysis of causes has important consequences. A homosexual tendency arising from psychological, accidental, or environmental influences is said sometimes to yield, as do some other deep-seated disorders, to psychological treatment by enticing the underlying, subconscious cause into full consciousness and self-understanding. Constitutionally homosexual disposition, on the other hand, is probably incurable.

Further, an involuntary predisposition, traceable to psychological distortion, infantile terrors, accidental situations, or congenital factors, whether or not complicated by later unhappy experiences, is obviously not a fitting target for moral condemnation or contempt, but for sympathy. In Karl Barth's phrase, much homosexual inclination is "a moral malady"; it is no more to be blamed than left-handedness or color blindness. To borrow convenient terms of distinction, it is the recognition of constitutional homosexuality, in men and women, that has moderated Christian judgments in recent years, even when homosexual practice (homosexuality) remains condemned.

Homosexuality

A Christian View. This discrimination between condition and conduct is essential to a fair Christian reaction. Homosexual acts continue to arouse disgust. Though ignorance, and fear for the vulnerable, mingle with it, moral repulsion is sometimes a healthy reaction—as that toward wanton cruelty. Aquinas first articulated the age-old intuition reflected in Leviticus, in Deuteronomy (where homosexuality is linked with bestiality as perversion), and in Paul that homosexual activity is essentially unnatural, a perversion of the natural order linking sex with procreation, and so defiance of divine natural law. Society still disapproves, and discovery of homosexual situations involving those we have loved, trusted, and admired does affect our judgment of their character, trustworthiness, and quality. Secrecy and deceit are therefore still necessary. Known homosexual behavior alienates from “normal” society, making relationships more difficult to establish, thus leading to frustration and despair. Though the Sodom argument be abandoned, Scripture reprobates such practices, while Christian love must condemn the use for sensual purposes of another’s body, mind, and emotions if, as seems inevitable in unnatural relations, that degrades and undervalues the partner. Finally, in the constant conflict between flesh and spirit in Christian life, deliberate cultivation of homosexual sensuality can have no defensible place. For all these reasons, homosexual activity is wrong.

But the homosexual condition, until indulged, is innocent and should be cleared of the guilt feeling that may drive into deeper introversion. Like all congenital deviations from the normal, established homosexuality has to be accepted and lived with. The resulting problem is acute, but no more so than for heterosexuals, the widower/widow, the impotent, the single who long to marry and cannot or (through inherited insanity) should not. For all such, prostitution or promiscuity may offer constant temptation, but one to be resisted by the help of God. For neither heterosexual nor homosexual is the situation culpable; but actions to which the situation may incline them remain sinful, as unnatural, degrading, contrary to Christian concern for total welfare of others, inimical to religious devotion and spiritual progress, and no solution to their problem.

But to say this is to acknowledge that the existence and acuteness of the problem challenge Christian compassion and ministry, and call for ever improving sex education in a Christian context. A mature society will recognize prevalent homosexual activity not as “liberation” but as a symptom of moral malaise; an alert church will not ostracize but befriend those whose constitution and circumstances make Christian living harder for them than for most. R. E. O. WHITE

Bibliography. A. Comiskey, Freeing the Homosexual; Pursuing Sexual Wholeness; J. Drakeford, Christian’s View of Homosexuality; E. Hurst and R. Kinney, Homosexuality: Laying an Axe to the Roots; C. Keysor, What You Should Know about Homosexuality; H. Kimball-Jones, Toward a Christian Understanding of the Homosexual; R. Lovelace, Homosexuality and the Church; R. Moss, Christians and Homosexuality; L. Payne, Healing of the Homosexual; L. Smedes, Sex for Christians; G. Van DenAargweg, Homosexuality and Hope; J. White, Eros Defiled.

Honest to God Debate. See ROBINSON, JOHN ARTHUR THOMAS.

Hooker, Richard (1554–1600). A major Anglican theologian. Hooker was born near Exeter and educated at Oxford, after which he became a leading preacher in London. He was a noted opponent of the Puritans, who maintained that the established Church of England had failed to carry through a fully scriptural reformation. Hooker answered the Puritan critics of Anglicanism in his epoch-making Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity in eight books (only five were published in his lifetime). Whitgift, archbishop of Canterbury, had encouraged this project, and Queen Elizabeth I praised its completion. In order to defend the Anglican establishment Hooker circumvented both the Puritan appeal to Scripture and the Catholic appeal to church tradition by going behind both to the primary source of authority: natural law, which is implanted in people’s minds by God and comes to full expression in the state. The voice of the people is the voice of God, but is articulated through the civil magistrate. While Hooker held that Scripture contained what is necessary for salvation, still the law of nature was primary. As times change, specific laws (including Scripture) can be changed, though always in accordance with fundamental natural law. Thus the church cannot be held subject to the letter of Scripture or of tradition; it is free to adjust itself to its own historical context. In practice, Hooker’s position tended to uphold Erastianism (state control over the church) and royal absolutism, though his idea that government must ultimately rest on popular consent would later influence Locke and Burke in a libertarian direction. Hooker’s Christology was, from the Calvinist perspective, somewhat subordinationist. He had little to say on the atonement. However, his Laws would remain the classical defense of the Anglican establishment, a monument of noble English prose, and an exemplar of massive scholarship. D. F. KELLY

See also ANGLICAN COMMUNION; NATURAL LAW.

Bibliography. I. Walton, Works of Richard Hooker; W. S. Hill, ed., Studies in Richard Hooker; J. S. Marshall, Hooker and the Anglican Tradition; P. Munz, Place of Hooker in the History of Thought; C. J. Sisson, Judicious Marriage of Mr. Hooker and the Birth of "The Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity."

Hope. Elpis (Hebrew bāṭah) had in Greek and Roman times a neutral meaning as expectation of good or evil. Some, like Thucydides, treat it cynically; others, like Menander, extol it; Sanskrit poets class it among evils. Paul characterizes the Gentile world as elpida mē echontes (Eph. 2:12). For OT writers (except Ecclesiastes?) God is "the Hope of Israel" (Jer. 14:8). They trust in him (17:7), wait passively upon him (Ps. 42:5), or actively anticipate his blessing (62:5). Some Israelites cherished materialistic hopes for a messianic kingdom; but the Anglican Article 7 denies that the old fathers looked only for transitory promises, since such as Daniel anticipated the resurrection (Dan. 12:2).

Christ himself is described as the Christian hope (1 Tim. 1:1), and by his resurrection the specifically Christian virtue of hope is bestowed on the regenerate, who abound in hope through the Spirit (Rom. 15:13). (1) This hope relates to salvation and is an essential grace, like faith and love (1 Cor. 13:13); but where faith refers to past and present, hope includes the future (Rom. 8:24–25). (2) Its object is the ultimate blessedness of God's kingdom (Acts 2:26; Titus 1:2). (3) It produces the moral fruits of joyful confidence in God (Rom. 8:28), unashamed patience in tribulation (Rom. 5:3), and perseverance in prayer. (4) It anticipates an actual righteousness (Gal. 5:5) and is thus good (2 Thess. 2:16), blessed (Titus 2:13), and glorious (Col. 1:27). (5) It stabilizes the soul like an anchor by linking it to God's steadfastness (Heb. 3:6; 6:18–19). (6) It was generated in the OT fathers by God's promise first given to Abraham (Rom. 4:18), then embraced by Israel (Acts 26:6–7), and proclaimed by Paul as the hope of the gospel.

The one in whom hope is placed is sometimes called elpis, e.g., Jesus in 1 Timothy 1:1; the Thessalonians in 1 Thessalonians 2:19; or God in Jeremiah 17:7. Similarly the thing hoped for is elpis (Col. 1:5; 1 John 3:3), i.e., hope stored up in the heavens, expectation focused on the parousia and voiced in the cry Maranatha.

Elpis is a collective hope in the body of Christ. The Thessalonians are exhorted to hope for reunion with their deceased brethren (1 Thess. 4:13–18), and ministers hope for their converts (2 Cor. 1:7), desiring to present them perfect (Col. 1:28). Christ as the chief Shepherd expresses the hope that his own will together behold his glory (John 17:24), and this consummation is guaranteed by the earnest of the Spirit within Christian hearts and the church (Rom. 8:16–17).

D. H. TONGUE

See also HOPE, THEOLOGY OF; MOLTMANN, JÜRGEN; PANNENBERG, WOLFHART.

Bibliography. J. C. Becker, Suffering and Hope: The Biblical Vision and the Human Predicament; E. Brunner, Eternal Hope; R. Bultmann and K. N. Rengstorf, TDNT 2:517–29; E. H. Cousins, ed., Hope and the Future of Man; K. Hahnhart, "Paul's Hope in the Face of Death," JBL 88:445–57; E. Hoffmann, NIDNTT 2:238–46; P. S. Minear, Christian Hope and the Second Coming; J. Moltmann, Theology of Hope; J. Pieper, On Hope.

Hope, Theology of. In the late 1960s a new approach to theology emerged. Its early leaders were Germans who attempted to do theology and understand the mission of the church from a shift in interpretative perspective. This new approach is a resurrection-centered theology, in the awareness that Christ's resurrection is the beginning and promise of that which is yet to come. The Christian is to be seen as a "hoper," who is impatient with evil and death in this present age. The church is seen as a disquieting entity, confronting society with all its human securities, empires, and contrived absolutes. The church awaits a coming city and, therefore, exposes all the cities made with hands. This form of theology exists in dialogue with other visions of the future, especially Marxism, and it stands against the individualism of liberal pietist and existential theologies. In some ways it is orthodox, and yet politically it can be quite radical. Third World churches have been deeply influenced by the theology of hope.

Undoubtedly a central figure of this new theology is Jürgen Moltmann. The most influential work by Moltmann is his Theology of Hope, published in English in 1967. This book is merely part of a wealth of material produced by Moltmann. It is a work of sustained spiritual force and systematic power, written when Western culture was in great ferment. Theology of Hope speaks of an understanding of God as being ahead of us and the one who will make all things new. He is known now in his promises. It speaks to a world vividly aware of the "not yet" dimensions of human and social existence, and of the fact that hope at its human level is of the stuff of meaningful existence. Within this sort of situation, sustained by a renewed confidence in the eschatological or apocalyptic vision of Scripture, and reacting to the individualistic exaggerations of theological existentialism (e.g., Bultmann), Moltmann has sought to rethink theology.

Eschatology is not to be seen as the last chapter in a theology textbook but the perspective from which all else is to be understood and given its proper meaning. For Moltmann eschatology is the key or central concept from which everything else in Christian thought is set.

Moltmann sees the entire story of Israel as a unique historic pilgrimage as Israel is confronted by the God of promise. Israel's entire identity is in light of the promises of God. In Jesus Christ the future kingdom is present—but as future kingdom. His resurrection is the firstfruits of the resurrection and can have meaning only within that universal horizon of meaning. Christian life and salvation are firstfruits, living in the promise of the future of God in Christ.

The church is to be seen as the people of hope, experiencing hope in the God who is present in his promises. The coming kingdom gives the church a much broader vision of reality than a “merely” private vision of personal salvation. The church is to contest all the barriers that have been constructed by man for security; it challenges all structures that absolutize themselves, and all barriers erected between peoples in the name of the reality that is to come in Jesus Christ. The coming kingdom creates confronting and transforming vision for the mission of the people of God.

Although Moltmann is perhaps most conspicuous, he is not the only theologian in this grouping. Wolfhart Pannenberg is another who has become quite well known in the United States since the late 60s. His editorship of a programmatic work, Revelation as History (1968), and his Jesus—God and Man (1968) have already given him a significant place on the theological map. In Revelation as History, Pannenberg has produced a key essay containing “Dogmatic Theses on the Doctrine of Revelation.” In this work we find an understanding of all reality in terms of the eschaton, the Christ event as the beginning, proleptically, of that future, and of the concept of God as the God of the future. Apocalyptic is the key theological category, for only at the end will God be seen as God, and only in the light of this end is the resurrection of Jesus Christ seen in its proper universal context. Pannenberg's massive work on Christology is a further attempt to rethink this crucial doctrine “from the end.” Jesus Christ is defended as very God and very man, and the resurrection is defended as an event in history and given meaning by placing it within an apocalyptic conceptual horizon. Here, indeed, is a new and promising attempt to affirm the church's witness to Christ as God and man.

From a much more political emphasis comes the work of Catholic theologian Johannes B. Metz. In his Theology of the World (1968) we have a serious attempt to rethink the mission of the church in light of the future orientation of biblical faith. Lutheran theologian Carl Braaten is perhaps the leading American advocate of this sort of theology and its meaning for theology and church. His programmatic work is Future of God (1969).

It is, of course, true that since the publication of Albert Schweitzer's Quest of the Historical Jesus at the turn of the century, the church has been vividly aware of eschatology. But what was to be done with it? Was it merely a first century conceptual “husk” (Harnack)? Was it the vivid mythological language of existential ultimacy (Bultmann)? Was it merely a mistake replaced by the church (Loisy)? No, say the theologians of hope. They have studied the biblical witness long and hard. They have listened seriously to the philosophical climate of their time, especially sharpening their historical awareness through the left wing of the Hegelian tradition (Feuerbach, Marx, and Bloch). They contend that the time has come to rethink theology in light of the telos.

Theological reflection can take several styles. One approach is to take one doctrine as central and think from it to the rest of one's theological agenda. The central doctrine becomes the hub and other doctrines are the spokes of a conceptual wagon wheel. Luther did this with great power with the doctrine of justification; Barth, likewise, with the incarnation of the Son. Theologians of hope have made eschaton their conceptual center. Their first move is to use this center to affirm the meaning and significance of Jesus Christ. The eschaton is not an embarrassment; rather, it gives Christianity both personal and universal significance in a world that thinks, plans, and dreams in terms of future fears, hopes, and schemes. Further, this form of doing theology provides a way of seeing the mission of the church in terms of the larger issues of man in community and the question of revolution. The promise of this effort remains to be fully seen. Surely from their own perspective no theological model can be absolute.

On the critical side, questions certainly arise. It seems that with all the focus on the end, a simple question arises about the beginning. How do the creation and fall fit in? Would it be as easy to conceptualize a sort of dualism with God finally “winning” in the end? Surely this is not contemplated—but what is? Further, Moltmann seems to have much difficulty incorporating any thought of a future judgment as condemnation. But if the Christ-event is the “presence of all future” and if it is the clue to the destiny of all, then is the church in its witness and mission anything more than the harbinger of the truth of all men? Is there no real discussion to be made? Is there no condemnation in the future? Resurrection in the Bible is unto either life or condemnation. Finally, is this theology no more than a sign of the times? Because our materialism and narcissism have blinded us to God as a living presence, have we now conjured a theology to somehow account for this by putting him into the future? Has virtue (hope) become the child of tragic necessity? Criticisms such as these, however necessary, need not keep us from exploring the possibilities of thinking “from the telos.”

S. M. SMITH

See also METZ, JOHANNES BAPTIST; MOLTMANN, JÜRGEN; PANNENBERG, WOLFHART.

Bibliography. W. Capps, Time Invades the Cathedral; F. Herzog, ed., Future of Hope; M. E. Marty and D. G. Peerman, eds., New Theology No. 5; J. Macquarrie, Thinking about God; J. M. Robinson and J. B. Cobb Jr., eds., Theology As History; D. P. Scaer, “Theology of Hope,” in Tensions in Contemporary Theology, S. Gundry and A. F. Johnson, eds.

Hosts, Lord of. See GOD, NAMES OF.

Household Salvation. Both the OT and NT demonstrate a family solidarity that is alien to Western individualistic thought. The Abrahamic, Mosaic, and Davidic covenants involved the household in the covenant blessings. The OT formula “he and his house” referred to parents and their children of all ages. Thus, wagons were sent by Pharaoh to bring to Egypt those members of the households of Joseph’s brothers who could not walk (i.e., old people and children, Gen. 45:18–19). When Saul destroyed Ahimelech’s household (1 Sam. 22:16–19), not even infants were spared. The household includes infants, as is seen in Genesis 17, where every male “in Abraham’s house” was circumcised (including a baby eight days old). Deuteronomy 6 shows the importance of teaching children the revealed way of blessing, while Exodus 12 includes children in the Passover meal.

The NT also involves the household in salvation. Acts 11:14 says: “You and all your household will be saved.” In Acts 2:38–39 Peter states: “The promise is for you and your children.” Household baptisms show that the whole family was involved in salvation (Acts 16:15, 33; 18:8; 1 Cor. 1:16). In 1 Corinthians 7:12–16 Paul counsels believers to remain married to unbelievers: “For the unbelieving husband has been sanctified through his wife, and the unbelieving wife has been sanctified through her believing husband. Otherwise your children would be unclean, but as it is, they are holy.” Hence in some sense one believing parent sanctifies an entire household. Whether household salvation implies infant baptism is a disputed question. Nevertheless, scholars who disagree on baptism still unite in attributing high significance to the household in the economy of salvation.

D. F. KELLY

Bibliography. J. Jeremias, Infant Baptism in the First Four Centuries; D. Kingdon, Children of Abraham: A Reformed Baptist View of Baptism, the Covenant, and Children.

House of God. See TABERNACLE, TEMPLE.

Hubmaier, Balthasar (ca. 1480–1528). South German Reformer and writer. Born in Friedberg near Augsburg, Hubmaier was sometimes known as Dr. Friedberger. He studied with the famous Johann Eck, Luther’s later opponent, at the University of Freiburg, and earned his B.A. degree, but later followed Eck to the University of Ingolstadt, where he received both the licentiate and the doctorate in theology. He was a priest in the Regensburg Cathedral, in Waldshut in Breisgau (twice in each), and in Schaffhausen. He engaged in both friendly discussion and bitter debates with Zwingli in Zurich, and ended up imprisoned there (1525–26). He escaped with his life only by recanting. Like Luther, he at first sympathized with the demands of the German peasants but later opposed their armed revolt.

Hubmaier wrote voluminously. In 1524 he issued his eighteen theses, as well as his famous booklet against the burning of heretics. In 1525 he accepted baptism from Wilhelm Reublin, a colleague of the Zurich founder of Anabaptism, Conrad Grebel. By this time he had broken with Catholicism, as revealed in his marriage with Elisabeth Hügeline. He wrote several books on baptism which were powerful defenses of the baptism of believers. His catechism for the instruction of catechumens appeared in 1526. The next year he issued treatises on church discipline, baptism, the Lord’s Supper, and free will. By 1527 he had broken with the Swiss, South German, and Austrian Anabaptists on the subject of nonresistance as set forth in his booklet on the sword; on that subject he stood closer to Luther.

Arrested in 1527, both Hubmaier and his wife were imprisoned in Vienna. He endured torture on the rack, which sufficiently broke his spirit so that he offered to “stand still” as to the practice of believer’s baptism. But he steadfastly refused to recant. Strangely enough, he was granted a formal disputation with his old friend John Faber, a staunch Catholic theologian. For a time he was imprisoned in Kreuzenstein in northern Austria, but was soon taken back to prison in Vienna, from which he was led forth to the stake on March 10, 1528. His wife was drowned several days later. Some people compared his death with that of Jan Hus in 1415.

J. C. WENGER

See also ANABAPTISTS.

Bibliography. T. Bergsten, Balthasar Hubmaier; H. C. Vedder, Balthasar Hubmaier.

Hügel, Friedrich von. See VON HÜGEL, FRIEDRICH.

Humanism. See SECULARISM, SECULAR HUMANISM.

Humanism, Christian

Humanism, Christian. The view that individuals and their culture have value in the Christian life. Justin Martyr appears to have been the first to offer a formulation of Christianity that included an acceptance of classical achievements. He stated in the Apology (1.46) that Christ the Word had put culture under his control. Such an approach, he believed, would restrain believers from leading vulgar lives while at the same time keeping them from attaching more importance to human culture than to the truths of the faith.

During the Middle Ages little attention was paid to humanism, but with the beginning of the Renaissance there was a revival of that perspective. Renaissance humanism was both an outlook and a method. It has been described as “man’s discovery of himself and the world.” The worth of earthly existence for its own sake was accepted, and the otherworldliness of medieval Christianity was disparaged. Humanists believed that the pursuit of secular life was not only proper but even meritorious. Closely allied to the new view of worldly life was a devotion to nature and its beauty as part of a broadened religious outlook. Yet Renaissance humanism must be viewed from another vantage point. Those involved in the movement were devoted to the studia humanitatis, or the liberal arts, including history, literary criticism, grammar, poetry, philology, and rhetoric. These subjects were taught from classical texts of the Greco-Roman period and were intended to help students understand and deal with other people. In addition, the humanists valued ancient artifacts and manuscripts and tried to revive classical lifestyles.

Many Christians, including Savonarola and Zwingli, reacted against the more secular approach of humanism; but others such as John Colet, Thomas More, and Erasmus felt that great benefits would come from the revival of classicism and the development of historical criticism. It has been pointed out that even John Calvin reveals the influence of humanism. The new Renaissance philological tools were helpful in studying the Bible, and the ancient view of man held the promise for better government and greater social justice. In the minds of many sixteenth century scholars a wedding of the ethical and social concern of the Renaissance with the introspective force of Christianity held the possibility for church renewal. Christian humanist teaching was kept alive by many Anglicans, by the moderates in the Church of Scotland, by certain German pietists, and through the philosophy of Kant. It continues in the twentieth century among such writers as Jacques Maritain and Hans Küng.

Those who believe that the Christian revelation has a humanistic emphasis point to the fact that man was made in the image of God, that Jesus Christ became man through the incarnation, and that the worth of the individual is a consistent theme in the teaching of Jesus. Indeed, when asked to give a summary of the life that pleases God, Christ advised his listeners to “love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your mind” and to “love your neighbor as yourself” (Matt. 22:37, 39).

Christian humanists acknowledge the contributions of other forms of humanism, such as the classical variety that discovered the value of human liberty, and Marxism, which taught that man has been estranged from the good life because he is dispossessed of property and subordinated to material and economic forces. However, they caution that these other forms can degenerate into excessive individualism or savage collectivism because they operate without God. The Christian humanist values culture but confesses that man is fully developed only as he comes into a right relationship with Christ. When this happens, a person can begin to experience growth in all areas of life as the new creation of revelation (2 Cor. 5:17; Gal. 6:15).

R. G. CLOUSE

See also ERASMUS, DESIDERIUS; KÜNG, HANS; MARITAIN, JACQUES.

Bibliography. W. Bouwsma, Interpretation of Renaissance Humanism; L. Bouyer, Christian Humanism; Q. Breen, John Calvin: A Study in French Humanism; J. W. Cooper, Theology of Freedom: The Legacy of Jacques Maritain and Reinhold Niebuhr; H. Küng, On Being a Christian; J. Maritain, True Humanism; J. I. Packer, Knowing Man; L. Spitz, Religious Renaissance of German Humanism; G. Toffanin, History of Humanism; C. Trinkaus, In Our Image and Likeness.

Humanity of Christ. See CHRISTOLOGY.

Hume, David (1711–1776). Scottish philosopher and historian. Born and educated in Edinburgh, Hume maintained a love affair with philosophy that would absorb his life and make him one of the key British philosophers of the Enlightenment. During a three-year visit in France (1734–37) he wrote Treatise of Human Nature, which was published in three volumes in 1739–40 after his return to London. Although he expected it to be quite popular, to Hume’s chagrin its abstract nature and difficult language failed to interest the public. Immersing himself in more study, mainly in economic and political theory, he published in 1741 the first volume of his Essays, Moral and Political, which, in contrast, was exceptionally well received. Nevertheless, he was unable to obtain a university professorship and, after a decade of application, received only the post of librarian at the Advocates’ Library. Hume attained his greatest success as a man of letters during this period of excellent research facilities, publishing Natural History of Religion in 1757 and completing Dialogues concerning Natural Re- ligion which, upon the advice of friends, he withheld from publication until after his death.

Both deism and orthodox Christianity were attacked in Hume's literary works. Hume maintained that all of one's knowledge is the product of experience. While man can know the relation between ideas with certainty, their actual reality cannot be established beyond an appearance of probability. Thus, concepts of cause and effect do not come from logic, but rather from man's habit of association and man's custom. In Dialogues Hume declared that the argument of natural theology for the infinite cannot be inferred from the finite and that the existence of God cannot be proved by arguments from cause and effect. Hume did not say that God does not exist, but he did argue that the existence of God may not be established from reason or sense experience. In this fashion, he anticipated Kant by attacking ontological, cosmological, and teleological proofs of the existence of God.

In his "Essay on Miracles," which was a section of his Philosophical Essays concerning Human Understanding (1748), Hume argues that since all of one's knowledge comes from experience, and since this experience conveys the regularity of nature, the report of a miracle is much more likely to be a false report than an interruption in the uniform course of nature. Thus, a report of resurrection from the dead is in all probability a deceptive report. In Natural History of Religion, Hume suggests that all religious sentiments grow out of two human emotions, hope and fear—especially fear. He believed in studying religion scientifically, because there was nothing unique about religious experience. Therefore, it should be approached in the same secular fashion as any other form of human behavior. Hume contended that from polytheism man turned to monotheism through the observation of nature. Experiences of good and evil that conveyed to man benevolent and malevolent gods were transformed to belief in one powerful and arbitrary God through observation of strange occurrences and impressive natural phenomena. Hume found no connection between deity and morality, and he believed moral life was dominated by the passions of mankind.

Hume's philosophical works attained much more fame in France than in Britain, and he spent time with some of the most important French thinkers of the eighteenth century. He was a man of many talents. Between 1754 and 1762 he published History of England, which became a standard historical work and made him rich. He published numerous essays on a wide range of topics from demography to economics.

Although the narrow Enlightenment presuppositions of Hume's thought and the deism of his day are now gone, the popular effect of his works and type of reasoning continue, to the detriment of the Christian faith. The naturalism implicit in what he said has now become virtually the essence of modern contemporary thought, so much so that even Christian theologians such as Rudolf Bultmann disallow any miraculous element in their theology. The net result of this has been the secularization of the Western world.

D. A. RAUSCH

See also DEISM; EMPIRICISM; ENLIGHTENMENT, THE; KANT, IMMANUEL; MIRACLE; SECULARISM, SECULAR HUMANISM.

Bibliography. R. M. Burns, Great Debate about Miracles: From Joseph Glanvill to David Hume; O. Chadwick, Secularization of the European Mind in the Nineteenth Century; V. C. Chappell, ed., Hume: A Collection of Critical Essays; A. N. Flew, Hume's Philosophy of Belief; J. C. A. Gaskin, Hume's Philosophy of Religion; P. Gay, Enlightenment: The Rise of Modern Paganism; T. H. Green and T. H. Grose, eds., Philosophical Works of David Hume; R. Hall, Fifty Years of Hume Scholarship; E. Mossner, Life of David Hume; B. Stroud, Hume.

Humiliation of Jesus Christ. See STATES OF JESUS CHRIST.

Humility. Usually looked down upon in the world, being too often confused with "ever-so-humbleness," with willful self-disparagement, or with conventional descriptions of (other) sinners as "guilty, vile, and helpless worms." In Christian tradition humility ranked high. With Barnabas it was part of "inward fasting"; with Chrysostom, "foundation of our philosophy"; Augustine said, "If you ask me what is the first precept of the Christian religion I will answer, first, second and third, Humility."

À Kempis and Bernard held humility necessary to imitation of Christ. Luther condemned "instead of being humble, seeking to excel in humility." "Unless a man is always humble, distrustful of himself, always fears his own understanding . . . passions . . . will, he will be unable to stand for long without offense. Truth will pass him by." Humility is "aptness for grace," the essence of faith.

For Calvin, humility alone exalts God as sovereign; it is part of self-denial, with the abandonment of self-confidence that constitutes faith, and of self-will. (Calvin insisted on being buried in an unmarked grave.) Puritans cultivated humility as an antidote to self-righteousness, by constant self-examination. Jonathan Edwards thought humility an essential test of religious emotionalism.

Such appreciation of humility springs from the prophetic conviction that man, made of dust, totally dependent and sinful, had nothing to be proud of except God's being mindful of him and visiting him (Ps. 8:4-5) with favor and redemption. God dwells with the humble (Isa. 57:15) and requires that man walk humbly with him (Mic. 6:8). Later legalism contradicted this with its doctrine of merit; Paul's reiterated repudiation of boasting illustrates where the Christian shoe pinched the Pharisee's foot.

Humility

So Jesus required, for receiving the kingdom or greatness within it, that one humble oneself as a child in "pure receptivity," the unself-conscious, unassuming readiness to accept favor, without considering desert, without injured pride, trusting the kindness of the giver. The example was set by Jesus' washing the disciples' feet as the Servant who humbled himself—"emptied himself" (Phil. 2:7-8). So, whoever would be first must be servant of all (Mark 10:43).

Thus, from humility toward God followed humility toward others ("in humility consider others better than yourselves," Phil. 2:3, the classic passage) and also toward oneself ("Do not think of yourself more highly than you ought," Rom. 12:3). For the Christian knows he possesses nothing he has not received, is nothing but for the grace of God, and, apart from Christ, can do nothing. He remembers that God opposes the proud, giving grace to the humble; never presumes to repay God's goodness but counts himself an unworthy servant; and recognizes that the highest goodness is always unconscious (Matt. 25:37). He never forgets he has been loved, saved, and made a son of God.

R. E. O. WHITE

See also CARDINAL VIRTUES, SEVEN.

Bibliography. C. A. Baumbich, How to Eat Humble Pie and Not Get Indigestion; A. Murray, Humility: The Beauty of Holiness.

Hus, Jan (ca. 1372–1415). Early Czech reformer. Hus (also Huss) was born in the village of Husinec in southern Bohemia. He studied at the university in Prague, and in 1398 joined the arts faculty as a lecturer. He also took priestly vows. During these years he underwent a conversion, although the details are unclear. His choice of a priestly vocation had been largely motivated by a desire for prestige, financial security, and the camaraderie of academic society. As a result of his conversion, Hus adopted a simpler lifestyle and manifested more interest in spiritual growth.

Hus was appointed rector and preacher in Prague's Bethlehem chapel, the center of the Czech reform movement, in 1402. During these years many of John Wycliffe's ideas influenced Hus, especially those dealing with the spirituality of the church. However, Hus was not solely a product of Wycliffe's theology, because earlier Czech theologians, such as Matthew of Janov, shaped his theological development as well.

By 1407 Hus was clearly identified with the reformists. His evangelical wing threatened not only the theological balance in Bohemia but also the ethnic status quo by challenging the power that Germans held in the Roman Catholic Church in Bohemia.

In 1409 Pope Alexander V empowered the archbishop of Prague to root out heresy in his diocese. When the archbishop asked Hus to stop preaching, Hus refused, and was excommunicated in 1410. When Hus continued to attack the papal politics of the Great Schism and the sale of indulgences, rioting erupted in Prague against the church hierarchy. With no support from the king, and the pope threatening to place Prague under interdict, Hus left the city in 1412 to live in southern Bohemia.

In 1414, with a promise of safe conduct, Hus traveled to the Council of Constance, where he was imprisoned and placed on trial for heresy. He refused to admit that the charges against him were true unless proven so by Scripture. Nevertheless, he was judged guilty and burned at the stake on July 6, 1415.

Hus's sermons attacked clerical abuses, especially the immorality and high living of the clergy. His theology was a mixture of evangelical and traditional Roman Catholic doctrines. Hus preached against the veneration of the pope by stressing a strong Christocentric faith that emphasized an individual's responsibility before God. He believed only Christ could forgive sins and expected a coming day of judgment. However, he still accepted the Roman Catholic doctrine of purgatory. Hus believed that both the wine and the bread should be administered in the Lord's Supper and held a view of the elements similar to the doctrine of consubstantiation. He emphasized preaching the Word of God to bring about moral and spiritual change in listeners' lives. To help them read the Scriptures, he also revised a Czech translation of the Bible.

As a theologian, Hus helped restore a biblical vision of the church, one that focused on Christ's teachings and example of purity. Moreover, his stress on preaching and the universal priesthood of believers became hallmarks of the later Protestant Reformation. He also encouraged congregational hymn singing, writing many songs himself. For Czechs, Hus was not only a spiritual leader but also a focal point of national inspiration in the centuries following his death.

P. KUBRICHT

See also BOHEMIAN BRETHREN.

Bibliography. J. Hus, Church, D. S. Schaff, trans.; M. Spinka, John Hus, A Biography; John Hus and the Czech Reform; John Hus' Concept of the Church; M. Spinka, ed., John Hus at the Council of Constance; Letters of John Hus; J. K. Zeman, Hussite Movement and the Reformation in Bohemia, Moravia and Slovakia (1350–1650): A Bibliographical Study Guide.

Hutchinson, Anne (1591–1643). One of the most creative of New England's early religious thinkers, whose theology brought her into serious conflict with Puritan authorities. She came to Massachusetts in 1634 to remain under the preaching of her English pastor, John Cotton, who had migrated to Boston the year before. Hutchinson was especially taken by Cotton's emphasis on God's free grace. Once in New England, Hutchinson began a midweek meeting to discuss Cotton's sermon of the previous Sunday and to encourage lay piety. All went well until word began to spread that her views were tending toward antinomianism, the theological error that Christians do not need the law. In her meetings she suggested that a believer possesses the Holy Spirit and thus is not bound by the law. Further, mere obedience to external laws (for example, of Massachusetts) does not mean that one is truly a Christian.

Anne Hutchinson relied on the preaching of John Cotton and on her own wide knowledge of the Bible to support these views. They were in fact a legitimate, if unsettling, extension of Puritan concepts of salvation. The difficulty came in the potential damage of these opinions to the Puritan way in New England. If every believer were entirely under grace, how could the godly act together to build the society which Puritans longed for so dearly? The Massachusetts leaders soon demanded an explanation. Through many days of interrogation, Hutchinson held her own against the colony's most powerful ministers and magistrates by careful biblical argument and penetrating logic. Just when it seemed as if she had finally silenced her opponents, however, she made a fatal mistake. She claimed that the Holy Spirit communicated directly to her, apart from Scripture, and this the leaders could not tolerate. As a result, she and her followers were banished from the colony in 1638. She moved first to Rhode Island, then to Long Island, and finally to inland New York. Here she and most of her family were killed by Indians. One of her descendants, Thomas Hutchinson, eventually became the last colonial governor of Massachusetts, the very colony which had long before banished his ancestor, colonial America's ablest, if also most controversial, woman theologian. M. A. NOLL

Bibliography. E. Battis, Saints and Sectaries: Anne Hutchinson and the Antinomian Controversy in the Massachusetts Bay Colony; D. D. Hall, ed., Antinomian Controversy, 1636–1638: A Documentary History.

Hyperdulia. In Roman Catholic theology, hyperdulia is defined as that form of veneration offered to the Blessed Virgin Mary in her capacity as the Mother of God. Hyperdulia as a veneration may be seen as a form of adoration if one remembers that adoration ultimately is offered to the Trinity. The cult of dulia therefore differs from the cult of latria, which is adoration directly to God. In Lumen Gentium the Second Vatican Council re-stated that "veneration" of Mary is part of the "devotion" to Mary which proceeds from true faith. T. J. GERMAN See also DULIA; LATRIA.

Bibliography. L. Bouyer, Rite and Man: Natural Sacredness and Christian Liturgy; B. Häring, Law of Christ.

Hypostasis. The word is a transliteration of the Greek hypostasis, "substance," "nature," "essence" (from hyphistasthai, "stand under," "subsist," which is from hypo, "under," and histanai "cause to stand"), and denotes a real personal subsistence or person. In philosophy it signifies the underlying or essential part of anything, as distinguished from attributes that may vary. It developed theologically as the term to describe any one of the three real and distinct subsistences in the one undivided substance or essence of God, and especially the one unified personality of Christ the Son in his two natures, human and divine. The classic Chalcedonian definition of God, one essence in three hypostases (mia ousia, treis hypostaseis), was unfortunately translated into Latin as "one substance [Gr. hypostasis] in three persons" (una substantia, tres personae). This not only confused threefold substance with the one ousia (Lat. essentia, "essence"), but the Latin word persona ("face" or "mask") sounded like Sabellian modalistic monarchianism to the Greeks. The Council of Alexandria (362) tried unsuccessfully to resolve the conflict by defining hypostasis as synonymous with the very different word persona. Although much confusion still reigns, orthodoxy has generally held to the one substance of God, known in the three persons of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. W. E. WARD

See also CHALCEDON, COUNCIL OF; GOD, DOCTRINE OF; SUBSTANCE.

Bibliography. L. Hodgson, Doctrine of the Trinity; J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines; G. L. Prestige, God in Patristic Thought; C. C. Richardson, Doctrine of the Trinity; H. P. Van Dusen, Spirit, Son, and Father; C. Welch, In This Name: The Doctrine of the Trinity in Contemporary Theology.

Hypostatic Union. The doctrine of the hypostatic union, first set forth officially in the definition of faith produced by the Council of Chalcedon (451), concerns the union of the two natures (dyo physes) of deity and humanity in the one hypostasis or person of Jesus Christ. It can be stated as follows: In the incarnation of the Son of God, a human nature was inseparably united forever with the divine nature in the one person of Jesus Christ, yet with the two natures remaining distinct, whole, and unchanged, without mixture or confusion, so that the one person, Jesus Christ, is truly God and truly man.

Hypostatic Union

Several important christological issues are highlighted by this doctrine: (1) the unipersonality of the Savior. Nestorianism, which divided the natures as persons, is ruled out. There is only one who is at the same time God and man. Obviously this doctrine excludes any separation between the Christ of faith and the Jesus of history. (2) The continuity of the Savior's personality. Jesus Christ is the same person who was the pre-existent Logos, the Son of God (John 1:1, 14; 8:58). Thus, every form of adoptionism is ruled out, since the hypostatic union excludes the independent personal subsistence of the human nature. (3) The complexity of the Savior's personality. While there is continuity of identity, there is this difference. It is no longer the divine nature alone which is expressed in his person. The human nature, not an impersonal appendage, has its personal subsistence in the Logos. The incarnate Christ is theanthrōpos, the God-man. (4) The distinction of the natures. Eutychianism, which confused the natures into a tertium quid, is excluded, along with every form of monophysitism. (5) The perfection of the natures. Every Christology that diminishes either the deity or the humanity of Jesus Christ, from docetism to Socinianism, from Arianism to Apollinarianism, would be considered inadequate from the standpoint of this doctrine. Jesus Christ is truly, perfectly, and wholly God, and he is truly, perfectly, and wholly man.

Admittedly, this doctrine leaves many metaphysical questions unanswered. However, it should be noted that this doctrine was not produced as the fruit of philosophic speculation on the possible singularly cosubsistence of the finite and the infinite. Rather it was offered as a precise description of the incarnation recorded in Scripture, drawn from the greatest extent of biblical data and making use of whatever language that might help in that descriptive task (such as the introduction of a technical distinction between physis and hypostasis). The considered biblical data include all the major passages on the incarnation (such as John 1:1-14; Rom. 1:2-5; 9:5; Phil. 2:6-11; 1 Tim. 3:16; Heb. 2:14; 1 John 1:1-3), as well as the Gospel narratives and epistolary references where the attributes of both natures are manifested in one person, the communicatio idiomatum.
C. BLAISING

See also CHALCEDON, COUNCIL OF; CHRISTOLOGY; COMMUNICATION OF ATTRIBUTES, COMMUNICATIO IDIOMATUM; MONOPHYSITISM; PERICHORESIS.

Bibliography. K. Barth, Church Dogmatics; L. Berkhof, Systematic Theology; G. C. Berkouwer, Person of Christ; A. Grillmeier, Christ in Christian Tradition; C. Hodge, Systematic Theology; J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines; R. Norris Jr., ed., Christological Controversy; R. V. Sellers, Council of Chalcedon.

Ii

“I Am” Sayings. A diversity of “I am . . .” formulae in the OT by which Yahweh repeatedly discloses himself. He reveals himself as the God of the patriarchs (Gen. 15:7; 17:1; 28:13; etc.), or as “the LORD [Yahweh] your God, who brought you out of Egypt” (e.g., Exod. 20:2 at the beginning of the Decalogue), or more simply in the words “I am the LORD” (e.g., Ezek. 33:29; 36:36). The disclosure of Exodus 3:14, often rendered “I am who I am” or “I am the existing one,” may well be an instance of paronomasia or word play; but more importantly, like the repeated “I am he” or “I myself am he” utterances (Deut. 32:39; Isa. 41:4; 43:10, 13, 25; 45:18; 46:4; 48:12; 51:12; 52:6), Yahweh presents himself in antithesis to the finite gods of the prevalent polytheism. In most instances the context precludes a rendering “I am this or that,” but presupposes something like “I am the Absolute One.” Especially in Isaiah 40–66, the verses surrounding each example show that the meaning of God as the Absolute works out in an array of attributes: he is sovereign, uncreated, unimaginable, personal, master of history, holy, and the universal monarch whose purposes cannot ultimately be thwarted. Moreover, the formula here is self-revelatory: Yahweh is not addressed in this way, but uses these expressions of himself, thereby demonstrating that he graciously chooses to reveal himself to men.

In the NT, many “I am” sayings are supplied with a subjective completion (e.g., “I am the light of the world,” John 8:12) and therefore do not qualify as “I am” utterances in the absolute sense. More difficult are the few instances outside John’s Gospel where the text offers a simple egō eimi (lit. “I am”) but where the context makes clear that the meaning is “It is I” or “I am he”—with the antecedent of the “I” or “he” apparent in the surrounding verses. These are probably at best ambiguous self-disclosures of deity, hints for those familiar with the OT, and many of Jesus’ prepassion self-revelations adopt such a stance of planned ambiguity. For instance, when Jesus walks to his frightened disciples across the surface of the water, he calms their fears by saying, egō eimi. The context demands the conclusion that Jesus is identifying himself (“It is I”), showing that what they perceive is not a ghostly apparition (Mark 6:50). Yet not every “I” could be found walking on water: it would be premature to discount all reference to OT theophany. Again, Jesus warns his disciples against those who will lead many astray by claiming “I am” (Mark 13:6; Luke 21:8); but the context demands this be interpreted as “I am the Christ”—as Matthew 24:5 makes explicit. Jesus uses identical language at his trial (Mark 14:61–62) and similar language after his resurrection (Luke 24:39), his words in each case bearing some ambiguity.

The Fourth Gospel raises new questions. Although many of Jesus’ “I am” utterances recorded by John are supplied with explicit predicates (“I am the true vine,” “I am the good shepherd,” “I am the bread of life,” “I am the resurrection and the life”), two are undeniably absolute in both form and content (8:58; 13:19) and constitute an explicit self-identification with Yahweh, who had already revealed himself to men in similar terms (see esp. Isa. 43:10–11). Jesus’ opponents recognize this claim to unity with Yahweh (John 8:58–59); in 13:19–20, Jesus himself proceeds to make it explicit. These two occurrences of the absolute “I am” suggest that in several other passages in John, where “I am” is formally absolute but a predicate might well be supplied from the context (e.g., 4:26; 6:20; 8:24, 28; 18:5, 6, 8), an intentional double meaning may be involved.

D. A. CARSON

See also CHRISTOLOGY.

Bibliography. B. J. Beitzel, “Exodus 3:14 and the Divine Name,” TJ 1:5–20; R. E. Brown, Gospel according to John 1:532–83; D. A. Carson, Christ the Lord; D. Daube, New Testament and Rabbinic Judaism; P. B. Horner, “I Am” of the Fourth Gospel; H.-G. Link, NIDNTT 2:278–83; W. Manson, Jesus and the Christian; E. Stauffer, TDNT 2:343–62.

Ibn Rushd. See AVERROES.

Icon

Icon. See IMAGES, VENERATION OF.

Idealism. Idealism is a theory about the nature of reality. Idealism is, in effect, “idea-ism.” It holds that ideas are all there is, or that ideas are the most fundamentally real entities, or that all that we can know are ideas. In some versions of idealism, reality is identified with the contents of Mind or minds.

Of the earliest idealists, Plato (427–327 B.C.) is the most noteworthy. His doctrine of the Forms concerns the relation between thought and reality. The objects of ordinary experience have the reality they have by means of their participation in the more fundamental reality of immaterial Forms or Ideas. For example, on one interpretation of Plato’s metaphysics, corresponding to any individual material object there is the Form or Idea of that object, of which the material object is at best only an inadequate imitation. Thus, what all horses have in common is their participation in the form of “horseness.” This horseness is what is ultimately real. The material world is in some sense ontologically dependent upon Ideas that exist in or make up a transcendent world. Other interpreters suggest that Plato adopted this sort of account only for abstract objects.

In any case, Plato’s theory does not imply that physical objects are immaterial, or that physical objects are somehow constituted by the mind. George Berkeley (1685–1753) did propose such a view about the ontology of physical objects. He reasoned that skepticism about physical objects is an unavoidable consequence of assuming that reality and experience are separable, and that reality is, at best, represented in experience. He sought to rebut skepticism by suggesting that physical objects are collections of sensible qualities, which are mental entities that he called “ideas.” These do not exist apart from the mental act of perception. Hence, esse est percipi; “to be is to be perceived.” Physical objects exist only as perceived (and minds exist only as perceivers). It is an important consequence of Berkeley’s argument that it is not even possible for physical objects to exist unperceived.

To account for the actual, as opposed to merely possible, existence of objects when unperceived by humans, Berkeley inferred that there is an omnivigilant Mind for whom all actual objects—whether or not they happen to be perceived by humans—are objects of perception. Berkeley was, of course, referring to God. His idealist theory was thus an attempt both to refute skepticism and to demonstrate the existence of God. At the same time, Berkeley’s association of idealism with theistic metaphysics precluded the threat of solipsism. All finite minds (e.g., human minds) exist as objects of perception within (or as objects thought of by) a single infinite Mind. Despite the counterintuitive character of Berkeley’s idealism, his Christian theological perspective was robustly theistic and remarkably orthodox.

It has sometimes been supposed that phenomenism, which was inspired in no small part by Berkeley’s approach to perception, is a variety of idealism. But this is a mistake. Berkeleian idealism restricts existence to objects of actual perception; some varieties of phenomenism, however, allow for the existence of pure possibilia. In rough approximation, phenomenism is Berkeleian idealism minus theistic metaphysics plus the idea that there are “permanent possibilities of sensation” (see J. S. Mill) which are not, as such, actually perceived by anyone, though they could be.

Phenomenism is also to be distinguished from a variety of idealism that was later developed by Immanuel Kant (1724–1804). Kantian, or “transcendental,” idealism denies that objects depend for their existence on sensory experience. Kant distinguished between a world of things as they are in themselves (the noumena) and a world of things as they appear to us (the phenomena). These two worlds are related in that the phenomenal world is a kind of representation of the noumenal world to the mind; but the representation is not realistic—it isn’t as if there can be a match between phenomenal representations and the noumena.

On the Kantian view, the relation of the mind to each world is complicated. The phenomena are in some sense the contents of experience as structured by the categories of the mind. The mind does have access to these contents, which are mere appearances, but it does not have access to noumena as such. In experience, the noumena are presented to the mind for structural organization. The result is a kind of empirical realism about appearances that is at the same time an idealism about their extra-mental noumenal correlatives. That is, the objects of experience are empirically real and transcendently ideal. They are empirically real in that they are items of the phenomenal world constructed by the mind. They are transcendently ideal in that one must theorize as if there is a noumenal realm of things-in-themselves that in some sense lie beyond and provide the input for constructing the phenomenal realm. Otherwise, reality would be identical to the transcendental, constructing ego, which Kant denied and the absolute idealists affirmed.

The development of “absolute idealism” in critical response to Kant was inaugurated by J. G. Fichte (1762–1814) (under the label “critical idealism”), and more systematically and influentially promoted by G. W. F. Hegel (1770–1831). Fichte, who was Kant’s pupil denied the realm of noumena altogether and maintained that reality is a product of thought in approximately the same way that the phenomenal world is a product of thought on Kant's view.

Hegel asserted the identity of reality with consciousness, by which he meant self-consciousness. This form of consciousness was further characterized as unconditioned and fittingly dubbed "the Absolute" or "Absolute Spirit." Consciousness thus conceived is creative, free, and self-determining. Philosophy in this vein was concerned with the study of the expression of unconditioned consciousness within the universe as a whole, which gives unity to the baffling panoply of seemingly unharmonious parts. Thought is latent within the whole framework of reality, and individual minds make this latent presence of thought concrete. Since these finite minds are themselves manifestations or loci of Spirit at large in the universe, their collective activity over time is regarded as the progressively developing self-consciousness of Absolute Spirit.

The three leading exponents of German idealism, Fichte, F. W. J. Schelling (1775–1854), and Hegel, were theology students before they were philosophers. Under the influence of their idealism, their theology was a kind of halfway house between theism and pantheism, with rather more pronounced tendencies in the direction of pantheism. For Hegel, Christian trinitarianism functioned as a model of the relation between mind and reality, but his version of Christianity was anything but orthodox.

The era of Hegelian idealism was kept alive in Britain and America by such influential thinkers as F. H. Bradley (1846–1924) and Josiah Royce (1855–1916). Indeed, Anglo-American philosophy was largely dominated by this and derivative forms of idealism well into the 20th century.

During the 19th century, idealism was formulated because of the insensitive response to human ideals that was then prevalent, and this accounts in part for the considerable influence of idealism on theological reflection during that period. Hegel and those idealists who came after him considered a wide range of human activity—including philosophy, the sciences, the arts and humanities, participation in social and political institutions—to be naturally connected with the main concern of the spirit, namely, self-understanding. The evolving nexus of understanding achieved by the collective activity of individual spirits was thought to constitute a larger-scale unfolding of the Absolute Spirit that enlivens the whole universe of things. For many, this speculative metaphysical thesis was lent greater plausibility by the emergence of evolutionary thought about the empirical world with the publication of Darwin's Origin of Species (1859).

As time went on, the perspective of absolute idealism was insistently mapped onto traditional Christianity, and vice versa. This is perhaps the least appreciated force leading to the dissolution of 19th century idealism. Both Christianity and Hegelianism would be transformed in the process of amalgamation, and whatever the fortunes of Christianity might later be, the shelf life of Hegelian idealism proved to be remarkably brief. The attempt to treat this idealism as the basic framework for a Christian philosophy contributed to the fragmentation of idealism and engendered problems for sustaining a credible conception of the authority of Christianity. The project of working out the relation between Christianity and Hegelian (or quasi-Hegelian) idealism resulted in a variety of conceptual experiments that drifted further and further apart and set the stage for one of the most vigorously anti-metaphysical movements of intellectual history—logical positivism.

Among derivative idealisms with strong theological overtones was a position known as "personal idealism" or "personalism." Beginning with A. S. Pringle-Pattison (1856–1931), this perspective sought to rescue individual conscious selves from the oblivion threatened by absolute idealism. One by-product of this personalist thrust was a turning away from the radical immanentism about God fostered by Hegelianism. Comparative aversion to radical immanentism is a distinguishing feature of the personal idealism of Hastings Rashdall (1858–1924), C. C. J. Webb (1865–1954), and John Oman (1860–1939). In the United States, personalism was most notably expounded by B. P. Bowne (1847–1910) and E. S. Brightman (1884–1953) at Boston University.

While logical positivism represented a rather vehement reaction to the perceived metaphysical recklessness of British and American idealism, milder but no less critical voices could be heard. Alternative perspectives included the pragmatism of American philosophers C. S. Peirce and William James, the process theism of A. N. Whitehead, the neo-Thomism of such figures as Jacques Maritain and E. L. Mascall, and the American schools of New Realism and Critical Realism. The systematic development of these perspectives each contributed to the demise of idealism.

More recently, idealism has recouped some of its lost momentum. Late 20th century exponents of idealism include John Foster and Howard Robinson, who have brought their more general idealist positions to bear especially upon problems in the philosophy of mind. Their idealist convictions, however, more nearly resemble the Berkeleyian perspective, and bear nothing of the stamp of Hegelian idealism.

R. D. GEIVETT

See also BERKELEY, GEORGE; HEGEL, GEORGE WILHELM FRIEDRICH; GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF; POSITIVISM; METAPHYSICS; PERSONALISM; PLATO, PLATONISM; REALISM.

Bibliography. D. M. Armstrong, ed., Berkeley's Philosophical Writings; R. Bubner, ed., German Idealist Phi-

Idealism

osophy; F. Copleston, History of Philosophy: Fichte to Hegel; A. C. Ewing, Idealism: A Critical Survey; J. A. Foster, Case for Idealism; J. S. Mill, Examination of Sir William Hamilton's Philosophy; J. Passmore, Hundred Years of Philosophy; H. M. Robinson, Matter and Sense; A. P. F. Sell, Philosophy of Religion, 1875–1980; T. L. S. Sprigge, Theories of Existence.

Identification with Christ. The theological doctrine of identification with Christ which derives from various Scriptures that regard Christians as being “in Christ.” In a general way Christ is identified with humanity as the second Adam, and identified with Israel as the predicted Son of David. In these cases the identity is a physical fact. In contrast to these relationships the theological concept of identification with Christ relates a Christian to the person and work of Christ by divine reckoning, by the human experience of faith, and by the spiritual union of the believer with Christ effected by the baptism of the Holy Spirit.

Identification with Christ is accomplished by the baptism of the Holy Spirit, an act of divine grace and power sometimes expressed as being baptized into (eis) the body of Christ, the church (1 Cor. 12:13), and sometimes described as being baptized into Christ (Gal. 3:27). This new relationship of being “in Christ” was first announced by the Lord to his disciples in the upper room in the statement, “You [pl.] are in me [en emoi], and I am in you” (John 14:20). The new relationship of the believer in Christ is defined as a new position, “in Christ,” resulting from a work of God. That it is more than merely a position created by divine reckoning is revealed by the companion revelation, “I in you.” The resultant doctrine is embraced in the word union, which is commonly taken as a synonym for identification.

Various figures are employed in Scripture to illustrate this union and identification. The vine and the branches is employed by Christ himself in John 15:1–6. Here the union is manifested by communion, spiritual life, and fruit as a result of the union of branch and vine. The branch is in the vine and the life of the vine is in the branch. Another figure is that of the head and the body (cf. Eph. 1:22–23; 4:12–16; 5:23–32). Here also there is organic union of the body and the head, depicting the living union of Christ and the church. Intrinsic to the figure is the thought that the identification of the body with the head does not imply equality but carries with it the obligation of recognizing the head as the one who directs the body.

Close to the figure of the head and the body is that of the marriage relation of Christ and the church presented in the same section as the figure of the head and the body in Ephesians 5:23–32. Here the relationship is compared to the identification of a wife with her husband stated in the declaration that they are “one flesh.”

Various expressions are used to signify this identification. Most frequent is the terminology “in Christ” (en Christō), but others also are used such as “in” or “into Christ” (eis Christon), and “in the Lord” (en kyriō). Though some distinction may be observed between the use of the prepositions en and eis (“in” and “into”), the resultant doctrine is much the same.

Important theological truths are related to the doctrine of identification in Scripture. The believer is identified with Christ in his death (Rom. 6:1–11); his burial (Rom. 6:4); his resurrection (Col. 3:1); his ascension (Eph. 2:6); his reign (2 Tim. 2:12); and his glory (Rom. 8:17). Identification with Christ has its limitations, however. Christ is identified with the human race in his incarnation, but only true believers are identified with Christ. The identification of a believer with Christ results in certain aspects of the person and work of Christ being attributed to the believer, but this does not extend to possession of the attributes of the Second Person, nor are the personal distinctions between Christ and the believer erased. Taken as a whole, however, identification with Christ is a most important doctrine and is essential to the entire program of grace. J. F. WALVOORD

See also MURRAY, ANDREW; MYSTICISM; UNIO MYSTICA; UNITIVE WAY, THE.

Bibliography. L. Berkhof, Systematic Theology; E. Best, One Body in Christ; L. S. Chafer, Systematic Theology; A. Deissmann, St. Paul; A. Schweitzer, Mysticism of Paul the Apostle; L. B. Smedes, Union with Christ; A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology; H. C. Thiessen, Lectures in Systematic Theology; J. F. Walvoord, Holy Spirit.

Idolatry. The worship of an idol or of a deity represented by an idol, usually as an image. Idolatry, as a form of religious practice, was common in both OT and NT times. Literary and archaeological evidence for the practice has survived from Mesopotamia, Syrio-Palestine, Egypt, and from the Roman Empire.

One of the most distinctive features of Hebrew religion during the OT period was the absence of idolatry. Its practice was prohibited among the Hebrews, and the archeological evidence indicates that the prohibition was observed for the most part.

There were two prevalent forms of idolatry in OT times, both banned by the Decalogue: (1) The first commandment prohibited the Israelites from worshipping any other god than the Lord (Exod. 20:3), thereby eliminating the false forms of idolatrous religion practiced in neighboring nations. (2) The second commandment forbade the worship of the God of Israel in the form of an image or idol (Exod. 20:4–6).

Of the two prohibitions, the latter was crucial to the integrity of Israel's theology. To worship God in the form of an idol would be to reduce God the Creator to the substance of creation (that which was represented in the idol), thereby undermining fundamentally the conception of the transcendent Creator God. The idol gave to devotees a sense of the physical proximity of a deity and perhaps also the conviction that the deity's power could be harnessed by human beings. The God of Israel was immanent, but that immanence could not be expressed in physical or tangible form; it remained the essence of faith and of experience.

Despite the prohibition of idolatry in Hebrew law, it clearly remained a fundamental form of temptation throughout Israel's history, whether in worshiping false gods through their idols or in reducing the worship of the one true God to idolatrous form. Hence, the denunciation of idolatry in its various forms is a recurrent theme in both the law and the prophets (Deut. 7:25–26; 29:16–17; Isa. 40:18–23).

In NT times idolatry was practiced in various forms throughout the Roman empire and was steadfastly resisted by the early Christian church. It was understood as a sign of human folly (Rom. 1:22–23), representing a perversion of true religion. More frequently, however, the NT writers used the concept of idolatry in a metaphorical sense, particularly with respect to covetousness (Eph. 5:5, Col. 3:5); covetousness is an "idol" by virtue of becoming the immediate focus of a person's desires and "worship," displacing the worship of God.

In the later history of Christianity, idolatry in the strict sense has continued to be opposed in the terms of the ancient biblical prohibitions. But the continuing danger has more commonly returned in the metaphorical sense delineated in the NT; it is the "worship" (i.e., the total dedication of a person) of that which is seen and tangible, the goals of covetousness, rather than the unseen spiritual being that is God. P. C. CRAIGIE

Bibliography. O. Barfield, Saving the Appearances: A Study of Idolatry; W. Brueggemann, Israel's Praise: Doxology against Idolatry and Ideology; P. C. Craigie, Book of Deuteronomy; R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel; M. Halberstal, Idolatry.

Ignatius of Antioch. See ANTIOCHINE THEOLOGY; APOSTOLIC FATHERS.

Ignatius of Loyola (1491–1556). The founder of the Society of Jesus (Jesuits). Ignatius was born into the Basque nobility in Guipúzcoa. Although destined early for a church career, he served as a courtier until 1521, when he was wounded in battle. During his convalescence his reading of the lives of Christ and the saints resulted in a religious conversion. He is frequently stereotyped as the soldier-saint, but his military career lasted only a few months, and the stereotype detracts from any real understanding of Loyola.

After his conversion he spent eleven months in prayer and fasting at Manresa in Catalonia. His religious experiences there became the basis and core of his Spiritual Exercises, published in 1548 after much revision. The Spiritual Exercises, a classic of Christian spirituality that has been published in five thousand editions in some thirty languages, is a manual designed to share Loyola's mystical experiences at a lower level with ordinary but sincere Christians and to help them reorder their lives to a single-minded service of God.

Loyola completed a pilgrimage to Jerusalem in 1523 and, returning to Europe, determined that he could serve his fellowman more effectively if he had an education. He therefore enrolled in a grammar school at Barcelona for two years before entering the University of Alcalá, where he attracted a few disciples. Opposition from the Inquisition forced him to transfer to the University of Salamanca. There he was imprisoned by the Inquisition; although acquitted, he was forbidden to speak on religious topics until he had completed theological studies. Thereupon, Loyola transferred to the University of Paris, where he studied from 1528 to 1535, and gathered around him companions, such as Francis Xavier and Diego Lainez, who were to be the founding fathers of the Society of Jesus. In 1534 Loyola and six companions vowed perpetual poverty and chastity and promised to work for souls in Palestine if that were possible. After a short visit to Spain he was reunited with his companions at Venice, but war between Venice and the Turks prevented their departure for Palestine. Instead, they preached in the north Italian cities and then placed themselves at the disposal of Pope Paul III. Loyola was ordained a priest in 1537. Gradually the companions realized that only the structure of a religious order would preserve and perpetuate their union and apostolic work. Paul III authorized the Society of Jesus in 1540. Loyola was elected the first superior general and was commissioned to draw up constitutions.

Loyola lived in Rome from 1537 until his death in 1556, writing the Jesuit Constitutions and supervising the rapid expansion of the new order. His correspondence (all but a handful of 6795 items relate to the Roman years) mirrors the first decades of Jesuit history. Meanwhile, his mystical experiences, which had abated during his years of study, returned with increased force. In his last years, Loyola was at once a mystic and a religious bureaucrat. He set up a halfway house for ex-prostitutes, a hospice for young girls, and charitable agencies for abandoned boys, Jewish converts, and impoverished noblemen. His autobiography, dictated to a subordinate, covers his life up to 1537.

Ignatius of Loyola

J. P. DONNELLY

See also SOCIETY OF JESUS.

Bibliography. J. Brodrick, St. Ignatius: The Pilgrim Years, 1491–1538; P. Caraman, Ignatius Loyola: A Biography of the Founder of the Jesuits; C. de Dalmases, Ignatius of Loyola, Founder of the Jesuits: His Life and Work; P. Dudon, St. Ignatius of Loyola; M. Foss, Founding of the Jesuits, 1540; H. Rahner, Ignatius the Theologian; A. Ravier, Ignatius of Loyola and the Founding of the Society of Jesus; F. Wulf, Ignatius Loyola: His Personality and Spiritual Heritage, 1556–1956.

Ignorance. A lack of knowledge, either in general or with respect to a particular fact or subject.

Biblical Description. The OT describes ignorance as a failure (1) to know clearly (Ps. 73:22; Isa. 56:10) and, therefore, (2) to act acceptably (Lev. 4:2, 22, 27; 5:15, 18; Num. 15:24–29). Divine provision for those who had committed sins of ignorance was found in the sin offering (Lev. 4:2–12). Guilt for such acts was recognized, but the extent of culpability diminished.

The NT expresses ignorance (agnoeō and agnoia) as (1) failure to understand or perceive (Mark 9:32; Luke 9:45); (2) to be uninformed, not to know, as in the phrase “I do not want you to be unaware, brothers” (Rom. 1:13; 11:25; 1 Cor. 10:1; 12:1; 2 Cor. 1:8; 1 Thess. 4:13); (3) ignorance that leads astray (1 Tim. 1:13; Heb. 5:2); and (4) not knowing as a consequence of the willful closing of one’s mind to the appeal of truth (Acts 13:27; Rom. 10:3). Once again sin is acknowledged, but culpability is tempered by the dimension of ignorance involved.

Ethical Implications. Ethicists have long sought an equitable mode for determining the extent of culpability for acts performed in ignorance. A useful formula is expressed by distinguishing between avoidable and unavoidable ignorance (some use the terms “vincible” and “invincible”).

In events involving unavoidable ignorance we exonerate the agent from responsibility, as in the case of a man’s failure to appear for an appointment because he was ignorant of the fact that he would be engaged in an accident on the way. Obviously such ignorance is unavoidable. On the other hand, a judge does not excuse a defendant who claims he did not know that a gun was loaded, for the agent could have taken the time to inform himself on this point and, since the gun is a lethal weapon, he should have informed himself before pressing the trigger. However, it is important to recognize that not all avoidable ignorance is deemed inexcusable. If a professor of physics were not able to explain $E = MC^2$ we would find this inexcusable; on the other hand, if he pleaded ignorance as to the evolution of the English preposition we might well excuse him even though he could have added such material to his fund of knowledge. It becomes clear, therefore, that determining the extent of man’s culpability in certain contexts is dependent upon numerous factors.

The Christian rejoices in the fact that the final judgment of humankind resides with a mind more penetrating, a will more discerning, and a heart more loving than his own.

Theological Synthesis. Men and women are sinners and constitutionally ignorant. Having lost the pristine knowledge of God in the fall, they are aware of the existence of deity but are totally incapable of knowing how to effect peace with him (Rom. 1:19–20; Eph. 2:12; 4:18). Their ignorance is most clearly expressed in this inability to recognize the Son of God when he appeared; this failure issued in Christ’s rejection and death (Acts 3:17; 1 Cor. 2:7–8). Only divine intervention has prevented man from perishing in his ignorance (Hos. 13:9 κλυ). As the gospel is proclaimed (1 Cor. 15:1–3) faith is created (Rom. 10:17) and a knowledge provided that eventuates in man’s salvation (2 Tim. 3:15). In eternity, the ignorance of re-deemed man will be superseded by consummate knowledge (the beatific vision, 1 Cor. 13:12).

F. R. HARM

See also ETHICS, BIBLICAL; RESPONSIBILITY.

Bibliography. J. Hardon, Catholic Catechism; J. Hospers, Human Conduct; J. Macquarrie, ed., Dictionary of Christian Ethics; A. C. Schultz, DCE 311–12; E. Schütz and E. D. Schmitz, NIDNTT 2:390–409.

Illumination. (1) A general enlightening that Christ brings to all men especially through the gospel (John 1:9; 2 Tim. 1:10); (2) the enlightening experience of salvation (Heb. 6:4; 10:32); (3) the understanding of Christian truth (Eph. 1:18); and (4) the searching character of future judgment (1 Cor. 4:5). Biblically, the verb phōtizō is used in such references.

Theologically, the word has been applied to various other concepts. (1) In the early church, baptism was frequently described as illumination (e.g., Justin, First Apology 61). (2) Applied to biblical inspiration, the illumination theory holds that the perception and understanding of the biblical writers were elevated or intensified to a degree greater than that of other people. (3) Illumination and revelation are confused in the neo-orthodox view of the Bible’s becoming the Word of God, for that makes man’s discovery of truth the locus of revelation.

Specifically, the doctrine of illumination relates to that ministry of the Holy Spirit that helps the believer understand the truth of Scripture. In relation to the Bible, the doctrine of revelation relates to the unveiling of truth in the material of the Scriptures; inspiration concerns the method by which the Holy Spirit superintended the writing of Scripture; and illumination refers to the ministry of the Spirit by which the meaning of Scripture is made clear to the believer.

The unregenerate man cannot experience this illuminating ministry, for he is blinded to the truth of God (1 Cor. 2:14). The Lord promised his followers that when the Spirit came on the day of Pentecost he would lead them into the truth (John 16:13–16), and this includes understanding the deep things of God (1 Cor. 2:9–10). However, such understanding is not without conditions. The believer must himself be maturing and in fellowship with the Lord to experience this full perception of truth, for carnality in his life will hinder the ministry of the Spirit (1 Cor. 3:1–3). He also would expect to benefit from the Spirit ministering through others who have the gift of teaching (Rom. 12:6–7), and such ministry can be experienced orally or through the printed page or various other media. But ultimately it is the Spirit who is the direct connection between the mind of God as revealed in the Scriptures and the mind of the believer seeking to understand the Scriptures.

C. C. RYRIE

See also INTERNAL TESTIMONY OF THE HOLY SPIRIT.

Bibliography. L. S. Chafer, Systematic Theology; B. Ramm, Witness of the Spirit; C. C. Ryrie, Holy Spirit.

Illuminative Way, The (Lat. Via Illuminativa). The second of the three stages of the mystic way, being intermediary between the purgative way, in which the person learns to reject sin, and the unitive way, in which the person enters the pure love of God, the mystic union. This second stage, also called the Way of the Proficients, finds the person being disengaged from his attachment to the things of this world, even those that are good or are associated with religious meanings. Instead the soul is enlightened concerning the pure world of the spirit and is thus prepared to appreciate God more deeply. While found in its basics as early as Basil the Great, the classic expression of this way is found in the writings of John of the Cross, particularly the first part of the Dark Night of the Soul.

P. H. DAVIDS

See also BASIL THE GREAT; BEATIFIC VISION; JOHN OF THE CROSS; MYSTICISM; PURGATIVE WAY, THE; UNITIVE WAY, THE.

Illyricus. See FLACIUS, MATTHIAS.

Image of God. The doctrine that humanity is in certain respects created in the divine likeness. The Bible answers the question of the nature of humanity by pointing to the imago Dei. That humanity by creation uniquely bears the image of God is a fundamental biblical doctrine—as is also that this image is sullied by sin and that it is restored by divine salvation. Humanity's nature and destiny are interwoven with this foundational fact, and speculative philosophies inevitably strike at it when they degrade humanity to animality or otherwise distort the personality.

Biblical Data. The biblical data pertaining to the imago Dei are found in both New and Old Testaments. Their setting throughout is revealed religion and not speculative philosophy. Dependence of the Pauline view on the Hellenistic mystery religions has been asserted by the comparative religions school. Reitzenstein has affirmed (Die hellenistischen Mysterienreligionen, 7–10) that Paul's teaching on the image is indebted to the private mystery cults in Egypt, Phrygia, and Persia, particularly those of Isis, Attis and Cybele, and Mithra, with their goal of salvation secured through personal union with the god or goddess. But H. A. A. Kennedy has argued convincingly in St. Paul and the Mystery Religions that the basic NT ideas are forged against the background of Hebrew theology, rather than of the Hellenistic cults, and that even in respect to the image the resemblance between the Pauline concepts and the mysteries is superficial. David Cairns also emphasizes that “the New Testament writers make almost no use”—he might properly have deleted the word “almost”—of notions frequently found in the mystery cults such as the divinization of the believer and human absorption into the Deity.

Hebrew-Christian theology frames the doctrine of the imago in the setting of divine creation and redemption. “The gist of the doctrine of Creation is surely this,” Cairns reminds us, in respect to the image, “that man's being, though linked with the divine, is itself essentially not divine, but created, and thus dependent on God, and of a different order from His own being though akin to it” (63). Bible doctrine does not, therefore, simply affirm in a religious manner what speculative philosophies express more generally in their emphasis on the inherent dignity and worth of the person, or on the infinite value and sacredness of human personality. For Scripture conditions one's dignity and value upon the doctrine of creation, and not upon an intrinsic divinity, and assuredly it does not obscure the fact of the fall and of the desperate need of redemption. Those who, like Kingsley Martin, profess to find in Stoicism a superior and sounder basis for human dignity than that afforded by biblical theology seem little to realize that in such a transition to pantheism the Hebrew-Christian dimensions of the imago are actually abandoned.

The biblical discussion turns on the Hebrew words šelem and dēmūt, and the corresponding Greek terms eikōn and homoiōsis. Scripture employs these terms to affirm that humankind was fashioned in the image of God, and that Jesus Christ the divine Son is the essential image of the invisible God. The passages expressly affirming the divine image in humanity are Genesis 1:26, 27; 5:1, 3; and 9:6; 1 Corinthians 11:7; Colossians 3:10; and James 3:9. The doctrine is implied also in other passages in which the precise phrase “image of God” does not appear, particularly in Psalm 8, which J. Laidlaw called “a poetic replica of the creation-narrative of Genesis 1 as far as it refers to man” (HDB 2:452a), and in the Pauline reference on Mars Hill to humanity and the Maker. The terms “image and likeness” in Genesis 1:26 and 5:3 do not distinguish different aspects of the imago but state intensively the fact that men and women uniquely reflect God. Instead of suggesting distinctions within the image, the juxtaposition vigorously declares that by creation humanity bears an image actually corresponding to the divine original. In Genesis 1:27 the word “image” alone expresses the complete idea of this correspondence, whereas in 5:1 the term “likeness” serves the same purpose.

Image of God

Although humanity images God by creation—a fact which the divine prohibition of graven images (which obscure the spirituality of God) serves pointedly to reinforce—the fall precludes all attempts to read off God’s nature from humanity’s. To project God in humanity’s image is therefore a heinous form of idolatry confounding the Creator with the creaturely (Rom. 1:23). This confusion reaches its nadir in worship of the beast and his image or statue (Rev. 14:9–11).

Recent Theological Studies. Granted that the terms “image” and “likeness” denote an exact resemblance, in what respect does humanity reflect God? What of the vitiating effects of the fall into sin? Is the NT conception of the imago in conflict with the OT conception? Is it in conflict with itself? These questions are among those most energetically debated in contemporary theology.

The importance of a proper understanding of the imago Dei can hardly be overstated. The answer given to the imago-inquiry soon becomes determinative for the entire gamut of doctrinal affirmation. The ramifications are not only theological but affect every phase of the problem of revelation and reason, including natural and international law, and the cultural enterprise as a whole. Any improper view has consequences the more drastic as its implications are applied to regenerate and to unregenerate humanity, from primal origin to final destiny.

The new theology supports a “christological” or “eschatological” interpretation of the divine image in humankind. This orientation is formally commendable, since the God-man assuredly exhibits the divine intention for persons, and the glory of redeemed humanity will consist in full conformity to Christ’s image. In the past a type of Christian rationalism has sometimes unfortunately emerged, seeking on the basis of anthropology alone, independently of Christology, to delineate one’s true nature and destiny. Such expositions, which arbitrarily identify the imago in fallen humanity with that of Christ, blur easily into speculations of a personalistic and idealistic nature.

But there is also need for caution over the new theology, since it often incorporates an evasive turn into its christological appeal. It diverts attention from the important question of humanity’s primal origin—that is, from the creation and fall of the first Adam—because of a reluctance to challenge the modern evolutionary philosophy from the standpoint of the Genesis creation account.

By the imago the Protestant Reformers understood especially humankind’s state of original purity, in accord with Genesis 1 and 2, wherein Adam is depicted as fashioned for rational, moral, and spiritual fellowship with his Maker. The existentializing philosophy of our times, however, finding this representation too abruptly contradictory of current scientific views, confers upon the first Adam only a mythical status, regarding him—in respect to deviation from perfection—as simply a type of every person. The imago is then no longer conceived as a state, but as a relation—since an original state of Adamic purity is set aside. Hence neo-orthodox theology not only rejects, in common with Protestantism generally, the Roman Catholic exposition of the image in Thomistic terms (of analogia entis, a “being” which Creator and creature share in different degrees), but also sets aside the traditional Protestant confidence in the Genesis creation narratives as a scientifically relevant account of origins.

Just because the christological or eschatological view looks to the end rather than to the beginning, it does not by itself do full justice to the biblical representation. It subordinates the exhibition of the divine image as God’s gift in creation and is vulnerable also to universalistic expositions of redemption. For while the image of the Godhead (Gen. 1:26) on the basis of creation has an anticipatory reference to the God-man, it is not as such the image of Jesus Christ the Redeemer. Although the redemption-image truly presupposes the creation-image, and the creation-image prepares the way for the redemption-image, Karl Barth’s emphasis that all divine revelation is redemptive ignores significant considerations. If the original image is in fact a reflex of grace, if humanity is God’s image only by promise (whereas Jesus Christ is actually God’s image), can universalism really be avoided? We may note: (1) The creation-image was once-for-all wholly given at the creation of the first Adam; the redemption-image is gradually fashioned. (2) The creation-image is conferred in some respect upon the whole human race; the redemption-image only upon the redeemed. (3) The creation-image distinguishes humanity from the animals; the redemption-image distinguishes the regenerate family of faith from unregenerate mankind. (4) The creation-image was probationary; the redemption-image is not.

Statements of the imago Dei in current theology, while equating the image with those features by which humankind transcends the animals, often give to the biblical passages a bizarre tone of novelty. Barth proposed at least two interpretations of the image, and Emil Brunner, three, and none of their recensions are devoid of difficulties. The conclusion to be drawn from such adjustment and readjustment is that theologians today seek to comprehend the image within a framework that is unsatisfactorily narrow. While pantheizing liberalism formerly set aside sin and the need for redemption, and mistakenly regarded the natural person as destined for Christ simply on the basis of creation, neo-orthodox writers exaggerate the transcendence of God to the dilution of the imago in humanity as both created and fallen. The recent dialectical reconstructions of the imago almost invariably profess to honor the Protestant Reformers, who are credited with first having controlled the imago idea in terms of the “true dialectical or christological principle.” But Calvin’s stress on continuity and discontinuity of humanity’s imago with the Maker is said to have lacked a proper working balance, which the dialectical approach now provides. The new speculation conceives their unity “eschatologically”; that is, neither original righteousness nor the fall are conceded a place in a past empirical time-series, but are held to be known only in faith-response. So it is that the christological and eschatological expositions of the imago today are surfeited with dialectical and existential elements.

Recent denials that the imago survives in fallen humanity reflect an extreme point of view. Barth championed this position at an earlier stage, contending that humanity and personality have no significance for the image. T. F. Torrance professed to find it in Calvin. Brunner readily acknowledged that the image formally survives the fall, but vacillated over the question of its material content. Nonetheless, the divergences of neo-orthodox theologians are not as significant as their agreements, especially their exclusion of the forms of logic and of a conceptual knowledge of God from the imago. The result is their depreciation of the rational element in revelation, both general and special. This modern revision of the noetic aspect of the imago accords with the limitation of human reason in dialectical philosophy; the admission of such conceptual knowledge of God would undermine the possibility of and necessity for the dialectic.

Evangelical expositors of the biblical revelation find the created image of God to exist formally in human personality (moral responsibility and intelligence) and materially in his knowledge of God and of his will for humanity. Hence the image is not reducible simply to a relation in which one stands to God, but rather is the precondition of such a relationship. The fall of humanity is not destructive of the formal image (human personality), although it involves the distortion (though not demolition) of the material content of the image. The biblical view is that humanity is made to know God as well as to obey him. Even in revolt humanity stands condemned by the knowledge it has, and is proffered God’s redemptive revelation in scriptural (i.e., in propositional) form. The objections that the admission of such a rational content to the imago implies pantheism, or a capacity for self-salvation by reflection through its supposed assertion of an undamaged spot in human nature, loses force when the support for such objections is seen to rest on exaggerations of divine transcendence from which the dialectical view itself arises, rather than on biblical considerations.

Although the Old and New Testaments seem to conflict—since the former reiterates the survival of the image in humankind after the fall, while the latter stresses the redemptive restoration of the image—there is no real clash. The OT conception is presupposed also in the New, which is a legitimate development, for the NT also speaks of the divine image in the natural person (1 Cor. 11:7; James 3:9). But its central message is the redeemed person’s renewal in the image of Christ.

Wider Implications. The Bible depicts humanity primarily from the perspective of its relation to God because its nature and destiny can be grasped only from this standpoint. Its interpretation of humanity is therefore primarily religious. The creation narratives are not written expressly to answer the questions posed by modern science, although attempts to discredit them as unscientific sooner or later are embarrassed by inevitable reversals of scientific opinion. Helpful evangelical discussions of the harmony of Scripture and science on such matters as the origin, unity, and antiquity of the human race may be found in Contemporary Evangelical Thought (C. F. H. Henry, ed., “Science and Religion”) and Theology and Evolution (R. Mixer, ed.). The Bible does not discriminate humanity from the animals in terms of morphological considerations, but rather in terms of the imago Dei. Humanity is made for personal and endless fellowship with God, involving rational understanding (Gen. 1:28–29), moral obedience (2:16–17), and religious communion (3:3). Humanity is given dominion over the animals and charged to subdue the earth, that is, to consecrate it to the spiritual service of God and humankind.

Nor does Scripture detail a science of psychology in the modern sense, although it presents a consistent view of human nature. Its emphasis falls on humanity as a unitary personality of soul and body. Their disjunction is due to sin (2:17); human reconstitution as a corporeal being in the resurrection is part of the human destiny. While the soul survives in the intermediate state between death and resurrection, this is not the ultimate ideal (2 Cor. 5:1–4), in sharp contrast to Greek philosophy. The dispute over dichotomy or trichotomy too often loses sight of the unitary nature of human personality. It is not possible to assert separate distinctions within human nature simply on the basis of the different scriptural terms for soul, spirit, mind, and so forth. Hebrews 4:12, often cited in behalf of trichotomy (“dividing soul and spirit, joints and marrow”), does not establish soul and spirit as different entities, but as different functions of the one psychic life of humankind, as is evident from the parallel phrase “the joints and marrow” in relation to the body.

Image of God

To the OT picture the NT adds the graphic exposition of the adoption of grace (John 1:12) and the new role, subsequent to the rescue from an unregenerate race, in the family of redemption. As a member of the church, the body of Christ, whose head has already passed through death and resurrection, the redeemed person already has an existence in the eternal order (Eph. 1:3), so that the sudden end of this world order will disclose the exalted Redeemer as the true center of one’s life and activity. At the same time, the crowned Christ mediates to the members of the body powers and virtues that belong to the age to come as an earnest of their future inheritance (2 Cor. 1:22; Gal. 5:22; Eph. 1:14). One’s destiny is therefore not simply an endless existence, but is moral—either a life redeemed and fit for eternity, or a life under perpetual divine judgment.

C. F. H. HENRY

See also MANKIND, DOCTRINE OF.

Bibliography. K. Barth, Church Dogmatics; G. C. Berkouwer, Man: The Image of God; E. Brunner, Man in Revolt; D. Cairns, Image of God in Man; G. H. Clark, Christian View of Man and Things; A. Hoekema, Created in God’s Image; J. G. Machen, Christian View of Man; J. M. Miller, “The ‘Image’ and ‘Likeness’ of God,” JBL 91:289–304; W. Mundle et. al., NIDNTT 2:284–93; R. Niebuhr, Nature and Destiny of Man; J. Orr, God’s Image in Man; H. W. Robinson, Christian Doctrine of Man; M. Smith, Image of God; T. F. Torrance, Calvin’s Doctrine of Man.

Images, Veneration of. Honor directed to God, saints, or angels through visual representations such as paintings, statues, and other symbols.

Christian history has been marked by recurring tension between those who revere images and those who reject them. Those who reject them derive this position from the biblical prohibition against making images. Those who revere them argue that even under the old dispensation

Moses approved image-making in the form of the cherubim above the ark. Moreover, in the new dispensation God himself assumed human form; the incarnation thus conveyed divine sanction for images. The deniers consider image veneration idolatry; defenders insist that veneration involves no ascription of any divinity to the image.

In the ancient church, public veneration of images developed slowly because of the aversion to idolatry. In the spirit of the Decalogue such fathers as Tertullian, Eusebius, and Augustine condemned artistic representations of sacred persons. The Gentile church, however, gradually incorporated symbols into worship, as paintings from the catacombs attest. Early images seldom portrayed human form but employed suggestive figures, e.g., a lamb or cross for Christ, a dove for the Holy Spirit or apostles. After Constantine, as Christians enjoyed more opportunity to decorate churches, reverence toward images increased. In the sixth century, Gregory I cautiously approved paintings as media to instruct the illiterate, but he explicitly forbade worship of images.

An important stage in the history of Christian images was reached when the iconoclastic controversy arose in Byzantium during the eighth and ninth centuries A.D. Those who defended the use of images were called iconodules and those who rejected images were the iconoclasts. The Quinisext Council (Trullan Synod 692) decreed that Christ must be represented in his human form and not as a lamb. To counter the monophysite and monothelite heresies, which taught that Christ’s humanity had been abridged by his divinity, the council found representation of the human form necessary to declare the reality of the incarnation. As John of Damascus, the chief systematizer of this christological rationale, explained, inasmuch as the invisible God had become visible, it is proper to represent artistically “what is visible in God,” namely Christ’s flesh. In this respect, the icon is a pictorial creedal statement.

But while the conciliar approval of images determined Orthodox Christology, a bitter iconoclastic controversy ensued, leading to the explicit requirement of images by Nicea II (787). Clarifying the image’s role in piety, the council stated that in viewing the representation, the faithful are moved to love and worship the prototype with veneration (proskynēsis), though not with the adoration (latría) proper only to divinity.

The Catholic West was reserved in its acceptance of the Nicean commendation, preferring to honor saints in their relics. Trent defined Catholic doctrine in response to the revival of iconoclasm in the Protestant Reformation, affirming that it is proper to venerate images of Christ, the Virgin, and other saints, not because of any virtue in the images but because honor given to them passes to the persons depicted.

P. D. STEEVES

See also DULIA; NICEA, SECOND COUNCIL OF; TRENT, COUNCIL OF.

Bibliography. O. Barfield, Saving the Appearance: A Study of Idolatry; E. Bevans, Holy Images; A. Bryer and J. Herrin, eds., Iconoclasm; J. Gibbons, Faith of Our Fathers; St. John Damascene on Holy Images; E. J. Martin, History of the Iconoclastic Controversy; J. Meyendorff, Byzantine Theology; L. Ouspensky, Theology of the Icon; J. Pelikan, Christian Tradition: Spirit of Eastern Christendom.

Imago Dei. See IMAGE OF GOD.

Imitation of Christ. The basic biblical concept that man is God's child and reflects his attributes. Accordingly Christians are to imitate not evil, but good (3 John 11), Paul's conduct (1 Cor. 4:16; Phil. 3:17; 2 Thess. 3:7, 9), the apostles, even as they imitate Christ (1 Cor. 11:1; 1 Thess. 1:6), the heroes of faith (Heb. 6:12; 13:7), and God the Father (Eph. 5:1). In 1 Thess. 2:14 Paul commends the Thessalonian church for imitating the churches of Judea in steadfastness under persecution.

From these passages, and more particularly from those indicating that man is made in God's image, we derive the popular notion of imitating Christ. The sad facts of sin teach us all that God's image in man is either partially or totally destroyed. But the Bible declares that restoration of the image is possible through Christ; hence the desire to imitate Christ as the only exact and full image of God (Col. 1:15; 2:9). Likeness to Christ is achieved not by legalistically trying to mold one's action after the divine pattern but by the inward processes of salvation that change heart attitudes, producing good works and Christlike virtues (Rom. 12:2; Eph. 2:8–10; Phil. 2:12–13). The image becomes more like Christ through our attending to him (2 Cor. 3:18), but is not finally completed until we see him on the day of resurrection (Rom. 8:29–30; 1 John 3:2).

From the beginning many desired to imitate the Master, requesting, for example, a model prayer (Luke 11:1–4), which we still repeat today. This ambition prompted the zealous declaration of James and John that they could drink Jesus' cup and undergo his baptism (Mark 10:38–39). It moved Paul, as he sought to let the indwelling Spirit of Christ speak and act through him (Gal. 2:20; Phil. 1:21); so he exhorted others to imitate him even as he imitated Christ.

In Acts 7:60 we find Stephen imitating the dying words of Jesus (Luke 23:34). In Paul's letters the theme of exhibiting Christ's humility, sufferings, and death constantly recurs (e.g., Rom. 8:17, 18, 36; Phil. 1:29–30; 2:5; 3:10–21), and Peter says explicitly (1 Pet. 2:21–23) that we are to follow in Christ's steps in suffering and death.

In the postapostolic literature there is a conscious effort to point out how the martyrs imitated Christ in their humility, in being betrayed, in their Spirit-prompted utterances, and in their triumphant dying (e.g., Ignatius; To the Ephesians 10:3; To the Romans 6:3; Martyrdoms of Polycarp 1:1–2; 17:3; 19:1; Diognetus 10:4–5). This literature fortified thousands who nobly imitated their Lord during the terrible Roman persecutions. When Constantine legalized Christianity, "second-quality" Christians flooded the churches and the imitation of Christ was confined more and more to the monasteries. Mystical experiences corresponding to those of both Christ and the saints multiplied, culminating in the stigmata of Francis of Assisi, a literal physical reproduction of the wounds of Christ. Such mystical experiences continue to our day.

During the fifteenth century and afterward the quiet mysticism of Thomas à Kempis's book, Imitation of Christ, influenced all branches of the church. In our time James Stalker's Imago Christi (1889) is perhaps the best, although In His Steps by Charles Sheldon (1899) has sold more copies. It is debatable whether John Bunyan's devotional classic, Pilgrim's Progress, should be classified here, but devotion takes many forms; consciously or unconsciously all of them reproduce an image of Christ in the devotee, more or less complete, more or less enlightened.

Modern psychology throws much new light on the perennial desire to imitate Christ by stressing man's need to identify the self with strong personalities (mother figure, father, saint, etc.) in order to build the personality, and by stressing the importance of the subconscious as a reservoir from which our actions rise.

T. B. CRUM

See also BROTHERS OF THE COMMON LIFE; FRANCIS OF ASSISI; IDENTIFICATION WITH CHRIST; MYSTICISM; PIETISM; THOMAS À KEMPIS; UNIO MYSTICA.

Bibliography. M. Griffiths, Example of Jesus; J. M. Gustafson, Christ and the Moral Life; E. Malatesta, ed., Imitating Christ.

Immaculate Conception. The idea that the Virgin Mary did not have original sin at her conception nor did she acquire elements of original sin in the development of her life, whereas all other human beings have original sin from their conception due to the fall of Adam. The immaculate conception is an article of faith for Roman Catholics, who believe that Mary, as the Mother of God, did not have original sin because of the direct intervention of God. Mary was immaculate as a divine privilege. The Roman Catholic Church considers the doctrine of the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary to be part of apostolic teaching related to both the Bible and tradition. It holds that the doctrine is referred to, at least implicitly, in Genesis 3:15, which indicates a woman who will battle Satan. The woman ultimately wins the battle. Pope Pius IX said that this section of the Bible foretells the immaculate conception. He described his view in "Ineffabilis Deus."

Immaculate Conception

In the early church Mary was often referred to as "all holy." Luke 1:28 which relates Gabriel's greeting to Mary "Hail, full of grace" is said to be a reference to her immaculate conception. In the eighth century the church in England began to celebrate a feast of Mary's conception. Thomas Aquinas and Bernard of Clairvaux opposed the introduction of the feast into France. Duns Scotus favored the feast and explained that Mary was more indebted to the redemptive power of Jesus Christ than any other human being because Christ prevented her from contracting original sin because of the foreseen merits of Christ. By 1685 most Catholics accepted the notion of the immaculate conception. Clement XIII strongly favored the doctrine in the eighteenth century. In the nineteenth century devotion to the feast grew swiftly. Pope Pius IX, after consulting with all bishops of the church, stated the dogma holding that "the most blessed Virgin Mary was preserved from all stain of original sin in the first instant of her conception." This took place in 1854. The immaculate conception is a special feast for the Catholics of the United States.

Protestants deny that the doctrine of the immaculate conception is supported by the biblical evidence; they teach that Mary was a sinner, saved by grace through faith, like every other believer.

T. J. GERMAN

See also MARIOLOGY; MARY, ASSUMPTION OF; MARY, THE BLESSED VIRGIN; MOTHER OF GOD.

Bibliography. J. B. Carol, Fundamentals of Mariology; E. O'Connor, ed., Dogma of the Immaculate Conception.

Immanence of God. See GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF.

Immanuel. Literally "with us [is] God." Occurring three times in the Bible (Isa. 7:14; 8:8; Matt. 1:23), the Hebrew word 'immānū'el (Gr. Emmanouēl) is employed as a proper name in all three verses, and as such is the name of the promised offspring of the 'almā ("unmarried woman") of Isaiah 7:14 and the parthenos ("virgin") of Matthew 1:23, who owns (Isa. 8:8) and protects (v. 10) the land and people of Israel.

As a proper name it is also descriptive of both this child's divine nature and his messianic work of grace. Taken by itself, this name, of course, does not prove that this virgin's son would also be the Son of God, the Second Person of the Holy Trinity. But when one learns from New Testament revelation that Mary's virginally conceived offspring was in fact God incarnate (John 1:1, 18; 20:28; Rom. 9:5; Titus 2:13; Heb. 1:8; 2 Pet. 1:1; 1 John 5:20; cf. Luke 1:35; Col. 2:9; 1 Tim. 3:16), then it becomes apparent that his name was intended to indicate more than the idea that God was merely active through Jesus to govern and protect his people; it actually becomes descriptive of the incarnate Christ's divine nature.

How this name implies his gracious work is apparent from the preposition "with" in his name. When one reflects on the two parties on either side of the preposition: on the one hand, God, infinitely holy, in whom there is no darkness at all (1 John 1:5), who is of purer eyes than to behold evil with any degree of approbation (Hab. 1:13); and on the other hand, human beings, of whom none is righteous (Rom. 3:10) and who are all children deserving God's wrath (Eph. 2:3), one could hardly blame God had he sent his Son as "God against us" or "God opposed to us." When, however, he reveals his Son as "God with us," the messianic task, full of grace and the promise of salvation, is suggested.

That his ministry fulfills the Messianic task promised by the name Immanuel Jesus himself affirms when he declares, "Surely I am with you always" (Matt. 28:20). And the hope that it holds forth is finally and fully satisfied in the new heaven and new earth when "God himself will be with [people] and be their God" (Rev. 21:3).

R. L. REYMOND

Immersion. See BAPTISM, MODES OF.

Imminence. The doctrine that Christ can return at any moment and that no predicted event must intervene before that return. This view is held primarily by those who believe the church will be raptured before the seven-year-tribulation (also known as the seventieth week of Daniel). It is the view typically held by dispensational premillennialism.

Traditionally, most pretribulation rapturists have considered the imminence of Christ's return to be one of the strongest evidences that the rapture will occur before, rather than after, the tribulation. The argument runs like this: The NT presents Christ's return as a comforting hope (John 14; 1 Thess. 4:17-18; Titus 2:13; James 5:7-8). Believers wait for Christ (1 Thess. 1:10) and are exhorted to be alert and self-controlled (5:6); consequently, it is a purifying hope (1 John 3:1-3; cf. Rom. 13:11-12; 1 Pet. 4:7). If the hope is a blessed and comforting hope, no events of predicted trial and tribulation are expected to occur before Christ returns for the church. Otherwise, believers would dread the approach of Christ's return because of the preceding events to be endured. If Christ's return is the basis for exhortations to godly living, that return must be expected at any moment; events thought to be some distance away because of predicted intervening events do not serve well to promote purity and readiness. Finally, believers are exhorted to live in watchfulness and expectation of Christ's return, not of intervening events. According to pretribulationists, all these considerations imply that the event believers await is imminent, and a rapture that comes after a seven-year tribulation cannot be imminent. Therefore the rapture must be pretribulationist.

Posttribulation rapturists reply by insisting that the passages in question imply only the believer's attitude of expectancy, not imminence. They also argue that the NT clearly implies certain necessary intervening events before Christ's return, such as time to carry out the Great Commission (Matt. 28:18–20; Acts 1:8) or the assurance to Peter he would reach old age (John 21:18–19; 2 Pet. 1:14). Thus, for the NT church the exhortations to watch could not have implied imminence. Why, then, should they now?

The doctrine of imminence has been most characteristic of pretribulation rapturists. However, some who hold to a midseventieth week rapture accept at least a limited imminence by maintaining that the beginning of the seventieth week cannot be known. Also, those who either understand the tribulation or seventieth week to be already fulfilled or who spiritualize it can hold to the imminence of Christ's return. A few posttribulationist premillennialists accept the imminence of Christ's return on this basis. Amillennialists are hesitant to dogmatically espouse a strict imminence doctrine, but they do not subscribe to a seven-year period necessarily occurring before Christ's return. Though amillennialists are uncomfortable describing Christ's coming as strictly imminent, they do think it may be described as impending and as something the believer should always be ready and watchful for. S. N. GUNDRY

See also ESCHATOLOGY; RAPTURE OF THE CHURCH; SECOND COMING OF CHRIST; TRIBULATION.

Bibliography. R. H. Gundry, Church and the Tribulation; G. E. Ladd, Blessed Hope; J. F. Strombeck, First the Rapture; J. F. Walvoord, Blessed Hope and the Tribulation; Rapture Question; L. J. Wood, Is the Rapture Next?

Immortality. The quality or state of being immortal. The concept of immortality is expressed directly in the Bible only in the NT. The words used are athanasia and aphtharsia, with its cognate adjective aphthartos. Athanasia is the exact equivalent of the English immortality, and it is used in 1 Corinthians 15:53–54, where it describes the resurrection body as one which is not subject to death, and in 1 Timothy 6:16, where God is said to be the one who alone has immortality. He alone in his essence is deathless. Aphtharsia has the basic meaning of indestructibility and, by derivation, of incorruption, by which it is rendered in the familiar resurrection paean in 1 Corinthians 15:42–54 in the KJV. The translation immortality is used, however, in Romans 2:7, where the reference is to the life of glory and honor to which the believer aspires: in 2 Timothy 1:10, where it is said that Christ “abolished death and . . . brought life and immortality to light.” The adjective aphthartos is used to describe God as not being subject to diminution or decay (Rom. 1:23; 1 Tim. 1:17); or of things which are not perishable, such as the crown awarded to the successful Christian (1 Cor. 9:25), the inheritance which is reserved for the Christian (1 Pet. 1:4), and the seed of which the Christian is born (1 Pet. 1:23).

It may be said, therefore, that immortality in the biblical sense is a condition in which the individual is not subject to death or to any influence which might lead to death. God is uniquely immortal in that he is without beginning or end of life and is not in any way affected by change or diminution. Man, on the other hand, is immortal only by derivation and when his mortal body has been replaced by one which is immortal. This article is concerned with human immortality.

The biblical idea of immortality thus differs from all others in certain important respects. One of these is that in nonbiblical teaching man is inherently immortal. Another is that it is the spiritual aspect of human nature which is only thought to be immortal. The human soul or spirit survives death. A corollary of these two is that the human body is usually thought of as a kind of prison house of the spirit, or, at best, as a very transitory part of the human personality. In biblical thought man is not inherently immortal; moreover, it is the whole man, body and soul, that is immortal, even though the body must undergo a transformation in order to achieve immortality.

In the OT as well as in the NT, man is a complete being only as his body and spirit are in union. He is then a living soul, or person (Gen. 2:7). While some have understood the Genesis narrative as teaching that man was created immortal and that sin brought mortality, it would seem better to interpret the account as teaching that man would have gained immortality through a period of testing in which he would be obedient to the divine commands. If death was the penalty for sin, life was to be the reward for obedience.

Throughout the OT the dead are described as going down to Sheol, a place of obscurity, forgetfulness, and relative inactivity (e.g., Job 10:20–22, 14:13; Ps. 88:10–12). Sheol, however, was not outside the Lord's purview (Ps. 139:8; Amos 9:2), and it was indicated through some OT writers that there would be a deliverance from it (Job 19:25–27; Pss. 16:10; 49:14–15). This deliverance would take the form of a resurrection, though this climax of OT hope finds clear expression only in Daniel 12:2.

In the NT it is implied that OT believers did not have a full knowledge of the meaning of immortality, since our Lord Jesus Christ brought life and immortality (aphtharsia) to light through the gospel (2 Tim. 1:10). Christians have been begotten in Christ to an immortal (aphtharton) inheritance (1 Pet. 1:3–4). The inheritance is described as one of glory, honor, incorruption (aphtharsia), and eternal life. To be without the life in Christ is not to have immortality, in the biblical sense of the term.

Immortality

Immortality, for the Christian, involves the resurrection and may be fully attained only after it. While it is said that believers who have died are present with the Lord when they are absent from the body (2 Cor. 5:8), they are nevertheless to be changed at Christ's appearing. Both those who have died and those who are alive upon earth will receive a body like the resurrection body of Jesus Christ (Phil. 3:21). Those who are the children of God will be like Christ (1 John 3:2), perfected in righteousness (Phil. 1:6), and they will serve God continually.

D. W. KERR

See also ANNIHILATIONISM; CONDITIONAL IMMORTALITY; HEAVEN; INTERMEDIATE STATE; RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD; SHEOL.

Bibliography. J. Baillie, And the Life Everlasting; P. Cotterell, I Want to Know What the Bible Says About Death; O. Cullmann, "Immortality of the Soul and the Resurrection of the Dead," HDSB 7–36; M. J. Harris, Raised Immortal; X. Léon-Dufour, Life and Death in the New Testament; H. R. Mackintosh, Immortality and the Future; S. D. F. Salmond, Christian Doctrine of Immortality; B. Schlink, What Comes after Death?; S. Travis, Christian Hope and the Future of Man.

Immortality, Conditional. See CONDITIONAL IMMORTALITY.

Immutability of God. See GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF.

Impanation (Lat. impanare, "to embody in bread"). An explanation of Christ's presence in the Lord's Supper which maintains that he is embodied in the bread. Christ is locally and physically present in the host. Guitmund of Aversa (d. before 1195) taught this doctrine, comparing Christ's incarnation at Christmas with his impanation in the Eucharist. John of Paris (d. 1306) said "the body of Christ is 'impanated,'" i.e., "has become bread." The Roman Catholic Church rejected this view, affirming instead transubstantiation, the doctrine that at the consecration the bread is changed into the body of Christ in a "wonderful and singular conversion," so that the accidents (outward appearance) of bread remain, but the substance (inward reality) is body. Impanationists disagreed, insisting on both the continuing existence of bread and the presence of Christ's body. A communicant receives not just the body of Christ, as in transubstantiation, but also bread. This position is often attributed to Lutherans, who are said to teach consubstantiation, the view that in the Lord's Supper one receives body and bread mixed together. Individual Lutherans may hold such opinions. The Lutheran confessions, however, do not try to explain the mode of union between Christ's body and the bread in the Supper. It is regarded as a "mystery." Lutherans officially rejected impanation, condemning it in the Formula of Concord of 1577, confessing that they "do not believe that the body and blood of Christ are locally enclosed in the bread", but testifying that while they receive "natural bread" they also obtain his body "in a supernatural, incomprehensible manner".

C. G. FRY

See also LORD'S SUPPER, VIEWS OF.

Impassibility of God. The doctrine that God is not capable of being acted upon or affected emotionally by anything in creation.

Passibility, Thomists argued, involves potentiality and potentiality involves change. Unrealized potential and change in the Deity seemed to contradict their understanding of God's immutability, transcendence, self-existence, self-determination, and perfection. Suffering, furthermore, seemed incompatible with perfect divine blessedness. Thus the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England affirm that God is without body, parts, or passions.

However, that view seemed to others to convey the idea that God was devoid of an affectional nature essential to personality and agapē love. As early as the Bishops Conference of 1786 the word "passions" was omitted. Hence, the Methodist statement also stops with saying God is without body or parts.

The two hypotheses, that God is passible and that God is impassible, need to be put to the test of relevant scriptural evidence, along with their assumptions concerning the meaning of other divine attributes.

The OT portrays God as folding Israel in his arms like a shepherd (Isa. 40:11), redeeming and restoring his scattered children (43:5–7), loving with a love greater than a mother's tenderness (49:15), and comforting as a mother comforts her child (66:13). Jesus constantly referred to God as Father to convey the fact that God personally cares about his children by creation and regeneration.

All of these anthropomorphic expressions are figurative, but the figures of speech illustrate a nonfigurative point. The God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob is not without feeling, not without the capability of loving and feeling the hurt of love spurned. The relationship of love to suffering stands out in God's suffering servant (Isa. 53). With some things God is pleased, with others God is displeased. God pours out his righteous indignation upon the ungodly who persecuted his people (63:1–6), but God suffered as his people suffered. "In all their distress he too was distressed, and the angel of his presence saved them. In his love and mercy he redeemed them; he lifted them up and carried them all the days of old" (v. 9). When his people turn against him, the Holy Spirit can be grieved (v. 10; Eph. 4:30).

The heavenly Father was so moved by human sin that he sent his Son into the world to suffer as humans suffer, to sacrifice himself, and to lay the foundation for the church. The Father suffered with Jesus and with the poor, the orphans, the widows, and the strangers. But the Father did not die on the cross. The Father suffers, but, contrary to Kitamori and Moltmann, does not die, even symbolically. But before Jesus can establish his future kingdom, he must suffer many things and be rejected (Luke 17:25). Missing the impact of the Father's imputed wrath and Jesus' agony as forsaken by the Father, we miss the pathos of the gospel.

Dietrich Bonhoeffer, in his Letters and Papers from Prison, asks, did not Jesus himself use distress as his point of contact with men? We are challenged to participate in the sufferings of God at the hands of a godless world. By ranging themselves with God in his suffering, Bonhoeffer claimed, Christians distinguish themselves from the heathen. H. Wheeler Robinson saw that suffering rises from love. Because God loves mankind he permits, or suffers, sin, but takes no pleasure in it. The only way moral evil can enter the consciousness of the morally good is as suffering. What meaning can there be in a love, Robinson asks, that is not costly?

We do not worship, as Dorothee Sölle alleged, an apathetic God. Just as God perfectly uses his intellectual and volitional powers, he perfectly uses his emotional powers. Negatively, God has no physical pains, and no emotions inconsistent with all his other attributes. God is not overcome by emotions, has no emotions out of control, out of balance, or inappropriate to the situation. God does not suffer emotional disorders. Affirmatively, the God of the Bible has an appropriate, healthy, self-controlled emotional experience. As exhibited in Jesus, the Father may be viewed as weeping with those who weep and rejoicing with those who rejoice.

A biblically active, rather than a philosophically passive, view of God's other attributes avoids the alleged antinomy Leonard Hodgson thinks irresolvable. God's immutability does not reduce the living, active, personal Lord of all to an impersonal, static principle. It affirms that God in all his thoughts, words, and acts moves dynamically in ways consistent with his own essence and purposes. Let passibility involve change. Change that does not deny any of God's essential attributes is in harmony with a biblical view of God. God is not only transcendent, but also immanent, relating to both the just and the unjust. Though God alone has life in himself, God has granted life to many others in order to participate in personal relationships with them. God's perfect joy is surely not an unrealistic one, but is inseparable from his knowledge of all the evils and values of creation. Suffering accepted as inevitable, Kitamori has observed, is depressing, but suffering born of love produces power and life.

G. R. LEWIS

See also GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF; MOLTMANN, JÜRGEN; PAIN OF GOD THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. J. O. Buswell Jr., Systematic Theology of the Christian Religion; T. E. Fretheim, Suffering of God; J. Gill, Body of Divinity; V. A. Harvey, Handbook of Theological Terms; A. Heschel, God of the Prophets; L. Hodgson, For Faith and Freedom; G. R. Kewis, ZPEB 5:530-33; K. Kitamori, Theology of the Pain of God; J. Y. Lee, God Suffers for Us; A. McGrath, Christian Theology; J. Moltmann, Crucified God; J. K. Mozley, Impassibility of God; C. Pinnock, Openness of God; H. W. Robinson, Suffering, Human and Divine; D. Sölle, Suffering.

Impeccability of Christ. See SINLESSNESS OF CHRIST.

Imprecatory Psalms. The psalms containing passages seeking the hurt of someone else (e.g., 5:10; 10:15; 55:15; 109:9-20) and which compel the question of whether they can have any place in Christian Scripture. Two background remarks are in place. First, imprecations are found in the NT also, not least the maledictions of the Lord himself (e.g., Matt. 23:13-32) and the apostolic anathema (Gal. 1:8-9; cf. Rev. 6:10; 18:20). Second, the notably imprecatory Psalm 69 is used by the Lord Jesus (John 15:25) and of the Lord Jesus (John 2:17; Rom. 15:3), and its divine inspiration is affirmed (Acts 1:16, 20; see also Rom. 11:9-10).

It is impossible, therefore, to dismiss the imprecatory psalms as OT morality, especially when we recall that the OT itself forbids vengeance and grudge-bearing (Lev. 19:17-18), teaches that the Lord hates violence (Ps. 5:6), and insists that vengeance must be left to him (Ps. 7:4; Prov. 20:22). Furthermore, the imprecatory psalms themselves cannot be treated as if they are somehow out of step with the rest of the OT or are perhaps exemplary of a lower morality than the OT came to hold; for alongside the imprecations, these very psalms display a spirituality we would covet (Ps. 139 is a case in point).

In a positive appraisal of the imprecatory psalms it must be noted first that all the imprecations are prayers. They are not a declaration of intent on the part of the psalmist, but a commitment of the problem to the Lord and a leaving of vengeance to him; they show an obedient faith godward and an unretaliatory intent manward. Second, the imprecations express a holy, moral indignation. These psalmists longed for the vin-dication of God's name (9:19–20; 83:16–17), and were lifted up to experience a perfect hatred (139:21–22). Third, the imprecations were expressed with realism: a realistic acceptance of what God had revealed of his certain judgment (cf. 109:13 with Exod. 20:5) and a realistic awareness of the outworking of just retribution in the experiences of this life (cf. Ps. 137:8–9, implying, "O how right he will be"). J. A. MOTYER

Imprecatory Psalms

See also GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF.

Bibliography. F. D. Kidner, Psalms; C. S. Lewis, Reflections on the Psalms; J. A. Motyer, New Bible Commentary Revised.

Imputation. A broad concept finding its theological center in the atonement. The Latin imputare literally means "to reckon," "to charge to one's account," and is an adequate rendering of the Greek term logizomai. This forensic notion of imputation has its partial roots in the commercial and legal language of the Greco-Roman world; those who have something imputed to them are accountable under the law. It is in this sense that Paul asks Philemon to have Onesimus's debts transferred to Paul (Philem. 18: "If he has done you any wrong . . . charge it to me"). Imputation also has its distinctively Hebraic roots (cf. ḥāšab, "to count for, to reckon"), being used, for example, in reference to the sacrificial system (cf. Lev. 7:18: "neither shall it be credited to him"; Lev. 17:4). It is also important to note that the OT uses the term to include even those judgments that have no direct, objective basis (e.g., Gen. 31:15: "Does he not regard us as foreigners?"; 2 Chron. 9:20).

In the NT, Christians are said to receive the "alien righteousness" of God as a "gift that came by the grace of the one man, Jesus Christ" (Rom. 5:15). Just as God reckoned Abraham as righteous on the basis of Abraham's belief alone (Gen. 15:6; Rom. 4:3), so others are similarly blessed as the Lord does not impute their iniquity to them (Ps. 32:1–2; Rom. 4:7–8). This divine judicial act is based, not on human merit, but on God's love (Rom. 5:6–8).

In arguing for a forensic, communal grace rooted solely in the Lord Jesus Christ, through whom we receive our reconciliation, Paul contrasts the work of Christ with the sin of Adam, by which sin, guilt, and death came into the world (Rom. 5:12–14). Just as it is in Christ that we are redeemed, so it is in Adam that we are judged sinners (Rom. 5:15–21; cf. 1 Cor. 15:21–22). The exact meaning of this comparison has caused heated debate through much of church history. Can it be said that humankind is judged according to an "alien guilt"? Is not such a notion irrational, harsh, arbitrary, and even fatalistic, not in keeping with the larger biblical witness that people act freely and are responsible for their own sins (cf. Ezek. 18:1–20)?

Pelagius in the fifth century substituted for the notion of imputation the less severe concept of imitation. He argued that as free and responsible agents who are born with the capacity not to sin, all people nevertheless sin concretely, following Adam's example. Pelagius was opposed by Augustine, and his view concerning human possibility has since been repeatedly rejected by the orthodox church (although it has proven a recurring notion, e.g., in Protestant liberalism).

How then is the imputation of Adam's sin to humankind to be understood? Some have argued that God's justice demands that imputation be considered not as forensic, but as real, all humankind having in fact sinned with Adam. Guilt thus is a proper guilt and in no sense alien. Such "realists," however, have difficulty in explaining how we might be actually present with Adam.

An alternate solution, one argued by the Westminster Confession, for example, is to understand Adam as our representative. God, in creating the human community, covenanted with all humanity through its head, Adam. The decision of the public figure Adam to sin is thus our decision as well, and his guilt, ours too. Such an explanation is often labeled federalism, after a federalist notion of government.

Although the exact nature of divine imputation remains a mystery, a biblically based understanding of the concept would want to maintain the following:

1. As formulated by Paul, the notion of imputation is included as part of a doxology to God for his grace in Christ. Imputation has to do ultimately with salvation, with our "alien righteousness," with being reckoned as if we were righteous.

2. Not only is Christ the theme of Paul's discussion, he is the starting point as well. Only in the context of God's yes to us on the cross (and in the law) do we understand the full horror of his no to humankind (Rom. 5:13). In Adam, God judged the entire human race guilty, but only in Jesus is this fact fully understood (cf. Jesus' cry, "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" Mark 15:34; cf. Isa. 53:4–6; 2 Cor. 5:21).

3. The doctrine of the imputation of sin has never had as its purpose the denial of personal freedom and guilt. Rather, it has been intended to emphasize universal complicity on the part of humanity. The notion of imputation provides sin neither an excuse nor an explication, only a judgment. We stand in need of God's grace (cf. Rom. 6:23).

4. The stress on the corporate and original nature of human sin, on the human solidarity of guilt, is but one pole of a full biblical understanding. Sin's social dimension needs the continual, yet paradoxical, balancing of sin's individual and personal dimensions (1 John 1:9–10). As fallen men and women, we live out a life of sin (i.e., of independence from God) and actualize our sins. Given God's judgment on humankind, God's alienation from us, we can only worship the creature and not the Creator. And yet, it is we who choose no longer to submit and to follow instead our independent passions.

5. The analogy between Adam and Christ is not simple or total. While the imputation of righteousness is arbitrary, a free and undeserved act of grace whose reality remains forensic, the imputation of guilt is appropriate, its consequence affirming the judgment. Paul himself emphasizes the danger of taking the analogy too far, distinguishing the "free gift" from the "trespass" (Rom. 5:15).

6. The divine imputation of sin and guilt, being a forensic act of God, needs have no objective basis in the life of the person (cf. 2 Cor. 5:21: "For our sake he made him [Christ] to be sin who knew no sin, so that in him [Christ] we might become the righteousness of God"). Nevertheless, the consistent biblical witness, validated by all who have followed after Adam, is that it does (cf. Rom. 3:23: "all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God"). God is not capricious, but righteous and loving (Ezek. 18:25–32). Humankind has not merely been declared guilty; it has acted out its guilt.

R. K. JOHNSTON

See also ADAM; FALL OF THE HUMAN RACE; SIN.

Bibliography. G. C. Berkouwer, Sin; H. W. Heidland, TDNT 4:284–92; A. A. Hodge, Atonement; J. Murray, Imputation of Adam's Sin.

Incarnation (Lat. in and carō, stem carn, meaning "flesh"). In the context of Christian theology, the act whereby the eternal Son of God, the Second Person of the Holy Trinity, without ceasing to be what he is, God the Son, took into union with himself what he before that act did not possess, a human nature, "and so [He] was and continues to be God and man in two distinct natures and one person, forever" (Westminster Shorter Catechism, Q. 21). Scripture support for this doctrine is replete, e.g., John 1:14; Romans 1:3–4; 8:3; Galatians 4:4; Philippians 2:6–8; 1 Timothy 3:16; 1 John 4:2; 2 John 7).

The Nature of the Incarnation. Like many other theological terms, this term can be misleading. It might suggest that the eternal Logos by the act of incarnation was confined to the human body of Jesus of Nazareth. The implication of such a construction of the result of the incarnation is that God the Son, kenotically "emptying" himself, divested himself of his attribute of being always and everywhere immediately present in his universe. But to hold such a view is tantamount to contending that he who enfleshed himself as Jesus of Nazareth, while doubtless more than man, is not quite God. Divine attributes are not, however, characteristics separate and distinct from God's essence that he can set aside when he desires. To the contrary, it is precisely the sum total of God's attributes that constitutes the essence of his deity and expresses his divine glory. Jesus, during the days of his flesh, claimed omnipresence for himself in Matthew 18:20 and 28:20. Recognizing this, the Council of Chalcedon (A.D. 451), whose creedal labors produced the christological definition that fixed the boundaries for all future discussion, declared that Jesus Christ possessed "two natures without confusion, without change, without division, without separation, the distinctiveness of the natures being by no means removed because of the union, but the properties of each nature being preserved" (emphasis added; cf. also Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion 2.13.4; Heidelberg Catechism, Q. 48). The doctrine, thus clarified, means that in the incarnation the divine Logos, while in the body of Jesus and personally united to it, is also beyond the bounds of the human nature he assumed.

It is very important, in light of what has just been said, to underscore that in the incarnation the divine Logos did not take into union with himself a human person; otherwise, he would have been two persons, two egos, with two centers of self-consciousness. The Scriptures will not tolerate such a view. Never does Jesus Christ, when referring to himself, say "we" or "us" or "our"; he always uses "I" or "me" or "my." What the divine Logos, who was already and eternally a person, did do, through the operation of the Holy Spirit, was to take into union with himself a human nature with the result that Jesus Christ was one person with a divine nature (i.e., a complex of divine attributes) and a human nature (i.e., a complex of human attributes). This is not to say that the human nature of Christ is impersonal; "the human nature of Christ was not for a moment impersonal. The Logos assumed that nature into personal subsistence with Himself. The human nature has its personal existence in the person of the Logos. It is in-personal rather than impersonal" (L. Berkhof). John Murray writes: "The Son of God did not become personal by incarnation. He became incarnate but there was no suspension of his divine self-identity."

The Effecting Means of the Incarnation. The means, according to Scripture, whereby the incarnation came about is the virginal conception of the Son of God by the Holy Spirit in the womb of Mary (Isa. 7:14; Matt. 1:16, 18, 20, 23, 25; Luke 1:27, 34–35; 2:5; 3:23; Gal. 4:4). The Holy Spirit in this way insured the divine personality of the God-man without creating at the same time a new human personality. As Berkhof says: "If Christ had been generated by man, He would have been a human person, included in the covenant of works, and as such would have shared the common guilt of mankind. But now that His subject, His ego, His person, is not out of Adam, He is not in the covenant of works and is free from the guilt of sin. And being free from the guilt of sin, His human nature could also be kept free, both before and after His birth, from the pollution of sin."

Incarnation

Scripture Representations of the Incarnate Person. Because Jesus Christ is the God-man (one person who took human nature into union with his divine nature in the one divine person), the Scriptures can predicate of his person whatever can be predicated of either nature. In fact, the person of Christ may be designated in terms of one nature while what is predicated of him so designated is true by virtue of his union with the other nature (cf. Westminster Confession, VIII, vii). In other words:

1. The person, and not a nature, is the subject of the statement when what is predicated of Christ is true by virtue of all that belongs to his person as essentially divine and assumptively human; e.g., redeemer, prophet, priest, and king.

2. The person, and not a nature, is the subject of the statement when what is predicated of him, designated in terms of what he is as human, is true by virtue of his divine nature; e.g., in Romans 9:5 Christ is designated according to his human nature ("Christ according to the flesh"), while what is predicated of him is true because of his divine nature ("God over all, forever praised"). The Scriptures do not confuse or intermingle the natures. It is the person of Christ who is always the subject of the scriptural assertions about him.

3. The person, and not a nature, is the subject of the statement when what is predicated of him, designated in terms of what he is as divine, is true by virtue of his human nature; e.g., in 1 Corinthians 2:8 Christ is designated according to his divine nature ("the Lord of glory"), while what is predicated of him is true because of his human nature (man "crucified" him). Again, there is no confusion here of the divine and human natures of Christ. It is not the divine nature as such which is crucified; it is the divine person, because he is also human, who is crucified.

R. L. REYMOND

See also CHRISTOLOGY.

Bibliography. L. Berkhof, Systematic Theology; C. Hodge, Systematic Theology; J. Murray, Collected Writings; R. L. Reymond, Jesus, Divine Messiah: The New Testament Witness; B. B. Warfield, Person and Work of Christ.

Inclusive Language. Gender-neutral and universally nonexclusive language in new versions of Scripture and liturgy used to replace masculine-oriented and favored-group language of traditional versions. Alterations range from modest adjustments that emphasize equality between men and women to radical changes in the language used for God and faith. Inclusivists offer alternate renderings, substitutions, and paraphrases to correct the inherent bias of the English language toward the masculine gender. An Inclusive-Language Lectionary, New Revised Standard Version of the Bible (NRSV) and New Testament and Psalms: An Inclusive Version (NTPIV) illustrate inclusive alternations.

Arguments in Favor. 1. The use of inclusive language avoids sexual bias. Sensing a danger of sexism inherent in the exclusive use of the masculine metaphor and its limitations to communicate God's feminine attributes, the NTPIV replaces "Father" with "Father-Mother" and "God." The exclusive and repeated use of the masculine metaphor can communicate a picture of God that ignores his feminine attributes (cf. Isa. 49:15 and Matt. 23:37). The NTPIV corrects the bias by translating the Lord's prayer "Our Father-Mother in heaven hallowed be your name." John 3:23 now reads, "But the hour is coming, and is now here, when the true worshipers will worship God [not "the Father"] in spirit and in truth, for God [not "the Father"] seeks such as these as worshipers." Including the feminine metaphor in prayer, the United Church of Christ's Book of Worship offers, "You [God] have brought us forth from the womb of your being."

2. New renderings improve a grammatical deficiency. The lack of a common-gender third person singular pronoun in the English language warrants substitutions that are gender inclusive. Where the intention of the third person singular pronoun is collective, plural substitutes help all people, men and women, identify with God's wholeness, not just his masculinity. For example, the NRSV translates Psalm 1:3, "They [not "he"] are like trees planted by streams of water, which yield their fruit in its season, and their leaves do not wither. In all they do, they [not "he"] prosper."

3. Inclusive alterations are more culturally relevant. Recent changes in the English language toward inclusive language call for similar changes in Scripture and liturgy. Firefighters are no longer called "firemen." Airline stewardesses are now called flight "attendants." The language of Scripture and liturgy previously influenced by a patriarchal culture should now reflect an egalitarian society. Therefore substituting "people" for "men," where "men" is used collectively, is faithful to the Scriptures' intent and reflects positive inclusive developments (cf. John 12:32 and Gal. 3:11 NRSV).

Arguments Against. 1. The mandates of inclusive language and accuracy in translating often stand in conflict. The preface of the NRSV includes the directive by the National Council of the United Church of Christ to depart from ordinary principles of translation, specifying, "masculine-oriented language should be eliminated as far as can be done without altering passages that reflect the historical situation of ancient patriarchal culture." However, crafting new inclusive metaphors and substitutions often sacrifices accuracy in translating. The Messianic prediction of Psalm 34:20 now reads, "He keeps all their [not "his"] bones" (NRSV), sacrificing the personal nature and prophetic intent of the text. The word "his" should be translated by a personal not a collective pronoun (cf. John 19:36). In Proverbs 5:21 the immediate application to a specific individual is obscured by changing singulars to plurals: "For human [not a "man's"] ways are before the eyes of the Lord, and he watches all their [not "his"] paths" (cf. Pss. 1:3; 91:15; Mark 10:39 and James 5:14-15). Luke 23:46 now reads, "Then Jesus, crying with a loud voice, said, Father-Mother [not "Father"], into your hands I commend my spirit. Having said this, Jesus died" (NTPIV). In these verses the accurate meaning and the original intent have been sacrificed by inclusive alterations.

2. Inclusive substitutions compromise orthodox theology. The holiness (separateness) of God is effectively communicated in the masculine metaphor. Although God is occasionally compared to a mother, he is never addressed as Mother or given a feminine title. Metaphor and simile differ both in function and effect. In metaphor the identity between the subject and the thing compared is assumed. Scripture teaches that God is Father and Jesus is the Son. A simile compares one aspect of something to another as in Isaiah 42:14, where God will "cry out like a woman in travail." Here God is not being identified with the figure of a woman but only one aspect of womanhood. Although God is exclusively identified by the masculine metaphor, he is not a male or sexual being. Sexuality is a structure of creation. John 4:24 says, "God is spirit." The male metaphor is qualified so that God is both identified by the masculine gender and yet distinguished from his creation. The "Father-Mother" metaphor and the idea that we have been brought forth "from the womb of your being" introduces sexual emphasis into deity where it has no place and identifies God too closely with his creation. The figures of carrying in the womb and giving birth convey that the creation has issued forth from the body of the deity and therefore shares in deity's substance. Ancient Egyptian and Canaanite religions taught that nature constituted the life and activity of their deities, who gave birth to the world through the sexual union of their gods and goddesses. Groves, pillars, and any natural object became mediums of revelation and worship (e.g., Ashtoreth, Canaanite and Mesopotamian astral worship). The holiness of God in relation to his creation is conveyed in the masculine metaphor and compromised by a feminine one.

The introduction of inclusive language also disrupts and alters the delicate balance between the three persons of the Trinity and the one essence of God's being. Matthew 28:19 now reads, "baptizing them in the name of the Father-Mother [not "Father"] and of the beloved Child [not "Son"] and of the Holy Spirit" (NTPIV). Also, when the metaphor "Mother" is introduced into Jesus' prayer of Luke 23:34 stating, "Then Jesus said, Father-Mother [not "Father"], forgive them; for they do not know what they are doing," the result is a theology compounded by pantheism and polytheism. The Trinity has been a touchstone of historic Christianity. Such changes mark a radical departure from orthodox faith.

3. Ideological alterations undermine the adequacy of revelation. Jesus Christ revealed God's identity as our heavenly Father. His words are the self-disclosure of God himself (cf. John 17:8), not those of one corrupted by patriarchal culture. Apart from Scripture, the biblical faith has no language for the divine. Crafting new metaphors and introducing new language that defines God and faith on the basis of preference calls into question the sufficiency of his Word. J. R. LINCOLN

Bibliography. E. Achtemeier, "Female Language for God: Should the Church Adopt It?," in Essays in Honor of James Luther Mays, D. G. Miller, ed.; D. G. Bloesch, Battle for the Trinity: The Debate Over Inclusive God-Language; Is the Bible Sexist?; D. A. Carson, Inclusive-Language Debate; V. Eller, Language of Canaan and the Grammar of Feminism; R. W. Jenson, "The Christian Doctrine of God" in Keeping the Faith, G. Wainwright, ed.; A. F. Kimel Jr., ed., Speaking the Christian God: The Holy Trinity and the Challenge of Feminism; P. Minear, "Changes in Metaphor Produce Changes in Thought," Presbyterian Outlook, Dec. 1983; T. Peters, "The Battle Over Trinitarian Language," Dialog 30 (Winter 1991); D. Sayers, "The Image of God" in Christian Letters to a Post-Christian World.

Indian Theology. The attempt to reformulate biblical theology in Indian categories of thought, in a manner relevant to the Indian context. Until recently Western theology has dominated the Indian theological scene, and Christianity has come under criticism from Hindu thinkers in this regard. The pioneers of Indian theology were not Christians but enlightened Hindus who came under the strong influence of Western thought and Christianity. These enlightened nationalists wanted to reform Hinduism and Indian society, thereby counterbalancing Christian missionary activities. For Indian Christian leaders, Indian theology is an attempt to meet the criticism that Christianity is a foreign and dangerous denationalizing force. It represents a search for and an expression of self-identity in India and in the field of Christian theology. It is an attempt to conceptualize the urge for being Christian and Indian simultaneously. It faces the challenges of re-nascent Hinduism in its relegation of Christianity to a subordinate status. Moreover it stands for the concern of Indian theologians to communicate the gospel in thought patterns familiar to the Indian mind. It is to present “the water of life in an Indian cup.”

Indian Theology

Trends in Indian Theology. No uniform pattern or common trends can be traced in Indian theology. Corresponding to the diversified historical context and socioreligious needs, there are varied theological expressions of response to the gospel.

1. There are attempts to harmonize Christianity, to be precise, Christ, with Hinduism. Ram Mohan Roy (1772–1833) the father of modern India, and his successor Keshab Chandra Sen (1838–84) interpreted Jesus in Indian traditions. Jesus is portrayed as an Asiatic. His ethical precepts, independent of his person, provide the way to happiness and peace. His “Divine Humanity” is explained within the framework of Hindu mystic traditions. Jesus Christ and the “best elements” of Christianity are conveniently accommodated under the wide umbrella of Hinduism. Because of the universalistic and absorptive features of Hinduism, no tension is experienced in this.

2. There is concern for dialogue. Christian theology in India finds itself in the midst of spirited and influential non-Christian religious systems, especially Hinduism, which claims the allegiance of eighty-four percent of Indians. Hindu religious-cultural factors have, therefore, played a decisive role in the emergence of several significant issues of Indian theology, for instance, the uniqueness and finality of Christ and the nature and scope of Christian mission. A viable base has been found in the NT synthesis of Hebrew and Greek culture for synthesizing Christian and Hindu culture in India. Hinduism and its scriptures are treated as counterparts to Judaism and the OT in relation to the gospel. God speaks equally through other religions also. P. D. Devanandan and Raymond Panikkar’s theologies emerge in this context of religious-cultural pluralism. They advocate letting Christ reform Hinduism from within and so unveil the Christ who is already present there, though hidden and unacknowledged.

3. There is frequently a polemic emphasis. God’s special revelation is essential for knowing the truth, and Jesus is this divine special revelation. Without him intuition and inspiration fall short of “the rock of Christ” in knowing the truth.

4. There is an apologetic emphasis. Renascent Hinduism stripped Christ and Christianity of everything that they claim and possess. Christ is made one among those who experienced the advaitic (monistic) experience. Christianity is treated as one of the earlier stages in the evolution of religion. The church has been accused of denationalism. The crucial issues reflected in Brahmabandab Upadhyaya’s theology are to be judged in this context. He reformulated the doctrine of the Trinity, portraying Christ as “nothing but the highest.” He was a Hindu-Catholic, i.e., at heart a Christian, yet culturally a Hindu.

5. There is concern for evangelism. Jesus Christ is not a monopoly of the West. He is equally for India too. There he is to be presented, not in Western robes and image, but in terms and thought-forms intelligible to the Indian mind. Sadhu Sunder Singh’s Christocentric theology is a conscious attempt toward this.

6. One finds emphasis on relevancy. Indian theologians want to erase the ghetto mentality of the minority Christians. Their task is to help Christians see themselves as an integral part of the larger community in India and participate in the common life and experience. The struggles for socioeconomic development and humanization are seen as “Christ at work today.” M. M. Thomas and others contend that Christian theology has to be relevant in this context, and therefore the contextual and social dimensions of the gospel are primary.

7. There is a concern for social justice and liberation. During the last decade a distinct form of “Indian Liberation Theology” has emerged. It is called Dalit Theology. This is a conscious attempt to move away from the traditional and philosophical Hindu categories to those of the “broken people”—the marginalized masses oppressed for centuries through the Hindu social scheme of varna (caste system). There is a strong anti-Hindu disposition here. Dalit theologians also claim that Dalit theology is truly national and indigenous in nature and scope.

Summary and Evaluation. These attempts to explain, interpret, and formulate the essentials of Christianity in Indian thought-patterns have enabled Indian thinkers to contribute something to Christian theology. While contributing to the field of apologetics, these attempts to wed faith with reason, revealed theology with natural theology, have had only partial success. It has, to an extent, made the gospel relevant in the context of Indian nationalism, religious-cultural pluralism, and socioeconomic development. It marks the beginning of Indian biblical scholarship and creative theological formulations. Yet none has managed to be faithful to Christian theology in its entirety, nor to the context and content simultaneously. Quite often “context” has become more decisive than the “text,” and this is critical. The final authority seems to rest upon context and not the Bible. More than the special revelation in Scripture, various social sciences influence and determine the content and scope of Indian theology. Instead of being theocentric, God in relation to man, it becomes more anthropocentric, man in relation to man or structures. However, no one philosophy or sociology can provide an adequate framework for Christian theology that is faithful to the revealed content of Scripture. The quest for relevance in theology, whether European, American, African, or Indian, should not be at the expense of commitment to the finality of the written and living Word. C. V. MATHEW

Bibliography. K. Baago, Pioneer in Indigenous Christianity; R. H. S. Boyd, Introduction to Indian Christian Theology; H. Burkle and W. M. W. Roth, eds., Indian Voices in Today's Theological Debate; A. P. Nirmal, ed., Towards a Common Dalit Ideology; M. M. Thomas, Acknowledged Christ of the Indian Renaissance.

Indulgences. The means by which the Roman Church claims to give remission before God of the temporal punishment due to sins, whose guilt has already been forgiven. The theology of this idea developed slowly in the Western church and from the sixteenth century in Roman Catholicism, it has often been the case that practice went ahead of theory. Further, the granting of indulgences has sometimes been the occasion of abuse and controversy, e.g., the famous controversy between Martin Luther and J. J. Tetzel in 1517 in Germany at the beginning of the Protestant Reformation.

Basic to the theology of indulgences is the distinction between eternal and temporal punishment due to sin. Roman Catholics believe that in absolution, given by the priest following repentance, the repentant sinner receives the remission of sins and removal of eternal punishment by God, for the sake of Jesus Christ. The matter of temporal punishment of sins remains, however, and this can only be removed by penitential acts and effort. It is here that indulgences are believed to function, in that the church (via the pope or a bishop) grants indulgences to cover all or part of the temporal punishment of sins. In the case of an indulgence granted to a soul in purgatory, the effect is to guarantee for that soul the intercession of the saints.

By what power does the church grant such indulgences? There is believed to exist a treasury of merits (those of Christ, the saints, and martyrs) available to the church in and through the communion of saints. The pope may make use of this merit and apply it via indulgences to Christian people in order to remit their temporal punishment. Since the Second Vatican Council the Roman Church has made efforts to revise and improve this whole system. P. TOON

See also ABSOLUTION; MERIT; PENANCE.

Bibliography. J. Neuner and J. Dupuis, eds., Christian Faith in the Doctrinal Documents of the Catholic Church; P. Schaff, Creeds of Christendom.

Inerrancy and Infallibility of the Bible. See BIBLE, INERRANCY AND INFALLIBILITY OF.

Infallibility. The state of being incapable of error. The word "infallible" occurs in the KJV in Acts 1:3 with reference to proofs of the resurrection of Christ. There is no corresponding word in the Greek, however, and it is omitted in later versions.

That the revelation of God in Jesus Christ is infallible, in the general sense that it presents mankind with the infallible way of salvation, would be accepted by all Christians, but the set of infallibility is a matter of controversy. Three main lines of thought may be discerned, corresponding to the three main divisions of Christendom. The Eastern Orthodox Church believes that general councils of the Church are guided by the Holy Spirit so as not to err; the Roman Catholic Church believes that the pope is personally preserved from error by God; and Protestant thought relies on the sufficiency of Holy Scripture as the guide to God's self-revelation. We can relate these three theories in the following way. Christians of all traditions accord to Holy Scripture a unique place in the determination of the gospel, and there exists an extensive body of common belief derived from it. This common belief is further described and defined by the councils held in the early centuries, four of which at any rate command universal approval. The Orthodox Church continues to rely on councils, the Latin Church has finally come to define the seat of infallibility as the papacy, while Protestants look to the Scriptures as the ultimate source of authority. Particular attention must be given to the doctrine of papal infallibility, and the Protestant doctrine of the sufficiency and supremacy of Scripture.

The doctrine of the infallibility of the pope was defined by the Roman Catholic Church in the year 1870. It declares that the pope is enabled by God to express infallibly what the church should believe concerning questions of faith and morals when he speaks in his official capacity as "Christ's vicar on earth," or ex cathedra.

Behind this dogma lie three assumptions that are disputed by other Christians: (1) Christ established an office of "vicar" for his church on earth; (2) this office is held by the bishop of Rome; and (3) Christ's vicar is infallible in his declarations of faith and morals. The grounds upon which the Church of Rome bases these assumptions may be summarized as follows: (1) Our Lord's saying to Peter recorded in Matthew 16:18, "You are Peter, and on this rock I will build my church," implies that Christ made Peter the head of the church, or his "vicar on earth." (2) Peter was bishop at Rome, and thereby constituted this see the supreme bishopric over the church, transmitting to his successors the prerogative of being Christ's vicar. (3) The vicar of Christ must be infallible by the very nature of the case. All three arguments are necessary to the doctrine of papal infallibility, and all three display a fallibility which makes it impossible for the Orthodox and Protestant churches to accept them.

Infallibility

Recently, Roman Catholic attitudes toward papal infallibility have shifted somewhat in response to ecumenical dialogue, historical investigation, and most recently Hans Küng's work. Küng's challenge, provoked by the papal ruling on contraception, set off a large and still unresolved debate inside Catholicism. Küng argued that the papal teaching office (magisterium) has in fact made many contradictory and erroneous rulings over the centuries, and that Catholics should therefore speak only of an "indefectibility of the Church," a position strikingly similar to that of some Protestants, as many Catholics pointed out. The debate has forced all Catholics to define more clearly just what papal infallibility entails, thus cutting back many exaggerated notions of it; and many progressive Catholics have sought to include bishops, theologians, and even the whole church in their notion of an infallibly preserved tradition of the true faith. In the meantime historians have shown that the indefectibility of the church was the received view in the West down to about 1200, slowly replaced then by the infallibility of the church and finally by the infallibility of the papacy, a position first proposed around 1300 but hotly debated in the schools and never officially sanctioned until 1870.

When we turn to Protestant or evangelical thought on this matter, we find that, in so far as it is used at all, infallibility is ascribed to the OT and NT Scriptures as the prophetic and apostolic record. The Scriptures are infallible in a fourfold sense: (1) the word of God infallibly achieves its end; (2) it gives us reliable testimony to the saving revelation and redemption of God in Christ; (3) it provides us with an authoritative norm of faith and conduct; and (4) there speaks through it the infallible Spirit of God by whom it is given.

In recent years concentration upon historical and scientific questions, and suspicion of the dogmatic infallibility claimed by the papacy, has led to severe criticism of the whole concept even as applied to the Bible; and it must be conceded that the term itself is not a biblical one and does not play any great part in actual Reformation theology. Yet in the senses indicated it is well adapted to bring out the authority and authenticity of Scripture. The church accepts and preserves the infallible Word as the true standard of its apostolicity; for the Word itself, that is, Holy Scripture, owes its infallibility not to any intrinsic or independent quality but to the divine subject and author to whom the term infallibility may properly be applied.

W. C. G. PROCTOR AND J. VAN ENGEN

See also EX CATHEDRA; PAPACY; PETER, PRIMACY OF; ROMAN CATHOLICISM.

Bibliography. H. Küng, Infallible?; G. Salmon, Infallibility of the Church; B. B. Warfield, Inspiration and Authority of the Bible.

Infant Baptism. See BAPTISM, INFANT.

Infant Salvation. The possibility of the salvation of infants, recognized from the earliest times of the NT church. Irenaeus, for instance, includes "infants and children" among those whom Christ came to save. The changing doctrine of the church, whereby the kingdom of God was identified with the external church, and the widespread acceptance of the belief that outside the visible church there could be no salvation, gave rise to the doctrine that baptism, the sacrament of admission to the external church, was necessary to salvation. No unbaptized infant therefore could be saved, although, in the view of medieval churchmen, the sufferings of lost infants are less intense than those of lost adults. Furthermore, Thomas Aquinas and others admitted the possibility that stillborn infants of Christian parents might, in the grace of God, be sanctified and saved in a way unknown to us.

The Council of Trent, which defined the position of the papal church as against the Protestant position, committed the Church of Rome to the view that infants dying unbaptized were damned, although it did not express a definite view as to the kind and degree of their punishment. Moreover, the belief was expressed that the desire and intention of godly parents to have their children baptized might be accepted in lieu of actual baptism in the case of stillborn babes. Eusebius Amort (1758) taught that God might be moved by prayer to grant salvation to such infants extrasacramentally. The inconclusiveness of the Tridentine declarations leaves the way open for widely differing conceptions as to what is to be understood by the exclusion of unbaptized children from heaven.

The Augsburg Confession commits Lutheranism to the view that baptism is necessary to salvation, although, in modification of this position, Lutheran theologians have taught that "the necessity of baptism is not intended to be equalized with that of the Holy Ghost." Luther believed that God would accept the intention to baptize the infant in lieu of actual baptism where circumstances made the latter impossible. Later Lutherans adopt the more cautious attitude that it would be wrong to assume that all unbaptized infants, including children of those who are outside the church, are lost. While not committing themselves to a belief in the salvation of all children dying in infancy, they tend to regard it as an uncontradicted hope.

The Reformed doctrine of the church carried with it a distinctive doctrine of infant salvation. The church of Christ being, not an external organization, but the true people of God everywhere, it follows that membership in this community is acquired, not by the external act of baptism, but by the internal action of the Holy Spirit in regenerating the soul. Zwingli took the position that all children of believers dying in infancy are saved, for they were born within the covenant, the promise being to believers and to their children (Acts 2:39). He even inclined to the view that all children dying in infancy are elect and saved. John Owen, a good spokesman of Puritan Calvinism, expressed the belief that infants may have an interest in the covenant even through more remote forebears than parents. And, since the grace of God is free and not tied to any condition, he has no doubt that many infants are saved whose parents are not believers. Whatever differing shades of opinion may be found in Reformed teaching with regard to infant salvation, the Reformed Confessions agree in teaching the possibility of infants being saved “by Christ through the Spirit, who worketh when, and where, and how he pleaseth” (Westminster Confession). They do not give confessional authority to the Zwinglian supposition that death in infancy may be taken as a sign of election, and thus of salvation, but with reverent caution assert only that for which they can claim the clear authority of Holy Scripture, namely, that all elect children shall be saved by God’s mysterious working in their hearts although they are incapable of the response of faith. They have no claim, in themselves, to salvation, but are, as in the case of saved adults, the subjects of the sovereign election of grace, and the purchase of the redeeming blood of Christ.

G. N. M. COLLINS

See also BAPTISM, INFANT; LIMBO

Bibliography. A. A. Hodge, Class Book on the Confession of Faith; C. Hodge, Systematic Theology; B. B. Warfield, Studies in Theology.

Infralapsarianism (Lat. for “after the fall,” sometimes designated “sublapsarianism”). A part of the doctrine of predestination, specifically that which relates to the decrees of election and reprobation. The issues involved are God’s eternal decrees and man’s will—how can the one be affirmed without denying the other. If one argues for God’s predetermination of humanity’s fate, this tends to deny free will and threatens to make God responsible for sin. On the other hand, if one argues for the freedom of the human will, thus making people responsible for sin, this can threaten the sovereignty and power of God, since his decrees then are contingent upon humankind’s decision. The dilemma is not new. Pelagius and Augustine argued over the issue at the Synod of Orange, 529, which sided with Augustine. In the Middle Ages, Duns Scotus and William of Ockham questioned Augustine’s position. Erasmus and Luther argued the issue in Freedom of the Will and Bondage of the Will. Melancthon got involved and was accused by Flacius of synergism, and by the end of the sixteenth century the position of Arminius stirred the controversy among the Reformed, who attempted to resolve the issue at the Synod of Dort.

What is the order of the eternal decrees of God? Infralapsarians argue for this order:

- (1) God decreed the creation of humanity—a good, blessed creation, not marred or flawed.
- (2) God decreed that humanity would be allowed to fall through its own self-determination.
- (3) God decreed to save some of the fallen.
- (4) God decreed to leave the rest to their just fate of condemnation.
- (5) God provided the Redeemer for the saved.
- (6) God sent the Holy Spirit to effect redemption among the saved.

The key to the order of the decrees is that God decreed election to salvation after the fall—not before; hence the name of the view “infralapsarianism.” The supralapsarian view would offer an order in which the decree for election and reprobation occurs before the creation. Those on both sides of the issue cite weighty arguments for their positions, quote Scripture as a foundation, and comb through Augustine, Calvin, and others for support. Generally most Reformed assemblies have refused to make either infra- or supralapsarianism normative, although the tendency has been to favor the former without condemning those who hold to the latter.

R. V. SCHNUCKER

See also ARMINIUS, JAMES; CALVINISM; DECREES OF GOD; DORT, SYNOD OF; ORDER OF SALVATION; PREDESTINATION; SUPRALAPSARIANISM.

Inheritance. Property or other possessions received by an heir. The OT terms for heir and inheritance do not necessarily bear the special sense of hereditary succession and possession, although they are found in laws concerning succession to the headship of the family, with consequent control of the family property (Gen. 15:3–5; Num. 27:1–11; 36:1–12; Deut. 21:15–17). The main roots are nāḥal (the substantival form, naḥālā, occurs nearly two hundred times), and yāras. Both signify possession in a general sense, though the former means receiving as one’s share by lot. Hēleq, “portion,” has the same idea.

A development of thought and a spiritualizing of the concept of inheritance is apparent in the OT. From the first, the inheritance promised by Yahweh to Abraham and his descendants was the land of Canaan (Gen. 12:7; 15:18–21; 26:3; 28:13; Exod. 6:8). Israel’s possession of the land rested solely on the gift of Yahweh, and, though only entered into with hard fighting, was not theirs by self-effort (Josh. 21:43–45; Ps. 44:3). Furthermore, the inheritance had to be divided by lot among the tribes, the allotting having divine sanction (Num. 26:52–56; 33:54; 34:13; Josh. 14:1–12; 18:4–10). The land was to be possessed “for ever” (Gen. 13:15), yet continued enjoyment and possession was conditional upon faithfulness to God (Deut. 4:26–31; 11:8–9). Although given to Israel, the land also remained the inheritance of Yahweh, his special portion out of all the earth (Exod. 15:17; Lev. 25:23; 1 Sam. 26:19; 2 Sam. 21:3; Ps. 79:1; Jer. 2:7).

Inheritance

Alongside and developing from this concept of the land as Jehovah’s inheritance is the thought that Israel, whom he has chosen and put in the land, was also his inheritance (Deut. 4:20; 7:6; 32:9). Likewise, Israel, and particularly the faithful of the nation, came to regard Yahweh himself, and not merely the land, as their inheritance (Pss. 16:5; 73:26; Lam. 3:24). Indeed, the Levites never had any inheritance but Yahweh and the tithe (Num. 18:20–26). However, the earlier thought of the possession of the land was not lost, for in the messianic kingdom such possession is envisaged (Ps. 37:9; Isa. 60:21).

In the NT heir and inheritance represent kléronomos, kléronomia, and derivatives (also used in LXX for nāḥal and yāraš). So basic an idea in the Old Covenant as inheritance must have its counterpart in the New Covenant. The Epistle to the Hebrews, particularly, shows that as Israel received her inheritance, so in the New Covenant a better inheritance is to be possessed by the New Israel. Furthermore, as is to be expected, the inheritance is “in Christ.” In Mark 12:1–11 Christ claims to be the heir of God. This is confirmed in Hebrews 1:2 and implied in Romans 8:17. Here, more clearly than nāḥal or yāraš, kléronomos conveys the thought of hereditary possession. Romans 8:17 shows that those “in Christ” are joint heirs with Christ of the inheritance. Whereas the inheritance is his by right, in that he is the only begotten Son, it is possessed by the believer by grace, as he is adopted as a son in Jesus Christ.

The inheritance is the kingdom of God with all its blessings (Matt. 25:34; 1 Cor. 6:9; Gal. 5:21). While enjoyment of it begins in this life, insofar as the kingdom is already present, the full possession must be future (Rom. 8:17–23; 1 Cor. 15:50; Heb. 11:13–16; 1 Pet. 1:3–4).
R. C. CRASTON

Bibliography. W. D. Davies, Gospel and the Land; W. Foerster and J. Herrmann, TDNT 3:758–785; J. D. Hester, St. Paul’s Concept of Inheritance; W. Mundle, NIDNTT 2:295–304; J. Schneider, TDNT 4:594–598.

Inheritance of Adam’s Sin. See IMPUTATION; SIN.

Iniquity. See SIN.

Inner Light. See FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF.

Inner Man (Gr. ho esō anthrōpos). A term used by Paul in Romans 7:22; 2 Corinthians 4:16; and Ephesians 3:16 to express graphically the human focus of God’s work of regeneration. We should probably not understand him to be referring specifically to certain distinct areas lying near the center of the human personality. The term is deliberately vague and is used to express two paradoxical ideas:

1. The work of God is at present secret, to be revealed at the eschaton. In 2 Corinthians 4–5 Paul is afflicted, persecuted, yet possesses the treasure of the gospel (4:7–10), his eyes fixed on the unseen reality of future transformation (4:18–5:5). In Romans 7 he describes a torturing moral conflict arising from the godward orientation of the “inner man or person,” against which other instincts within him strive. This conflict too will only be resolved at the end (Rom. 8:11, 23).

2. The work of God must embrace the whole of one’s nature, penetrating every corner of the person. Ephesians 3:16 literally runs, “that he may grant you . . . to be strengthened through his Spirit into the inner man”: “into” expresses this penetration. Thus “inner man” means “the whole/essential person viewed from the perspective of God’s secret work of transformation.”
S. MOTYER

See also MANKIND, DOCTRINE OF.

Bibliography. J. Behm, TDNT 2:698–99; R. Jewett, Paul’s Anthropological Terms; W. D. Stacey, Pauline View of Man.

Inspiration, Plenary. See PLENARY INSPIRATION.

Inspiration, Verbal. See VERBAL INSPIRATION.

Inspiration of the Bible. See BIBLE, INSPIRATION OF.

Integrative Theology. See THEOLOGY, INTEGRATIVE.

Intercession. See PRAYER.

Intercession of Christ. See OFFICES OF CHRIST.

Intermediate State. The period between death as an individual phenomenon and the final judgment and consummation. If Christian thought held to no final state of affairs for all creation, then perhaps one’s final situation could be conceived as being settled at death, as in Greek philosophy. However, Christian creeds have always affirmed the resurrection of the body, the judgment of the living and the dead, and life everlasting. To affirm that each individual’s destiny is caught up in the triumph of God in Christ has created the distinct possibility of reflection upon the individual's situation between death and that future event.

In the NT. The NT offers no sustained reflection on the intermediate state, and this is probably because the parousia was perceived as so real and imminent that it would have seemed irrelevant to reflect upon the state of the dead. In 1 Thessalonians 4:13–18 we find exactly this sort of thinking. Paul is here assuring the believers that those who are “asleep” in Christ have not lost out on the “day of the Lord.” Indeed, “the dead in Christ will rise first.” We need only note that the reflection here is not upon the present situation of “sleeping” Christians, but upon their future place in the parousia.

A further reason for the absence of reflection on the intermediate state could well be the profound awareness of human wholeness. Salvation is never the extrication of the soul from the body for participation in ethereal bliss. We can see this awareness reflected in 2 Corinthians 5:1–10. Here Paul refers to the intermediate state paradoxically as being “unclothed” (v. 4) and as being “at home with the Lord” (v. 8). His true longing and expectation is that at the parousia he will put on his “heavenly dwelling” by being “swallowed up by life” (vv. 2–4). To die is “gain” because it is a departure to “be with Christ” (Phil. 1:21–23), yet Paul is only too clear that his hope is set upon the triumph of Christ when the last enemy, death, is destroyed (1 Cor. 15:20–27). Salvation is ultimately resurrection (Rom. 8:18–23).

It should be noted that some have been so keenly aware of the importance of the parousia, the emphasis on human wholeness in Scripture, and the paucity of reflection on the intermediate state that other positions have been taken. Luther seemed sympathetic with the notion that the intermediate state was a kind of sleep, or soul sleep. The parousia was a real awakening. Others have so emphasized our body/soul unity that death is seen to be total; the parousia would then be the re-creation of our body/soul.

Perhaps the classic text contesting such views of soul sleep and the like is the parable of the rich man and Lazarus (Luke 16:19–31). Here we are given a unique (in the Bible) and vivid picture of the intermediate state in which destinies are fixed, bliss and torment are apportioned, and a “great chasm has been fixed” between the blessed and damned. Recent scholarship has made it clear that the imagery depicting these contrasting fates was part of the popular lore of the time. Further, once this is understood, the real, final focus of the parable comes to light, namely the fate of the five remaining brothers and their self-pandering unbelief. With their lifestyle they have shut themselves out of the possibility of hearing the Word of God. Perhaps the most such imagery is intended to teach is the real and eternal consequences resulting from our beliefs and consequent life styles. If we are rightly cautioned against pushing the imagery beyond Jesus' intention, we must also resist the claim that it has no meaning. If that were true, what would Jesus have meant when he said, “Today you will be with me in Paradise” (Luke 23:43)?

Purgatory. There has been a tragic side to the history of reflection on the intermediate state, in the emergence of the doctrine of purgatory. Purgatory in Roman Catholic thought developed during the Middle Ages and hardened into dogma in reaction to the Protestant rejection of it. The Council of Trent (1545–63) declared that those who reject the doctrine of purgatory are “anathema,” accursed. Purgatory is the doctrine that the intermediate state is not only the place of fixed blessing and torment, but primarily the place of passage by punishment toward blessing as postbaptismal sins are atoned for. Since some sins are more grievous than others, the time of punishment varies. The church here “below” can also aid those being punished through prayers and masses. Even outright absolution has been granted through the exercise of the power of the keys of Peter by the pope. Recent Roman Catholic thought has seen purgatory in more positive terms as a preparing, cleansing, or maturing transition from life on earth to the joys of heaven.

This doctrine can be seen as a distortion of biblical truth for several reasons: (1) Clear scriptural warrant is absent. The only possibly supportive text is in the Apocrypha (2 Macc. 12:43–45). (2) The doctrine reflects an unacceptable ecclesiastical hubris that would claim to have clout in heaven concerning the extent of punishment of those already dead. This deprives God of his freedom and majesty as Judge. (3) The doctrine reflects the loss of the triumphant awareness of the eschatological reality of justification through the cross of Christ. “There is therefore now no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus” (Rom. 8:1 RSV).

The doctrine of purgatory reflects pastoral problems relating to an earlier age in which church and society were coterminous and all baptism was of infants. How are postbaptismal sins to be dealt with and how is divine justice to be related to this form of sin of those who are dead? The theory of purgatory said, “You will not be lost, yet God will be just.” At the present time, with much awareness of life as a process or evolution, purgatory has also allowed for speculation about the continued development of the soul. As such, it continues to be attractive for some in a greatly modified form.

Spirits in Prison. A further area of reflection has concerned itself with the language of 1 Peter 3:18–22 and 4:6 about the preaching by the Crucified to the “spirits in prison.” This imagery has been rather naturally related to the question of the state of all those who never heard the gospel, infants, and the impaired. Does (or did) Christ preach to these so that they too have the opportunity of belief? Is this what is behind the phrase “descended into hell”? It certainly has been interpreted this way from Origen to Luther (Calvin saw this phrase as a theological reflection on the meaning of Christ’s death).

Intermediate State

The reference to spirits in prison brings us to the biblical teaching that is the backdrop for the doctrine of the intermediate state, the OT doctrine of Sheol, translated Hades in the NT. Strictly speaking the early OT concept of Sheol is not part of the intermediate state. Here Sheol is either the grave or the realm of the dead where there is the absence of all we know as life, yet existence continues. Sheol is pictured as a gloomy prison where there is no hope (Job 17:13–16), an insatiable monster (Prov. 30:15–16). However, elsewhere in the OT this is not all. Hope reaches beyond Sheol to rejoice in a future in the presence of God (Pss. 49:15; 73:24–26). As the full apocalyptic vision of a final judgment emerges in Daniel 12:2–3, Sheol has become the intermediate state. In the era between the Testaments, distinctions within Sheol emerged, and Sheol became separate from paradise, yet connected. We see this in the parable discussed. Finally, the vision of the book of Revelation sees Sheol (Hades) as being destroyed in the lake of fire (Rev. 20:14). This vision of the final judgment answers the cry of the souls of the martyred witnesses to Christ, “How long . . . until you judge?” (Rev. 6:10). This last judgment will not be rendered till death and Hades gave up the dead in them (Rev. 20:13).

The intermediate state remains an area of inevitable concern for Christians both for practical pastoral reasons and as part of the meaning of salvation. However, it should remain clear that the hope of the Christian focuses on the parousia of Christ and the new creation. Speculation on the intermediate state should never diminish the certainty that flows from the cross or the hope in the new creation.

S. M. SMITH

See also DESCENT INTO HELL; PARADISE; PURGATORY; SECOND CHANCE; SOUL SLEEP; SPIRITS IN PRISON.

Bibliography. H. Berkhof, Well-Founded Hope; J. Calvin, Psychopannychia; R. H. Charles, Eschatology; K. Hahnhart, Intermediate State in the New Testament; M. J. Harris, Raised Immortal; A. A. Hoekema, Bible and the Future; D. Moody, Hope of Glory; H. Schwarz, On the Way to the Future; H. B. Swete, Life of the World to Come.

Internal Calling. See CALL, CALLING.

Internal Testimony of the Holy Spirit. The theological designation of the Holy Spirit’s activity in bringing about the believing acknowledgment of Scripture’s inherent authority. It thus identifies one of the many facets of the illuminating work of the Spirit by which the eyes of a sinner’s heart are enlightened (Eph. 1:17–18) to receive and respond to God’s word. In the succinct description of the Westminster Confession, “Our full persuasion and assurance of the infallible truth and divine authority [of Scripture], is from the inward work of the Holy Spirit bearing witness by and with the Word in our hearts” (1.5).

The doctrine of the internal testimony goes back in some form to Augustine and other patristic theologians. It became part of the general Protestant perspective, and was given its clearest expression by John Calvin in the Institutes of the Christian Religion (1.7–9). Since Calvin, it is generally known by the Latin term testimonium Spiritus sancti internum, and the doctrine has become part of such Reformed confessions as the French (4), Belgic (5), Second Helvetic (1), and Westminster (1.5). In those confessions the internal testimony is more closely tied to the believer’s acknowledgment of the canon and the infallibility of Scripture than it was in Calvin’s Institutes of the Christian Religion and in the draft he personally submitted to the synod which adopted the French Confession in 1559. The doctrine is also implied in the Formula of Concord (2.2), is included in the works of Arminius (1.40), and found a place in several early Baptist confessions.

Although the words are not found directly in Scripture, the doctrine of the internal testimony of the Holy Spirit rests on the pervasive witness of Scripture to the depravity of the sinner’s heart and mind and to the necessity of the Holy Spirit’s work in bringing such sinners to faithful obedience to Christ and the Word. The whole of 1 Corinthians 2 is relevant. Paul emphasizes that “the man without the Spirit does not accept the things that come from the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness to him, and he cannot understand them, because they are spiritually discerned” (2:14). The Spirit, however, enables such sinners to “understand what God has freely given us” (2:12) and gives believers “the mind of Christ” (2:16). Some related passages are John 16:13–15; 1 Thess. 1:5; and 1 John 2:20, 27.

Calvin and the Reformed confessions distinguish the internal testimony of the Holy Spirit from three alternative sources posited by the Roman Catholics, the Anabaptists, and the apologetic appeal to reason, respectively. Roman Catholicism, at least in practice, based a believer’s certainty concerning the authority of Scripture on the testimony of the church (cf. Institutes of the Christian Religion 1.7.1–3). On the other hand, Anabaptists claimed new revelation by the Spirit to create this certainty (cf. Institutes of the Christian Religion 1.9). Others attempted to establish credibility in Scripture by apologetic arguments developed largely from extrabiblical materials and which appealed to human reason for conviction. Both Calvin and the Reformed confessions also reject that approach (Institutes of the Christian Religion 1.8; Belgic, 5; Westminster, 1.5). Calvin acknowledged that such “secondary aids to our feebleness” may be useful if “they follow that chief and highest testimony” of the Holy Spirit (1.8.13). However, the attempt “to prove to unbelievers that Scripture is the Word of God” is to act foolishly “for only by faith can this be known” and that is the result of the Spirit’s testimony (1.8.13).

This doctrine of the internal testimony should not be confused with the Barthian view that regards Scripture as a fallible witness to revelation and acknowledges authoritative revelation only in an ever-recurring, present act of God. It should also be distinguished from existentialist views of revelation as well as from mystical and pietistic claims to new revelation. On the other hand, the classic doctrine may not be used to exclude the role of solid exegesis of the biblical text and of sound hermeneutical principles for biblical interpretation.

The internal testimony of the Holy Spirit is related to, but distinguished from, both the text of Scripture and the subjective conviction of the believer. The internal testimony relates to the external testimony of Scripture itself; it does not bring new revelation to supplement Scripture. Scripture clearly testifies to its own inspiration and authority. It is self-authenticating (autopiston), inherently authoritative. The Spirit’s internal testimony does not make Scripture authoritative; rather, it contributes to the believer’s conviction that Scripture is truly what it claims to be. Thus the same Spirit who inspired the authoritative Word awakens that conviction and acknowledgment in a sinner’s heart through this internal testimony “by and with the Word.”

The Spirit’s internal testimony is a divine activity and should not be confused with the believer’s experience of it. The Spirit’s activity in the sinful heart is the cause; the believer’s deep-rooted experience is the subjective result. The experience brings firm conviction, but the experience itself may not be appealed to as evidence of the truth of one’s convictions; it may legitimately be referred to only as an explanation of how that conviction arose within one’s heart. The Spirit testifies “by and with the Word”; hence the biblical text must be appealed to as evidence for the truth of personal conviction. Word and Spirit are correlative in bringing the subjective conviction; they may not be separated in accounting for that conviction.

The experience resulting from the Spirit’s internal testimony is a firm conviction, however, not mere subjective feeling. Calvin described it as “a conviction that requires no reasons,” as “a knowledge with which the best reason agrees,” and as knowledge in “which the mind truly reposes more securely and constantly than in any reasons” (1.7.5). Nor is it an experience restricted to only a few; it is a conviction that every “believer experiences within himself,” although Calvin adds, “my words fall far beneath a just explanation of the matter” (1.7.5). F. H. KLOOSTER

See also ILLUMINATION.

Bibliography. A. Kuyper, Work of the Holy Spirit; J. Murray, “The Attestation of Scripture,” in Infallible Word; B. Ramm, Witness of the Spirit; P. Schaff, Creeks of Christendom; B. B. Warfield, Calvin and Calvinism.

Interpretation of the Bible. An explanation of what is not immediately plain in the Bible. Because of the multifaceted character of the Bible, its interpretation takes a variety of forms. The biblical documents are ancient, written in Hebrew, Aramaic, and Greek at various times between 1200 B.C. (if not earlier) and A.D. 100, reflecting several different historical and cultural settings. A basic requirement for the understanding of these documents is their grammatico-historical interpretation or exegesis—bringing out of the text the meaning the writers intended to convey and which their readers were expected to gather from it. This grammatico-historical exegesis is commonly practiced in the classroom, and is distinguished from exposition, which is more appropriate to the pulpit. Exposition aims to apply the text and its meaning to men and women today, enabling them to answer the question: What message has this for us, or for me, in the present situation? To be valid, exposition must be firmly based on exegesis: the meaning of the text for hearers today must be related to its meaning for the hearers to whom it was first addressed. The study of the principles of interpretation—both the grammatico-historical interpretation and the practical application of that interpretation in the pulpit—is called hermeneutics.

Grammatico-historical Exegesis. Each biblical document, and each part of a biblical document, must be studied in its context—both its immediate literary context and the wider situation in which it appeared. This calls for an understanding of the following elements:

The Biblical Languages. One must study not merely vocabulary, but how structure, from syllable to discourse level, affects the meaning.

The Types of Literature Represented. Unless the literary character of a document is obvious from the first, one must ask whether it is prose or poetry, history or allegory, literal or symbolic. Some genres found in the Bible have peculiar features not readily paralleled elsewhere and call for special rules of interpretation (e.g., prophecy and apocalyptic).

Interpretation of the Bible

The Historical Background. A sense of history, such as the biblical writers themselves had, is necessary for the understanding of their writings. The historical background is the whole span of Near Eastern civilization from the early fourth millennium B.C. to the period of the widest expansion of the Roman Empire (under Trajan, A.D. 98–117). The changes within this time span were so sweeping that a biblical document can be misinterpreted if it is related to the wrong chronological setting. An appreciation of this fact will save us from judging precepts and actions of the Late Bronze Age by the ethical principles of the Sermon on the Mount. Again, the book of Jeremiah may yield some devotional profit even when one ignores the revolutionary movements that took place during the prophet's ministry, but the book could not be expounded adequately without some appraisal of those movements and their relation to Jeremiah's message.

The Geographical Conditions. The influence of climate and terrain on the outlook and behavior patterns of a population is of the greatest importance. The religious conflicts of OT times cannot be understood apart from some acquaintance with Palestinian geography. The prevalent Baal worship resulted from the fact that Palestine depended for its fertility on regular rainfall (cf. Deut. 11:10–17; Jer. 14:22; Hos. 2:8). To the Canaanites, Baal was the rain god who fertilized the earth, and his worship was a magical ritual designed to make the rain fall and the crops grow. It was difficult for the Israelites, after their settlement in Canaan, to grasp the lesson that the God of their fathers, who had provided for them in the wilderness, was equally able to provide for them in this new environment—that it was he, and not Baal, who sent the rain and gave them good harvests. So much of the biblical language, literal and metaphorical, has direct reference to geographical conditions that a knowledge of these conditions is indispensable for understanding the language.

The Life Setting. What kind of people were those whom we meet in the Bible? The effort to get under their skin and see through their eyes is not easy, but it is necessary if we are to gain a sympathetic understanding of their unquestioned assumptions, their actions and words, their loves and hates, their motives and aspirations. Here trustworthy descriptions of everyday life in biblical times can be very helpful.

Theological Exegesis. For those who accept the Bible as a sacred text, the church's book, the record of God's unique self-revelation, its interpretation cannot be conducted on the grammatico-historical level alone. That level is fundamental, but there is a theological level. The books of the Bible do not simply constitute an anthology or a library; they make up a canon—a canon in two stages: the canon of the Hebrew Scriptures (common to Jews and Christians) and the canon of the Greek New Testament (recognized by the church). Thus, in addition to the forms of context of which grammatico-historical exegesis takes account, the whole canon provides a theological context within which each document may be viewed and its contribution to the record of divine revelation and of human response to that revelation may be assessed. Whereas grammatico-historical exegesis may bring out the variety of viewpoint and emphasis represented in the Bible, theological exegesis presupposes that there is an overall unity in the light of which the diversity can be appreciated in its proper perspective.

Jewish Exegesis. In traditional Jewish exegesis of the Hebrew Scriptures, the Prophets and the Writings were treated largely as commentaries on the Torah. Alongside the surface meaning of the text, the pēšat, was the more extended application, the dēraš, which might appear farfetched at times, but not more so than the allegorization practiced in Alexandrian Judaism and in many areas of the Christian church. Leading rabbis set forth certain rules to be followed in scriptural interpretation: Hillel (ca. 10 B.C.) propounded seven, Ishmael (ca. A.D. 100) thirteen, and Eliezer ben Yose (ca. A.D. 150) thirty-two. These remained normative into medieval times.

Early Christian Exegesis. The NT writers treat the OT oracles as a unity, teaching the way of salvation through faith in Jesus Christ and providing believers with all that is needed for the service of God (2 Tim. 3:15–17). The basis of this unity is that those who “spoke from God as they were carried along by the Holy Spirit” (2 Pet. 1:21) all bore witness to Christ. In the earliest Christian interpretation the OT is related to the NT as promise is to fulfillment. The promise is found in the histories that led up to Christ as well as in the prophecies that foretold his coming; the fulfillment is found in him. The writer to the Hebrews contrasts the “many times and various ways” in which “God spoke to our forefathers through the prophets” with his perfect and final revelation in Christ (Heb. 1:1–2). Paul traces God's dealings with the world through successive stages associated with Adam, Abraham, Moses, and Christ. This conception of the biblical revelation as historical and progressive is fundamental; it goes back to the creative insight of Christ himself. It traces a consistent pattern of divine action throughout the centuries, marked by repeated manifestations of judgment and renewal, until it found its definitive exemplification in the gospel.

The Postapostolic Age. Biblical interpretation in the postapostolic age is influenced by a Greek theory of inspiration that had as its corollary allegorical exegesis. If a poet like Homer was inspired, then what he said about the gods could be acceptable to thoughtful pagans only if it were taken to be a veiled allegorical presentation of truths otherwise attained by philosophical reasoning. This attitude influenced the OT interpretation of the Jewish philosopher Philo of Alexandria, and subsequently the biblical interpretation of the Alexandrian Christians, Clement and Origen. To them, much in the Bible that was intellectually incredible or morally objectionable if understood literally could be made intelligible and congenial if it was allegorized. By allegorization, it was believed, the intention of the Spirit who spoke through the prophets and apostles could be penetrated. But this approach was largely arbitrary, because the approved interpretation depended so largely on the interpreter's personal preference, and in practice it violated the original intention of the Scriptures and almost obliterated the historical relatedness of the revelation they recorded. Over against the school of Alexandria stood the school of Antioch which, while it did not completely reject allegorization, paid much more serious attention to the historical sense of the text. In the West, the anonymous Pauline commentator usually referred to as Ambrosiaster and, above all, Jerome attached supreme importance to the grammatical sense, while Ambrose and Augustine were more influenced by the allegorizing methods of Alexandria. But Augustine's theological insight, especially his recognition of divine love as the essential element in revelation, supplied him with a sound hermeneutical principle and kept his allegorization within scriptural limits.

The Middle Ages. The patristic distinction between the literal and "higher" senses of Scripture was elaborated in the Middle Ages. The schoolmen dwelt on the fourfold sense of Scripture: (1) the literal sense, which related the things done and said in the biblical record according to its surface meaning; (2) the moral sense, which brought out lessons for life and conduct; (3) the allegorical sense, which deduced doctrine from the text; (4) the anagogical sense, which derived heavenly meanings from earthly data. For example, a reference to water could denote on different levels (1) literal water, (2) moral purity, (3) the practice and doctrine of baptism, (4) eternal life in the heavenly Jerusalem (as in Rev. 22:1). Some of these could be further subdivided: thus varieties of the allegorical sense were the mystical sense and what is nowadays called the typological sense. A good example of the mystical sense is provided by Bernard of Clairvaux in his homilies on the Song of Songs. There was a parallel development (called sōd) in Jewish interpretation: this extracted the highest meaning, which led by knowledge through love to ecstasy and the beatific vision. The typological sense, when properly controlled, was based on a comparison of recurring instances of a particular pattern throughout Scripture. The typological sense of the material details of the wilderness tabernacle and the levitical sacrifices was found in the spiritual worship of the Christian order.

Alongside the cultivation of the derivative senses, many centers in Western Europe cultivated literal interpretation; this often went hand in hand with the study of Hebrew, knowledge of which was easily obtainable from rabbis. One such center was the Abbey of Saint Victor, Paris, where a vigorous school of literal interpretation, in the tradition of Jerome, flourished in the twelfth century. Nicolas of Lyra, the greatest Christian Hebraist of his age, produced commentaries on the whole Bible. These were both literal and figurative, but he stressed the primacy of the literal sense, which alone could yield proof. Luther, who was not a little influenced by him, called him "a fine soul, a good Hebraist and a true Christian."

New Beginnings. In the late fifteenth and sixteenth centuries a series of new developments halted the threatened divorce between grammatico-historical and theological exegesis. Luther, in principle at least, refused to distinguish between these two forms of exegesis: "What is theology," he asked, "but grammar applied to the text?" But, a generation before Luther, others were expressing similar thoughts. The English scholar John Colet caused a sensation when he returned to Oxford from the continent in 1496 and, in a course of lectures on the Pauline Epistles, expounded them in the light of their historical setting, according to the plain meaning of the text. His methods of exegesis influenced Erasmus.

To the insights of the Renaissance, Martin Luther added those of the Reformation, making the teaching of justification by faith in Christ alone the central principle of biblical interpretation as of so much else. He rejected allegory as rubbish, although he did have recourse to it from time to time. John Calvin was a systematic exegete of the grammatico-historical school; his first exercise in this field was a commentary on a treatise of the Roman philosopher Seneca. His voluminous biblical commentaries are still consulted with profit.

The Counter-Reformation also made its contribution to the revival of sound exegesis. At a time when the Apocalypse was too often used as an arsenal for weapons to be used in the Reformation cleavage by one side against the other, F. Ribera and L. Alcasar went back to the earlier Christian fathers to find a more satisfactory method of interpreting that book. On the Reformed side, the first exegete to abandon the identification of Antichrist with the pope was the Dutch jurist Hugo Grotius, whose Annotationes in Novum Testamentum (1641-46) were so objective that he was criticized for rationalism.

Interpretation of the Bible

Primary and Plenary Senses. Since the Bible is the church's book, a further context within which any part of it may be read is supplied by the whole of Christian history. What the Bible has come to mean in the experience of Christian readers, generation by generation, has added something to its meaning for Christian readers today. This increment of meaning makes up what is called the plenary (or full) sense (sensus plenior). The primary sense is what the author intended to convey, established by the grammatico-historical method; but the plenary sense, provided it does not violate the primary sense, enriches the appreciation of the Bible both in the life of the church as a whole and in the personal experience of Christian men and women. The story of Jacob's wrestling with the angel at the ford of Jabbok (Gen. 32:22–32), for example, presents some interesting exegetical problems when studied in its original setting, but these do not impair the lessons readers of many ages have learned from it. Hosea in his day found significance in the story (Hos. 12:3, 4), and to later generations it has served as an illustration of the lesson learned by Paul from a different experience: "When I am weak, then I am strong" (2 Cor. 12:10). To many Christians in the English-speaking world Charles Wesley's hymn "Wrestling Jacob" has provided a rich commentary on the incident, disclosing the plenary sense in a Christian idiom.

And when my all of strength shall fail,
I shall with the God-Man prevail.

This plenary sense, however, is acceptable because it is consistent with the primary sense, according to which it was not wrestling and scheming Jacob, but weeping, disabled, clinging Jacob who prevailed with God and secured his blessing.

Post-War Trends. Since World War II the existential interpretation of Scripture (especially the NT) has been widely cultivated, largely under the influence of Rudolf Bultmann. Bultmann's own thinking was influenced by Wilhelm Dilthey, who insisted that the interpreter should project himself into the author's experience so as to relive it, and by Martin Heidegger, who conceived of the truly "authentic" man as experiencing freedom because he has faced reality. This conception of Heidegger provided the "pre-understanding" of Bultmann's theology and, not altogether surprisingly, Bultmann found this "pre-understanding" confirmed in the NT text. To his mind, Heidegger was saying, quite independently, what the NT writers had already said. Bultmann's disciple Ernst Fuchs regards the hermeneutical task as the creation of a "language event" in which the authentic language of the Bible encounters readers today, challenging them to decision, awakening faith, and achieving salvation.

Still more recent is the structuralist approach, which abandons all concern to keep the plenary sense in line with the primary sense. It may ignore all questions about the historical background of a text, its original life setting, and the course of its transmission; it may even be quite uninterested in the author's intention, since its concern is with the final form of the text as an independent linguistic phenomenon.

More fruitful approaches are the "salvation-history" hermeneutic represented preeminently by Oscar Cullmann and the "canonical exegesis" propounded by Brevard S. Childs—the former viewing the text in the light of the ongoing record of God's saving activity that finds its climax in Christ, the latter viewing it in the setting of the entire biblical canon.

Recent Developments. The latter part of the twentieth century saw numerous developments in interpretation theory, including the interpretation of the Bible. Hermeneutics, which formerly dealt almost exclusively with biblical interpretation, has become both an independent discipline and a subdivision of such subject areas as philosophy, literature, the social sciences, and the arts. Furthermore, in addition to asking about the theory and methods of interpretation, many circles have become preoccupied with understanding. By this is meant both cognitive and subconscious activity and especially the understanding of being in an existential sense, hence, self-awareness and/or personal meaningfulness.

Descriptions of the various objectives of interpretation implied above now clearly distinguish between those which seek (1) the meaning of the text itself, the intent of the author; (2) the personality and/or the experience of the author at the moment of writing; and (3) the self-understanding of the reader. The first, authorial intent interpretation, is that described above. It is most vigorously described and defended by E. D. Hirsch. Schleiermacher and his followers propound the second objective. The third, reader-oriented interpretation, closely associated with the existentialist and later philosophical developments. Each of these programs has its own "hermeneutical circle" that controls its methodology. Hirsch, focusing upon the text, constantly repeats the process of moving from viewing the text as a whole to concentration on its parts. Schleiermacher advocated moving from text to psychological data and back again. The circle of Bultmann and other reader-oriented interpreters moves between the text's interpretation of existence and questions put to it by the interpreter.

The Historical Critical Method (HCM) is frequently associated with hermeneutics and biblical interpretation. Theoretically it is simply an attempt to discover the character of the text and historical circumstances out of which it arose from an investigation of what is assumed in it.

However, emerging as it did in the humanistic, rationalistic environment of the Enlightenment in the eighteenth century, it rejected the possibility of the supernatural and questioned even the most central assumptions and affirmations of the Bible. Its conclusions were usually detrimental to an understanding of the text as historically accurate and theologically authoritative. Changes in the philosophical climate have raised significant questions about the basic assumptions of the HCM and the way it has been practiced. Nevertheless, in one form or another it remains as a much-used interpretive tool by non-evangelical students and, increasingly, among some evangelicals. These latter insist that without its original liberal presupposition the HCM has its contribution to make to the careful investigator.

The most recent developments are those which arise from postmodernism. This philosophical orientation rejects the concepts of absolute truth, rational methodologies, and any other form of "foundationalism." It adopts an all-pervasive relativism which asserts that truth is that which is "true" for the interpreter or his/her community and holds to a pluralism in which even apparently contradictory truth claims may be "true." The postmodernist is convinced of the oppressive nature of hierarchical, impersonal patriarchal models for organization and relationships and seeks their overthrow. He/she may see some relevance in the notions of history and positivism but seeks "truth" in contending and conflicting cultures and concepts of truth. In fact, postmodernism is rooted in and celebrates discontinuity. It builds upon a new epistemology that is organized around imagination. The implications of all this for biblical interpretation are, obviously, varied. It certainly leads to a view of "authority" that is vastly different from the traditional ones and offers differing interpretations, based on methods and intuitions of the individuals and groups for which there need be little consistency.

Recent changes and developments have thrown the theory and practice of biblical interpretation into an unsettled state. Nonevangelicals struggle with the implications of the current scene to find a means of retaining the Bible as the Church's book while conforming to the spirit of the time. Some evangelicals, rejecting the dominance of rationalism and other features of the Enlightenment, join those questioning the possibility of knowing with certainty. They are attracted to such interpretative objectives as those of reader-oriented hermeneutics and seek for help in postmodernism.

Practitioners of the HCM have long insisted that the Bible must be interpreted "just like any other book." Stendahl insisted that there is a difference between studying the Bible as "a classic," where one seeks to touch the spirit and wisdom of the past to be challenged and thrilled, and as "Scripture," where one comes to sit under its authority. One wonders if the time has come to state openly that for evangelicals the Bible cannot be interpreted like any other book.

The attraction of some evangelicals to some modern theories and methods, as to those of older liberalism, raises serious questions. Not of least importance is that which asks about the possibility of maintaining the view that the Bible is the trustworthy word of God if the intent of the human and divine authors is not the ultimate objective of interpretation.

F. F. BRUCE AND J. J. SCOTT JR.

See also ALLEGORY; BULTMANN, RUDOLF; DEMYTHOLOGIZATION; DODD, CHARLES HAROLD; HEILSGESCHICHTE; HIGHER CRITICISM; TYPE, TYPOLOGY.

Bibliography. A. K. M. Adam, What Is Postmodern Biblical Criticism?; G. W. Anderson, ed., Tradition and Interpretation; J. Barr, Old and New in Interpretation; E. C. Blackman, Biblical Interpretation; C. E. Braaten, History and Hermeneutics; G. Bray, Biblical Interpretation Past and Present; R. Bultmann, Faith and Understanding; B. S. Childs, Exodus: A Commentary; O. Cullmann, Salvation in History; C. H. Dodd, According to the Scriptures; F. W. Farrar, History of Interpretation; H.-G. Gadamer, Truth and Method; L. Goppelt, Typos: The Typological Interpretation of the Old Testament in the New; R. M. Grant, Short History of the Interpretation of the Bible; E. D. Hirsch Jr., Validity in Interpretation; B. Lindars, New Testament Apologetic; I. H. Marshall, ed., New Testament Interpretation; D. and C. C. McCartney, Let the Reader Understand: A Guide to Interpreting and Applying the Bible; D. E. Nineham, ed., Church's Use of the Bible Past and Present; R. Palmer, Hermeneutics: Interpretation Theory in Schleiermacher, Dilthey, and Gadamer; J. M. Robinson and J. B. Cobb, New Hermeneutic; J. J. Scott Jr., "Some Problems in Hermeneutics for Contemporary Evangelicals," JETS 22:66-77; B. Smalley, Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages; K. Stendahl, "The Bible as a Classic and the Bible as Holy Scripture," JBL 103:3-10; P. Stuhlmacher, Historical Criticism and Theological Interpretations of Scripture; A. C. Thiselton, New Horizons in Hermeneutics: Two Horizons; G. Vermes, Scripture and Tradition in Judaism; J. Weingreen, From Bible to Mishna; J. D. Wood, Interpretation of the Bible.

Interpretation of Tongues, Gift of. See SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

Invisible Church. See CHURCH.

Invocation of Saints. Requests to persons in heaven for their intercession before God in support of the petitioner's prayers.

The practice of invocation of saints derives from the doctrine of the communion of saints, the fellowship of all members of the Body of Christ, including the terrestrial church militant and the heavenly church triumphant. If Christian fellowship impels believers on earth to bear one another's burdens in prayer, it seems reasonable to conclude that the compassion of those who have died disposes them even more to pray for those who still struggle with evil and suffering, especially as the former no longer face their own cares.

Invocation of the Saints

Scriptural support for the practice is indirect. That believers should pray for others is explicit (Rom. 15:30; James 5:16); that the dead feel concern for the living appears from the rich man in Hades (Luke 16:27–28). Catholic and Orthodox teaching infers that the saints in heaven know the needs of the faithful and delight to aid their brethren for the sake of God's kingdom. In respectful gratitude, those on earth invoke the saints' efficacious intercession. Such intercession does not detract from but rather honors Christ the mediator, through whose merits all prayers are offered. While believers surely may pray directly to God, the praise of his glory is amplified by the joining of the prayers of the blessed in heaven to those from earth.

Having begun in the third century, the practice of invocation intensified during the Middle Ages in connection with the veneration of patron saints and relics. The Council of Trent moderated the practice by declaring it "good and useful" to invoke the saints, while not mandating invocation nor anathematizing those who denied its efficacy.

Reformation theology identified the notion that human souls hear prayer as blasphemy. Lutheran doctrine acknowledged that saints do pray generally for the church militant, but they do not receive its prayers. Calvin denied that departed saints "abandon their own repose to be drawn into earthly cares."

Modern Roman Catholic theology affirms the propriety of invocation while distinguishing between divine adoration (latria) and respect for saints (dulia). Recently, some non-Catholics have begun to reckon with the unity of living believers with the dead in Christ, whereby God is beseeched to receive by "comprecation" the praise of the blessed in heaven in unison with the church on earth.

P. D. STEEVES

See also BEATIFICATION; CANONIZATION; COMMUNION OF SAINTS; DULIA; LATRIA; VENERATION OF SAINTS.

Bibliography. P. Brown, Cult of the Saints; J. Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion; J. Gibbons, Faith of Our Fathers; J. Pelikan, Christian Tradition.

Irenaeus (ca. 130–ca. 200). A Greek father of the early church. In his youth Irenaeus listened to Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, disciple of John. In his maturity he was bishop of Lyons in Gaul. Irenaeus ("peaceful") sought to mediate between the churches of Asia Minor and Rome in the Montanist and the Quartodeciman disputes.

Two of his treatises survive. The Demonstration (or Proof) of the Apostolic Preaching may have been written for an apologetic or a catechetical purpose. It presents Christ and Christianity as the fulfillment of Old Testament prophecy. Salvation history is structured according to the various covenants of God with man.

Against Heresies (Refutation and Overthrow of the Gnosis Falsely So Called) is a polemical work opposing Gnosticism. Against the Gnostics' mythological interpretation of Scripture, association of matter with evil, and spiritualizing eschatology, Irenaeus proposed an interpretation of Scripture according to a summary of the apostolic preaching (the "rule of truth"), the biblical doctrines of creation, redemption, and resurrection, and a chiliastic eschatology.

Irenaeus's most original contribution to theology was his doctrine of recapitulation. The fully divine Christ became fully man in order to sum up all humanity in himself. What was lost through the disobedience of the first Adam was restored through the obedience of the second Adam. Christ went through all the stages of human life, resisted all temptation, died, and arose a victor over death and the devil. The analogy with Adam was extended to include Mary as a new Eve. The benefits of Christ's victory are available through participation in him.

Irenaeus contributed to the developing ecclesiastical organization the doctrine of apostolic succession. The Gnostics claimed a secret tradition from the apostles. Irenaeus argued that if the apostles had had any secrets to impart they would have delivered them to those men they appointed as bishops of the churches. The succession passed from one occupant of the teaching chair to the next in each church, not from ordainer to ordained. The public nature of the teaching given by the bishops and the uniformity of this teaching among all the churches guaranteed that it was the genuine apostolic tradition. The church of Rome, as founded by Paul and Peter and as mirroring all the churches, held an important place in this argument.

Irenaeus is the earliest known author to argue from Scripture as a whole: NT as well as OT and a range of NT writings approximating the present canon.

E. FERGUSON

Bibliography. V. Ammundsen, "The Rule of Truth in Irenaeus," JTS 13:574–580; F. R. M. Hitchcock, Irenaeus of Lugdunum; J. Lawson, Biblical Theology of Saint Irenaeus; E. P. Meijering, "God, Cosmos, History," VC 28:248–76; E. Molland, "Irenaeus of Lugdunum and the Apostolic Succession," JEH 1:12–28; J. T. Nielsen, Adam and Christ in the Theology of Irenaeus of Lyons; W. R. Schoedel, "Theological Method in Irenaeus," JTS 35:31–49; D. R. Schultz, "The Origin of Sin in Irenaeus and Jewish Pseudepigraphical Literature," VC 32:161–90; G. Wingren, Man and the Incarnation.

Irish Articles (1615). One hundred and four articles of belief adopted at the first convocation of the Irish Episcopal Church. The articles are arranged under nineteen heads. They were written largely by James Ussher, then in charge of Trinity College Theological Faculty in Dublin, later archbishop of Armagh. These articles affirm the absolute sovereignty of God, predestination, election and reprobation, and justification by faith, along with the importance of repentance and good works. They teach the Puritan view of the sabbath, identify the pope as Antichrist, and recognize the king as head of both church and state. They mention neither the necessity of episcopal ordination nor the three orders of the ministry. These articles are considerably more Calvinist than the earlier (1563) Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England. In 1635 the Irish Articles were officially replaced by the Thirty-nine Articles, although Archbishop Ussher continued to require subscription to both. The Westminster Confession of Faith (of the British Parliament's Assembly of Divines in the 1640s) draws more from the Irish Articles than from any other source. Thus the Anglican Irish Articles—mediated through the Westminster Confession—have had their greatest influence on the Presbyterian Churches of the English-speaking world.

D. F. KELLY

See also CONFESSIONS OF FAITH; CREED, CREEDS; THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES; USSHER, JAMES; WESTMINSTER CONFESSON OF FAITH.

Bibliography. A. F. Mitchell, Westminster Confession of Faith: A Contribution to the Study of Its History, and to the Defense of Its Teaching; P. Schaff, ed., Creeeds of Christendom.

Ironside, Henry Allen (1876–1951). Popular Bible teacher, evangelist, pastor, and author. Born in Toronto, Canada, "Harry" Ironside moved with his family to California in 1886. There at the age of fourteen he was converted and began to preach. After a brief period as a Salvation Army officer, Ironside resigned because he no longer accepted the holiness view of "entire sanctification." He joined the Plymouth Brethren and started what would become a highly successful itinerant ministry of preaching and teaching. Though essentially self-taught, he was always in high demand as an expositor at Bible conferences and institutes. From 1925 to 1943 he served as a visiting professor at Dallas Theological Seminary. From 1930 to 1948 he was pastor of Moody Memorial Church in Chicago, a position that earned him considerable criticism from the Plymouth Brethren, who reject the idea of "one-man ministries" and of receiving a stipulated salary for preaching the gospel. During a preaching tour of New Zealand, Ironside suffered a fatal heart attack and was buried in Auckland in January 1951.

In addition to his itinerant and pastoral ministries, Ironside is best known for his prolific literary output. He produced close to a hundred major books and pamphlets, mainly on expository and prophetic themes. Ironside was a major figure in the popularizing of dispensationalism among American evangelicals and for the most part followed the views of the Scotfield Reference Bible.

T. P. WEBER

See also DISPENSATION, DISPENSATIONALISM.

Bibliography. H. A. Ironside, Great Parenthesis; Historical Sketch of the Brethren Movement; Lamp of Prophecy; Mysteries of God; Prophet Isaiah; E. S. English, Ordained of the Lord.

Irresistible Grace. See GRACE.

Irving, Edward (1792–1834). An evangelical Church of Scotland minister who sought to get back behind the anticharismatic stance of the Protestant Reformation and reintroduce the charismatic dimension to Protestantism. A man of creativity and singular powers of expression, he became critical of his fellow evangelicals early in his ministry. Believing himself called as a prophet by God with a message—however yet unclear—to the British Protestantism of his day, he jumped at the invitation to become minister of a small congregation in London in 1822. Here his pulpit gifts were soon recognized, and by 1827 the great Regent Square Church was erected to hold the crowds.

Fearful of liberalism and disillusioned with the entrepreneurial optimism of evangelicalism, his romanticism led him, in company with so many Confessional Protestants, to seek the answers to the needs of the present in a golden age of the past. This age was the Reformation, but while most British Confessionalists sought the answer in Reformation doctrine, he as usual beat his own path. He discerned much of the power of the Reformation to lie in its sacramental theology, and thus he particularly stressed the presence and power of the Holy Spirit in baptism—a charismatic sacramentalism.

His expectations were heightened when he came in touch with some of the first evangelical Anglican premillennialists. In the imminent return of Jesus Christ, he saw the removal of liberalism and evangelicalism; but even more he saw a brief period prior to the Second Advent when there would be a latter-rain outpouring of the Holy Spirit. With his exuberance and expectation he became the first major popularizer of nineteenth-century premillennialism, leading such recognized fathers of the movement as J. N. Darby and other early Plymouth Brethren into this new understanding. He was now advocating a charismatic eschatology.

The next stage in Irving's development was his conviction that the "extraordinary" gifts of the Holy Spirit would be given once again just prior to the Second Coming. This he preached and for this he waited. During this period he also developed a charismatic Christology in which he taught that in the incarnation Jesus Christ received a fallen human nature, but that the activity of the Spirit kept him from sin. Such views created much opposition in the Church of Scotland, opposition that intensified when he announced that his new views opened up a universal triumph of Christ which could no longer bear with traditional Calvinism.

Then in the spring of 1830 word came that speaking in tongues had occurred in the west of Scotland, and within a year, manifestations were present in Regent Square Church. Barred from his pulpit by the presbytery, and subsequently deposed by the Church of Scotland General Assembly (1833), Irving and his supporters, almost all former evangelical Anglicans, found their way into what became known as the Catholic Apostolic Church. Those gifted with apostleship consigned Irving to a significantly lesser rank, which he accepted, only to die within a matter of months.

I. S. RENNIE

See also CHARISMATIC MOVEMENT; TONGUES, SPEAKING IN.

Bibliography. G. Carlyle, Collected Writings of Edward Irving; A. Dallimore, Life of Edward Irving; R. A. Davenport, Albury Apostles; A. L. Drummond, Edward Irving and His Circle; M. Oliphant, Life of Edward Irving; W. Oliver, Prophets and Millennialists; E. Sandeen, Roots of Fundamentalism; G. Strachan, Pentecostal Theology of Edward Irving; H. C. Whitley, Blinded Eagle: An Introduction to the Life and Teaching of Edward Irving; J. E. Worsfold, Origins of the Apostolic Church in Great Britain.

Israel, New. A description of the church, arising from the conviction that the position of Israel as the elect people of God has been transferred to the church, so that the former can no longer claim it. The description is not actually used in the NT, but of course the NT may take this view of the relationship without using the expression. It has been used from the time of Tertullian, and it is plainly vital to theology to know whether the NT supports its use. So we ask, Could the church have been called the New Israel in the NT?

The NT presents a picture of both continuity and discontinuity between itself and the Old.

Discontinuity. There are some horrifying expressions of judgment upon Israel for her failure to accept the Christ (e.g., Matt. 23:37–38; Mark 13:2; Luke 19:41–44; John 8:24; Rom. 9:27–29; 11:8–10; 1 Thess. 2:16), as well as some strong expressions of the inadequacy and provisional nature of the OT law (Rom. 3:20; 8:3; Gal. 3:23–25; Phil. 3:6–7; Heb. 8:13) and a polemic against Israelite institutions (e.g., the teaching office—Matt. 23:2–32; the sacrificial system—Heb. 10:3–4, 11; the temple—Acts 7:48–53; the synagogue worship—2 Cor. 3:14–15).

Continuity. The NT also affirms the divine origin of the Old, and its compatibility with the gospel (Matt. 5:17–18; 22:41–46; John 5:37–39; 10:35; Rom. 3:2, 31; 7:12, 14; 13:8–10; 15:4), and consequently we find OT images, institutions, and prophecies applied to Christ and the church. Paul asserts the certainty of Israel's ultimate salvation (Rom. 11:25–26), and the early church (following Jesus' example) initially felt completely at home in, or took over for itself, the institutions of Israel (temple—Luke 2:49; John 5:1; Acts 3:1; teaching office and prophecy—Mark 1:21; Acts 13:15–16; synagogue—Luke 4:16; Acts 13:5).

Reconciliation. How are these two attitudes to be reconciled? Some have maintained that the NT writers simply could not clarify the relationship of the church to Israel and the law, because they were too personally involved. But deep personal involvement is usually a spur to clarity of mind. Paul, for one, had to think very carefully about this issue, because in his Gentile mission it was raised on two opposing fronts: on the one hand, the "Judaizers" argued that the coming of Christ meant no alteration whatsoever in the pre-existing state of affairs: Israel is still the elect people of God, so Gentile converts must join Israel (by circumcision) as well as the church (by baptism). Against them certain Gentile Christians argued that Israel had finally forfeited her special status, and that God had established in Christ a new Gentile order of salvation, in which the law had no place (Rom. 11:19).

Paul steered a careful course between these extremes. Some scholars maintain that his response differs from that of other NT authors, but taking the NT as a whole the following picture emerges:

1. Christ, not any particular group of people, is the center of God's purposes. "All the promises of God have their Yes in him," (Weymouth) says Paul (2 Cor. 1:20). In Galatians, Paul pictures Christ as the "seed of Abraham" when Abraham was given the promise "to you and your descendants" (Gen. 17:7–8), on which Israel's election was based (Gal. 3:16). In a sense, then, Christ is himself the people of God, embodying all that God intended for the elect. Matthew makes the same point vividly when he shows Jesus reenacting the great events of Israel's election. He goes down to Egypt to avoid destruction (Matt. 2:13; Gen. 45:7; 50:20), and is brought up again as God's Son (Matt. 2:14; Exod. 4:22). He passes through the water like Israel (Matt. 3:16–17;

1 Cor. 10:1–2; Exod. 14:22), and is tempted in the wilderness (Matt. 4:1–11; Deut. 8:3). Finally he sits on a mountain and his disciples gather round him to hear his Torah, just as Moses climbed Sinai to receive the Torah from God (Matt. 5:1–12; Exod. 19:20–20:17).

2. It follows that the people of God and the OT must be understood christocentrically. Only in Christ, says Paul, are the promises made to Abraham fulfilled. Consequently, “If you belong to Christ, then you are Abraham’s seed, and according to promise” (Gal. 3:29). Since all, whether Jew or Gentile, may embrace Christ by faith, it follows that Abraham is not merely the father of historical Israel but “the father of all who believe,” whatever their national origin (Rom. 4:11; cf. Matt. 8:5–13). Conversely, the right to claim Abraham as father, and enjoy membership in Israel, is forfeited by Jews who refuse to believe (John 8:39–44; Rom. 9:6–7; cf. Rom. 2:28–29). So the name Israel is rightly applied only to those Jews who form the saved remnant in Christ (cf. Gal. 6:16: the phrase “Israel of God” here could refer to the whole church, Jews and Gentiles, but probably Paul is praying especially for Jewish Christians); and Gentile Christians may picture their position as that of “graft” onto the age-old “tree” of God’s people (Rom. 11:17–24).

Christ thus provides the key to the right understanding of the OT. Its institutions (e.g., high priest—Heb. 4:14; Davidic king—Luke 1:32–33) and prophecies (e.g., prophet like Moses—John 5:46; Acts 3:22–23; servant of the Lord—Mark 10:45; Acts 3:13; New Covenant—Heb. 8:6–13) are applied to Jesus, and the law itself finds its meaning only in pointing to him (Rom. 3:21; 10:4; Gal. 3:24).

3. Judgment on Israel does not cancel her election. Interpreting the OT through Christ does not mean any sudden changes of direction. Just as Zechariah proclaimed the fulfillment of the covenant in Christ (Luke 1:67–79), so Paul insists that God’s word still stands (Rom. 9:6), that he has not rejected his people (Rom. 11:1), and that Israel will be saved (vv. 25–26), for “the gifts and the call of God are irrevocable” (v. 29). But she will be saved through a judgment that will remove the dross and purify her once and for all (Isa. 1:24–26; Rom. 9:27–29).

4. OT ways of understanding God’s people may be applied to the church. The saving events of the OT, especially the Exodus, are used to illuminate salvation in Christ (e.g., John 6; 1 Cor. 10:1–11); the true meaning of OT religion is found in the gospel (e.g., Rom. 3:24–25; 1 Pet. 1:18–19); and many times images for Israel are applied to believers (e.g., Luke 12:32; John 15:1; 1 Pet. 2:9).

Conclusion. We must conclude that the phrase “New Israel,” applied to the church, does not reflect the fullness of NT thinking. The phrase “renewed Israel” would imply less of a dividing line between the testaments and would help us to take seriously today Paul’s radical statement that the gospel concerns “the Jew first and also . . . the Greek” (Rom. 1:16 KJV). S. MOTYER

See also CHURCH.

Bibliography. D. L. Baker, Two Testaments: One Bible; F. F. Bruce, New Testament Development of Old Testament Themes; W. D. Davies, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism; H. L. Ellison, Mystery of Israel; D. J. Harrington, God’s People in Christ: New Testament Perspectives on the Church and Judaism; W. Hendriksen, Israel in Prophecy; D. E. Holwerda, Jesus and Israel: One Covenant or Two?; S. Motyer, Israel in the Plan of God; H. Räisänen, Paul and the Law; P. Richardson, Israel in the Apostolic Church.

Israel and Prophecy. The declaration of the Word of God to the people of God (Israel). In any discussion of Israel in the context of prophecy there is difficulty over the precise definition of terms. First, the word “prophecy” must be clearly understood, for if it is misused, it may distort any attempt to understand Israel’s place in prophecy. The subject matter of prophecy, given the fundamental definition above, may vary. God’s Word may relate to the past, present, or future, though in the first instance it will always have some relevance to its immediate present in the time of the prophet. When the divine Word is concerned with the distant future, it is merely one part of biblical prophecy, namely prophetic eschatology. As the OT prophets were Israelites, and as their message concerned the chosen people, it follows that almost all prophecy, including prophetic eschatology, has as its primary focus Israel (including the united kingdom and after 922 B.C. the separate states of Judah and Israel). This statement of fundamental principles is crucial, for in popular English usage the word “prophecy” has become more or less synonymous with prediction and futurology. This popular and modern approach to prophecy is typified by a statement in a modern popular paperback, “Prophecy is merely history written in advance.” This approach to the subject is a fundamental misunderstanding of the OT notion of prophecy.

A second difficulty pertains to the use of the word “Israel.” In modern discussions of the Bible’s prophetic eschatology, frequent reference is made to Israel. But it is not always easy to determine in the sources whether the reference is to Israel in the OT sense (the nation of the chosen people) or in some future nationalistic sense (a restored Israel), or whether the reference is to the church, which may perhaps be referred to as the New Israel. Whereas the first difficulty arises simply from mistaken understanding, the second difficulty is related to the interpretation of such difficult texts as Galatians 6:16 (see Richardson).

The Basic Prophetic Message Concerning Israel. The prophets in general addressed the Word of God to Israel throughout the nation's history in OT times and during and after the Exile, continuing into the period when the chosen people no longer survived as a distinct and independent nation. Prior to the beginning of the Exile (587/6 B.C.), the prophets' message was that Israel's failure in the covenant relationship had been so fundamental that if there were no repentance, judgment would come; the covenant would be brought to an end. The message was designed to evoke repentance and thus avert judgment; the eventual failure of the nation to rediscover the essence of its covenant relationship with God culminated in the end of the independent state of Israel.

During and after the Exile, the prophets continued to address God's word to the Israel that survived, not as a nation, but as a people. In part, their message was addressed to those in exile and to those returning to the promised land. The prophets continued to speak of coming judgment, but with respect to the future they spoke also of a restoration of Israel that lay beyond the judgment. In the interpretation of particular prophetic passages, it is difficult to know sometimes whether the restoration of which they speak is fulfilled in the return of Israel to the promised land after the Exile and the consequent reestablishment of the temple worship, or whether they refer to a more distant future. While the distinction is often difficult to draw in a particular text, it is clear that in the prophetic writings as a whole a distinctive prophetic eschatology develops; the prophets gave expression to their anticipation of a new and restored Israel in a transformed world in which violence and evil would be eliminated. Yet, as one might expect when the divine message is declared through different persons, the substance of the various prophetic eschatologies differs in details; it is not that the respective messages contradict each other, but rather that the truth toward which they point eludes the descriptive capacity of human language. In profound symbolism, limited nevertheless by the inadequacy of human speech, the prophets anticipated a transformed world in which God's kingdom and rule would be eventually established.

From Prophecy to Apocalyptic. At the end of the OT period and continuing into intertestamental times, a transformation took place from prophecy to apocalyptic; that is, the proclamation of the divine Word in prophecy (especially that part having eschatological significance) gave way to apocalyptic writings in which the "secrets" of the future were affirmed in the account of visions, or in narratives written in the form of visionary accounts. The book of Daniel, not technically a prophetic book, forms a bridge between OT prophecy and intertestamental and NT apocalyptic writings (notably the Revelation to John). Though the themes of prophetic eschatology continue to be present in the apocalyptic writings, their concern is less immediate than that of the prophets, who addressed God's Word urgently to their own generation. In the attempt to interpret the apocalyptic literature, one faces similar difficulties to those encountered in the interpretation of prophetic eschatology; it is not always easy to differentiate between that which clearly refers to events now lying in the past and that which still pertains to a future reality.

Problems of Interpretation. The place of Israel in prophetic eschatology and apocalyptic literature is the subject of considerable difficulty of interpretation. (1) While the Bible clearly affirms a faith about the future, namely, the return of Christ, a transformed world, and a new Israel, it also warns of the dangers of trying to determine the precise time of such events. It is one thing to be perpetually ready, but readiness must be accompanied by an awareness that we do not and cannot know the future precisely (Mark 13:22; Acts 1:6-7). (2) All language about the future must necessarily be mysterious and symbolic, insofar as it conveys truth beyond our present knowledge of historical reality. As such, the general truth of the language must be grasped, but one must not reduce prophetic statements to completely literal meaning, as if they constituted an airline schedule of departures and arrivals from heavenly places. (3) During the course of Christian history, each age has had interpreters who have identified the prophetic and apocalyptic "predictions" with the persons and events of their own age. Time has shown them to be fundamentally wrong over and over again; thus, while retaining readiness and an openness to God's intervention in human history, a healthy skepticism may be adopted to some of the popular "prophets" of our own age, whose interpretations of the biblical texts are no less suspect than those of their predecessors. (4) Attempts to relate the role of Israel in future history to the "millennium" referred to in Revelation 20:1-10 are equally fragile and should be presented with a good deal of caution, given the genuine difficulties in interpreting the biblical texts with respect to their modern and future implications. (5) The reestablishment of the modern state of Israel in 1948 has given rise, in both Judaism and Christianity, to renewed speculation about the restoration of Israel and the fulfillment of the eschatological anticipations of the prophets. It must certainly be recognized that this is an extraordinary event, and that the Zionist movement, during the last one hundred years, has been motivated in part by the prophetic expectations of the restoration of the nation and the return of the people of the diaspora. But even such an extraordinary event cannot be interpreted automatically as a fulfillment of the ancient prophetic hope. Within the state of Israel, there are parties of ultraorthodox Jews (e.g., the Neturei Karta) who are opposed to the government of Israel precisely because, in their view, the state was not established by the intervention of a messianic figure and as an act of God. Indeed, the Neturei Karta proclaimed the first government of Israel to be "a regime of blasphemers."

In summary, the biblical perspective emerging from the writings of the prophets is that human history has a direction and movement within the providence of God in which Israel has a continuing place. From the NT perspective, faith in the second coming of Christ, coupled with the prophetic eschatology concerning Israel, is something to be grasped by faith. To retain the vital faith in the culmination of human history as we know it, and yet to refrain from tying the prophetic message concerning Israel to our own intricate schemes and timetables, are the challenges perpetually facing us in attempting to understand Israel's place in prophecy. P. C. CRAIGIE

See also ESCHATOLOGY; MILLENNIUM, VIEWS OF THE; SECOND COMING OF CHRIST; ZIONISM, CHRISTIAN.

Bibliography. O. T. Allis, Prophecy and the Church; C. E. Armerding and W. W. Gasque, eds., Dreams, Visions, and Oracles; D. C. Christensen, Prophecy and War in Ancient Israel; A. G. Fruchtenbaum, Israeology: The Missing Link in Systematic Theology; G. E. Ladd, ISBE (rev.) 1:151-71; H. K. LaRondelle, Israel of God in Prophecy; J. B. Payne, Encyclopedia of Biblical Prophecy; D. L. Petersen, ed., Prophecy in Israel: Search for an Identity; G. P. Richardson, Israel in the Apostolic Church.

Issy, Articles of (1695). Thirty-four articles composed by a commission of the Catholic Church in 1695 at Issy, near Paris. The commission, made up of J. B. Bossuet, L. de Noailles, and M. Tronson, was formed to condemn erroneous teachings in the writings of Madame Guyon, who was under the influence of Bishop Fénelon. At issue were the theories of quietism (not unlike the nineteenth century Protestant holiness and deeper life movement), which called for an abandonment of human effort and complete passivity of will in order to reach a state of spirituality pleasing to God. The need for petitionary prayer was set aside for a passive, contemplative state of soul. The active life of faith and repentance was inferior, if not a positive hindrance, to the quiet losing of the soul in God. It is doubtful that Madame Guyon or Bishop Fénelon actually held to the extreme doctrines of quietism such as indifference to the truth of the Trinity and the incarnation, or to the impossibility of sin in the yielded soul. Though Madame Guyon, F. Fénelon, and J. B. Bossuet all signed the Articles of Issy, Bossuet and Fénelon continued to wage literary battle until the church condemned Fénelon with twenty-three propositions in 1699. D. F. KELLY

See also FÉNELON, FRANCOIS DE SALIGNAC DE LA MOTHE; GUYON, MADAME; QUIETISM.

Bibliography. R. A. Knox, Enthusiasm; B. B. Warfield, Perfectionism.

Jj

Jah. See GOD, NAMES OF.

Jahweh. See GOD, NAMES OF.

Jansen, Cornelius Otto (1558–1638). Flemish Catholic theologian. Jansen was born at Accoi, near Leerdam in southern Holland, and educated first at Louvain and then at Paris, where he received his doctorate in 1617. Shortly thereafter he was appointed director of the Saint Pulcherie Seminary in Louvain and professor of exegesis at the university. In 1630 he was named Regius Professor of Sacred Scripture, and in 1635 was University Rector. The next year he was consecrated bishop of Ypres, where he died of the plague in 1638.

After Jansen's death some of the commentaries he had written for his academic lectures on biblical books were published. More significant, however, was his major treatise on Augustine. Jansen had been interested in Augustine's religious thought since student days. In the early 1620s, coming to believe that Augustine's theology of efficacious predestinating grace was being threatened by the humanitarian tendencies of the Jesuit theologians of the Counter-Reformation, he embarked on an intensive study of Augustine's works, particularly his anti-Pelagian writings. The massive treatise which resulted from his work, entitled Augustinus, was published posthumously in 1640. Its three parts presented Augustine's theology of grace in a systematic and continuous synthesis. Part one described the Pelagian and semi-Pelagian heresies that Augustine sought to refute; part two expounded Augustine's interpretation of man's original state of innocence and his subsequent fall; and part three set forth his doctrine of salvation through God's redeeming grace in Jesus Christ.

The publication of this work touched off a heated controversy in Roman Catholic circles in European countries, particularly in France. Jansen's theology encountered strong opposition both from the ecclesiastical establishment and from the civil power. In 1653 five propositions, allegedly derived from Jansen, were condemned by Pope Innocent X in his bull Cum Occasione. These propositions, related to predestination, maintained that without God's enabling grace man cannot fulfill the divine commands and that the operation of God's grace, bestowed on his elect, is irresistible. Despite such official opposition, however, Jansenism, because it sought to defend traditional orthodoxy, to deepen personal piety, and to foster ascetic rigor in moral conduct, enlisted the support of certain notabilities. One of them was Blaise Pascal, whose Provincial Letters is one of the classic documents of this controversy. Other supporters included the theologian and philosopher Antoine Arnauld and his sister Jacqueline, abbess of the convent of Port Royal, which became an important center of Jansenist influence. But in 1709 Port Royal was closed down and its occupants dispersed; and in 1713 Pope Clement XI, in his bull Unigenitus, officially condemned certain propositions attributed to Pasquier Quesnel, a leading Jansenist theologian. Though the movement in France was thus seriously damaged, in 1723 the Jansenists of the Netherlands nominated a schismatic archbishop of Utrecht as their ecclesiastical leader, and this group has maintained its existence down to the present day, becoming in the later nineteenth century part of the Old Catholic Church.

N. V. HOPE

See also PASCAL, BLAISE.

Bibliography. N. Abercrombie, Origins of Jansenism; R. A. Knox, Enthusiasm; E. Romanes, Story of Port Royal; A. Sedgwick, Jansenism in Seventeenth Century France.

Jansenism. See JANSEN, CORNELIUS OTTO.

Jaspers, Karl (1883–1969). German existentialist philosopher. Trained in medicine, he first practiced in psychiatry and then moved via psychology to philosophy, finally accepting a professorship in this at Heidelberg in 1921. He was ousted from his post during the Nazi era but returned to it after the war. His first major book, General Psychopathology (1913), dealt with the merits and limits of various psychological procedures, distinguishing between the internally comprehensible and the merely causally recognizable events in the life of the mind.

In subsequent works—Psychologie der Weltanschauungen (1919), Philosophie (3 vols., 1932), Man in the Modern Age (1932), Reason and Existence (1935), Existenzphilosophie (1938), and numerous others—he developed the central ideas of his existentialism. The nature of the self is discovered through the “illumination of existence,” which discloses man as an entity seeking understanding and being. Existence is the authentic self and infinitely open to new possibilities. It cannot be conceptually determined by philosophy but is illuminated by reflection and communicated. It is the eternal in man and total freedom; but since life is a flux in which man seeks to find mooring, existence is necessarily limited by “boundary situations” such as death, suffering, guilt, and struggle. Man has freedom of choice, and when he chooses, he acts. But in so doing he takes chances, because the original choice determines his subsequent existence. Since there is no escape from man’s limits, he is condemned to endless striving, but in the paradox between finite existence and the struggle for infinity is found transcendence, the ultimate symbol of his salvation.

In these and his major theological volumes—Nietzsche and Christianity (1946), Perennial Scope of Theology (1948), and Myth and Christianity (1954)—Jaspers sees religious answers emerging from metaphysical descriptions of being. He rejects theism, pantheism, revealed religion, and atheism as mere “ciphers” or symbols that should not be taken literally, and argues that one should look to phenomenological descriptions of the fringes of inward and outer experiences for the understandings usually articulated by theology and metaphysics. He uses “the encompassing” to designate the ultimate but indefinite limits of being as we think, conceive, or conceptualize, while reserving “transcendence” for man’s personal, devoted, and committed effort to reach the encompassing. In effect he calls for a “philosophical faith” in man’s freedom and the transcendence which provides him with help and on which the world is grounded, and rejects the alleged “absolutism” of traditional Christianity for the openness and tolerance of this faith.

In his later years Jaspers turned more to social activism—Idea of the University (1946), Question of German Guilt (1946), Future of Mankind

(1957)—and published extensively in the history of philosophy as well. R. V. PIERARD

See also BULTMANN, RUDOLF; EXISTENTIALISM.

Bibliography. L. H. Ehrlich, Karl Jaspers: Philosophy as Faith; P. Koestenbaum, Encyclopedia of Philosophy 4:254–58; E. T. Long, Jaspers and Bultmann; S. Samay, Reason Revisited: The Philosophy of Karl Jaspers; P. A. Schilpp, ed., Philosophy of Karl Jaspers; C. F. Wallnaff, Karl Jaspers: An Introduction to His Philosophy.

Jealousy. An intense emotion that may be seen in a positive light as zeal or in a negative light as envy. It is a single-minded devotion that, when turned inward to one’s self, produces hatred and envy of others but, when turned beyond one’s self, produces intense zeal leading to total selflessness.

The Hebrew word qānā’ comes from a root meaning “to become dark red” (Num. 5:14; Prov. 6:34). There is heightened color resulting from the deep personal emotions being felt. The Greek word zēloō, meaning “to boil,” may be translated “zeal” or “jealousy” depending on the context. This term is used for both God and man (Deut. 32:21; Acts 7:9; Rom. 10:19; 11:11; 1 Cor. 10:22; 13:4).

God reveals himself as “a jealous God” (Exod. 20:5; 34:14). He alone is the true living God and has the exclusive right to the worship and service of his people. He is jealous for the well-being of his people (Zech. 1:14). He is a “consuming fire” against all evil both within and without Israel, but full of zeal on behalf of the salvation of his people (Deut. 4:24). God’s jealousy is provoked by idolatry (Deut. 32:16) and by disobedience (Isa. 59:17–18) because such a course destroys those who pursue it. The matter of absolutes—right and wrong—are always involved when God is concerned.

Man can also possess a jealousy or zeal for God and for the things of God. Elijah declared “I have been very zealous for the Lord God Almighty” (1 Kings 19:10). Paul speaks of his godly jealousy with regard to the Corinthian Christians: “I am jealous for you with a godly jealousy” (2 Cor. 11:2). Paul also indicates that the godly sorrow of these same Christians created in them an intense zeal for doing right (2 Cor. 7:11). A strong passion for God and for his purpose is the kind of motivation that causes his people to remain faithful to him.

Jealousy has a double meaning as it relates to man. In contrast to godly zeal there is envy. Cain’s murder of Abel in Genesis 4 is the first biblical illustration of the destructive and negative force of jealousy. Paul makes it clear that envy is the antithesis of love (1 Cor. 13:4; 2 Cor. 12:20). He also identifies jealousy as being among the “works of the flesh” (Gal. 5:20). Jealousy in this sense is resentfulness toward others for what they have in possessions, advantages, relationships, or whatever. It destroys one's spirituality (Job 5:2; Prov. 14:30).

Jealousy

From a psychological perspective jealousy in its negative sense distracts a person from his own genius and productivity, and ultimately destroys him. Jealousy distorts one's entire perspective of the world, producing an enormous amount of tension and conflict. The jealous person is always an angry person who is filled with self-pity. For the jealous person both his past and his future seem empty, and the desire to cut other people down to his own size becomes intense. The jealous person responds defensively and is easily irritated. He develops a hypersensitivity toward everyone and interprets both the deeds and conversations of others in the most negative light possible. Jealousy sets a person at cross-purposes to everyone, robbing him of any feeling of belonging to the world.

Nothing can liberate the envious person until he sees that he is the source of his own painful situation.

C. DAVIS

Bibliography. M. and W. Beecher, Mark of Cain: An Anatomy of Jealousy; E. M. Good, IDB 2:806-7; IBD 2:736-37; J. Pulsford, Jealousy of God; A. Stumpff, TDNT 2:877-88.

Jehovah. See GOD, NAMES OF.

Jehovah's Witnesses. This name was adopted in 1931 by the movement founded by Charles Taze Russell (1852-1916) in the 1870s. Russell was born in 1852 in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. His family were Congregationalists, but Russell reacted strongly against his religious upbringing. At the age of eighteen he started a Bible class in Pittsburgh, and his group grew into the organization we now know as the Jehovah's Witnesses. In 1876 Russell became the group's pastor, and in 1879 he started a magazine, Zion's Watchtower, the forerunner of today's Watchtower. The organization became the Zion's Watchtower Tract Society in 1884. In 1908, Russell moved the Headquarters of his organization to Brooklyn, New York. The organization has been based in Brooklyn ever since.

In 1886 Russell published the first of a series of seven books entitled Studies in the Scriptures. Volume six appeared in 1904 and the seventh volume in 1917, a year after Russell's death. The publication of volume seven led to a schism in the organization. The majority of members followed J. F. Rutherford, while a smaller group formed itself into the Dawn Bible Students Association. This organization is still in existence and publishes the Dawn magazine, which has a circulation of about 30,000 copies. The larger group following Rutherford became today's Jehovah's Witnesses. Their magazine, Watchtower, has a circulation of over sixty-five million worldwide.

As the Jehovah's Witnesses maintain no professional clergy, Watchtower also functions as a primary mouthpiece of the Brooklyn headquarters, relating matters of doctrine and practice to the faithful.

Following Russell's death in 1916, Joseph Franklin Rutherford (1869-1942) became the leader of the organization. An able organizer, he developed the group into its present organization. Rutherford wrote over a hundred books and fundamentally shaped the group's theology. He increased its hostility toward organized religion and developed a variety of highly successful missionary methods. At his death, Rutherford left behind an organization that has continued to grow at a remarkable rate.

In 1981 the Jehovah's Witnesses were shaken by a series of schisms that led to a large number leaving the organization. The leader of the opposition to the Brooklyn headquarters group was Professor James Penton, a Canadian whose family had been among Russell's earliest converts. Penton and those who sided with him sought to reemphasize the doctrine of justification by faith and return the group to its original interest in Bible study. The intention of Penton and other Witnesses who shared his ideas appears to have been to reform the group from within. The Brooklyn leadership strongly rejected their arguments and expelled anyone who supported their views. Although this division was a serious one, it appears that the majority of Witnesses remained within the official organization, which retained control over all the group's assets.

As a religious organization the Jehovah's Witnesses are typical of many nineteenth-century groups. Although their theology bears some resemblance to that of the Arians in early church history, they are essentially a modern group strongly influenced by rationalism. Like many other new religions in the nineteenth century, the Witnesses represent a strong reaction to the scientific worldview. The rationalism of the group can be seen in their rejection of trinitarian doctrines and traditional teachings about the person and work of Jesus Christ. Their rationalistic attitude toward the Bible comes out in their literal interpretation of prophecy and failure to appreciate the symbolic character of biblical language. Their rejection of blood transfusions reflects this rejection of modern science as well as the extreme literalism of their exegesis.

In attempting to justify their interpretation of Christianity and rejection of orthodoxy the Witnesses produce their own translation of the Bible—New World Translation of the Christian Greek Scriptures and New World Translation of the Hebrew Scriptures in 1950. Although this work claims to be a translation, the Witnesses have yet to name the translators or their credentials as competent scholars. What one finds in fact is a rendering of the Bible in terms of the theology of the organization.

Probably the best introduction to the theology of the Jehovah's Witnesses is their book Let God Be True. In addition to their rejection of the Christian doctrine of the Trinity they teach a number of distinctive doctrines. For example, their doctrine of Christ says that Jesus was not co-eternal with God the Father, but the first and greatest of Creation and the incarnation of Michael the Archangel. The Holy Spirit is not a person, but the impersonal force or power of God. The Watchtower doctrine of salvation starts with the grace of Christ and then relies upon one's own works. In their view the atonement is a ransom paid to God Jehovah by Jesus Christ which removes Adam's sin, laying the foundation for a new righteousness and enabling men to save themselves by their good works. This ransom was paid not upon a cross, however, but through his being impaled upon a "torture stake." They teach that Jesus was resurrected a divine spirit after offering this ransom to God. At death humans either sleep until the resurrection, or if they are evil, suffer annihilation. In their view, Jesus Christ returned to earth spiritually in 1914. In 1918, Jesus then entered and began cleansing the spiritual temple. This includes the resurrection of those among a select 144,000 who up to that point had died. Also in 1918 began the judgment of the nations. This judgment continues, overthrowing Satanic forces ruling the nations and establishing the millennial theocratic kingdom. This kingdom will arrive in the near future with the battle of Armageddon. After Armageddon true believers will be resurrected to a life of bliss on earth while the select group of 144,000 will rule in heaven with Christ. In addition to holding these doctrines, Jehovah's Witnesses reject a professional ministry and, until recently, the idea of church buildings, now known as "Kingdom Halls." They are pacifists and call upon their members to have nothing to do with worldly politics.

Today there are over four million Witnesses worldwide. They have an extensive missionary network throughout the world and operate in most countries, bringing in nearly 200,000 new members a year. In some places, particularly in Africa, the Witnesses have suffered severe persecution. In others, especially North America, they are rapidly coming to resemble a reasonably sized denomination.

I. HEXHAM

See also CULTS.

Bibliography. T. Dencher, Watch Tower versus the Bible; A. Hoekema, Four Major Cults; W. R. Martin and N. Klawn, Jehovah of the Watch Tower; J. Penton, End Delayed.

Jerome (ca. 347–419). Biblical scholar and translator who aimed to introduce the best of Greek learning to Western Christianity. He sensed the inferiority of the West, and he labored to add scholarship to the public glory of the church.

Jerome, whose Latin name was Eusebius Hieronimus, was born in the little town of Strido near the border of Italy and Dalmatia (today's Yugoslavia). His parents were well-to-do Catholics who sent their son to Rome for his higher education. There he heard the great grammarian Donatus, laid the foundation of his library of classical Latin authors, and adopted Cicero as his model of Latin style.

At the end of his studies, when about twenty years of age, he set off for Gaul. In Treves, the imperial capital, he experienced a type of conversion, renouncing a secular career for meditation and spiritual work. This change of career led him back to his home and to neighboring Aquilia, where he met Rufinus and other clergymen and devout women interested in asceticism. Thus began his career of cultivating ascetic and scholarly interests.

In 373 Jerome decided to travel to the East. He settled for a time in the Syrian desert southeast of Antioch. There he mastered Hebrew and perfected his Greek. After ordination at Antioch he went to Constantinople and studied with Gregory of Nazianzus. In 382 he returned to Rome, where he became the friend and secretary of Pope Damasus. We have Damasus to thank for the first impulse toward Jerome's Latin translation of the Bible, the Vulgate.

When Damasus died, late in 384, Jerome for the second time decided to go to the East. After some wandering, first to Antioch, then Alexandria, he settled in Bethlehem, where he remained for the rest of his life. He found companions in a monastery and served as a spiritual adviser to some wealthy women who had followed him from Rome.

Jerome's greatest accomplishment was the Vulgate. The chaos of the older Latin translation was notorious. Working from the Hebrew OT and the Greek NT, Jerome, after twenty-three years of labor, gave Latin Christianity its Bible anew. Although the text became corrupted during the Middle Ages, its supremacy was reaffirmed by the Council of Trent in 1546, and it remains to this day the classical Latin Bible.

A second and related part of Jerome's heritage lies in his expositions of Scripture. Like all biblical interpreters of the early church, Jerome affirmed a threefold (historical, symbolic, and spiritual) meaning of Scripture and repudiated an exclusively historical interpretation as "Jewish." What he demanded was only that the historical interpretation should not be considered inferior to the allegorical (or spiritual).

Jerome was no creative theologian, no great teacher of the church. He engaged in one bitter controversy after another with vindictive passion. Yet for all his personal weaknesses, Jerome's reputation as a biblical scholar endures.

B. L. SHELLEY

Bibliography. J. N. D. Kelly, Jerome; C. C. Mierow, Saint Jerome: The Sage of Bethlehem; F. X. Murphy, ed., Monument to Saint Jerome; J. G. Nolan, Jerome and Jovinian; J. Steinmann, Saint Jerome and His Times; H. von Campenhausen, Men Who Shaped the Western Church.

Jerusalem. The origins of the city are lost in antiquity, but evidence of civilization on the site stretches back to 3000 B.C., and the city is referred to by name in Egyptian texts as early as the beginning of the second millennium B.C. According to Ezekiel 16:3, the site was once populated by Amorites and Hittites; and, if it is to be identified with Salem (Gen. 14:18; Ps. 76:2), it was ruled in Abraham's day by the petty king Melchizedek, who was also "priest of God Most High." Some hold that the "region of Moriah" (Gen. 22:2), where Abraham was tested with the sacrifice of Isaac, was what became the temple site, but this connection has not been proved.

Jerusalem in History. At the time of the conquest Jerusalem (otherwise known as Zion, the name originally given to the southeast hill where the earliest fortress was located) was populated by the Jebusites, a Semitic tribe ruled over by Adoni-Zedek. Joshua soundly defeated an alliance of rulers headed by Adoni-Zedek (Josh. 10) but never took Jerusalem, which became a neutral city between Judah and Benjamin. It was still administered by Jebusites, even though the men of Judah overran and burned at least parts of the city (Judg. 1:8, 21). This situation changed when King David decided to move his capital from Hebron. He decisively conquered the Jebusites (2 Sam. 5:6–10) and established Jerusalem (or Zion) as his strategic center and political capital. Calling it the City of David (2 Sam. 5:9), he fortified and beautified it until his death, and his successor, Solomon, pursued the same course even more lavishly.

The division of the kingdom immediately after Solomon's death marked the beginning of several stages of decline. Now the capital of the southern kingdom only, Jerusalem was plundered by Egyptians under Shishak as early as the fifth year of Rehoboam (1 Kings 14:25–26). Fresh looting took place in Jehoram's reign, this time by a concert of Philistines and Arabs; and part of the walls were destroyed in skirmishes between Amaziah of the southern kingdom and Jehoash of the north. Repairs enabled the city under Ahaz to withstand the onslaught of Syria and Israel, and again the city providentially escaped when the northern kingdom was destroyed by the Assyrians. But eventually the city was captured (597 B.C.) and then destroyed (586 B.C.) by the Babylonians, and most of the inhabitants killed or transported.

Persian rule brought about the return of a few thousand Jews to the land and city, and the erection of a smaller temple than the majestic center built by Solomon; but the walls were not rebuilt until the middle of the fifth century under the leadership of Nehemiah. Jerusalem's vassal status continued under the Greeks when Alexander the Great overthrew the Persian Empire; but after his untimely death (323 B.C.) Jerusalem became the center of a brutal conflict between the Seleucid dynasty in the north and the Ptolemies of Egypt in the south. The struggle bred the Jewish revolt led by the Maccabees, who succeeded in rededicating the temple in 165 B.C. Infighting and corruption contributed to the decisive defeat of the city by the Romans in 63 B.C. and its pacification in 54 B.C.

Herod the Great came to power in 37 B.C. as a vassal king responsible to Rome, and embarked on the enlargement and beautification of the temple and other buildings, projects not completed until decades after his death. The Jewish revolt that began in A.D. 66 inevitably led to the destruction of the city by the Romans in A.D. 70. A further revolt under Bar Cochba in A.D. 132 led to the city's destruction once again (135). This time the Romans rebuilt the city on a smaller scale and as a pagan center, banning all Jews from living there—a ban that was not lifted until the reign of Constantine. From the early fourth century on, Jerusalem became a "Christian" city and the site of many churches and monasteries. Successive occupiers—Persians, Arabs, Turks, Crusaders, British, Israelis—have left their religious and cultural stamp on the city, which since 1967 has been unified under Israeli military might. The political future of the city, especially the Old City, is uncertain, as the Palestinian-Israeli peace talks unfold.

The Centrality of Jerusalem. From the time that Jerusalem became both the political and the cultic capital of the children of Israel, it progressively served as a bifocal symbol: on the one hand it reflected the people and all their sinfulness and waywardness; on the other it represented the place where God made himself known and the anticipation of all the eschatological blessing that God had in store for his people. In Scripture, Zion is the city of God (Pss. 46:4; 48:1–2) and therefore the joy of the whole earth (Ps. 48:2). The Lord himself has chosen Zion (Ps. 132:13–14), which consequently serves as his abode. But if Jerusalem thus becomes virtually equivalent to "temple," it can in other images represent all of God's covenant people; indeed, to be "born in Zion" is to know God and experience his salvation (Ps. 87:5). These strands come together at least in part because the temple is located on the holy hill called Zion (Ps. 15:1; Isa. 31:4; Joel 2:1); equally, the holy hill is set in parallel with Jerusalem (Dan. 9:16–17). Hence Jerusalem is the holy city (Neh. 11:1; Isa. 48:2; 52:1), so much so that going up to Zion is virtually equivalent to approaching Yahweh (Jer. 31:6) and salvation out of Zion is, of course, from the Lord (Ps. 14:7; cf. Pss. 128:5; 134:3).

Jerusalem's Sin. Precisely because of these associations, the sin of its people is the more grievous. The prophets (esp. Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Micah) speak of Jerusalem as a prostitute, fallen away from God, guilty of idolatry and of flagrant disregard of God's commandments. The city must stand under the judgment of God (e.g. Isa. 1:21; 29:1–4; 33:9–14; Jer. 6:22–30). Jerusalem's social and religious transgressions are so gross and persistent that Ezekiel labels it "the city of bloodshed" (Ezek. 22:2–3; 24:6). In its sin Jerusalem is counted as part of the pagan world (Ezek. 16:1–3) and will certainly be destroyed (Ezek. 15:6). The citizens of Jerusalem are worse than Samaria and Sodom (Lam. 4:6; Ezek. 16:44–58; cf. Amos 2:4–5; Mal. 2:11). The city taken by David will now be taken in judgment (Isa. 29:1–7).

Analogous to this bifocal casting of Jerusalem's symbolic significance stands the prophetic intertwining of threatened destruction and promised eschatological blessing. Because Jerusalem is so sinful, it must be judged and destroyed (Isa. 1:21; 32:13–14; Ezek. 22:19); the guilty must be brought to account (Zeph. 1:12). At one level this judgment is executed in the horrors of the exile (2 Kings 24:13, 20; Jer. 42:18; 44:13; Lam. 1–5); but according to Jesus this is not the only judgment Jerusalem must face (Matt. 23:37–39).

Jerusalem's Glory. Yet all is not gloom. Nations used by God to punish Jerusalem must themselves be called to account (Ps. 137:1, 4–9; Isa. 10:12). Promises for the restoration of Jerusalem following the exile become linked with promises of eschatological blessing (Isa. 40:1–5; 54:11–17; 60; cf. Hag. 2:19; Zech. 1:12–17). Yahweh can no more forget Jerusalem than a woman can forget her child (Isa. 49:13–18). Ezekiel anticipates the return of Yahweh to Zion (43:1–9). In Zion, Yahweh will inaugurate his eschatological rule (Pss. 146:10; 149:2; Isa. 24:23; 52:7; Obad. 21; Mic. 4:7; Zeph. 3:14; Zech. 14:9), whether personally or through Messiah (Zech. 9:9–10), his servant (Isa. 40–66).

Although there are frequent demands that Jerusalem (and by metonymy all Israel) repent as a presage of the eschatological glory, yet ultimately Jerusalem's glory rests on God's saving intervention (Isa. 62; 66:10–15). He it is who washes away the filth of Zion's sin (Isa. 4:4). Jerusalem will become the eschatological capital (Isa. 16:1; 45:14), will be awarded a new name expressive of Yahweh's delight and rights (Isa. 62:4, 12; Jer. 3:17; 33:16; Ezek. 48:35; Zech. 8:3), will be built with unfathomable opulence (Isa. 54:11–17), and will be secure from all enemies (Isa. 52:1; Joel 2:32; 3:17). The redeemed who return to Zion constitute the holy remnant (2 Kings 19:31; Isa. 4:3; 35:10; 51:11)—a theme which suggests that the early return to Jerusalem after the exile constitutes an anticipation of an eschatological return (Isa. 27:13; 62:11; Zech. 6:8, 15). The temple is central to the city (Ezek. 40–48; cf. Isa. 44:28; Zech. 1:16).

The eschatological glory to be experienced by Zion is accompanied by a transformation of nature and by long and abundant life, heroic strength, economic prosperity, joy, and thankful praise (Isa. 11; 12:4–6; 61:3; 62:8–9; 65:20; Jer. 33:11; Zech. 2:4, 5). Although there is repeated assurance that the nations that have savaged Jerusalem will themselves be ravaged, in another emphasis the nations of the earth, after an unsuccessful campaign against Jerusalem (Isa. 29:7–8; Mic. 4:11), join in a great pilgrimage to Zion, where they are taught by Yahweh to live according to his will (Isa. 2:2–4; Jer. 33:9; Mic. 4:1–3; Zech. 2:11). In all this Jerusalem retains a central place.

Jerusalem in NT Teachings. In the NT "Zion" occurs only seven times: Romans 9:33 and 1 Peter 2:6 (citing Isa. 28:16), Romans 11:26 (citing Isa. 59:20), Matthew 21:5 and John 12:15 (cf. Zech. 9:9; Isa. 40:9; 62:11—all with reference to the inhabitants addressed as the daughter of Zion), and in two independent uses, Hebrews 12:22 and Revelation 14:1 (both "Mount Zion"). But "Jerusalem" occurs 139 times. Even many of the occurrences in the Gospels and Acts that at first glance seem to bear nothing more than topographical significance tend to fall into identifiable patterns. Jerusalem is still "the holy city" (Matt. 4:5; 27:53), the home of the temple and its priestly service, as well as the center of rabbinic authority. Jesus must die in the Jerusalem area (Matt. 16:21; Mark 10:33–34; Luke 9:31), in direct conflict with these central Jewish institutions. His death and resurrection stand in fulfillment of all they represented; but the irony and tragedy of the sacrifice is that the people connected with these institutions recognized little of this salvation-historical fulfillment. The temple had become a den of thieves (Mark 11:17), and Jerusalem itself lived up to its reputation as killer of the prophets (Matt. 23:37–39; cf. Luke 13:33). Jerusalem must be destroyed by foreign invaders (Matt. 23:38; Luke 19:43–44; 21:20, 24). In Acts Jerusalem is the hub from with the gospel radiates outward (Acts 1:8), the site both of Pentecost and of the apostolic council; but if it is the moral and salvation-historical center of Christianity, it is also the ideological home of Judaizers who wish to make the entire Mosaic code a precondition for Gentile conversion to Jesus Messiah—a position Paul condemns (Gal. 1:8–9). Paul himself, however, is quick to recognize how beholden all other believers are to the Christian remnant of Jerusalem (Gal. 2:10; 2 Cor. 8–9) which in a salvation-historical sense is truly the mother church. At the same time, Paul uses Jerusalem or Mount Zion in a modified typology to align freedom, Christians, and the blessings of the heavenly Jerusalem over against law, Jesus without Christ, and Mount Sinai (Gal. 4:21–31).

Jerusalem

A still deeper connection links OT treatment of Jerusalem to the “heavenly Jerusalem” (Heb. 12:22), to which Christian believers have already come, and to “Jerusalem above” (Gal. 4:26), which in an extended typology embraces new covenant believers and relegates geographical Jerusalem and its children to slavery: Jesus fulfills and to that extent replaces the OT types and shadows that anticipated him. Jesus enters Jerusalem as messianic king (Mark 11:1–11) and is concerned to see Jerusalem’s temple pure (Mark 11:15–17) precisely because the city and temple anticipate his own impending death and resurrection—events that shift the focal meeting place between God and man to Jesus himself (Mark 14:57–58; John 2:19–22). This constitutes part of a broader pattern, worked out in some detail in the Epistle to the Hebrews, in which the gospel and its entailments simultaneously fulfill OT institutions and expectations and render them obsolete (e.g., Heb. 8:13). The ultimate goal is the new Jerusalem.

Jerusalem and the Church. Difficulties in rightly relating OT and NT materials on Jerusalem have contributed to the church’s changing perceptions regarding itself, the Jews, and Jerusalem. Especially in the wake of the destruction of A.D. 132–35 Christians saw themselves as the exclusive heirs of the covenant people of old: Christians constituted the true Jerusalem. Geographical Jerusalem became a focal point for Christian piety and tradition, an ideal location for monasteries and basilicas, especially after Helena, mother of Constantine, devoted great attention to Christian sites around the city. The Constantinian settlement (early fourth century) continued to see Christianity as the legitimate heir of Judaism, but its mingling of ecclesiastical and spiritual authority led both to persecution of Jews and to substantial disillusionment when Rome, perceived as the successor of Jerusalem, was ransacked by barbarians. The latter event prompted Augustine to write his famous City of God, which shifted the focus of the true city from both Jerusalem and Rome to the spiritual dimension; but this stance was easily overlooked during the height of medieval Catholicism, when Rome’s authority frequently extended itself to all temporal spheres. The Reformation, and especially the Puritan awakening in England, while preserving a certain harshness toward Jews, became progressively interested in Jewish evangelism—not in order to restore the Jews to Jerusalem, but to reincorporate them into the people of God and thus (in the case of the Puritan hope) to usher in the expected millennial age.

Modern theological treatments frequently focus on the replacement theme (W. D. Davies, Gospel and Land) or use the city as a cipher for a colorful intermingling of sociology and Barthianism (J. Ellul, Meaning of the City). Conservatives tend to dispute how much of the OT promises regarding Jerusalem’s restoration are taken up in NT typological fulfillment. Positions range from a thoroughgoing affirmation of typology (various forms of amillennialism) to equally thoroughgoing disjunction (various forms of dispensationalism). The typological cannot be ignored, nor can the NT’s substantial silence on the future of Jerusalem and the land; but some passages, notably Luke 21:21–24, anticipate the restoration of Jerusalem’s fortunes, whether in the empirical city or in the eschatological antitype.

D. A. CARSON

See also JERUSALEM, NEW.

Bibliography. F. F. Bruce, “Paul and Jerusalem,” TB 19:3–23; M. Burrows, IDB 2:843–66; G. Fohrer and E. Lohse, TDNT 7:292–338; H. Geva, Ancient Jerusalem Revealed; J. Jeremias, Jerusalem in the Time of Jesus; K. M. Kenyon, Digging Up Jerusalem; R. M. Mackowski, Jerusalem: City of Jesus; W. H. Mare, Archaeology of the Jerusalem Area; B. Mazar, Mountain of the Lord; J. Munck, Paul and the Salvation of Mankind; G. F. Oehler, Theology of the Old Testament, 509–21; B. C. Ollenburger, Zion, the City of the Great King; D. F. Payne, IBD 2:752–60; J. B. Payne, ZPEB 3:459–95; F. E. Peters, Jerusalem; G. N. H. Peters, Theocratic Kingdom 3:32–63; N. W. Porteous, “Jerusalem-Zion: the Growth of a Symbol,” in Living the Mystery; J. D. Purvis, Jerusalem, the Holy City: A Bibliography; H. Shanks, Jerusalem: An Archaeological Biography; G. A. Smith, Jerusalem; P. W. L. Walker, ed., Jerusalem Past and Present in the Purposes of God; Y. Yadin, ed., Jerusalem Revealed.

Jerusalem, New. Already in Paul and in the Epistle to the Hebrews, Jerusalem becomes an antitypical symbol for the church, the new covenant community, the “Mount Zion” which is the locus of the firstborn (Gal. 4:26; Heb. 12:22). In the Apocalypse this theme extends to a further expression, “the new Jerusalem” (Rev. 3:12; 21:2).

In the first occurrence (3:12) one of the rewards promised to the believers in Philadelphia (3:7–13) is “the name of my God and the name of the city of my God, the new Jerusalem, which is coming down out of heaven from my God.” All seven of the letters of Revelation 2–3 utilize elements that speak loudly to the cultural and historical backgrounds of the immediate recipients. Philadelphia had suffered a series of disastrous earthquakes that had bred major insecurity; and the church, small and faithful but not strong, suffered from similar feelings of insecurity. The risen Christ therefore reassures his people by promising an eminently suitable reward: they will be made pillars in the temple of God (in an earthquake zone!), the temple they will never leave, and they will be characterized by the name of the new Jerusalem, the city of God. Whatever theological value rests in this rubric, it also symbolizes in this context the ultimate hope and reward of the church, the dwelling place of God, sovereignly interposed by God and characterized by massive stability and unending endurance.

The new Jerusalem receives extended treatment in Revelation 21–22. The ultimate state of the church, and her reward, is presented under diverse metaphors: the church is simultaneously “prepared as a bride beautifully dressed for her husband”—indeed, she is “the bride, the wife of the Lamb” (21:2, 9), and “the Holy City, the new Jerusalem, coming down out of heaven from God” (21:2). The holy city is perfectly symmetrical (21:16) and is constructed with materials of fabulous wealth (21:18–21, using language from Isa. 54:11). It shines with the glory of God (Rev. 21:11) and has foundations named after the apostles and gates named after the twelve tribes of Israel (21:12, 14). The water of life flows from the throne of God down the middle of the main street (22:1), and on each side of the stream the tree of life bears a different crop of fruit each month. The throne of God and of the Lamb is in the city (22:3); night and tears have both been banished (21:4; 22:5). Best of all, God’s servants will see his face, and that will provide all the light they need (22:4–5). The “nations” are not other than the church, since they have free access to this city that does not admit anything impure (21:24–27; 22:2); rather, the city becomes the focal point of the existence of all the redeemed in the new heaven and new earth.

The rich symbolism reaches beyond our finest imaginings, not only to the beatific vision but to a renewed, joyous, industrious, orderly, holy, loving, eternal, and abundant existence. Perhaps the most moving element in the description is what is missing: there is no temple in the new Jerusalem, “because the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are its temple” (21:22). Vastly outstripping the expectations of Judaism, this stated omission signals the ultimate reconciliation.

D. A. CARSON

See also CHURCH; JERUSALEM.

Jesuits. See SOCIETY OF JESUS.

Jesus Christ. The expression is a combination of a name, “Jesus” (of Nazareth), and the title “Messiah” (Hebrew) or “Christ” (Greek), which means “anointed.” In Acts 5:42, where we read of “preaching Jesus the Christ” (literal trans.), this combination of the name and the title is still apparent. As time progressed, however, the title became so closely associated with the name that the combination soon was transformed from the confession—Jesus (who is) the Christ—to a confessional name—Jesus Christ. The appropriateness of this title for Jesus was such that even Jewish Christian writers quickly referred to Jesus Christ rather than Jesus the Christ (cf. Matt. 1:1; Rom. 1:7; Heb. 13:8; James 1:1; 1 Pet. 1:1).

Sources of Information. The sources for our knowledge of Jesus Christ can be divided into two main groups: non-Christian and Christian.

Non-Christian Sources. These sources can be divided again into two groups: pagan and Jewish. Both are limited in their value. There are essentially only three pagan sources of importance: Pliny (Epistles x.96); Tacitus (Annals xv.44); and Suetonius (Lives xxv.4). All these date from the second decade of the second century. The main Jewish sources are Josephus (Antiquities xviii.3.3 and xx.9.1) and the Talmud. The non-Christian sources provide meager information about Jesus, but they do establish the fact that he truly lived, that he gathered disciples, performed healings, and that he was condemned to death by Pontius Pilate.

Christian Sources. The nonbiblical Christian sources consist for the most part of the apocryphal gospels (A.D. 150–350) and the “agrapha” (“unwritten sayings” of Jesus, i.e., supposedly authentic sayings of Jesus not found in the canonical Gospels). Their value is quite dubious in that what is not utterly fantastic (cf. Infancy Gospel of Thomas) or heretical (cf. Gospel of Truth) is at best only possible and not provable (cf. Gospel of Thomas 31, 47).

The biblical materials can be divided into the Gospels and Acts through Revelation. The information we can learn from Acts through Revelation is essentially as follows: Jesus was born a Jew (Gal. 4:4) and was a descendant of David (Rom. 1:3); he was gentle (2 Cor. 10:1), righteous (1 Pet. 3:18), sinless (2 Cor. 5:21), humble (Phil. 2:6), and was tempted (Heb. 2:18; 4:15); he instituted the Lord’s Supper (1 Cor. 11:23–26), was transfigured (2 Pet. 1:17–18), was betrayed (1 Cor. 11:23), was crucified (1 Cor. 1:23), rose from the dead (1 Cor. 15:3–8), and ascended to heaven (Eph. 4:8). Certain specific sayings of Jesus are known (cf. Acts 20:35; 1 Cor. 7:10; 9:14), and possible allusions to his sayings are also found (e.g., Rom. 12:14, 17; 13:7, 8–10; 14:10).

The major sources for our knowledge of Jesus are the canonical Gospels. These Gospels are generally divided into two groups: the Synoptic Gospels (the “look-alike” Gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke) and John. The former are generally understood to “look alike” due to their having a literary relationship. The most common explanation of this literary relationship is that Mark wrote first and that Matthew and Luke used Mark and another source, now lost, which contained mostly teachings of Jesus (called "Q") and that they used other materials as well ("M" = the materials found only in Matthew; "L" = the materials found only in Luke).

Jesus Christ

Jesus of Nazareth. In Matthew and Luke we find accounts of the birth of Jesus. Both accounts point out that Jesus was born of a virgin by the name of Mary in the town of Bethlehem (Matt. 1:18–2:12; Luke 1:26–2:7; attempts to find allusions to the virgin birth in Gal. 4:4 and John 8:41 are quite forced). Attempts to explain these accounts as parallels to Greek myths stumble on the lack of any really substantial parallels in Greek literature and above all on the Jewish nature of these accounts.

The ministry of Jesus began with his baptism by John (Mark 1:1–15; Acts 1:21–22; 10:37) and his temptation by Satan. His ministry involved the selection of twelve disciples (Mark 3:13–19), which symbolized the regathering of the twelve tribes of Israel; the preaching of the need of repentance (Mark 1:15) and the arrival of the kingdom of God in his ministry (Luke 11:20); the offer of salvation to the outcasts of society (Mark 2:15–17; Luke 15; 19:10); the healing of the sick and demon-possessed (which is referred to in the Jewish Talmud); and his glorious return to consummate the kingdom.

The turning point in Jesus' ministry came at Caesarea Philippi when, after being confessed as the Christ by Peter, he acknowledged the correctness of this confession and proceeded to tell the disciples of his forthcoming death (Matt. 16:13–21; Mark 8:27–31). Advancing toward Jerusalem, Jesus cleansed the temple and in so doing judged the religion of Israel (note Mark's placement of the account between 11:12–14 and 11:20–21 as well as the contents of the following two chapters). On the night in which he was betrayed he instituted the ordinance of the Lord's Supper, which refers to the new covenant sealed by his sacrificial blood and the victorious regathering in the kingdom of God (Matt. 26:29; Mark 14:25; Luke 22:18; 1 Cor. 11:26). Thereupon he was arrested in the Garden of Gethsemane, tried before the Sanhedrin, Herod Antipas, and finally Pontius Pilate, who condemned him to death on political charges for claiming to be the Messiah (Mark 15:26; John 19:19). On the eve of the sabbath Jesus was crucified for the sins of the world (Mark 10:45) outside the city of Jerusalem (John 19:20) at a place called Golgotha (Mark 15:22) between two thieves who may have been revolutionaries (Matt. 27:38).

He gave up his life before the sabbath came, so there was no need to hasten his death by crurifragium, i.e., the breaking of his legs (John 19:31–34). He was buried in the tomb of Joseph of Arimathea (Mark 15:43; John 19:38) on the eve of the sabbath. On the first day of the week, which was the third day (Friday to 6 P.M. = day 1; Friday 6 P.M. = day 2; Saturday 6 P.M. to Sunday A.M. = day 3), he rose from the dead, the empty tomb was discovered, and he appeared to his followers (Matt. 28; Mark 16; Luke 24; John 20–21). He stayed forty days with the disciples and then ascended into heaven (Acts 1:1–11).

So ended the three-year ministry (John 2:13; 5:1; 6:4; 13:1) of Jesus of Nazareth.

The Christ of Faith. The unique self-understanding of Jesus can be ascertained by two means: the implicit Christology revealed by his actions and words, and the explicit Christology revealed by the titles he chose to describe himself.

Implicit Christology. Jesus during his ministry acted as one who possessed a unique authority. He assumed for himself the prerogative of cleansing the temple (Mark 11:27–33), of bringing the outcasts into the kingdom of God (Luke 15), and of having divine authority to forgive sins (Mark 2:5–7; Luke 7:48–49).

Jesus also spoke as one who possessed authority greater than that of the OT (Matt. 5:31–32, 38–39), than Abraham (John 8:53), Jacob (John 4:12), and the temple (Matt. 12:6). He claimed to be Lord of the Sabbath (Mark 2:28). He even claimed that the destiny of all people depended on how they responded to him (Matt. 10:32–33; 11:6; Mark 8:34–38).

Explicit Christology. Along with the implicit Christology of his behavior Jesus also made certain christological claims by means of the various titles he used for himself. He referred to himself as the Messiah or Christ (Mark 8:27–30; 14:61–62), and his formal sentence of death on political grounds (note the superscription on the cross) only makes sense on the basis of Jesus' having acknowledged that he was the Messiah. He referred to himself also as the Son of God (Matt. 11:25–27; Mark 12:1–9), and a passage such as Mark 13:32 in which he clearly distinguished between himself and others must be authentic, for no one in the church would have created a saying such as this in which the Son of God claims to be ignorant as to the time of the end. Jesus' favorite self-designation, due to its concealing as well as revealing nature, was the title Son of Man. Jesus in using this title clearly had in mind the Son of Man of Daniel 7:13, as is evident from Matt. 10:23; 19:28; 25:31; Mark 8:38; 13:26; 14:62. Therefore, rather than stressing humility, it is clear that this title reveals the divine authority Jesus possesses as the Son of Man to judge the world and his sense of having come from the Father (cf. here also Matt. 5:17; 10:34; Mark 2:17; 10:45). Many attempts have been made to deny the authenticity of some or all of the Son of Man sayings, but such attempts founder on the fact that this title is found in all the Gospel strata (Mark, Q, M, L, and John) and satisfies perfectly the “criterion of dissimilarity,” which states that if a saying or title like this could not have arisen out of Judaism or out of the early church, it must be authentic. The denial of the authenticity of this title is therefore based not so much on exegetical issues as upon rationalistic presuppositions which a priori deny that Jesus of Nazareth could have spoken of himself in this way.

The Christology of the NT. Within the NT numerous claims are made concerning Jesus Christ. Through his resurrection Jesus has been exalted and given lordship over all creation (1 Cor. 15:27; Phil. 2:9–11; Col. 1:16–17). The use of the title “Lord” for Jesus quickly resulted in the association of the person and work of Jesus with the Lord of the OT—i.e., Yahweh. (Cf. Rom. 10:9–13 with Joel 2:32; 2 Thess. 1:7–10, 1 Cor. 5:5 with Isa. 2:10–19; 2 Thess. 1:12 with Isa. 66:5; 1 Cor. 16:22 and Rev. 22:20; Phil. 2:11.) His preexistence is referred to (2 Cor. 8:9; Phil. 2:6; Col. 1:15–16); he is referred to as creator (Col. 1:16); he is said to possess the “form” of God (Phil. 2:6) and be the “image” of God (Col. 1:15; cf. also 2 Cor. 4:4). He is even referred to explicitly in a number of places as “God” (John 1:1; 20:28; Rom. 9:5; 2 Thess. 1:12; Titus 2:13; Heb. 1:5–8; 1 John 5:20; although the exegesis of some of these passages is debated, some of them clearly refer to Jesus as “God”).

The Quest for the Historical Jesus. The beginning of the quest for the historical Jesus can be dated to 1774–78 when the poet Lessing published posthumously the lecture notes of Hermann Samuel Reimarus. These notes challenged the traditional portrait of Jesus found in the NT and the church. For Reimarus, Jesus never made any messianic claim, never instituted any sacraments, never predicted his death, and did not rise from the dead. The story of Jesus was in fact a deliberate deception by the disciples. In so portraying Jesus, Reimarus raised the question, “What was Jesus of Nazareth really like?” And so the quest to find the “real” Jesus arose. During the earliest part of the nineteenth century the dominating method of research in the quest was rationalism, and attempts were made to explain “rationally” the life of Christ (cf. K. H. Venturini’s Non-Supernatural History of the Great Prophet of Nazareth). A major turning point came when D. F. Strauss’s Life of Christ was published in 1835, for Strauss in pointing out the futility of the rationalistic approach argued that the miraculous elements in the Gospels were to be understood as nonhistorical “myths.” This new approach was in turn succeeded by the liberal interpretation of the life of Jesus, which minimized and neglected the miraculous dimension of the Gospels and viewed it as “husk” that had to be eliminated in order to concentrate on the teachings of Jesus. Not surprisingly, this approach found in the teachings of Jesus such liberal doctrines as the fatherhood of God, the brotherhood of man, and the infinite value of the human soul.

The “death” of the quest came about for several reasons. For one, it became apparent, through the work of Albert Schweitzer, that the liberal Jesus never existed but was simply a creation of liberal wishfulness. Another factor that helped end the quest was the realization that the Gospels were not simple objective biographies which could easily be mined for historical information. This was the result of the work of William Wrede and the form critics. Still another reason for the death of the quest was the realization that the object of faith for the church throughout the centuries had never been the historical Jesus of theological liberalism but the Christ of faith, i.e., the supernatural Christ proclaimed in the Scriptures. Martin Kähler was especially influential in this regard.

During the period between the two World Wars, the quest lay dormant for the most part due to disinterest and doubt as to its possibility. In 1953 a new quest arose at the instigation of Ernst Käsemann. Käsemann feared that the discontinuity in both theory and practice between the Jesus of history and the Christ of faith was very much like the early docetic heresy, which denied the humanity of the Son of God. As a result he argued that it was necessary to establish a continuity between the historical Jesus and the Christ of faith. Furthermore he pointed out that the present historical skepticism about the historical Jesus was unwarranted because some historical data were available and undeniable. The results of this new quest have been somewhat disappointing, and the enthusiasm that greeted it can be said, for the most part, to have disappeared. New tools have been honed during this period, however, which can assist in this historical task.

The major problem that faces any attempt to arrive at the “historical Jesus” involves the definition of the term “historical.” In critical circles the term is generally understood as “the product of the historical-critical method.” This method for many assumes a closed continuum of time and space in which divine intervention, i.e., the miraculous, cannot intrude. Such a definition will, of course, always have a problem seeking to find continuity between the supernatural Christ and the Jesus of history, who by such a definition cannot be supernatural. If “historical” means nonsupernatural, there can never be a real continuity between the Jesus of historical research and the Christ of faith. It is becoming clear, therefore, that this definition of “historical” must be challenged, and even in Germany spokesmen are arising who speak of the need for the historical-critical method to assume an openness to transcendence, i.e., openness to the possibility of the miraculous. Only in this way can there ever be hope of establishing a continuity between the Jesus of historical research and the Christ of faith.

Jesus Christ

R. H. STEIN

See also BAPTISM OF JESUS; CHRISTOLOGY; LOGOS; MESSIAH; PREEXISTENCE OF CHRIST; RESURRECTION OF CHRIST; SECOND COMING OF CHRIST; SERMON ON THE MOUNT; SINLESSNESS OF CHRIST; STATES OF JESUS CHRIST; VIRGIN BIRTH OF JESUS.

Bibliography. M. Bockmuehl, This Jesus; G. A. Boyd, Cynic Sage or Son of God?; R. E. Brown, Death of the Messiah; F. F. Bruce, Jesus and Christian Origins outside the New Testament; S. T. Davis, Risen Indeed: Making Sense of the Resurrection; J. B. Green, ed., Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels; J. G. Machen, Virgin Birth of Christ; I. H. Marshall, Origins of New Testament Christology; J. P. Meier, Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus; B. F. Meyer, Aims of Jesus; E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism; J. W. Shepard, Christ of the Gospels; R. H. Stein, Method and Message of Jesus' Teachings and Jesus the Messiah; G. H. Twelftree, Jesus the Exorcist; J. van Bruggen, Christ on Earth; J. J. Wilkins and J. P. Moreland, eds., Jesus under Fire; B. Witherington III, Christology of Jesus; Jesus Quest: The Third Search for the Jew of Nazareth; N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God.

Jesus Prayer. See HESYCHASM.

Jesus Seminar. "A small, self-selected association of academics who meet twice a year to debate the Historical Jesus" (L. T. Johnson). It was founded by Robert Funk in 1985. Other scholars of repute supporting its work include John Dominic Crossan and Marcus Borg. It champions a mission of debunking the perception fostered in the Gospels and many churches that Jesus was not only human but also a divine figure who brought salvation and will one day rule all things as sovereign Lord. It has marketed its views skillfully and attracted widespread media interest in its proceedings.

The Seminar's ostensible focus is academically rigorous examination of the Gospel traditions relating to Jesus. Such scrutiny of the Gospels has long been a feature of scholarship, not only in the modern academy but also in the ancient church. Augustine was not alone in laboring diligently to work out how the Gospels interrelate. Calvin toiled prodigiously to account for the similarities and differences in the biblical narratives. Since the Enlightenment millions of man-hours have been expended in seeking the most critically assured reconstruction possible of Jesus' times, words, and importance.

The Seminar's distinctive feature is its wholesale commitment to seven "pillar" assumptions about the Gospels and Jesus. Zeal for these assumptions, most of them disputed by other scholars, casts doubt on its claims to scholarly probity. These are: (1) the "historical" Jesus is not the "Christ" confessed by the church; (2) the Jesus of John's Gospel is almost completely fictitious; (3) Matthew and Luke are largely derived from Mark; (4) more important than Mark to Matthew and Luke was a hypothetical document called Q (consisting of about 225 verses common to Matthew and Luke and absent from Mark); (5) Jesus was not an eschatological visionary with respect to either some "second coming" on his part or some cataclysmic divine intervention by God to end the present age and inaugurate the final one; (6) Jesus must be considered within an "oral culture" context, claimed to be quite different from a written culture; and (7) the Gospels are false in matters of history unless they can be shown to the modern skeptic's satisfaction to be true.

Of these seven pillars, only (3) and (4) represent scholarly consensus undergirded by clear evidence (and some scholars dispute even these). The other five are either unproved or unprovable. They are at best mere arbitrary working guidelines, "pillars" suspended in rhetorical midair.

The Seminar's procedure has been to vote on the likelihood of Jesus' sayings using colored beads. They are extending the same method to his deeds. Their findings (not surprisingly, given the "pillars" on which their observations rest) is that Jesus said and did little of what the Gospels report.

The Seminar has drawn criticism regarding its membership, methods, claims, and publicity tactics. Many experts along the full sweep of the academic spectrum have distanced themselves from the group. This has not prevented the sowing of much confusion by the Seminar's pronouncements among their target audience: the general public. But in some instances its labors have backfired: curious observers have been moved to probe Gospel evidences for themselves and discovered that the chasm between the Jesus of (fair-minded) critical scrutiny and the Christ proclaimed in the gospel and confessing church is not nearly as gaping as the Jesus Seminar has warned. Jesus is found to be more credible than the Jesus Seminar.

R. W. YARBROUGH

Bibliography. R. Funk and R. Hoover, eds., Five Gospels; L. T. Johnson, Real Jesus; M. J. Wilkins and J. P. Moreland, Jesus under Fire; B. Witherington, Jesus Quest.

Jocz, Jakób (1906–1983). A Polish Christian of Jewish parentage, who became the premier theologian of the Hebrew Christian movement, precursor of contemporary Messianic Judaism. He was born near Vilna, Lithuania, then ruled by tsarist Russia, and his father served as a missionary for the Anglican "Church Missions to Jews"

(CMJ) from 1920 until his death in the Holocaust. Jakób was drafted into the army of the newly independent Poland shortly after World War I, rising to the rank of sergeant before resigning to pursue studies at the CMJ's Bible school in Warsaw. In 1934 he traveled to the CMJ's headquarters in London and on July 7, 1935, was ordained by the Church of England. He was married and thereafter returned to Warsaw to serve as an evangelist.

In the summer of 1939, Jocz and his wife traveled to London to address the Church Missionary Society's summer conference. Consequently, the Joczs found themselves in exile during the Second World War, thereby escaping annihilation during the Holocaust. During the war years, Jocz traveled throughout England raising funds for Jewish relief, almost the sole remaining work of the CMJ at this time.

After the war, still unable to return to Poland, Jocz accepted the call from an Anglican parish in north London, where he served as pastor from 1947 until 1956. During these years he also served as president of the International Hebrew Christian Alliance, at that time the only fraternal organization for Christians of Jewish heritage. This was also a period of ongoing debate between Jocz, representing the CMJ on behalf of Jewish missions, and James Parkes, whose liberal Anglican views were more popular with the Jewish Chronicle, principal newspaper of London's Jewish community.

From 1956 through 1960, Jocz served as director of Toronto's Nathanael Institute, but in 1959, he was invited to lecture at the city's Anglican seminary. The next year, he became professor of systematic theology at the seminary, where he taught for sixteen years, during which he traveled widely and published numerous articles and books, primarily on the relationship between Judaism and Christianity and the continuing validity of evangelization among the Jewish community.

Jocz's early evangelicalism emerged in articles written for Der Weg, a Yiddish language magazine of Poland's substantial pre-Holocaust Hebrew Christian community. In these articles, he was not particularly interested in Jewish religious thought—at least until "The Scriptures and the Jewish People" (in the January 1939 issue), in which he first discussed Christianity's debt to Judaism for its own scriptures. It was the Holocaust that forced Jocz to seek a reason for Jewish suffering, after which he hoped that a "new dawn" awaited the Jewish people. His articles during the war, and his first book, Is It Nothing to You?, attempted to awaken the church to the plight of Eastern Europe's Jews. After the war ended, he turned to the isolation of Hebrew Christians from the mainstream of the Jewish community and their separateness from Gentile Christianity as well. He was one of the first Christian writers to address Zionism (April 1945), and after the establishment of the Jewish State he suggested that the litmus test of Israel's new democracy was the treatment of Israel's Hebrew Christians (June 1949); he also exposed Christian anti-Semitism (October 1949) long before it became fashionable in Christian theology. His concern about emerging pluralism also anticipated postmodern theology. Although not a New Testament specialist, he critiqued Franz Rosenzweig's theoretical division of primitive Christianity into Petruskirche, the "Jewish Church," and johanneischer Kirche, which saw Jews as Other. Further, he urged caution in reading back church anti-Semitism into the New Testament documents (September 1953), although anticipating the subsequent theological reassessment of Christian anti-Semitism (May 1955).

His was a theology of tension—between law and grace, Judaism and Christianity, old and new covenants, dialogue and evangelism, and old-fashioned Christendom and not-yet-emerging pluralism, which he often termed "syncretism." Beginning in 1971 he was an active part of the Canadian Anglican/Roman Catholic dialogue, often focusing on the nature of the ordained ministry. In 1976 Jocz retired, although he continued to write.

K. W. RICK

See also ANTI-SEMITISM; GAEBELEIN, ARNO CLEMENS; MESSIANIC JUDAISM; ZIONISM; ZIONISM, CHRISTIAN.

Bibliography. J. Jocz, Christians and Jews: Encounter and Mission; Covenant: A Theology of Human Destiny; Is It Nothing to You?; Jewish People and Jesus Christ; Jewish People and Jesus Christ after Auschwitz; Judaism and the State of Israel; Spiritual History of Israel.

John, Theology of. For a man who has been so prominent in Christian thinking throughout the centuries, John is a strangely shadowy figure. In the Gospels and Acts he is almost invariably accompanied by someone else and the other person is the spokesman (there is an exception when John tells Jesus that he forbade a man to cast out demons; Luke 9:49). He is often linked with Peter and with his brother James, and these three were especially close to Jesus (Matt. 17:1; Mark 14:33; Luke 8:51). He and James were called "sons of thunder" (boanērges; Mark 3:17), which perhaps points to the kind of character revealed in their desire to call down fire from heaven on people who refused to receive Jesus (Luke 9:54).

We learn more from the writings linked with his name. The Fourth Gospel as it stands is anonymous, but there is good reason for thinking that John wrote it and that he was the beloved disciple who leaned on Jesus' breast at the Last Supper (John 13:23) and to whom the dying Jesus commended his mother (19:26–27). The impression we get is that John had entered into the mind of Jesus more than any of the other disciples had.

God as Father. From his Gospel we learn a good deal about the Father, and, indeed, it is to John more than anyone else that Christians owe their habit of referring to God simply as “the Father.” John uses the word “father” 137 times (which is more than twice as often as anyone else; Matthew has it 64 times, Paul 63). No less than 122 refer to God as Father, a beautiful emphasis that has influenced all subsequent Christian thinking. John also tells us that this God is love (1 John 4:8, 16), and love is an important topic in both his Gospel and his epistles. We know love in the Christian sense because we see it in the cross (John 3:16; 1 John 4:10); it is sacrificial giving, not for worthwhile people, but for sinners.

The Father is constantly active (John 5:17); he upholds his creation and brings blessing on those he has made. He is a great God whose will is done, particularly in election and salvation. “No one can come to me,” said Jesus, “unless the Father who sent me draws him” (6:44); and again, “You did not choose me, but I chose you” (15:16; cf. 8:47; 18:37).

The book of Revelation was written by John (Rev. 1:1–3), though which John is not specified. But there is good reason for seeing it as coming from John the apostle and as stressing an important aspect of Johannine thought, namely that of divine sovereignty. It is easy to get lost in a strange world of seals, trumpets, bowls, and animals with unusual numbers of heads and horns. But this is not the important thing. Throughout this book God is a mighty God. He does what he wills and, though wickedness is strong, in the end he will triumph over every evil thing. There is a great deal about the wrath of God in Revelation (and something about it in the Gospel), which brings out the truth that God is implacably opposed to evil and will in the end overthrow it entirely.

Christology. Throughout the Johannine writings there is a good deal of attention given to Christology. The Gospel begins with a section on Christ as the Word, a passage in which it is clear that God has taken action in Christ for revelation and for salvation. Jesus is “the Savior of the world” (John 4:42), and this is brought out when he is referred to as Christ (= Messiah), Son of God, Son of Man, and in other ways. They all depend in one way or another on the thought that God is active in Christ in bringing about the salvation he has planned. John has an interesting use of terms like “glory” and “glorify,” for he sees the cross as the glorification of Jesus (12:23; 13:31). Suffering and lowly service are not simply the path to glory; they are glory in its deepest sense. This striking form of speech brings out the truth that God is not concerned with the kind of thing that people see as glorious. The whole life of Jesus was lived in lowliness, but John can say, “We have seen his glory” (1:14).

Miracles. John’s treatment of the miracles is distinctive. He never calls them “mighty works” as do the Synoptists, but “signs” or “works.” They point us to significant truth, for God is at work in them. “Work” may be used of Jesus’ nonmiraculous deeds as well as those that are miraculous, which suggests that his life is all of a piece. He is one person; he does not do some things as God and others as man. But all he does is the outworking of his mission, a thought which means much to John. There are two Greek words for “to send,” and John’s Gospel has both more frequently than any other book in the NT. Mostly he uses the words to bring out the truth that the Father sent the Son, though there are some important passages linking the mission of his followers with that of Jesus (John 17:18; 20:21). Being sent means that Jesus became man in the fullest sense, as is brought out by his dependence on the Father (cf. 5:19, 30) and by statements about his human limitations (e.g. 4:6; 11:33, 35; 19:28). John’s Jesus is fully divine, indeed, but he is also fully human.

The Holy Spirit. John tells us more about the Holy Spirit than do the other evangelists. He is active from the beginning of Jesus’ ministry (John 1:32–33), but the full work of the Spirit on earth awaited the consummation of Jesus’ own ministry (7:39). The Spirit is active in the Christian life from the beginning (3:5, 8), and there are important truths about the Spirit in Jesus’ farewell discourse. There we learn among other things that he is “the Spirit of truth” (14:16–17), that he will never leave Jesus’ people (14:16), and that he has a work among unbelievers, namely that of convicting them of sin, righteousness, and judgment (16:8).

The Spirit is active in leading Christians in the way of truth (John 16:13), and John has a good deal to tell us about the Christian life. He speaks of “eternal life,” which seems to mean life proper to the age to come, life of the highest quality (cf. 10:10). Entrance into life is by believing, and John uses this verb ninety-eight times (though never the noun “faith”). Believers are to be characterized by love (13:34–35). They owe all they have to the love of God, and it is proper that they respond to that love with an answering love, a love for God that spills over into a love for other people. This receives strong emphasis in 1 John. John emphasizes the importance of light (for believers are people who “walk in the light”; 1 John 1:7) and of truth. Jesus is the truth (John 14:6) and the Spirit is the Spirit of truth (14:17). To know the truth is to be free (8:31–32).

John’s is a profound and deep theology, though expressed in the simplest of terms. It sets forth truths no Christian can neglect. L. L. MORRIS Bibliography. R. E. Brown, Gospel according to John; J. H. Charlesworth, ed., John and the Dead Sea Scrolls; J. E. Davey, Jesus of St. John; W. F. Howard, Christianity according to St. John; R. Kysar, Fourth Evangelist and His Gospel; C. F. Nolloth, Fourth Evangelist; N. J. Painter, John: Witness and Theologian; S. S. Smalley, John: Evangelist and Interpreter; D. M. Smith, Johannine Christianity; D. G. Vanderlip, Christianity according to John.

John of the Cross (1542–1591). One of the leading teachers of Christian contemplation or the mystical way, as well as a founder of the Discalced Carmelite order. Born Juan de Yepes y Álvarez in Old Castile, Spain, to a poor family of noble stock, he entered the Carmelite order in 1563 and, after a study of theology at Salamanca, was ordained in 1567. At that time the discipline of the Carmelite Order was relatively lax, and many of its leaders favored the mitigated observance. John, distressed by their laxity, came under the influence of Teresa of Ávila and, following her advice, attempted to introduce reform into the order. While in and out of office and prison because of his combination of great ability and reforming zeal (which his superiors mistrusted and feared), he produced some of the greatest mystical theological literature in the history of the church. The order itself eventually split into Calced and Discalced branches, as the stricter group withdrew in 1578 under the leadership of Teresa and John. His death was the result of privations suffered in these struggles.

While John of the Cross is best known for his Dark Night of the Soul, that work is but the second part of Ascent of Mount Carmel. This latter work deals with the purgative way, while the former instructs in the illuminative and unitive ways. Through the progressive stages of purgation (the night of the senses) and spiritual growth (the night of the spirit) the soul is prepared for union with God, described in terms of marriage (Living Flame of Love). While John was a strict monastic and a philosopher in the Thomistic tradition, and while he fed on Scripture, especially the hard sayings of Jesus and Paul, his poetic gentleness is evident in Spiritual Canticle (begun while in prison), and his wisdom as a spiritual guide and counselor shines through his work, which is important to pastors in many traditions but is invaluable to people interested in more mystical spiritual experience of the nonimaged type.

P. H. DAVIDS

See also ILLUMINATIVE WAY, THE; MYSTICISM; PURGATIVE WAY, THE; UNITIVE WAY, THE.

Bibliography. L. Christiani, St. John of the Cross; A. Cugno, St. John of the Cross; B. Frost, St. John of the Cross; E. A. Peers, Handbook to the Life and Times of Saint Teresa and Saint John of the Cross; Spirit of Flame.

John the Baptist. The son of Zechariah the priest and Elizabeth (also of priestly descent and a relative of Mary the mother of Jesus). Born in the hill country of Judah, his birth having been foretold by an angel (Luke 1:11–17) he spent his early years in the wilderness of Judea (1:80). His public ministry began in the fifteenth year of the emperor Tiberius (ca. A.D. 27), when he suddenly appeared out of the wilderness.

The Gospels look upon John as the fulfillment of the Elijah redivivus expectation, for both the announcing angel (Luke 1:17) and Jesus (Mark 9:11–13) expressly taught this. Furthermore, John's garb of a "garment of camel's hair, and a leather girdle around his waist" (Matt. 3:4) was similar to the dress of Elijah (2 Kings 1:8). Although John himself denied this identification (John 1:21–25), admitting only to being Isaiah's "voice in the wilderness" (1:23), it may be that he was disclaiming the popular hope for the literal resurrection of Elijah, accepting only the fulfillment of his spirit and power. Indeed this was the explicit promise of the angel.

John's message had a twofold emphasis: (1) the imminent appearance of the messianic kingdom, and (2) the urgent need for repentance to prepare for this event (Matt. 3:2). In true prophetic fashion his concept of the nature of the kingdom was not that of the popular mind and thus was a proper preparation for Christ. The multitudes expected the "day of the Lord" to be happiness for all Israel, basing their hope on racial considerations. John proclaimed that the kingdom was to be a rule of righteousness, inherited only by those who exhibited righteousness by the way they lived. Thus his message of repentance was directed particularly to the Jew, for God was going to purge Israel as well as the world (Matt. 3:7–12). When Jesus appeared on the scene John's role as a forerunner was completed in his personal testimony to the fact of Jesus' messiahship (John 1:29).

The baptism of John complemented his preparatory task. In its basic sense it was a symbolic act for the cleansing away of sin and was thus accompanied by repentance. So Matthew 3:6 says, "And they were baptized by him in the river Jordan while confessing fully (exomologoumenoi) their sins." But in its fullest sense it was an eschatological act preparing one for admission into the messianic kingdom. Thus when the Pharisees and Sadducees came for baptism, John said, "Who warned you to flee from the wrath coming?" (Matt. 3:7). Josephus's account of John's baptism (Antiquities xviii.5.2) is at variance with this, suggesting that its purpose was to provide a bodily purification to correspond with an already accomplished inward change. The historical background to John's baptism is probably Jewish proselyte baptism, with John emphasizing by this that both Jew and Gentile were ceremonially unclean as far as the true people of God were concerned. The baptism of Jesus by John (Matt. 3:13–15) is to be explained not as a sign that Jesus needed repentance, but rather that by this act he was identifying himself with mankind in the proper approach to God's kingdom.

John the Baptist

It has long been felt that John was at one time connected with the Essenes, because of his ascetic habits and his location near the chief settlement of the sect. This has been given greater possibility by the recognized affinities between John and the Dead Sea Scroll (Qumran) sect, an Essenish group which dwelt on the northwest shore of the Dead Sea. This connection is certainly possible, for both John and the Qumran sect resided in the wilderness of Judea, both were of a priestly character, both laid emphasis on baptism as a sign of inward cleansing, both were ascetic, both thought in terms of imminent judgment, and both invoked Isaiah 40:3 as the authority for their mission in life. But although John may have been influenced by the sect in the early stages of his life, his ministry was far greater. John's role was essentially prophetic; the sect's was esoteric. John issued a public call to repentance; the sect withdrew to the desert. John proclaimed an exhibition of repentance in the affairs of ordinary life; the sect required submission to the rigors of its ascetic life. John introduced the Messiah; the sect still waited for his manifestation.

John's denunciation of Herod Antipas for his marriage was the cause of his death by beheading (Matt. 14:1–12). Josephus tells us that this took place at the fortress of Machaerus near the Dead Sea. The Mandaeans were influenced by John, for he plays a large part in their writings. This connection may have come through John's disciples, who existed for at least twenty-five years after John's death (Acts 18:25; 19:3).

R. B. LAURIN

Bibliography. E. Barnwell, "The Baptist in Early Christian Tradition," NTS 18:95–128; F. F. Bruce, New Testament History; M. Burrows, More Light on the Dead Sea Scrolls; C. H. Kraeling, John the Baptist; J. A. T. Robinson, Twelve New Testament Studies; C. H. H. Scobie, John the Baptist; J. Steinmann, John the Baptist and the Desert Tradition; W. Wink, John the Baptist in the Gospel Tradition.

Jones, Griffith. See CALVINISTIC METHODISM.

Jones, Rufus Matthew (1863–1948). American Quaker philosopher. Born in South China, Maine, he studied at Haverford College, the University of Pennsylvania, Harvard, and in Europe, and became a minister of the Society of Friends in 1890. From schoolmastering at Oak Grove Seminary in Vassalboro, Maine (1889–93), he returned to teach philosophy at Haverford with which he maintained a connection for the rest of his life. His popularity as a lecturer is seen in the thirteen honorary degrees he received throughout his lifetime. A further early responsibility was the editorship of what became The American Friend (1894–1912), and he was instrumental in starting the Five Years Meetings of Friends.

Jones was also a prime mover in the founding (1917) of the American Friends Service Committee of which he was longtime chairman and about which he wrote in Service of Love (1920). Liberal theologian and strong ecumenist, he became the acknowledged spokesman for Quaker theology and outreach. He was active too as a peacemaker when differences arose among Friends. He wrote extensively on the place of Quakerism within the whole context of Christian mysticism, and his influence was felt in his co-authoring and editing the Roundtree Quaker History series.

J. D. DOUGLAS

See also FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF; MYSTICISM.

Bibliography. R. M. Jones, Call to What is Vital; Fundamental Ends of Life; Later Periods of Quakerism; Pathways to the Reality of God; Quaker in the American Colonies; Studies in Mystical Religion; H. H. Brinton, ed., Children of Light: In Honor of Rufus M. Jones; H. E. Fosdrick, ed., Rufus Jones Speaks to Our Times: An Anthology; D. Hinshaw, Rufus Jones, Master Quaker; N. O. Rush, Bibliography of the Published Writings of Rufus M. Jones; E. G. Vining, Friend of Life: The Biography of Rufus Jones.

Joy. A delight in life that runs deeper than pain or pleasure. From a biblical perspective it is not limited by nor tied solely to external circumstances. Joy is a gift of God, and like all of his other inner gifts it can be experienced even in the midst of extremely difficult circumstances.

In both the OT and the NT joy is presented as a consistent mark of both the individual believer and the believing community. It is a quality of life and not simply a fleeting emotion. It is grounded in God himself and flows from him (Ps. 16:11; Rom. 15:13). Joy is not an isolated or occasional consequence of faith, but rather an integral part of one's whole relation to God. The fullness of joy comes when there is a deep sense of the presence of God in one's life. From that awareness flows the strong desire to share what one is experiencing with others. It is too good to keep for oneself alone.

In the OT the most common Hebrew words for joy are šimhâ (gladness, mirth); gâl or gîl (to spring about, be joyful); māšôš (joy, rejoicing), and sāmēah (to shine, be glad). Both the experience and expression of joy were associated with God's mighty saving acts (Pss. 5:11; 9:2; 16:9; 32:11; 63:11; Isa. 35:10), with God's law (Ps. 119:14) and with God's Word (Jer. 15:16). This joy was celebrated at festivals with singing, shouting, clapping of hands, and dancing.

The NT words most commonly used are chara (joy) and chairō (to rejoice). Here joy is also connected with God's salvation (1 Pet. 1:6). What God has made available to all men in his redemptive grace is cause for great rejoicing. Jesus made it clear that joy is inseparably connected to love and to obedience (John 15:9–14). Paul identifies joy as a vital part of the fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22).

There can also be joy in suffering or in weakness when suffering is seen as having a redemptive purpose and weakness as bringing one to total dependency upon God (Matt. 5:12; 2 Cor. 12:9).

From a psychological perspective one cannot experience joy while being preoccupied with one's own security, pleasure, or self-interest. Freedom from inhibitions comes when one is caught up in something great enough to give meaning and purpose to all of life and to every relationship. God alone is the only adequate center for human existence, and he alone can enable us to experience life with joyous spontaneity and to relate to others with love.

C. DAVIS

Bibliography. H. Conzelmann, TDNT 9:359–72; S. S. Smalley, IBD 2:820–21; D. Harvey, IDB 2:1000–1001; J. Moffatt, Grace in the New Testament.

Judaism. The religion and culture of the Jewish people. Jewish civilization includes historical, social, and political dimensions in addition to the religious. The word “Judaism” derives from the Greek Ioudaismos, a term first used in the intertestamental period by Greek-speaking Jews to distinguish their religion from Hellenism (see 2 Macc. 2:21; 8:1; 14:38). In the NT the word appears twice (Gal. 1:13–14) in reference to Paul's prior consuming devotion to Jewish faith and life.

Development. Hebrew religion began to give rise to Judaism after the destruction of the temple and the exile of Judah in 586 B.C. The term “Jew,” in its biblical use, is almost exclusively postexilic. The Jewish religion of the biblical period evolved through such historical stages as the intertestamental, rabbinic, and medieval to the modern period of the nineteenth century with Orthodox, Conservative, and Reform Judaism.

Along the way Jewish religion took on new teachings and practices. But with the lengthy development of Judaism and its many changes it is incorrect to posit, as some have done, that Jewish history produced two separate religions: an OT religion of Israel and the postexilic religion of Judaism. Despite the shifting phases of its history, the essence of the religious teaching of Judaism has remained remarkably constant, firmly rooted in the Hebrew Scriptures (OT). Judaism is a religion of ethical monotheism. For centuries many Jews have sought to distill its essential features from one biblical verse that calls Israel “to act justly and to love mercy and to walk humbly with your God” (Mic. 6:8).

The Babylonian exile brought certain modifications in Jewish religious life. Deprived of land, temple, and cultic priestly ministrations, Judaism began to adopt a nonsacrificial religion. Jews began to gather in homes for the reading of Scripture, prayer, and instruction. Here may be traced the earliest roots of the synagogue. Now “lip sacrifice” (prayer and penitence) rather than “blood sacrifice” (sheep and goats) became central to the life of piety.

There was one thing Israel carried to Babylon and clung to dearly. It was the law, the Torah, for by it Israel was assured of its divine calling and mission. In the fifth century the “father of Judaism,” Ezra the scribe, enacted religious reforms by appealing to the Torah. The priesthood was purified and mixed marriages dealt with as the principles of the law became applied to every detail of life. Gradually many Jews came to believe that here lay the only real proof of who was a true Jew: vigorous, unflinching obedience to the teachings of Torah.

Scribes became the priestly interpreters of the Torah, setting forth their own authoritative teachings. By the second century B.C. the Pharisees taught that the oral law carried the same authority as the law of Moses. Later Jesus denied that the traditions of men were equal in authority to the written law (Mark 7:1–23); in addition, Paul denied that man could be justified before God by obedience to that law (Gal. 3).

The destruction of the temple in A.D. 70 and the scattering of thousands of Jews from the land brought a sudden demise to the priesthood. Johanan ben Zakkai, a Pharisee, was soon permitted by the Romans to open an academy at Jabneh. He took it upon himself to install rabbis as the keepers and legislators of Torah. By word of mouth the rabbis passed their teachings from generation to generation until the oral law (Mishnah) was written down about A.D. 200, Rabbi Judah ha-Nasi being its chief editor. By A.D. 500 the Talmud was completed with the issuing of the Gemara, a rabbinical commentary on the Mishnah. The Talmud contains more than 6,000 folio pages and references to more than 2,000 scholar-teachers. It became the basic document of rabbinic Judaism and still holds a major place in shaping Jewish thought.

Basic Doctrines and Beliefs. According to the teaching of Judaism there is no set of beliefs upon the acceptance of which the Jew may find salvation. Even Maimonides' thirteen articles of faith—as close as Judaism ever came to a catechism—is not binding on the conscience of Jews. Judaism has historically put more stress upon the deed (miswā) than the creed ('āni ma'āmin, “I believe”). Nevertheless, from Talmudic times, as a way of life Judaism has been distinguished by giving special emphasis to certain beliefs and ethical values.

Judaism

In the Mishnah (Abot 1:2) one sees the broad philosophy that governed the minds of the early rabbis: "By three things is the world sustained: by the law, by the [temple] service, and by deeds of lovingkindness." This basic teaching is further underscored by the threefold function of the synagogue as a "house of study" (for learning of Torah), "house of prayer" (for worship of God), and "house of assembly" (for the care of community needs).

Contemporary Judaism often speaks of four foundational pillars of the Jewish faith, each interacting as a major force as part of the covenant: (1) the Torah, always a living law as the written Torah is understood in light of the oral Torah; (2) God, a unity (one), spiritual (not a body), and eternal; (3) the people (Israelites/Jews), called into being by God as members of one family, a corporate personality, a community of faith; and (4) the land (known today as Erez Yisrael), a bond going back to Abraham, the "father of the Hebrew people" (Gen. 17:7–8).

In its modern expression Judaism is also shaped by the following traditional beliefs.

1. Man is pivotal in the universe. He sees himself as partner with God in the unending process of creation. In rabbinic thought, "God needs man as much as man needs God."
2. Man is a responsible moral agent, fully accountable for his acts. He is free to shape his own destiny.
3. Human progress is possible as man realizes the great potential within him. The nature of man is basically good, or neutral, free from the encumbrance of original sin. Thus man may be optimistic and hopeful about his future.
4. "This-worldliness" is a distinguishing mark of Judaism. The Hebrew Scriptures focus more on earth and man than upon heaven and God. Hence lengthy speculation about the afterlife and otherworldly realities has never occupied a major position in Jewish thought.
5. All of life must be regarded as sacred. Man is to seek to imitate God in sanctifying his every action. Time must be imbued with the seeds of eternity.
6. Man is to pursue peace, justice, and righteousness. Salvation is dependent upon the betterment of society through good deeds. Historically, Jews have seen the Messiah as God's anointed human representative (not a God-man) who would usher in a golden age of societal and spiritual redemption. Today, however, Reform Judaism teaches that the Messianic Age will appear when humankind collectively, by its acts, reaches a level of true enlightenment, peace, and justice.

M. R. WILSON

See also ESSENES; PHARISEES; SADDUCEES; ZIONISM.

Bibliography. L. Baeck, Essence of Judaism; J. L. Blau, Modern Varieties of Judaism; R. P. Bulka, ed., Dimensions of Orthodox Judaism; H. Danby, Mishnah; N. de Lange, Judaism; H. Donin, To Be a Jew; I. Jakobovits, EJ 10:383–97; A. Hertzberg, ed., Judaism; S. T. Katz, ed., Jewish Philosophers; K. Kohler, Jewish Theology; G. F. Moore, Judaism; J. Neusner, Judaism as Philosophy; Judaism: The Classical Statement; Judaism: The Evidence of the Mishnah; Way of Torah: An Introduction to Judaism; D. Philipson, Reform Movement in Judaism; R. Rabinowicz, World of Hasidism; L. Roth, Judaism: A Portrait; E. P. Sanders, Judaism: Practice and Belief 63 BCE–66 CE; S. Schechter, Studies in Judaism; M. Sklare, Conservative Judaism; M. Steinberg, Basic Judaism; L. Trepp, Judaism: Development and Life; A. J. Wolf, ed., Rediscovering Judaism.

Judaizers. Those Gentiles who followed certain religious practices and customs of Judaism. The Greek verb Ioudaizō "to judaize" (RSV "live like Jews"; NIV "follow Jewish customs") occurs in the NT only in Galatians 2:14. In his passage Paul relates how he opposed Peter at Antioch because Peter refused to eat with the Gentiles in the church there. By practicing social separation Peter was in effect saying to these Gentile Christians, "Unless you conform to Jewish dietary laws and a Jewish lifestyle we cannot maintain fellowship with you." By his withdrawal Peter was compelling these Gentiles to "judaize."

Christ, however, had already instituted a change in regard to OT regulations on clean and unclean foods (Mark 7:1–23; cf. Lev. 11; Deut. 14). As "apostle to the Gentiles" (Rom. 11:13), Paul was against imposing a Jewish dietary code on non-Jews. Such might imply that the belief of Gentile Christians was defective in comparison with that of Jewish Christians; something else (i.e., conformity to Jewish custom) must be added to faith in Christ (cf. Acts 15:1, 5). Paul thus was opposed to judaizing. It had the potential to distort salvation by grace alone, divide the body, and be an argument for developing two separate assemblies: one for Jews and one for Gentiles.

The only OT reference to judaizing is found in Esther 8:17, where the Hebrew yēhūdî ("Jew") is used to form the Hithpael verb mityahādîm, "to become a Jew" or "profess oneself a Jew." The verb refers to those Gentiles in Persia who adopted the Jewish way of life out of fear for Esther's decree, which permitted the Jews to avenge themselves on their enemies (Esth. 8:13). The LXX uses Ioudaizō here and adds that they became circumcised. This normally would imply conversion. In this circumstance, however, they may only have pretended to be Jews in order to save their own lives by identification with the Jewish cause.

M. R. WILSON

Bibliography. F. F. Bruce, Epistle to the Galatians; Y. Slutsky, EJ 10:398–402; J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus, Paul and the Law; F. V. Filson, IDB 2:1005–6; W. Gutbrod, TDNT 3:383; E. F. Harrison, ISBE (rev.) 2:1150; C. Moore, Es-ther; J. Munck, Paul and the Salvation of Mankind.

Judgment. Because we are born in sin and therefore cannot live up to God's righteous standards, condemnation (damnation, the older synonym, has other connotations today) hangs over our heads like the sword of Damocles (Rom. 1:18; Eph. 5:5–6; Col. 3:5–6; 2 Pet. 2:3). God himself is the one who condemns (Job 10:2; Jer. 42:18). His condemnation is based on his justice, and such condemnation is deserved (1 Kings 8:32; Rom. 3:8). Condemnation comes to the wicked and unrepentant (Matt. 12:41–42; Luke 11:31–32; John 5:29; Rom. 5:16, 18; 2 Thess. 2:12; Rev. 19:2) and results in eternal punishment (Matt. 25:46), but no OT believer who trusted in God (Ps. 34:22) or NT believer who trusts in Christ (John 3:18; 5:24) will be condemned. Jesus came to save rather than to condemn (John 3:17), and he frees us from final condemnation (Rom. 8:1–2).

Conscience may cause us to condemn ourselves (1 John 3:19–21), but no one can justly condemn those who are righteous if God is on their side (Isa. 50:9). In fact, the Lord prevents or reverses unfair condemnation by our enemies (Pss. 37:33; 79:11; 102:19–20; 109:20). Self-righteous people should avoid condemning others (Job 32:3; Luke 6:37; Rom. 8:33–34; 14:3), because quickness to condemn may recoil on their own heads (Job 15:6; Ps. 34:21; Rom. 2:1; Titus 3:10–11). Needless to say, it is the height of arrogance and folly for sinful people to condemn a just and omnipotent God (Job 34:17, 29; 40:8).

Divine judgment is God's method of displaying his mercy as well as his wrath toward individuals and nations (Exod. 6:6; 7:4; Eccles. 3:17; 12:14; Dan. 7:22; Joel 3:2; 2 Cor. 5:10). As God is the one who condemns, so also he is the true and only Judge (Gen. 18:25; Judg. 11:27; Ps. 82:1; Eccles. 11:9), an office and function shared by the Father (John 8:49–50) and the Son (Acts 10:42; 17:31; Rom. 2:16). Retributive or negative judgment is a direct result of sin (1 Sam. 3:13; Ezek. 7:3, 8, 27; Rom. 2:12; Jude 14–15) and is therefore both just (Ezek. 33:20; 2 Tim. 4:8; 1 Pet. 2:23) and deserved (Pss. 94:2; 143:2; Ezek. 18:30). Rewarding or positive judgment relates to believers' stewardship of their talents and gifts and is therefore characterized by divine compassion (Matt. 25:14–23; 1 Cor.

3:12–15; 1 Pet. 1:17). Although we experience judgment initially in this life, all of us are judged ultimately after death (John 12:48; Acts 17:31; Rom. 2:16; Rev. 20:12–13) at the judgment seat of God (Rom. 14:10) or Christ (2 Cor. 5:10). Self-judgment, another manifestation of the same activity, is brought about by rebellion and willfulness (Rom. 13:2; 1 Cor. 11:29; 1 Tim. 5:12).

It is not only human beings who are judged, however. God also judges other gods, real or imagined (Exod. 12:12; Num. 33:4; Jer. 10:14–15), and angels as well (2 Pet. 2:4; Jude 6). The devil himself is not exempt from such judgment (1 Tim. 3:6). And although in the final analysis God is the only Judge, he has chosen to allow us to participate with Christ in judging the world (Matt. 19:28; Luke 22:30; 1 Cor. 6:2; Rev. 20:4), including the angels (1 Cor. 6:3).

The story of Noah's flood contains several principles concerning divine judgment that are worth careful consideration. (1) God's judgments are never arbitrary. Our sin is God's sorrow (Gen. 6:5–6). The Lord is not capricious when he judges. He makes a considered and deliberate decision before unleashing his punishment. (2) God can be counted on to judge sin (Gen. 6:7). No sin escapes his notice; his judgment on sin is inevitable (Rom. 2:3; Heb. 9:27; 10:26–27). (3) God always gives sinners an opportunity to repent before judging them (see Acts 17:30–31; Rom. 2:4; 2 Pet. 3:9). There was a period of 120 years of grace for the people of Noah's day (Gen. 6:3). (5) God always follows through on his decision to judge (cf. Gen. 7:4 with vv. 12 and 23), once he has announced it and once people have had an opportunity to repent. His judgments are irreversible. (6) God's judgments always lead to death (see Jer. 51:18; Hos. 6:5). Genesis 7:17–24, the only paragraph in the flood narrative that does not contain the name of God, reeks with the smell of death. When judgment results in death, God is no longer there.

But the flood story teaches us also that (7) God's judgments always include elements of both justice and grace. Though the story of the flood begins with judgment, it ends with redemption; though it begins with a curse on those who sinned (Gen. 6:7), it ends with a covenant for those who obeyed God (9:11). If judgment always issues in death, grace and redemption always issue in life. Judgment is never God's last or best word to those who believe in him, because "mercy triumphs over judgment" (James 2:13).

R. YOUNGBLOOD

See also JUDGMENT SEAT.

Bibliography. F. Büchsel, TDNT 3:921–54; L. Morris, Biblical Doctrine of Judgment; W. Schneider et al., NIDNTT 2:361–71; R. Youngblood, Book of Genesis.

Judgment, Last

Judgment, Last. See LAST JUDGMENT.

Judgment of Nations. Amillennialism and premillennialism, the two prevailing approaches to eschatology among evangelical Protestants, have quite different views of the eschatological judgments. These differences are a reflection of the inherent differences of the systems and each one's schema of the unfolding of future events.

Amillennialists believe that the Bible teaches one general resurrection of all the dead at the end of the present age when Christ returns. This is taken to imply that there is also only one final judgment, since the judgment is said to follow the resurrection (Rev. 20:11–15). The so-called judgment of the nations (Joel 3:1–3), then, is subsumed under this one final judgment. Consequently, all people who ever lived, saved and unsaved, appear before Christ in this final judgment scene.

Premillennialists generally distinguish four judgments: the judgment of believers, the judgment of Israel, the judgment of the nations, and the “great white throne” judgment. These judgments are distinct from one another in subjects, time, and place. Premillennialists disagree among themselves on some aspects of these judgments (especially on those matters that are related to the time of the rapture), but there is general agreement on the judgment of the nations. They understand it to be a judgment of the living Gentile nations by Jesus Christ following his return in glory to the earth (cf. Joel 3:1–3; Isa. 2:4; Matt. 25:31–46). In the dispensationalist premillennial scheme this occurs after the seven-year tribulation but before the millennium. The main indictment in the judgment of the nations will be their treatment of Israel (Joel 3:2), but Isaiah 2:4 could imply that other wrongs will also be brought to judgment. It must be emphasized that premillennialists understand this as a final judgment of the living nations when Christ returns to earth. The unrighteous living (the goats) go to eternal punishment; the righteous (sheep) who have treated Israel well and who submit to the messianic King enter the earthly millennial kingdom (cf. Isa. 60:13).

S. N. GUNDRY

See also JUDGMENT SEAT; LAST JUDGMENT; MILLENNIUM, VIEWS OF THE; SECOND COMING OF CHRIST.

Bibliography. L. Berkhof, Systematic Theology; C. L. Feinberg, Premillennialism or Amillennialism?; A. A. Hoekema, Bible and the Future; A. J. McClain, Greatness of the Kingdom.

Judgment Seat. From the Greek bēma; literally a “step,” referring to the platform upon which the civil magistrate sat during judicial proceedings; also translated as “court” or “tribunal” (Acts 18:12, 16). This platform could be found in both public (John 19:13) and private (Acts 25:23) locations.

Figuratively the term found use as a picture of the final confrontation between man and Jesus Christ where an accounting would be held for the individual's earthly deeds. Such a judgment appears to be universal in scope, including (1) all the nations of the world (Matt. 25:32); (2) angels (2 Pet. 2:4; Jude 6; cf. 1 Cor. 6:3, where Christians appear to participate in this judgment); (3) the unsaved dead at the “great white throne” (Rev. 20:5, 7); and (4) individual Christians (2 Cor. 5:10). While the predominant nature of these judgments seems to be the condemnation of the wicked (Matt. 25:31, 46; John 3:18; 2 Thess. 1:7–10; Rev. 20:14–15), the judgment of Christians appears to be one that is designed to evaluate the stewardship of their earthly life only (Rom. 14:10; 1 Cor. 3:12–15).

Chrysostom used the figure to warn schismatic Judaizers (Homily on Rom. 14:10) as well as to bring hope and correction to Christians (Homily on 2 Cor. 5:10).

S. E. McCLELLAND

See also JUDGMENT; JUDGMENT OF NATIONS; LAST JUDGMENT.

Bibliography. J. Bailey, And the Life Everlasting; L. Boettner, Immortality; O. Cullmann, Christ and Time; L. Morris, Biblical Doctrine of Judgment; Wages of Sin.

Julian of Norwich (ca. 1342–ca. 1417). English mystic. Born probably in or near Norwich, eastern England, she had a five-hour series of fifteen visions in 1373. These “shewings” healed her of a serious illness. About this experience she wrote at the time, but then some twenty years or more later she produced a second and longer account of the events, entitled Sixteen Revelations of Divine Love, “one of the most remarkable documents of medieval religious experience.” Its contents range over a wide field, including predestination, the Trinity, the existence of evil, the overwhelming love of God, the Incarnation, the sufferings of Christ, prayer, and penance. Her presentation is profound, precise, and persuasive.

Julian may have been influenced by the slightly earlier anonymous work, Cloud of Unknowing, which had originated in a neighboring area of England, and in which were traces of Neoplatonic thinking. Julian (also known as Juliana) spent much of her life as a recluse at St. Julian's Church, Norwich, and a modern chapel there is dedicated to her memory. She was never beatified.

Two manuscript copies of her tract are preserved in the British Museum. It was first printed in 1670, edited by R. F. S. Cressley. Henry Collins produced another version in 1877. There are modern editions of Revelations by G. Warrack (1958) and J. Walsh (1961), and biographies by

R. H. Thouless (1924), P. F. Chambers (1935) and P. Molinari (1948). J. D. DOUGLAS

See also MYSTICISM.

Jüngel, Eberhard (b. 1934). Professor of systematic theology and philosophy of religion at Tübingen since 1969, and a potent advocate of the continuing relevance of Barthian theology. A somewhat eclectic and difficult thinker, Jüngel has been influenced by the language theories of Fuchs and Heidegger, the metaphysics of Aristotle and Hegel, Bultmann's hermeneutics, and the theological work of Luther and Barth.

As in the theology of Barth, Christology forms the center of Jüngel's theology. Rejecting any discussion of God's relationship to the world which is not christologically derived, he contends that Christ is both the locus of revelation and the ontological ground for the God-human relationship. The core of Jesus' ministry was his proclamation of a kingdom of divine authority that "interrupts" into the world and remakes the structures of the world to which God comes in Christ. As such, Christ is less the agent of redemption than a proclaimer or definer of the true nature of both God and humanity, and in the act of definition, the bond of relationship between God and the human. In short, as the incarnate God, Christ defines what it means to be both God and human.

The cross is understood as a trinitarian act of God's coming to the world in suffering. God identifies himself with Jesus in such a way that he reveals his absolute freedom as the One who "can die as a human being" and not lose his own being. In the act of dying, Jesus demonstrates the complementarity and nearness of God and the world.

While the cross forges or defines the divine-human relationship, it also holds the two apart, as the divine is the giver of grace and the human is passive receptor. The key is not classical transcendence but existential relationship. Here Jüngel moves from Barth to Luther and the latter's doctrine of justification. It is justification that provides Jüngel a model for his understanding of the proper distinction between God and humanity. Liberated by grace, the human can now live "in correspondence with God" rather than a life of self-assertion.

As is the case with Barth, the specter of christomonism and even modalism is present in Jüngel's christological trinitarianism. Evangelicals will also stumble over his understanding of revelation as "speech-act." Combining Barth's doctrine of revelation with Bultmann's ideas about Christian existence and hermeneutics, Jüngel rejects an instrumental theory of language in favor of a quasi-sacramental idea of language as the real presence of its referent. Thus the divine comes into the world not through historical action or religious experience but as God "captures" the metaphorical and analogical language of Scripture. Thus Scripture loses any objective focus outside of its kerygmatic proclamation.

Not surprisingly, Jüngel's understanding of Christ lacks any historical extension and all but collapses into his own prophetic word. Jesus of Nazareth is replaced by a Christ-principle who becomes the occasion for the enunciation of relationship. Giving little attention to the orders of creation and history, Jüngel's notion of the God who comes in Jesus Christ seems quite static for it lacks any grounding in or portrayal of historical interaction.

M. WILLIAMS

See also BARTH, KARL; NEO-ORTHODOXY.

Bibliography. E. Jüngel, Death; Doctrine of the Trinity; God as the Mystery of the World; Theological Essays; G. Wainwright, "Eberhard Jüngel," in Expository Times 92:131-35; J. M. Wall and D. Heim, eds., How My Mind Has Changed; J. B. Webster, Eberhard Jüngel: An Introduction to His Theology.

Justice. The Christian concept of justice is founded upon the character and will of God as revealed in Scripture. Justice is therefore transcendent in nature; however, justice is also rooted in the warp and woof of daily living as it reflects the immanence of a God who is involved in the affairs of humanity. Thus, to speak of justice in a biblical, Christian way is to recognize and hold in tension the paradoxes that often accompany the meeting of the transcendent and the immanent. Because justice obtains its meaning from the revealed character and actions of God, to speak of justice in a biblical sense is to say many things at the same time.

In the Old Testament, God's justice is connected to his righteousness (šēdāqā) and the law as an external reflection of his righteous will; therefore, to be in relationship with God carries the idea of covenant where law serves as a reminder that obedience to God, love of one's neighbor, and care for the creation is exercising justice. Covenant involves both the corporate and individual dimensions of social relationships. In this sense, justice is fidelity to one's self and one's relationships—the maintaining of covenant.

Justice as related to the idea of law is also a commentary on God's holiness. Violations of the covenant laws are violations of justice or the dishonoring of God's holiness. Violations infer the idea of punishment, but punishment in the Old Testament carries both the sense of retribution and restoration. Dishonoring God's holiness on the level of human relations is violating someone made in the image of God. Justice is punishing the offender in hopes of restoring the covenant, but the offender is also required to make retribution to God for the restoration to be complete.

Justice

The biblical practice of covenant fidelity is the proper context for the concept of justice.

The New Testament also defines the concept of justice in terms of righteousness through the word dikaioynē and its cognates. Here justice has the meaning of God's judgment against sin and his restoration of those who have sinned through the life of Jesus Christ (Rom. 3:20–31), as well as the additional meaning of righteousness as characterizing the life of those who are his people.

The difficulty comes when the concept of justice is applied to people and circumstances beyond the biblical intention of relationships as a covenant, where God's character and will are not honored as the foundation for justice. This is the point at which the paradoxes of justice become more apparent. This is the point at which the transcendent and the immanent meet, where the holiness of God and the fallenness of creation clash. Christianity says that the individual is both exalted as valuable and fallen due to sin. How are Christians to seek justice in a world where these two seeming contradictions often appear in the form of cultures and social institutions that do not exist to honor God?

Justice involves seeking lawful equality without respect to persons. Theologians such as Walter Rauschenbusch, H. Richard, and Reinhold Niebuhr struggled with how justice is dispensed in cultures where the political, economic, and social structures are designed to reward people based upon their contribution to the system and therefore end up perpetuating the power of the haves over the have nots. The system, in this sense, promotes inequality and thus injustice. The structures of a culture are reflections of those who create and maintain them. It is within these social structures that these theologians located the corporate dimension of human fallenness as revealed through social institutions that are a contradiction to the biblical idea of justice as equality.

Laws as a measure of equality and judges as interpreters of the law are to protect and provide for all without respect to persons. Augustine spoke of justice as a basic principle that bonds societies together. Yet if the laws privilege some above others, are these laws just? What if law makers do not recognize the transcendent value of justice but view the idea of law as a product of social forces? Can justice exist where the inherent worth of the individual as made in the image of God is not valued? How can the Christian and the church exercise justice within the framework of covenant? Is the church to reform the institutions of society, to take charge of and control the political and economic structures of the culture and thereby mete out justice as God directs? Would this type of agenda require force? Should the church use force in requiring the society or the state to be just in its dealings with individuals and groups? These questions raise the issue of whether civil disobedience is allowable for Christians and what the proper role is for Christians and the church in relationship to the state. Historically, Christians have come down on both sides of these issues, from Martin Luther and John Calvin to Dietrich Bonhoeffer and Martin Luther King Jr.

There are alternatives to the biblical basis of justice. Plato sought to establish justice upon his idea of ultimate reality as a transcendent form of cosmic order. The polity of a proper society would reflect this order and therefore justice would prevail. Thomas Hobbes developed the philosophy that justice is consonant with self-preservation, the protection of one's own interest. The protection of one's self-interest justifies whatever means are taken to ensure it. John Stuart Mill popularized this concept of justice in the utilitarian idea of the pursuit of happiness for the greatest number in a society. Emmanuel Kant rejected Mill's notion as he found it to be too impermanent, being based on the idea of happiness, which could change with society's whims. Instead, Kant proposed the grounding of justice on human nature. Ultimately, the core of human nature is free will, which can choose actions based on reasonable principles regardless of circumstances. To act in accord with one's nature, in spite of circumstances, is to act justly. The problem with each of these approaches is that they all fail to provide a basis for justice that unites the transcendent and the immanent, providing value for the individual and society that is rooted in neither.

Biblical justice has always had a social, political, and economic dimension to it. The people of God, by virtue of their relationship with a God who has revealed himself as righteous and holy, have a heritage of responsibility to each other and the world around them. That heritage has meant carrying the witness of justice into every area of life, be it social, political, or economic. It is a prophetic witness that often speaks against the culture as well as suffering the injustices of the culture. This witness is both individual, involving the personal and business lives of Christians, and corporate, engaging the church in the needs and concerns of the society. Justice knows no boundaries. It invades the private lives of Christians to inquire about whether we are making money with justice and spending it with compassion. It questions whether the concerns of the poor and disenfranchised are our own concerns and whether we are applying ourselves where we can to make a difference. Justice is provocative and demanding. Liberation theologians Gustavo Gutierrez and Juan Segundo are representative of Christian thinkers concerned about how the church responds to issues of social and political justice within a context where justice is considering my neighbor's rights and not just my own.

Will the commitment of the church to a "just society" make a difference? What does the church as a community have to offer in terms of justice? Jürgen Moltmann is an example of those theologians who believe that the answer to that question will force the church to sharpen and readjust its eschatological focus. In the person of Jesus Christ, the immanent and transcendent dimensions of justice have been forever united. Moltmann speaks of the church as the new community founded upon the earth by virtue of the resurrection of Jesus Christ. The church is to bear witness to the fact that the final word on justice has been spoken, in a proleptic sense. That final word is that God, the just judge, has, in his justice, pronounced mercy. The efforts exerted for justice by Christians in every sphere of life are statements of covenant fidelity grounded in the hope that God has and will restore his total creation. In the meantime the church is to exercise justice in every relationship. From a Christian perspective, perhaps the focus should not be on whether a particular society becomes just but, more importantly, on whether the church is actively pursuing justice in the face of paradoxes that emerge from the meeting of the immanent and the transcendent.

M. BURCH

See also CIVIL LAW AND JUSTICE IN BIBLE TIMES; CIVIL RIGHTS; RIGHTEOUSNESS.

Bibliography. E. Brunner, Justice and the Social Order; J. D. Douglas, NBD; C. Henry, God, Revelation, and Authority; J. Moltmann, Church in the Power of the Spirit; H. R. Niebuhr, Kingdom of God in America; R. Niebuhr, Moral Man and Immoral Society; C. Pfeiffer and H. Vos, WBE.

Justification. The basic fact of biblical religion is that God pardons and accepts believing sinners (see Pss. 32:1–5; 130; Luke 7:47–50; 18:9–14; Acts 10:43; 1 John 1:7–2:2). Paul's doctrine of justification by faith is an analytical exposition of this fact in its full theological connections. As stated by Paul (most fully in Romans and Galatians, though see also 2 Cor. 5:14–21; Eph. 2:1–18; Phil. 3:4–11), the doctrine of justification determines the whole character of Christianity as a religion of grace and faith. It defines the saving significance of Christ's life and death by relating both to God's law (Rom. 3:24–31; 5:16–21). It displays God's justice in condemning and punishing sin, his mercy in pardoning and accepting sinners, and his wisdom in exercising both attributes harmoniously together through Christ (Rom. 3:23–26). It makes clear what faith is—belief in Christ's atoning death and justifying resurrection (Rom. 4:23–25; 10:8–12), and trust in him alone for righteousness (Phil. 3:8–9). It makes clear what Christian morality is—law-keeping out of gratitude to the Savior whose gift of righteousness made law-keeping needless for acceptance (Rom. 7:1–6; 12:1–2). It explains all hints, prophecies, and instances of salvation in the OT (Rom. 1:17; 3:21; 4:1–25). It overthrows Jewish exclusivism (Gal. 2:15–16) and provides the basis on which Christianity becomes a religion for the world (Rom. 1:16; 3:29–30). It is the heart of the gospel. Luther justly termed it articulus stantis vel cadentis ecclesiae; ("the article by which the church stands or falls") a church that lapses from it can scarcely be called Christian.

The Meaning of Justification. The biblical meaning of "justify" (Hebrew, šādēq; Greek, LXX and NT, dikaioō) is to pronounce, accept, and treat as just, i.e., as, on the one hand, not penally liable, and, on the other, entitled to all the privileges due to those who have kept the law. It is thus a forensic term, denoting a judicial act of administering the law—in this case, by declaring a verdict of acquittal and so excluding all possibility of condemnation. Justification thus settles the legal status of the person justified (Deut. 25:1; Prov. 17:15; Rom. 8:33–34). The justifying action of the Creator, who is the royal Judge of this world, has both a sentential and an executive, or declarative, aspect: God justifies, first, by reaching his verdict and then by sovereign action makes his verdict known and secures to the person justified the rights that are now his due. What is envisaged in Isaiah 45:25 and 50:8, for instance, is specifically a series of events that will publicly vindicate those whom God holds to be in the right.

The word is also used in a transferred sense for ascriptions of righteousness in nonforensic contexts. Thus, men are said to justify God when they confess him to be just (Luke 7:29; Rom. 3:4 = Ps. 51:4), and themselves when they claim to be just (Job 32:2; Luke 10:29; 16:15). The passive can be used generally of being vindicated by events against suspicion, criticism, and mistrust (Matt. 11:19; Luke 7:35; 1 Tim. 3:16).

In James 2:21, 24–25 its reference is to the proof of a man's acceptance with God that is given when his actions show that he has the kind of living, working faith to which God imputes righteousness. James's statement that Christians, like Abraham, are justified by works (v. 24) is thus not contrary to Paul's insistence that Christians, like Abraham, are justified by faith (Rom. 3:28; 4:1–5), but is complementary to it. James himself quotes Genesis 15:6 for exactly the same purpose as Paul does—to show that it was faith which secured Abraham's acceptance as righteous (v. 23; cf. Rom. 4:3–25; Gal. 3:6–9). The justification that concerns James is not the believer's original acceptance by God, but the subsequent vindication of his profession of faith by his life. It is in terminology, not thought, that James differs from Paul.

Justification

There is no lexical ground for the view of Chrysostom, Augustine, and the medieval and Roman theologians that “justify” means, or connotes as part of its meaning, “make righteous” (by subjective spiritual renewal). The Tridentine definition of justification as “not only the remission of sins, but also the sanctification and renewal of the inward man” (Sess. VI, ch. vii) is by biblical standards erroneous.

Paul’s Doctrine of Justification. The background of Paul’s doctrine was the Jewish conviction, universal in his time, that a day of judgment was coming in which God would condemn and punish all who had broken his laws. That day would terminate the present world order and usher in a golden age for those whom God judged worthy. This conviction, derived from prophetic expectations of “the day of the Lord” (Isa. 2:10–22; 13:6–11; Jer. 46:10; Amos 5:19–20; Obad. 15; Zeph. 1:14–2:3, etc.) and developed during the intertestamental period under the influence of apocalyptic, had been emphatically confirmed by Christ (Matt. 11:22–24; 12:36–37; etc.). Paul affirmed that Christ himself was the appointed representative through whom God would “judge the world with justice” in “the day when God will judge men’s secrets through Jesus Christ” (Acts 17:31; Rom. 2:16). This, indeed, had been Christ’s own claim (John 5:27–29).

Paul sets out his doctrine of the judgment day in Romans 2:5–16. The principle of judgment will be exact retribution (“to each person according to what he has done,” v. 6). The standard will be God’s law. The evidence will be “men’s secrets” (v. 16); the Judge is a searcher of hearts. Being himself just, he cannot be expected to justify any but the righteous, those who have kept his law (Rom. 2:12–13; cf. Exod. 23:7; 1 Kings 8:32). But the class of righteous men has no members. None is righteous; all have sinned (Rom. 3:9–20). The prospect, therefore, is one of universal condemnation, for Jew as well as Gentile; for the Jew who breaks the law is no more acceptable to God than anyone else (Rom. 2:17–27). All men, it seems, are under God’s wrath (Rom. 1:18) and doomed.

Against this black background, comprehensively expounded in Romans 1:18–3:20, Paul proclaims the present justification of sinners by grace through faith in Jesus Christ, apart from all works and despite all demerit (Rom. 3:21–28). This justification, though individually located at the point of time at which a man believes (Rom. 4:2; 5:1), is an eschatological once-for-all divine act, the final judgment brought into the present. The justifying sentence, once passed, is irrevocable. The wrath of God will not touch the justified (Rom. 5:9). Those accepted now are secure forever. Inquisition before Christ’s judgment seat (Rom. 14:10–12; 2 Cor. 5:10) may deprive them of certain rewards (1 Cor. 3:15), but never of their justified status. Christ will not call in question God’s justifying verdict, only declare, endorse, and implement it (Rom. 8:33–34).

Justification has two sides. On the one hand, it means the pardon, remission, and nonimputation of all sins, reconciliation to God, and the end of his enmity and wrath (Acts 13:39; Rom. 4:6–7; 5:9–21; 2 Cor. 5:19). On the other hand, it means the bestowal of a righteous man’s status and a title to all the blessings promised to the just: a thought which Paul amplifies by linking justification with the adoption of believers as God’s sons and heirs (Rom. 8:14–39; Gal. 4:4–7). Part of their inheritance they receive at once: through the gift of the Holy Spirit, whereby God “seals” them as his when they believe (Eph. 1:13), they taste that quality of fellowship with God which belongs to the age to come and is called “eternal life.” Here is another eschatological reality brought into the present: having in a real sense passed through the last judgment, the justified enter heaven on earth. Here and now, therefore, justification brings “life” (Rom. 5:18), though this is merely a foretaste of the fullness of life and glory that constitutes the “righteousness for which we hope” (Gal. 5:5) promised to the just (Rom. 2:7, 10), to which God’s justified children may look forward (Rom. 8:18–25). Both aspects of justification appear in Romans 5:1–2, where Paul says that justification brings, on the one hand, peace with God (because sin is pardoned) and, on the other, hope of the glory of God (because the believer is accepted as righteous). Justification thus means permanent reinstatement to favor and privilege, as well as complete forgiveness of all sins.

The Ground of Justification. Paul’s deliberately paradoxical reference to God as “justifying the ungodly” (Rom. 4:5 κτλ)—the same Greek phrase as is used by the LXX in Exodus 23:7; Isaiah 5:23, of the corrupt judgment that God will not tolerate—reflects his awareness that this is a startling doctrine. Indeed, it seems flatly at variance with the OT presentation of God’s essential righteousness, as revealed in his actions as Legislator and Judge—a presentation which Paul himself assumes in Romans 1:18–3:20. The OT insists that God is “righteous in all his ways” (Ps. 145:17), a “God who does no wrong” (Deut. 32:4; cf. Zeph. 3:5). The law of right and wrong, in conformity to which righteousness consists, has its being and fulfillment in him. His revealed law, “holy, righteous and good” as it is (Rom. 7:12; cf. Deut. 4:8; Ps. 19:7–9), mirrors his character, for he “loves” the righteousness prescribed (Pss. 11:7; 33:5; Jer. 9:24) and “hates” the unrighteousness forbidden (Ps. 5:4–6; Isa. 61:8; Zech. 8:17). As Judge, he declares his righteousness by “visiting” in retributive judgment idolatry, irreligion, immorality, and inhuman conduct throughout the world (Ps. 9:5–6, 15–20; Amos 1:3–3:2, etc.).

“God is a righteous judge, a God who expresses his wrath every day” (Ps. 7:11). No evildoer goes unnoticed (Ps. 94:7–9); all receive their precise desert (Prov. 24:12). God hates sin and is impelled by the demands of his own nature to pour out “wrath” and “fury” on those who complacently espouse it (cf. the language of Deut. 28:63; Isa. 1:24; Jer. 6:11; 30:23–24; Ezek. 5:13–17). It is a glorious revelation of his righteousness (cf. Isa. 5:16; 10:22) when he does so; it would be a reflection on his righteousness if he failed to do so. It seems unthinkable that a God who thus reveals just and inflexible wrath against all human ungodliness (Rom. 1:18) should justify the ungodly. Paul, however, affirms, not merely that God does it, but that he does it in a manner designed “to demonstrate his justice, because in his forbearance he had left the sins committed beforehand unpunished—he did it to demonstrate his justice at the present time, so as to be just, and the one who justifies the man who has faith in Jesus” (Rom. 3:25–26). The statement is emphatic, for the point is crucial. Paul is saying that the gospel which proclaims God’s apparent violation of his justice is really a revelation of his justice. So far from raising a problem of theodicy, it actually solves one; for it makes explicit, as the OT never did, the just ground on which God pardoned and accepted believers before the time of Christ, as well as since.

Some question this exegesis of Romans 3:25–26 and construe justice or righteousness here as meaning saving action, on the ground that in Isaiah 40–55 justice or righteousness and salvation are repeatedly used as equivalents (Isa. 45:8, 19–25; 46:13; 51:3–6, etc.). This eliminates the theodicy; all that Paul is saying, on this view, is that God now shows that he saves sinners. The words “just, and” in v. 26, so far from making the crucial point that God justifies sinners justly, would then add nothing to his meaning and could be deleted without loss. However, quite apart from the specific exegetical embarrassments it creates, this hypothesis seems groundless, for (1) OT references to God’s righteousness normally denote his retributive justice (the usage adduced from Isaiah is not typical), and (2) these verses are the continuation of a discussion that has been concerned throughout (from 1:18 onward) with God’s display of righteousness in judging and punishing sin. These considerations decisively fix the forensic reference here. “The main question with which St. Paul is concerned is how God can be recognized as himself righteous and at the same time as one who declares righteous believers in Christ” (Taylor, 299). Paul has not (as is suggested) left the forensic sphere behind. The sinner’s relation to God as just Lawgiver and Judge is still his subject. What he is saying in this paragraph (Rom. 3:21–26) is that the gospel reveals a way in which sinners can be justified without affront to the divine justice which, as he has shown (1:18–3:20), condemns all sin.

Paul’s thesis is that God justifies sinners on a just ground, namely, that the claims of God’s law upon them have been fully satisfied. The law has not been altered, or suspended, or flouted for their justification, but fulfilled—by Jesus Christ, acting in their name. By perfectly serving God, Christ perfectly kept the law (cf. Matt. 3:15). His obedience culminated in death (Phil. 2:8); he bore the penalty of the law in men’s place (Gal. 3:13), to make propitiation for their sins (Rom. 3:25). On the ground of Christ’s obedience, God imputes not sin but righteousness to sinners who believe (Rom. 4:2–8; 5:19). “The righteousness of God” (i.e., righteousness from God: see Phil. 3:9) is bestowed on them as a free gift (Rom. 1:17; 3:21–22; 5:17, cf. 9:30; 10:3–10): that is to say, they receive the right to be treated and the promise that they shall be treated by the divine Judge no longer as sinners, but as righteous. Thus they become “the righteousness of God” in and through him who “had no sin” personally but was representatively made sin (treated as a sinner and punished) in their stead (2 Cor. 5:21). This is the thought expressed in classical Protestant theology by the phrase “the imputation of Christ’s righteousness,” namely, that believers are righteous (Rom. 5:19) and have righteousness (Phil. 3:9) before God for no other reason than that Christ their Head was righteous before God, and they are one with him, sharers of his status and acceptance. God justifies them by passing on them, for Christ’s sake, the verdict that Christ’s obedience merited. God declares them to be righteous, because he reckons them to be righteous; and he reckons righteousness to them, not because he accounts them to have kept his law personally (which would be a false judgment), but because he accounts them to be united to the one who kept it representatively (and that is a true judgment). For Paul union with Christ is not fancy but fact—the basic fact, indeed, in Christianity; and the doctrine of imputed righteousness is simply Paul’s exposition of the forensic aspect of it (see Rom. 5:12–21). Covenantal solidarity between Christ and his people is thus the objective basis on which sinners are reckoned righteous and justly justified through the righteousness of their Savior. Such is Paul’s theodicy regarding the ground of justification.

Faith and Justification. Paul says that believers are justified dia pisteōs (Rom. 3:25), pistei (3:28), and ek pisteōs (3:30). The dative (pistei) and the preposition dia represent faith as the instrumental means whereby Christ and his righteousness are appropriated; the preposition ek shows that faith occasions and logically precedes our personal justification. That believers are justified dia pistin, “on account of faith,” Paul never says, and would deny. Were faith the ground of justification, faith would be in effect a meritorious work, and the gospel message would, after all, be merely another version of justification by works—a doctrine which Paul opposes in all forms as irreconcilable with grace and spiritually ruinous (cf. Rom. 4:4; 11:6; Gal. 4:21–5:12). Paul regards faith, not as itself our justifying righteousness, but rather as the outstretched empty hand that receives righteousness by receiving Christ. In Habakkuk 2:4 (cited Rom. 1:17; Gal. 3:11) Paul finds, implicit in the promise that the godly man (“the just”) would enjoy God’s continued favor (“live”) through his trustful loyalty to God (which is Habakkuk’s point in the context), the more fundamental assertion that only through faith does any man ever come to be viewed by God as just, and hence as entitled to life, at all. The apostle also used Genesis 15:6 (“Abraham believed God, and it was reckoned unto him for righteousness,” ERV) to prove the same point (see Gal. 3:6; Rom. 4:3–25). It is clear that when Paul paraphrases this verse as teaching that Abraham’s faith was reckoned for righteousness (Rom. 4:5, 9, 22), all he intends us to understand is that faith—decisive, wholehearted reliance on God’s gracious promise (vv. 18–22)—was the occasion and means of righteousness being imputed to him. There is no suggestion here that faith is the ground of justification. Paul is not discussing the ground of justification in this context at all, only the method of securing it. Paul’s conviction is that no child of Adam ever becomes righteous before God save on account of the righteousness of the last Adam, the second representative man (Rom. 5:12–19); and this righteousness is imputed to men and women when they believe.

Justification

Theologians on the rationalistic and moralistic wing of Protestantism—Socinians, Arminians, and some modern liberals—have taken Paul to teach that God regards man’s faith as righteousness (either because it fulfills a supposed new law or because, as the seed of all Christian virtue, it contains the germ and potency of an eventual fulfillment of God’s original law, or else because it is simply God’s sovereign pleasure to treat faith as righteousness, though it is not righteousness; and that God pardons and accepts sinners on the ground of their faith). In consequence, these theologians deny the imputation of Christ’s righteousness to believers in the sense explained, and reject the whole covenantal conception of Christ’s mediatorial work. The most they can say is that Christ’s righteousness was the indirect cause of the acceptance of man’s faith as righteousness, in that it created a situation in which this acceptance became possible. (Thinkers in the Socinian tradition, believing that such a situation always existed and that Christ’s work had no Godward reference, will not say even this.) Theologically, the fundamental defect of all such views is that they do not make the satisfaction of the law the basis of acceptance. They regard justification not as a judicial act of executing the law, but as the sovereign act of a God who stands above the law and is free to dispense with it, or change it, at his discretion. The suggestion is that God is not bound by his own law: its preceptive and penal enactments do not express immutable and necessary demands of his own nature, but he may out of benevolence relax and amend them without ceasing to be what he is. This, however, seems a wholly unscriptural conception.

Certain exegetes maintain that Paul’s gospel of justification aims primarily to identify believers in Christ as God’s covenant people, benefiting from his covenant faithfulness, rather than to show sinners as such how God puts them right with himself through the cross. Though justification undoubtedly confers covenant status (Gal. 3:6–29), this shift of focus seems not to do justice to the layout, thrust, and flow of Romans and Galatians, nor to Paul’s modeling of the life of justification in Philippians 3. Theology has not erred in treating personal salvation as the basic issue with which the doctrine of justification deals.

The Doctrine in History. Interest in justification varies according to the weight given to the scriptural insistence that man’s relation to God is determined by law and sinners necessarily stand under his wrath and condemnation. The later medieval theologians took this more seriously than any since apostolic times; they, however, sought acceptance through penances and meritorious good works. The Reformers proclaimed justification by grace alone through faith alone on the ground of Christ’s righteousness alone, and embodied Paul’s doctrine in full confessional statements. The sixteenth and seventeenth centuries were the doctrine’s classical period. Liberalism spread the notion that God’s attitude to all men is one of paternal affection, not conditioned by the demands of penal law; hence interest in the sinner’s justification by the divine judge was replaced by the thought of the prodigal’s forgiveness and rehabilitation by his divine Father. The validity of forensic categories for expressing man’s saving relationship to God has been widely denied. Many neo-orthodox thinkers seem surer that there is a sense of guilt in man than that there is a penal law in God, and tend to echo this denial, claiming that legal categories obscure the personal quality of this relationship. Consequently, Paul’s doctrine of justification has received little stress outside evangelical circles, though a new emphasis is apparent in recent lexical work, the newer Lutheran writers, and the Dogmatics of Karl Barth. J. I. PACKER

See also FAITH; SANCTIFICATION.

Bibliography. L. Berkhof, Systematic Theology; G. C. Berkouwer, Faith and Justification; J. Buchanan, Doctrine of Justification; J. Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion; D. A. Carson, ed., Right with God; W. Cunningham, Historical Theology; C. Hodge, Systematic Theology; E. Käsemann, "Righteousness of God in Paul," in New Testament Questions of Today; H. Küng, Justification; A. E. McGrath, Iustitia Dei; L. Morris, Apostolic Preaching of the Cross; J. Owen, Justification by Faith; G. Quell et al., TDNT 2:174–225; H. Seebass and C. Brown, NIDNTT 3:352–77; M. A. Seifrid, Justification by Faith; V. Taylor, Forgiveness and Reconciliation; N. T. Wright, Climax of the Covenant; J. A. Ziesler, Meaning of Righteousness in Paul.

Justin Martyr (ca. 100–ca. 165). An early apologist for the Christian faith. Justin's exact dates are not known, but they can be approximated through data given in his first Apology. He addressed this work to the Emperor Antoninus Pius, who ruled Rome from A.D. 137 to 161. Justin's martyrdom is estimated to have occurred between 162 and 167.

Justin is known primarily through his first and second Apologies, and his "Dialogue with Trypho." He was clearly a Platonist. In becoming a Christian he did not renounce his philosophy but rather found the fulfillment of his philosophical aspirations in Christ, the divine Logos. He remained sympathetic to Heraclitus as the first champion of the Logos in the Hellenistic traditions, and he maintained an allegiance to Plato that is evident in his Apologies. Justin believed that Plato was familiar with Moses and that the philosopher's writings were influenced by the Pentateuch, although there is little to support Justin's belief at this point.

Justin's defense of Christianity was designed, first, to halt the government's wholesale persecution of Christians. He claims that the Christians are suffering not for any crimes which they have committed, but simply because they bear the name, Christian. He appeals to justice and decries punishments that have been inflicted without trial. His Apology is therefore an attempt to show that Christian beliefs are not treasonous.

Second, Justin explains that Christianity is the true religion and, as such, was anticipated by the ancient prophets. One third of the first Apology is given to an explanation of these early prophecies and their fulfillment in Jesus of Nazareth. He asserts that demons, having taken their lead from the prophetic utterances of the Old Testament, constructed the pagan religions in an attempt to divert people from the truth which entered the world with Christ's first advent.

Third, Justin seeks to correct the misrepresentations of Christians in Roman society. He explains the practices of the early church in an attempt to dissipate the rumors and falsehoods believed by the persecutors of the Church. In doing this Justin provides what Leslie William Bernard calls "the fullest description we possess of the second century rites" of the church (Bernard, 171). Justin sets forth a liturgical order for worship which bears some resemblance to high liturgical forms still practiced today (Apology 1.67). He explains the practice of baptism (Apology 1.62) and the Eucharist (Apology 1.65–66), and explains that Sunday is the day of worship because it was the first day of creation as well as the day of Christ's resurrection (Apology 1.67).

Justin's concern was to correct the injustice against Christians, set forth Christianity as the true religion, and correct misrepresentations in order to alleviate suffering. His chief value as a writer rests in the historic significance of his early explanations of Christian rites and rituals.

J. R. Roor

Bibliography. Justin Martyr, St. Justin Martyr: First and Second Apologies, L. W. Barnard, trans.; A. Bellinzoni, Sayings of Jesus in the Writings of St. Justin Martyr; H. Chadwick, Early Christian Thought and the Classical Tradition; E. R. Goodenough, Theology of Justin Martyr; C. C. Martindale, Justin Martyr; E. F. Osborn, Justin Martyr; C. I. K. Story, Nature of Truth in the Gospel of Truth in the Writings of Justin Martyr.

Justitia Civilis. See CIVIL RIGHTEOUSNESS.

Kk

Kabbalah (Heb. qābal, “to receive tradition”). An esoteric mystic lore of Judaism, passed as secret doctrine to only the chosen few. Its origin is lost in antiquity, but one sees traces of ancient Jewish apocalyptic, talmudic, and midrashic literature and non-Jewish sources of Gnosticism and Neoplatonism in Kabbalah. Its first systematic development occurred among the Babylonian Jewish Gaonim scholars (A.D. 600–1000). As the Babylonian center waned, other areas became prominent—Italy, Spain, southern France, and Germany—and the development continued in the 1100s and 1200s. The most prominent book of Kabbalah is the Zohar, which appeared in 1300 under Moses de Leon. Once this material was recorded, everyone was able to study it. Further development occurred in the sixteenth century in Safed, Israel, under Isaac Luria, who initiated a distinctive emphasis of redemption and messianism. Rabbis at times denounced this form of study as so much speculation that would only lead Jewish people away from mainline Judaism’s three great emphases: repentance, prayer, and good deeds to humankind and God.

Christians in the Middle Ages also became interested in Kabbalah—e.g., Lully, Pico della Mirandola, and John Reuchlin. As with Jewish people, there was also a reaction among some Christians against sterile belief, and it was thought that Kabbalah was a valid corrective. Christians also studied this material to find verification of their mystical beliefs.

Kabbalah pictures God as being above all existence; through a series of ten emanations the world was created. The system is somewhat pantheistic since everything that exists has its place in God. Through good deeds a pious Jew supposedly affects the various emanations, ultimately affecting God on behalf of humankind.

Kabbalah includes reincarnation. The pure soul, once the body dies, will be present among the emanations who control the world. An impure soul must be reborn in another body, and the process continues until it has been made pure. Evil is only the negation of good, and in the Jewish setting evil is overcome through the three great emphases, along with strict adherence to the law.

What is most distinctive is the hermeneutical principle of finding hidden meanings in Scripture texts. Human language in Scripture is examined not only allegorically and analogically, but also through the interpretation of words and letters according to their numerical equivalents, and by interchanging numerical equivalents new letters and words could be created, thereby allowing for new interpretations.

Kabbalah influenced Jewish messianic movements, principally Hasidism, which developed a joyful religious expression that avoided sterile legalism.

L. GOLDBERG

Bibliography. J. Abelson, Jewish Mysticism; D. C. Ginsburg, “The Kabbalah,” in Essenes; G. Scholem, EJ 10:490–654; A. E. Waite, Holy Kabbalah; M. Wasman, “The Kabbalah,” in History of Jewish Literature 2:337–421.

Kagawa, Toyohiko (1888–1960). Japanese pastor, social reformer, evangelist, and author. Toyohiko Kagawa was born July 10, 1888, in Kobe, Japan. He was orphaned before he was four, and the loneliness and exclusion he felt while growing up produced the empathy for the poor and disadvantaged in Japanese society that shaped the direction of his life. Raised a Buddhist, he became a Christian at age fifteen through the influence of an American missionary. His theological education began at a Presbyterian seminary in Kobe (1905–8), after which he studied at Princeton University and Theological Seminary (1914–17). The hallmark of Kagawa’s life was the conviction that Christian witness must include social service to meet the material needs of people. His theological contribution, therefore, rested on his application of Christian teaching in the social realm. He was criticized for too closely aligning the kingdom of God with kingdoms of this world, and his aversion to abstract theology prohibits his being ranked among Japan's theologians. Kagawa's desire to express Christ through social concern was first articulated when he moved into Kobe's Shinkawa slum in 1909 to live among the poor. He was a prolific organizer, forming labor and peasant unions and a consumer cooperative, leading a pacifist movement, securing the right of unions to organize, and founding the National Anti-War League. Although Kagawa was a determined social activist and founding member of Japan's Socialist Party, he formed the Kingdom of God Movement in 1930 to bring Japanese to faith in Christ and traveled throughout Japan and the world as an itinerant evangelist. Kagawa died on April 23, 1960.

P. A. ERICKSEN

Bibliography. T. Kagawa, Across the Death Line (also called Before the Dawn); Brotherhood Economics; Christ and Japan; W. Axling, Kagawa; C. J. Davey, Kagawa of Japan; A. S. Moreau, Twentieth Century Dictionary of Christian Biography; R. Schildgen, Toyohiko Kagawa: Apostle of Love and Social Justice.

Kähler, Martin (1835–1912). German Protestant theologian. He was born near Königsberg in East Prussia, the son of a Lutheran pastor, and studied theology at the universities of Heidelberg, Tübingen, and Halle. Except for three years at Bonn (1864–67), his entire academic career as professor of systematic theology was spent at the University of Halle. His theological development was shaped by Rothe, Tholuck, Müller, Beck, and von Hofmann.

Kähler's principal theological work, a volume on dogmatics entitled Die Wissenschaft der christlichen Lehre (1883), had the doctrine of justification as its primary theme. His lectures on Protestant theology, the Geschichte der protestantischen Dogmatik im 19 Jahrhundert, were published posthumously (1962). He is best known for a collection of essays entitled Der sogenannte historische Jesus und der geschichtliche, biblische Christus (1892), in which he resisted the current scholarly trend of separating the historical Jesus from the apostolic proclamation. He claimed that these attempts to isolate the historical Jesus were as filled with speculation as were the dogmatic christological theories against which the historians of Jesus were reacting. The real Jesus is not the historically reconstructed Jesus of Nazareth but the Christ of faith.

Kähler, however, was not unconcerned about the historical issues. He claimed that the Christ of the kerygma attested to in the NT was the Jesus of history. In Kähler's thought there is no separation of the kerygmatic Christ from the historical figure of Jesus, nor was Jesus the mere starting point of the early Christian kerygma. Rather, Jesus was the basis and content of the kerygma, and hence the object of faith. Kähler's views anticipated those of J. Weiss, A. Schweitzer, and R. Bultmann, and have been important in recent theological discussion.

D. S. FERGUSON

See also BULTMANN, RUDOLF; DEMYTHOLOGIZATION; NEO-ORTHODOXY.

Bibliography. M. Kähler, So-Called Historical Jesus and the Historic, Biblical Christ, C. E. Braaten, trans., C. E. Braaten, New Directions in Theology Today.

Kant, Immanuel (1724–1804). One of the most acute philosophers of all time. In his thought the Age of Enlightenment reached its peak. No other thinker has so profoundly influenced the course of nineteenth- and twentieth-century philosophy and theology.

Kant was born in Königsberg, East Prussia, where from 1755 until his death he taught philosophy at the university. In 1784 he wrote an article asking the question, "What is enlightenment?" He replied that enlightenment is man's emergence from immaturity. It is man learning to think for himself without relying on the authority of the church, the Bible, or the state to tell him what to do. Kant's philosophy was an attempt to reappraise human knowledge, ethics, aesthetics, and religion in the light of this ideal. As a necessary first step, he undertook an examination of the scope and limitations of the human mind in relation to these subjects. This was the common theme of his three great critiques: Critique of Pure Reason (1781), Critique of Practical Reason (1788), and Critique of Judgment (1790). These dealt respectively with human knowledge, ethics, and aesthetics. He also dealt with ethics in his Groundwork of the Metaphysic of Morals (1785). He set out his enlightened view of religion in Religion Within the Limits of Reason Alone (1793).

Kant's approach to knowledge combined elements from both rationalism and empiricism. Kant agreed with the empiricists in saying that all our knowledge of the world outside us comes to us via our senses. But he held with the rationalists that the mind itself contributes to our knowledge of reality. Its role is to process the data provided by the senses. It does so by applying to sense data such notions as time and space, number, and cause and effect. The mind uses these ideas to interpret physical reality as related by the sense of sight, touch, smell, and sound. Without them we could not grasp anything at all. On the other hand, we know things only as they are conditioned by the mind with all its limitations. We do not know reality as it is in itself.

This led Kant to reject all metaphysical knowledge. Since our knowledge of even material things is conditioned by the mind, all claims to knowledge of reality over and above the physical must be likewise conditioned. Claims to metaphysical and theological knowledge involve hopeless contradictions that the human mind is not equipped to resolve.

Kant rejected the traditional arguments for the existence of God. He argued that the cosmological argument (arguing from causation to a first cause) and the teleological argument (arguing from evidence of design in the world to a great designer) rested upon the illegitimate ontological argument. The latter appealed to reason alone to infer the existence of God from the notion of God as the most perfect being, on the grounds that the latter would not be the most perfect being if he did not exist. Kant believed that the ontological argument rested on a tautology that merely defined God as a necessarily existing, perfect being without supplying any reasons for thinking that such a being actually did exist. It could no more prove the existence of God by asserting his existence than a merchant could increase his wealth merely by writing zeros in his ledger. Kant maintained that the cosmological and teleological arguments tacitly appealed to the ontological argument in order to convert the ideas of a first cause and great designer into an actually existing first cause and great designer.

Kant rejected the idea of ethics based on the will of God, although his own view begs the question of the source of our sense of moral obligation. He applied the categorical imperative as the test of the moral value of an action: "Act only on that maxim whereby thou canst at the same time will that it should become a universal law." The notions of God, freedom, and immortality were for Kant regulative principles. They were indemonstrable but gave coherence to ethical thought and behavior.

Kant saw Christianity as a way of teaching ethics for the philosophically unsophisticated. Jesus was for him an enlightened moral teacher whose life exemplified his teaching.

In their different ways idealism, existentialism, and logical positivism were responses to the positions advocated by Kant. Liberal theology either followed Kant in stressing the ethical aspect of religion or Schleiermacher in his attempt to get around Kant by basing theology on religious feeling.

C. BROWN

See also ENLIGHTENMENT, THE.

Bibliography. K. Barth, Protestant Theology in the Nineteenth Century; L. W. Beck, Early German Philosophy: Kant and His Predecessors; E. Cassirer, Kant's Life and Thought; F. Copleston, History of Philosophy; S. Körner, Kant; B. M. G. Reardon, Kant as Philosophical Theologian; Y. Yovel, Kant and the Philosophy of History.

Kaufman, Gordon D. (b. 1925). Mennonite minister and theologian, at Harvard Divinity School since 1963, Kaufman argues for the study of theology as a philosophical discipline, as an imaginative construction, grounded in the radical historicity of human life. He is an influential proponent of grounding theology as an academic discipline in the modern university upon obviously public grounds or warrants rather than in provincial or sectarian interests.

In Systematic Theology: A Historicist Perspective, Kaufman argues that Christian doctrines are interpretations of the historicity of human life, and that this historicity is inherent in Christian faith. Systematic theology integrates and addresses the discordant dimensions of modern existence—the political, scientific, cultural, historical, and private. Theology, as an imaginative construction, must be reconstructed in ways appropriate to our own historical existence.

Kaufman employs a "biohistorical" understanding of humanity—that is, human life is the product of biological evolution and historical development—to argue that humans have necessarily created the symbolism of Christianity in order to situate themselves in the world, especially by employing the symbol of God. Instead of beginning with the acceptance of the revelation of God as a given (of God, the Bible as "God's word," or Jesus) that functions, in essence, as an authoritarian symbol, theology should consider how and why humans maintain the necessity to create and use the concept of God (Essay on Theological Method). If one can speak objectively of the revelation of God then, according to Kaufman, this is idolatry. Instead, theology is an attempt to understand these symbols, and as such it is a deliberate human exercise and not beyond criticism or revision. So Jesus Christ is an allegory or symbol of a universal notion rather than a particular and unique authoritative character.

Kaufman stands within the liberal theological tradition of Immanuel Kant. His rejection of authoritarian revelatory models for God, Christ, and Scripture is materially at odds with evangelical theology. Kaufman's radical historicist contention serves to relativize language about God. In his fear of idolatry, Kaufman's understanding of transcendence prohibits any revelatory move from God to human life. Instead, we are left with theology as a human move to God, solely for human purposes.

J. P. CALLAHAN

Bibliography. G. Kaufman, Content of Decision: An Essay on Theological Method; God the Problem: Nonresistance and Responsibility and Other Mennonite Essays; In Face of Mystery: A Constructive Theology; Relativism, Knowledge and Faith; Systematic Theology: A Historicist Perspective; Theological Imagination: Constructing the Concept of God.

Keble, John (1792–1866). A founder of the Tractarian (Oxford) Movement. Keble College, Oxford, is named in his memory. From 1823 until his death he was a parish priest. From 1831 to 1841 he combined that duty with the professorship of poetry at Oxford, where as a young man he had been a fellow of Oriel College. His first major publication was the cycle of poems he called Christian Year (1827), which was often reprinted. He was regarded by J. H. Newman as the real founder of the Tractarian Movement because of the sermon he preached before the University of Oxford on July 14, 1833. In this he referred to the national apostasy displayed in the suppression of ten Irish bishoprics (Ireland was then part of Britain). He called for a higher view of the church as the church not of Parliament but of Christ. With Newman he wrote many of the ninety Tracts for the Times (1833–41). He edited the classic apology of Anglicanism, Richard Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity, along with other works, and two years later, in 1838, he became one of the editors of the Library of the Fathers. To this he contributed a translation of the works of Irenaeus. After the defection of Newman to Rome in 1845, Keble shared with E. B. Pusey the leadership of the movement. He was known as its quiet saint, a strong moral and spiritual leader. His high view of the Eucharist is seen in his Eucharistical Adoration (1857). His hymns are often sung in Anglican churches. P. TOON

See also ANGLO-CATHOLICISM; OXFORD MOVEMENT; PUSEY, EDWARD BOUVERIE.

Bibliography. G. Battiscombe, John Keble: A Study in Limitations; O. Chadwick, ed., Mind of the Oxford Movement; J. R. Griffin, John Keble: Saint of Anglicanism.

Kempis, Thomas à. See THOMAS A KEMPIS.

Kenosis, Kenotic Theology. “Kenosis” is a Greek term taken from Philippians 2:7, where Christ is spoken of as having “emptied himself” (RSV) and taken human form. There has been much discussion about this entire crucial passage (2:6–11), and several interpretations exist today. Kenotic theology is a theology that focuses on the person of Christ in terms of some form of self-limitation by the preexistent Son in his becoming man. Kenotic theology at the theoretical level is a way of conceiving of the incarnation that is relatively new in the history of reflection on the person of Christ. Some see this form of thought about Christ as the most recent advance in Christology; others see it as a blind alley.

History. Kenotic theology can be said to have begun as a serious form of reflection on Christology in the works of Gottfried Thomasius (1802–75), a German Lutheran theologian. In general, kenotic theology was formulated in the light of three crucial concerns. The primary concern was to find a way of understanding the person of Christ that allowed his full humanity to be adequately expressed. Biblical studies had given the church an intensified awareness that Christianity began in the earliest encounters with the man Jesus. Critical scholarship was “recapturing” him in the light of his environment. It was becoming more sensitive to the limitations of that “prescientific” era and was seeing more clearly the Synoptic portrait of the human personality of the man Jesus. All this conspired to force upon theologians the need to affirm in new ways that Christ was truly man. He grew, he hungered, he learned, he appropriated his culture, and he exhibited its limitations. All this must be said about Christ himself, not merely about some abstract appendage called humanity “assumed” by God the Son.

A second, equally important concern was to affirm that God truly was in Christ. The creeds are correct: very God, very man. The problem is how this can be said without turning Christ into an aberration. If to be human is to learn, grow, etc., and to be God is to be omniscient, then how can we speak of one person? Must he not have had “two heads”?

The third concern stems in part from the first. The age was learning to think in terms of the categories of psychology. Consciousness was a central category. If at our “center” is our consciousness, and if Jesus was both omniscient God and limited man, then he had two centers and was thus fundamentally not one of us. Christology was becoming inconceivable for some.

The converging of these concerns led to kenotic theologies in a variety of forms. All shared a need to affirm Jesus’ real, limited humanity and limited consciousness along with the affirmation that he is very God and very man. The varying forms of the theory of divine self-limitation were the way this was attempted.

All forms of classical orthodoxy either explicitly reject or reject in principle kenotic theology. This is because God must be affirmed to be changeless; any concept of the incarnation that would imply change would mean that God would cease to be God.

Types. These concerns by no means force a uniformity of formulations; in fact, there are many different possibilities under the general category “kenotic theology.” There is a variety of possibilities for a Christology in terms of the idea of a preincarnate self-limitation by God the Son. There are two broad categories for understanding kenotic theories. One concerns the relation of the kenotic theory to traditional orthodox formulas. A kenotic theory can have the function of being supportive modification of a traditional formula or it can be presented as an alternative. This is a key difference between the otherwise quite similar presentations given by Anglican Charles Gore in his Bampton Lectures, Incarnation of the Son of God (1891), and Congregationalist P. T. Forsyth in his Person and Place of Jesus Christ (1909). Both writers clearly affirm a real commitment to an understanding of Christ as God and man, yet Gore's kenotic proposal functions to reinforce his consistent and articulate defense of Chalcedonian orthodoxy. Forsyth sees his theory as a biblical alternative to a static, Greek, outmoded formula found in the Chalcedonian Definition. Both Gore and Forsyth are altogether clear on their vision of Jesus' humanity, growth, and limitations as part of the meaning of his identity.

A second distinction within kenotic theories concerns the place of the concept within the larger understanding of God's being and relation to the world. The work of A. E. Garvie in Studies in the Inner Life of Jesus (1907) shows the influence of a conservative form of Hegelian speculation on the nature of the Trinity. Here there is seen to be a movement or dialectic within God between fullness (Father) and self-limitation/expression (Son) that finds its historic expression in the incarnation kenotically understood. Thus, kenotic theology is not intended to be an ad hoc device for making sense of the Christ event; rather, the Christ event is the historic expression of the eternal dialectic within the Triune God. Others also see the relation of God as Creator to creation as a form of self-limitation, thus providing genuine human freedom and the broad context for the more specific instance of divine self-limitation in Jesus Christ. The contrast to these more speculative forms of kenotic theology would naturally be those forms that focus more specifically on the incarnation as the exclusive act of divine self-limitation for our salvation.

At least two broad areas of distinction can be made in understanding the potential range of kenotic theories. First is the crucial distinction on the relation of a proposed kenotic theology to the history of Christology. Is the theory to be seen as an alternative to existing dogma (Forsyth, Mackintosh) or a reinforcing modification (Garvie, Weston)? Second, is a kenotic theology to be seen in its uniqueness as the act of divine self-limitation (Forsyth), or is it to be seen as either the culminating historical instance of the Trinitarian dialectic (Garvie) and/or the kenotic relation of God to creation in general?

Criticism. Kenotic theology as formulated in Germany (1860–80) or in England (1890–1910) was clearly not without challenge. Indeed, many believe that the criticisms evoked have proven fatal.

A persistent criticism has been that kenotic theology is not biblical. If one were to hold some sort of developmental theory about the emergence of NT Christology—as do R. Bultmann, J. Knox, R. H. Fuller, e.g.—then the most that could be said would be that kenotic theology could at best reflect one of the emerging models. If one holds to the christological unity of the NT, as do kenotic theorists in general, then the question is more pointed. What advocates of kenotic theology would uniformly contend is that as an interpretative scheme their understanding allows one to see Jesus Christ as a real, growing, limited man without creating a sense that God is not somehow deeply involved in exactly this man. It is not a question of the interpretation of Philippians 2, but a question of how one sees God and man in Jesus Christ. Did Christ know or not know the time of the end (Mark 13:32)? Orthodoxy said he must know, for he is the presence of the omniscient God; however, for some reason he has chosen not to reveal this knowledge. Kenotic theorists insist that the text says what it says. He limited himself to his human and real development; he was genuinely dependent on his Father; he did not know. The problem of who is biblical cuts more than one way.

A second criticism clearly must focus on the fundamental credibility of the concept of a divine self-limitation. We must be clear here. Theology has always countenanced a divine concealment for pedagogical purposes in Christ. He concealed his divine radiance and became tangible so as to meet us in our darkened, fallen world on our terms (Augustine). Kenotic theology goes a crucial step beyond this; in the incarnation, however conceived, there was a preincarnate act of limitation, whether it be a “laying aside” (Gore) or a “concentration” (Forsyth). It is something like whether or not a missionary were to take his two-way radio (and thus his link to his support system) with him into the jungle. How can Jesus Christ be God if we would simultaneously affirm that during the incarnate life he was not omniscient?

Following the lead of Thomasius, some argued that there are two kinds of attributes—internal (love, joy, etc.) and external (omnipotence, omnipresence, etc.). The eternal Son “set aside” the external attributes and revealed the internal. In him we see the love of Father-Son; in him we see God's “heart” made visible. A. M. Fairbairn carefully works this out in his pioneering work, Place of Christ in Modern Theology (1895).

Others of a more speculative bent (e.g., Garvie) contend that self-limitation is in God in his “innertrinitarian” life. Thus, what is revealed in Christ is not one act of self-limitation, but God the Son in his eternal self-limiting obedient relation to the Father. The incarnation is thus seen to be the revelation of the eternal relation of Father to Son and the saving love that would include others.

The third response focuses on the importance of goal or intention for God. If God can be said to have as his fundamental goal to bring lost children back to himself, then his omnipotence/omniscience is precisely that which achieves the goal. The greatest act of omnipotence can then be seen as the Son's becoming “poor” that we may become rich in him. Omnipotence is reconsidered more in terms of the goal in view than as an abstract category. Forsyth worked with this idea at length; he called it the “moralizing of dogma,” that is, the reshaping of our view of God from what he called static categories to dynamic ones reflecting God’s saving purposes seen in Christ. Thus, there were several ways those holding a kenotic theology would attempt to make the concept of self-limitation credible. Further, the challenge was reversed. How, it was asked, can one make sense of Jesus Christ as an omniscient being simultaneously living as a growing, learning, limited man without creating a “two-headed” being? Is the union of natures conceivable without a divine self-limitation? Is not some form of docetism the only alternative? Did Jesus only look human?

The third criticism has focused on the supposed strength of kenotic theology, the consciousness of Jesus. Perhaps, it would be conceded, the person of the Incarnate is more of a unity, but have we not created a new duality between the preincarnate Son and the historical Jesus? Was there not an inconceivable loss (of knowledge) at Bethlehem? Further, if the Son simultaneously remained the transcendent Logos, is there not a radical, fatal discontinuity between the consciousness of the transcendent Logos and the earthly Jesus? It can be argued that at this point kenotic theology is most strained. However, the strain is fundamentally a relocation of the same strain orthodoxy faces when it attempts to affirm very God—very man in terms of the consciousness of the earthly Jesus. The problem cuts both ways. For kenotic theology the tension is in the cleavage between the preexistent and incarnate Son. For orthodoxy the tension is as great as it attempts to comprehend in some measure how Jesus can be both the presence of the omniscient God and a limited, growing man.

Summary. Kenotic theology is in some instances a variant but new form of orthodox, biblical faith. It has appeared in a variety of forms over the last century. It has been vigorously debated, and interest in it remains. From one angle it can be seen as an attempt to give conceptual substance to the great hymn of Charles Wesley that speaks in awe that the Son would “empty himself of all but love” and die for a fallen humanity. From another angle kenotic theology represents an attempt to give central place to Jesus’ limited yet sinless humanity while affirming that the ultimate significance of that humanity was and is that here on earth God the eternal Son has come, truly come, to redeem.

S. M. SMITH

See also CHRISTOLOGY; FAIRBAIRN, ANDREW MARTIN; FORSYTH, PETER TAYLOR; GORE, CHARLES; LORD, JESUS AS; MACKINTOSH, HUGH ROSS.

Bibliography. A. B. Bruce, Humiliation of Christ; P. Dawe, Form of a Servant: A Historical Analysis of the Kenotic Motif; P. T. Forsyth, Person and Place of Christ;

C. Gore, Dissertations on Subjects connected with the Incarnation; G. F. Hawthorne, Presence and the Power; W. Pannenberg, Jesus—God and Man; O. C. Quick, Doctrines of the Creed; H. E. W. Turner, Jesus the Christ; W. I. Walker, Spirit and the Incarnation; C. Welch, God and Incarnation in Mid-Nineteenth Century German Theology; F. Weston, One Christ.

Kerygma. A Greek word meaning “proclamation.” It may refer to the content of the gospel, to the message of the sermon, or to the preaching itself. The verb form, kēryssō, meaning “to preach” or “to proclaim,” is used in reference to Jesus’ message concerning the coming of the kingdom of God (Mark 1:14–15). In current NT scholarship the term is used to describe the content of the early Christian message. It contains within its scope the life and work of Jesus, with particular emphasis on his conflicts, suffering, death, and resurrection from the dead. In addition, the kerygma connected the events of Jesus’ life and death with the history of Israel, seeing them as the climax of God’s redemptive activity.

Kerygma is often distinguished from didachē, the former being the message of God’s act in Christ calling people to the decision of faith and membership in the community of faith, the church, the latter being the instruction in belief and morals the new converts received within the church.

It is now a commonly accepted practice to understand the kerygmatic proclamation as foundational for the beginnings of the Christian church. To be sure, there are differences among scholars regarding the details, but there is wide unanimity that the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus constitute the eschatological act of God that has ushered in the new age.

The NT as a whole may be said to be kerygmatic in character, but certain passages appear to contain quite specific kerygmatic formulations. In 1 Corinthians 15:1–11 the apostle makes reference to the tradition he has “received”: (1) that Christ died for our sins in accordance with the Scriptures; (2) that he was buried; (3) that he was raised on the third day according to the Scriptures; and (4) that he appeared to Cephas, then to the Twelve. Other NT passages that appear to contain kerygmatic formulations include Acts 2:22–24; Romans 1:1–4; and 1 Timothy 3:16. These passages should be viewed as but examples of the way the kerygmatic proclamation came to be stated in specific form.

The theological debate around the term kerygma has focused on the relationship of the proclaimed message to the historical Jesus. To understand the Gospels as a kerygmatic witness to the risen Christ rather than biographical reports has been nearly universally accepted by theologians and NT scholars. But the question remains: Where does the historical Jesus fit into the theological scheme? Surely the kerygma without the Jesus of history is a shaky foundation for faith, and a Jesus without the kerygma allows for no faith at all.

Rudolf Bultmann has raised the question of the relationship between the kerygma and the Jesus of history with characteristic force. Faith, he argues, must never be allowed to rest on the results of historical scholarship but only on the kerygma. But, one might ask, is it not only one short step from this position to a removal of the earthly life of Jesus from the content of the kerygma? Bultmann refused to take this step, insisting, as a minimum, that the kerygma is linked to the bare fact of Jesus' historicity and his death on the cross. Many of his critics have pointed out the apparent inconsistency in his view; namely, on the one hand, his insistence that faith must not be tied to history but solely rooted in the kerygma and, on the other, his unwillingness to separate the Jesus of history from the kerygma. It would seem that even Bultmann cannot escape the charge he has often leveled at other theologians: that they make faith dependent upon historical inquiry.

It is certainly true that in the minds of the NT authors there is no separation of the kerygmatic proclamation from the Jesus of Nazareth who lived, preached, died, and rose from the dead. He, indeed, was the one who was alive in the word of preaching.

D. S. FERGUSON

See also BULTMANN, RUDOLF; DODD, CHARLES HAROLD; GOSPEL; PREACH, PREACHING.

Bibliography. C. E. Braaten and R. A. Harrisville, eds., Kerygma and History; R. Bultmann, Kerygma and Myth; C. H. Dodd, Apostolic Preaching and Its Developments.

Keswick Convention. An annual summer gathering of evangelical Christians held since 1875 at Keswick in the Lake District of northern England. It had its origin in the Moody-Sankey evangelistic campaign in Britain in 1873-74 and in the writings of the American religious leaders Asa Mahan, W. E. Boardman, and especially Mr. and Mrs. Robert P. Smith. The first Keswick Convention was preceded by a number of similar smaller conferences held by Smith throughout England and by larger ones held at Broadlands and at Oxford in 1874 and at Brighton in 1875. T. D. Harford-Battersby, vicar of Keswick, held the first Keswick Convention on his own church grounds, and the meetings, lasting one week, have been held there every year since. This convention has become the mother of similar conventions not only in England but in many other countries throughout the world.

From the beginning the convention has had as its aim the deepening of the spiritual life. It differs from the average Bible conference in that it aims not merely to impart Bible knowledge and spiritual uplift, but to be a spiritual clinic where defeated and ineffective Christians may be restored to spiritual health. It stands for no particular brand of denominational theology. Its motto is "All One in Christ Jesus."

Since the convention has a definite aim and purpose to accomplish in its meetings, the teaching given during the week normally follows a progressive order. On the first day the addresses focus on sin and its disabling spiritual effects in the life of the believer. On the second day the addresses deal with the provision God has made through the cross to deal with the problem of sin, not only its guilt but also its power. Much is made of Rom. 6-8, where Paul states that the believer is identified with Christ in his death to sin and is therefore set free from slavery to sin. Keswick does not teach the possibility of the eradication of the sin nature or the attainability of sinlessness in this life. The third day is devoted to teaching on consecration, which is man's response to God's call for complete abandonment to the rule of Christ, involving both a crisis and a process. The fourth day is occupied with teaching on the Spirit-filled life. All Christians, it is taught, receive the Holy Spirit at regeneration, but not all are controlled by him. The fullness of the Spirit is made experiential by abandonment to Christ and abiding in that state of abandonment. On Friday the theme of the convention is Christian service, which is the natural result of a Spirit-filled life. Keswick has always stressed the importance of missions and has deeply influenced the missionary movement.

The majority of Keswick speakers have naturally come from England, but many have come from other parts of the world. Among the better known are Donald G. Barnhouse, F. B. Meyer, H. C. G. Moule, Andrew Murray, John R. W. Stott, Hudson Taylor, and R. A. Torrey. The addresses given at the convention are published annually in a volume usually called either Keswick Convention or Keswick Week.

S. BARABAS

Bibliography. S. Barabas, So Great Salvation: The History and Message of the Keswick Convention; C. F. Harford, Keswick Convention; E. H. Hopkins, Law of Liberty in the Spiritual Life; J. Pollock, Keswick Story.

Keys of the Kingdom. A spiritual authority to preach the gospel and exercise church discipline on earth. The phrase occurs only once in Scripture. In Matthew 16:19 Jesus says to Peter, "I will give you the keys of the kingdom of heaven; and whatever you shall bind on earth shall have been bound in heaven and whatever you shall loose on earth shall have been loosed in heaven" (NASB).

Elsewhere in the NT a key always implies authority to open a door and give entrance to a place or realm (Luke 11:52; Rev. 1:18; 3:7; 9:1; 20:1; cf. Isa. 22:22). The keys of the kingdom of heaven therefore represent at least the authority to preach the gospel of Christ (cf. Matt. 16:16) and thus to open the door of the kingdom of heaven and allow people to enter.

Peter first used this authority by preaching the gospel at Pentecost (Acts 2:14–41). But the other apostles also were given this authority in a primary sense (they wrote the gospel in permanent form in the NT). And all believers have this “key” in a secondary sense, for they can all share the gospel with others.

However, two factors suggest that the authority of the keys in Matthew 16:19 is broader than just preaching the gospel. First, the plural “keys” suggests authority over more than one door. Thus, more than just entrance to the kingdom is implied; some authority within the kingdom is also suggested.

Second, Jesus completes the promise about the keys with a statement about “binding” and “loosing.” Although the rabbinic literature often used the words “bind” and “loose” for forbidding and permitting various kinds of conduct, a much closer parallel in language, grammar, and authorship is Matthew 18:18, where “binding” and “loosing” mean placing under church discipline and releasing from church discipline (see Matt. 18:15–17). This sense is also suitable in the context of Matthew 16:19; after promising to build his church, Jesus also promises to give not only the authority to open the door of entrance into the kingdom, but also some administrative authority to regulate the conduct of people once they are inside.

The initial conversation with Peter in Matthew 16:16–19 does not indicate whether the disciplining authority of the keys would later be given to others. But in Matthew 18:18 this authority is broadened to the church generally whenever it meets and corporately exercises church discipline (as in Matt. 18:17).

The term “whatever” in both passages is neuter and refers not to persons but to specific actions that are subject to discipline. Yet the authority of the keys with respect to church discipline is not completely unlimited. It will only be effective against true sin (cf. Matt. 18:15), sin as defined by God’s Word. The keys of the kingdom do not represent authority to legislate ethical standards in an absolute sense, for the authority to define right and wrong belongs to God alone (Ps. 119:89, 142, 160; Matt. 5:18; Rom. 1:32; 2:16; 3:4–8; 9:20). Nor can the authority of the keys involve authority to forgive sins, which in Scripture can be done only by God himself (Ps. 103:3; Isa. 43:25; 55:7; Mark 2:7, 10; 1 John 1:9). In John 20:23 the “forgiveness” of sins by the disciples is best understood as freeing from church discipline and restoring personal relationships in a sense similar to the “loosing” of Matthew 16:19 and 18:18.

Both Matthew 16:19 and Matthew 18:18 use an unusual Greek verb construction (periphrastic future perfect). It is best translated by the NASB, “whatever you shall bind on earth shall have been bound in heaven, and whatever you shall loose on earth shall have been loosed in heaven” (emphasis added). Several other examples of this construction show that it indicates not just a future action (“shall be bound”), for which a common Greek tense was available (future passive), but rather an action that would be completed before some future point, with effects that would continue to be felt (see Gen. 43:9; 44:32; Luke 12:52; Sir. 7:25; Hermas, Similitudes 5.4.2; Letter of Aristaeus, 40). Thus, Jesus is teaching that church discipline will have heavenly sanction. But it is not as if the church must wait for God to endorse its actions; rather, whenever it enacts discipline it can be confident that God has already begun the process spiritually. Whenever it releases from discipline, forgives the sinner, and restores personal relationships, it can be confident that God has already begun the restoration spiritually (cf. John 20:23). Earthly church discipline involves the awesome certainty that corresponding heavenly discipline has already begun.

W. A. GRUDEM

See also CHURCH DISCIPLINE; KINGDOM OF CHRIST, GOD, HEAVEN; PETER, PRIMACY OF.

Bibliography. J. Calvin, Commentaries; W. O. Carver, ISBE 3:1794–97; J. Jeremias, TDNT 3:744–53; D. Müller and C. Brown, NIDNTT 2:729–34.

Kierkegaard, Søren (1813–1855). Danish lay theologian and unintentional founder of existentialism. Born in Copenhagen, he inherited a melancholy disposition from his father, a wealthy and devout wool dealer. Kierkegaard spent ten years preparing for the Lutheran ministry at the University of Copenhagen (M.A. 1840) but was never ordained. Although his life was filled with personal tragedy and loneliness, he was familiar with the major literary, artistic, and intellectual movements of his day.

Kierkegaard’s writings were significantly shaped by personal relationships. Perhaps the most important of these was his broken engagement to Regine Olsen. Although Kierkegaard loved her deeply, he ended the relationship convinced that the intimacy of marriage would destroy them both. His love for Regine became a symbol of Abraham’s faith at being willing to sacrifice Isaac, a theme Kierkegaard returned to again and again.

The engagement ended, Kierkegaard sought refuge in Berlin. He returned shortly to Copenhagen with his first major work, Either-Or (1843). It is a brilliant, dialectical, and poetic discussion in which he sought to justify his actions but which also set forth a basic tenet of existentialism. Kierkegaard argued that each individual must choose—consciously and responsibly—among the alternatives that life brings.

Many Kierkegaard scholars divide his works into two groupings, although the division is arbitrary. The first writings (1843–46) are characterized by aesthetic and philosophical themes. Titles from this period include Fear and Trembling (1843), Philosophical Fragments (1844), Concept of Dread (1844), and Concluding Unscientific Postscript to the Philosophical Fragments (1846).

Following a vicious attack on him in 1846 by a widely read literary paper, Kierkegaard became even more withdrawn and considered giving up writing. A second conversion experience in 1848, however, convinced him of the need to clarify for his contemporaries the true nature of Christianity. Titles characteristic of this later period include Works of Love (1847), Christian Discourses (1848), and Training in Christianity (1850).

Philosophically, Kierkegaard's target was the "system" (idealism) of G. W. F. Hegel. He attacked Hegel's attempt to systematize all of reality because Hegel left out the most important element of human experience, namely existence. Indeed, Kierkegaard felt that no philosophical system could explain the human condition. The experience of reality, such as the loss of a loved one, was what mattered, not the idea (concept) of it. Whereas Hegel emphasized universals, Kierkegaard argued for decision and commitment. Hegel sought an objective theory of knowledge. Kierkegaard believed in the subjectivity of truth.

This emphasis on the subjective led to Kierkegaard's paradoxical understanding of faith. Genuine faith calls for a "leap of faith," a passionate commitment to God in the face of uncertainty and objective reasoning. For Kierkegaard, the free choice of faith alone brings authentic human existence.

The last few years of his life were filled with writings harshly critical of the established Lutheran Church. Following the death in 1854 of his father's friend Bishop Jacob Pier Myser, Kierkegaard could not refrain from attacking the cold formality and indifference of the state church. He was especially hard on clerics, symbolized by Myser, who had become all too comfortable in secular society, and, rather than striving to be followers of Christ were spiritually bankrupt civil servants. After two years of this crusade Kierkegaard's health was broken, and he died shortly thereafter.

During his lifetime Kierkegaard was little known or read outside of Denmark. In the twentieth century, as his works have been translated, Kierkegaard has come to be widely appreciated for his affirmation of faith and critique of the human condition.

D. B. ELLER

See also EXISTENTIALISM.

Bibliography. W. H. Auden, Living Thoughts of Kierkegaard; H. Bloom, ed., Søren Kierkegaard; R. Brethall, ed., Kierkegaard Anthology; E. Carnell, Burden of Søren Kierkegaard; J. Collins, Mind of Kierkegaard; H. Diem, Kierkegaard: An Introduction; Kierkegaard's Dialectic of Existence; L. Dupré, Kierkegaard as Theologian; V. Eller, Kierkegaard and Radical Discipleship; W. Lowrie, Short Life of Kierkegaard; L. Shestov, Kierkegaard and the Existential Philosophy; P. Sponheim, Kierkegaard on Christ and Christian Coherence; J. D. B. Walker, Kierkegaard: The Descent into God.

King, Christ as. See OFFICES OF CHRIST.

King, Martin Luther, Jr. (1929–1968). Christian advocate of nonviolent social change and America's most visible civil rights leader from 1955 until his assassination in April 1968. The son of a prominent black Baptist pastor in Atlanta, King studied at Morehouse College, Crozer Theological Seminary, and Boston University, where he received the Ph.D. At Boston he pursued studies in philosophy (personalism and Hegelianism) and theology (varieties of existentialism, liberalism, and more traditional orthodoxy) that would one day contribute to his civil rights activity. In 1955, while pastor of the Drexler Avenue Baptist Church in Montgomery, Alabama, he led a successful bus boycott that ended racial segregation in the city's public transportation system. In 1957 he helped organize the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), whose leaders, like King, were mostly black Baptist pastors.

King's personal prestige was at its height in the early to mid-1960s. His keynote sermon, "I Have a Dream," at the great march on Washington in August 1963 was one of the most memorable such performances in American history. He also directed the well-publicized Selma to Montgomery march in the spring of 1965. The first of these events mobilized support for the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the second for the federal Voter Registration Act of 1965. King was awarded the Nobel Prize for Peace in 1964.

Toward the end of his life King struck off on several new courses that put his influence in jeopardy. He traveled north (to Chicago in 1966, for example) to campaign for civil rights, and this cost him the support of those who saw the issue in strictly southern terms. He also criticized the Vietnam war, which earned him distrust from the administration of President Lyndon Johnson. And he was caught in an ideological crossfire caused by rioting in American cities during the mid- to late 1960s. Critics claimed that King should answer for the violence because of his forceful promotion of civil rights. Some blacks felt that King betrayed their cause by continuing to repudiate the use of violence to attain racial justice.

During the 1950s and 1960s King's prominence gave many Americans their first glimpse of the richness of black preaching. His speeches and writings drew heavily on the vocabulary of black Christian history. Yet his thought reflected a number of influences. It drew upon an evangelical realism concerning the nature of evil and a scriptural defense of nonviolence ("love your enemies"). In classic black fashion, however, he made little distinction between spiritual and social problems involved in the civil rights struggle. Other elements also entered his thinking—the pacifism of Gandhi, the civil disobedience of Thoreau, the existentialist theology of Paul Tillich, the personalistic idealism he had studied at Boston University, and the American public faith in democratic equality. The conviction that bound these various influences together was his belief that a history of suffering made the oppressed especially capable of proclaiming and working toward the ultimate triumph of God's righteousness.

M. A. NOLL

See also BLACK THEOLOGY; CIVIL RIGHTS.

Bibliography. C. E. Lincoln, ed., Martin Luther King, Jr.: A Profile; R. Lischer, Preacher King; J. M. Washington, Testament of Hope: The Essential Writings of Martin Luther King, Jr.

Kingdom of Christ, God, Heaven. Terminology. "The kingdom of God" occurs four times in Matthew (12:28; 19:24; 21:31; 21:43), fourteen times in Mark, thirty-two times in Luke, twice in John (3:3, 5), six times in Acts, eight times in Paul, once in Revelation (12:10). "The kingdom of the heavens" occurs thirty-three times in Matthew, once in a variant reading in John 3:5, once in the apocryphal work the Gospel of the Hebrews 11. "Kingdom" occurs nine times (e.g., Matt. 25:34; Luke 12:32; 22:29; 1 Cor. 15:24; Rev. 1:9); also "your kingdom" (Matt. 6:10; Luke 11:2); "his kingdom" (Matt. 6:33; Luke 12:31; 1 Thess. 2:12); "the kingdom of their [my] Father" (Matt. 13:43; 26:29); "The good news [gospel] of the kingdom" (Matt. 4:23; 9:35; 24:14); "the message about the kingdom" (Matt. 13:19); "the subjects [sons] of the kingdom" (Matt. 8:12; 13:38); "the coming kingdom of our father David" (Mark 11:10). Twice "kingdom" is used of the redeemed (Rev. 1:6; 5:10).

"The kingdom of God" and "the kingdom of heaven" are linguistic variations of the same idea. Jewish idiom often substituted a suitable term for deity (Matt. 21:25; Mark 14:61; Luke 15:21; 1 Macc. 3:50). Matthew preserves the Semitic idiom while the other Gospels render it into idiomatic Greek. See Matthew 19:23–24 for their identity of meaning.

The kingdom of God is also the kingdom of Christ. Jesus speaks of the kingdom of the "Son of Man" (Matt. 13:41; 16:28), "my kingdom"

(Luke 22:30; John 18:36). See "his kingdom" (Luke 1:33; 2 Tim. 4:1); "your kingdom" (Matt. 20:21; Luke 23:42; Heb. 1:8); "the kingdom of the Son he loves" (Col. 1:13); "his heavenly kingdom" (2 Tim. 4:18); "the eternal kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ" (2 Pet. 1:11). God has given the kingdom to Christ (Luke 22:29), and when the Son has accomplished his rule, he will restore the kingdom to the Father (1 Cor. 15:24). Therefore, it is "the kingdom of Christ and of God" (Eph. 5:5). The kingdom of the world is to become "the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ" (Rev. 11:15). There is no tension between "the power and the kingdom of our God and the authority of his Christ" (Rev. 12:10).

The Secular Use. Basileia is first the authority to rule as a king and secondly the realm over which the reign is exercised.

The Abstract Meaning. In Luke 19:12, 15 (ΚΥ) a nobleman went into a far country to "receive a kingdom," i.e., authority to rule. Revelation 17:12 speaks of ten kings who have not yet "received a kingdom"; they are to "receive authority as kings" for one hour. These kings give over their "kingdom," their authority, to "the beast" (Rev. 17:17). The harlot is the great city that has "kingdom," dominion over the kings of the earth (Rev. 17:18).

The Concrete Meaning. The kingdom is also a realm over which a reign is exercised. The idea of a realm is found in Matthew 4:8 = Luke 4:5; Matthew 24:7; Mark 6:23; Revelation 16:10.

The Kingdom Is God's Reign. The "kingdom of God" means primarily the rule of God, the divine kingly authority.

Old Testament Usage. The Hebrew word malēkūt, like basileia, carries primarily the abstract rather than the concrete meaning. A king's reign is frequently dated by the phrase "in the . . . year of this malēkūt," i.e., of his reign (1 Chron. 26:31; Dan. 1:1). The establishment of Solomon's malēkūt (1 Kings 2:12) meant the securing of his reign. The reception of Saul's malēkūt by David (1 Chron. 12:23) is the authority to reign as king. The abstract idea is evident when the word is placed in parallelism with such abstract concepts as power, might, glory, and dominion (Dan. 2:37; 4:34; 7:14).

When malēkūt is used of God, it almost always refers to his authority or his rule as the heavenly King. See Psalms 22:28; 103:19; 145:11, 13; Daniel 6:26; Obadiah 21.

New Testament Usage. The kingdom of God is the divine authority and rule given by the Father to the Son (Luke 22:29). Christ will exercise this rule until he has subdued all that is hostile to God. When he has put all enemies under his feet, he will return the kingdom—his messianic authority—to the Father (1 Cor. 15:24–28). The kingdom (not kingdoms) now exercised by men in opposition to God is to become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ (Rev. 11:15) and "he will reign for ever and ever." In Revelation 12:10 the kingdom of God is parallel to the salvation and power of God and the authority of his Christ.

Kingdom of Christ, God, Heaven

This abstract meaning is apparent in the Gospels. In Luke 1:33 the everlasting kingdom of Christ is synonymous with his rule. When Jesus said that his kingdom was not of this world (John 18:36), he did not refer to his realm; he meant that his rule was not derived from earthly authority but from God and that his kingship would not manifest itself like a human kingdom but in accordance with the divine purpose. The kingdom that people must receive with childlike simplicity (Matt. 19:14; Mark 10:15; Luke 18:17), that people must seek (Matt. 6:33; Luke 12:31), that Christ will give to the disciples (Luke 22:29), is the divine rule.

The Kingdom Is Soteriological. The object of the divine rule is the redemption of people and their deliverance from the powers of evil. 1 Corinthians 15:23–28 is definitive. Christ's reign means the destruction of all hostile powers, the last of which is death. The kingdom of God is the reign of God in Christ destroying all that is hostile to the divine rule.

The NT sees a hostile kingdom standing over against God's kingdom. The "kingdom of the world" is opposed to God's kingdom (Rev. 11:15) and must be conquered. The kingdoms of the world are under satanic control (Matt. 4:8; Luke 4:5). Matthew 12:26 and Luke 11:18 speak of the kingdom of Satan, whose power over humans is shown in demon possession. This world or age opposes the working of God's kingdom; the cares of the age will choke the word of the kingdom (Matt. 13:22). This opposition between the two kingdoms, of God and of Satan, is summarized in 2 Corinthians 4:4. Satan is called the god of this age and is seen to exercise his rule by holding people in darkness. This statement must be understood in light of the fact that God remains the King of the ages (1 Tim. 1:17; Rev. 15:3).

The kingdom of God is the redemptive rule of God in Christ defeating Satan and the powers of evil and delivering people from the sway of evil. It brings to people "righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Spirit" (Rom. 14:17). Entrance into the kingdom of Christ means deliverance from the power of darkness (Col. 1:13) and is accomplished by the new birth (John 3:3, 5).

The Kingdom Is Dynamic. The kingdom is not an abstract principle; the kingdom comes. It is God's rule actively invading the kingdom of Satan. The coming of the kingdom, as John the Baptist preached it, would mean a mighty divine act: a baptism of judgment and fire (Matt. 3:11–12). God was about to manifest his sovereign rule in the Coming One in salvation and judgment.

The Kingdom Comes at the End of the Age. John looked for a single, though complex, event of salvation-judgment. Jesus separated the present and future visitations of the kingdom. There is a future eschatological coming of the kingdom at the end of the age. Jesus taught the prayer, "Your kingdom come" (Matt. 6:10). When the Son of Man comes in his glory, he will sit on the throne of judgment. The wicked will suffer the condemnation of fire; the righteous will "inherit the kingdom" (Matt. 25:31–46). The same separation at the end of the age is pictured in Matthew 13:36–43. This eschatological coming of the kingdom will mean the palingenesia (Matt. 19:28), the rebirth or transformation of the material order.

The Kingdom Has Come into History. Jesus taught that the kingdom, which will come in glory at the end of the age, has come into history in his own person and mission. The redemptive rule of God has now invaded the realm of Satan to deliver people from the power of evil. In the exorcism of demons Jesus asserted the presence and power of the kingdom (Matt. 12:28). While the destruction of Satan awaits the coming of the Son of Man in glory (Matt. 25:41; Rev. 20:10), Jesus has already defeated Satan. The stronger man (Satan) is bound by the stronger man (Christ), and people may now experience a new release from evil (Matt. 12:29). The mission of the disciples in the name and power of Christ casting out demons meant the overthrow of Satan's power (Luke 10:18). Thus, Jesus could say that the kingdom of God was present in the midst of people (Luke 17:21). In the messianic works of Christ fulfilling Isaiah 35:5–6, the kingdom manifested its power (Matt. 11:12; biazetai is best interpreted as a middle form).

The Kingdom Is Supernatural. As the dynamic activity of God's rule, the kingdom is supernatural. It is God's deed. Only the supernatural act of God can destroy Satan, defeat death (1 Cor. 15:26), raise the dead in incorruptible bodies to inherit the blessings of the kingdom (1 Cor. 15:50), and transform the world order (Matt. 19:28). The same supernatural rule of God has invaded the kingdom of Satan to deliver people from bondage to satanic darkness. The parable of the seed growing by itself sets forth this truth (Mark 4:26–29). The ground brings forth fruit of itself. People may sow the seed by preaching the kingdom (Matt. 10:7; Luke 10:9; Acts 8:12; 28:23, 31); they can persuade others concerning the kingdom (Acts 19:8), but they cannot build it. It is God's deed. People can receive the kingdom (Mark 10:15; Luke 18:17), but they are never said to establish it. People can reject the kingdom and refuse to receive it or enter it (Matt. 23:13), but they cannot destroy it. They can wait for it (Luke 23:51), pray for its coming (Matt. 6:10), and seek it (Matt. 6:33), but they cannot bring it. The kingdom is altogether God's deed although it works in and through humans. People may do things for the sake of the kingdom (Matt. 19:12; Luke 18:29), work for it (Col. 4:11), suffer for it (2 Thess. 1:5), but they are not said to act upon the kingdom itself. They can inherit it (Matt. 25:34; 1 Cor. 6:9–10, 15:50), but they cannot bestow it upon others.

The Mystery of the Kingdom. The presence of the kingdom in history is a mystery (Mark 4:11). A mystery is a divine purpose hidden for long ages but finally revealed (Rom. 16:25–26). The OT revelation looks forward to a single manifestation of God's kingdom when the glory of God would fill the earth. Daniel 2 sees four human kingdoms, then the kingdom of God.

The mystery of the kingdom is this: Before this eschatological consummation, before the destruction of Satan, before the age to come, the kingdom of God has entered this age and invaded the kingdom of Satan in spiritual power to bring to people in advance the blessings of forgiveness (Mark 2:5), life (John 3:3), and righteousness (Matt. 5:20; Rom. 14:17), which belong to the age to come. The righteousness of the kingdom is an inner, absolute righteousness (Matt. 5:20, 48) that can be realized only as God gives it to people.

The parables of Matthew 13 embody this new revelation. A parable is a story drawn from daily experience illustrating a single, fundamental truth; the details are not to be pressed as in allegory. The kingdom has come among humans but not with power that compels every knee to bow before its glory; it is rather like seed cast on the ground, which may be fruitful or unfruitful depending on its reception (Matt. 13:3–8). The kingdom has come, but the present order is not disrupted; the children of the kingdom and the children of the evil one grow together in the world until the harvest (Matt. 13:24–30, 36–43). The kingdom of God has indeed come to humans, not as a new glorious order, but like the proverbial mustard seed. However, its insignificance must not be despised. This same kingdom will one day be a great tree (Matt. 13:31–32). Instead of a world-transforming power, the kingdom is present in an almost imperceptible form like a bit of leaven hidden in a bowl of dough. However, this same kingdom will yet fill the earth as the leavened dough fills the bowl (Matt. 13:33). In neither of these two parables is the idea of slow growth or gradual permeation important, for our Lord nowhere else used either idea. In Scripture natural growth can illustrate the supernatural (1 Cor. 15:36–37).

The coming of the kingdom of God in humility instead of glory was an utterly new and amazing revelation. Yet, said Jesus, people should not be deceived. Although the present manifestation of the kingdom is in humility—indeed, its Bearer was put to death as a condemned criminal—it is nevertheless the kingdom of God, and, like buried treasure or a priceless pearl, its acquisition merits any cost or sacrifice (Matt. 13:44–46).

The fact that the present activity of the kingdom in the world will initiate a movement that will include evil people as well as good should not lead to misunderstanding of its true nature. It is the kingdom of God; it will one day divide the good from the evil in eschatological salvation and judgment (Matt. 13:47–50).

The Kingdom as the Realms of Redemptive Blessing. A reign must have a realm in which its authority is exercised. Thus, the redemptive rule of God creates realms in which the blessings of the divine reign are enjoyed. There is both a future and a present realm of the kingdom.

The Future Realm. God calls people to enter his own kingdom and glory (1 Thess. 2:12). In this age the children of the kingdom will experience suffering (2 Thess. 1:5) and tribulations (Acts 14:22), but God will rescue them from every evil and save them for his heavenly kingdom (2 Tim. 4:18). People should be careful to assure entrance into the kingdom of Jesus Christ (2 Pet. 1:11). Paul frequently speaks of the kingdom as a future inheritance (1 Cor. 6:9–10; 15:50; Gal. 5:21; Eph. 5:5).

In the Gospels the eschatological salvation is described as entrance into the kingdom of God (Mark 9:47; 10:24), into the age to come (Mark 10:30), and into eternal life (Matt. 25:46; Mark 9:45; 10:17, 30). These three idioms are interchangeable. The consummation of the kingdom requires the coming of the Son of Man in glory. Satan will be destroyed (Matt. 25:41), the dead in Christ raised in incorruptible bodies (1 Cor. 15:42–50) that are no longer capable of death (Luke 20:35–36) to inherit the kingdom of God (Matt. 25:34; 1 Cor. 15:50). Before his death Jesus promised his disciples renewed fellowship in the new order (Matt. 26:29) when they would share both his fellowship and his authority to rule (Luke 22:29–30).

The stages of this consummation is a debated question. The Gospels picture only a single redemptive event at the return of Christ with resurrection (Luke 20:34–36) and judgment (Matt. 25:31–46). Revelation pictures a more detailed consummation. At the return of Christ (Rev. 19), Satan is bound and shut up in a bottomless pit, the first resurrection occurs, and the resurrected saints share Christ's rule for a thousand years (Rev. 20:1–5). In this millennial reign of Christ and his saints is found the fulfillment of such sayings as Matthew 19:28; Luke 22:30; 1 Corinthians 6:2; Revelation 5:10. Only at the end of the millennium is Satan cast into the lake of fire (Rev. 20:10) and death finally destroyed (Rev. 20:14).

One interpretation understands this language realistically and looks for two future stages in the accomplishment of God's purpose, one at the beginning and one at the end of the millennium. This view is called premillennialism because it expects a millennial reign of Christ after his second coming. It explains the Gospel expectation in terms of progressive revelation. Daniel 2 does not foresee the church age; the Gospels do not foresee the millennial age; only Revelation gives the full outline of the consummation.

Kingdom of Christ, God, Heaven

Others insist that there is only one stage of consummation and that the coming of Christ will inaugurate the age to come. The binding of Satan is the same as that in Matthew 12:29; the "first" resurrection is not bodily but spiritual (John 5:25; Rom. 6:5); and the reign of Christ and his saints is a present spiritual reality (Eph. 2:5–6; Heb. 1:3; Rev. 3:21). This interpretation is called amillennial because it does not expect a millennial reign after Christ's return. The thousand years is a symbolic number for the entire period of Christ's present reign through the church.

It is often overlooked that in both of these interpretations the final goal is the same—the consummation of God's kingdom in the age to come. The debate is about the steps by which God will accomplish his redemptive purpose and not about the character of God's redemptive purpose.

A Present Realm. Because the dynamic power of God's reign has invaded this evil age, it has created a present spiritual realm in which the blessings of God's reign are experienced. The redeemed have already been delivered from the power of darkness and brought into the kingdom of Christ (Col. 1:13). Jesus said that since the days of John the Baptist the kingdom of God has been preached and people enter it with violent determination (Luke 16:16). The one who is least in the new order of the kingdom is called greater than the greatest of the preceding order (Matt. 11:11) because that person enjoys kingdom blessings John never knew. Other sayings about entering a present realm of blessing are found in Matthew 21:31.

The present and future aspects of the kingdom are inseparably tied together in Mark 10:15. The kingdom has come among humans and its blessings have been extended in the person of Jesus. Those who now receive this offer of the kingdom with complete childlike trust will enter into the future eschatological kingdom of life.

The Kingdom and the Church. The kingdom is not the church. The apostles went about preaching the kingdom of God (Acts 8:12; 19:8; 28:23); it is impossible to substitute "church" for "kingdom" in such passages. However, there is an inseparable relationship. The church is the fellowship of people who have accepted God's offer of the kingdom, submitted to its rule, and entered into its blessings. The kingdom was offered to Israel (Matt. 10:5–6), who, because of their previous covenantal relationship to God, were "subjects of the kingdom" (Matt. 8:12)—its natural heirs. However, the offer of the kingdom in Christ was made on an individual basis in terms of personal acceptance (Matt. 10:35–37; Mark 3:31–35) rather than in terms of the family or nation. Because Israel rejected the kingdom, it was taken away and given to a different people (Matt. 21:43), the church.

Thus, we may say that the kingdom of God creates the church. The redemptive rule of God brings into being a new people who receive the blessings of the divine reign. Furthermore, it was the activity of the divine rule that brought judgment upon Israel. Individually the kingdom means either salvation or judgment (Matt. 3:12); historically the activity of the kingdom of God effected the creation of the church and the destruction of Israel (Matt. 23:37–38). This is probably the meaning of Mark 9:1. Within the lifetime of the disciples the kingdom of God would be seen manifesting its power in bringing a historical judgment upon Jerusalem and in creating the new people, the church. Paul announced the rejection of Israel and the salvation of the Gentiles (Acts 28:26–28; 1 Thess. 2:16). However, the rejection of Israel is not permanent. After God has visited the Gentiles, he will regraft Israel into the people of God, and "so all Israel will be saved" (Rom. 11:24–26), receive the kingdom of God, and enter into its blessings (see Matt. 23:39; Acts 3:19–20).

The kingdom also works through the church. The disciples preached the kingdom of God and performed signs of the kingdom (Matt. 10:7–8; Luke 10:9, 17). The powers of the kingdom were operative in and through them. Jesus said that he would give to the church the keys of the kingdom of heaven with power to bind and loose (Matt. 16:18–19). The meaning of the keys is illustrated in Luke 11:52. The scribes had taken away the key of knowledge, i.e., the correct interpretation of the OT. The key of understanding the divine purpose had been entrusted to Israel but the scribes had so misinterpreted the oracles of God delivered to them (Rom. 3:2) that when Messiah came with a new revelation of God's kingdom, they neither entered themselves nor allowed others to enter. These keys, along with the kingdom blessings, are to be given to the new people who, as they preach the good news of the kingdom, will be the means of binding or loosing people from their sins. In fact, the disciples had already used these keys and exercised this authority, bringing people the gift of peace or pronouncing the divine judgment (Matt. 10:13–15). The kingdom is God's deed. It has come into the world in Christ; it works in the world through the church. When the church has proclaimed the gospel of the kingdom in all the world as witness to all nations, Christ will return (Matt. 24:14) and bring the kingdom in glory.

G. E. LADD

See also CHURCH.

Bibliography. G. Dalman, Words of Jesus; R. H. Fuller, Mission and Achievement of Jesus; R. Hiers, Kingdom of God in the Synoptic Tradition; A. M. Hunter, Introducing New Testament Theology; B. Klappert, NIDNTT 2:372–390; W. G. Kümmel, Promise and Fulfillment; G. E. Ladd, Crucial Questions about the Kingdom of God; Jesus and the Kingdom; G. Lundström, Kingdom of God in the Teaching of Jesus; R. Otto, Kingdom of God and the Son of Man; H. Ridderbos, Coming of the Kingdom; A. Robertson, Regnum Dei; K. L. Schmidt et al., TDNT 1:564–593; G. Vos, Teaching of Jesus concerning the Kingdom of God and the Church.

Kingsley, Charles (1819–1875). Anglican writer and social reformer. Graduate of Cambridge, he was ordained and from 1844 lived in Hampshire. He was also chaplain to Queen Victoria (1859); professor of modern history at Cambridge (1860–69), a post for which he was dubiously competent but which made few demands on his time; and canon of Westminster (1873). Influenced by Thomas Carlyle and F. D. Maurice, he was a founding member of the Christian Socialist movement in England, which views are reflected in many of his popular novels, notably Alton Locke (1850), which highlighted appalling industrial conditions. He called on the church to take vigorous social action and resented the description “muscular Christianity” that came to be applied to his teachings. Kingsley supported Darwin’s theories and sought to reconcile Christianity and science, not least in his best-selling children’s book, Water Babies (1863). This led to a notorious dispute with J. H. Newman, the target of one of Kingsley’s less felicitous utterances: “Truth, for its own sake, had never been a virtue with the Roman clergy.” Out of the controversy came Newman’s Apologia pro Vita Sua (1864), in which Newman outlined his religious development. Kingsley disliked asceticism of all kinds and greatly disliked the Oxford Movement with its High Church sympathies. He was of the Broad Church party but became more theologically conservative in later life. He worked selflessly on behalf of the working classes at a time when such crusades were unpopular among his contemporaries. “The age of chivalry is never past,” he declared, “so long as there is a wrong left undressed on earth.”

J. D. DOUGLAS

See also SOCIALISM, CHRISTIAN.

Bibliography. U. P. Hennessy, Canon Charles Kingsley.

Kneel, Kneeling. The various Hebrew and Greek words and phrases that express the idea of kneeling usually pertain to acts of worship, pronouncements of blessing, prayer, and homage to superiors.

In the NT the Greek gonypetein, “to kneel,” and gony, “knee,” in the phrase “bow the knee” are the most common words used, but the close equivalent, proskynein, “to worship,” can mean kneel in worship as well as complete prostration. For example, the soldiers knelt before Christ in mock homage (Mark 15:19), the apostle Paul bowed his knees before the Father in prayer (Eph. 3:14), and Cornelius worshiped Peter by falling at Peter’s feet, apparently upon his knees (Acts 10:25). References to bowing the knees are rare among the Greeks and Romans in extrabiblical literature, but the word proskynein is used frequently to denote such posture.

The Hebrew kāra, “to bow down,” is often connected with berek, “knee,” in the OT, as in Isaiah 45:23, “every knee will bow.” The Hebrew derivative, bārak, means “to bless” and implies that the one blessed kneels (1 Sam. 23:21), except when God is blessed by people (1 Chron. 16:36).

Both the OT and NT have frequent references to kneeling in adoration and petition. Typical is the psalmist’s exhortation, “Come, let us bow down in worship, let us kneel before the LORD our Maker, for he is our God” (Ps. 95:6–7). Solomon is pictured kneeling, as is Daniel: “Three times a day he got down on his knees and prayed” (Dan. 6:10). The Lord Jesus also “knelt down and prayed” (Luke 22:41), as did the apostles and followers: “On the beach we knelt to pray” (Acts 21:5). Stephen (Acts 7:60), Peter (Acts 9:40), and Paul (Acts 20:36) are pictured kneeling. In the Gospels petitioners knelt before Jesus, as did the man who sought his son’s healing (Matt. 17:14), the rich ruler (Mark 10:17), and the man with leprosy (Mark 1:40).

By Irenaeus’s time the church worshiped while standing, prostrated, bowing, and kneeling. In standing the worshipers united with Christ and his resurrection. Other positions symbolized repentance, submission, and petition. Sitting during worship was unknown, though it was common in teaching sessions. The Apostolic Constitutions command prayer while standing thrice on the Lord’s day honoring the risen Christ. In Chrysostom’s time the deacon admonished, “Let us stand with reverence and decency.” The Eucharist was first received by communicants while standing, and not until later was kneeling introduced. The Reformers received Holy Communion while sitting, since to kneel meant adoration to the host. The Anglican prayer book specified frequent kneeling during the service, to which the Puritans objected. Theodoret recounts that ordination candidates were “forced” to kneel, thus demonstrating their sense of unworthiness and the awesome nature of the office being accepted.

Scripture and history show that the position of the body in worship is significant, though the perceptions of the meaning of those positions may vary. What is important is that one express true worship in terms of the current conception of that which expresses adoration, humility, and yieldedness.

Kneel, Kneeling

In Scripture kneeling is a significant eschatological concept, summing up the goal of history—that Jesus will be acknowledged as Lord when every knee bows in worship to him (Phil. 2:10).

W. H. BAKER AND W. N. KERR

Bibliography. B. S. Easton, ISBE 3:1815; S. Mowinckel, Psalms in Israel's Worship 2:44–52; A. Murtonen, “The Use and Meaning of the Words lebarek and berakah in the OT,” VT 9:158–77; J. N. Oswalt, TWOT 1:132–33; J. Scharbert, TDOT 2:279–308; H. Schlier, TDNT 1:738–40; H. Schonweiss, NIDNTT 2:859–60; W. S. Towner, “‘Blessed by Yahweh’ and ‘Blessed Art Thou, Yahweh’—The Modulation of a Biblical Formula,” CBQ 30:386–99.

Knowledge. The theologian’s interest in the cognitive condition called “knowledge” can be organized under three general headings: (1) the epistemology of divine knowledge, which investigates the nature of God’s knowledge, (2) the epistemology of human knowledge, with special focus on the conditions and limits of human knowledge of God and the relation between human knowledge and various theological categories (for example, original sin), and (3) theological prolegomena, which examines the status of theology as an intellectual discipline. All of these theological projects relate to general issues in the branch of philosophy known as epistemology (from the Greek terms episteme = knowledge, and logos = discourse).

Epistemologists customarily distinguish between “knowing how” and “knowing that,” and concentrate their attention on the latter—so-called propositional knowledge. The most widely discussed conception of propositional knowledge—variously called the “standard definition,” the “traditional account,” or the “tripartite analysis”—defines “knowledge” as justified true belief. (Philosophers often use “JTB” as another label for this account.) On this account, an instance of knowledge is a belief with a double exalted status. First, the belief must be true. Thus, only those propositions that are true can be known (though the truth value of false propositions may, on this account, be known.) Second, the belief must be justified (in the right sense or to the right degree). This conception of knowledge has a bearing on all three sets of issues marked out above.

The epistemology of God’s knowledge especially concerns the nature of divine omniscience. Biblical monotheism agrees with classical theism in ascribing to God omniscience (Pss. 23:24; 147:5; Heb. 4:13; 1 John 3:20), which is most naturally characterized as the knowledge of all true propositions as true and of all false propositions as false. The grand doctrine of divine omniscience invites consideration of the following questions.

First, is God’s knowledge limited to propositions, or does God also have “know-how” knowledge? Apparently, God knows how to realize ends that conform to his intentions. For example, he knows how to create a physical universe out of nothing, he knows how to become incarnate and live as a complete human being among other human persons, he knows how to make propitiation for human sin, and he knows how to arrange for the resurrection of believing saints to everlasting life. But are there any limits to God’s know-how knowledge? Does he know how to ride a bicycle or boil an egg (or fry fish)?

Second, does God have beliefs? If not, what does that imply about the nature of God’s knowledge? Belief of a proposition is generally thought by epistemologists to be a necessary condition for propositional knowledge, or knowledge that something is the case. But Christian philosopher William Alston has argued that God does not have beliefs. For beliefs are either dispositional or occurrent. If belief is occurrent, it is a mental assenting to a proposition. But assent is unworthy of God since failure to assent is not only unattractive to him but also impossible. On a dispositional account, a belief that such-and-such is the case is nothing more than a disposition to act in a way appropriate to such-and-such being the case. On this conception, a belief represents an unrealized potentiality on the part of the believer. But how can God have any unrealized potentialities? Alston does not say much about what God’s knowledge amounts to if it does not include belief, and perhaps Alston is mistaken. But if he is right, then most philosophical accounts of knowledge are not perfectly general accounts, even if they seem to be fairly satisfactory analyses of human knowledge. Indeed, the epistemologist should consider whether a proper conception of God’s knowledge places any special constraints on the general concept of knowledge, of which human knowledge is a species.

Third, whether or not God’s having propositional knowledge entails that God has beliefs, does God know all true propositions? Here there are at least two sorts of issues to explore. (1) Does omniscience imply that God knows infinitely many true propositions and therefore that God has infinitely many true beliefs? If it is not logically possible to know the truth values of infinitely many propositions, then what does omniscience entail about the actual scope of God’s knowledge? (2) Does God’s propositional knowledge include knowledge of propositions about all future acts of human freedom, as well as counterfactuals of human freedom?

Some theologians have taken the measure of divine omniscience by denying bivalence for future tense propositions, suggesting that such propositions are neither true nor false, and hence that there is no truth value to be known when it comes to propositions about future states of affairs. (After all, if truth is a necessary condition for knowledge, one can only foreknow what is true.) Thus, human freedom is compatible with divine omniscience. But this requires a dubious conception of propositions and runs counter to the most natural interpretation of biblical prophecy.

Other theologians therefore ascribe to God something called “middle knowledge.” On this view, God has exhaustive knowledge of all human choices in all possible worlds, and he knows which possible world is the actual world. In their exercise of freedom, humans contribute to the actualization of a particular possible world; and God, having middle knowledge, knows this contribution as actual and free, as well as all counterfactuals of human freedom as counterfactual.

Fourth, how does God know what He knows? Theologians have traditionally supposed that if God is essentially omniscient, then God does not come to know or acquire the knowledge that He has, but has it all at once and eternally. So only in a very special sense may we inquire about the source of God’s knowledge.

God’s knowledge is at once immediate, non-discursive, comprehensive, and infallible. God has direct intellectual apprehension of all truths in a single unified and perduring awareness of all actual states of affairs as actual (in the past, present, or future) and of all other possible states of affairs as possible but not actual. (Question: If God timelessly knows infinitely many true propositions, could his knowledge of them be inferential, as George Mavrodes has speculated?) God’s knowledge is comprehensive and infallible, but it is also perfect in the more exalted sense of being a realization of the highest cognitive ideal conceivable (see Alston and Mavrodes). It exemplifies the highest possible realization of a doxastic fulfillment structure, cognitively speaking. For God’s knowledge there can be no question of the possibility of being mistaken.

To put it another way, speaking anthropomorphically, all of God’s first-order knowledge is accompanied by second-order knowledge. That is, in knowing the truth value of all propositions, he knows the truth value of all propositions concerning the state of his own knowledge. Echoing the Psalmist, we acknowledge that God’s knowledge is high and that we cannot attain to it, though we can, as an act of worship, revel in and admire it (1 Sam. 2:3).

Fifth, what is the nature of the evidence that God is omniscient? There are numerous indicators of divine omniscience in the Scriptures. Some philosophers and theologians, working within the tradition of “perfect being” theology, further maintain that the attribute of omniscience is logically contained in the concept of a maximally perfect being. As the above questions illustrate, it is one thing to know or to be justified in believing that God is omniscient, and something else to understand what omniscience includes and how it is possible.

Sixth, the doctrine of the Incarnation, including as it does the doctrine of the two natures of Jesus Christ, invites further inquiry into the nature of God’s knowledge. What precisely was the status of Jesus’ knowledge during his life on the earth? Was his knowledge, given that he was human, in any sense limited? If so, was it at the same time in some sense unlimited? If Jesus’ knowledge was at the same time both limited and unlimited, what does this imply about the specific relation between his divine and human natures? Did Jesus know, for example, that he was God when he was tempted by the Devil in the wilderness? (See also Luke 2:52; Mark 13:31–32; 15:34.)

Some hold that Jesus had both a divine mind and a human mind, and that the relation between the two was asymmetrical, such that the divine mind had full access to the contents of the human mind, but that the human mind of Jesus did not have access to the contents of the divine mind unless the divine mind, as it were, granted access. Did Jesus mistakenly believe, in his human mind, that he could sin? How and when did Jesus “discover” that he was God? Did Jesus ever believe that he was able to sin? Did he ever believe that he was born with original sin? Could Jesus have had any false beliefs? These and other questions arise for the epistemology of divine knowledge within the Christian tradition.

Religious epistemology, as generally treated in philosophy of religion, is concerned with the epistemology of human knowledge of God, with focus on such questions as the following: How is human knowledge of God possible? What are the sources of human knowledge of God? And what is the extent of human knowledge of God?

Human knowledge of God includes knowledge of God’s existence, knowledge of God’s character, and knowledge of God’s relations to the world, including God’s intentions and actions. Many theologians hold that all human knowledge of God is “revealed,” being grounded in the data of this or that source of revelation. Theologians classify the various repositories of divine revelation into two categories: general revelation and special revelation. Some hold that special revelation supplants general revelation, whereas others maintain that the two sources of revelation complement one another.

Other questions are treated in religious epistemology. What is the relation between faith and reason? Does human knowledge of God preclude faith? Or is faith a sui generis form of knowledge, namely, religious knowledge? What is the role of the Holy Spirit in the human acquisition of knowledge about God? Is it possible to be ignorant of the existence of God or to be justified in believing that God does not exist?

Knowledge

These are all questions about the possibility, the scope, and the conditions of human knowledge of God. In addition to these, there are yet other questions of obvious interest to theologians—questions about human knowledge more generally. What are the noetic effects of sin? What domains of human inquiry are affected by sin, and how is sin able to have this result for human cognition? How is virtue, especially Christian virtue, related to the possibility of knowledge? What about human cognitive success? Is this evidence that God exists? That is, is the possibility of human knowledge best explained in terms of the hypothesis that God created humans with a capacity for knowledge? How and to what extent does error creep into our attempts to believe what is true, and could God have created us with the capacity for infallible knowledge? And again, if Jesus was both fully human and sinless, can the noetic effects of sin be regarded as essential properties of humans (that is, can they be essential to being human)?

Finally, there are epistemological questions, falling under the purview of theological prolegomena, about the enterprise of theology itself. The term “theology” refers to an intellectual discipline, a form of inquiry and the results of such inquiry. Does the enterprise of theology contribute to the fund of human knowledge? How is theology to be integrated with other forms of inquiry (for example, the natural sciences)? What is the place of theology within a knowledge tradition? What counts as expertise in theology? What are the requisite skills for doing theology? What is involved in “knowing how” to do theology well? Is the theologian’s quarry limited to a systematically organized set of true theological propositions, or does it include the pursuit of knowledge of God over and above knowledge about God?

R. D. GEIVETT

See also CHRISTOLOGY; EPISTEMOLOGY; FAITH; GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF; INCARNATION; NATURAL THEOLOGY; REVELATION, GENERAL; REVELATION, SPECIAL; TEMPTATION.

Bibliography. W. P. Alston, “Does God Have Beliefs?” in Divine Nature and Human Language; H. Bavinck, Philosophy of Revelation; D. Brown, Divine Trinity; J. O. Buswell, Christian View of Being and Knowing; G. H. Clark, Christian View of Men and Things; W. L. Craig, Only Wise God; J. A. Dorner, History of the Development of the Doctrine of the Person of Christ; T. P. Flint, Divine Providence; N. Gillman, Gabriel Marcel on Religious Knowledge; A. Kenny, God of the Philosophers; B. J. F. Lonergan, Insight: A Study of Human Understanding; J. Maritain, Degrees of Knowledge; T. V. Morris, Logic of God Incarnate; J. Orr, Christian View of God and the World; R. Swinburne, Christian God; Coherence of Theism.

Knowledge, Gift of. See SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

Knox, John (1514?–1572). Scottish Reformer who pursued a vigorous and prolonged career of preaching and writing on behalf of Protestantism. After a short term of preaching at St. Andrews Castle and nineteen months of captivity as a galley slave of the French, Knox became pastor of an English congregation (1549–54). He then fled to the continent where, in Geneva from 1555 to 1559, he came under the effective influence of Swiss Reformed leaders, particularly John Calvin. Knox returned to Scotland in 1559, preaching at St. Giles Church in Edinburgh and working tirelessly for the establishment of a Reformed Church. At times he was in direct conflict with Mary, Queen of Scots. After Mary’s abdication in 1567, Knox preached at the coronation of her son, James VI.

Knox saw his calling as primarily a preacher, not an academic theologian. His favorite characterization of his work was “to blaw his maisteris trumpet.” Nevertheless, his literary output was prodigious, filling six volumes.

Knox’s theology was Protestant. The principle that dictated the content of his thinking was that of sola Scriptura, that the Bible is the only authoritative basis upon which doctrine can be founded. Having been influenced by Luther’s writing and by George Wishart, Knox early affirmed sola fide, justification by faith only. His theology was profoundly Calvinistic at its core. At the behest of Calvin in 1559, Knox wrote his only academic theological work, the Treatise on Predestination, of some 170,000 words. In it he follows closely the formulations of Calvin and Theodore Beza, teaching God’s sovereign election of some to salvation, his choice of others to damnation, and affirming that humankind’s salvation is by grace alone. In 1560 Knox coauthored the Scots Confession, a document that served as the confessional basis of the Scottish Church until the drafting of its heir, the Westminster Confession of Faith (1647). The Scots Confession is notable for the centrality of the work of Christ in each of its various topics, as well as for a richness of spirituality and warmth of expression.

In that same year, Knox helped draft the First Book of Discipline, in which the authors formulated a plan for the ecclesiastical and social life of the nation. In a time when the people were moving from one kind of church to a completely different kind, Knox found it necessary to provide them with biblical criteria by which to judge a truly Christian church. The marks of a true church according to the Book of Discipline were the proper preaching of God’s Word, the proper administration of baptism and the Lord’s Supper, and the proper exercise of discipline.

The Book of Discipline also provided directions for worship. Knox’s commitment to sola Scriptura is found clearly in his theology of worship.

Exposition of Scripture and preaching are the center of true worship according to the Reformer. Under the influence of Ulrich Zwingli and John Hooper, Knox taught that no practice is legitimate in public worship unless it is specifically commanded in Scripture (the so-called regulative principle). While in England in 1551 Knox brought this principle to bear on the Book of Common Prayer by convincing Thomas Cranmer to state explicitly that kneeling during the reception of the Lord's Supper did not imply adoration of the bread and wine (the so-called black rubric). Knox's view of the Lord's Supper was similar to that of Calvin and Bucer: the presence of Christ is spiritual and received only by faith. Under the First Book of Discipline government of the church was not strictly presbyterian, but the presbyterian idea was present in seed form.

The Scottish Reformer's most distinctive contribution to Reformation theology was his concept of the relation of church and state. He tended to view the church and the state as comprising the same community. Not recognizing the NT view of the church as the fulfillment of the Israelite theocracy, Knox looked to the OT theocracy for a model of good civil government. In the Reformation period the religion of the prince was the religion of the people. Knox therefore constantly had to battle the Roman Catholic queens who persecuted the Protestants. Knox found a precedent in ancient Israel for the right of God's people to disobey civil authority when it contradicted the higher law of Scripture (Admonition or Warning, 1554). He eventually taught that Christians are obliged to overthrow an idolatrous (i.e., Roman Catholic) monarch as the Israelites overthrew idolatrous kings. This idea he propounded in First Blast of the Trumpet against the Monstrous Regiment of Women (1558). Knox's affirmation of the state establishment of religion was incompatible with his affirmation of the right of the individual to be guided by Scripture alone. Nevertheless, his teaching gave impetus to the growth of religious freedom.

Although Knox opposed any extensive involvement of the church in affairs of government, he had a clear social vision. He stated the obligation of every Christian to care for the poor, and he devised a system by which each church would provide for its own needy and administer catechetical schools for all children, rich and poor. However, Knox was not a social revolutionary, nor would he have favored democracy as such.

John Knox can be seen as a forebear of Puritanism in his view of worship and the "regulative principle." His doctrine of the right of dissent from tyrannical government provided the lines for a doctrine of church and state that was developed by later Presbyterians and French Huguenots. The sense of man's utter dependence upon the grace of God that informed Knox's thought and life has been the heart of the life of the Reformed family of churches throughout its history.

H. GRIFFITH

See also SCOTS CONFESSION.

Bibliography. J. Knox, History of the Reformation in Scotland, W. C. Dickinson, ed.; Works, D. Laing, ed.; P. H. Brown, John Knox; R. L. Greaves, Theology and Revolution in the Scottish Reformation; R. G. Kyle, Mind of John Knox; J. S. McEwen, Faith of John Knox; W. S. Reid, Trumpeter of God: A Biography of John Knox; J. Ridley, John Knox; H. Watt, John Knox in Controversy.

Koinonia. See FELLOWSHIP.

Konsequent Eschatologie. See CONSISTENT ESCHATOLOGY; SCHWEITZER, ALBERT.

Kraemer, Hendrik (1888–1965). Missionary, ecumenist, and theologian. Born in the Netherlands, Kraemer was educated at the Dutch Missionary High School in 1905, admitted to the Dutch Bible Society in 1911, and began his advanced studies at Leiden University where he received his doctorate in 1921. His relationship with J. R. Mott and the Student Christian Movement was influential in his decision to serve as a lay missionary in Indonesia for fourteen years until his appointment to the Chair of Comparative Religion at Leiden in 1937.

Kraemer's mission efforts in Indonesia were directed at reaching the elite of the dominant Islamic population. In this regard he was a staunch proponent of autonomous, indigenous churches he called "living communities" trained to reach their own culture. The role of the missionary was as a "guru kedewasaan," or guide to maturity. He helped found the first theological faculty for the training of indigenous clergy at Djakarta in 1934.

Kraemer emerged as an international figure in 1928 with his appointment to the Message Committee and chair of the Islamic section of the Second World Missionary Conference in Jerusalem. This conference became known for its positive approach to creating an alliance between Christianity and other world religions in order to combat the forces of world secularization. In 1938 Kraemer wrote Christian Message in a Non-Christian World as a preparatory statement for the next world conference in Tambaram. In this book he developed the concept of "biblical realism" as a response to the intrusion of secularization into the missionary enterprise. His mission theology was a compendium of the Brunner/Barth debate in that it recognized the validity of other religions as human responses to existence while arguing that the dialogue between Christianity and these religions must account for the superiority of the Christian revelation in Christ; however, for Kraemer, Christian revelation was not primarily the realm of apologetics but rather proclamation.

Critics have since argued that Kraemer's influence on subsequent missionary efforts, regarding the discontinuity between the gospel and other religious traditions, actually resulted in the break off of conversation with non-Christian religions rather than the fostering of helpful dialogue.

M. BURCH

Bibliography. C. F. Hallencreutz, Kraemer towards Tambaram; O. V. Jathanna, Decisiveness of the Christ-Event and the Universality of Christianity in the World of Plurality; W. I. Nicholson, Toward a Theology of Comparative Religion: A Study in the Thought of Hendrick Kraemer and Wilfred Contwell Smith.

Kulturkampf. Kulturkampf (struggle for civilization) refers to a church-state struggle between the Roman Catholic Church and the Prussian and German Reich-government, beginning in 1871. The liberal R. Virchow's "party of progress" coined the term in 1873 to speak of a "battle for culture and civilization" and against the constraints of Roman Catholicism. The Roman Catholic Church in turn fought against the repressive policy of the German government and various liberal parties.

The mastermind behind the government efforts was Minister President and Chancellor Otto von Bismarck, who feared that Catholic influence (cf. the Vatican I decree on papal infallibility, 1870) could jeopardize his political agenda of a united, national Germany (second German Reich).

Thus, Bismarck progressively instituted the following measures to ensure, as he saw it, national unity of religion and education: (1) dissolving of the Catholic bureau in the Ministry of Education and Culture (1871); (2) the "Pulpit Law" against the "misuse of the pulpit for political ends" (1871); (3) the "School Inspection Law" with exclusive monopoly of the state to control all schools (1872); (4) the "Jesuit Law" leading to the expulsion of Jesuits; (5) the influence of the state in the training and examination of priests (and pastors) as well as (6) increased state control over the church ("May Laws," 1873); (7) the closing of most monasteries and orders (1875); (8) the introduction of civil marriage in Prussia and the German Reich ("Civil Marriage Act," 1874-75); and (9) the discontinuation of fiscal state support of the church (1875).

Despite Pope Pius IX's reinforcement of the Catholic resistance to Bismarck's legislation, the government condemned, dismissed, and imprisoned many bishops and priests and severed diplomatic relations with the Vatican.

On account of continuing and rising opposition to Bismarck's polity on the part of the German Catholic population as well as the rise of the new Socialist movement, Bismarck engaged in conciliatory dialogues with the new pope (Leo XIII). The Kulturkampf was thus concluded between 1880 and 1887.

Government policies 1-4, however, remained more or less intact, and policies 6 and 8 were partially retained. On the other hand, the Roman Catholic Church emerged from the conflict with a renewed degree of influence in Germany.

H. F. BAYER

Bibliography. F. Darmstaedter, Bismarck and the Creation of the Second Reich; E. Eyck, Bismarck after Fifty Years; T. S. Hamerow, Social Foundations of German Unification; H. W. Smith, German Nationalism and Religious Conflict: Culture, Ideology, Politics, 1870-1914.

Küng, Hans (b. 1928). Contemporary Roman Catholic theologian. Born in Switzerland, Küng received a varied education at the German College in Rome, the Gregorian University, and the Sorbonne, with additional study in Berlin, London, Amsterdam, and Madrid. Ordained in 1955, he first served as a parish priest; upon achieving prominence with his theological writing, he was appointed professor of theology on the Roman Catholic faculty at Tübingen in 1960. A progressive thinker with a gift of popularization, he helped to promote many of the reforms at the Second Vatican Council, being prepared to go much further, as his Council, Reform and Reunion (1961) testifies. In Justification (1964) he even advanced the startling thesis that the Calvinist and Catholic views of justification are substantially the same, the Council of Trent's teaching being an extreme that is defensible only as a necessary answer to the opposite extreme of Luther. This did not, he thought, compromise Trent's irreflexibility, since its presentation remained true in context even if it needed to be supplemented to achieve the total picture. Küng's concern for reunion led him to apply the same technique of supplementation to another debatable issue in Apostolic Succession (1968), a symposium in which he argued for a succession not only of apostles but also of prophets and teachers and all charismatic functions. Reservations about the papacy as a true pastorate, along with the publication of Humanae Vitae (on birth control), launched him into a fuller investigation of authority in Infallible? (1972), in which he claimed that historical relativity rules out infallibility and that the papal claim is more a political tool than a true doctrinal reality. The threat thus posed to a basic Roman Catholic principle could not pass unnoticed. An inquiry began that led to Küng's admonishment in 1975 and finally, when he refused to recant, to his deposition, not from the Tübingen faculty, but from his official status as a Roman Catholic teacher. If, however, Küng seemed to have been moving to a reformation position on justification and the Petrine office, he was going beyond it to liberal Protestantism with his denial of infallibility to Holy Scripture as well, which on his view offers us only the normative language of faith. The implications of this denial came out plainly in his apologetic work On Being a Christian (1971), in which, while stressing Christ's centrality, he called many NT stories uncertain, contradictory, and legendary, rejected Chalcedonian Christology, weakened God's transcendence in favor of humanization, and seemed to present Christ more as an example to follow than a divine Savior in whom to trust. The work Does God Exist? (1980), though containing much of interest and value, continued on the same course of apologetics by concession. Not surprisingly, then, a more conservative Vatican refused in 1982 to accede to Küng's request for an audience until he withdrew the extreme opinions, which according to Küng Dialogue (1980), constituted the grounds for his loss of authorization as an official teacher of doctrine. Küng resumed his literary activity with a book on Eternal Life in 1984. In the later 1980s and 1990s he devoted much of his time to discussing the relationship between Christianity and other religions. Along with others he produced Christianity and the World Religions in 1986, and he was coeditor of the Ethics of World Religions and Human Rights in 1990, of Parliament of the World Religions in 1993, and of Islam in 1994. This new departure seems to hold out little hope for future reconciliation with the Vatican.

G. W. BROMILEY

Bibliography. P. Hebblethwaite, New Inquisition?; C. M. LaCugna, Theological Methodology of Hans Küng; R. Nowell, Hans Küng and His Theology; L. Swidler, ed., Consensus in Theology; Küng in Conflict.

Kuyper, Abraham (1837–1920). Dutch theologian and statesman. Born in Maassluis, Kuyper was the son of a Reformed Church minister. At the University of Leiden he was a brilliant student who embraced liberalism and the latest theological views. During his first pastorate, in Beesd, he experienced an evangelical conversion. Influenced by the piety of his parishioners, he began anew his study of theology, drawing inspiration from the Dutch Calvinist tradition.

Following the death of Groen van Prinsterer in 1876, Kuyper became the leader of the small but growing Calvinist movement in both church and state. He wrote many books and hundreds of articles on theology, philosophy, politics, art, and social issues in which he sought to express a Christian world and life view.

Kuyper founded two newspapers, the daily political paper De Standaard and the weekly religious paper De Heraut. In 1876 he entered parliament as a representative of the newly formed Anti-Revolutionary Party. This was the first modern political party in the Netherlands. In 1878 he published Ons Program, the party's political manifesto, and in 1880 he founded the Free University of Amsterdam. Active in church politics, Kuyper led a secession movement from the state church in 1886 to form the independent Gereformeerde Kerk (Reformed Church).

In 1900 Kuyper's Anti-Revolutionary Party was elected to office and he became prime minister. He broke the crippling railway strike of 1902 but after a bitter election campaign in 1905 lost power. From 1908 he sat as a delegate in the Second Chamber of the Dutch Parliament and continued to exercise a political influence as editor of De Standaard until shortly before his death.

Kuyper is best remembered for his development of the theological doctrine of common grace and his views about the importance of the kingdom of God in Christian thinking, which were influenced by the work of F. D. Maurice. His social and political theory of sphere sovereignty is an attempt to give an intellectual justification to pluralism and create structural means of limiting the power of the state. Kuyper was keenly aware of the dangers of totalitarianism. He was a strong lover of liberty who recognized that business interests as well as government can oppress the weak; therefore, he saw the function of the state as that of preserving God's justice in society.

I. HEXHAM

See also MAURICE, JOHN FREDERICK DENISON; REFORMED TRADITION.

Bibliography. A. Kuyper, Christianity and the Class Struggle; Lectures on Calvinism; Principles of Sacred Theology; Work of the Holy Spirit; P. Kasteel, Abraham Kuyper; M. Langley, Practice of Political Spirituality: Episodes from the Public Career of Abraham Kuyper, 1879–1918; L. Praamsma, Let Christ Be King: Reflections on the Life and Times of Abraham Kuyper; F. Vandenberg, Abraham Kuyper.

L

Labor. See WORK.

Lactantius (ca. 240–ca. 320). When the Emperor Diocletian established his capital at Nicomedia, he invited Lucius Caelius Firmianus Lactantius, probably from North Africa, to teach rhetoric there. Lactantius was converted to Christianity and lost his position. Later the Emperor Constantine chose Lactantius as tutor for his son Crispus, an act that brought him to Gaul about 313.

Lactantius used history, philosophy, and especially his own literary training to defend Christianity. On the Manner in which the Persecutors Died describes the horrible deaths of enemies of the church. On the Anger of God deals with God's punishment of crime. On the Workmanship of God presents the marvels of the human body as a proof of the wisdom and goodness of God. His principal work is Divine Institutes, of which he also prepared an epitome. Its first three books are a refutation of paganism, giving a systematic presentation of the themes of early Christian apologetics. Books 4 through 7 set forth a philosophy of religion emphasizing the true worship of the one God, justice, moral conduct, and the immortality of the soul. This work shows what aspects of Christian teaching appealed to the ruling circles around Constantine, to whom the work is addressed.

Christianity, according to Lactantius, combines true religion and true wisdom, the two things for which the nature of man is desirous. He gives abundant citation of pagan testimonies (especially from Latin literature) in support of Christian teaching. Lactantius followed Plato on the nature of the soul and body but combined this view with chiliasm. Although presenting a strong case for a Christian version of natural religion, he was weak on distinctively Christian doctrines, his views on the Trinity in particular being deficient. Lactantius has been called the "Christian Cicero," both for the excellence of his style and for the quantity of quotations and ideas taken from Cicero.

E. FERGUSON

Bibliography. P. Labriolle, History and Literature of Christianity; R. M. Ogilvie, Library of Lactantius; R. Pichon, Lactance; J. Stevenson, "The Life and Literary Activity of Lactantius," Studia Patristica 1:661–77.

Lake of Fire. The phrase occurs six times in Revelation and nowhere else in the NT or in Jewish literature. It is the place of eternal punishment for the wicked. The beast and false prophet are thrown alive into it before the millennial reign (19:20). After the final battle they are joined by Satan (20:10), and after the final judgment death and Hades are also cast in (20:14; cf. Isa. 25:8; 1 Cor. 15:26), as well as those whose names are not in the book of life (20:15). Revelation 21:8 lists many others who will be cast into the fiery lake: "the cowardly, the unbelieving, the vile, the murderers, the sexually immoral, those who practice magic arts, the idolaters and all liars."

Although "lake of fire" does not occur elsewhere, "fire" was commonly associated with punishment and destruction, often in connection with the final judgment. It is especially common in Revelation.

Three of the six occurrences of "lake of fire" speak of fire and sulfur (19:20; 20:10; 21:8; the KJV translates "sulfur" as "brimstone"). This combination is common in the OT and NT (e.g., Gen. 19:24; Ps. 11:6; Ezek. 38:22; Luke 17:29; Rev. 9:17–18; 14:10). The imagery of a lake, fire, and sulfur within the context of punishment and destruction may have originated from the story in Genesis 19:24.

Revelation 20:14 and 21:8 equate the lake of fire with the second death (cf. Rev. 2:11; 20:6), a rabbinic term for the death of the wicked in the next world. After physical death (i.e., the first death) the soul resides temporarily in Hades and goes through the final judgment. The wicked are then condemned to the lake of fire (i.e., the second death) in eternal, conscious punishment (cf. Rev. 14:11; 20:10). There is no concept of annihilation in Revelation.

The conflict between Satan and humans that began in the Garden of Eden will most assuredly end with God's total victory. Satan and his followers have traded the new creation for the lake of fire.

W. D. MOUNCE

See also DEATH, SECOND; ETERNAL PUNISHMENT; GEHENNA; HELL; JUDGMENT.

Bibliography. G. E. Ladd, Revelation of John; R. H. Mounce, Book of Revelation; G. Vos, ISBE 3:1822.

Lamb of God. Twice in the NT Jesus is called the Lamb of God, and on each occasion by John the Baptist (John 1:29, 35). The word amnos (lamb) is found also in Acts 8:32, 1 Peter 1:19; and in the LXX version of Isaiah 53:7. This last reference suggests Isaiah 53 as the immediate context for John's declaration concerning Christ, the Messiah, as the Lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world. The Baptist's quotation from Isaiah 40 on the previous day shows that such Isaianic passages were on his mind. Before the Jewish commentators' polemic against Christians, which drove them to seek another explanation, the lamb of Isaiah 53 was identified with the Messiah as the servant of God. This identity of Jesus as Messiah with the Lamb of God was sure for the Baptist (John 1:20, 23, 29).

The use of the genitive of possession—the lamb of God—specifically relates Christ to God in the act of sin bearing. He is at once the sacrificial victim presented to God and the victim provided by God. In this relationship he bears the world's sin, removing it by taking it on himself. As in Isaiah 53 he bears on himself alone the iniquity of us all, by being “led like a lamb to the slaughter, as a sheep before her shearers is silent” (vv. 6–7).

Some scholars prefer to see the paschal lamb of Exodus 12 as the background for the Baptist's word on the score that it holds no expiatory overtones, while others reject the reference on precisely the same grounds. It is not evident, however, that the paschal sacrifice is without an expiatory character in view of the declaration of Exodus 12:13: “The blood will be a sign for you . . . and when I see the blood, I will pass over you.” The paschal sacrifice is basic to the whole sacrificial system. There is, therefore, good reason to allow the paschal allusion, since when the Baptist spoke, the Passover was not far off (John 2:12–13), and our Lord was afterward identified therewith (John 1:29, 36; cf. 1 Cor. 5:7). The two figures, that of Isaiah 53:7 and that of Exodus 12, consequently coalesce in the designation. They are not contradictory but complementary. It was said by A. F. Delitzsch that all the utterances of the NT regarding the Lamb of God are derived from the prophecy of Isaiah 53:7, in which the Passover type finds fulfillment. All the ideas surrounding the figure of the lamb built up through the progressive revelation of the OT may indeed go into the concept as it occurs in the NT. In Genesis there is the necessity of the lamb—Abel brought the firstlings of his flock (cf. Heb. 9:22); in Exodus, the efficacy of the lamb—the blood-sprinkled doorposts (cf. Rev. 7:14); in Leviticus, the purity of the lamb—without blemish (cf. 1 Pet. 1:19); in Isaiah, the personality of the lamb—“he,” the lamb, as the servant of the Lord (John 1:29; Rev. 5:12–13). Nowhere, therefore, does the figure merely suggest “the meekness and gentleness of Christ” (2 Cor. 10:1); it always carries with it a sacrificial sense (cf. Rev. 5:6, 12; 13:8).

In the book of Revelation the unqualified designation lamb (arnion) occurs eight times in symbolic reference to Christ and unites the two ideas of redemption and kingship. On one side are statements about a Lamb that has been slain (5:6, 12); those who “have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb” (7:14); those who “overcame [the accuser of our brothers] by the blood of the Lamb and by the word of their testimony” (12:11); and “those whose names are written in the Lamb's book of life” (21:27). The stress here falls upon the redeeming work of Christ as the Lamb of God. On the other side, connected with the title is the idea of sovereignty. It is the Lamb who was slain who has power to take the scroll and loose its seals (5:6–7); there is reference to the wrath of the Lamb (6:16); and the Lamb is seen at the center of the throne (7:17); the throne in heaven is the throne of God and the Lamb (22:1, 3); the wicked make war against the Lamb, but the Lamb is victorious (17:14). In the general term Lamb, then, two ideas unite: victorious power and vicarious suffering. At the heart of God's sovereignty there is sacrificial love.

H. D. McDONALD

Bibliography. C. H. Dodd, Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel; L. Morris, Apostolic Preaching of the Cross; D. B. Sandy, “John the Baptist's ‘Lamb of God’ Affirmation in Its Canonical and Apocalyptic Milieu,” JETS 34:447–60.

Landmarkism. A term representing a number of convictions maintained by some Baptists, mostly in the southern United States, concerning the nature of the church. With other Baptists, the adherents of Landmarkism are firmly congregational, believing that ecclesiastical authority is limited to the local assembly. More distinctively, they hold that the NT model for the church is only the local and visible congregation and that it violates NT principles to speak of a universal, spiritual church. Landmark Baptists also believe that Communion should be restricted to members of the local assembly and that baptism is valid only when administered in a properly constituted local Baptist congregation. They further believe that a historic “Baptist succession” may be traced from John the Baptist to modern Baptist churches in which believer's baptism and Landmark principles have prevailed. With this belief they also feel that the Roman Catholic Church and the denominations arising from the Reformation are not true churches according to NT standards.

Landmarkism

The Landmark emphasis was propounded by James R. Graves (1820–93), influential editor of the Tennessee Baptist, and takes its name from a pamphlet by James M. Pendleton, Old Landmark Re-Set (1856), based on Proverbs 22:28: “Remove not the ancient landmark” (KJV). It is the position of the million-member American Baptist Association, of the much smaller United Baptists, and of some independent Baptist churches.

M. A. NOLL

See also BAPTIST TRADITION, THE.

Bibliography. J. R. Graves, Old Landmarkism: What Is It?; D. P. Olinger, Parachurch Ministries and the New Testament: A Consideration of Neolandmarkist Ecclesiology; A. C. Piepkorn, Profiles in Belief.

Language about God. See INCLUSIVE LANGUAGE.

Last Adam, The. See ADAM, THE LAST.

Last Day, Days. OT prophets often predict that “in that day” (e.g., Amos 8:9–14; 9:11–15) the Lord will act in a mighty way to judge evil and redeem his people. Usually the order is judgment followed by redemption, which we may designate F¹ (Future¹) and F² (Future²) respectively. In prophetic poetry the two themes are repeated and interwoven as highly charged eschatological warnings and promises that often refer to historical events just past or soon to come, as well as to the long-range messianic age. The essential meaning of judgment/redemption is common to both, where the first is analogous to the second, while the significance of the essential meaning is applied in each case to the appropriate age. Several OT examples are Isaiah 2:2–21; 3:18–4:6; 10:20–23; Hosea 1–2; Joel 1–3. The latter prophecy is especially instructive because it typically speaks of the dire judgment to come (“The day of the LORD is great; it is dreadful. Who can endure it?” Joel 2:11, F¹), then prophesies of the blessings to follow (“In those days and at that time, when I restore the fortunes of Judah and Jerusalem, I will gather all nations,” 3:1–2, F²).

The NT continues the OT theme of judgment/redemption and announces the inauguration of the final eschatological day or time. Jesus proclaims that “the time has come” and parallels that announcement with the news that “the kingdom of God is near,” in light of which he calls for repentance and belief in the good news (Mark 1:15). At Nazareth he announces that he is fulfilling the prophecy of Isaiah 61:1–2: “Today this scripture is fulfilled in your hearing” (Luke 4:18– 21). There can be little doubt that Jesus saw the prophesied age of judgment/salvation as having been initiated by his invasion of the demonic realm (“But if I drive out demons by the Spirit of God, then the kingdom of God has come upon you,” Matt. 12:28). Yet it is inaugurated, not fully realized, eschatology, for Jesus says that something greater than Jonah and Solomon is here (namely himself), but that there is a coming judgment when all men of Nineveh and the Queen of the South will arise and condemn the present generation. Hence, in the new age now begun, there is a further division of F¹ and F², where F¹ is Jesus’ inaugurated judgment/salvation and F² is the completion of that inaugurated reign.

Paul also identifies the OT prophecies regarding the last day with Jesus, seeing in him the fulfillment of time: “When the time had fully come, God sent his Son” (Gal. 4:4). The writer to the Hebrews opens his epistle with a contrast between OT prophets and Christ, demonstrating the superiority of the new over the old and the arrival of the last days (Heb. 1:1–2). It is clear that the NT understands the last days to have begun in the person and work of Jesus Christ, as Peter attests on the day of Pentecost when he quotes Joel 2:28–32 and associates the fulfillment of the prophecy with the ministry of Jesus, calling upon his hearers to repent and be baptized (Acts 2:14–39).

Yet because of the continuation of suffering and demonic opposition to the gospel, the NT writers were given to understand that the eschatological day had been initiated but not consummated by Jesus (following his own dominical authority), hence a second coming of Christ will complete the day. Peter expresses this tension when he writes of God’s great mercy by which “he has given us new birth into a living hope through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead [F²], and into an inheritance that can never perish, spoil or fade—kept in heaven for you, who through faith are shielded by God’s power until the coming of the salvation that is ready to be revealed in the last time [F²]” (1 Pet. 1:3–5). In the interim, suffering accompanies rejoicing and tests the genuineness of faith (1 Pet. 1:6–7), making vigilance a virtue, just as Jesus warned: “Be careful, or . . . that day will close on you unexpectedly like a trap” (Luke 21:34). Paul follows the same form of F¹ and F², proclaiming the finished work of Christ but anticipating the “day of God’s wrath” (Rom. 2:5, confident of being sealed in the Holy Spirit for “the day of redemption” (Eph. 4:30; cf. John 6:39), but never boastful or complacent. One of the most impressive statements about the tension and paradox of NT F¹ and F² is Paul’s appeal to the Philippians to have the mind of Christ and to shine as lights in a crooked and perverse generation, “in order that I may boast on the day of Christ that I did not run or labor for nothing" (Phil. 2:16). Viewed in this manner, the last day, now inaugurated, is a time of testing for Christians and is moving inexorably toward its conclusion when each will receive either judgment or fulfillment. R. G. GRUENLER

See also AGE, AGES; DAY OF CHRIST, GOD, THE LORD; ESCHATOLOGY; KINGDOM OF CHRIST, GOD, HEAVEN; LAST JUDGMENT; SECOND COMING OF CHRIST; TRIBULATION.

Bibliography. C. H. Dodd, Parables of the Kingdom; M. Erickson, Contemporary Options in Eschatology; W. Hendriksen, Lectures on the Last Things; A. A. Hoekema, Bible and the Future; G. E. Ladd, Last Things: An Eschatology for Laymen; G. Vos, Pauline Eschatology.

Last Judgment. Judgment at history's end is the climax of a process by which God holds nations and persons accountable to him as Creator and Lord.

The OT centers ultimate judgment in the day of Yahweh, when the Lord rids his world of every evil: haughtiness (Isa. 2:12–17), idolatry (Isa. 2:18–20), compromise with paganism (Zeph. 1:8), violence, fraud (Zeph. 1:9), complacency (Zeph. 1:12), and all that brands people as sinners (Isa. 13:9). Both the nations (Joel 3:2; Amos 1:3–2:3) and Israel (Amos 9:1–10; Mal. 3:2–5) are targets of judgment, which the OT sees as purification of God's people and world so that his creative and covenantal purposes are fulfilled: "The earth will be full of the knowledge of the LORD as the waters cover the sea" (Isa. 11:9).

The intertestamental period focuses on the punishment—usually by disaster—of God's enemies, human and supernatural (1 Enoch 10:6; 105:3–4). Where such judgment did not take place in history, where the wicked flourished and the righteous suffered (cf. Pss. 37; 73), divine justice was questioned. The problem was solved with the view that judgment was not limited to history but could occur after death (1 Enoch; Ps. Sol. 3:1–12) when God or the Son of Man would execute judgment in the last day (1 Enoch; 2 Esdr. 7).

The NT builds on OT and intertestamental teaching, expanding it in light of Christ's incarnation. In the Synoptics, Jesus announces himself as the eschatological judge (Mark 14:62) and calls attention to the day of judgment (Matt. 10:15; 11:22, 24; 12:36, 41–42; 23:33), describing it as a final separation of the evildoers from the righteous (Matt. 13:41–43, 47–50). Jesus' parables indicate that his purpose is not to frame an eschatological timetable but so to teach the fact of judgment that his hearers face their present decisions for or against the kingdom with utter seriousness. In the longest judgment parable, Jesus' point is that the ultimate outcome will be determined by whether the nations receive or reject his "brothers" who come to them with the gospel message (Matt. 25:31–46).

John's Gospel underscores the tie between present human decisions and future divine judgment: believers do not go through judgment but have already crossed from death to life (5:24); the disobedient will not see life but are already under wrath (3:36). Final judgment, committed by the Father to the Son (5:26–27), will follow the resurrection of both the evil and the good (5:28–29), sealing the decree that human faith or disobedience has already determined.

Paul amplifies these themes: judgment is connected with Christ's coming and the resurrection of the dead (1 Cor. 15:22–25); Christ is judge (2 Tim. 4:1); Christians share in the judging (1 Cor. 6:2–3); judgment is fair (Rom. 2:11), universal (Rom. 2:6), and thorough (Rom. 2:16); through justification judgment is robbed of terror for believers, whose sins have been judged on the cross (Rom. 3:21–26; 8:1, 31–34); believers' judgment consists of rewards for good works (Rom. 14:10; 2 Cor. 5:10) manifested when the purging fires clear away all dross (1 Cor. 3:13–15); final judgment of unbelievers, exclusion from God's presence, is a recurrent theme, much of it stated in OT language (Rom. 6:21; Phil. 1:28; 3:19; 1 Thess. 5:3; 2 Thess. 1:9); divine judgment is both present and future reality (Rom. 1:18–32).

Second Peter and Jude use some of the Bible's fiercest language to depict the fate of the wicked teachers (incipient Gnostics?) who misled the faithful by mocking their hope of a second coming and encouraging licentious living because they did not fear a final judgment (2 Pet. 3:3–7; Jude 3–4). These letters see the final judgment as the ultimate act in a historical pattern (2 Pet. 2:4–10; Jude 5–7), an act that should prompt righteous living by its cosmic power to destroy even the very heavens (2 Pet. 3:11–13).

Revelation pictures a tribulation poured out on the earth as a judgment just before the final judgment (seven trumpets, 8–11; seven bowls, 16). As the first step in the final judgment the evil leaders whose blasphemous activities sparked the tribulation are captured in battle by the triumphant Christ and consigned to the lake of fire (19:20–21). Next, Satan, the ultimate source of evil, is seized and bound for the duration of the millennium (20:1–3). His release results in further deception of the nations, a clear sign that God's final judgment is deserved—even after a thousand years of Christ's perfect rule the nations persist in their sin. The throne and the books symbolize a careful, accurate process based on well-kept records (20:11–15). The scene is cosmic in scope: earth and sky flee to be replaced by a new heaven and earth (20:11; 21:1); the damage to creation done by human sin is reversed, as the OT prophets foresaw (Isa. 11:6–9; 65:17–25) and Paul depicted (Rom. 8:22–23).

Last Judgment

The theological implications of the biblical teaching are that final judgment is (1) the ultimate triumph of God's will and the consummate display of his glory in history—the sign that all he intended has been accomplished; (2) the cosmic declaration that God is just—all affronts to his glory are punished and all recognition of it is rewarded; (3) the climax of Christ's ministry, as the Apostles' Creed affirms; (4) the reminder that human and cosmic history move toward a goal, measured by the purposes of God; (5) the absolute seal of human accountability—all believers are held responsible for their works, all unbelievers for their rebellion; (6) the most serious motive for Christian mission—in the face of such judgment the world's only hope is Christ's salvation (Acts 4:12).

Belief in the last judgment was uniformly endorsed in the early creeds and the Reformation confessions. Except where the various ancient and modern forms of universalism have held sway, Christians have accepted the fact of final judgment, though its form and timing have been strongly debated.

D. A. HUBBARD

See also DAY OF CHRIST, GOD, THE LORD; ESCHATOLOGY; HEAVEN; HELL; JUDGMENT; LAST DAY, DAYS; SECOND COMING OF CHRIST; TRIBULATION.

Bibliography. D. G. Bloesch, Essentials of Evangelical Theology; A. A. Hoekema, Bible and the Future; G. E. Ladd, Theology of the New Testament; J. P. Martin, Last Judgment; L. Morris, Biblical Doctrine of Judgment; W. Schnieder, NIDNTT 2:361–67; W. Strawson, Jesus and the Future Life; R. V. G. Tasker, Biblical Doctrine of the Wrath of God.

Last Supper. See LORD'S SUPPER.

Last Times. See LAST DAY, DAYS.

Latimer, Hugh (ca. 1485–1555). English Protestant martyr. Educated at Cambridge, he was ordained about 1510 as a Roman Catholic priest and in 1524 was still opposing the Lutheran teaching. The following year, however, he was converted to Protestantism through the influence of Thomas Bilney and in 1531 was inducted to the parish of West Kington in Wiltshire.

Latimer's attitudes were sometimes unpredictable. Preacher rather than scholar, he had a great concern for the poor and he attacked their oppressors, whether clergy or landlords. He supported Henry VIII's efforts to get his first marriage annulled. He drew disciplinary charges for alleged criticism of traditional beliefs such as pilgrimages, the existence of purgatory, and the veneration of saints. Latimer, who protested that his preaching agreed with that of the fathers, said he did not object to certain traditions but did not regard them as essential. He was excommunicated and jailed for three months until he made complete submission. Nevertheless, he was appointed in 1534 to preach before the king every Wednesday in Lent and, through the influence of his friend Thomas Cromwell, was consecrated bishop of Worcester in 1535. He told the king that the dissolution of the monasteries could be justified only on acceptance of the view that purgatory was a delusion. A reaction in favor of Rome led to his resignation in 1539, and for the rest of Henry's reign he lived quietly.

Under Edward VI he declined to exercise his bishopric because he felt it might inhibit his preaching, which attracted large crowds. On Mary's accession (1553) he was arrested. He declared he acknowledged the Catholic Church but denied the Church of Rome. When condemned to death, he raised the possibility of an appeal to the next general council of the church. In 1555 he was burnt in Oxford with Nicholas Ridley, whom he encouraged with words that became famous: "We shall this day light such a candle, by God's grace, in England as I trust shall never be put out."

J. D. DOUGLAS

Bibliography. W. H. D. Adams, Great English Churchmen; A. G. Chester, Hugh Latimer, Apostle to the English; H. S. Darby, Hugh Latimer; R. Demaris, Hugh Latimer; M. L. Loane, Masters of the English Reformation.

Latitudinarianism. This critical label became attached to a group of Anglican divines in the late seventeenth century whose thought displayed a high regard for the authority of reason and a tolerant, antidogmatic temper ("gentlemen of a wide swallow"). In many ways products of the Cambridge Platonists (to whom the term was originally applied), they nevertheless lacked their mystical and imaginative depth. Moreover, though mostly Cambridge men, they became prominent churchmen. They included John Tillotson, archbishop of Canterbury; Edward Stillingfleet, bishop of Worcester; Simon Patrick, bishop of Chichester and Ely; Gilbert Burnet, Reformation historian and bishop of Salisbury; and Thomas Tenison, archbishop of Canterbury. They reacted against the Calvinism of the Puritans and were broadly Arminian in outlook. They aligned themselves with progressive and liberal movements in the contemporary intellectual world. Hostile to scholasticism and Aristotelianism, they drew inspiration more from Descartes's new "mechanical" philosophy. Respect for "the theatre of nature" led them to support scientific developments such as the Royal Society. Thomas Sprat, bishop of Rochester, was its historian, and Joseph Glanvill was a fellow of the society as well as rector of Bath and the author of Vanity of Dogmatizing and Agreement of Reason and Religion. They hailed the new mathematics of Isaac Barrow and Isaac Newton as signs of a new age of light.

Their comprehensiveness allowed only a narrow core of fundamentals in religion. They resisted the Laudian, or High Church, insistence on conformity in nonessentials such as church order and liturgy. Stillingfleet's Irenicum advocated "comprehension" between Anglicans and Presbyterians; Burnet tried to incorporate Nonconformists into the Church of England. They approved "that vertuous mediocrity which our Church observes between the meretricious gaudiness of the Church of Rome, and the squalid sluttery of Fanatick conventicles" (Patrick). Above all, they held that "true philosophy can never hurt sound divinity," which in practice normally meant harmonizing Scripture and the fathers with the light of reason. Theologically vague and spiritually insubstantial, their religion was strongly moralistic. Their emphasis on reasonableness looked forward to the skepticism of Hume and the reductionist theology of the next century. They were also the precursors of the broad churchmen of the nineteenth century, e.g., the contributors to Essays and Reviews (1860), and of the modernists and radicals of more recent Anglican divinity.

D. F. WRIGHT

See also CAMBRIDGE PLATONISM; LOW CHURCH.

Bibliography. G. R. Cragg, Church and the Age of Reason; From Puritanism to the Age of Reason; M. H. Nicolson, "Christ's College and the Latitude Men," MP 27:35–53; N. Sykes, From Sheldon to Secker; B. Willey, Seventeenth Century Background.

Latria. In Roman Catholic theology the adoration given to God alone. It differs from any adoration given to either the Virgin Mary or the saints, a point settled by the Second Council of Nicaea. Dulia differs from latria in the sense that it is an honor given to distinguished persons other than God. Thomas Aquinas developed this doctrine. Forms of latria could be bowing and kneeling directed toward either God alone or the God-man in the sacrament of the Eucharist. If latria were given to a creature it would be idolatry.

T. J. GERMAN

See also DULIA; HYPERDULIA.

Bibliography. T. Aquinas, Summa Theologica; B. Häring, Law of Christ; W. Palmer, Introduction to Early Christian Symbolism.

Latter Days. See LAST DAY, DAYS.

Latter-Day Saints. See MORMONISM.

Laud, William (1573–1645). Archbishop of Canterbury and advisor to Charles I, Laud served simultaneously as a member of the King's Privy Council, on the Court of High Commission, and as chief of the Star Chamber Court. His life was marked by a clear, if limited, vision of a church efficiently ordered, a uniformity of worship, and an obedient populace. He lacked both the craftiness of Richelieu and the human warmth of Archbishop Ussher to succeed by force or by consent.

His policies alienated both Puritans and Parliament in England and the general populace in Scotland. His reforms centered on the attempt to suppress the Puritan lectureships and to institute ceremonial practices thought by many to be "papist."

He was, however, a loyal member of the Church of England, diligently upholding the catholic nature of the Protestant reform in England against Roman Catholic claims, as is recounted in his "Conference with Fisher the Jesuit." His use of the Star Chamber Court to bring about uniformity in England gave the connotation of tyranny to that court in the history of constitutional law. His attempt to impose the Prayer Book upon Scotland precipitated the events that led to his imprisonment and execution and to civil war.

Laud was an able scholar with exceptional liturgical skills. His prayer "For the Church" is still used today in abbreviated form. He was too busy in matters of statecraft to continue his early theological promise, but it is noteworthy that in his description of Anglican differences with Rome there is no mention of justification, that "grand question," according to Richard Hooker, that lies "betwixt us and the Church of Rome." His name has been given to that High Church movement at the Restoration that was in reaction to the Puritan rule, and the early Tractarians in the nineteenth century perceived themselves as building upon Laud's view of Anglicanism. His biographers have tended to be uncritical clerical apologists, with the exception of Hugh Trevor-Roper, who approaches Laud from a secular humanist viewpoint.

C. F. ALLISON

See also ANGLO-CATHOLICISM; CAROLINE DIVINES; HIGH CHURCH MOVEMENT.

Bibliography. E. C. B. Bourne, Anglicanism of William Laud; A. S. Duncan-Jones, William Laud; P. Heylyn, Cyprianus Anglicus; J. B. Mozley, Essays Historical and Theological; H. R. Trevor-Roper, Archbishop Laud.

Lauds. See OFFICE, DAILY (DIVINE).

Lausanne Covenant. A three-thousand-word statement that emerged from the 1974 Lausanne Congress on World Evangelization. Soundings had been taken over the previous months about its nature and contents, but the covenant was very much the work of the congress itself. A five-member drafting group, in consultation with the executive committee, submitted a statement for comment from the 2,750 participants. The response from many individuals and groups, sometimes calling for further personal discussions, was painstakingly examined before an amended draft was approved by the executive committee, presented and explained to the gathering by draft chairman John Stott, and offered for signature to the representatives of some 150 countries.

Lausanne Covenant

Topics covered by the covenant included the purpose of God, the authority of Scripture, the uniqueness of Christ, social responsibility, evangelism and its implications, Christian nurture, spiritual conflict, freedom and persecution, the power of the Holy Spirit, and the return of Christ.

There had been sticky moments when the drafting group was besieged by criticism from what one of its members called “the old guard on one hand, the young Turks on the other.” The latter wanted to go further on social action and allied issues, the former had questioned whether being “without error in all that it affirms” quite added up to scriptural inerrancy. That all was resolved amicably reflects the harmonious spirit pervading what Time magazine called “a formidable forum, possibly the widest-ranging meeting of Christians ever held.”

The effect of the Lausanne Covenant has been felt worldwide as evangelicals have attempted to put its theology seriously into practice.

J. D. DOUGLAS

See also EVANGELICALISM; EVANGELISM; MISSIOLOGY; STOTT, JOHN R. W.

Law, Biblical Concept of. The truest window we possess into the mind and life of the OT believer is the Book of Psalms. Here we meet the saints of the old covenant in their joys and sorrows; we feel the weight of their problems and covet the richness of their spirituality. At the center lies the law of the Lord. Taking verses at random from Psalm 119, we find God’s law is a delight (v. 92), an object of love (v. 97), venerated as truth (v. 142), a means of peace (v. 165) and liberty (v. 45), and a treasure above all earthly wealth (v. 72). To say that we do not customarily think of OT law in these terms is to admit that we have fallen into the error of identifying the Pharisees of the NT with the saints of the OT, forgetful that to the Lord Jesus, Pharisaic Judaism was a plant his heavenly Father had not planted (Matt. 15:13) and that he himself was the perfect example of life under the law.

God’s Law in God’s World. From the beginning God’s law lay at the center of his dealings with humankind. The major focus of Genesis 2—the Creator’s benevolence and bounty toward his chief creature—does not obscure the fact that humankind in the garden was under law and that it was through obedience that they entered into life. The balance of things is seen in the contrast between “every tree” that is there for our enjoyment and the single tree that is forbidden. Yet in that single tree was enshrined the principle of law. Thus, at the outset the Bible joins together that enduring partnership, obedience and life. Obedience safeguarded the enjoyment of the life that was life indeed; disobedience not only forfeited that life but replaced it by a death-bearing opposite. In Genesis 3, with disobedience came the birth of a bad conscience (v. 8), the replacement of love by resentment (v. 12), the corruption of marriage (v. 16), and, most notably from our present point of view, the dislocation of man from his environment (vv. 17–19), which turns to fight against him and only grudgingly and at great cost furnishes a sufficiency for life.

The rest of the OT perpetuates this view of people in their environment: only by obedience to God’s law can we prosper and live successfully in God’s world. The very environment itself turns against the disobedient. The earth is defiled by lawbreakers (Lev. 18:24–30) and “vomits out” those who fail to keep the law (Lev. 20:22). Behind this concept of the moral vitality of the environment lies one aspect of the OT theology of the Spirit of the Lord: he was operative in creation (Gen. 1:2; Ps. 33:6), and his activity is seen in both the renewal and decay of plants (Ps. 104:30; Isa. 40:7). The life that vitalizes the environment is God’s life, full of his holiness.

Thus, the OT has a distinct environmentalism to share with us, and at its center lies the law of God the Creator.

The Two Images of God. Humankind in the Image of God. Humankind is the crown of the creativity of God. The threefold use of the verb “to create” in Genesis 1:27 marks humankind as both the creature par excellence and the perfect creative act. This human uniqueness is summed up in the description “in our image, in our likeness,” words that are used uniformly throughout the OT of outward form or shape, and this must be their leading idea here too. This does not mean that visibility, form, and shape are part of the divine essence, for God is Spirit. Nonetheless, the OT reveals (e.g., Judg. 13:3, 6, 10, 15) that there is an outward shape uniquely suited to (though not essential to) the divine perfection, and in that image (šelem) and likeness (dēmût) we were created. But every other aspect also of our nature is related, directly or indirectly in the Genesis narrative, to the image of God: matrimonial (1:26–27; 5:1–2), governmental (1:28), spiritual (subject to personal address by God: 1:28, contrast the bare fiat of 1:22), moral (2:15–17), and rational (2:19–20). The uniqueness of the divine image permeates human nature and constitutes a definition of what humankind truly is.

Law in the Image of God. Turning now to a very different genre of Scripture, we find in Leviticus 19 that God has provided another image of himself on earth. Every aspect of human experience is gathered into this rich review of life under God's law: filial duty (v. 3), religious commitment (v. 4), ritual exactness (v. 5), care of the needy (v. 9), honesty in deed and word (vv. 11–12), and many more, touching on relationships and even on dress, hygiene, and horticulture. Yet all this variety suspends from one central truth: "I am the LORD." Lord is the divine name, the "I AM WHO I AM" (Exod. 3:14), so that the significance of the recurring claim is not "You must do what I tell you" (i.e., "lord" as an authority word) but "You must do this or that because I AM WHO I AM"; every precept of the law is a reflection of "WHO I AM." Humankind is the living, personal image of God; the law is the written, perceptual image of God. The intention of Leviticus 19 is declared at the outset: "Be holy because I, the LORD your God, am holy" (v. 2). The Lord longs for his people to live in his image, and to that end he has given them his law.

A Truly Human Life. The nature of humankind is the image of God, and the law is given both to activate and to direct that nature into a truly human life; any other life is subhuman. Of course, it is true that in a world of sinners the law, regrettably, has to give itself to the task of curbing and rebuking antisocial and degrading practices, but OT law has, to a far greater extent, the function of liberating humans to live according to their true nature. For it is only when people find the law of liberty that they become free. For this reason the OT asserts that the law has been given for our good, to bring us to a hitherto unrealized fullness of life (Deut. 4:1; 5:33; 8:1).

The Pillars of True Religion. The full flowering of the law of God in the OT came through the ministry of Moses and in the context of that foundational series of events that began with the exodus and climaxed at Mount Sinai.

Grace and Law. A major truth emerges simply in the way in which the Exodus story is told. Egypt was the scene of a twofold act of God: liberation and redemption. The former was achieved by the tenth plague (Exod. 11:1) and actually brought to Israel all they had sought in crying to the Lord (Exod. 2:23). But the Lord himself had something further in mind: he promised also redemption (Exod. 6:6) as a distinct exercise on his part and, to accomplish it, added the Passover. In this way Israel became the people who took shelter beneath the blood of the lamb (Exod. 12:13, 22–23) and who, by sheltering, were saved from the wrath of God (Exod. 12:12) and were initiated into a life of pilgrimage (Exod. 12:11). Pharaoh would have made them outcasts (Exod. 11:1); the blood and the flesh of the lamb made them the Lord's redeemed pilgrims. It was this people—the people liberated and redeemed by grace—who came to Mount Sinai.

Sinai was not a chance stopping place on the journey but an intended, primary destination (Exod. 3:12), and thither they were led by the pillar of cloud and fire (Exod. 13:21–22). The people redeemed by blood were brought by their Redeemer to the place of lawgiving (Exod. 20:2). Grace precedes law; the law of God is not a system of merit whereby the unsaved seek to earn divine favor but a pattern of life given by the Redeemer to the redeemed so that they might know how to live for his good pleasure. Such is the biblical understanding of the place and function of law.

The Way of Holiness by Obedience. The law that God gave through Moses had many aspects—e.g., civil, dealing with the legal system of the people of God considered as a state, with courts and penalties; moral, the law of holy living; and religious, the law of the ceremonies and sacrifices. It is the latter two that concern us here.

The first desire of the redeemer God is that his redeemed should be obedient. To keep the law is not a new bondage but a proof that the old bondage was past (Exod. 20:2). The lawgiving led up to a pledge of obedience (Exod. 24:7) that matched the longing of the Lord (Deut. 5:29).

With the law so central to life, it is understandable that the OT should develop a rich legal vocabulary. In logical order, the first word descriptive of God's law is "testimonies" (ēdā, e.g., Ps. 119:2 כִּו). In his law the Lord has "testified" regarding himself and his requirements. This self-revelation was given in "teaching" (tôrâ, e.g., Ps. 119:1), such as a loving parent would impart (cf., e.g., Prov. 3:1; 6:20). Once given, the teaching is a "word" (dābār, e.g., Ps. 119:28) to live by, an intelligible body of truth to be pondered and applied. But the Lord's testimony is also imperative, taking the form of "statute" (ḥōq, a permanent enactment, e.g., Ps. 119:5 כִּו), "judgment" (mišpāt, authoritative decision, e.g., Ps. 119:7), "precept" (piqqūd, e.g., Ps. 119:4), and "commandment" (mišwâ, e.g., Ps. 119:10), applying the law to the details of life. As a whole, God's law is a "way" (derek, e.g., Ps. 119:37 כִּו) or characteristic lifestyle.

In the OT as in the NT (e.g., Acts 5:32) obedience is a means of grace. The narrative of Genesis 2–3 provides a historical visual aid: obedience gave access to the tree of life; disobedience promised self-enhancement (Gen. 3:5) but brought death. Throughout the OT this remains the mirror of the true. A life based on the law of the Lord is constantly nourished by secret springs and is consistently fruitful (Ps. 1:2–3); it is under the blessing of God (Ps. 1:1), for by his law the Lord has made his people secure from bondage (Exod. 20:2). The psalmist speaks for every true believer when he testifies that the way of obedience is the way of true liberty (Ps. 119:45).

Law, Biblical Concept of

The Way of Fellowship. In the covenant ceremony of Exodus 24:4–8 the ritual of the blood matches the two focal points of the Passover: the people sheltering beneath the blood both enjoy peace with God and also are committed to pilgrimage. Thus it is that Moses first sprinkles the blood on the altar—a Godward movement reflecting the central Passover theology of propitiation. But next, as soon as the people have committed themselves to the way of obedience, the rest of the blood is sprinkled over them; the blood covers the needs of the redeemed throughout their walk of pilgrim obedience.

In the covenant ceremony it is also to be noted that the presence of the Lord in the midst of his people is symbolized by an altar, for it is the blood of sacrifice that alone secures and maintains fellowship between Redeemer and redeemed. The permanence of the people in the divine presence is symbolized by stone pillars—stone for durability—but, while thus in his presence, their activity is to offer burnt offerings and peace offerings. Blood had brought them into peace with God, and blood would maintain his fellowship by means of the appointed offerings.

The other side of the same reality is seen in Leviticus 9. The Aaronic priesthood has just been introduced into its sacred function (Lev. 8) and now for the first time celebrates the full round of levitical sacrifices: the sin offering (9:8), the burnt offering (v. 12), and the fellowship offering (v. 18). The climax follows: “The glory of the LORD appeared to all the people” (v. 23), this being the foretold purpose of the sacrifices (v. 6). The sacrifices are thus designed for the expression, enjoyment, and maintenance of fellowship with God.

Three main sacrifices were enjoined: the burnt offering, the fellowship offering, and the sin offering. The burnt offering expressed the double idea of acceptance before God and dedication to God. Its aroma is sweet to the Lord (Lev. 1:9), indicating his delight to accept it and the one who offers it (cf. Gen. 8:20–21). The truth of acceptance is underlined when the burnt offering reappears in token form in the fellowship offering; the fat of the offering (Lev. 3:3–5, 9–11, 14–16) is regarded as a burnt offering in miniature and is called “the food of the offering” (Lev. 3:11 KJV; cf. 21:8). This means that the Lord, accepting the offering and the offerer, is delighted to sit at table with him, condescending to participate in the feast of reconciliation. But the burnt offering also expresses dedication. In Genesis 22 the Lord exercised his right to claim all, and in responding with a burnt offering, Abraham was holding nothing back (v. 12). The story of the offering of Isaac, ruling out forever the admissibility of human sacrifice, established at the same time the heart-searching standard of devotion the burnt offering expressed.

The fellowship offering looked toward both God and humanity. Godward, it expressed thanksgiving and personal love (Lev. 7:12, 16), but it was commanded that this joyous response to God’s goodness should be marked also by fellowship with others: the priest has his share (Lev. 7:31–34), and we find the command of Leviticus 7:16 fulfilled in the family celebration of Deuteronomy 12:7.

The object of the sin offering was forgiveness. Awareness of a particular fault brought the individual sinner with his offering (Lev. 4:23), and the result was divine forgiveness (Lev. 4:20, 26, 31, 35).

Two acts are common to all three main categories of sacrifice: the laying on of hands (Lev. 1:4; 3:2; 4:4) and the ritual of the blood (Lev. 1:5; 3:2; 4:5–6). In connection with burnt offerings and sin offerings these acts are explicitly linked with making atonement (Lev. 1:4; 4:20, 26), and the sacrifices thus find their focus in the price-paying concepts of a substitution-based theology.

That the OT concept of law is, in fact, the biblical concept of law is nowhere seen more clearly than in the continuance throughout the Bible of the same pillars of true religion: grace and law. For the purpose of God remains the same, the obedience of his people, and it remains true that those who thus walk in the light find that the blood of Jesus Christ keeps cleansing them from all their sin.

J. A. MOTYER

See also CIVIL LAW AND JUSTICE IN BIBLE TIMES; CRIMINAL LAW AND PUNISHMENT IN BIBLE TIMES; OFFERINGS AND SACRIFICES IN BIBLE TIMES.

Bibliography. W. Anderson, Law and Gospel; P. Dale, Old Testament Law; H. Hubner, Law in Paul's Thought; B. N. Kaye and G. J. Wenham, eds., Law, Morality and the Bible; E. F. Kevan, Evangelical Doctrine of Law; Grace of Law; F. D. Kidner, Sacrifice in the Old Testament; F. Lyall, Slaves, Citizens, Sons: Legal Metaphors in the Epistles; B. Martin, Christ and the Law in Paul; J. A. Motyer, Image of God: Law and Liberty in Biblical Ethics; Law and Life; F. Thielman, From Plight to Solution; G. J. Wenham, Book of Leviticus; S. Westerholm, Israel's Law and the Church's Faith.

Law, William (1686–1761). English theologian and devotional writer. Born at King’s Cliffe in Northamptonshire, Law entered Emmanuel College, Cambridge, in 1705 and graduated in 1708. In 1711 he was elected to a fellowship in his college and ordained as a deacon of the Church of England. In 1714, for refusing to take the oath of allegiance to George I, the newly arrived Hanoverian king, Law was deprived of his fellowship and became a nonjuror, though remaining in communion with the Church of England. From 1723 until 1737 he acted as a tutor to Edward Gibbon, father of the famous historian by the same name. In 1740 he retired to King's Cliffe, where he remained until his death, living a disciplined life of prayer and good works, particularly the establishment of much-needed schools and almshouses.

Law participated actively in the religious controversies that agitated the Church of England during the eighteenth century. In 1717 Benjamin Hoadly, bishop of Bangor, published a sermon entitled "The Nature of the Kingdom of Christ," based on John 18:36. In this sermon he denied that in the NT there is a visible church of Jesus Christ, and he defined Christianity as merely "sincerity." In Three Letters to the Bishop of Bangor (1717–19), Law argued that the church is a unique organism, founded by Jesus Christ, having its own special ordinances and its distinctive ministry going back to the NT apostles. In 1730 Matthew Tindal published "the deists' Bible," Christianity as Old as the Creation, whose thesis was that Christianity was simply a republication of the religion of nature as apprehended by human reason. In 1731 Law issued Case of Reason, in which he contended that however important reason may be in religion, it alone cannot fathom the mysteries of God's providence, but must be supplemented by special divine revelation.

Law's most enduring contribution was in the realm of Christian devotion. Here his most important work was Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life (1729). Its argument is that if Christians really desire to follow their Lord Jesus Christ, it must be in every area of activity, in business and leisure as well as in strictly devotional practices. The Christian life, he maintains, must be a continual practice of humility, self-denial, and renunciation of the world; and he illustrates his thesis by a vivid series of imaginary characters who embody various virtues and vices. This treatise became a favorite with Christian leaders as different as John Wesley, George Whitefield, and Samuel Johnson and the great nineteenth-century Scottish preacher Alexander Whyte.

N. V. HOPE

See also MYSTICISM.

Bibliography. S. H. Hobhouse, William Law and Eighteenth Century Quakerism; A. W. Hopkinson, About William Law; J. H. Overton, William Law, Non-Juror and Mystic; E. P. Rudolph, William Law; William Law on Christian Perfection; A. K. Walker, William Law: His Life and Thought.

Law and Grace. See LAW, BIBLICAL CONCEPT OF.

Law and Justice in Ancient Times. See CIVIL LAW AND JUSTICE IN BIBLE TIMES.

Lawless One. See ANTICHRIST.

Lawrence, Brother. See BROTHER LAWRENCE.

Laying on of Hands. An act performed in different ways and with various meanings in the OT, NT Judaism, and the Christian church. The simple placing (Heb. šim or šit) of hands on a person was practiced when pronouncing a blessing (Gen. 48:14–22; cf. Jesus' blessing of the children, Matt. 19:13, 15; Mark 10:13, 16; Luke 18:15). Healing was accompanied by touching in Jesus' ministry and in Acts (e.g., Matt. 8:15; Mark 1:41; 5:23; 6:5; 8:23, 25; Luke 4:40; Acts 28:8). The bestowal of the Spirit was accompanied by an imposition of hands also (Acts 8:14–17; 19:1–7). It is debated whether this was a normative situation. The meaning of Hebrews 6:2 is disputed, but this is often linked with the passages just cited as part of the "initiation" into the life of the church, perhaps at baptism. The laying on of hands accompanies Paul's healing (Acts 9:17), at which time he also was filled with the Spirit.

Ultimately the laying on of hands was associated mainly with ordination. Acts 6:6; 13:3; 1 Timothy 4:14; and 2 Timothy 1:6 are often cited in this connection. Daube suggests that this action was to be linked with the Hebrew sāmak rather than with šim, as above. Sāmak was a leaning rather than merely a touching action. This term was also used in the OT with respect to the offering of sacrifices. The appointment of Joshua as Moses' successor was accompanied by this imposition of hands (sāmak, Num. 27:18, 23), as was the appointment of the Levites (Num. 8:10). Joshua had the Spirit, as did the seven in Acts 6:1–6, but apparently, according to Deuteronomy 34:9, he received an additional gift of the spirit of wisdom. It is questionable whether this appointment of a successor is a true antecedent of the later ordination of authoritative teachers. The installation of the elders of Israel (Num. 11:16–17, 24–25) did not include the laying on of hands. The setting apart of the Levites to a special service (Num. 8:14, 19) has some similarity to the setting apart of Paul and Barnabas for a special work (Acts 13:2), and hands were imposed in each case (Num. 8:10; Acts 13:3). Also in each case the laying on of hands was done by a group of peers; in neither was it an ordination to teach (Paul and Barnabas had already been in Christian ministry, and Paul viewed his authority as coming directly from God, not through human agency, Gal. 1:1).

It is difficult to assess the significance of the imposition of hands in the case of Timothy (1 Tim. 4:14; 2 Tim. 1:6). Most commentators assume that the Jewish practice of ordination of rabbis stands as a precedent. However, although it is traditional to think of that Jewish practice as extending continuously back to the time of Moses, evidence is lacking that ordination of teachers by the laying on of hands existed in the time of Christ. The Jewish examples of the laying on of hands that are usually cited are not necessarily those of ordination. Laying on of hands was also used to admit people to the Sanhedrin (M. Sanh. 4.4), but this was not equivalent to rabbinical ordination. Timothy received a charisma through prophetic utterance with the laying on of hands; Paul does not say that the hands conveyed the spiritual gift. Later ordination, Jewish and Christian, was to an authoritative teaching ministry and was characteristically accompanied not by prophecy but by prayer. Daube sees "the laying on of hands of the presbytery" (1 Tim. 4:14) as reflecting the šēmīkat zēqēnīm (Bab. Sanh. 13b), which he understands to be the laying (or leaning) on of hands not by elders but to make elders. It may be questioned whether this was in mind, whether the practice had yet become common in Judaism, and whether it is in fact the word sāmak with its associations, rather than šīm, that provides the background. First Timothy 5:22 may refer to the same conferral as Timothy received or, less likely, to the reception of penitents. Apparently the ordination Rabbi Yohanan ben Zakkai conferred was the earliest example known to later writers.

Laying on of Hands

Paul and Barnabas "appointed" (cheirontoneō, lit. "stretch out the hand") elders in every city (Acts 14:23), and a brother was "chosen" (same verb) by the churches to accompany Paul in carrying the collection (2 Cor. 8:18–19). This verb, cheirotoneō, which could mean "elect" or "point out," became, along with its cognate cheirotonia, a major term for the laying on of hands at ordination. So did the similar cheirothesia, although this word was not so used in the Apostolic Constitutions. The laying on of hands, along with prayer, has continued in Christian ordination until today, whereas the laying on of hands ceased to be used for ordination in Judaism sometime after the second century.

Various Christian churches have also used the laying on of hands in such ceremonies as confirmation, healing, and absolution. In the third century the laying on of hands and the anointing with oil using the sign of the cross (chrism or chrismation) took a strong place alongside baptism. The following centuries, especially in the Eastern churches, saw even more importance placed on chrismation, which vied with baptism as a means of the bestowal of the Holy Spirit. Confirmation with chrismation continued as a separate rite, and the laying on of hands decreased in significance in connection with baptism, although it continued to be important in other rites, especially ordination.

A basic theological issue is whether the laying on of hands conveys any special power in itself. Daube sees it as an extension of one's personality, even in the case of offering sacrifices. Naturally the widespread concept of conveying power by touching a person is never far from mind. However, Scripture itself does not attribute power to the act except in the case of healing. Even here it is not magical, though people may have had such thoughts when approaching Jesus or the apostles through touching them or their possessions, or even through proximity to them (Acts 5:15–16; 19:11–12). The woman in Matthew 9:20–22; Mark 5:25–34; and Luke 8:43–48 drew power from Jesus by touching his clothes. Timothy's gift was received through (dia) prophecy, but with (meta), not through, the laying on of hands (1 Tim. 4:14). Some think that the emphasis on prayer here, along with the fact that prayer was commonly associated with the raised hand, indicates an act of benediction rather than a transfer of power or authority. This element of blessing can also be seen in other biblical instances of the raised or imposed hand. Paul and Barnabas were sent off to a specific work in a supportive atmosphere of worship, prayer, and fasting by the laying on of hands (Acts 13:1–3). By this they were "committed to the grace of God" (14:26).

Recent studies tend toward the view that the laying of hands on those serving God and the church should be an act of the whole church rather than of the hierarchy of the church. Interchurch consultations, especially since Vatican II, have concentrated on the church, its ministry, and ordination. The biblical, historical, and ecclesiastical significance of the laying on of hands is relevant to such inquiries.

W. L. LIEFELD

Bibliography. R. A. Culpepper, "Biblical Basis for Ordination," RE 78:471–84; D. Daube, New Testament and Rabbinic Judaism; A. Ehrhardt, "Jewish and Christian Ordination," JEH 5:125–38; E. Ferguson, "Laying on of Hands: Its Significance in Ordination," JTS 26:1–12; L. Hoffman, "Jewish Ordination on the Eve of Christianity," Studia Liturgica 13:11–41; E. J. Kilmartin, "Ministry and Ordination in Early Christianity against a Jewish Background," Studia Liturgica 13:42–69; M. C. Sansom, "Laying on of Hands in the Old Testament," ExpT 94:323–26; M. Warkentin, Ordination: A Biblical-Historical View; D. F. Wright, "Ordination," Them 10:5–10.

Leadership, Gift of. See SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

Leibniz, Gottfried Wilhelm (1646–1716). The brilliant son of a philosophy professor at Leipzig University, Leibniz at first studied law at Leipzig but soon turned his attention to philosophy and mathematics, interests that would consume him for the rest of his life. From 1673 to the end of his life he worked for the Duke of Brunswick assembling and cataloging the vast archives of the House of Brunswick as he wrote a large history of the family. A man with many interests and intellectual contacts, he founded the Prussian Academy in 1700 and tried to promote peace between Protestant and Roman Catholic theologians as well as to unite Protestant churches in general. He was devoted to the cause of international peace.

Although he was a rationalist, Leibniz took to task Spinoza's philosophy, denouncing it as an attack on personal immortality and lacking a place for divine purpose and creativity. He was not content with Descartes's dualism in regard to "spiritual substance" mysteriously interacting with "material substance," and he disliked the mechanistic view of the universe proposed by Newton. Leibniz viewed God as a free and rational being, a being who could have created any type of world that he desired. He believed that God must have created the best of all possible worlds, one in which men are rewarded and punished according to their conduct. God is not responsible for evil. Evil is the result of human freedom. Leibniz had a theistic optimism that was ridiculed by Voltaire but was a precursor to the optimism of the Enlightenment in general. He was the first to use the term theodicy (in the title of a work he published in 1710), explaining that the existence of evil is a necessary condition of the existence of the greatest moral good.

In Monadology (1720) Leibniz agrees that matter consists of atoms but contends that beyond and beneath the divisible physical atoms are the indivisible metaphysical atoms. These spiritual force centers he called monads. These monads are independent of each other but are brought into a rational organization through a predetermined harmony arranged by the mind and will of God. His system allowed him to defend traditional proofs of God's existence (with modification) and to uphold some scholastic principles that had been attacked by other philosophers. He believed that his doctrine of substance could be brought into harmony with both transubstantiation and consubstantiation. Christianity, he noted, was the summation of all religions.

Leibniz has been viewed as Germany's greatest seventeenth-century philosopher and one of the most universal minds of all times. He is indicative of the great diversity within early modern rationalism.

D. A. RAUSCH

See also ENLIGHTENMENT, THE; RATIONALISM; SPINOZA, BENEDICT DE; THEODICY.

Bibliography. C. D. Broad and C. Lewy, Leibniz: An Introduction; S. C. Brown, Leibniz; M. Hooper, ed., Leibniz: Critical and Interpretive Essays; B. Mates, Philosophy of Leibniz; B. Russell, Critical Exposition of the Philosophy of Leibniz; R. Saw, Leibniz; R. C. Sleigh, Leibniz and Arnauld.

Leipzig Disputation (1519). Debate held at the University of Leipzig between June 27 and July 16, 1519, which involved Johann Eck, Martin Luther, and Andreas von Carlstadt. Eck, a professor of theology at the University of Ingolstadt, was a distinguished scholar and a feared disputant. Although he was originally a friend of Luther's, his criticism of the Ninety-five Theses aroused Luther's anger and provoked a vehement attack by Luther's colleague, Carlstadt. This eventually resulted in Eck challenging Carlstadt to a public disputation. Originally Luther was not expected to participate, but he became involved in the pamphlet war that preceded the debate. Seemingly Eck wanted Luther included because he hoped to expose the radicalness of Luther's position and to discredit the Reformer.

Eck and Carlstadt began the debate by discussing the questions of grace and free will. Although Carlstadt defended his position nobly, Eck proved the more skillful debater. When Luther entered the context on July 4, the subject was changed to the question of papal authority. Before the debate Luther had written that papal primacy was of recent origin and that it was contrary to the teaching of Scripture, the decrees of the Council of Nicea, and the evidence of church history. This gave Eck the opportunity to associate Luther's views with those of the Bohemian heretic Jan Hus, who had been condemned by the Council of Constance and burned at the stake in 1415. It was a particularly serious accusation in Leipzig because, following the death of Hus, his followers had fled into Saxony. When Luther stated that "among the articles of John Hus, I find many which are plainly Christian and evangelical, which the universal church cannot condemn," Eck pointed out that the Council of Constance had not been of that opinion. Luther responded by stating that councils could err and had erred in the past and that only the Scriptures were infallible. During the closing days of the debate, Luther and Eck dealt with the subjects of purgatory, penance, and indulgences. The disputation concluded with Carlstadt and Eck returning to the questions of grace and free will.

Both sides claimed victory in the debate, but the Universities of Erfurt and Paris, the appointed judges, never rendered a clear verdict. The debate was a tactical success for Eck because he had succeeded in identifying Luther with a condemned heretic. For Luther the Leipzig disputation was a turning point in his career, as it revealed the extent of his estrangement from the official position of the church and helped to clarify his thought on the central issues.

R. W. HEINZE

See also ECK, JOHANN; LUTHER, MARTIN.

Bibliography. W. H. T. Dau, Leipzig Debate in 1519; E. G. Schwiebert, Luther and His Times.

Lent

Lent. A forty-day period of penitence and prayer that begins on Ash Wednesday and prepares for the feast of Easter. It is a form of retreat for Christians preparing to celebrate the paschal mystery. It became a forty-day retreat during the seventh century to coincide with the forty days spent by Christ in the desert; before this Lent usually lasted only a week. Every Friday of Lent is a day of abstinence. Fasting probably originated from the custom of fasting by those who were expecting to be baptized after being catechumens. The third, fourth, and fifth Sundays of Lent refer to the process of preparing for baptism.

Penitential works are very important during Lent. These include not only abstinence and fasting but also prayers and charitable works. Ash Wednesday is one of the greatest days of penitence. Vatican Council II in the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy describes how penitence will lead one closer to God. People should not become overly involved in the penitence itself, however, but realize that the penitence is in preparation for celebrating the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. Christians seek a change of heart during Lent in their relationship to God.

T. J. GERMAN

See also ASH WEDNESDAY; CHRISTIAN YEAR; EASTER.

Bibliography. H. Franke, Lent and Easter; N. Hordern and J. Otwell, Lent; A. W. Jones, Passion for Pilgrimage.

Leo I, the Great. The pontificate of Leo I (440–461) was seminal in the development of the medieval papacy. The pope was probably Italian though not Roman-born. His education was entirely Latin and Christian and his worldview completely Roman. He led the Western church at the very end of imperial dominion in the West. It was a period ripe for the advance of papal power in both theory and reality.

Leo I was a great administrator who sought to control all of Christendom. The chaos left by invading barbarians, especially the Vandals and Huns, made local churches turn to Rome for help and advice. Leo made significant inroads into imperial power in the West, even to assuming the old imperial title Pontifex Maximus (chief priest), which the emperors had dropped. In the Eastern empire, where imperial power was intact and the invaders held at bay, this was more difficult. However, the East was beset with christological heresies, and the Roman church's reputation for impeccable orthodoxy enabled the pope to insinuate himself into the situation.

Scholars disagree as to the exact meaning of Leo's papacy. However, several points seem clear. It was he who put previous claims of papal supremacy based on the Petrine doctrine into a highly structured legal setting. His letters and decretals made clear his vision of a hierarchical church with everything converging on Rome. He provided the indispensable idea of plenitudo potestatis (plenitude of power) for the See of Peter where the pope, as heir of Peter, ruled over the whole church. His claims were rejected in the East, where in 451 the Council of Chalcedon gave the patriarch of Constantinople equal status. This was a blow to Leo, but where imperial power remained strong he could not achieve his aims.

In 455 Leo I, representing the people of Rome, persuaded Attila the Hun and his hordes to stop a brief raid on the city. Attila withdrew beyond the Danube, where he died one year later. Such events as this help explain the enormous power assumed by a pope who was also performing the duties of a defunct imperial authority. When he died in 461, Leo left in the papal archives powerful documentation upon which later popes from Gregory the Great to Innocent III could draw to achieve ultimate power in Western Christendom.

C. T. MARSHALL

See also PAPACY.

Bibliography. G. Barraclough, Medieval Papacy; T. G. Jalland, Letters and Sermons of Leo the Great; Life and Times of Saint Leo the Great.

Lessing, Gotthold Ephraim (1729–1781). German dramatist, critic, and writer. Son of a pastor in Saxony, he was originally trained in Lutheran orthodoxy, but after studying in Leipzig and Berlin he adopted the popular philosophy of the Enlightenment. He early distinguished himself as a writer and held various positions in which he exercised his literary skills. In 1770 he was placed in charge of the Duke of Brunswick's library at Wolfenbüttel, where he soon stirred up a storm of controversy by publishing fragments from a manuscript by the Hamburg orientalist H. S. Reimarus (1694–1768). The Wolfenbüttel Fragments (1774–78) was essentially a deist tract that rejected the validity of biblical revelation and explained the origins of Christianity from a naturalistic standpoint. Lessing responded to his critics in a series of polemical writings but was silenced by the Brunswick censor in 1778. His theological ideas were further developed in his most mature dramatic work, Nathan the Wise (1779), and his essay Education of the Human Race (1780).

Although Lessing is best known for his contributions in literature and the evolution of the German language, he is a landmark figure in the history of theology as well. By publishing the Fragments he opened the door to critical study of the Bible, especially the NT. He insisted that the life and personality of Jesus might be different from that portrayed in the Gospels and the subsequent teaching of the church. Applying critical tests to the Gospels, he suggested the existence of an Aramaic original of Matthew that was later condensed in Greek and that Mark and Luke supplemented with new material. But Lessing went further to question whether authentic belief could properly be bound up with particular historical events. No historical truth, he said, could be demonstrated nor could it be used to demonstrate anything. There was a “ditch” between history and eternal truths that could not be crossed. Thus, he rejected the idea of revelation in history, arguing that if religious truth is genuine, it must be so universally and is of a different order from that of historical events. He called upon people to adopt a “natural” or “positive” religion, one that recognizes God, forms noble conceptions of him, and directs individuals to keep these in mind in all of their thoughts and deeds. The “inner truth” of religion cannot be derived from a written tradition but is something capable of being felt and experienced. The miraculous power of all faiths may be assumed to be real, but it cannot be proven at the present time. Truth is something for which we always seek but cannot expect to find, because there is no such thing as a lord of history within history who will provide us with final truth. By portraying the essence of religion as purely humanitarian morality apart from all historical revelation, Lessing laid the foundations for Protestant liberalism. R. V. PIERARD

See also ENLIGHTENMENT, THE; LIBERALISM, THEOLOGICAL.

Bibliography. H. Chadwick, ed., Lessing's Theological Writings; H. E. Allison, Lessing and the Enlightenment; K. Barth, Protestant Thought from Rousseau to Ritschl; C. Bertheau, SHERK 6:464–65; C. Brown, NIDCC 593; M. F. McCarthy, NCE 8:676–78; P. Gay, Enlightenment; G. E. Michalson, Lessing's Ugly Ditch: A Study of Theology and History; L. P. Wessell, G. E. Lessing's Theology: A Reinterpretation.

Levinas, Emmanuel. See POSTMODERNISM.

Lewis, Clive Staples (1898–1963). Anglican scholar-novelist and Christian apologist, perhaps best known for his mythopoeia that explores theological concepts. Born in Belfast in Northern Ireland, he received his B.A. from University College, Oxford, in 1924, and was fellow and tutor in English literature at Magdalen College, Oxford, from 1925 until 1954. He then accepted the chair of Medieval and Renaissance English at Cambridge. Among his works in literary criticism the most significant are Allegory of Love: A Study in Medieval Tradition (1936; rev. 1938), English Literature in the Sixteenth Century, Excluding Drama (1954) in the Oxford History of English Literature Series, and Experiment in Criticism (1961).

Converted in the late 1920s first to theism and then to Christianity, he saw himself as an “empirical theist” who arrived at the existence of God by reason. In his two autobiographical works, Pil- grim's Regress: An Allegorical Apology for Christianity, Reason, and Romanticism (1933) and Surprised by Joy (1955), he presents the concept of sehnsucht, or sense of longing for the infinite, as the motivating factor in his conversion, and he builds upon this sense of desire in his apologetics.

Lewis's theological writings are renowned for lucidity of style and force of logic. Miracles: A Preliminary Study (1947; rev. 1960) and Problem of Pain (1940) are his most well-known volumes of Christian apologetics. Abolition of Man (1943) is a philosophical statement arguing for the existence of the Tao, or objective moral and natural law. Screwtape Letters (1943)—which quickly sold over one million copies—and Great Divorce (1946) are fictional explorations of the nature of temptation and the experience of redemption.

Lewis's writings rest upon his concern with the integrity of language and the significance of myth, and his mythopoeic works are his most original achievements. Although he had many disagreements with the semantic philosopher Owen Barfield, he generally adopted Barfield's high view of the nature of language and myth (see Owen Barfield, Poetic Diction). Myth is the transcendent language of truth, inexpressible in rationalist terms but able to be glimpsed by the imagination. Lewis's chief mythopoeia are Till We Have Faces: A Myth Retold (1956); his trilogy of space travel—Out of the Silent Planet (1938), Perelandra (1943), and That Hideous Strength (1945)—and his seven-volume Chronicles of Narnia (1950–56). The latter is judged to be among the finest children's literature of our time.

Lewis's romance and marriage late in life to the American Joy Davidman Gresham, followed by her illness and death, have been fictionally told in the film Shadowlands; a more accurate account may be found in the biographies. His poignant grief at his wife's death is presented in Grief Observed (1961, under the pseudonym N. W. Clerk). Letters to Malcolm: Chiefly on Prayer (1964) and Spenser's Images of Life (1967) were published posthumously.

Lewis was an eclectic thinker whose works bear the influence not only of such classic Christian authors as Dante, Spenser, and Milton, but also of such more recent writers of mythopoeia as George MacDonald and G. K. Chesterton, together with his close friends Charles Williams and J. R. R. Tolkien. His orthodox theology and experiential apologetics have large appeal for all Christians, and his imaginative writings continue to attract a very wide audience. R. N. HEIN

Bibliography. W. H. Lewis, ed., Letters of C. S. Lewis; C. S. Carnell, Bright Shadow of Reality; H. Carpenter, Inklings; J. Christopher, C. S. Lewis; R. L. Green and W. Hooper, C. S. Lewis; M. P. Hannay, C. S. Lewis; T. Howard, Achievement of C. S. Lewis; C. Kilby, Christian World of C. S. Lewis; K. Lindskoog, C. S. Lewis Hoax; C. N. Manlove, C. S. Lewis: His Literary Achieve- ment; D. T. Myers, C. S. Lewis in Context; R. L. Putrill, C. S. Lewis's Case of the Christian Faith; G. Sayer, Jack: C. S. Lewis and His Times; J. R. Willis, Pleasures Forevermore.

Lewis, Clive Staples

Lex Talionis. See CIVIL LAW AND JUSTICE IN BIBLE TIMES.

Liberal Evangelicalism. The term refers historically to those (1) who have based their understanding of the Christian faith in the evangelical tradition of the church, but (2) who have understood their responsibility to the modern world as demanding their acceptance of a scientific worldview with its specific commitment to historical and psychological methodology. Used particularly in the early decades of the century by some within the Church of England (e.g., T. Guy Rogers, V. F. Storr, E. W. Barnes) to clarify their continuing evangelical orientation, the term has sometimes been adopted to describe other theological moderates who have sought a synthesis of the gospel and modern knowledge.

With evangelicals, these pastors and teachers have emphasized the need for a personal relationship with God, the freedom of the Spirit, the authority of the Bible, the person of Jesus as God incarnate, the centrality of the cross, and the need for conversion. With liberals, however, they have agreed that in a world forever changed by the Enlightenment the message of Christianity must be recast. Bemoaning the decline of evangelicalism in the wider church, liberal evangelicals have seen a major reason as being a lack of sensitivity to the modern age and its thought forms.

While the term "liberal evangelical" is an imprecise one, allowing for a wide range of theological distinctiveness, the following are illustrative: (1) The authority of Scripture is understood as residing not in the letter of the text (this would be bibliolatry) but in its dynamic revelation of God in Christ. (2) Older and what is believed cruder penal theories of the atonement have sometimes been replaced by those stressing the redeeming love of God in Christ. (3) Scientific theories such as evolution have been embraced and understood theologically as being compatible with a Christian view of creation. (4) Higher critical conclusions concerning the Bible (e.g., the dating of Daniel, the authorship of 2 Peter, the redaction of Matthew) have been accepted.

The English liberal evangelicals of the 1920s (the terms "modern evangelicals" and "younger evangelicals" have also been used) sometimes diverged on these and other specific issues, but they found a unity in their desire to be concurrently evangelical and modern. Their precursors were such British moderates as P. T. Forsyth, R. W. Dale, and James Denney; their colleagues outside the Church of England, theologians such as H. R. Mackintosh; and their successors (though the term was seldom applied), such luminaries as T. W. Manson, J. S. Whale, Donald and John Baillie, and perhaps even C. S. Lewis.

In America, owing perhaps to the early acrimony of the fundamentalist-modernist controversy, the term has not often been used. Moreover, no comparable turn-of-the-century moderating group of evangelical scholars emerged. Charles Briggs and Henry Preserved Smith began their careers as evangelicals but in the process of speaking to the modern age repudiated much of their earlier beliefs. After World War II, the influence of moderating theologians such as Karl Barth, C. S. Lewis, and Dietrich Bonhoeffer, the need for a more responsible biblical criticism, the desire to escape a pervasive anti-intellectualism, the growing stress on human fulfillment, and a renewed commitment to social justice combined to produce a new generation of evangelicals who shared with their earlier British counterparts a joint commitment to the evangelical faith and to the modern age. Edward Carnell, Bernard Ramm, and George Ladd might be viewed as early representatives of this new "liberal" (or "progressive") evangelicalism, though they would not have used this adjective. Today schools such as Fuller Theological Seminary and Regent College would be committed both to a clear evangelicalism and to a full exploration of the interface between the gospel and modern culture. The agenda of liberal evangelicalism continues, if not the name.

R. K. JOHNSTON

See also BAILLIE, JOHN; DENNEY, JAMES; EVANGELICALISM; FORSYTH, PETER TAYLOR; LEWIS, CLIVE STAPLES; LIBERALISM, THEOLOGICAL; MACKINTOSH, HUGH ROSS; MANSON, THOMAS WALTER.

Bibliography. D. M. Baillie, God Was in Christ; J. E. Carnell, Case for Orthodox Theology; M. Erickson, Evangelical Left; Postmodernizing the Faith; P. T. Forsyth, Person and Place of Jesus Christ; R. Quebedeaux, Young Evangelicals; B. Ramm, After Fundamentalism; T. G. Rogers, ed., Liberal Evangelicalism; J. S. Whale, Christian Doctrine.

Liberalism, Theological. Also known as modernism, this is the major shift in theological thinking that occurred in the late nineteenth century. It is an extremely elusive concept. A variety of shades of liberal thinking exist; it has changed in character during the passage of time; and the distinctions between liberalism in Europe and North America are considerable.

Main Features. The major distinctive is the desire to adapt religious ideas to modern culture and modes of thinking. Liberals insist that the world has changed since the time Christianity was founded so that biblical terminology and creeds are incomprehensible to people today. Although most would start from the inherited orthodoxy of Jesus Christ as the revelation of a savior God, they try to rethink and communicate the faith in terms that can be understood today. As Harry Emerson Fosdick put it, we must express the essence of Christianity, its "abiding experiences," but we must not identify them with the "changing categories" by which they were expressed in the past. Liberals maintain that Christianity has always adapted its forms and language to particular cultural situations and that the "modernists" in any given age have merely been those who were most candid and creative in doing this.

A second element of liberalism is its rejection of religious belief based on authority alone. All beliefs must pass the tests of reason and experience, and one's mind must be open to new facts and truth regardless of where these may originate. No questions are closed or settled, and religion must not protect itself from critical examination. As the Bible is the work of writers who were limited by their times, it is neither supernatural nor an infallible record of divine revelation and thus does not possess absolute authority. The "essence of Christianity" replaces the authority of Scripture, creeds, and the church. This means there is no inherent contradiction between the kingdoms of faith and natural law, revelation and science, the sacred and the secular, or religion and culture.

A central idea of liberal theology is divine immanence. God is seen as present and dwelling within the world, not apart from or elevated above the world as a transcendent being. He is its soul and life as well as the creator. Thus God is found in the whole of life and not just in the Bible or a few revelatory events. Because he is present and works in all that happens, there can be no distinction between the natural and supernatural. The divine presence is disclosed in such things as rational truth, artistic beauty, and moral goodness. Although most liberals attempt to hold on to a core of Christian doctrine, some did carry immanence to its logical end, which is pantheism.

Immanence contributed to such common liberal beliefs as the existence of a universal religious sentiment that lay behind the institutions and creeds of particular religions and the superiority of good works (both in individual and collective terms) over professions and confessions. God is seen as the one who enables man to integrate his personality and thereby achieve perfection. This of course required the restatement of many traditional Christian doctrines. The incarnation was the entrance into the world through the person of Jesus Christ of a molding and redeeming force in humanity, and it signified and ratified the actual presence of God in humanity. His prophetic personality is the clearest and most challenging demonstration of the divine power in the world, and he is both the revelation of God and the goal of human longing. Just as Jesus' resurrection was the continuation of his spirit and personality, so it is with all mortals after the death of the physical body. Sin or evil is seen as imperfection, ignorance, maladjustment, and immaturity, not the fundamental flaw in the universe. These hindrances to the unfolding of the inner nature may be overcome by persuasion and education, and salvation or regeneration is their removal. Religion represents the dimension of life in which personal values receive their highest expression, and its power possesses spiritually therapeutic qualities. Prayer, for example, heightens one's spiritual sensitivity and confers the moral benefits of stability, self-control, and peace of mind.

Liberalism also manifests a humanistic optimism. Society is moving toward the realization of the kingdom of God, which will be an ethical state of human perfection. The church is the movement of those who are dedicated to following the principles and ideals set forth by Jesus, the one who provided the ultimate example of an unselfish life of love, and the members of this fellowship work together to build the kingdom. Liberal eschatology views God's work among humankind as that of redemption and salvation, not punishment for sin, and this end will be reached in the course of a continuous, ascending progress.

Sources and Development. Theological liberalism originated in Germany, where a number of theological and philosophical currents converged in the nineteenth century. German thought had a profound impact on British and American theology, but indigenous movements in both places, the Broad Church tradition in Britain and Unitarianism in America, significantly shaped liberalism's development there.

Kant's ethical idealism and rejection of all transcendental reasoning about religion had the effect of limiting knowledge and opening the way for faith. Schleiermacher introduced the idea of religion as a condition of the heart whose essence is feeling. This made Christian doctrine independent of philosophical systems and faith a matter of individual experience of dependence on God. Jesus was the perfect realization of the ideal of a new life of spiritual communion with God, and this possibility also existed for those who were drawn into fellowship with him in the church.

Hegel went off in another direction with his absolute idealism, as this emphasized the existence of a rational structure in the world apart from the individual minds of its inhabitants. That which is real is rational, and all reality is the manifestation of the absolute idea or the divine mind. Through a dialectical process of the ebb and flow of historical struggle, reason is gradually overcoming the irrational and good is triumphing over evil. The main contributions of Hegelian idealism were support for the idea of divine immanence and the fostering of historical and biblical criticism.

Liberalism, Theological

The ideas of F. C. Baur and the Tübingen School on the origins and early development of Christianity and the NT followed the principles of Hegelian historical evolution, and the same was true with Graf and Wellhausen in OT studies. Higher criticism questioned the authorship and dating of much of the biblical literature and rejected the traditional understanding of the Scriptures as divinely revealed oracles. Christianity was simply seen as the historical fulfillment of natural religion, the culminating self-disclosure of immanent Spirit. Beginning with D. F. Strauss, carried forward by E. Renan and J. R. Seeley, and reaching a high point with Harnack, the “life of Jesus” was studied with the intent of stripping off the dogmatic formulations of the church and getting back to the concrete, historical human personage. They found hidden behind the smoke screen of theology and Hellenistic philosophy the teaching of a simple ethical religion summed up in the fatherhood of God and brotherhood of man. Insisting that Christianity must be founded upon the exact type of person he was, they felt it necessary to get behind the “Christ of the creeds” to the “Jesus of history.”

The sway of Hegel was broken by Ritschl, who emphasized the importance of faith and religious experience. He upheld Christianity’s claim to uniqueness but argued that Christian experience should be based on the objective data of history, not personal feeling. Ritschl saw Christianity as a life of action that would free people from the enslaving passions of their own nature and the determinism of their physical environment. Religious statements are value judgments relating to one’s spiritual situation and have practical consequences. Ritschl’s theology of moral values relates the gospel to two poles—the redemptive work of Christ and the fellowship of redeemed persons (the kingdom of God). In the kingdom one achieves moral perfection and thus is like Christ. God is immanent, transcendent, and personal all at the same time.

Liberals welcomed the findings of science and readily accommodated to the challenge of Darwinism. Evolution vindicated divine immanence, since this explained how God had slowly built the universe through natural law. He also revealed himself through an evolutionary process, as the Israelites began with backward, bloodthirsty ideas and gradually came to understand that the righteous God could be served only by those who are just, merciful, and humble. At last, Jesus portrayed him as the loving Father of all people. Thus, redemption was the gradual transformation of humankind from a primitive state to that of obedience to God. The scientific approach was applied to theology and biblical criticism, and they were regarded as open to all truth. Just like the physical realm, culture and religion had evolved, and there was no fundamental antagonism between the kingdoms of faith and natural law.

Liberalism was prevalent in French Protestantism, where Auguste Sabatier taught that religion must be understood as life rather than doctrine. It is to be grasped through religious psychology and the historical study of the documents in which the religious consciousness of the past has left an imprint. According to the Catholic Alfred Loisy, the essence of Christianity is in the ongoing faith of the church rather than exclusively in the teachings of Jesus, and it is constantly reshaped by the present. Catholic modernism had a strong foothold in France as well as in Britain and to a lesser extent in the United States, but it was effectively quashed by papal action in the early twentieth century.

British liberalism was related to the latitudinarian tradition and was found among the broad churchmen such as Benjamin Jowett, who stressed a loose definition of dogma. Anglican modernism was distinctly British, individualistic, and compromising, tending to combine Jesus’ natural manhood with a doctrine of his divinity. Perhaps the most controversial liberal was R. J. Campbell, a Methodist who criticized orthodox doctrine for its “practical dualism” in making people think of God as above and apart from his world instead of expressing himself through his world. He stressed instead the inward unity of God, humanity, and the universe almost to the point of pantheism. By and large, British liberalism tended to be theoretical and academic and more subdued in its overt humanistic enthusiasm.

In the United States the major source of liberal religious ideas was Unitarianism, and it had already modified the doctrines of divine sovereignty, human sin, and biblical revelation before German thought began to make itself felt. By the 1890s most of the major theologians had studied in Germany, and many of them had come to accept the principles of higher criticism and Darwinism. American liberalism was characterized by a strong sense of activism and a feeling that God is present and active in the great forward movements of human culture.

Liberal theologians concerned themselves with building the kingdom of God and promoting the applied liberalism known as the social gospel. This emphasized the need to modify the corrupt society that in turn was corrupting humankind. Social gospelers talked of the kingdom in which people would live as brothers and sisters in a spirit of cooperation, love, and justice. They believed the church must turn from saving individual sinners to the collective action of saving society. Achieving a better life on earth replaced the concern for the afterlife, and it was expected that Christ and Christian values would conquer the world. Progress could be seen in the advance of political democracy, the movement for world peace, and efforts to end racial discrimination.

Decline and Persistence. By the time of World War I, liberalism had made considerable inroads in the Protestant churches in Europe and North America, but it rested on shaky foundations. World War I shattered the heady optimism that was its stock in trade, while conservatives counterattacked. Often referred to as fundamentalists, confessionalists, or pietists, they denounced liberalism for being, as J. G. Machen put it, “Not Christianity at all, but a religion which is so entirely different from Christianity as to belong in a distinct category.” Although the fundamentalist challenge was more or less beaten back, a more serious threat came from the sophisticated theologians of neo-orthodoxy who called for the recovery of divine transcendence and a realistic doctrine of sin. Liberalism, with its emphasis on human freedom and self-determination, gave religious sanction to modern persons’ efforts to control their lives by autonomous reason and to improve conditions by relying on their own goodness, but it tried to deny the overwhelming power of sin and evil that repeatedly thwart human aspirations. The neo-orthodox suggested that liberals failed to grasp either the actual condition of humankind or the doctrine of God that could provide a remedy. Christianity was transformed into a high-minded ethical humanism that offered little for those caught up in the travail of modern life; and in its efforts not to separate the sacred from the secular, it too closely identified the one with the other.

Liberalism had also become too dependent on finding the historical Jesus, and, as Albert Schweitzer showed, the Jesus that researchers were uncovering possessed an apocalyptic worldview and assumptions that were quite at variance with their conception of his teaching. The history of religion school carried the idea of historical development to its logical end and portrayed Christianity as the syncretistic religion of the ancient near East. This meant the denial of its distinctiveness and the authority of the biblical canon. Christianity was merely one among many religions, all of which were relative to their time and circumstance, and thus it had no claim to finality.

In the 1930s some adherents moved much further to the left and broke almost completely with Christianity. Some turned to secular humanism, and in their 1933 manifesto repudiated the existence of God, immortality, and the supernatural in general, and substituted faith in humans and their capabilities. Others identified with an empirical philosophy of religion based entirely on the scientific methods and experience.

Nevertheless, liberalism did not die out. A group of “evangelical liberals” in the United States, among them H. E. Fosdick, William A. Brown, Rufus Jones, and Henry Sloane Coffin, preached a God who was both immanent and transcendent, that Jesus, the Bible, and Christianity were unique, and that Jesus should be accepted as Lord of one’s life. A new generation of “neoliberals” criticized the old modernism for its excessive preoccupation with intellectualism, sentimentality, a watered-down concept of God, and accommodation to the modern world that prevented it from launching a moral attack. Such people as W. M. Horton, John C. Bennett, and H. P. Van Dusen called for finding who God really is and securing his help in facing the human predicament, which is sin.

In Germany liberal scholarship was dominated by such giants as Bultmann, with his emphasis on form criticism and demythologizing the NT so modern humans could understand what the Christian faith is, and Tillich, who was concerned with the ultimate, the ground of being, and suggested that God cannot be described in symbols that last from age to age but can only be encountered by experience. Bonhoeffer put forth the idea of a religionless Christianity in which the church must be concerned with Christ and not religious ideas. We live in a world come of age and must reject the way of religion, which is a psychological crutch. Christians must step out in faith and follow the one who is “the man for others” in costly discipleship.

By the 1960s most liberals had abandoned humanistic optimism, progressive cultural immanentism, and the dream of an earthly kingdom, but they gave no ground on the nonliteral interpretation of the Bible. Many had a renewed interest in natural theology and stressed the importance of social change. The “radical” and “secular” theologians talked about the traditional concept of God as being “dead” in this secular age and gloried in the God who comes to us in the events of social change. They were optimistic about the creative possibilities open to secular humans, held up love as the sufficient norm of ethical behavior, and reaffirmed the lordship of Christ and his call to discipleship.

R. V. PIERARD

See also CATHOLICISM, LIBERAL; CHICAGO SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY; HIGHER CRITICISM; SOCIAL GOSPEL; TÜBINGEN SCHOOL; UNITARIANISM.

Bibliography. L. J. Averill, American Theology in the Liberal Tradition; K. Cauthen, Impact of American Religious Liberalism; R. J. Coleman, Issues of Theological Conflict: Evangelicals and Liberals; J. Dillenberger and C. Welch, Protestant Christianity Interpreted through Its Development; W. R. Hutchison, Modernist Impulse in American Protestantism; D. E. Miller, Case for Liberal

Liberalism, Theological

Christianity; W. Pauck, Heritage of the Reformation; B. Reardon, Liberal Protestantism; H. Zahrnt, Question of God: Protestant Theology in the Twentieth Century.

Liberation Theology. This is more a movement that attempts to unite theology and sociopolitical concerns than a new school of theological theory. It is more accurate to speak of liberation theology in the plural, for these theologies of liberation find contemporary expression among blacks, feminists, Asians, Hispanic Americans, and Native Americans. The most significant and articulate expression to date has taken place in Latin America. Theological themes have been developed in the Latin American context that have served as models for other theologies of liberation.

At least four major factors have played a significant role in the formulation of Latin American liberation theology. First, it is a post-Enlightenment theological movement. The leading proponents—such as Gustavo Gutiérrez, Juan Segundo, and José Miranda—are responsive to the epistemological and social perspectives of Kant, Hegel, and Marx.

Second, liberation theology has been greatly influenced by European political theology and the North American radical theology, finding in J. B. Metz, Jürgen Moltmann, and Harvey Cox perspectives that have criticized the ahistorical and individualistic nature of existential theology.

Third, it is for the most part a Roman Catholic theological movement. With notable exceptions, such as José Miguez-Bonino (Methodist) and Rubem Alves (Presbyterian), liberation theology has been identified with the Roman Catholic Church. After Vatican II (1965) and the conference of the Latin American episcopate (Celam II) in Medellín, Colombia (1968), a significant number of Latin American leaders within the Roman Catholic Church turned to liberation theology as the theological voice for the Latin American church. The dominating role of the Roman Catholic Church in Latin America has made it a significant vehicle for liberation theology throughout the South American continent.

Fourth, it is a theological movement specifically and uniquely situated in the Latin American context. Liberation theologians contend that their continent has been victimized by colonialism, imperialism, and multinational corporations. Economic “developmentalism” has placed so-called underdeveloped Third World nations in a situation of dependence, resulting in the local economies of Latin America being controlled by decisions made in New York, Houston, or London. To perpetuate this economic exploitation, liberationists argue, the powerful capitalist countries, especially the United States, give military and economic support to secure certain political regimes supportive of the economic status quo.

These four factors combine to bring about a distinctive theological method and interpretation.

Theological Method. Gustavo Gutiérrez defines theology as “critical reflection on historical praxis.” Doing theology requires the theologian to be immersed in his or her own intellectual and sociopolitical history. Theology is not a system of timeless truths, engaging the theologian in the repetitious process of systematization and apologetic argumentation. Theology is a dynamic, ongoing exercise involving contemporary insights into knowledge (epistemology), humankind (anthropology), and history (social analysis). Praxis means more than the application of theological truth to a given situation. It means the discovery and the formation of theological truth out of a given historical situation through personal participation in the Latin American class struggle for a new socialist society.

Liberation theology accepts the two-pronged “challenge of the Enlightenment” (Juan Sobrino), which shapes its biblical hermeneutic. The first challenge comes through the philosophical perspective begun by Immanuel Kant, which argued for the autonomy of human reason. Theology is no longer worked out in response to God’s self-disclosure through the divine-human authorship of the Bible. This revelation from “outside” is replaced by the revelation of God found in the matrix of human interaction with history. The second challenge comes through the political perspective founded by Karl Marx, which argues that human wholeness can be realized only through overcoming the alienating political and economic structures of society. The role of Marxism in liberation theology must be honestly understood. Some critics have implied that liberation theology and Marxism are indistinguishable, but this is not completely accurate.

Liberation theologians agree with Marx’s famous statement: “Hitherto philosophers have explained the world; our task is to change it.” They argue that theologians are not meant to be theoreticians but practitioners engaged in the struggle to bring about society’s transformation. In order to do this, liberation theology employs a Marxist-style class analysis, which divides the culture between oppressors and oppressed. This conflictual sociological analysis is meant to identify the injustices and exploitation within the historical situation. Marxism and liberation theology condemn religion for supporting the status quo and legitimating the power of the oppressor. But unlike Marxism, liberation theology turns to the Christian faith as a means for bringing about liberation. Marx failed to see the emotive, symbolic, and sociological force the church could be in the struggle for justice. Liberation theologians claim that they are not departing from the ancient Christian tradition when they use Marxist thought as a tool for social analysis. They do not claim to use Marxism as a philosophical worldview or a comprehensive plan for political action. Human liberation may begin with the economic infrastructure, but it does not end there.

The challenge of the Enlightenment is followed by the challenge of the Latin American situation in formulating liberation theology's hermeneutics of praxis. The important hermeneutical key emerging out of the Latin American context is summarized in Hugo Assmann's reference to the "epistemological privilege of the poor." On a continent where the majority is both poor and Roman Catholic, liberation theology claims the struggle is with "man's inhumanity to man" and not with unbelief. Liberation theologians have carved out a special place for the poor. "The poor man, the other, reveals the totally Other to us" (Gutiérrez). All communion with God is predicated on opting for the poor and exploited classes, identifying with their plight, and sharing their fate. Jesus "secularizes the means of salvation, making the sacrament of the 'other' a determining element for entry into the Kingdom of God" (Leonardo Boff). "The poor are the epiphany of the Kingdom or of the infinite exteriority of God" (Enrique Dussel). Liberation theology holds that in the death of the peasant or the native Indian we are confronted with "the monstrous power of the negative" (Hegel). We are forced to understand God from within history mediated through the lives of oppressed human beings. God is not recognized analogically in creation's beauty and power, but dialectically in the creature's suffering and despair. Sorrow "triggers the process of cognition," enabling us to comprehend God and the meaning of his will (Sobrino). Combing post-Enlightenment critical reflection with an acute awareness of Latin America's conflict-ridden history results in several important theological perspectives.

Theological Interpretation. Liberation theologians believe that the orthodox doctrine of God tends to manipulate God in favor of the capitalistic social structure. They claim that orthodoxy has been dependent on ancient Greek notions of God that perceived God as a static being who is distant and remote from human history. These distorted notions of God's transcendence and majesty have resulted in a theology that thinks of God as "up there" or "out there." Consequently, the majority of Latin Americans have become passive in the face of injustice and superstitious in their religiosity. Liberation theology responds by stressing the incomprehensible mysteriousness of the reality of God. God cannot be summarized in objectifying language or known through a list of doctrines. God is found in the course of human history. God is not a perfect, immutable entity, "squatting outside the world." He stands before us on the frontier of the historical future (Assmann). God is the driving force of history causing the Christian to experience transcendence as a "permanent cultural revolution" (Gutiérrez). Suffering and pain become the motivating force for knowing God. The God of the future is the crucified God who submerges himself in a world of misery. God is found on the crosses of the oppressed rather than in beauty, power, or wisdom.

The biblical notion of salvation is equated with the process of liberation from oppression and injustice. Sin is defined in terms of "man's inhumanity to man." Liberation theology for all practical purposes equates loving one's neighbor with loving God. The two are not only inseparable but virtually indistinguishable. God is found in our neighbor, and salvation is identified with the history of "man becoming." The history of salvation becomes the salvation of history embracing the entire process of humanization. Biblical history is important insofar as it models and illustrates this quest for justice and human dignity. Israel's liberation from Egypt in the exodus and Jesus' life and death stand out as the prototypes for the contemporary human struggle for liberation. These biblical events signify the spiritual significance of the secular struggle for liberation.

The church and the world can no longer be segregated. The church must allow itself to be inhabited and evangelized by the world. "A theology of the Church in the world should be complemented by a theology of the world in the Church" (Gutiérrez). Joining in solidarity with the oppressed against the oppressors is an act of "conversion," and "evangelization" is announcing God's participation in the human struggle for justice.

The importance of Jesus for liberation theology lies in his exemplary struggle for the poor and the outcast. His teaching and action on behalf of the kingdom of God demonstrate the love of God in a historical situation that bears striking similarity to the Latin American context. The meaning of the incarnation is reinterpreted. Jesus is not God in an ontological or metaphysical sense. Essentialism is replaced with the notion of Jesus' relational significance. Jesus shows us the way to God; he reveals the way one becomes a child of God. The meaning of Jesus' incarnation is found in his total immersion in a historical situation of conflict and oppression. His life absolutizes the values of the kingdom—unconditional love, universal forgiveness, and continual reference to the mystery of the Father. But it is impossible to do exactly what Jesus did simply because his specific teaching was oriented to a particular historical period. On one level Jesus irreversibly belongs to the past, but on another level Jesus is the zenith of the evolutionary process. In Jesus history reaches its goal. However, following Jesus is not a matter of retracing his path, trying to adhere to his moral and ethical conduct, as much as it is recreating his path by becoming open to his “dangerous memory,” which calls our path into question. The uniqueness of Jesus’ cross lies not in the fact that God, at a particular point in space and time, experienced the suffering intrinsic to humankind’s sinfulness in order to provide a way of redemption. Jesus’ death is not a vicarious offering on behalf of humankind who deserve God’s wrath. Jesus’ death is unique because he historicizes in exemplary fashion the suffering experienced by God in all the crosses of the oppressed. Liberation theology holds that through Jesus’ life people are brought to the liberating conviction that God does not remain outside of history indifferent to the present course of evil events but that he reveals himself through the authentic medium of the poor and oppressed.

Liberation Theology

Theological Critique. The strength of liberation theology is in its compassion for the poor and its conviction that Christians should not remain passive and indifferent to their plight. Inhumanity between people is sin and deserves the judgment of God and Christian resistance. Liberation theology is a plea for costly discipleship and a reminder that following Jesus has practical social and political consequences.

Liberation theology’s weakness stems from an application of misleading hermeneutical principles and a departure from historic Christian faith. Liberation theology rightly condemns a tradition that attempts to use God for its own ends but wrongly denies God’s definitive self-disclosure in biblical revelation. To argue that our conception of God is determined by the historical situation is to agree with radical secularism in absolutizing the temporal process, making it difficult to distinguish between theology and ideology.

Marxism may be a useful tool in identifying the class struggle that is being waged in many Third World countries, but the question arises whether the role of Marxism is limited to a tool of analysis or whether it has become a political solution. Liberation theology rightly exposes the fact of oppression in society and the fact that there are oppressors and oppressed, but it is wrong to give this alignment an almost ontological status. This may be true in Marxism, but the Christian understands sin and alienation from God as a dilemma confronting both the oppressor and the oppressed. Liberation theology’s emphasis on the poor gives the impression that the poor are not only the object of God’s concern but the salvific and revelatory subject. Only the cry of the oppressed is the voice of God. Everything else is projected as a vain attempt to comprehend God by some self-serving means. This is a confused and misleading notion. Biblical theology reveals that God is for the poor, but it does not teach that the poor are the actual embodiment of God in today’s world. Liberation theology threatens to politicize the gospel to the point that the poor are offered a solution that could be provided with or without Jesus Christ.

Liberation theology stirs Christians to take seriously the social and political impact of Jesus’ life and death but fails to ground Jesus’ uniqueness in the reality of his deity. It claims he is different from us by degree, not by kind, and that his cross is the climax of his vicarious identification with suffering humankind rather than a substitutionary death offered on our behalf to turn away the wrath of God and triumph over sin, death, and the devil. A theology of the cross that isolates Jesus’ death from its particular place in God’s design and shuns the disclosure of its revealed meaning is powerless to bring us to God, hence assuring the perpetuity of our theological abandonment.

D. D. WEBSTER

See also GUTIÉRREZ, GUSTAVO; HEGEL, GEORG WILHELM FRIEDRICH; HOPE, THEOLOGY OF; MOLT-MANN, JÜRGEN; SEGUNDO, JUAN LUIS.

Bibliography. C. E. Armerding, ed., Evangelicals and Liberation; H. Assmann, Theology for a Nomad Church; L. Boff, Jesus Christ Liberator; R. M. Brown, Theology in a New Key: Responding to Liberation Themes; I. Ellacuria, Freedom Made Flesh: The Mission of Christ and His Church; A. Fierro, Militant Gospel: A Critical Introduction to Political Theologies; R. Gibellini, ed., Frontiers of Theology in Latin America; G. Gutiérrez, Theology of Liberation; J. A. Kirk, Liberation Theology: An Evangelical View from the Third World; J. Miquez-Bonino, Doing Theology in a Revolutionary Situation; J. P. Miranda, Marx and the Bible; P. E. Sigmund, Liberation Theology at the Crossroads.

Liberty, Christian. To live is to choose; to choose is to live. The exercise of choice, however, does not in itself make us free. Choice is only the shuttle that weaves the fabric of our lives into a shroud of death or a chrysalis of new life, depending on which “god” defines the values, goals, and purposes that attract our choices. Freedom, or liberty (the terms are here synonymous), is not that we can choose but what we choose; freedom is not, then, a status but an achievement. Indeed, the freedom of the Christian is a divine gift. It is a fatal delusion to confuse ability to choose with an illusory right to choose as we please—all choice is an obedience to some “god.” Christian freedom resides in obedience to the only God in whose service is liberty.

Christian liberty emerges out of duty. The sense of duty has its origin in God, who lays the demands of his law upon everyone through the witness of conscience. Some seek relief from the divine presence in assorted forms of pseudo-freedom—philosophies, mysticisms, wealth, power, rebellion. Others pursue oblivion via drugs, busyness, dropping out, the abuse of others. But the witness of God is never stilled, and detached from duty choice becomes freedom’s counterfeit “license”—slavery to fad, fashion, passion, whim, greed, megalomania. And license is the dance of death.

The human predicament consists in a person's uneasy awareness of the divine pressure for obedience to God's law without finding within one's self the resources for obeying it. The good news, which is the gospel, is that God himself opens the way to obedience through faith in Jesus Christ. Christian liberty thus bears two faces: (1) freedom from human disability and enslavement to the devil; and (2) freedom for striving to know and do God's will.

Freedom From. "He has rescued us from the dominion of darkness and brought us into the kingdom of the Son he loves" (Col. 1:13; cf. John 8:32, 36; Eph. 2:2).

God liberates in Christ. The paradigm of that liberation is the rescue of Israel from Egypt. Unhappily, the "Egypt event" has become a slogan for liberation theologies that confuse "freedom from" (which by itself is license) with Christian liberty.

Jesus illustrates in physical terms the nature of the liberation he effects through his miracles. He calls the dead to life, illumining the fundamental miracle of the believer's rebirth by the Word through water and Spirit (John 3:5). He makes the deaf to hear—as the believer now can hear his Word. He opens the eyes of the blind—as the newborn now sees all in the light of the Word. He makes the lame to walk—as the believer now walks in his way. He cures the bodily ill—as the Christian is freed for a more abundant life. He loosens the tongue of the mute—so believers can sing his praise and make their witness. Christ's miracles vividly illustrate the Christian's "freedom from."

Still more, Jesus frees us from sinking under the burden of suffering and hardship by transmuting these (for those who see) into divine pedagogy (Prov. 3:11–12; Heb. 12:6). He liberates the weak and the poor from the agonies of envy by equalizing all (who hear) before his cross; and he draws the sting of physical death and the seeming triumph of the tomb (for all who believe) by the power of his resurrection (1 Cor. 15:54–57).

In Christ the believer is liberated from servitude to the gods of this age, but we only enter into a full realization of this gracious liberty as we strive daily to live positively for God.

Freedom For. The pivot that hinges "freedom from" to "freedom for" is the divine law, written by God on tablets of stone and the flesh of the human heart, summarized in the Decalogue, to which much of the Bible is commentary.

First, the law pressures us into acknowledgment of sin (Rom. 3:20), and thus drives us through repentance to Christ (Gal. 3:24). Then, once liberated in Christ, the believer finds in the law the goal, values, and purposes summed up in the term love (John 14:21, 23; Gal. 5:14). And love weaves, by the power of the Spirit, our choices into freedom.

In a word, the God who liberates us from Egypt sets before our feet the way of life as illumined by his law (Exod. 20:2–17; Ps. 119:105), and grants us, through Christ, the gift of the Spirit by whom we can be free—that is, we can seek to do what God commands.

"Freedom from" by grace and through Christ becomes in the life of the believer a blessed "freedom for" by the Spirit and in Christ. Seeking daily to walk in the light of God's Word, along the way which is Christ himself, Christ's redeemed believer comes to realize in his own experience (where freedom alone can be understood) the Lord's gracious promise: "If you hold to my teaching, you are really my disciples. Then you will know the truth, and the truth will set you free" (John 8:31–32). L. R. DE KOSTER

See also ETHICAL SYSTEMS, CHRISTIAN; ETHICS, BIBLICAL.

Bibliography. K. Barth, Humanity of God; E. J. Dempsey-Douglass, Woman, Freedom, and Calvin; A. C. Guelzo, Edwards on the Will: A Century of Theological Debate; E. Jungel, Freedom of a Christian; M. Luther, Christian Liberty; P. Toon, Free to Obey.

Liberty, Religious. See TOLERANCE.

Liddon, Henry Parry (1829–1890). A leader of the later Oxford Movement and perhaps the most popular Anglican preacher during the last third of the nineteenth century. Born in North Stoneham, Hampshire, he attended King's College School, London, and Christ Church College, Oxford, where he was graduated in 1850. Following his ordination as a priest in 1853, he served as vice principal at Cuddleston Theological College near Oxford (1854–59) and St. Edmund's Hall at Oxford (1859–62) before returning to Christ Church College to assume permanent residence (1862–90).

As an undergraduate, Liddon converted from the evangelicalism of his youth to Anglo-Catholicism under the influence of his mentor, Edward Pusey. Later the two worked closely together as Oxford theologians and, with John Keble, as leaders of the Oxford (or Tractarian) Movement after the defection of John Henry Newman. Liddon's role in the movement was less that of defending Catholic doctrine than of serving as the chief High Church critic of the mounting liberalizing influence in the church and the secularizing influence in higher education. He vigorously fought efforts to diminish the acceptance of the Athanasian and Nicene creeds, and his 1866 Bampton Lectures defending the divinity of Christ attracted wide attention. Crowds flocked to hear his long but clear, engaging, and persuasive sermons at Oxford and at St. Paul's in London, where he became a canon in 1870. His teaching and preaching slowed the departure from creedal Christianity in England, although when he died, in many respects the Oxford Movement died with him.

W. C. RINGENBERG

See also ANGLO-CATHOLICISM; OXFORD MOVEMENT.

Bibliography. H. P. Liddon, Divinity of Our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; Life of Edward Bouverie Pusey; J. O. Johnston, Life and Letters of Henry Parry Liddon; G. W. E. Russell, Dr. Liddon.

Lie, Lying. A lie is an intentional deception or falsehood. A false or erroneous statement should be classified as a lie only if it includes an intention to deceive. Nor is withholding the truth necessarily a lie, for lying is actively, intentionally conveying a falsehood. While the term "lie" might be appropriate to a broad range of behavior ("living a lie," "lying eyes"), it is most specifically a problem for conscious, intentional communication such as speech and writing. Not only personal speech but corporate advertising, political rhetoric, and the claims of religious groups must be scrutinized in an effort to avoid being guilty of lying.

All false witness and lying is prohibited to the people of God (Exod. 20:16; Prov. 12:22; Col. 3:9). The extreme seriousness of the offense is indicated in Scripture by the fate of Ananias and Sapphira (Acts 5:1–11) and the place of unrepentant liars in the final judgment (Rev. 21:8; 22:15). The biblical opposition to all lying originates in the fact that the people of God owe their life and allegiance to "the only true God" (John 17:3). Jesus Christ is "the truth" (John 14:6). The Holy Spirit is "the Spirit of truth" (John 16:13). The Word is always "the truth" (John 17:17). Conversely, Satan is "a liar and the father of lies" (John 8:44). Fundamental to human sin and alienation from God is the choice to "exchange the truth of God for a lie" (Rom. 1:25). There is no middle ground: the people of God must "put off falsehood and speak truthfully" (Eph. 4:25). The choice is between the way of God and the way of Satan.

Lying is wrong first of all, then, because it alienates us from the God who is truth itself. Second, lying destroys community and interpersonal relations (Prov. 25:18; 26:18–19, 28). This is so not only because of the immediate injury to the recipient of the lie but also because the trust that is essential to community is undermined. A third reason lying is wrong is that it destroys the liar. The contradiction between the liar's knowledge of the truth and his or her participation in the lie is a dehumanizing surrender of personal wholeness and integrity. Furthermore, one lie inexorably leads to further lies to cover up the first.

This web of falsehood produces a kind of bondage that is the opposite situation to the knowledge and practice of the truth that sets one free.

This general perspective on lying is very clear and consistent throughout the canon of Scripture. The difficulty with this general approach is raised by situations in which lies appear to be justified after all—either by obedience to a special command of God or by the necessity to violate the prohibition against lying in order to obey another biblical principle (e.g., the preservation of life). Among these cases are Abraham's two lies about Sarah being his sister (Gen. 12:11–19; 20:2–13), Rahab's lie to protect Israel's spies (Josh. 2:4–6), and the deception of the midwives in Egypt (Exod. 1:17–19). Abraham's situation falls into the category of a lie apparently justified in the interest of saving a life. Rahab and the midwives raise another common difficulty: whether a lie is justified by the national interest (e.g., during wartime).

One approach (Thielicke, Bonhoeffer) to this set of problems has been to stress the strong relational and contextual character of the biblical teaching on truth and falsehood. Fundamental to this kind of approach is the affirmation that truth is ultimately the person of Jesus Christ. A lie is thus an intentional denial or contradiction of the truth and reality of Jesus Christ in a given situation. It is Jesus Christ to whom truth is owed and by whom truth is measured, not independent, abstract facts in themselves. It follows from this presupposition that both truth and falsehood are also related to one's neighbor. "You shall not give false testimony against your neighbor" (Exod. 20:16). You shall "speak the truth in love" (Eph. 4:15). In short, truth and falsehood are not controlled by isolated facts alone but by those facts in relation to God and to one's neighbor.

The other approach to the problem of the "justified lie" is that of casuistry (Murray). Casuistry attempts to make exceedingly careful distinctions in order to vindicate the principle that one ought never to lie under any circumstances. Thus, it is argued that Rahab is not commended for her lie (Heb. 11:31; James 2:25) but rather for her faith and works. Her choice of sinful means (the lie) is not endorsed, though her basic faith is. A similar argument is made in the case of Jacob and Rebekah's deception of Isaac and Esau (Gen. 27). Samuel's deception of the elders at Bethlehem is vindicated in that he stated one truth ("I come here to sacrifice") while concealing his primary purpose—to anoint David as the next king (1 Sam. 16).

Both the relational and casuistic approaches to the problem of lying are susceptible to exploitation in the interest of self-justification and the rationalization of subterfuge and falsehood. Yet both approaches preserve important principles by which situations must be judged. With the casuist we must strive to remain true to the facts as we know them. With the relational ethicist we must strive to speak the truth (and avoid lying) with the interests of God and our neighbors always in view.

D. W. GILL

See also CASUISTRY; ETHICS, BIBLICAL; TRUTH.

Bibliography. A. Flavelle, NBD 734–35; J. M. Gustafson and J. T. Laney, eds., On Being Responsible; J. Murray, Principles of Conduct; H. Thielicke, Theological Ethics.

Life. God as the Source. As the one being who has no cause outside himself, God is frequently disclosed in both the OT and NT as “the living God” (e.g., Deut. 5:26; Josh. 3:10; Ps. 84:2; Matt. 26:63; Rom. 9:26). “But the LORD is the true God; he is the living God, the eternal King” (Jer. 10:10). “As the LORD lives” was a common formula in oath-taking (e.g., 1 Sam. 14:39, 45; 19:6) that characterized God’s nature as dynamic in contrast with idols that are mute (Hab. 2:18) and cannot move (Isa. 40:20; cf. 44:9–20; 1 John 5:21). As the living God he “gives all men life and breath and everything else” (Acts 17:25; cf. Gen. 2:7). And he can therefore withdraw life at his will (Deut. 30:19; cf. Judg. 13:3; Job 34:14–15). All life, whatever its expression, has its source in him.

Fuller study of the OT passages shows that the phrase “the living God” was not intended simply to contrast the God of Israel with the dead idols of the heathen. It is specifically a positive description of him as present and active in the world, and in particular among his chosen people as creator and sustainer of their national existence, as well as being himself the never-failing energy of its life both physical and spiritual.

In the NT the very life that is God’s is shared by his Son. Peter’s declaration (Matt. 16:16) amounts to the confession that the living God is now revealed in him, and that he is thus the giver of eternal life to such as receive him (cf. John 6:68–69). In John 6:57 Jesus declared that “the living Father” had sent him, “and I live because of the Father.” In living his life in the flesh, which involved human weakness, struggle, and suffering, Jesus depended on the Father every moment for sustenance and support. In thus referring his life to the living Father, Jesus made explicit the fact that all life on the human plane derives from God, is dependent on him, and is responsible to him.

In the Old Testament. The two most important words translated “life” by the English versions are ḥay, usually in its plural form; ḥayyim; and nepeš. Of these ḥayyim is by far the most numerous, while nepeš occurs 754 times. The LXX distinguishes between them by translating the former as zōē and the latter as psychē. The term rûah, found 378 times, often as a synonym for nepeš (cf. Isa. 26:9), means generally “life energy.” As the “breath principle” of both humans and beasts (Eccles. 3:19; cf. Gen. 6:17; 7:15, 22), it has its source in God. Sometimes the presence of rûah is contrasted with its absence, which is a state of death (cf. Gen. 45:27; 1 Sam. 30:12; Ps. 104:29).

Human Life. As existing, humans have ḥayyim. Broadly the term connotes active existence with the idea of movement prominent (cf. Gen. 7:21; Lev. 11:10 KJV; Ezek. 47:9 KJV; Acts 17:28). The opposite of this life movement is inertia. When God’s Spirit moved, life came to be (Gen. 1:2). Ecclesiastes declares that this life is God-given (5:18; cf. 8:15), and the psalmist speaks of “the God of my life” (42:8), who redeems from the pit (103:4; cf. Lam. 3:58).

As living, humans have nepeš. The word is usually translated “soul,” sometimes as “breath,” and as “life” ninety-nine times. Although common to humans and beasts (Job 12:10), nepeš in humans expresses their existence as living beings apart from God (cf. Gen. 2:7; 12:13; Exod. 12:15) in contradistinction to rûah, which expresses humans as drawing life from God. Yet humans exist as fully integrated beings, living psychosomatic unities.

Life is thus God’s supreme gift. It is the “blessing” of which the opposite, death, is the curse (Deut. 30:19). Because it is good, life has “a moral and spiritual connotation” (Orr). To do good in the love and fear of God is truly to live (Cf. Pss. 34:12; 36:9; Prov. 10:11).

Afterlife. There is no clear and constant affirmation of an individual future life in the OT. This may be because of the preoccupation of the nation with its own survival. Yet the belief must always have been in Jewish theological thought; the personal translation of Enoch and Elijah was familiar, as was the Mosaic account of humankind’s creation. According to Josephus, it was widely accepted in Judaism that “souls have an immortal vigor.” At times the hope did shine forth, dimly and briefly. If the hope of the future life is not certainly present in Psalms 71:20 and 73:23–26, the language of Psalm 16 concerning “the path of life” (v. 11) does readily lend itself to such an interpretation.

In the New Testament. Three words are translated “life”: bios, zōē, and psychē. Bios, the few times it is used, connotes life as the present state of existence (Luke 8:14; 1 Tim. 2:2; 1 Pet. 4:2) as well as the resources by which it is maintained (“living,” Mark 12:44 KJV; Luke 15:12, 30; 21:4 KJV; “material possessions,” 1 John 3:17).

Zōē, a frequently used word, corresponds generally with the OT ḥayyim to denote the state of one possessed of vitality, one who is animate. The term embodies all conceptions of what constitutes life (Luke 12:15; Acts 8:33; 17:25; 1 Pet. 3:10) and so is constant in the phrase “eternal life” (John 3:15–16, 36; 4:14; Rom. 6:23; 1 Tim. 6:12).

Psychē generally equates with the OT nepeš as the animating principle of life (Acts 20:10) and thus stands for a person’s “self” (cf. Acts 2:43; 3:23; Rom. 13:1). Psychē may specify life as presently lived on earth (cf. Matt. 10:28; 16:25) and life eternal in the kingdom of God (Luke 21:19; Heb. 10:39).

Present Life. Jesus regarded life as a sacred trust from God, and in that realization he himself lived. He did not come to destroy life but to save it (Luke 9:56 κτν) and to give it overflowing zest (John 10:10). He decried worrying about the means of living (Matt. 6:25) since even the humblest forms of life were his Father’s concern (Matt. 10:31; Luke 12:24). True living is not a matter of bread alone but of obedience to the word of God (Matt. 4:4). To seek to secure one’s own life in selfish disregard of its spiritual dimension is finally to lose it; while to lose it for Christ’s sake is to save it (Matt. 10:39; 16:25).

Eternal Life. The concept of eternal life is present in the teaching of Jesus (Matt. 19:29; 25:46; cf. 18:8–9; 19:17, and parallels), but it figures most prominently in the Johannine writings and means more than mere everlastingness. It is a life of a new quality—the God-type life. It is best understood in contrast to death, to that which is perishing (John 3:16; 5:24; 10:28). Life apart from God is the ethical destruction of the soul, the forfeiture of one’s true destiny as a child of God. But the eternal life of which Christ is the embodiment and the giver is one of fellowship with God, which by its nature transcends the limits of space and time. John stresses the present possession of this life. It is something the believer has (John 3:36; 6:47; 1 John 5:12–13, 16). This Christ-communicated life is essentially divine (John 5:26; cf. 1:4), while belief is the one absolute subjective condition of its impartation (John 3:36; 5:24; 6:40, 47).

When expressing the significance of salvation in Christ in terms of life, Paul has the same general account as does John. He uses the phrase nine times. Of this life Christ is at once its source and mediator (Rom. 6:23)—indeed the two, Christ and life, are virtually identified (Gal. 2:20; Phil. 1:21; Col. 3:3–4). Sometimes Paul uses the simple term “life” as containing all the implications of eternal life (Rom. 5:17; 2 Cor. 5:4; Phil. 2:16).

This life is not, however, imposed on anyone; it has to be taken hold of (1 Tim. 6:12, 19). It is procured by faith (1 Tim. 1:16), while the inward and outward evidences of its possession are outlined in Romans 6 and 2 Corinthians 4 (cf. vv. 11, 16).

Phrases such as “a new life” (Rom. 6:4), “the new way of the Spirit” (Rom. 7:6; cf. Gal. 5:25), “life in Christ Jesus” (Rom. 6:23; 2 Tim. 3:12; cf.

Rom. 8:2; 2 Cor. 4:10–11) are alternatives for eternal life.

Resurrection Life. Eternal life is not only a present possession, it carries the hope of future realization. The promise of godliness is for both the life that now is and that which is to come (1 Tim. 4:8). Paul gives prominence to the future aspect and coordinates it with immortality (Rom. 2:7; cf. 2 Cor. 5:4; 2 Tim. 1:10), while contrasting it with death (Rom. 6:23) and destruction (Gal. 6:8). As himself the “resurrection and the life” (John 11:25), Christ has “destroyed death and has brought life and immortality to light through the gospel” (2 Tim. 1:10). The hope of life forever is thus assured in him (2 Tim. 1:1; Titus 1:2; 3:7). Christ is the believer’s life both present and future (Col. 3:3–4; cf. Gal. 2:20; Phil. 1:21), and because Christ lives so shall the believer live also (John 14:19). Hope in Christ is not for this life only (1 Cor. 15:19), for at his coming again the earthly tent in which we now live will be exchanged for a heavenly dwelling (1 Cor. 15:42–44; 2 Cor. 5:1–2) and “so that what is mortal may be swallowed up by life” (2 Cor. 5:4).

H. D. McDONALD

See also ETERNAL LIFE; RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD.

Bibliography. R. Bultmann, TDNT 2:832–75; J. Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion; E. E. Ellis, NBD 697–701; J. G. Hoare, Life in St. John’s Gospel; A. R. Johnson, Validity of the Individual in the Thought of Ancient Israel; D. M. Johnson, Human Life and Human Worth; H. D. McDonald, Christian View of Man; J. Orr, ISBE 3:1888–90; O. A. Piper, IDB 3:124–30; H. W. Robinson, Corporate Personality in Ancient Israel; W. B. Wallis, ZPEB 3:927–32.

Life, Book of. See BOOK OF LIFE.

Life, Everlasting. See ETERNAL LIFE.

Light. To the ancient Hebrew, surrounded by sun worshipers, light was a holy thing, the natural symbol for deity. In the OT God is pictured as creating light (Gen. 1:3) and being clothed with light (Ps. 104:2), and the term is used in conjunction with life to express that ultimate blessedness God gives to people (Ps. 36:9). In the NT phōs is employed as an expression for the eternally real in contrast to the skotos of sin and unreality. Some trace this contrast back to the antithesis between the realms of Ahura Mazda and Angra Mainyu in Zoroastrianism, and it certainly colors the doctrine of the two spirits in the Dead Sea Scrolls. Plato associated the sun with the idea of the good, and Philo regarded the Creator as the archetype of light.

In 1 John 1:5 it is stated absolutely that, “God is light.” James calls God, as creator of heavenly bodies, “father of the lights,” 1:17, adding the caveat that he does not change position or suffer eclipse as they do. The pastorals recall the majesty of God on Sinai by stating that he dwells in “unapproachable light,” 1 Timothy 6:16. Light in the NT is more often spoken of as residing in the Logos and is described (John 1:3–4) as the life of men. It enters the world, shines in the darkness of error, illumines every man; but only those who receive the Logos become children of light and ultimately enter the Holy City whose “lamp” is the Lamb (Rev. 21:23).

By becoming incarnate the Logos becomes “light of the world,” John 8:12. In rabbinic tradition this phrase had been applied to Torah and temple and did not amount to a claim to deity; but for John it implies that Christ is the “true light”, the ultimate reality. By contrast there are many lesser lights or copies of reality, who derive their transitory flame from the Logos; such a “lamp” was the Baptist (John 5:35). The true Light bears witness to himself, because light is self-evidencing, and by light we see light. The lesser lights witness to the Logos.

Paul’s conversion is essentially an encounter with the “light out of heaven,” Acts 9:3. The scales of sinful darkness fall from his eyes, and he is commissioned as a light of the Gentiles (Acts 13:47). He puts on the armor of light to contend with the rulers of world darkness, who are led by Satan, metamorphosed into a parody angel of light (2 Cor. 11:14). He exhorts his converts to walk as children of light (Eph. 5:8).

During the exodus God’s light was displayed to Israel as his shekinah glory in cloud and fire. Phos is also found associated with doxa (“glory”) in the LXX of Isaiah 60:1–3. The transfiguration accounts contain both themes. Christ’s garments become white as “light,” Matthew 17:2, and both Peter and John insist that they behold the doxa of God on the mount (John 1:14; 2 Pet. 1:17). In the fourth Gospel the light of Christ’s glory is manifested not simply on the mount, but by all his signs, and issues in a “judgment” or discrimination by light: evildoers hate the light; truth-seekers come to the light; when light appears, all people pass judgment on themselves (John 3:19–21).

D. H. TONGUE

Bibliography. H. Conzelmann, TDNT 9:310–358; C. H. Dodd, Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel; A. Dupont-Sommer, Jewish Sect of Qumran; E. R. Goodenough, By Light, Light; H. C. Hahn et al., NIDNTT 2:484–96; D. Tarrant, “Greek Metaphors of Light,” SJT 14:172–74.

Likeness of God. See IMAGE OF GOD.

Limbo. Derived from a Germanic word for a hem or fringe, limbo was devised by medieval theologians as the place or state of those souls after death who did not fit neatly into either heaven or hell. In fact, there were two limbos. The limbo of the fathers (limbus patrum) was for the souls of the OT saints; Christ’s descent into hell in the creed was interpreted as his liberating these souls and taking them to heaven. In Renaissance art the limbo of the fathers was depicted as a large prison cell. More important was the limbo of infants (limbus infantum). The majority of children born before the development of modern medicine died without attaining a maturity sufficient to commit serious personal sin. Augustine believed that all children of Adam have original sin, and hence infants who die without baptism are consigned to hell, although their punishment there will be mild. Many medieval theologians such as Peter Lombard and Thomas Aquinas considered the Augustinian view too harsh and postulated limbo as a perpetual state free from pain of sense but without supernatural salvation and the enjoyment of God. Partly this view paralleled the development of the concept of original sin as privation of grace rather than as positive guilt.

The Councils of Lyons and Florence stated that those who die with only original sin will be punished differently from those with personal sin. Pius VI rejected the claim of the Jansenist Synod of Pistoia that belief in limbo was Pelagian; but belief in limbo has never been defined by the Roman Catholic Church, although it was the dominant teaching of Catholic theologians for many centuries. Theologians in the Calvinist tradition had little need to postulate a limbo: unbaptized infants go to heaven or hell as God has predestined them.

Many twentieth-century Catholic theologians have tended to argue for the salvation of unbaptized infants, some postulating an illumination of the infant at the moment of death and a choice for or against God. Others see death itself as a sort of saving martyrdom. Some argue that the parents or the church provide a kind of baptism by desire. Others see limbo as lasting only until the general judgment, at which souls in limbo are either united to Christ or obdurately reject him.

J. P. DONNELLY

See also INTERMEDIATE STATE.

Bibliography. J. Dyer, Limbo: Unsettled Question; W. A. Van Roo, “Infants Dying Without Baptism: A Survey of Recent Literature and Determination of the State of the Question,” Greg 35:406–73; V. Wilkin, From Limbo to Heaven.

Limited Atonement. See ATONEMENT, EXTENT OF.

Lindbeck, George (b. 1927). Historical theologian at Yale, trained in medieval thought, Lutheran ecumenist and observer at the Second Vatican Council, and best known for his theological work self-characterized as postliberal (or Yale theology).

Lindbeck's discontent with the development of Protestantism after the Reformation is coupled with his ecumenical focus on the relationship of Catholicism and early Lutheranism as a reform movement within the church of the West (he participated in numerous Lutheran–Roman Catholic dialogues and joint commissions in the United States and internationally). Advocate of a historical and dogmatic version of Reformation Christianity, and against the modern versions of conservative (biblicist) and liberal (experiential) Christianity, Lindbeck stresses the communal and confessional Christian tradition as the starting point for theology.

Lindbeck's response to the waning influence of the Enlightenment is linked with his rejection of the modern effort to establish a cultural Christianity and the justification of theology on the premise of a foundational religious anthropology and a historical-critical hermeneutic. This has led Lindbeck to point out the neglect of premodern hermeneutics and theological method within modern Christianity. His concern with canonical and figural scriptural interpretation is linked with his interest to recognize the abiding importance of Israel (encompassing contemporary Judaism) and Israel's scriptures for Christian identity. Scripture is a canonical narrative unified in a communal reading of Jesus Christ as the center of its interpretation. Thus, both the church and Israel are fulfilled in the story of Christ, so the church shares rather than fulfills the story of Israel.

Lindbeck has also situated himself between the polarization of right and left in both Protestant and Catholic theology, and his ecumenism has focused on reconciling historic Christian communities and retrieving a premodern and unitive manner of regarding the Bible. His 1984 work Nature of Theology offered an ecumenical theory in which doctrine was regarded as communally authoritative rules of discourse, attitude, and action. Doctrines in this theory function like cultures or languages, forming the conceptualization of normative idiom(s) measuring skills and governing practices of religious believers. He contrasted this cultural-linguistic model with theories that hold doctrine to be symbols of inner feelings, attitudes, or existential orientations (typical of liberal theology after Schleiermacher), or cognitive propositions that statically correspond to supposedly universally established realities (typical among early modern and contemporary conservative movements).

Lindbeck's work and influence is widespread, and evangelicals are both appreciative and cautious about his characterization of doctrine in socio-linguistic terms. His confessional commitments situate him firmly in the Protestant tradition, and his efforts in ecumenism and dialogue have distinguished him in the larger Western religious tradition.

J. P. CALLAHAN

Bibliography. G. A. Lindbeck, "Barth and Textuality," Theology Today 43; Dialogue on the Way; Future of Roman Catholic Theology; Infallibility; "Scripture, Consensus, and Community" in Biblical Interpretation in Crisis, R. Neuhaus, ed.; B. D. Marshall, Theology and Dialogue: Essays in Conversation with George Lindbeck; K. Surin, ed., Modern Theology, Special Issue: George Lindbeck's The Nature of Doctrine (January 1988).

Literalism. A commitment to strict exactness of words or meanings in translation or interpretation. A literal translation seeks to represent as accurately as possible in one language words written in another. By way of contrast, a paraphrase translation seeks only to reproduce the meaning (or the translator's understanding of the meaning) of the original.

Most often literalism is used in connection with biblical interpretation. Generally it seeks to discover the author's intent by focusing on the author's words in their plain, most obvious sense. The Jewish rabbis practiced an extreme form of literalism that stressed external and even minor points of OT or traditional requirements. They gave little thought to the intent or purpose that lay behind the texts with which they dealt and so received the condemnation of Jesus (Matt. 23:23–24; Mark 7:3–23). Medieval interpreters sought a fourfold meaning (the quadriga)—literal, moral, allegorical, and anagogical—for every text. The plain, literal meaning was considered the lowest and least important level of meaning and received little attention. Disregard for the literal meaning led many of these theologians into sometimes wild speculations and vastly different allegorical or mystical interpretations for the same text.

Luther and the other Reformers, rejecting multiple meanings for biblical passages, sought the single sense. This Luther described as "the very simplest, . . . the literal, ordinary, natural sense." Literalism in this sense remains as the central focus of conservative Protestant interpretation theory.

Since the Reformation at least two main trajectories of thought have come to be associated with literalism. One attitude seems akin to that of the rabbis. It approaches the text in such a strict, unimaginative way that word and letter are permitted to suppress the spirit of the text. Interpretation becomes a mechanical, grammatical, logical process. In extreme forms this type of literalism makes no room for special consideration for figurative literary forms such as poetry or metaphor nor for the possibility of unique situations addressed by the author.

Other contemporary adherents of literalism, no less devoted to finding the true meaning of the text as intended by the author; employ different attitudes and methodologies. They seek to apply interpretative principles and rules with a sense of appropriateness and sensitivity. In addition to grammatical and philosophical investigations, they employ information about the author's historical and cultural situation that may aid in interpretation. Differing literary forms and genres are handled with methods suitable to their type. Individual passages are considered within their immediate context in the writing in which they appear as well as within the totality of Scripture. These interpreters focus on words and externals in order that these may lead them to the meaning and spirit of the text. For them "literalism" means to seek the plain meaning without exaggeration, distortion, or inaccuracy.

J. J. SCOTT JR.

See also INTERPRETATION OF THE BIBLE.

Literal Sense of Scripture. See INTERPRETATION OF THE BIBLE.

Liturgical Year. See CHRISTIAN YEAR; WORSHIP IN THE CHURCH.

Liturgies. See WORSHIP IN THE CHURCH.

Lloyd-Jones, David Martyn (1899–1981). English preacher and writer. His birth in Welsh-speaking Wales and Calvinistic Methodist upbringing were early and formative influences in his life. Medical studies placed him on the threshold of a distinguished career as a physician, but in 1926 he forsook medicine to respond to the call of God to preach. He began his ministry, without formal theological training, in a small Presbyterian church in Wales. During the following thirteen years he read widely, honed his evangelical convictions and preaching skills, and gained an increasing reputation as a skillful pastor and masterful preacher. The year 1939 brought a call to copastor the Westminster Chapel in central London. By 1943 and for the next thirty-two years, he was the sole pastor of what was to become the most influential evangelical pulpit in England.

Lloyd-Jones's influence was forged by several strong theological convictions. The passionate core of his theology was the glory and sovereignty of God. His was a supremely God-centered universe, made known by the authoritative revelation of the Bible. For Lloyd-Jones, Christianity was not a religion of speculation, but one of objective revelation. His biblically elevated view of God and suspicion of sinful humanity led him to the absolute necessity of the work of the Holy Spirit. He understood Christian life and ministry as preeminently supernatural in character. Finally, he was completely persuaded of the centrality of the church in God's purposes. His was a faith committed to local churches as the common and ordinary means God had ordained to convert sinners and sanctify saints.

Such views brought both great influence and controversy. His passion for the pastoral nature of preaching impacted preachers worldwide. His stand against the tide of subjective and human-centered gospel presentations gave fellow evangelicals confidence in the power of biblical truth. He was instrumental in the formation and grounding of the burgeoning student movement of groups such as InterVarsity Fellowship. Ecumenical efforts in Britain eventually led him to part company with such men as John Stott and J. I. Packer. Finally, his many books gave him a worldwide audience that continues to hear him today.

J. MITCHELL JR.

Bibliography. I. H. Murray, David Martyn Lloyd-Jones.

Locke, John (1632–1704). English philosopher often associated with early modern empiricism and a staunch defender of free inquiry. The son of an attorney, he was educated at Oxford for the ministry, studied chemistry and medicine, and served the family of the Earl of Shaftesbury as doctor, secretary, and tutor. His study of Descartes awakened his interest in philosophy, while his study of Hobbes helped form his ideas. A rationalist at heart, Locke ironically freed philosophy from many of its rationalistic presuppositions, and his philosophic system is a combination of Christian rationalism and empiricism.

In Essay Concerning Human Understanding (1690), Locke depicted the human mind as a blank slate, a sheet of white paper "void of all characters, without any ideas." The two fountains of knowledge from which ideas flow are sense-experience and self-reflection. By means of reflection one perceives one's own states and activities, while by sensation one ascertains the effects of other things. Locke dismissed Descartes's Platonist conception of "innate ideas," declaring that knowledge through reason was a "natural revelation." Such knowledge through sense-experience or self-reflection was never absolute or final, but probable and reasonable. Thus, Locke spoke of the "reasonableness" of Christianity, argued for the existence of God, and maintained that God's law gives humans their rule of morality. Locke appears to be more interested in the self-reflection aspect, and later empiricists would criticize him for forsaking direct mechanistic conceptions for reflective analysis.

Locke's place in the history of theology is clearly demonstrated in his Reasonableness of Christianity (1695). In this treatise he clearly states that the essence of Christianity is the acknowledge of Jesus Christ as the Messiah, while emphasizing that reason is the final criterion in ascertaining the truth of the Bible. Jesus was sent into the world to give true knowledge of God and to provide an example for humans, and Locke maintained that even Christ's miracles were not out of harmony with reason. Locke admitted that Christian dogma was incapable of irrefutable proof but declared that Christ confirmed a moral law already apparent from nature (a law also enforced by rewards or punishments in another world). The broader implications of this thought are found in his social contract theory, which postulated an ethical society of those who voluntarily accepted a set of moral principles advantageous to society and to self.

While the extremely popular Locke insisted that he was not a deist and that he did not want to dispense with Scripture as revelation (the last years of his life he devoted to study of the Bible), others would carry his ideas to these extremes. His philosophical and theological thoughts would provide a bridge to the natural religion of deism.

D. A. RAUSCH

See also DEISM; EMPIRICISM; ENLIGHTENMENT, THE; RATIONALISM.

Bibliography. R. I. Aaron, John Locke; J. Colman, John Locke's Moral Philosophy; J. Dunn, Locke; J. J. Jenkins, Understanding Locke; W. M. Spellman, John Locke and the Problem of Depravity; R. S. Woolhouse, Locke.

Logical Positivism. See POSITIVISM.

Logos. The most usual Greek term for "word" in the NT; occasionally with other meanings (e.g., account, reason, motive); specifically in the prologue to the fourth Gospel (John 1:1, 14) and perhaps in other Johannine writings (1 John 1:1; Rev. 19:13) it is used of the Second Person of the Trinity. In ordinary Greek parlance it also means reason.

Johannine Usage. According to John 1:1–18, the logos was already present at the creation ("in the beginning" relates to Gen. 1:1), in the closest relationship with God ("with" = pros, not meta or syn). Indeed, the logos was God (not "divine," as Moffatt—the anarthrous predicate is grammatically required but may also indicate a distinction between the persons). This relationship with God was effective in the moment of creation (1:2). The entire work of creation was carried out through ("by" = dia, v. 3) the logos. The source of life (1:4, probable punctuation) and light of the world (cf. 9:5) and of every person (1:9, probable punctuation), and still continuing (present tense in 1:5) this work, the logos became incarnate, revealing the sign of God's presence and his nature (1:14).

The prologue thus sets out three main facets of the logos and its activity: its divinity and intimate relationship with the Father, its work as agent of creation, and its incarnation.

In 1 John 1:1 "the logos of life," seen, heard, and handled, may refer to the personal Christ of the apostolic preaching or impersonally to the message about him. Revelation 19:13 pictures Christ as a conquering general called the logos of God. As in Hebrews 4:12, it is the OT picture of the shattering effects of God's word (cf. the imagery of v. 15) that is in mind.

Background of the Term. Old Testament. Diverse factors give some preparation for John's usage. God creates by the word (Gen. 1:3; Ps. 33:9), and his word is sometimes spoken of semi-personally (Pss. 107:20; 147:15, 18); it is active, dynamic, achieving its intended results (Isa. 50:10–11). The wisdom of God is personified (Prov. 8—note especially vv. 22–31 on wisdom's work in creation). The angel of the Lord is sometimes spoken of as God, sometimes as distinct (cf. Judg. 2:1). God's name is semipersonalized (Exod. 23:21; 1 Kings 8:29).

Palestinian Judaism. Besides the personification of wisdom (cf. Ecclus. 24), the rabbis used the word mē'mrā', "word," as a periphrasis for "God." This usage occurs in the Targums.

Greek Philosophy. Among the philosophers the precise significance of logos varies, but it stands usually for "reason" and reflects the Greek conviction that divinity cannot come into direct contact with matter. The logos is a shock absorber between God and the universe, and the manifestation of the divine principle in the world. In the Stoic tradition the logos is both divine reason and reason distributed in the world (and thus in the mind).

Hellenistic Judaism. In Alexandrian Judaism there was full personification of the word in creation (Wis. Sol. 9:1; 16:12). In the writings of Philo, who, though a Jew, drank deeply from Platonism and Stoicism, the term appears more than 1,300 times. The logos is "the image" (Col. 1:15); the first form (prōtōgonos), the exact representation (charaktēr, cf. Heb. 1:3), of God; and even "Second God" (deuteros theos; cf. Eusebius, Praeparatio Evangelica 7. 13); the means whereby God creates the world from the great waste; and, moreover, the way whereby God is known (i.e., with the mind; closer knowledge could be received directly, in ecstasy).

Hermetic Literature. Logos occurs frequently in the Hermetica. Though post-Christian, these are influenced by Hellenistic Judaism. They indicate the logos doctrine, in something like Philonic terms, in pagan mystical circles.

Sources of John's Doctrine. John 1 differs radically from philosophic usage. For the Greeks, logos was essentially reason; for John, essentially word. Language common to Philo and the NT has led many to see John as Philo's debtor. But one refers naturally to Philo's logos as "it," to John's as "he." Philo came no nearer than Plato to a logos who might be incarnate, and he does not identify logos and Messiah. John's logos is not only God's agent in creation; he is God, and becomes incarnate, revealing, and redeeming.

The rabbinic me'mra, hardly more than a reverent substitution for the divine name, is not sufficiently substantial a concept; nor is direct contact with Hermetic circles likely.

The source of John's logos doctrine is in the person and work of the historical Christ. "Jesus is not to be interpreted by Logos: Logos is intelligible only as we think of Jesus" (W. F. Howard, IB 8:442). Its expression takes its suitability primarily from the OT connotation of "word" and its personification of wisdom. Christ is God's active Word, his saving revelation to fallen humanity. It is not accidental that both the gospel and Christ who is its subject are called "the word." But the use of logos in the contemporary Hellenistic world made it a useful "bridge" word.

In two NT passages where Christ is described in terms recalling Philo's logos, the word logos is absent (Col. 1:15–17; Heb. 1:3). Its introduction to Christian speech has been attributed to Apollos.

Logos in Early Christian Use. The apologists found the logos a convenient term in expounding Christianity to pagans. They used its sense of "reason," and some were thus enabled to see philosophy as a preparation for the gospel. The Hebraic overtones of "word" were underemphasized, though never quite lost. Some theologians distinguished between the Logos endiathetos, or Word latent in the godhead from all eternity, and the logos prophorikos, uttered and becoming effective at the creation. Origen seems to have used Philos' language of the deuteros theos. In the major christological controversies, however, the use of the term did not clarify the main issues, and it does not occur in the great creeds.

A. F. WALLS

See also JESUS CHRIST; JOHN, THEOLOGY OF; WORD, WORD OF GOD, WORD OF THE LORD.

Bibliography. R. G. Bury, Logos Doctrine and the Fourth Gospel; A. Debrunner, TDNT 4:69–136; C. H. Dodd, Fourth Gospel; J. D. G. Dunn, Christianity in the Making; H. Haarbeck et al., NIDNTT 3:1078–1146; W. F. Howard, Christianity according to St. John; L. W. Hurtado, One God, One Lord: Early Christian Devotion and Ancient Jewish Monotheism; R. L. Ottley, Doctrine of the Incarnation; J. Painter, "Theology, Eschatology, and the Prologue of John," SJT 46:27–42; G. L. Prestige, God in Patristic Thought; F. E. Walton, Development of the Logos Doctrine in Greek and Hebrew Thought.

Logos Spermatikos. See JUSTIN MARTYR.

Loisy, Alfred Firmin (1857–1940). French Catholic modernist and biblical scholar. Born at Ambrières in French Lorraine, Loisy studied for the Catholic priesthood at Chalons-sur-Marne Seminary (1874–79) and then at the Institute Catholique in Paris (1879–81). Ordained in 1879, in 1881 he began to teach Hebrew and Assyrian and then biblical exegesis at this institute. But because he employed the canons of historical criticism in his Bible teaching, he was dismissed in 1893. From 1894 to 1899 he served as chaplain to the Dominican teaching nuns at Neuilly. In 1900 he was appointed lecturer on the science of religion at the École Pratique des Hautes Études.

In 1902 Loisy published L'évangile et l'église (Gospel and the Church). It was a reply to the liberal German Protestant Adolf Harnack, who in his book Das Wesen des Christentums (What Is Christianity?) had maintained that essential Christianity consisted in acceptance of Christ's teaching concerning the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man—i.e., the religion of Jesus, not the religion about Jesus. Christianity with its institutional church represented a perversion of the original gospel. But Loisy contended that Jesus preached a future objective kingdom, of which his messiahship was the central feature. When this kingdom did not immediately materialize, the organized church, with its hierarchy, cultus, and creeds, emerged as the necessary instrument through which the Christian gospel could be proclaimed to the world. But this apologetic argument did not sit well with the church establishment. In 1903 Loisy's L'évangile et l'église, along with four of his other books, was put on the Index of prohibited books. In 1904 he resigned his position at the École Pratique, and in 1906 he ceased to exercise his priestly functions. In 1907 Pope Pius X in his decree Lamentabili and his encyclical Pascendi gregis, "Against the Errors of the Modernists," condemned Loisy's positions as "the synthesis of all heresies." Refusing to accept this papal condemnation, Loisy was excommunicated in 1908.

From 1909 to 1930 Loisy was professor of the history of religions in the Collège de France. Though he continued to publish scholarly works, mainly in the field of early Christianity, he drew no nearer to Catholic orthodoxy and died unrecconciled to the church.

N. V. HOPE

See also CATHOLICISM, LIBERAL.

Bibliography. A. Loisy, Gospel and the Church; My Duel with the Vatican; M. D. Petre, Alfred Loisy, His Religious Significance; A. R. Vidler, Modernist Movement in the Roman Church.

Lollards. The name given the English followers of John Wycliffe, and later to anyone seriously critical of the Roman Catholic Church in England, including extremists. Apparently, the original meaning of the term was a "chanter," and it was used derisively to designate a "mumbler" of prayers. At first (1380) the Lollards were Oxford scholars led by Nicholas of Hereford, who translated the first Lollard Bible, and the movement enjoyed some academic support for twenty years. Soon, however, it spread to laymen in various towns due to the preaching of William Swinderly and, later, the leadership of Wycliffe's secretary, John Purvey. The Lollards followed Wycliffe in doctrine and stressed divine election, personal faith, and above all, the Scriptures. They held that the Bible was the chief religious authority and that individuals had the right to base their beliefs on their own reading of the Bible. The chief duty of priests is to preach the Word of God. By 1395 the Lollards were an organized sect with spokesmen in Parliament and strength among the middle and artisan classes due to the industry of their unlicensed ministers. Twelve Conclusions, a summary of Lollard theology presented to Parliament in 1395, disapproved of the church's hierarchy, temporal power, indulgences, and clerical celibacy. It found unscriptural the papacy, transubstantiation, the necessity of confessing sins to a priest, prayers for the dead, pilgrimages, the use of images in worship, and war. All hope of toleration was dashed in 1401 when Parliament passed a statute, "On the Burning of a Heretic," that led to the recantation of the early Lollard leaders. Despite this legislation, the resultant burning of a few Lollards, and the opposition of Archbishop Thomas Arundel, Lollardy remained strong among the middle class, especially through the efforts of the distinguished soldier Sir John Oldcastle, who, beginning in 1410, provided strong leadership to the movement. He successfully identified Wycliffe's church reform with middle-class discontent over the clergy's pride, avarice, and ungodliness. After leading a Lollard march on London, he was hanged in 1417. Thereafter, the Lollards went underground. Their continued existence is witnessed to by Reginald Peacock's attack on their views in 1455, Repression of Overmuch Blaming of the Clergy. Lollard revivals in the early sixteenth century helped set the stage for the English Reformation by providing minds receptive to Lutheranism. Lollardy also exerted considerable influence in Scotland and contributed to the rise of the Husites in Bohemia. Recent studies have argued that the congregational dissent of the seventeenth century was a direct descendant of Lollardy.

Lollards

R. A. PETERSON

Bibliography. M. E. Aston, "Lollardy and Sedition 1381-1431," in Past and Present 17:1-44; "Lollardy and the Reformation: Survival or Revival?" History 99:149-70; G. G. Coulton, Medieval Panorama: The English Scene from Conquest to Reformation; M. Deanesly, Lollard Bible; A. G. Dickens, Lollards and Protestants in the Diocese of York, 1509-58; J. Gairdner, Lollardy and the Reformation in England; A. Hudson, Lollards and Their Beliefs; R. D. Kendall, Drama of Dissent: The Radical Poetics of Nonconformity; K. B. McFarlane, John Wycliffe and the Beginning of English Nonconformity; W. H. Summers, Our Lollard Ancestors; J. A. F. Thompson, Later Lollards 1414-1520; H. B. Workman, Dawn of the Reformation; J. Wycliffe, Apology for Lollard Doctrine.

Lombard, Peter. See PETER LOMBARD.

Lonergan, Bernard Joseph Francis (1904-1984). Catholic (Jesuit) philosopher/theologian and polymath, born in Quebec in 1904. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1922, received his B.A. from the University of London in 1930, and was ordained a priest in 1936. In 1940 he received the S.T.D. from the Gregorian University, Rome. Lonergan spent his teaching career in Canada (Loyola College and Regis College), Rome (Gregorian University), and the United States (Harvard and Boston College). He received seventeen honorary doctorates, and was a consultant for Vatican II.

Lonergan is best known for constructing a new method (paradigm) for theology that attempted to answer both scientific and philosophical criticisms against dogmatic theology. He analyzed the epistemological assumptions and methodologies of mathematics, political theory, economics, ethics, and natural sciences, and from these laid the groundwork for an empirical method in theology, which he thoroughly applied to the doctrines of Trinity and incarnation (De Deo Trino I and II, and De Verbo Incarnato).

His method proceeded from an experiential, not a propositional, foundation. According to Lonergan, there are three "horizons" of change: intellectual conversion (examining evidence, discerning the quality of the evidence, considering alternative interpretations for that evidence, all of which, he says, will move one away from fundamentalisms), moral conversion (moving from pleasure/pain motivations to a higher axiology in which action is essential), and religious conversion (moving from focus on the finite world to placing one's concerns in the larger context of transcendent meaning and value).

Lonergan's wide mastery of other disciplines (which few readers are able to follow), his dialectical method, his almost Kantian understanding of the subjectivity of the knower, his thorough acquaintance with scholastic theology, and the fact that much of his work was written in Latin, make his work difficult to grasp for the average reader (he is sometimes referred to as "the theologian's theologian," an arguable distinction).

Lonergan attempted to focus his new method on finding a balance between "outdated dogma" and uncritical liberalism. One common objection is that he was inconsistent in holding to scholastic Roman Catholic doctrine while promoting an empirical dialectical theological method and epistemology (including higher critical views of Scripture) that subvert that very doctrine.

W. G. PHILLIPS

Bibliography. B. Lonergan, Insight: A Study of Human Understanding; Method in Theology; H. Maynell, Introduction to the Philosophy of Bernard Lonergan.

Lord. See GOD, NAMES OF.

Lord, Jesus as. "Jesus is Lord" is probably the earliest of the Christian confessions and worked its way into the various acts of Christian worship. In what may well reflect a baptismal liturgy, Paul writes, "If you confess with your mouth, 'Jesus is Lord' . . . you will be saved" (Rom. 10:9). Similarly, in the confessional or creedal formula in Philippians 2:11 every tongue shall confess that "Jesus Christ is Lord." Furthermore, only by the Holy Spirit can one say "Jesus is Lord" (1 Cor. 12:3).

It is important to note that it is Jesus as the risen and exalted one who is Lord—i.e., the lordship of Jesus is confessed by the believing community in virtue of his exaltation to the right hand of God. In his Pentecost sermon Peter declares that Jesus whom they crucified God has raised and exalted to his right hand; and the whole house of Israel must know assuredly that God by this exaltation has made him Lord and Christ (Acts 2:36). According to Paul, Jesus as Lord is declared Son of God with power through his resurrection from the dead. This must not be taken to mean that lordship is not to be ascribed to the earthly ministry of Jesus but to reinforce the point that the significance of the title in the life of the church is linked to his exaltation. To underscore this, Psalms 110:1 was drawn on heavily (cf. Matt. 22:44; 26:64; Mark 14:62; Luke 20:43; Acts 2:34–35; Heb. 1:13).

Scholars have long debated the origin and significance of the title. Did it arise out of a Palestinian or a Hellenistic milieu? Is its significance to be found in the OT or among the religions of the ancient world? In the Palestinian community "Lord" was most commonly linked with Yahweh and became a regular circumlocution for the divine name in the public reading of the Scriptures. In the LXX it is a translation of the Hebrew term "Adonia," a designation for Yahweh. Furthermore, the use of Maranatha ("Our Lord, come" or "Our Lord is coming") in 1 Corinthians 16:22 suggests an early Palestinian origin. It is suggested, therefore, that when Jesus is called Lord, it is affirming his oneness with God. Others, most notably Wilhelm Bousset and Rudolf Bultmann, have tried to show the title arose out of the worship of the Hellenistic Christian communities, which borrowed the title from the Greek background in which "Lord" is a common reference to the deity to be worshiped. They have argued that the title, which makes Jesus equal with God, could not have arisen in the monotheism of Palestine, and that Jesus was first worshiped in these Hellenistic Christian communities. Though the debate is exceedingly complex, the former explanation is probably to be preferred. The recognition by even the enemies of Jesus that he acted and spoke with the authority of the OT Lord is not to be dismissed.

As the title for the exalted one, "Lord" has special reference to the present work of Christ as over against his former work on earth or his future work. The life of the community is lived under Jesus' lordship (Rom. 14:8). The baptism, or gift, of the Spirit is the act of the risen Lord that creates and extends the church. Through the Spirit the lordship of Jesus is exercised so that even the work of the Spirit is to be seen as the work of the risen Lord. Having ascended on high he has given the church its charismatic leadership for the equipping of the saints and the perfecting of his body (Eph. 4:11–16). The diversity of gifts and the variety of services are the singular activity of the Lord (1 Cor. 12:4–5). The empowerment of the church is also expressed in the head-body imagery employed by Paul so that the head sustains the body and keeps it on course in the fulfilling of the divine plan (Eph. 1:22–23; Col. 1:18; 2:10). In the church the risen Lord thereby continues his own ministry begun in the incarnation.

Prayer, praise, thanksgiving, and intercession are carried on in the church by virtue of the presence of the Lord at the right hand of the Father (Rom. 8:34). The church rejoices in the Lord (Rom. 5:11; Phil. 3:1; 4:4). All the promises of the present meaning of ministry and witness are rooted in the lordship of Jesus. The promise of conquest and the certain, present reality of the love of God flow from his presence at the right hand of God (Rom. 8:34–39).

The whole of the created order also comes under the lordship of Jesus. He is the sovereign firstborn over all creation, for it was created through him and is sustained by him (Col. 1:15–16; Heb. 1:3). The structure of the text of Colossians 1:15–20 shows that Jesus has the same relationship over the created order that he has over his new creation, the church. Only so do we perceive meaning in both the world and creation. So it is the purpose of God to bring all things to their fulfillment in him (Eph. 1:10).

The lordship of Jesus over history is carried out through the church and its proclamation. By virtue of his lordship the church is free to live in the world as servant. Being free from the necessity of power and achievement, for the victory is sealed, the church functions in terms of faithfulness and obedience, knowing that it is God who gives the increase (1 Cor. 3:6) and that the conquest of death as the last enemy is a certainty in the light of the victory of Christ (1 Cor. 15:25–26). The gift of freedom is that by which the church bears witness to his lordship. The cross is taken up daily. The same is to be said of the weakness of the church. In Revelation the beast is allowed to make war against the saints and to conquer them (Rev. 13:7), but the final chapter reverses the script. The foolishness of the church also bears witness to the lordship of Jesus, since it is by paradox that the church prospers. Paul's testimony regarding himself is true for the church: When it is weak, then it is strong (2 Cor. 12:10).

Lord, Jesus as

The consequence of the church's reflection on the lordship of Jesus was to establish—in spite of the threat it might have posed to monotheistic commitments—the oneness of Jesus with God. As L. Goppelt has stated, "He was incorporated into the singularity of God." So a title whose basic thrust is to assert Jesus' present power and authority in the church and in the world leads the church to recognize that the authority is the direct, not mediated, authority of God himself. Jesus as Lord speaks not only of his work but of his person also, a fact made clear by the way the various NT writers use the OT. Thus, we see the prominence of the "name" of Jesus (e.g., Acts 2:38; Phil. 2:9–10). During his earthly ministry his lordship is obscured for the sake of redemptive servanthood, but after his resurrection he is declared openly to be what he always has been—one with God in power and person. R. W. LYON

See also CHRISTOLOGY; GOD, DOCTRINE OF; JESUS CHRIST.

Bibliography. O. Cullmann, Christology of the New Testament; W. Foerster and G. Quell, TDNT 3:1039–1094; F. Hahn, Titles of Jesus in Christology; M. J. Harris, Jesus as God; Three Crucial Questions about Jesus; L. W. Hurtado, One God, One Lord: Early Christian Devotion and Ancient Jewish Monotheism; R. J. Knowling, Testimony of St. Paul to Christ; W. Kramer, Christ, Lord, Son of God; R. N. Longenecker, Christology of Early Jewish Christianity; I. H. Marshall, Origins of New Testament Christology; W. Pannenberg, Jesus—God and Man; A. E. J. Rawlinson, New Testament Doctrine of the Christ; E. Schweizer, Lordship and Discipleship; P. Toon, Jesus Christ Is Lord; H. E. W. Turner, Jesus: Master and Lord; B. B. Warfield, Lord of Glory.

Lord of Hosts. See GOD, NAMES OF.

Lord's Day. Only once does the phrase "the Lord's Day" (Gr. tē kyriakē hēmera) occur in the NT, and that is in the last book (Rev. 1:10). What it means is debated. Some interpret this as a reference to the eschatological day of the Lord. For others it refers to Easter Sunday. Most, however, understand it as a designation of the first day of the week, Sunday.

Later references in early Christian literature in which the adjective alone (Gr. kyriakē) was used seem to support this. Ignatius, bishop of Antioch, wrote to the Magnesians ca. A.D. 115 urging them to "no longer live for the Sabbath but for the Lord's day [Gr. kyriakēn], on which day our life arose" (9:1).

In an early manual of church instruction, the Didache (ca. A.D. 120), Christians were directed to assemble on the Lord's Day to worship (14:1). According to the apocryphal Gospel of Peter (ca. A.D. 130), on the night of the Lord's Day the stone was rolled away from the tomb (9:35). At dawn on the same day (Gr. orthrou de tēs kyriakēs) the empty tomb was visited by the women (12:50).

The attraction of the phrase was at least twofold. It expressed the Christian conviction that Sunday was a day of resurrection when Christ Jesus conquered death and became Lord of all (Eph. 1:20–22; 1 Pet. 3:21–22) and a day that anticipated the return of that same Lord to consummate his victory (1 Cor. 15:23–28, 54–57).

In the NT Sunday was usually designated as "the first day of the week" (Gr. mia sabbatōn, e.g., Matt. 28:1; Mark 16:2; Luke 24:1; John 20:1). The term "sabbath" (Gr. sabbatōn) referred to both the seventh day of the week, Saturday, and the week of seven days in its entirety. Since only Saturday was specifically named, the remaining days of the week were distinguished by ordinal numbers with Sunday as "the first."

The term Sunday (Gr. heliou hēmera), never used by NT writers, first appeared in Christian literature in the work of Justin (ca. A.D. 150, First Apology 67.3), who followed the Roman calendar. The name Sunday came to the Romans through the Egyptians, who early adopted a week of days named after the sun, moon, and five planets. The first day of the week to the Romans was the day of the sun (Lat. dies solis). In the course of time, however, the Christian designation "the Lord's day" (Lat. dies dominica) came to displace the term Sunday throughout the Roman Empire. Modern Romance languages, which developed from the ordinary Latin, reflect this change, referring to the first day of the week as domenica (Italian), domingo (Spanish), and dimanche (French).

Early Practice. That the early church customarily met on Sunday during the NT era cannot be unequivocally demonstrated. However, two NT references suggest that this was the case. Paul met with the church at Troas (Acts 20:7) on the first day of the week at what seems to be a regular, although prolonged, meeting. He also directed the Corinthian church to make their contribution to the collection for the needy on a Sunday (1 Cor. 16:2), a practice which likely, though not necessarily, coincided with the meeting of the church.

Whether these meetings commenced according to the Jewish scheme of reckoning days (sunset to sunset) on a Saturday evening or according to the Roman (midnight to midnight) of a Sunday is a matter also debated, but the latter was more likely. According to Pliny, a Roman governor in Asia Minor (ca. 95–110), Christians met at dawn on a regularly scheduled day (Lat. stato die) to worship Christ and then reassembled later the same day to eat a meal (Letter to Trajan 10.96.7), a practice that recognized the Roman day. Christians in Corinth similarly met for a communal meal that included the observance of the Lord's Supper (1 Cor. 11:17–34). Whether they met morning and evening cannot be determined. If Paul's subsequent comments about worship (1 Cor. 14:26–40) were intended to conform Corinthian practice to what obtained elsewhere (cf. 14:33), then the Sunday gathering was also marked by considerable congregational participation including singing, prayer, and proclamation. According to Justin (First Apology 67.3–6) Sunday services included a reading of Scripture, exhortation, corporate and individual prayers, the Lord's Supper, and a collection.

Theology of the Lord's Day. When the early church began Sunday worship is not known. Nor do the NT writers offer a rationale for the shift from Saturday's sabbath observance to Sunday's meetings, but several factors may be suggested. (1) The seventh day, Saturday, was no longer regarded as a day to be especially observed by worship and rest from labor (Rom. 14:5–6; Gal. 4:8–11; Col. 2:16–17; cf. Acts 15:28–29). (2) The event of the resurrection, at the heart of the Christian gospel (e.g., Acts 2:31; 4:2, 10, 33; 10:40; 13:33–37; 17:18; Rom. 10:9; 1 Cor. 15:4, 12–19; 1 Thess. 1:10), occurred on a Sunday. (3) When the NT writers designated the various days on which the resurrected Christ appeared and spoke to his disciples, it was uniformly a Sunday (e.g., Matt. 28:1, 9; Luke 24:13–34; John 20:19, 26). (4) The coming of the Holy Spirit (Acts 2) occurred on Pentecost, a Sunday. (5) After the NT era the first and "eighth" days of the week (both Sundays) were referred to respectively as the day of God's creation (Justin, First Apology 67.7) and the day that anticipated the new creation or eternity (Barnabas 15:9; cf. 2 Enoch 33:7). Sunday was thus seen as a "firstfruit" of the future eternal state (cf. 1 Cor. 15:20). Also, perhaps Christians anticipated the Lord's return on his day (cf. Luke 12:35–36).

Underlying each of these reasons, however, may have been the desire on the part of the early church to distinguish itself from Judaism and its distinctive sabbath observances.

Significance. Within Christianity there are many differences of opinion on how the Lord's day should be observed. Three general distinctions may be noted. First, some Christians believe that the church as a whole was mistaken in leaving a Saturday observance for Sunday worship without a specific command to do so. They continue faithfully to observe the first commandment, "Remember the sabbath day by keeping it holy" (Exod. 20:8), and they stress the importance of rest and religiously oriented activity. The Seventh-day Adventists are the most visible members of this group.

A second and larger group transfer the principles of sabbath observance to Sunday. The name "sabbatarian" is commonly given to this position. A classic expression of this is in the Westminster Shorter Catechism, in which Sunday is called "the Christian Sabbath" (Q. 59). This position is marked by a strictness with regard to Sunday activity and usually is characterized by a list of practices to be avoided on that day. Question 60, for example, asks, "How is the Sabbath to be sanctified?" The answer is "by a holy resting all that day, even from such worldly employments and recreations as are lawful on other days."

The trend toward sabbatarianism is as old as Tertullian (ca. A.D. 200), who advocated that Christians rest from work on Sunday "so that we may give no place to the devil" (On Prayer 23). The Roman emperor Constantine subsequently enacted legislation mandating cessation of most types of labor (agriculture was excepted) on Sunday (Codex Justinian 3.12.3). English and Scottish reformers, however, gave sabbatarianism its most stringent formulation by requiring all persons to attend church "on the Lord's day, commonly called Sunday"; prohibiting all "worldly labor or busyness," excepting only "works of necessity or charity" (Act of Parliament 29, ch. 7, of Charles II). The English Puritans and Scottish Presbyterians who came to the United States in turn enacted similar legislation, including the adoption of "blue laws" restricting Sunday commerce. Some of these laws, despite intensive litigation and extensive relaxation, continue in effect.

Most Christians may be included in a third group, who believe that the sabbath commandment was a part of the ceremonial law of Israel and therefore not applicable to the church. This seems to have been the position of the early church. No hint of cessation from work on Sundays is found until Tertullian. While various factors, including Scripture (Ps. 92:2), may have led to an early morning and late evening meeting schedule, one likely explanation was the need to assemble at times that would not conflict with the workday. The subsequent application of sabbath principles to the church by men like Ambrose (cf. Homily on Ps. 47) and Chrysostom (cf. Homily 10 on Genesis) was in part a consequence of Constantine's imperial edict of 321 prescribing Sunday rest.

Most Christians, therefore, do not consider recreational activity or work on Sunday illegitimate, but they do stress the importance of gathering with other believers for worship, edification, and fellowship. Fellowship with other believers is encouraged in recognition of the fact that Christians are not isolated pilgrims but are members of one body united by faith in Christ, who require mutual intercourse for spiritual vitality (Rom. 1:12; Heb. 10:25). The goal of edification is the spiritual transformation of Christians into Christlikeness in character and conduct. A primary means to this end is the reading, explanation, and application of the Word of God (Eph. 4:11–16). Worship recognizes that the Christian's life was initiated by the graciousness of God the Father, was realized in the loving sacrifice of God the Son, and is advanced by the ministry of God the Spirit (Eph. 1:3–14). This worship is expressed in songs, prayers, and deeds such as giving but preeminently in the Lord's Supper, which reminds of Jesus' death and anticipates his return (1 Cor. 11:23–26). In so doing Sunday becomes the Lord's day. D. K. LOWERY

Lord's Day

See also SABBATARIANISM; WORSHIP IN THE CHURCH

Bibliography. S. Bacchiocchi, From Sabbath to Sunday; Divine Rest for Human Restlessness; R. Beckwith and W. Stott, Christian Sunday; D. A. Carson, ed., From Sabbath to Lord's Day; W. Foerster, TDNT 3:1095–96; P. K. Jewett, Lord's Day; E. Lohse, TDNT 7:1–35; H. Oster, Sacramentum Mundi; H. Riesenfeld, "Sabbath and the Lord's Day," in Gospel Tradition; W. Rordorf, Sunday; W. Stott, "Note on the Word Kyriakē in Rev. 1:10," NTS 12:70–75.

Lord's Prayer. The meaning of Jesus' pattern for prayer in Matthew 6:9–13 needs to be sought in the wider context of the units 6:5–13 and 6:1–18. The larger units indicate that Jesus is contrasting surface language with depth language in worship of God. The prayer is not a set form that he himself prayed or asked his disciples to pray, but illustrates the type of prayer appropriate to the person who worships deeply without hypocrisy. The entire Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5–7) takes its cue from Jesus' declaration in 5:20: "For I tell you that unless your righteousness surpasses that of the Pharisees and the teachers of the law, you will certainly not enter the kingdom of heaven." Three expressions of genuine worship are given in germinal form in 6:1–18: (1) almsgiving (vv. 2–4); (2) prayer (vv. 5–6, with vv. 7–15 as pattern); and (3) fasting (vv. 16–18). The theme of 5:20 is applied to these three areas and is articulated in the warning, "Be careful not to do your 'acts of righteousness' before men, to be seen by them. If you do, you will have no reward from your Father in heaven" (6:1). The warning is against play acting before a human audience; those who give, pray, or fast superficially will have their reward (refrain a, repeated in 6:2, 5, 16). Those who pray genuinely will receive their reward from God who sees en tō kryptō, "in secret" (refrain b, repeated in 6:3–4, 6, 17–18). The sentence and paragraph flow of 6:1–18 (with 6:19–21 as summary) brings out the antithetic contrasts of surface/depth motifs and illustrates the dominical pattern of Jesus' teaching that is picked up by Paul in his contrasts of living kata sarka, "according to the flesh," and kata pneuma, "according to the Spirit" (e.g., Gal. 5:16–24).

The eschatological age has broken in with the coming of Jesus, and now the law is no longer inscribed in stone but in the heart (Jer. 31:33). True prayer is to be a deep and spontaneous response to God, not a superficial game played out in public simply to curry favor with the world. The flow of thought in the larger unit of 6:1–18, with the summary of 6:19–21, makes clear the serious contrast of opposites in which the Lord's Prayer is to be understood.

Luke's location of the corresponding prayer (Luke 11:1–4) in the immediate context of Mary and Martha ("Martha, Martha, you are worried and upset about many things. . . . Mary has chosen what is better, and it will not be taken away from her," 10:41–42) and the importuned friend and related sayings ("Ask and it will be given to you," 11:9; "how much more will your Father in heaven give the Holy Spirit to those who ask him!" 11:13) indicates his similar understanding of the underlying meaning of Jesus' ordering of values in the new age.

Viewed in context of Jesus' eschatological contrasts, the Lord's Prayer provides a summary model for properly ordering the priorities of the kingdom. Both Matthew 6:9–13 and Luke 11:2–4 preserve Jesus' order: first God, then human needs. While Jesus makes use of Jewish sources in forming the prayer, he does not design it to be used as a set liturgical piece but as a model for the responsive heart in view of the demands of the new age. The prayer follows a common outline in both Matthew and Luke:

- I. Petition to the Father for his glory
Introduction: "Our Father in heaven" acknowledges the intimate relationship of Jesus and believers to the family of God, which is above transitory earthly values.
 1. First petition: "Hallowed be your name." This prayer recognizes the sovereign claim of God over the world and anticipates human response and the final consummation in the eschatological age (cf. Rom. 10:13; 15:9; Phil. 2:9–11).
 2. Second petition: "Your kingdom come." This prayer carries on the eschatological urgency of the "already/not yet" of Jesus' inaugurated kingship.

3. Third petition: "Your will be done on earth as it is in heaven." This is an expansion of the unified theme of the first two petitions, indicating the sovereign goal of God's eschatological plan and the importance of the believer's role (implied) in praying for its completion.
- II. Address to the Father for human needs.
4. Fourth petition: "Give us today our daily bread." Not only are daily needs in focus here but also quite likely a foretaste of the messianic banquet.
 5. Fifth petition: "Forgive us our debts, as we also have forgiven our debtors." The point here is one of proper attitude, as in the larger setting of Matthew 6:1–21. Unless one is in a forgiving mood in the sense of Matthew 6:14–15, he or she is not going to ask for or receive divine forgiveness.
 6. Sixth petition: "And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from the evil one." Temptation is to be understood as testing (peirasmos); cf. Luke 22:28; 1 Peter 1:6. In the NT it is often rendered thlipsis, trouble or affliction (e.g., John 16:33; Rom. 12:12), which has not only present but future eschatological connotations in regard to the final test in the end time (Matt. 24:21; Mark 13:24; 1 Pet. 4:12). Matthew's version may be translated, "but deliver us from the evil one," i.e., from the devil or Antichrist. The petition is fraught with eschatological tension, for Jesus knows that the inauguration of the kingship of God in enemy-occupied territory is going to mean testing and suffering both for himself and for his followers, right to the very end.

The doxology commonly used to conclude the prayer is not well attested in the manuscript traditions, though it is consonant with the original theme.

R. G. GRUENLER

See also PRAYER; SERMON ON THE MOUNT.

Bibliography. J. Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion; F. Chase, Lord's Prayer in the Early Church; R. Guelich, Sermon on the Mount; J. Jeremias, Lord's Prayer; E. Lohmeyer, Lord's Prayer; W. Luthi, Lord's Prayer, an Exposition.

Lord's Supper. In each of the four accounts of the Lord's Supper in the NT (Matt. 26:26–30; Mark 14:22–26; Luke 22:14–20; 1 Cor. 11:23–26) all the main features are included. The accounts of Matthew and Mark have close formal affinities. So have those of Luke and Paul. The main differences between the two groups are that Mark omits the words "Do this in remembrance of me" and includes "poured out for many" after the reference to the blood of the covenant. Instead of the Lord's reference to his reunion with the disciples in the fulfilled kingdom of God, common to the Synoptic Gospels, Paul has a reference to proclaiming the Lord's death "until he comes."

The meaning of Jesus' action has to be seen against its OT background. Questions are legitimately raised, however, about the actual nature and timing of the meal. The accounts seem to be at variance. The fourth Gospel says that Jesus died on the afternoon when the Passover lamb was slain (John 18:28). The Synoptic accounts, however, suggest that the meal was prepared for and eaten, as if it were part of the community celebration of the Passover feast that year in Jerusalem after the slaying of the lambs in the temple.

The Synoptic accounts raise further problems. It has been thought unlikely that the arrest of Jesus, the meeting of the Sanhedrin, and the carrying of arms by the disciples could have taken place if the meal had coincided with the official Passover date. Could Simon of Cyrene have been met coming apparently from work in the country, or could a linen cloth have been purchased for Jesus' body, if the feast was in progress?

To meet all such difficulties several suggestions have been made. Some have held that the meal took the form of a kiddush—a ceremony held by a family or brotherhood in preparation for the Sabbath or for a feast day. It has also been suggested that the meal could have been the solemn climax, before Jesus' death, of other significant messianic meals he had been accustomed to sharing with his disciples, in which he and they looked forward to a glorious fulfillment of hope in the coming kingdom of God.

Such theories present as many new difficulties as those they claim to solve. Moreover, many of the features and details of the meal accounted for indicate that it was a Passover meal. (They met at night, within the city; they reclined as they ate; the wine was red; wine was a preliminary dish.) Jesus himself was concerned to explain what he was doing in terms of the Passover celebration. Scholars who regard the meal as a Passover explain the attendant strange circumstances, and various theories have been produced to harmonize all the accounts. One theory is that disagreement between the Sadducees and the Pharisees led to different dates being fixed for the celebration of the feast in this year. Another theory suggests that Jesus held an irregular Passover, the illegality of which contributed to his being betrayed by Judas and arrested. (Such a theory could explain why there is no mention of a Passover lamb in the account.) Attention has been drawn to the existence of an ancient calendar in which the calculations of the date of the Passover were made on premises different from those made in official circles. The following of such a calendar would have fixed the date of the feast a few days earlier than that of its official celebration.

Lord's Supper

There is no doubt that Jesus' words and actions are best understood if the meal is regarded as taking place within the context of the Jewish Passover. In this the people of God not only remembered, but again lived through, the events of their deliverance from Egypt under the sign of the sacrificed paschal lamb as if they themselves participated in them (see Exod. 12). In this context, giving the bread and wine as his body and blood, with the words, "Do this in remembrance of me," Jesus points to himself as the true substitute for the paschal lamb and to his death as the saving event that will deliver the new Israel, represented in his disciples, from all bondage. His blood is to be henceforth the sign under which God will remember his people in himself.

In his words at the table Jesus speaks of himself not only as the paschal lamb but also as a sacrifice in accordance with other OT analogies. In the sacrificial ritual the portion of peace offering not consumed by fire and thus not offered to God as his food (cf. Lev. 3:1-11; Num. 28:2) was eaten by priest and people (Lev. 19:5-6; 1 Sam. 9:13) in an act of fellowship with the altar and the sacrifice (Exod. 24:1-11; Deut 27:7; cf. Num. 25:1-5; 1 Cor. 10). Jesus, in giving the elements, thus gave to his disciples a sign of their own fellowship and participation in his sacrificial death.

Moreover, Jesus included in the Last Supper the ritual not only of the paschal and sacrificial meal but also of a covenant meal. In the OT the making of a covenant was followed by a meal in which the participants had fellowship and were pledged to loyalty one to another (Gen. 26:30; 31:54; 2 Sam. 3:20). The covenant between God and Israel at Sinai was likewise followed by a meal in which the people "saw God, and they ate and drank" (Exod. 24:11). The new covenant (Jer. 31:1-34) between the Lord and his people was thus ratified by Jesus in a meal.

In celebrating the supper, Jesus emphasized the messianic and eschatological significance of the Passover meal. At this feast the Jews looked forward to a future deliverance that was foreshadowed in type by the Israelites' deliverance from Egypt. A cup was set aside for the Messiah lest he should come that very night to bring about this deliverance and fulfill the promise of the messianic banquet (cf. Isa. 25-26; 65:13, et al.). It may have been this cup that Jesus took in the institution of the new rite, indicating that even now the Messiah was present to feast with his people.

After the resurrection, in their frequent celebration of the Supper (Acts 2:42-46; 20:7), the disciples would see the climax of the table fellowship Jesus had had with publicans and sinners (Matt. 11:18-19; Luke 15:2) and of their own day-to-day meals with him. They would interpret it not only as a bare prophecy but as a real foretaste of the future messianic banquet and as a sign of the presence of the mystery of the kingdom of God in their midst in the person of Jesus (Matt. 8:11; cf. Mark 10:35-36; Luke 14:15-24). They would see its meaning in relation to his living presence in the church, brought out fully in the Easter meals they had shared with him (Luke 24:13-35; John 21:1-14; Acts 10:41). It was a supper in the presence of the risen Lord as their host. They would see, in the messianic miracle of his feeding the multitude, his words about himself as the bread of life, a sign of his continual hidden self-giving in the mystery of the Lord's Supper.

But they would not forget the sacrificial and paschal aspect of the supper. The table fellowship they looked back on was the fellowship of the Messiah with sinners, which reached its climax in his self-identification with the sin of the world on Calvary. They had fellowship with the resurrected Jesus through remembrance of his death. As the Lord's Supper related them to the coming kingdom and glory of Christ, so did it also relate them to his once-for-all death.

It is against this background of thought that we should interpret the words of Jesus at the table and the NT statements about the supper. There is a real life-giving relationship of communion between the events and realities, past, present, and future, symbolized in the supper and those who participate in it (John 6:51; 1 Cor. 10:16). This communion is so inseparable from participation in the supper that we can speak of the bread and the wine as if they were indeed the body and blood of Christ (Mark 14:22, "This is my body"; cf. John 6:53). It is by the Holy Spirit alone (John 6:53) that the bread and wine, as they are partaken by faith, convey the realities they represent, and that the Supper gives us participation in the death and resurrection of Christ and the kingdom of God. It is by faith alone that Christ is received into the heart at the Supper (Eph. 3:17), and as faith is inseparable from the word, the Lord's Supper is nothing without the word. Christ is Lord at his table, the risen and unseen host. He is not there at the disposal of the church, to be given and received automatically in the mere performance of a ritual. Yet he is there according to his promise to honor seeking and adoring faith. He is present also in such a way that though the careless and unbelieving cannot receive him, they nevertheless eat and drink judgment to themselves (1 Cor. 11:27–29).

In participating by the Holy Spirit in the body of Christ, which was offered once-for-all on the cross, the members of the church are stimulated and enabled by the same Holy Spirit to offer themselves to the Father in eucharistic sacrifice, to serve one another in love within the body, and to fulfill their sacrificial function as the body of Christ in the service of the whole world, which God has reconciled to himself in Christ (Rom. 12:1; 1 Cor. 10:17).

There is in the Lord's Supper a constant renewal of the covenant between God and the church. The word "remembrance" (anamnēsis) refers not simply to man's remembering of the Lord but also to God's remembrance of his Messiah and his covenant, and of his promise to restore the kingdom. At the supper all this is brought before God in true intercessory prayer.

R. S. WALLACE

See also LORD'S SUPPER, VIEWS OF.

Bibliography. E. J. F. Arndt, Font and the Table; A. J. B. Higgins, Lord's Supper in the New Testament; J. Jeremias, Eucharistic Words of Jesus; F. J. Leenhardt and O. Cullmann, Essays in the Lord's Supper; I. H. Marshall, Lord's Supper and Last Supper; M. Marty, Lord's Supper; E. Schillebeeckx, ed., Sacramental Reconciliation; M. Thurian, Eucharistic Memorial; J. J. von Allmen, Lord's Supper; G. Wainwright, Eucharist and Eschatology.

Lord's Supper, Views of. The NT teaches that Christians must partake of Christ in the Lord's Supper (1 Cor. 11:23–32; cf. Matt. 26:26–29; Mark 14:22–25; Luke 22:14–23). In a remarkable discourse Jesus said that his disciples had to feed on him if they were to have eternal life (John 6:53–57). The setting of that discourse was the feeding of the five thousand. Jesus used the occasion to tell the multitude that it should not be as concerned about perishable food as about the food that lasts forever, which he gives them. That food is himself, his body and his blood. Those who believe in him must eat his flesh and drink his blood—not literally, but symbolically and sacramentally—in the rite he gave the church. Through faith in him and partaking of him they would live forever, for union with him means salvation.

The setting for the institution of the Lord's Supper was the passover meal that Jesus celebrated with his disciples in remembrance of the deliverance of Israel from Egypt (Exod. 13:1–10; Matt. 26:17; John 13:1). In calling the bread and wine his body and blood, and saying, "Do this in remembrance of me," Jesus was naming himself the true Lamb of the Passover whose death would deliver God's people from the bondage of sin. Thus, Paul writes, "Christ, our Passover lamb, has been sacrificed" (1 Cor. 5:7; cf. John 1:29).

Transubstantiation. The doctrine of the Lord's Supper first occasioned discord in the church in the ninth century when Radbertus, influenced by the hankering for the mysterious and supernatural that characterized his time, taught that a miracle takes place at the words of institution in the supper: the elements are changed into the actual body and blood of Christ. Paschasius Radbertus (785–860) was opposed by Ratramnus, who held the Augustinian position that Christ's presence in the supper is spiritual. The teaching and practice of the church moved in Radbertus's direction—a doctrine of transubstantiation; namely, that in the supper the substance in the elements of bread and wine is changed into the substance of the body and blood of Christ while the accidents—i.e., the appearance, taste, touch, and smell—remain the same. In the eleventh century Berengar objected to the current idea that pieces of Christ's flesh are eaten during Communion and that some of his blood is drunk. With sensitivity he held that the whole Christ (totus Christus) is given the believer spiritually as he receives bread and wine. The elements remain unchanged but are invested with new meaning; they represent the body and blood of the Savior. This view was out of step with the times, however, and transubstantiation was declared the faith of the church in 1059, although the term itself was not used officially until the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215.

The medieval church continued and refined the teaching of transubstantiation, adding such subtleties as (1) concomitance, i.e., that both the body and blood of Christ are in each element; hence, when the cup is withheld from the laity, the whole Christ, body and blood, is received in the bread alone; (2) consecration, i.e., the teaching that the high moment in the Eucharist is not communion with Christ but the change of the elements by their consecration into the very body and blood of Christ, an act performed by the priest alone; (3) that, inasmuch as there is the real presence of Christ in the supper—body, blood, soul, and divinity—a sacrifice is offered to God; (4) that the sacrifice offered is propitiatory; (5) that the consecrated elements, or host, may be reserved for later use; (6) that the elements thus reserved should be venerated as the living Christ. The Council of Trent (1545–63) confirmed these teachings in its thirteenth and twenty-second sessions, adding that the veneration given the consecrated elements is adoration (latría), the same worship that is given God.

Luther and Consubstantiation. The Reformers agreed in their condemnation of the doctrine of transubstantiation. They held it to be a serious error that is contrary to Scripture; repugnant to reason; contrary to the testimony of our senses of sight, smell, taste, and touch; destructive of the true meaning of a sacrament; and conducive to gross superstition and idolatry. Luther's first salvo against what he considered to be a perversion of the Lord's Supper was Babylonian Captivity of the Church. In it he charges the church with a threefold bondage in its doctrine and practice concerning the supper—withholding the cup from the people, transubstantiation, and the teaching that the supper is a sacrifice offered to God. Luther tells about his earlier instruction in the theology of the sacrament and of some of his doubts: "When I learned later what church it was that had decreed this, namely the Thomistic—that is, the Aristotelian church—I grew bolder, and after floating in a sea of doubt, I at last found rest for my conscience in the above view, namely, that it is real bread and real wine, in which Christ's real flesh and real blood are present in no other way and to no less a degree than the others assert them to be under their accidents. I reached this conclusion because I saw that the opinions of the Thomists, whether approved by pope or by council, remain only opinions, and would not become articles of faith even if an angel from heaven were to decree otherwise (Gal. 1:18). For what is asserted without the Scriptures or proven revelation may be held as an opinion, but need not be believed. But this opinion of Thomas hangs so completely in the air without support of Scripture or reason that it seems to me he knows neither his philosophy nor his logic. For Aristotle speaks of subject and accidents so very differently from St. Thomas that it seems to me this great man is to be pitied not only for attempting to draw his opinions in matters of faith from Aristotle, but also for attempting to base them upon a man whom he did not understand, thus building an unfortunate superstructure upon an unfortunate foundation" (Works 36:29).

Lord's Supper, Views of

Luther was feeling his way into a new understanding of the sacrament at this time, but he believed it legitimate to hold that there are real bread and real wine on the altar. He rejected the Thomistic position of a change in the substance of the elements while the accidents remain, inasmuch as Aristotle, from whom the terms "substance" and "accidents" were borrowed, allowed no such separation. The "third captivity," the doctrine of the sacrifice of the Mass, Luther declared to be "by far the most wicked of all" for in it a priest claims to offer to God the very body and blood of Christ as a repetition of the atoning sacrifice of the cross, only in an unbloody manner; whereas the true sacrament of the altar is a "promise of the forgiveness of sins made to us by God, and such a promise as has been confirmed by the death of the Son of God." Since it is a promise, access to God is not gained by works or merits by which we try to please him but by faith alone. "For where there is the Word of the promising God, there must necessarily be the faith of the accepting man."

"Who in the world is so foolish as to regard a promise received by him, or a testament given to him, as a good work, which he renders to the testator by his acceptance of it? What heir will imagine that he is doing his departed father a kindness by accepting the terms of the will and the inheritance it bequeaths to him? What godless audacity is it, therefore, when we who are to receive the testament of God come as those who would perform a good work for him! This ignorance of the testament, this captivity of so great a sacrament—are they not too sad for tears? When we ought to be grateful for benefits received, we come arrogantly to give that which we ought to take. With unheard-of perversity we mock the mercy of the giver by giving as a work the thing we receive as a gift, so that the testator, instead of being a dispenser of his own goods, becomes the recipient of ours. Woe to such sacrilege!" (Works 36:47–48).

In his determination to break the bondage of superstition in which the church was held, Luther wrote four more tracts against the medieval perversion of the Lord's Supper. However, he also fought doctrinal developments on the other side. Some who with him rejected Roman Catholic error were denying any real presence of Christ in the supper; against them, beginning in 1524, Luther directed an attack. In these five writings he showed that, while he rejected transubstantiation and the sacrifice of the Mass, he still believed that Christ is bodily present in the Lord's Supper and that his body is received by all who partake of the elements. "On this we take our stand, and we also believe and teach that in the supper we eat and take to ourselves Christ's body truly and physically." While he acknowledged the mystery, he was certain of the fact of Christ's real corporeal presence inasmuch as he had said when he instituted the Supper, "This is my body." If Scripture cannot be taken literally here, it cannot be believed anywhere, Luther held, and we are on the way to "the virtual denial of Christ, God, and everything" (Works 37:29, 53).

Zwingli. Luther's main opponent among the evangelicals was Ulrich Zwingli, whose reforming activity in Switzerland was as old as Luther's in Germany. While equally opposed to Rome, Zwingli had been deeply influenced by humanism with its aversion to the medieval mentality and its adulation of reason. Luther felt an attachment to the whole tradition of the church, was conservative by nature, and had a deep mystical strain and suspicion of the free use of reason. "As the one was by disposition and discipline a schoolman who loved the Saints and the Sacraments of the Church, the other was a humanist who appreciated the thinkers of antiquity and the reason in whose name they spoke. Luther never escaped from the feelings of the monk and associations of the cloister; but Zwingli studied his

New Testament with a fine sense of the sanity of its thought, the combined purity and practicability of its ideals, and the majesty of its spirit; and his ambition was to realize a religion after its model, free from the traditions and superstitions of men. It was this that made him so tolerant of Luther, and Luther so intolerant of him. The differences of character were insuperable" (H. M. Fairbairn, Cambridge Modern History 2:345–46).

The chief differences between Luther and Zwingli theologically were Luther's inability to think of Christ's presence in the supper in any other than a physical way and a heavy dualism that runs through much of Zwingli's thought. The latter is seen in Zwingli's doctrine of the Word of God as both inward and outward, the church as both visible and invisible, and his conception of the means of grace as having both an external form and an inward grace given by the Holy Spirit. No physical element can affect the soul, but only God in his sovereign grace. Thus, there must be no identification of the sign with that which it signifies, but through the use of the sign one rises above the world of sense to the spiritual reality signified. By contrast, Luther held that God comes to us precisely in physical realities discerned by sense.

Zwingli interpreted the words of Jesus, "This is my body," in harmony with John 6, where Jesus spoke of eating and drinking his body and blood, especially v. 63: "It is the spirit that gives life, the flesh is of no avail." Therefore, he reasoned, not only is transubstantiation wrong but so is Luther's notion of consubstantiation, that somehow Christ is corporeally in, under, and with the elements. The doctrine of physical eating is absurd and repugnant to common sense. Moreover, God does not ask us to believe that which is contrary to sense experience. The word "is" in the words of institution means "signifies," or "represents," and must be interpreted figuratively, as is done in other "I am" passages in the Bible. Christ's ascension means that he took his body from earth to heaven.

Zwingli's shortcoming was his lack of appreciation for the real presence of Christ in the supper in his Holy Spirit and a real feeding of the faithful on him. What he needed for an adequate doctrine was Luther's belief in the reality of communion with Christ and a reception of him in the supper. This was to be found in Calvin.

Calvin. Calvin's view of the Lord's Supper appears to be a mediate position between the views of Luther and Zwingli, but it is in fact an independent position. Rejecting both Zwingli's "memorialism" and Luther's "monstrous notion of ubiquity" (Inst. 4.17.30), he held that there is a real reception of the body and blood of Christ in the supper, only in a spiritual manner. The sacrament is a real means of grace, a channel by which Christ communicates himself to us. With Zwingli, Calvin held that after the ascension Christ retained a real body, which is located in heaven. Nothing should be taken from Christ's "heavenly glory—as happens when he is brought under the corruptible elements of this world, or bound to any earthly creatures. . . . Nothing inappropriate to human nature [should] be ascribed to his body, as happens when it is said either to be infinite or to be put in a number of places at once" (Inst. 4.17.19). With Luther, Calvin believed that the elements in the supper are signs that exhibit the fact that Christ is truly present, and he repudiated Zwingli's belief that the elements are signs that represent what is absent.

Inasmuch as the doctrine of the real presence of Christ in the supper was the key issue in the eucharistic debate, it is obvious that Luther and Calvin agreed more than did Calvin and Zwingli. The latter's conception of Christ's presence was "by the contemplation of faith" but not "in essence and reality." For Luther and Calvin communion with a present Christ who actually feeds believers with his body and blood is what makes the sacrament. The question between them was the manner in which Christ's body exists and is given to believers.

In his response to this question, Calvin rejected the Eutychian doctrine of the absorption of Christ's humanity by his divinity, an idea he found in some of his Lutheran opponents, and any weakening of the idea of a local presence of the flesh of Christ in heaven. While Christ is bodily in heaven, distance is overcome by the Holy Spirit, who vivifies believers with Christ's flesh. Thus, the supper is a true communion with Christ, who feeds us with his body and blood. "We must hold in regard to the mode, that it is not necessary that the essence of the flesh should descend from heaven in order to our being fed upon it, the virtue of the Spirit being sufficient to break through all impediments and surmount any distance of place. Meanwhile, we deny not that this mode is incomprehensible to the human mind; because neither can flesh naturally be the life of the soul, or exert its power upon us from heaven, nor without reason is the communion which makes us flesh of the flesh of Christ, and bone of his bones, called by Paul, 'A great mystery' (Eph. 5:30). Therefore, in the sacred Supper, we acknowledge a miracle which surpasses both the limits of nature and the measure of our sense, while the life of Christ is common to us, and his flesh is given us for food. But we must have done with all inventions inconsistent with the explanation lately given, such as the ubiquity of the body, the secret inclosing under the symbol of bread, and the substantial presence on earth" (Tracts 2:577).

Calvin held that the essence of Christ's body was its power. In itself it is of little value since it "had its origin from earth, and underwent death" (Inst.

Lord's Supper, Views of

4.17.24), but the Holy Spirit, who gave Christ a body, communicates its power to us so that we receive the whole Christ in Communion. The difference from Luther here is not great, for he held that the "right hand of God" to which Christ ascended meant God's power, and that power is everywhere. The real difference between Luther and Calvin lay in the present existence of Christ's body. Calvin held that it is in a place, heaven, while Luther said that it has the same omnipresence as Christ's divine nature. Both agreed that there is deep mystery here that can be accepted though not understood. "If anyone should ask me how this [partaking of the whole Christ] takes place, I shall not be ashamed to confess that it is a secret too lofty for either my mind to comprehend or my words to declare. . . . I rather experience than understand it" (Inst. 4.17.32).

Summary. While each of the positions delineated above sought to do justice to the Holy Supper which the Lord has given his church, and while each has in it elements of truth, Calvin's position has received widest acceptance within the universal church. Moreover, it is the position closest to the thinking of contemporary theologians within both the Roman Catholic and Lutheran traditions. It is a position that sees the Lord's Supper as a rite instituted by Jesus Christ in which bread is broken and the fruit of the vine is poured out in thankful remembrance of Christ's atoning sacrifice, having become, through their reception and the sacramental blessing given by the Holy Spirit, the communion (that is, a partaking) of the body and blood of Christ and an anticipation of full future salvation. Other views of the Lord's Supper, such as those of the Eastern Orthodox churches, of the Anglican Church, or of other denominations, are variants of one or more of the views delineated and summarized above. M. E. OSTERHAVEN

See also LORD'S SUPPER.

Bibliography. D. Bridge and D. Pypers, Communion: The Meal That Unites?; G. W. Bromiley, ed., Zwingli and Bullinger; J. Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion; Tracts Relating to the Reformation, H. Beveridge, trans.; P. Schaff, ed., Creeeds of Christendom; K. B. Cully, Sacraments: A Language of Faith; K. McDonnell, John Calvin, the Church, and the Eucharist; J. Pelikan and H. T. Lehmann, eds., Luther's Works; E. Schillebeeckx, Christ: The Sacrament of the Encounter with God; D. Willis, "Sacraments as Visible Words," in Theology Today 37:444–57; G. S. Wurgul, Validation of Christian Sacraments.

Literature representing the contemporary debate within the Roman Catholic Church: E. J. Kilmartin, "Catholic Tradition of Eucharistic Theology: Towards the Third Millennium," TS 55:405–57; "Sacramental Theology: The Eucharist in Recent Literature," TS 32:233–77; P. Schoonenberg, "Transubstantiation: How Far Is This Doctrine Historically Determined?" in Sacraments: An Ecumenical Dilemma, Concilium Series 24 (see also vols. 31, 40).

For a statement on contemporary Eastern Orthodox understanding of the Eucharist, see J. Meyendorf, "Notes on the Orthodox Understanding of the Eucharist," in Sacraments: An Ecumenical Dilemma, Concilium Series 24.

Love. Asked which is the greatest commandment, Jesus replied, "Love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your mind.' This is the first and greatest commandment. And the second is like it: 'Love your neighbor as yourself.' All the Law and the Prophets hang on these two commandments'" (Matt. 22:37–40; cf. Mark 12:29–31; Luke 10:26–27). According to Mark 12:31 Jesus stated that there is no command greater than these two commands. Hence, love is of preeminent importance in the Bible.

Biblical Terms. Old Testament. There are many Hebrew words to express the concept of love. By far the most prominent one (used over two hundred times) is the verb 'āhēb, denoting both divine and human love as well as love toward inanimate objects such as food (Gen. 27:4), wisdom (Prov. 4:6), sleep (Prov. 20:13), agriculture (2 Chron. 26:10), and the good (Amos 5:15). The noun ahābā (used about thirty times) is used primarily of human love, as seen in its frequent use in Song of Songs, although it is also used of divine love (Isa. 63:9; Jer. 31:3; Hos. 11:4; Zeph. 3:17). Another frequently used word (over forty times), the noun dôd, has the sexual sense of a man being addressed as "lover" or "beloved"; it is frequently used in the Song of Songs (e.g., 1:13, 14, 16; 2:3). Finally, there is the often used noun hesed, which is translated most of the time as "mercy" in the KJV, "steadfast love" in the RSV, "lovingkindness" in the NASB, and "love" in the NIV, all of which have the idea of loyal covenantal love.

New Testament. There are several words for love in the Greek language, but only two are used with any frequency in the NT. Although not prominent in prebiblical Greek, the verb agapō/noun agapē is the most common NT word for love. This verb/noun combination is the most frequently used in the LXX in translating 'āhēb/ahabāh. It is an unmerited, self-giving love. The second most frequently used word for love in the NT is the verb phileō. It is the most common word for love in prebiblical Greek, but it is not often used in the LXX. Although this word overlaps with agapō/agapē, it is affectionate love characteristic of friendship. Its derivatives philos, "friend" (used twenty-nine times), and philia, "friendship" (used only in James 4:4), support this connotation. It is a love that is warm and merited. Two common Greek words for love are never used in the NT: storgē, having the idea of family love or affection, as borne out by the negative adjective astorgos used only in Romans 1:31 and 2 Timothy 3:3; and erōs, expressing a possessive love and used mainly of physical love. In contrast to agapē, “erōs has two principal characteristics: it is a love of the worthy and it is a love that desires to possess. Agapē is in contrast at both points: it is not a love of the worthy, and it is not a love that desires to possess. On the contrary, it is a love given quite irrespective of merit, and it is a love that seeks to give” (Leon Morris, Testaments of Love, 128). Although erōs does not always have a bad connotation, certainly agapō/agapē is far loftier in that it seeks the highest good in the one loved, even though that one may be undeserving, and hence its prominence in the Bible can be understood.

Love of God. The Attribute of Love. God in his very essence is described as being not only holy (Lev. 11:44–45; 19:2; 1 Pet. 1:16), spirit (John 4:24), light (1 John 1:5), and a consuming fire (Deut. 4:24; Heb. 12:29); God is also love (1 John 4:8, 16). God does not need to attain nor attempt to maintain love; it is the very substance and nature of God. Bultmann rightly states: “The sentence cannot be reversed to read, ‘Love is God.’ In that case, ‘love’ would be presupposed as a universal human possibility, from which a knowledge of the nature of God could be derived” (Johannine Epistles, 66). It is from this very essence of God’s being that the activity of love springs.

The Activity of Love. This comes from God’s nature of love. “To say, ‘God is love’ implies that all His activity is loving activity. If He creates, He creates in love; if He rules, He rules in love; if He judges, He judges in love” (C. H. Dodd, Johannine Epistles, 110).

1. Love within the Godhead. For people to understand love, they must perceive its activity within the Godhead. Many verses speak of the Father’s love for the Son; however, only John 14:31 explicitly states that Jesus loved the Father. Certainly other passages imply Jesus’ love for the Father. Love is demonstrated by the keeping of commandments (John 14:31; cf. vv. 15, 21, 23). Christ alone has seen the Father (John 3:11, 32; 6:46) and known him (Matt. 11:27; Luke 10:22; John 7:29; 8:55; 10:15). They are united to one another (John 10:30, 38; 14:10–11, 20; 17:21–23). Although there are no verses that speak explicitly of the Holy Spirit’s love for the other two persons of the Trinity, it is implied in John 16:13–15, where Jesus says that the Spirit will not speak from himself, as Jesus did not speak from himself (John 12:49; 14:10), but will speak and disclose what he hears from Christ and the Father. There is, therefore, a demonstration of love within the Godhead.

2. Love toward humans. In the OT the expression of God’s love for humans is indicated in four ways. First, the simple statement of God’s love for humans is given in a few places (e.g., Deut. 10:18; 33:3; Isa. 43:4; 63:9; Jer. 31:3; Hos. 14:4; Zeph. 3:17). Second, there is God’s electing love for the nation of Israel (e.g., Deut. 4:37; 7:6–8; 10:15; 1 Kings 10:9; Hos. 3:1; 11:1, 4; Mal. 1:2). Third, there is the covenant love, which is a loyal or steadfast love (hesed; e.g., Exod. 20:6; Deut. 5:10; 7:9, 12; 1 Kings 8:23; 2 Chron. 6:14; Neh. 1:5; 9:32; Ps. 89:28; Dan. 9:4). This love is readily seen in Psalm 106:45: “He remembered his covenant and out of his great love he relented.” God’s covenant with Israel gives assurance of his love toward them (Isa. 54:10). Finally, a few references speak specifically of God’s love toward individuals (e.g., Solomon in 2 Sam. 12:24 and Neh. 13:26; Ezra in Ezra 7:28; Cyrus [?] in Isa. 48:14). Although the OT references to God’s love toward humans are not many, there are a sufficient number from various portions of the OT to adequately confirm it.

The NT is replete with references of God’s love for humans. A central passage demonstrating this is 1 John 4:10: “This is love: not that we loved God, but that he loved us and sent his Son as an atoning sacrifice for our sins.” The demonstration of God’s love for humans is seen in each of the persons of the Trinity. Those who keep Christ’s commandments evidence their love for him and they are loved by the Father (John 14:21, 23; 16:27). As the Father loves Christ, so also he loves the believer (John 17:23). The love of the Father for the believer is assured (Eph. 6:23; 2 Thess. 2:16; 1 John 3:1). When God is mentioned, it almost invariably refers to the Father. This is emphasized when some gift or blessing given to the believer is also mentioned, because the gift is usually his Son (e.g., John 3:16; Rom. 5:8; 1 John 4:9–10, 16) or the Holy Spirit (Rom. 5:5). There are many references to Christ’s love for people. While on earth Christ loved Lazarus, Mary, and Martha (John 11:3, 5, 36). There is his love for John the apostle (John 13:23; 19:26; 20:2; 21:7, 20) and for the disciples as a group (John 13:34; 14:21; 15:9, 12). Christ’s death is the evidence of his love for the believer (2 Cor. 5:14; Gal. 2:20; Eph. 5:2; 1 Tim. 1:14–15; 1 John 3:16). In his ascension there is an assurance of his love for believers individually (Rom. 8:35, 37; Eph. 6:23) as well as the church as a body (Eph. 5:25). Finally, the Holy Spirit’s love for the believer is mentioned in Romans 15:30.

In conclusion, the love of God toward people is seen throughout the Bible. It is a love that is unselfish and unmerited. The epitome of this is seen in God’s love for sinners who were his enemies and deserved nothing except his wrath, but instead he sent Christ to die for them that they might become the children of God (Rom. 5:6–11;

2 Cor. 5:14–21). It is God's love that serves as a basis for human love.

Love of Humankind. With the entrance of sin humans have become haters and enemies of God (John 15:18, 24–25; Rom. 1:30; 5:10). But because God initiated his love by sending his Son, believers are exhorted, on the basis of God's own love, to love one another (1 John 4:10–11, 19). The source of this love is God (1 John 4:7–9) and not people. This is substantiated in Galatians 5:22, where it is seen as the fruit of the Holy Spirit. The words immediately following love—"joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness and self-control"—further describe the character of love rather than other fruit of the Spirit, for the "fruit" and the verb are singular and the context is about love (cf. vv. 6, 13, 14). This is further confirmed when one analyzes the love chapter (1 Cor. 13) and notices that the words used to describe love are the same or similar words as used in Galatians 5:22–23 (many times the noun form in Gal. 5 is the verb form in 1 Cor. 13). In these passages love is described as being unselfish and sacrificial with no condition of expecting the same in return. It is love that is given and not deserved. God's love is so, and people having experienced God's love are to exhibit this in two directions, namely, toward God and toward others. This is what is commanded in the Bible (Matt. 22:37–40; Mark 12:29–31; Luke 10:26–27).

Love Toward God. In the OT God commands humans to love God with their whole being (Deut. 6:5; 10:12; 11:1, 13, 22; 13:3; 30:6, 16; Josh. 22:5; 23:11; Ps. 31:23), and there are a few explicit references indicting human love for God (1 Kings 3:3; Pss. 5:11; 18:1; 91:14; 116:1; Isa. 56:6). In the NT outside of Jesus' quoting the OT command to love God (Matt. 22:37; Mark 12:30, 33; Luke 10:27) there are no explicit commands for people to love God (possibly 1 Cor. 16:22; 2 Thess. 3:5). Only a few passages are concerned with people's response of love toward God (John 21:15–17; 1 Pet. 1:8; 1 John 5:2, cf. 1 John 4:20–21). The references to people's love toward God are comparatively few possibly because it would seem normal for people to love God, who has done so much for them, and because they have experienced God's love. However, the command to love God is important because it shows that God is approachable and desires the dynamic relationship involved in love.

Love Toward Humans. The two greatest commandments indicate that people are to love others as well as God. Although there are not many verses that speak of people's love for God, the Scriptures abound with statements of people's love toward others. This is seen in four ways.

1. Love for neighbor. The command to love one's neighbor is stated often—first in Leviticus 19:18, which is then quoted several times in the NT (Matt. 5:43; 19:19; 22:39; Mark 12:31, 33; Rom. 13:9; Gal. 5:14; James 2:8). Paul states that love for the neighbor is the fulfillment of the law (Rom. 13:8, 10). In giving the command to love one's neighbor, Jesus made it clear in the parable of the good Samaritan that one's neighbors are more than those who are acquaintances or of the same nationality (Luke 10:26–37). This is in keeping with the OT, for Moses enjoined the Israelites to love the stranger or alien (Deut. 10:19). People are to be concerned with other people as God is concerned with people. The command is to love one's neighbor to the degree that one loves one's self. Since people are basically selfish and concerned about themselves, they should have that same degree of concern for their neighbors.

2. Love for one's fellow believers. In Galatians 6:10 Paul exhorts the believers to do good to all people and especially to those who are of the household of faith. Believers should love their neighbors, whoever they may be, but they must have a real and deep concern and love for those who are fellow believers. In the OT this is seen in Leviticus 19:17–18, where the neighbor is a fellow countryman of the covenanted nation Israel or one of the same faith. In the NT there is to be a definite love between believers. Jesus gave a new commandment: that believers are to love one another as he has loved them (John 13:34–35; 15:12, 17; cf. 1 John 3:23; 5:2; 2 John 5). The command to love one another was not new, but to love one another as Christ had loved them was a new command. This is further elaborated in 1 John. One who loves his brother abides in light (2:10) and God abides in him (4:12). In fact, one who does not love his brother cannot love God (4:20). The source of love is God (4:7), and because of God's love one should love his brother (3:11; 4:11).

Outside the Johannine literature there is the same command to love others in the faith (Eph. 5:2; 1 Thess. 4:9; 5:13; 1 Tim. 4:12; Heb. 10:24; 13:1; 1 Pet. 2:17). This was to be done fervently (Rom. 12:10; 1 Pet. 1:22; 4:8) and with forbearance (Eph. 4:2), serving one another (Gal. 5:13). Paul loved the believers (1 Cor. 16:24; 2 Cor. 2:4; 11:11; 12:15) and was happy when he heard of the saints' love for one another (Eph. 1:15; Col. 1:4; 2 Thess. 1:3; Philem. 5; cf. Heb. 6:10). Hence, one sees that love for the brother was a dominant theme in the early church. It was evidence to the world that they were truly the disciples of Christ (John 13:35).

3. Love for family. The Scriptures have a few commands and ample illustrations of love within the family. Husbands are commanded to love their wives (Col. 3:19) as Christ loves the church (Eph. 5:25–33; cf. Eccles. 9:9; Hos. 3:1). The love of the husband for the wife is seen in several accounts (Gen. 24:67; 29:18, 20, 30; 2 Chron. 11:21; Song 4:10; 7:6). Only one time are wives commanded to love their husbands (Titus 2:4) and in only Song of Songs is it mentioned (1:7; 3:1–4; 7:12). Certainly the wife's submission to the husband is evidence of her love for him (Eph. 5:22–24; 1 Pet. 3:1–6). Also, only once is there a command for parents to love their children, specifically for young wives to love their children (Titus 2:4), but there are several illustrations of such love in the OT (Gen. 22:2; 25:28; 37:3; 44:20; Exod. 21:5). Interestingly, there is no command or example of children loving their parents. However, there is the oft-repeated command for children to honor and obey their parents, which would be evidence of their love for their parents (e.g., Exod. 20:12; Deut. 5:16; Prov. 1:8; Matt. 19:19; Mark 10:19; Luke 18:20; Eph. 6:1; Col. 3:20). In conclusion, although not much is spoken about love within the natural family, it can be assumed that this love would be expected; anyone who does not take care of his family is considered a denier of the faith and worse than an unbeliever (1 Tim. 5:8).

4. Love for enemies. Jesus commanded his followers to love their enemies (Matt. 5:43–48; Luke 6:27–35). This love is demonstrated by blessing those who curse them, praying for those who mistreat them, and giving generously to them. This shows that love is more than friendship based on mutual admiration; it is an act of charity toward one who is hostile and has shown no loveliness. Jesus reminded the disciples that it is natural to love those who love them, but to love their enemies is a real act of charity; it is to be a mark of his disciples as opposed to those who are sinners or Gentiles. An example of this love is seen in God's love and kindness toward evil people by sending them sun and rain as he does for those who love him. The NT epistles reiterate that rather than seeking revenge, believers are to love those who hate and persecute them (Rom. 12:14, 17–21; 1 Thess. 5:15; 1 Pet. 3:9).

Conclusion. God in his very essence is love; hence, love is expressed toward the undeserving. John 3:16 states this unforgettably: though people have repudiated him, God loves the world, and the extent of his love was the sacrifice of his own Son, Jesus Christ, who was willing to lay down his life. On the basis of God's love believers are enjoined to love God, who is deserving, and to love others and even their enemies, who are undeserving. God's love is not only basic but it continually extends to the undeserving and unloving, as seen in his continuing love for the wayward believer in both the OT and NT. Thus, there is a deep loyalty in God's love toward the undeserving, and this is the basis of God's command for humankind's love. Therefore, God's love is seeking the highest good in the one loved, and people are enjoined to seek the highest good or the will of God in the one loved.

H. W. HOEHNER

See also GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF.

Bibliography. C. Brown, W. Günther, and H.-G. Link, NIDNTT 2:538–51; M. C. D'Arcy, Mind and Heart of Love; V. P. Furnish, Love Command in the New Testament; V. R. Good, IDB 3:164–68; W. Harrelson, "Idea of Agape in the New Testament," JR 31:169–82; G. Johnston, IDB 3:168–78; W. Klassen, IDBSup, 557–58; C. S. Lewis, Four Loves; J. Moffatt, Love in the New Testament; H. Montefiore, "Thou Shalt Love Thy Neighbor as Thyself," NovT 5:157–70; L. Morris, Testaments of Love; A. Nygren, Agape and Eros; G. Outka, Agape: An Ethical Analysis; F. H. Palmer, NBC 752–54; J. Piper, Love Your Enemies; G. Quell and E. Stauffer, TDNT 1:21–55; O. J. F. Seitz, "Love Your Enemies," NTS 16:39–54; M. H. Shepherd Jr., IDB 1:53–54; N. H. Snaith, Distinctive Ideas of the Old Testament; C. Spicq, Agape in the New Testament; G. Stählin, TDNT, 9:113–71; B. B. Warfield, "Terminology of Love in the New Testament," PTR 16:1–45, 153–203; D. D. Williams, Spirit and the Forms of Love.

Love Feast. In the New Testament. The brotherly love between Christians that was enjoined by Jesus (John 13:34; Gr. agapē) found its expression in three practical ways. It was commonly exercised in almsgiving; hence, on twenty-six occasions agapē is translated in the KJV "charity." In church gatherings and in Christian greetings it was displayed by the kiss (1 Pet. 5:14; see also Rom. 16:16; 1 Cor. 16:20; 2 Cor. 13:12; 1 Thess. 5:26). Gradually the term came to be applied to a common meal shared by believers. Although these meals are called agapai only in Jude 12 and possibly 2 Peter 2:13, where there is a variant reading of agapais for apatais ("deceivings"), there is a considerable amount of other evidence for their existence in the early church.

In Acts 2:42–47 there is an account of the early form of "communism" practiced by the believers, which includes breaking bread from house to house and eating their meat (Gr. trophē) with gladness and singleness of heart. The first phrase may refer to the administration of the Lord's Supper, but the second obviously indicates a full meal. Similar "communistic" behavior is mentioned in Acts 4:32. By the time of Acts 6:1–7 the increase of disciples in the Jerusalem church led to the appointment of the seven to serve tables, which presumably refers to the responsibility for arranging the common meals. R. L. Cole (Love-Feasts: A History of the Christian Agape) suggests that this number was selected so that each one might be responsible for a different day of the week. This arrangement arose from the complaint of the Hellenists that their widows were being neglected, and so would indicate that already these common meals were being held for charitable purposes, as was indeed the custom later.

When Paul was at Troas (Acts 20:6–12) there took place on the first day of the week both a "breaking of bread" and a full meal (which idea is contained in the verb geusamenos, used here for eating, cf. Acts 10:10). Both here and in 2:42 it is difficult to determine whether the phrase “breaking of bread” denotes a common meal or is a more restricted reference to the Lord’s Supper: whenever these words occur together in the Gospels, they describe the action of Jesus (Matt. 26:26; Mark 14:22; Luke 22:19; 24:30, 35). Certainly by the time of Paul’s writing to the Corinthians (ca. A.D. 55) it is evident that the church observed the practice of meeting together for a common meal before partaking of the Lord’s Supper (1 Cor. 11:17–34). This custom, however, does not appear to have been observed always in the spirit of agapē, for the apostle complains that some make it an excuse for gluttony, while others go without: in v. 21 to idion deipnon may refer to the fact that they refused to pool their food, or that from such a pool each took as much as one could eat. At all events the situation described here is possible only in the context of a meal more substantial than, and preceding, the bread and wine of the Lord’s Supper.

Various theories have been put forward suggesting that the agapē was a development from pagan guilds or Jewish common meals, or that it was necessitated by the common desire to avoid meats offered to idols. From the fact that most early Christian paintings found in the catacombs depicting the agapē show seven persons partaking, Cole argues that the custom developed from the incident on the shore of Tiberias, where Jesus shared the breakfast meal with seven of his disciples (John 21), and that the conversation with Peter on that occasion supplied the title of agapē for this meal. It is equally possible that the meal may have arisen from a desire to perpetuate the table fellowship the apostles had enjoyed during their Lord’s earthly life, and that later, as the church grew and communal living became impossible, the common meal was continued before the Lord’s Supper in an effort to place the receiving of that sacrament in its historical context. The fact that the Johannine account points to the giving of the new commandment of mutual agapē at that meal (John 13:34) would be sufficient reason for the application of that name to the rite.

In Church History. Ignatius (Smyr. 8.2) refers to the agapē, as does the Didache (10.1 and 11.9), the latter suggesting that it still preceded the Eucharist. By the time of Tertullian (Apology 39; De Jejuniis 17; De Corona Militis 3) the Eucharist was celebrated early and the agapē later at a separate service, and this maybe the practice referred to by Pliny in his letter to Trajan (Epistles 10.96), though his information is not altogether clear. Clement of Alexandria (Paedagogos 2.1 and Stromata 3.2) gives evidence also of the separation of the two observances. Chrysostom (Homily 27 on 1 Cor. 11:17) agrees with the order mentioned by Tertullian, but while he calls the agapē

“a custom most beautiful and beneficial; for it was a supporter of love, a solace of poverty, and a discipline of humility,” he does add that by his day it had become corrupt. In times of persecution the custom grew from celebrating agapai in prison with condemned martyrs on the eve of their execution (see the Passion of Perpetua and Felicitas 17.1, and Lucian De Morte Peregrini 12), whence developed the practice of holding commemorative agapai on the anniversaries of their deaths, and these gave rise to the feasts and vigils that are observed today. Agapai also took place on the occasion of weddings (Gregory of Nazianzus Epistles 1.14) and funerals (Apostolic Constitutions 8.42).

During the fourth century the agapē became increasingly the object of disfavor, apparently because of disorders at the celebration and also because problems were raised by the expanding membership of the church, and an increasing emphasis was being placed on the Eucharist. Augustine mentions its disuse (Ep. ad Aurelium 22.4; see also Confessions 6.2), and Canons 27 and 28 of the Council of Laodicea (363) restricted the abuses. The Third Council of Carthage (393) and the Second Council of Orleans (541) reiterated this legislation, which prohibited feasting in churches, and the Trullan Council of 692 decreed that honey and milk were not to be offered on the altar (Canon 57), and that those who held love feasts in churches should be excommunicated (Canon 74).

There is evidence that bread and wine (Didache), vegetables and salt (Acts of Paul and Thecla 25), fish (catacomb paintings), meat, poultry, cheese, milk, and honey (Augustine, contra Faustum 20.20), and pultes, “a pottage” (Augustine), were consumed on different occasions at the agapē.

In Modern Times. In the Eastern church the rite has persisted and is still observed in sections of the Orthodox Church, where it precedes the Eucharist, and in the Church of St. Thomas in India. From the Eastern church it was continued through the Church of Bohemia to John Hus and the Unitas Fratrum, whence it was adopted by the Moravians. From them John Wesley introduced the practice within Methodism (see references in his Journal), and it is occasionally observed today in Methodist churches. In the Anglican Prayer Book of 1662 the only survival is probably the collection of alms for the poor during the Communion service, but the practice of the sovereign’s distribution of Maundy money is a relic of the agapē, and in this connection it is interesting that the epistle appointed for Maundy Thursday is 1 Corinthians 11:17–34. A modern attempt to revive the custom can be seen in the increasing practice of holding a “parish breakfast” following the early Communion service, and experiments at using the agapē as an opportunity for interdenominational fellowship are described by Frank Baker in Methodism and the Love-Feast.

D. H. WHEATON

See also LORD'S SUPPER.

Bibliography. J. F. Keating, Agapē and the Eucharist in the Early Church; J. C. Lambert, Sacraments in the New Testament.

Lovingkindness. The translation of the Hebrew word hesed in the KJV. The KJV also followed the equivalent given in the Latin translation (miseri-cordia), which is preceded by the usage of the LXX ("mercy"). Modern versions render hesed by "steadfast love," "unfailing love," "lovingkindness," and "love" (cf. RSV, NIV). The word hesed is found approximately 250 times in the Hebrew OT, and of these there are 125 instances in the Psalms.

The nature of the God of Israel is love. Even when Israel has sinned, they are assured that Yahweh is full of lovingkindness (Exod. 34:6; Num. 14:18; Ps. 86:5, 15; Joel 2:13), on which basis he can and does forgive the sin of his repentant people. The assurance of lovingkindness is given in the legal framework of the covenant. God's love is a distinctive love. Yahweh has promised to be loyal to Abraham and his descendants (Deut. 7:12). The relation between lovingkindness as an expression of commitment (loyalty) and truth (ʿemet) expressing faithfulness is so close that the words occur next to each other some sixteen times: hesed we'emet (Pss. 25:10; 89:14). The God of the covenant shows his covenantal faithfulness by his loving commitment to his people, regardless of their responsiveness or righteousness (Deut. 7:7–8). As such, lovingkindness can be a synonym for covenant (Deut. 7:9, 12). The blessings are generally described as the divine benefits (Deut. 7:13–16). Hence, lovingkindness is not a mere relational term; it is active. The God who loves showers his benefits on his covenant people. He is active (ʿāsā) in his love (Deut. 5:10; Ps. 18:50). His lovingkindness also finds expression in righteousness. Righteousness as a correlative to lovingkindness guarantees the ultimate triumph and reward of God's people and also contains a warning that Yahweh does not tolerate sin, even though he may forbear for a long time. The quality of lovingkindness is also assured by its durability. It is from generation to generation (Exod. 34:7). Twenty-six times we are told that "his lovingkindness is forever" (NIV: "his love endures forever"; cf. Pss. 106:1; 107:1; 118:1–4; 136).

On the other hand, the God who is love also expects his people to be sanctified by demonstrating lovingkindness to their covenant God and to others. The call for a commitment of love to God finds expression in Deuteronomy 6:5; and was repeated by our Lord (Matt. 22:37). The human response to God's lovingkindness is love. On a horizontal plane the believer is called upon to show both lovingkindness (as David did, 2 Sam. 9:1, 3, 7) and love (Lev. 19:18, cf. Matt. 22:39). In people's response to lovingkindness and all that it entails, they show that they belong to the heavenly Father (Matt. 5:44–48).

W. A. VAN GEMEREN

See also GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF.

Bibliography. N. Glueck, Hesed in the Bible; L. J. Kuyper, "Grace and Truth," RR 16:1–16; K. D. Sakenfeld, Meaning of Hesed in the Hebrew Bible; N. H. Snaith, Distinctive Ideas of the Old Testament.

Low Church. A term used to describe those who do not place great emphasis on the corporate or historically continuous or doctrinally orthodox nature of the church (or a part or denomination within it), but who usually emphasize the rights and faith of the individual Christian. The technical usage relates to the eighteenth-century Church of England, where Low Church was contrasted with High Church as two schools of thought at each end of the Anglican spectrum of theological emphasis. To be Low Church was to be a latitudinarian or a broad churchman (a term that replaced low churchman in the nineteenth century).

After the rise of the evangelical movement in the Church of England, and after its controversy with the Tractarian movement, evangelicals were often called Low Church because in comparison with tractarians they appeared to have a low view of the historical church, its traditions and sacraments. This usage, though common, is technically incorrect, since genuine evangelical Anglicans actually have a high view of the historical church and its liturgy and doctrine.

A good example of a genuine low churchman is Sydney Smith (1771–1845), a canon of St. Paul's Cathedral, London, and a founder of the Edinburgh Review. Good examples of later broad (low) churchmen are the Oxford liberals of ca. 1850—W. G. Ward, A. H. Clough, Arthur Stanley, A. C. Tait, and Frederick Temple.

Outside Anglicanism the expression Low Church is used imprecisely to refer either to those who do not favor much ritual or ceremony in worship or to those who oppose high views of clergy or church officials.

P. TOON

See also LATITUDINARIANISM.

Bibliography. O. Chadwick, Victorian Church.

Lucifer. See SATAN.

Luke, Theology of. The Evidence. The theology of Luke may be discerned by observing several converging lines of evidence. Since a Gospel lacks the logical sequence of propositional statements characteristic of the Epistles, great care is needed to assess this evidence accurately. This is also true of Acts with its narratives and speeches. Both parts of Luke's works also contain direct teaching (e.g., Jesus' sayings and the speeches in Acts). The following must be considered.

Narrative Structure. The careful statement of purpose inserted before the Gospel narrative commences alerts the reader to observe factors that contribute to assurance regarding the truth of the Christian gospel. The inclusion of the birth narratives, in contrast to Mark and John, and with different episodes from those in Matthew, directs the reader to certain themes regarding the messiahship and sonship of Jesus. The use of a chiasmic structure in Zechariah's Benedictus (1:68–79) focuses attention on the middle theme, oath/covenant, along with the other repeated themes: God's "coming" (or "visitation"), his "people," "prophets," the "hand" of the "enemies," and the "fathers." The introduction of two witnesses, Simeon and Anna, according to the accepted pattern of two witnesses, draws attention to and confirms the identity of the baby as the promised Messiah (2:25–38).

Within the narrative of Jesus' ministry certain editorial touches have great effect in featuring theological themes. For example, by omitting most of Mark's narrative of 6:45–8:26, Luke is able to move quickly from the stilling of the storm (Matt. 8:23–27; Mark 4:35–41; Luke 8:22–25), with its significant climactic question, "Who is this?" pausing for only a few incidents, mainly those with messianic significance, to the question of Herod, "Who, then, is this?" (Luke 9:9), and on to the question at Caesarea Philippi, "Who do you say I am?" (Luke 9:20). Another use of structure is the inclusion of the unique central section. This not only contains a collection of Jesus' teachings but features a travel motif. There is a strong sense of movement toward Jerusalem, the city of destiny in God's plan (9:51, 53; 13:22, 33; 17:11; 18:31). See 9:31; 19:11, 28 on Jerusalem, and 9:57; 24:13–17 for examples of Luke's specific references to traveling. The introduction to this section looks ahead particularly to Jesus' ascension ("taken up," Luke 9:51; cf. the same term in Acts 1:2). This is a unique emphasis of Luke, the final event of his Gospel (24:50–53).

In Acts such literary devices as plot structure, movement, timing, and emphasis by relative length of sections can highlight theological truth through events and the response of characters. Acts, like the Gospel, emphasizes the significant role of Jerusalem at the beginning of its narrative but then moves out across.

Vocabulary. Careful observation of word frequency, especially when it is weighted statistically, provides significant evidence of theological emphasis, especially in Luke in comparison with the other Gospels. Observing the relative frequency of such words as "salvation," "sinner," "today," "God," "word," "city," and various words grouped in semantic fields such as those relating to poverty and wealth (to cite just a few) is foundational in assessing the theology of Luke. One example is the unusual frequency of "today" (Luke 2:11; 4:21; 5:26; 12:28; 13:32, 33; 19:5, 9; 22:34, 61; 23:43 and nine times in Acts but without the same emphasis as in the Gospel).

Context. Here we see especially the converging lines of evidence. When several significant words occur together in a passage that clearly has theological importance, especially if it is at a crucial point in the narrative, the reader may be confident that the author is making a major theological statement. Jesus' conversation with Zacchaeus is an example (Luke 19:1–10). It occurs shortly before Jesus' triumphal entry, and it centers on one of the so-called sinners, social outcasts, and other unpopular people featured in Luke as the objects of Jesus' concern. The vocabulary includes such Lukan key terms as parachrēma (Luke's frequent word for "immediately"), "must," "today," chairō (represented in NIV by "gladly"), hyparchō (represented by "possessions"), and "salvation." Another significant event occurs at the beginning of Jesus' ministry: his preaching in the Nazareth synagogue. This contains a programmatic statement about Jesus' anointing by the Spirit to preach good news to the poor. The significant use of Isaiah 61 with its jubilee motif (the "year of the Lord's favor") contributes to its theological importance.

Geographical, Cultural, and Historical Background. Luke sets the salvation events within the sweep of human history (2:1–2; 3:1–2, 22–38). His description of Jesus' orientation to Jerusalem from Luke 9:51 on points to Jesus' passion, resurrection, and ascension. Acts portrays the progress of the gospel and the expansion of the church across successive cultural boundaries (see, e.g., 2:5–11, 6:1; 8:1–8, 26–39, 40; 10:1–23; 18, 19, and Paul's travels). Religious and cultural confrontations highlight the distinctions of the Christian gospel (e.g., 8:9–25, 26–35; 10:34–43; 13:4–12; 14:8–20; 16:11–12, 16–18; 17:16–34; 19:8–12, 23–27).

The importance of such background for an understanding of Luke's theology lies in Luke's presentation of the way Jesus and his followers approached their environment and society. He sets the action in the reign of Herod the tetrarch (Luke 3:1) having already acknowledged political power (1:51–52). Then John the Baptist's and Jesus' activities evoked Herod's question, "I beheaded John. Who, then, is this . . . ?" (9:7–9). Jesus healed the sick and controlled nature, but also dealt with political terrorism and natural disaster (Luke 13:1–5). He confronted the business world (Luke 16:1–15), poverty, wealth (16:19–31), and greed (19:1–10). The apostles confronted the power structure in Acts 4:19–20, 25–29. But Paul apologized upon realizing that he had insulted the high priest (23:2–5). In Acts the hubris of Herod Agrippa brought retribution (12:21–23).

Theological Themes. Some of the specific themes and topics in Luke are the following:

Christology. As in the other Gospels, Jesus is seen in Luke as Messiah (e.g., Luke 9:20). He is also the Son of God, as the angel indicates (Luke 1:35) and as he himself recognizes at age twelve (Luke 2:49). One unique contribution of Luke is the presentation of Jesus as a prophet. He is compared and contrasted with John the Baptist as a prophetic figure. Luke hints at his prophetic role in 4:24–27 (where Jesus compares his breadth of ministry to that of Elijah and Elisha). In 13:33 Jesus clearly refers to himself as a prophet. Also, the ministry of Elisha comes to mind at the raising of the son of the widow of Nain near where Elisha had raised the son of the “great woman” (2 Kings 4:8–37) of Shunem and Jesus is called a prophet (7:11–16, cf. 24:19). Also in Acts, Jesus is proclaimed to the Jewish community not only as “Lord and Christ” (2:36) but as the prophet like Moses (3:22; 7:37). He is the servant of Isaiah 61:1–2 in Luke 4:18–21 and (also only in Luke) declared to be the “chosen” servant of Isaiah 42:1 at his transfiguration (Luke 9:35) as well as God’s Son.

In Acts the resurrection-ascension-exaltation vindicates Jesus and affirms his identity (Acts 2:24–36; 3:13–15; 5:30–32; 17:30–31). He continues the work he began (Acts 1:1–2). He revealed himself in glory to the martyr Stephen (7:56) and spoke to Saul of Tarsus from heaven (9:3–6). Paul’s trials permit him (and Luke) to recapitulate his conversion experience and the truth he proclaimed about Christ (22:6–8; 24:14–16, 21; 26:6–8, 12–18, 22–23).

Soteriology. Throughout his Gospel and Acts, Luke emphasizes the need and provision of salvation. The Gospel focuses on the cross through the passion predictions (9:22 et al.) in common with Matthew and Luke, in the early foreshadowings (2:35; 5:35), and especially through the sayings at the Last Supper (22:19–22). In Acts the crucifixion is seen as God’s will, though accomplished by sinful people (Acts 2:23). If neither the Gospel nor Acts contains the explicit statements familiar from Paul on the theology of atonement, that does not mean Luke’s doctrine is deficient. The Gospel presents the need of salvation and the progress of Jesus to the cross vividly; Acts declares the opportunity of forgiveness through Christ (e.g., 2:38; 4:12; 10:43; 13:39).

Glory. Nevertheless, Luke has a very strong theology of glory. He emphasizes the victory of the resurrection with a declaration of the vindication of Jesus (Acts 2:24; 3:15; 4:10; 10:39–42; 13:26–37; 17:31). The ascension is stressed predictively in the middle of the Gospel (9:51) and in the middle of Luke’s two-volume work, Luke 24 and Acts 1.

Doxology. This theology of glory finds practical expression in repeated ascriptions of glory to God. These occur especially at the birth of Christ (2:14) and on the occasions of healing (e.g., Luke 5:25–26; Acts 3:8–10).

The Holy Spirit. The Spirit is prominent from the beginning (Luke 1:15, 41; 2:25–35). Jesus was conceived by the overshadowing of the Spirit (1:35). He was full of the Spirit and led by the Spirit at the time of his temptation (4:1). The Spirit was upon him in his ministry (4:18). The Lord promised the Holy Spirit in answer to prayer (11:13) in anticipation of Pentecost (24:49; Acts 1:4) and of Pentecost itself (2:1–13). The Holy Spirit is, of course, prominent throughout the book of Acts.

Prayer. This is especially significant at times of crisis in the life of Jesus (Luke 6:12; 9:18) and in the early perilous days of the church (e.g., Acts 4:23–31; 6:4, 6; 8:15; 9:11; 10:2; 13:3).

The Power of God. Along with the other Gospels, Luke records the miracles of Jesus and uses the word dynamis. This emphasis continues throughout Acts (3:1–10, 5:12–16; 14:8–10; 28:1–6, 7–10). Peter and Paul are delivered from prison (12:1–10; 16:25–26) and Paul from shipwreck (27:27–44). Angels are God’s messengers and agents in Luke and Acts (Luke 1:11–20, 26–38; 16:22; Acts 8:26; 10:1–8; 12:6–11).

The Sovereignty of God; Sense of Destiny; Prophecy and Fulfillment. This is a unique emphasis of Luke. The verb dei, “it is necessary,” occurs frequently with reference to the things Jesus “must” accomplish (Luke 2:49; 4:43; 9:22; 13:33; 24:7, 26, 44–47). Other passages, some at the very outset of the Gospel, express Jesus’ destiny, the predetermined role of John the Baptist, and the continuity of Old Testament salvation history. Among those that are unique to Luke’s Gospel (and near its beginning) are 1:30–35, 46–55; 2:8–12, 25–35 and the important thematic quotation from Isaiah 61 in 4:16–21. A concise statement of Jesus’ mission, “the Son of Man came to seek and to save what was lost,” appears in Luke 19:10 within the context noted above that is especially rich in special Lukan vocabulary. The crucial significance of John the Baptist, outstanding among the people of Israel, is that he is a transition figure in God’s great plan at the juncture of promise and fulfillment (1:67–79; 7:24–28). This is seen both in terms of accomplishment (Luke 1:1, translating peplērophorēmenōn as “accomplished” or, with NIV, “fulfilled”) and in terms of fulfillment of OT prophecy. “Proof from prophecy” is a significant aspect of Luke's writing. In Acts similar usage of dei to indicate what God intends to accomplish occurs in 1:16, 21; 3:21; 9:6; 17:3; 19:21; 23:11; 27:24, 26. But beyond the use of this word, Acts makes clear God's purpose and plan in the death, resurrection, and ascension of Christ (2:22–36; 3:17–26; 4:24–28; 13:32–41).

Eschatology. Luke presents Jesus' teachings about a period of faithful service prior to his return (e.g., the parable of the nobleman, or the ten minas, Luke 19:11–27) and also retains Jesus' strong eschatological teachings (e.g., 12:35–40) with a sense of imminency (e.g., 18:8). It is misguided speculation (cf. Luke 17:20–21) that Luke rejected, not the imminency of the Lord's return. Luke's unique emphasis on "today" is to be understood against this background. Acts 1 presents Jesus' teaching about his return (1:11). The times and dates are retained within the Father's authority (1:7). Christ is to remain in heaven until the promised time of restoration (Acts 3:21).

Israel and the People of God. The juncture of promise and fulfillment affects the identity of God's people. The word laos, "people," is used with special meaning in Luke. In contrast to the crowds (ochloi) and the hostile rulers, the "people" are ready to receive Jesus. The reader of the Gospel sees the newly inaugurated kingdom personified in "tax collectors and sinners" (cf. the contrast between rulers and unschooled preachers in Acts 4:13). Naturally, in the period of Luke–Acts most of the "people" are Jews. In Acts Luke deals with the nature of the people of God and the position of the church in relation to the unbelieving Jews. He emphasizes that thousands of the Jews believed including priests (Acts 6:7; 21:20) but also shows Paul's commission and circumstantial necessity to preach to the Gentiles (Acts 9:15; 13:46–48; 14:27; 15:3, 7, 12, 14; 18:6; 22:21; 26:17; 28:28). In Acts 18:10 laos seems to include believing Gentiles along with Jews. Luke allows the Jerusalem Council (Acts 15) to portray the tension caused by this transition from promise to fulfillment and Israel to the broader church.

A major element in the transition is the changing function of the law. Luke reports the Sabbath controversies (Luke 13:10–17; 14:1–6) and Jesus' teachings in Luke 16:16; 24:44. He does not include any discussion on that topic in Acts apart from chapter 15 but does report the accusation against Stephen (6:11, 13) and Paul's affirmation of fidelity to the law (25:8). Luke's narrative about Peter's acceptance of the Gentile Cornelius, based on the command in his vision to eat unclean animals (10:9–16, 34–35) and the concessions made to new Gentile Christians (15:12–29) are significant. Luke sees a necessary modification of the law's application as the church expands, without requiring Jewish believers (like Paul) to violate the integrity of that law.

Thus, in Luke's theology the people of God, the church, comprise all who receive forgiveness of sins through the name of Christ, both Jew and Gentile (Acts 10:43). They form a community who live together in fellowship and are faithful in learning, prayer, breaking of bread, sharing, worshiping, and witnessing in anticipation of Jesus' return (Luke 24:52; Acts 1:8–11; 2:42–47; 3:1; 4:23–35; 20:7). Individually Christians are to follow Jesus as committed disciples (Luke 9:23–26; 14:25–33).

The Word of God. This is a more significant theme in Luke's writings than is generally recognized. Logos occurs in the Gospel prologue (1:2), in 4:22, 32, 36, and notably in the parable of the sower, which stresses obedience to God's word (8:4–15). In Acts the growth of the "word" parallels the growth of the church (4:31; 6:7; 12:24).

Discipleship. Luke contains teachings not in the other Gospels. In addition to 9:23–26, paralleled in Matthew and Mark, Luke has major sections on discipleship in 9:57–62; 14:25–33.

Poverty and Wealth. Luke's Gospel, addressed to a wealthy person, records Jesus' mission to the poor (4:18). Luke refers to a future reversal of social roles in the Magnificat (1:46–55), the Beatitudes (along with the woes, which only Luke describes; 6:20–26), and the story of the rich man and Lazarus (16:19–31). Luke gives direct teaching on possessions (Luke 12:33), has the only comment in the Synoptics on the Pharisees' greed (Luke 16:14), and emphasizes the church's generosity in sharing with those in need (Acts 2:44–45; 4:32–37; 11:27–30).

Recent Study. The study of Luke's theology has been pursued with great vigor during the past several decades. The creative work of Conzelmann spawned a number of treatises on Luke's theology. At issue have been the purpose for which Luke wrote the Gospel and Acts, the extent and significance of his redaction (editing), and the effect the author's theological tendencies may have had on his historical reliability. According to Conzelmann, Luke's purpose was to set forth his scheme of salvation history. Marshall sees Luke's work as a witness to salvation itself. Others have seen an apologetic motive (e.g., defense of Christianity for one or another purpose) or a theological motive (e.g., the identity of the people of God). Must it be assumed, as is often done, that Luke's theological purposes affected his historical objectivity adversely? For a defense of Luke's credibility as both a historian and theologian, see Marshall's work below. In conclusion, Fitzmyer's caution against interpreting Luke's theology in terms of one's own thesis about Luke is itself a comment on many contributions to this subject.

W. L. LIEFFELD

See also JOHN, THEOLOGY OF; MARK, THEOLOGY OF; MATTHEW, THEOLOGY OF; NEW TESTAMENT THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. C. K. Barrett, Luke the Historian in Recent Study; D. L. Bock, Luke; Proclamation from Prophecy and Pattern; R. L. Brawley, Luke-Acts and the Jews; H. Conzelmann, Theology of St. Luke; N. A. Dahl, Jesus in the Memory of the Early Church; E. E. Ellis, Eschatology in Luke; J. A. Fitzmyer, Gospel according to Luke; H. Flender, St. Luke: Theologian of Redemptive History; E. Franklin, Christ the Lord: A Study in the Purpose and Theology of Luke-Acts; J. B. Green, Gospel of Luke; Theology of the Gospel of Luke; J. Jervell, Luke and the People of God; L. T. Johnson, Literary Function of Possessions in Luke-Acts; L. E. Keck and J. L. Martyn, eds., Studies in Luke-Acts; C. A. Kimball, Jesus' Exposition of the Old Testament in Luke's Gospel; W. L. Liefeld, Interpreting the Book of Acts; Luke: Historian and Theologian; I. H. Marshall, Gospel of Luke; A. J. Mattill Jr., Luke and the Last Things; D. A. Neale, None but the Sinners; J. Nolland, Luke 1-9:20 and Luke 9:21-18:43; J. C. O'Neill, Theology of Acts in Its Historical Setting; R. F. O'Toole, Unity of Luke's Theology; N. B. Stonehouse, Witness of Luke to Christ; C. H. Talbert, Literary Patterns, Theological Themes and the Genre of Luke-Acts; C. H. Talbert, ed., Perspectives on Luke-Acts; R. C. Tannehill, Narrative Unity of Luke-Acts; D. L. Tiede, Prophecy and History in Luke-Acts; J. B. Tyson, Images of Judaism in Luke-Acts.

Lust. This word once meant only a strong desire or craving, in a good or bad sense. Now it is used in the sense of craving that which is forbidden, especially sexual passion. The word has been used in the history of English translations, especially in the KJV, to render several Hebrew and Greek words that are basically neutral in ethical overtones and indicate only strong desire. In particular contexts these words may take on the negative aspect found in present usage of "lust."

The Hebrew words with the overtones of lust are: (1) nepes, desire (see Exod. 15:9; Ps. 78:18); (2) šērîrût, stubbornness (see Ps. 81:12); (3) ta'āwâ, object of desire (see Ps. 78:30); (4) hāmad, desire for the beauty of the evil woman (see Prov. 6:25); (5) 'āwâ, to desire (see Ps. 106:14); (6) 'āgab, have inordinate affection, lust (see Jer. 4:30; Ezek. 23:7, 9, 12).

In short, the OT uses the concept for an inordinate desire for anything—e.g., the desire for specific food in the Exodus experience—and particularly for an intense misdirection of love, whether of a man to an immoral woman (Prov. 6:25) or of the nation of Israel away from God, her loving husband, to her lovers as in Ezekiel 23:5-7: "Oholah engaged in prostitution while she was still mine; and she lusted after her lovers; . . . and defiled herself with all the idols of everyone she lusted after."

The Greek terms and their general meanings are: (1) epithymia, desire, longing; epithymeō, to desire, long for; (2) hēdonē, pleasure, enjoyment; (3) oregō, to desire; orexis, longing, desire; (4) pathos, passion.

Epithymia/epithymeō, which is the key concept and virtually incorporates the other concepts in the various passages, indicates basically simply desire. In sinful people the desire becomes inordinate or is set over against God and thus becomes sinful or is directed to that which is sinful. Thus, the term is used for covetousness (Rom. 7:7; 13:9) or for those things that choke out the word of the gospel (Mark 4:19; cf. Luke 8:14, hēdonē), and is often indicated to be sinful by the object stated or the adjective supplied or qualification given (e.g., "on evil things," 1 Cor. 10:6; "of the sinful nature," Gal. 5:16; Eph. 2:3; 2 Pet. 2:18; deceitful; hurtful; youthful; worldly; former; fleshly; or ungodly). As the dominant note of one's life, the sinful desire to have is marked as a key sin by James ("You want something but don't get it. You kill and covet" 4:2; also hēdonē, 4:1, 3) and by John in his summary statement of the avarice of sin, "For everything in the world—the cravings of sinful man, the lust of his eyes and the boasting of what he has and does—comes not from the Father but from the world" (1 John 2:16), as well as by Paul ("The love of money is a root of all kinds of evil. Some people, eager [oregō] for money have wandered from the faith," 1 Tim. 6:10). More specifically both Paul and the Lord Jesus speak of lust in terms of sexual immorality, i.e., homosexuality (Rom. 1:24; cf. 1:27, orexis) and the lustful look, which is adultery (Matt. 5:28). Heterosexual immorality Paul speaks of as "lustful passion" (NASB) or "passionate lust" (NIV) by combining two of the terms (pathei epithymias) and describing such action as that which the heathen engage in who do not know God (1 Thess. 4:5).

Since the particular expression of lust in both OT and NT has been in terms of a compelling sexual immorality, it is understandable that a theology and culture formed by the Bible have virtually reduced the meaning of the word lust to that area.

G. W. KNIGHT III

Bibliography. F. Büchsel, TDNT 3:167-72; L. Foster, ZPEB 3:1008-9; R. A. Killan, WBE 2:1057-58; W. E. Rafferty, ISBE 3:1941-42; H. Schönweiss, E. Beyreuther, and J. Guhrt, NIDNTT 1:456-61; G. Stahlin, TDNT 2:900-926; H. Ringgren, et. al., TWOT 1:18, 294; 2:587-91, 644, 957.

Luther, Martin (1483-1546). Major leader of the German Reformation. Luther's father came from peasant background, but his mother was from a prosperous bourgeois family. His father achieved success in the mining industry so that he was able to afford an excellent education for his son. Luther began his studies at the Ratschule in Mansfeld and probably attended the Cathedral

Luther, Martin

School at Magdeburg, where he came under the influence of the Brethren of the Common Life. He completed his preparatory education at the Georgenschule in Eisenach before entering the University of Erfurt in 1501. He received his B.A. in 1502 and his M.A. in 1505. In accordance with his father's wishes, he had begun study for a law degree when a brush with death in a thunderstorm in July 1505 caused him to make a vow to become a monk.

While in the monastery Luther began the serious study of theology at Erfurt. In 1508 he was sent to Wittenberg to lecture on moral philosophy at the newly founded University of Wittenberg. He returned to Erfurt in 1509, where he continued his studies and delivered lectures in theology. His teachers at Erfurt adhered to the nominalist theology of William of Ockham and his disciple, Gabriel Biel, which disparaged the role of reason in arriving at theological truth and placed a greater emphasis on free will and the role of human beings in initiating their salvation than did traditional scholasticism. In 1510–11 Luther made a trip to Rome on a mission for his order. While in Rome he was shocked by the worldliness of the clergy and disillusioned by their religious indifference. In 1511 he was sent back to Wittenberg, where he completed his studies for the degree of Doctor of Theology in October 1512. In the same year he received a permanent appointment to the chair of Bible at the university.

During the period 1507–12, Luther experienced intense spiritual struggles as he sought to work out his own salvation by careful observance of the monastic rule, constant confession, and self-mortification. Initially Luther viewed God as a wrathful judge who expected sinners to earn their own righteousness. His theology changed through the influence of the vicar general of his order, Johann von Staupitz, and his study of the Scriptures as he prepared his university lectures. His major theological breakthrough is called the "tower experience" because according to his statement it took place in the tower of the Augustinian monastery. Although scholars are still divided on dating, many today accept Luther's statement that it did not occur until 1518. They believe that Luther gradually progressed in his understanding of justification, moving from the Augustinian view of justification as a process initiated by God in which the sinner cooperated, to the belief that it was a forensic act in which Christ's righteousness is imputed to the sinner. Through faith Christ's righteousness becomes ours. Rather than contributing to our justification, good works are the result of justification and the response to having been justified. This view is suggested in some of his earlier writings, but it was not expressed clearly and unambigu-ously until the 1518 sermon on Two Kinds of Righteousness.

The Reformation began in October 1517 when Luther protested a major abuse in the sale of indulgences in his Ninety-five Theses. These were translated into German, printed, and circulated throughout Germany, arousing a storm of protest against the sale of indulgences. When the sale of indulgences was seriously impaired, the papacy sought to silence Luther. He was first confronted at a meeting of his order held in Heidelberg on April 26, 1518, but he used the Heidelberg disputation to defend his theology and to make new converts. In August 1518 Luther was summoned to Rome to answer charges of heresy, even though he had not taught contrary to any clearly defined medieval doctrines. Because Luther was unlikely to receive a fair trial in Rome, his prince, Frederick the Wise, intervened and asked the papacy to send representatives to deal with Luther in Germany. Meetings with Cardinal Cajetan in October 1518 and Karl von Miltitz in January 1519 failed to obtain a recantation from Luther, although he continued to treat the pope and his representatives with respect.

In July 1519 at the Leipzig debate Luther questioned the authority of the papacy as well as the infallibility of church councils and insisted on the primacy of Scripture. This led his opponent, Johann Eck, to identify him with the fifteenth-century Bohemian heretic, Jan Hus, in an effort to discredit Luther. After the debate Luther became considerably more outspoken and expressed his beliefs with increasing certainty. In 1520 he wrote three pamphlets of great significance. The first, the Address to the Christian Nobility of the German Nation, called upon the Germans to reform the church and society, since the papacy and church councils had failed to do so. The second, Babylonian Captivity of the Church, clearly put Luther in the ranks of the heterodox, because it attacked the entire sacramental system of the medieval church. Luther maintained there were only two sacraments, baptism and the Lord's Supper—or at most three, with penance possibly qualifying as a third—rather than seven sacraments. He also denied the doctrines of transubstantiation and the sacrificial Mass. The third pamphlet, Freedom of the Christian Man, was written for the pope. It was nonpolemical and clearly taught the doctrine of justification by faith alone.

Even before the publication of these pamphlets a papal bull of excommunication was drawn up to go into effect in January 1521. In December 1520 Luther showed his defiance of papal authority by publicly burning the bull. Although condemned by the church, Luther still received a hearing before an imperial diet at Worms in April 1521. At the Diet of Worms he was asked to recant his teachings, but he stood firm, thereby defyng also the authority of the emperor, who placed him under the imperial ban and ordered that all his books be burned. On the way home from Worms, Luther was abducted by friends who took him to the Wartburg castle, where he remained in hiding for nearly a year. While there he wrote a series of pamphlets attacking Catholic practices and began his German translation of the Bible. In 1522 Luther returned to Wittenberg to deal with disorders that had broken out in his absence, and he remained there for the rest of his life. In 1525 he married Catherine von Bora, a former nun, who bore him six children. Luther had an extremely happy and rich family life, but his life was marred by frequent ill health and bitter controversies.

Luther often responded to opponents in a polemical fashion, using extremely harsh language. In 1525 when the peasants of south Germany revolted and refused to heed his call to negotiate their grievances peacefully, he attacked them viciously in a pamphlet entitled Against the Murdering Horde of Peasants. A controversy with the Swiss reformer Ulrich Zwingli over the Lord's Supper split the Protestant movement when an effort to resolve the differences at a meeting in Marburg failed in 1529. Throughout his life Luther maintained an overwhelming workload, writing, teaching, organizing the new church, and providing overall leadership for the German Reformation. Among his more important theological writings were the Smalcald Articles published in 1538, which clearly defined the differences between his theology and that of the Roman Catholic Church.

Luther never viewed himself as the founder of a new church body, however. He devoted his life to reforming the church and restoring the Pauline doctrine of justification to the central position in Christian theology. In 1522, when his followers first began to use his name to identify themselves, he pleaded with them not to do this. He wrote: "Let us abolish all party names and call ourselves Christians, after him whose teaching we hold. . . . I hold, together with the universal church, the one universal teaching of Christ, who is our only master." He died at Eisleben on February 18, 1546, while on a trip to arbitrate a dispute between two Lutheran nobles. He was buried in the Castle Church at Wittenberg.

R. W. HEINZE

See also LEIPZIG DISPUTATION; LUTHERAN TRADITION; LUTHER'S SMALL CATECHISM; MARBURG COLLOQUY; NINETY-FIVE THESES; SMALCALD ARTICLES.

Bibliography. P. Althaus, Theology of Martin Luther; J. Atkinson, Martin Luther and the Birth of Protestantism; R. H. Bainton, Here I Stand: A Life of Martin Luther; H. Bornkamm, Luther in Mid-Career 1521–1530; M. Brecht, Martin Luther; G. Brendler, Martin Luther: Theology and Revolution; G. Ebeling, Luther: An Intro- duction to His Thought; M. U. Edwards, Luther's Last Battles; M. Harran, Luther on Conversion: The Early Years; E. Iserloh, Theses Were Not Posted: Luther between Reform and Reformation; J. M. Kittelson, Luther the Reformer; B. Lohse, Martin Luther: An Introduction to His Life and Thought; J. Mackinnon, Luther and the Reformation; A. McGrath, Luther's Theology of the Cross: Martin Luther's Theological Breakthrough; H. Oberman, Luther: Man between God and the Devil; J. Pelikan and H. T. Lehmann, eds., Luther's Works; E. G. Rupp, Luther's Progress to the Diet of Worms; D. C. Steinmetz, ed., Luther in Context; J. M. Todd, Luther; W. von Loewenich, Luther's Theology of the Cross; G. Yule, ed., Luther: Theologian for Catholics and Protestants.

Lutheran Tradition. This term, or "Lutheranism," is employed to refer to the doctrine and practices authoritative in the Lutheran churches and as a broad term for those churches throughout the world in general. The name Lutheran was not self-chosen but was initially applied by the enemies of Martin Luther in the early 1520s. Only when he felt that the identification was understood to mean recognition of the truth of his teaching did Luther suggest, "If you are convinced that Luther's teaching is in accord with the Gospel, . . . Then you should not discard Luther so completely, lest with him you discard also his teaching, which you nevertheless recognize as Christ's teaching."

This teaching of Luther—forged from his discovery that the righteousness of God is not a righteousness that judges and demands but the righteousness given by God in grace—found its systematic expression in the formularies incorporated in the Book of Concord. All these documents, with the exception of the Formula of Concord, were written between 1529 and 1537 by Luther and Philip Melancthon. They reflect the emphasis on justification by grace and the correction of abuses in the life of the church while at the same time "conserving" the church's catholic heritage (through explicit commitment to the ancient creeds, traditional forms of worship, church government, etc.). During the years following Luther's death in 1546, theological conflicts increasingly plagued his followers. The Formula of Concord, composed of the Epitome of the Articles in Dispute and the Solid Declaration of Some Articles of the Augsburg Confession, sought to resolve those disputes in terms of the authentic teaching of Luther. Subscription to these "symbolical" writings of the Book of Concord as true expositions of the Holy Scriptures has historically marked the doctrinal positions of Lutheranism.

Doctrines. The distinctive doctrines of Lutheran theology have commonly been related to the classical leitmotifs of the Reformation: sola Scriptura, sola gratia, sola fide.

The theology of Lutheranism is first a theology of the Word. Its principle of sola Scriptura af-firmly the Bible as the only norm of Christian doctrine. The Scripture is the causa media by which people learn to know God and his will; the Word is the one and the only source of theology. Lutheranism pledges itself “to the prophetic and apostolic writings of the Old and New Testaments as the pure and clear fountain of Israel, which is the only norm according to which all teachers and teachings are to be judged and evaluated” (Formula of Concord, Epitome). To be sure, the authority of Scripture had been emphasized prior to Luther and the Reformation. However, when Lutheranism referred to the Bible as the divine Word, brought to humankind through the apostles and prophets, it spoke with a new conviction regarding the primacy of the Word. Luther recognized that the authority of Scripture was valid even where it was opposed by pope, council, or tradition.

Lutheran Tradition

The Lutheran understanding of this principle should be distinguished from bibliolatry. Historic Lutheranism viewed Scripture as the organic foundation of faith. It is the source of theology in an instrumental sense. It is not the cause of the being of theology; that would truly be a deification or worship of a book. Rather, God is the first cause of theology; he is the principium essendi—its foundation, its beginning, and its end. The Scripture is the principium cognoscendi, for from Scripture theology is known and understood. Furthermore, the Lutheran view of the Bible is to be distinguished from a legalistic orientation. Christ is at the center of the Bible. Essential to understanding the Word of God is accepting the promises of the gospel by faith. If this faith is lacking, the Scriptures cannot be correctly understood.

The second doctrinal distinctive of Lutheranism is the doctrine of justification. According to Luther, there are two kinds of righteousness—an external righteousness and an inner righteousness. External righteousness, or civil righteousness, may be acquired through just conduct or good deeds. Inner righteousness, however, consists of the purity and perfection of the heart. Consequently, it cannot be attained through external deeds. This righteousness is of God and comes as a gift of his fatherly grace. This is the source of justification. The ground for justification is Christ, who by his death made satisfaction for the sins of humankind. The Apology of the Augsburg Confession defines justification as meaning “to absolve a guilty man and pronounce him righteous, and to do so on account of someone else’s righteousness, namely, Christ’s.” Thus, God acquits people of all their sins, and he does this not because they are innocent; rather God justifies people and declares them to be righteous for Christ’s sake, because of his righteousness, his obedience to God’s law, and his suffering and death. When God justifies, he not only forgives sins, but he also reckons to people Christ’s perfect righteousness. God declares sinners to be righteous, apart from human merit or work, for the sake of Christ (forensic justification).

Related to this teaching is the third significant hallmark of Lutheranism: sola fide. The means whereby justification accrues to individuals is faith. The gospel, as Lutheranism confessed it, made faith the only way by which people could receive God’s grace. In the medieval scholastic tradition theologians spoke of faith as something that could be acquired through instruction and preaching (fides acquisita). This was distinguished from infused faith (fides infusa), which is a gift of grace and implies adherence to all revealed truth. Lutheranism repudiated this distinction. The faith that comes by preaching coincides with that which is justifying; it is wholly a gift of God. Justifying faith is not merely a historical knowledge of the content of the gospel; it is the acceptance of the merits of Christ. Faith, therefore, is trust in the mercy of God for the sake of his Son.

Lutheranism has persistently refused to see faith itself as a “work.” Faith is receptivity, receiving Christ and all that he has done. It is not people’s accomplishments that effect their justification before God. Faith is instead that which accepts God’s verdict of justification: “Faith does not justify because it is so good a work and so God-pleasing a virtue, but because it lays hold on and accepts the merit of Christ in the promise of the holy Gospel” (Formula of Concord, Solid Declaration).

The article of justification by grace through faith challenged the Roman Catholic tradition, which asserted that faith was pleasing to God only if it was accompanied by good works and perfected by love. At the Council of Trent in 1545 the Lutheran view was condemned, and the medieval Roman Church reiterated its doctrine that justification is a state of grace in which human good works have merit. For Lutheranism, faith and works certainly cannot be separated; however, they must be distinguished. The righteousness of faith refers to a person in relation to God (coram Deo). The righteousness of good works refers to a person in relation to other people (coram hominibus). These must not be confused so as to intimate that people will seek to become just in the sight of God on the strength of their good deeds, or in such a way that they will attempt to conceal sin with grace. Thus, with respect to justification, strictly speaking, good works must be clearly distinguished. But faith cannot be apart from works. Where there is faith in Christ, love and good works also follow.

In one way or another the three fundamental doctrines of Lutheranism—sola Scriptura, sola gratia, sola fide—determine the shape of other distinctive teachings. For example, the position of Lutheranism on a person’s free will is understood in the light of the doctrine of justification.

People are completely without a free will with respect to the “spiritual sphere” (that which concerns salvation). Salvation depends exclusively on the omnipotent divine will of grace. People do not have freedom to do good in the spiritual sense. Similarly, the Lutheran understanding of the Lord’s Supper must be viewed in light of the principle of sola Scriptura. Lutheranism has consistently battled against every denial of the real and essential presence of Christ’s body and blood in the Lord’s Supper. An important element of Lutheran biblical interpretation is that one takes words of command and promise literally unless there is some compelling reason for not doing so. If the words of institution at the supper were to be taken figuratively simply because they appear to conflict with reason or common sense (e.g., the Reformed axiom of the finite being incapable of the infinite), one could do so with any command or promise of God. Thus, Lutheranism has insisted on the doctrine of the “real presence” on the basis of Christ’s plain words. Also, the Lutheran view of grace contributed to the retention of infant baptism. Baptism expresses the participation of the Christian in the death and resurrection of Christ. Baptism, like the gospel, is powerful to confer the very faith it calls for with its promises; and in each case the Holy Spirit works faith through the instruments of his choosing, namely, baptism and the gospel. In Lutheran understanding it is no more difficult for the Holy Spirit to work faith in infants through the gospel promise attached to the water of baptism than in adults alienated from God through the proclamation of the gospel in preaching.

History. These doctrines of Lutheranism were subject to a variegated history in the centuries following the Reformation era. In the seventeenth century they were elaborated in a scholastic mold. Lutheran orthodoxy, whose classical period began about the year 1600, was an extension of the tradition represented by the Lutheran confessional writings. It was, however, profoundly influenced by the neo-Aristotelianism that had secured a foothold in the German universities. This German scholastic philosophy accented the intellectual strain that characterized Lutheran orthodoxy and prompted a more pronounced scientific and metaphysical treatment of theological questions. However, scholastic methodology did not lead to the surrender of Lutheran emphasis on the Bible. The dogmatic works of the orthodox period were based on the principle of sola Scriptura. There was an effort to systematize an objective form of theology (theology defined as a “teaching about God and divine things”). Revelation, as codified in the Bible, provided the point of departure for the orthodox theologians. The chief representatives of this period of Lutheranism included Johann Gerhard, Nikolaus Hunnius, Abraham Calov, and David Hollaz.

The period of Lutheran orthodoxy gave way to the pietist movement in the latter part of the seventeenth century. Pietism was a reaction to what was perceived as an arid intellectualism in the orthodox theologians. Philipp Jakob Spener’s Pia desideria called for a reform movement within Lutheranism. According to Spener, experience is the basis of all certainty. Therefore, the personal experience of the pious is the ground of certainty for theological knowledge. This led to the pietist critique of the metaphysical questions treated by the orthodox fathers as well as their traditional philosophical underpinnings. For the pietist Lutherans inner spiritual phenomena and individual experiences elicited the greatest interest. Since Spener and his followers assumed that theological knowledge could not be acquired apart from the experience of regeneration, their theological expositions dealt mainly with empirical religious events.

In the eighteenth century theological rationalism appeared in Germany. Christian Wolff, utilizing the Leibnizian principle of “sufficient reason,” argued that learning must be based on clear and distinct concepts and that nothing should be set forth without proof. Wolff’s thought had a great impact on theological activity. Harmony between faith and reason was assumed, and the natural knowledge of God led to the idea of special revelation while the rational proofs for the truth of Scripture demonstrated that the Bible is the source of this revelation. While Wolff intended to defend traditional doctrine, the consequence of his method was the acceptance of reason as a final authority. This conclusion was extended by Johann Semler, who applied a historicocritical method to the Bible and inserted it totally into the framework of human development.

Many Lutherans saw the influence of rationalism behind the Prussian Union of 1817. Frederick William III announced the union of the Lutherans and the Reformed into one congregation at his court in celebration of the three hundredth anniversary of the Reformation and appealed for similar union throughout Prussia. The union was the impetus for a revival of Lutheran confessionalism, which reacted to an increasing doctrinal indifference in some quarters of German Lutheranism as well as a growing interest in biblical criticism that threatened to remove the doctrinal foundations of Luther’s church. Prominent figures in the effort to restore historical Lutheranism were C. P. Caspari, E. W. Hengstenberg, and C. F. W. Walther. Walther joined an emigration of Saxons to the United States in 1838 to escape the theological legacy of rationalism and the union.

Apart from Germany, where two-thirds of the population had accepted Lutheranism by the end of the sixteenth century, the expansion of Lutheranism through Sweden, Denmark, and

Lutheran Tradition

Norway left national churches that have endured in strength. From these nations Lutherans migrated to the United States and Canada. The earliest Lutherans in America can be traced back to the seventeenth century. In Delaware, Swedish Lutherans had settled as early as 1638. In Georgia, almost a hundred years later, a group of refugee Lutherans from Salzburg established residence. Colonies of Lutherans also settled in upper New York and in Pennsylvania by the time of the Revolution. Henry Melchior Muhlenberg organized the first synod of Lutherans on American soil.

Contemporary Lutheranism seems to have entered on an age of unification. The various waves of immigrants to America led to a proliferation of Lutheran bodies. However, there have been a number of mergers between these groups, which are now mainly included in the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America (1988) and the Lutheran Church—Missouri Synod (1847). The Lutheran World Federation, founded in 1947, cultivates world unity and mutual assistance among its fifty or more member churches. Lutheranism throughout the world constitutes the largest of the churches that have come out of the Reformation, numbering some seventy million members, of whom between nine and ten million live in the United States and Canada.

J. F. JOHNSON

See also ADIAPHORA, ADIAPHORISTS; CONCORD, BOOK OF; CONCORD, FORMULA OF; LUTHER, MARTIN; MELANCHTHON, PHILIP; MONERGISM; MUHLENBERG, HENRY MELCHIOR; PIETISM; REFORMATION, PROTESTANT; SYNERGISM; WALTHER, CARL FERDINAND WILHELM.

Bibliography. J. M. Boice and B. Sasse, eds., Here We Stand; W. Elert, Structure of Lutheranism; T. L. Grave, Augsburg Confession; E. W. Gritsch and R. W. Jenson, Lutheranism; C. P. Krauth, Conservative Reformation and Its Theology; E. C. Nelson, ed., Lutherans in North America; F. Pieper, Christian Dogmatics; R. D. Preus, Theology of Post-Reformation Lutheranism; T. G. Tappert, ed., Book of Concord; R. C. Wolf, ed., Documents of Lutheran Unity in America.

Luther's Small Catechism. Martin Luther wrote his Small Catechism, a simple manual of instruction in the Christian faith, in 1529 after one of the great disappointments of his life. In 1527 and 1528 Luther and his associates were asked by their prince to inspect the churches of Saxony.

The results were profoundly disappointing. Ignorance reigned among clergy and laity alike, and the schools were in ruins. To meet the need for popular instruction, Luther immediately drew up wall charts containing explanations in simple language of the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, and the Apostles' Creed. When his colleagues delayed in their own efforts at providing educational materials, Luther pulled together his wall charts and published them as a short, simple exposition of the faith.

Luther intended his catechism to be an aid for family worship. In its preface he condemned parents who, by neglecting the Christian education of their children, had become the "worst enemies of God and man." Almost all of the catechism's sections began with remarks directed at the head of the house (e.g., "The Ten Commandments in the plain form in which the head of the family shall teach it to his household").

The catechism contains nine sections, each a series of questions and answers. These sections treat the Ten Commandments, the Apostles' Creed, the Lord's Prayer, baptism, confession and absolution, and the Lord's Supper. They also include instructions for morning and evening prayers, grace at meals, and a "Table of Duties" made up of scriptural passages "selected for various estates and conditions of men, by which they may be admonished to do their respective duties."

Much of the influence of Lutheranism around the world can be traced to the success of this catechism in expressing the profound truths of the faith in a language that all can understand. Unlike some Reformed confessions, Luther's Small Catechism lays out the Ten Commandments before describing the work of Christ. The catechism's exposition of the creed focuses on the free gift of salvation in Christ. And its sections on baptism and the Lord's Supper expound the views—mediating between Catholic sacramentalism and Protestant mere symbolism—which Luther developed fully in lengthy theological works.

M. A. NOLL

See also CATECHISMS; LUTHER, MARTIN.

Bibliography. A. C. Repp, Luther's Catechism Comes to America; T. G. Tappert, ed., Book of Concord.

Lux, Mundi. See GORE, CHARLES.

Lying. See LIE, LYING.

Mm

MacDonald, George (1824–1905). Scottish theologian and man of letters best known for his fairy tales for young people and his fantasies for adults. He was also a novelist and poet, writing some twenty-six novels in which he scrutinized human behavior and commented on it from a Christian point of view. He also wrote a considerable amount of devotional poetry in the romantic tradition. His poem “Dairy of an Old Soul,” composed of a seven-line stanza for each day of the calendar year, is a good work to introduce the reader to his mystical devotional attitudes and convictions.

He was born in Huntly, Scotland, and educated at King’s College, Aberdeen, and Highbury Theological Seminary, London. In 1851 he began his ministry in the Trinity Congregational Church at Arundel, West Sussex. Forced to resign when the laity objected to his teachings, he took his family to Manchester and soon started his writing career. Much of his life was spent in poverty and poor health, but he made a lecture tour of America in 1872–73, and as a mature author he was able to live in the more healthful climate of Italy.

MacDonald published five volumes of theological essays—Hope of the Gospel (1892), Miracles of Our Lord (1870), and three series of Unspoken Sermons (1867, 1885, and 1889). Although he was a keen and consistent thinker, he distrusted the ability of any abstract system of thought to contain truth, feeling that the imagination rather than the intellect could approach truth more nearly and embody it more compellingly. Hence an understanding of MacDonald’s imaginative writings is necessary for a full appreciation of his thought and influence. In general, his convictions spring from a Scottish Calvinist base, strongly modified by German romantic thought as it came to him mainly through the poetry and fantasies of the German writers Novalis and E. T. A. Hoffmann.

The following ideas are characteristic of MacDonald’s writings: Active obedience to the precepts of Christ is the all-important element in Christian experience. It is the essential response to God as our loving heavenly Father who looks impartially upon all people and expends all his divine energies to bring men “home” to himself. He works first through the agency of Christ, who in his person as Son of God is our atonement. The sufferings of God reveal his love. But God speaks as well through the entirety of creation and human experience, as his Spirit is resident in all things, offering to each person what each one needs—although it may be painful or appear terrible—for spiritual growth. People who are receptive to divine influences are in the process of growing to become full sons of God in will and deed; those who spurn God’s loving intentions are diminishing into spiritual grotesques. But MacDonald expresses hope for the eventual repentance of all the inhabitants of hell. He held that, inasmuch as God made man out of his own glory (not ex nihilo), the essential self to each man is divine. All unbelievers will one day be afforded opportunity to see both the hideous realities they had made themselves in God’s sight and the true beauty of divine love. The inevitable result of this vision will be repentance and turning to God. Finally, all nations will worship God as the source of righteousness and strength, and divine love will triumph in all.

These convictions have imaginative embodiment in the stories for young people—Princess and the Goblin (1872), Princess and Curdie (1883), and At the Back of the North Wind (1871)—and in two fantasies for adults, Phantastes (1858) and Lilith (1895). The fairy tale “Golden Key” is perhaps his masterpiece.

R. N. HEIN

Bibliography. R. N. Hein, George MacDonald: Victorian Mythmaker; Harmony Within: The Spiritual Vision of George MacDonald; C. S. Lewis, George MacDonald: An Anthology; G. MacDonald, George MacDonald and His Wife; S. Prickett, Romanticism and Religion; Victorian Fantasy; W. Raeper, George MacDonald; R. H. Reis, George MacDonald’s Fiction; D. S. Robb, God’s Fiction; G. E. Sadler, Expression of Character: The Letters of George MacDonald.

Machen, John Gresham (1881–1937). A leading American conservative theologian, NT scholar, and ecclesiastical controversialist. Machen was born in Baltimore of a distinguished southern Presbyterian family. He graduated with high honors from Johns Hopkins University, where under the guidance of the noted Greek scholar B. L. Gildersleeve he excelled in classical studies. After a year's graduate study at Johns Hopkins, Machen entered Princeton Theological Seminary to study under eminent Calvinist scholars such as Benjamin Warfield, Francis Patton, Geerhardus Vos, and R. D. Wilson.

During his final year as undergraduate Machen had the distinction of having a series of articles published in the Princeton Theological Review entitled "Critical Discussion of the NT Account of the Virgin Birth of Jesus." Upon graduation from Princeton in 1905 he was still uncertain of a call to the ministry and so went to Germany for a year's postgraduate work in the universities of Marburg and Göttingen. Although impressed and attracted by the liberal theology of Wilhelm Herrmann, Machen struggled through to a deep commitment to the infallibility of Scripture and to the traditional emphases of historic Reformed theology.

In 1906 Machen returned to Princeton as an instructor in the NT department. He continued in this position until he was installed as professor of NT in 1915. Only in 1913 did he finally decide to seek ministerial ordination. After 1912 he became more widely known as a scholar through the publication of various articles, reviews, and translations.

During World War I he spent several months on the front lines in France serving as a YMCA worker. After the war the theological atmosphere in the Northern Presbyterian Church and in Princeton Seminary was changing from traditional Calvinism to a much more liberal or "modernist" interpretation of Christianity. In the intense struggles between fundamentalists and modernists during the 1920s and 30s Machen emerged as an international champion of biblical authority and evangelical theology.

The faculty of Princeton Seminary split over some of these issues, and ultimately the liberal forces in the Presbyterian Church "reorganized" Princeton Seminary in 1929 in such a way that their viewpoint prevailed administratively. This led to the resignation of Machen, Cornelius Van Til, Oswald T. Allis, R. D. Wilson, and others, who under the guidance of Machen founded Westminster Seminary in Philadelphia in 1929.

Owing to his concern over liberal trends among Presbyterian missionaries, Machen founded the Independent Board for Presbyterian Missions in 1933. This step was to cost him his relationship to the church. He was tried by New Brunswick Presbytery in Trenton, New Jersey, in 1935 for disobeying the order of General Assembly to leave the Independent Board. Machen was not allowed to defend himself from Scripture or to make any reference to the theological implications of his case. He was suspended from the ministry and lost his appeals to synod and to the General Assembly of 1936.

On June 11, 1936, Machen led in the organization of the Presbyterian Church of America (which soon changed its name to the Orthodox Presbyterian Church). This new body did not grow as had been hoped and within a short time experienced division within its own ranks. Perhaps part of the problem lay with Machen's decision to dissolve the Covenant Union, which was an organization of Bible-believing Christians within the Presbyterian Church. The Rev. Walter Watson of Syracuse, N.Y., requested Machen to maintain relations with this group in the old church even though he was starting a separate body. If this were done, Watson felt that in time many thousands might decide to join with those who had already come out with Machen. The Covenant Union was dissolved, however, and thus evangelicals in the new church and those remaining in the old church failed to benefit from one another's fellowship and common purposes over the years. Nevertheless, evangelical Christianity in the Western world owes a large debt to Machen and to the organizations he founded for their intelligent and courageous explanation of and stand for historical Christian truth.

Machen died on a preaching tour in North Dakota. Among his most influential books are Origin of Paul's Religion (Sprunt Lectures for Union Seminary in Virginia in 1921); New Testament Greek for Beginners (1923); Christianity and Liberalism (1923); What Is Faith? (1925); Virgin Birth of Christ (Smyth Lectures for Columbia Seminary in 1927); Christian Faith in the Modern World (1936). Two of his booklets were very important: Attack upon Princeton Seminary—A Plea for Fair Play (1927) and Modernism and the Board of Foreign Missions (1933). Machen also founded two periodicals, Christianity Today and, later, Presbyterian Guardian (both ceased publication many years ago).

D. F. KELLY

See also EVANGELICALISM; FUNDAMENTALISM; PRINCETON THEOLOGY, OLD.

Bibliography. J. G. Machen, "Westminster Theological Seminary: Christianity in Conflict," in Contemporary American Theology, V. Ferm, ed.; H. W. Coray, J. Gresham Machen: A Silhouette; W. D. Livingston, Princeton Apologetics Exemplified by the Work of B. B. Warfield and J. Gresham Machen; Study in American Theology 1880–1930; B. J. Longfield, Presbyterian Controversy: Fundamentalists, Modernists, and Moderates; G. Marsden, "J. Gresham Machen, History, and Truth," WmTJ 42:157–75; W. S. Reid, "J. Gresham Machen," in Reformed Theology in America, D. F. Wells, ed.; C. A. Russell, Voices of American Fundamentalism, W. A. Elwell, ed.; F. A. Schaeffer, Church before the Watching

World; N. B. Stonehouse, J. Gresham Machen: A Biographical Memoir; P. Woolley, Significance of J. Gresham Machen Today.

MacKinnon, Donald Mackenzie (1913–1994). British philosopher and Anglican theologian. Beginning in 1936, MacKinnon taught at Edinburgh, Oxford, and Cambridge, from where he retired as the Norris-Hulse Professor of Divinity in 1978.

MacKinnon insisted that individual Christians are to apply their faith and therefore must be fully involved in social and political issues of justice. He was influenced by the Anglican socialist Christendom Group, though critical of its philosophical naïveté.

MacKinnon's work (characterized more by papers and essays than books) focused philosophically on the nature of theological discourse. He applied formal logic to questions of ethical and metaphysical languages and their meaning; all of these questions, he argued, wrestled with "the transcendent" and went beyond the limitations of language. He believed that not only is there the difficulty of what it means to utter a metaphysical statement, but also there is "the inadequacy of what is uttered" to reflect divine reality. God is finally incomprehensible.

In his discursive approach, MacKinnon attacked problems in minute detail; he expended far more effort in articulating questions than in answering them. He maintained that many doctrines (e.g., the hypostatic union) are not solutions but rather are statements of unsolvable problems.

MacKinnon believed theology must be anchored in history and was critical of (a) modern idealism (which he felt permeated most modern theology) and (b) arid theological liberalism (which grounded Christology in ecclesiology; he emphasized that the church is an extension of the incarnation, not the opposite.) He was known as a staunch advocate of philosophical and theological Realism.

The existential focus of MacKinnon's work was various forms of the problem of pain and its relation to the cross, although he was unwilling to accept any (even theoretical or eschatological) Christian solution to the problem of evil.

Because MacKinnon did theology interrogatively rather than affirmatively, he has been criticized for never clarifying how one ought to go about the task of doing theology, for his convoluted style of discourse, and for his pessimism regarding solutions to the problem of evil.

W. G. PHILLIPS

See also EVIL; EVIL, PROBLEM OF; PROVIDENCE OF GOD.

Bibliography. D. M. MacKinnon, Problem of Metaphysics; Study in Ethical Theory; K. Surin, ed., Christ, Ethics and Tragedy: Essays in Honor of Donald MacKinnon.

Mackintosh, Hugh Ross (1870–1936). Scottish theologian and author. Born at Paisley, he graduated with honors from the University of Edinburgh and from New College, after which he pursued postgraduate studies at Marburg in philosophy. He was Free Church of Scotland minister at Tayport from 1897 to 1901, and then at Beechgrove in Aberdeen until he was appointed professor of systematic theology at New College, Edinburgh, in 1904, which post he held until his death. He was elected moderator of the Church of Scotland's General Assembly in 1932.

Mackintosh had immense knowledge of and considerable sympathy for the liberal theological movement of nineteenth century German Protestantism. His admiration was always mingled, however, with criticism for what he considered its mistakes. Much of his work was an endeavor to make the British public familiar with the results of German scholarship. To accomplish this, he translated (jointly) works of Ritschl and Schleiermacher. He also reformulated the traditional doctrines of Christianity in light of modern scholarship in his lectures and books. In his Doctrine of the Person of Christ, he prefers the kenotic theory of the incarnation (Christ being emptied of his deity) to the Chalcedonian formula of Christ having two distinct natures (divine and human) united in one person without confusion. In Christian Experience of Forgiveness he opposes the atonement as a propitiation of the wrath of God, denies its penal character, and in certain respects blends a modified view of the moral influence theory of the atonement with other more traditional theological concepts. His posthumous work, Types of Modern Theology (1937), remains a classic survey of German Protestant theology from Schleiermacher to Barth. Some have considered Mackintosh to be a bridge between nineteenth-century liberalism and the theology of Karl Barth.

D. F. KELLY

See also KENOSIS, KENOTIC THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. H. R. Mackintosh, Divine Initiative; Immortality and the Future; Originality of the Christian Message; Some Aspects of Christian Belief; J. W. Leitch, Theology of Transition; T. F. Torrance, "H. R. Mackintosh: Theologian of the Cross," SJT 5:2; H. Wyatt, New College Edinburgh, a Centenary History.

Macquarrie, John (b. 1919). Anglican theologian, whose existentialist-based theology has significantly influenced contemporary Anglo-American tradition. Born in Scotland and educated at the Universities of Glasgow and Oxford, he was ordained in 1943. After ministering with the Royal Army Chaplains Department and at St. Ninian's Church, Brechin, he served as professor of systematic theology at Union Theological Seminary from 1962 to 1970 and then as Lady Margaret Professor of Divinity, Oxford, from 1970 to 1986. The most significant early influence on Macquarrie's thinking was the work of Martin Heidegger. Important also has been the thinking of Rudolf Bultmann, who made him aware of the theological benefits of attending to existential analysis, and Paul Tillich, who provided the insight he has used to incorporate the method of ontology and phenomenology in theology. His theology uniquely integrates the European and Anglo-American traditions. A prodigious author with over twenty-five books to his credit, he has been tireless in his efforts to enhance the credibility of Christian theology, both as an academic discipline and in its service to society. One of his chief contributions has been to demonstrate the ways in which theology may be related to peoples' experience of existence. Two early works laid the foundation for his existentialist approach: Existentialist Theology (1955) and Scope of Demythologizing (1960). His most systematic treatment of the central doctrines of the Christian faith is presented in Principles of Christian Theology (1966). His work, however, evinces a pluralist outlook and an inclination toward pantheism. Concerning the latter, he asserts that God does not exist without the world and that the ontological priority of God is compatible with the eternity of the world. Concerning the former, he views the Christian faith as continuous rather than discontinuous with non-Christian faiths, maintaining that the impact of history upon theology "puts in question the claims of any revelation to have an exclusive or normative status." Thus he disapproves of missionary efforts to convert pagans, calling instead for a "global ecumenism," recognizing that each of the great world religions is "advancing to the same goal by different routes." In addition, he understands the atonement to be illustrative in purpose rather than constitutive and fails to position the incarnation historically in any literal sense.

C. W. MITCHELL

See also ANGLICAN COMMUNION; BULTMANN, RUDOLF; EXISTENTIALISM; HEIDEGGER, MARTIN; PAN-THEISM; TILlich, PAUL.

Bibliography. "John Macquarrie," Roundtable: Conversations with European Theologians, Michael Bauman, ed.

Magnificat. The name given to the first of the three hymns in Luke's infancy narratives (1:46–55), the other two being the Benedictus (1:68–79) and the Nunc Dimittis (2:29–32). The name derives from the opening line of the poem in the Latin Vulgate (Magnificat anima mea Dominum).

With the hymn Mary praises the Lord for choosing her to be the mother of the Messiah (although not expressly stated) and for remembering his covenantal promises to Israel. Throughout the hymn runs a note of joy and expectation that now, with the anticipated birth of the Messiah, will begin the reversal of roles associated with the new age which results in the exaltation of the humble and the humiliation of the proud.

The hymn divides into two parts—personal and corporate. In the first part Mary praises God (vv. 46b–47), gives her reason for so doing (vv. 48–49), and then states the general principle that lies behind God's action: God is merciful to those who fear him (v. 50). In the second part Mary applies this general principle to others: just as God exalted Mary, who was of humble state, so also will he exalt all the humble and hungry. Conversely, he will bring down the proud, the rulers, and the rich (vv. 51–53). Specifically, God will remember his covenantal nation Israel and will, it is implied, raise them up from their humble position (vv. 54–55).

The theological consideration behind the hymn is that God deals with men in a consistent pattern—i.e., exaltation of the humble and humiliation of the proud. The historical consideration behind the hymn is that, with the birth of the Messiah, the OT hope of Israel's exaltation is now being realized. Although this is never explicitly stated, it is the basis for the whole hymn (cf. Luke 1:31–33, 35).

It is often said that the Magnificat is similar to Hannah's song (1 Sam. 2:1–10), even though the tone of the latter is one of boasting against enemies.

The Magnificat is very Jewish in nature, more Jewish than Christian. In form it is an individual thanksgiving psalm making use of Hebraic parallelism and OT phrases, many from the Psalms. Typical of OT prophetic oracles, the hymn speaks of future deeds as accomplished facts—what God has spoken, he will assuredly bring to pass.

The Semitic form shows that the hymn was in a pre-Lukan tradition. There is no reason that, following the angel's visit, Mary could not have formulated the hymn using traditional materials, perhaps even Hannah's song, and then repeated it in response to Elizabeth's greeting. Luke could even have learned the hymn from Mary herself. Some argue that the speaker was Elizabeth, but the evidence is not sufficient.

Since the time of St. Benedict (sixth century) the hymn has been part of the vespers liturgy of the Western church. It is also read daily in the morning office of the Eastern church.

W. D. MOUNCE

See also LUKE, THEOLOGY OF.

Bibliography. I. H. Marshall, Commentary on Luke.

Majoristic Controversy. One of various controversies within Lutheranism between Luther's death in 1546 and the definitive formulation of the Lutheran platform in the Book of Concord of 1580. The overarching concern was to maintain purity of doctrine (as Lutheranism saw it) without either relapsing into Catholicism or veering into Calvinism.

One of the concessions made by the Melanchthonians, or Philippists, to the Leipzig Interim after Charles V's defeat of the Smalcald League in 1547 was the assertion of Georg Major, a pupil of Melanchthon, that "good works are necessary to salvation." (Melanchthon had earlier made a like statement but had withdrawn it upon Luther's entreaty.)

The counterattack of the Gnesio-Lutheran ("true Lutheran") party was led by Flacius and Amsdorf, but the latter especially overshot the mark by his counterassertion that "good works are harmful to salvation" (although Luther had on occasion so expressed himself too).

The bitter controversy was settled in Article 4 of the Formula of Concord, which pointed out the excesses on both sides. Faith and good works (justification and sanctification) must not be confused in any way, but neither dare the importance of good works as an inevitable consequence of grace be minimized. H. D. HUMMEL

See also AMSDORF, NICHOLAS VON; CONCORD, BOOK OF; CONCORD, FORMULA OF; FLACIUS, MATTHIAS.

Bibliography. F. H. Bente, Historical Introduction to the Book of Concord; E. F. Klug and O. F. Stahlke, Getting into the Formula of Concord; A. J. Koelpin, ed., No Other Gospel: Essays in Commemoration of the 400th Anniversary of the Formula of Concord, 1580-1980; R. D. Preus and W. H. Rosin, eds., Contemporary Look at the Formula of Concord.

Major Orders. The senior or higher ranks, classes, or grades of the ordained ministry in the church, in contradistinction from minor orders (porters, electors, exorcists, and acolytes). In the Roman Catholic Church there are three major orders—episcopacy, priesthood, and the diaconate. These are seen to be of divine origin: "Christ, whom the Father sanctified and sent into the world, has, through his apostles, made their successors, the bishops, partakers of his consecration and his mission. These in their turn have legitimately handed on to different individuals in the church various degrees of participation in this ministry. Thus the divinely established ecclesiastical ministry is exercised on different levels by those who from antiquity have been called bishops, priests and deacons" (Vatican Council II, Constitution on the Church). Until 1972, when it was abolished, the subdiaconate had been included among the major orders.

All who are in major orders are required to be celibate. To be a priest it is necessary first to be ordained deacon; to be a bishop it is necessary to have been ordained deacon and priest.

In the Eastern, Orthodox, Anglican, and Catholic churches there is also agreement that the diaconate, priesthood, and episcopate are essential orders of ministry within the church. The Eastern and Orthodox churches also have various minor orders of ministry. Most Protestant denominations reject the idea of both major and minor orders and recognize only one basic form of ordained ministry. P. TOON

See also CHURCH OFFICERS; MINOR ORDERS; ORDERS, HOLY.

Man, Natural. This theme has long been involved in the debate over natural theology, which has sought to define how much knowledge of God (if any) is available to man outside Christ. But as a distinct theological term "natural man" is used by Paul in 1 Corinthians 2:14, where "natural" is a translation of psychikos and stands in contrast to "spiritual" (pneumatikos, 1 Cor. 2:13, 15; 3:1) and thus in parallel with "fleshly" (sarkinos, 1 Cor. 3:1). The meaning of "natural man" here is illuminated by 1 Corinthians 15:44-47, where the whole phrase does not appear, but psychikos is used a further three times, again in contrast to pneumatikos, and with reference to the contrast between Adam and Christ as "living being" (psyche) and "life-giving spirit" (pneuma) respectively (1 Cor. 15:45).

To summarize, the meaning of "natural man" indicates man in the "lower" aspects of his being—i.e., in those aspects which mark him off as creature, as temporally and spatially confined as limited to this-worldly, "fleshly" modes of perception that cannot penetrate the world of the Spirit. It means much more than "fallen," for it is applied by implication to Adam at the moment of his creation, before the fall (1 Cor. 15:45). But the fall is involved, for that had precisely the effect of shackling man irretrievably to those creaturely limitations which for Adam could have been opportunities for discovery and growth but became in fact a sentence of banishment. The contrasting "spiritual man" is not therefore one delivered from all creaturely limitations, but one in whom the indwelling Spirit is beginning to open the doors of perception which Adam slammed shut. S. MOTYER

See also MAN, OLD AND NEW; MANKIND, DOCTRINE OF; NATURAL THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. N. Cameron, Are Christians Human?; J. W. Cooper, Body, Soul, and Life Everlasting; A. Hoekema, Created in God's Image; G. E. Ladd, Theology of the New Testament; A. T. Lincoln, Paradise Now and Not Yet; E. Schweizer, TDNT 9:662–63; W. D. Stacey, Pauline View of Man.

Man, Natural

Man, Old and New. “Old man” and “new man” are terms used by Paul to express the contrast between life without Christ and life in union with him (Rom. 6:6; Eph. 4:22–24; Col. 3:9–10). The use of the word “man” in these contexts is at first sight puzzling, and this explains the RSV and NIV translations “self” and “nature,” which are attempts to paraphrase the Greek anthrōpos. In fact it seems that Paul has something much more far-reaching (and exciting) in mind than merely a contrast between the “before and after” experiences enjoyed by (or expected of) the believer.

The first step to a fuller understanding is to note that in all three contexts the notion of creation appears—explicitly in Ephesians 4:24 and Colossians 3:10 and implicitly in Romans 6:6, where the use of anthrōpos reminds us of its use with reference to Adam in Romans 5:12, 19. The next step is to notice that Christ is also called simply anthrōpos in Romans 5:15, in deliberate contrast to Adam. The third step is to recognize that Paul’s application of anthrōpos to Christ is his adaptation of the great title “Son of Man” (huios tou anthrōpou), applied to himself by Jesus. This title appears only in the Gospels, and it looks as though missionaries to the Gentiles (like Paul) had to “translate” it into something simpler to understand. We see this translation process at work in 1 Timothy 2:5–6, which seems to rest upon Mark 10:45 but reduces “Son of Man” to just “man.”

The final step is to go back to the OT roots of this title (Dan. 7:9–27) and to see that the Son of Man is the messianic figure appointed to establish God’s kingdom on behalf of his people, who receive the kingdom in and through him. Now put it all together: for Paul, Christ is the “new (Son of) Man” of a new creation/kingdom/humanity established in contrast to that of Adam, who is the “old man”; in union with Christ (through baptism into his death and resurrection, Rom. 6:3–5) we are transferred from the old creation to the new. Our “old man”—i.e., our membership in Adam—was crucified with Christ, and now we must seek to reflect in practice the “image” of this new man (“put on”), and to scour out the remaining image of the old (“put off”). 1 Corinthians 15:45–49 sums it all up.

S. MOTYER

See also MAN, NATURAL; MANKIND, DOCTRINE OF; NEW CREATION, NEW CREATURE; SON OF MAN.

Bibliography. G. E. Ladd, Theology of the New Testament; C. F. D. Moule, Origin of Christology; A. Richardson, Introduction to the Theology of the New Testament; J. A. T. Robinson, Body.

Man, Son of. See SON OF MAN.

Mandaeans. Mandaism is the only form of Gnosticism to survive into modern times as a practiced religion. Its adherents, according to their own tradition, lived in Palestine, possibly in pre-Christian times, whence they emigrated to Haran and subsequently to their present abode in southern Mesopotamia. Modern scholarship, pointing to a Jewish influence, also tends to postulate a Palestinian origin. Jesus is mentioned in Mandaean literature only as the “lying” or “false” Messiah, but John the Baptist figures more positively as a prophet. From this association medieval travelers came to call Mandaeans “Saint John’s Christians.” Although their sacred writings say little of Christianity, they are vehemently anti-Jewish. Certain scholars have postulated a Mandaean influence upon the Gospel of John. As Mandaean theology is essentially dualistic, it seems doubtful that such an influence was at work on the monotheism of John.

Mandaeism itself, though fundamentally Gnostic, demonstrates elements of Iranian dualism, Platonic thought, astrology, Judaism, and ancient Babylonian and Egyptian lore. The word “Manda” is usually understood to mean “Gnostic,” although it is the term applied to the laity. Ordinary priests are known as tarmidia or disciples, while those priests who are fully initiated into mystic knowledge and maintain full ritual purity are *nasoraean*s. Members practice frequent baptism, ritual meals and sacraments, incantations, and magic. A high value is placed on ritual observances, ritual purity, marriage, and procreation.

The Mandaean system is peopled with strange celestial powers, intermediary beings, and astrological influences. There is a supreme entity of the universe who produces a cosmic father and mother. The mother, who is essentially evil, is also called the Spirit. One of their numerous offspring creates the physical universe in a sinful action. Thus the Mandaean soul is entrapped in the prison of a physical body but at death ascends through the hostile spirits of the sky to a world of life. Manda-d-Hiia, “Knowledge of Life,” is a major savior figure.

The secret writings, some of undoubted antiquity, are fragmentary and sometimes self-contradictory. Written in an Aramaic dialect similar to that of the Babylonian Talmud, some have been published only in the last quarter century.

R. C. KROEGER AND C. C. KROEGER

See also GNOSTICISM.

Bibliography. E. S. Drower, Mandaeans of Iraq and Iran; Secret Adam; J. Finegan, Myth and Mystery: An Introduction to the Pagan Religions of the Biblical World; E. M. Yamauchi, Gnostic Ethics and Mandaean Origins; Mandaic Incantation Texts; Pre-Christian Gnosticism; “Present Status of Mandaean Studies,” JNES 25:88–96.

Mani (216–276). Syro-Persian thinker who founded Manichaeism, one of the last and most complex forms of Gnosticism. He received his early education from the Elchesaïtes, a Jewish-Christian baptismal community in southern Babylonia. Mani claimed his first revelation at the age of twelve and his call to apostleship when he was twenty-four. After his efforts to convert his community failed and resulted in his expulsion, he traveled to India, where he founded his first religious group. He returned in 242 to preach his faith in Babylonian provinces, and he became a vassal of the new monarch, Shapur I. Although Mani's beliefs were never established as the official state religion, he enjoyed royal protection and sent proselytizers throughout Persia and into foreign lands.

Mani consciously modeled his ministry after the missionary apostle Paul and contended that he was the greatest and last prophet or paraclete sent by the Father of Light. The most formative influences on Mani's thought were Marcion, Bardaisan (154–222), an Edessan philosopher, and other Gnostic sources. Mani's teaching was claimed to be superior to prophets who preceded him because, unlike Zoroaster, Buddha, and Jesus, Mani published an authoritative canon of at least seven major works, none of which survive in complete form. His system includes an elaborate mythical cosmogony and eschatology conceived in terms of two absolute principles, Light and Darkness, and an ascetic way of salvation. A unique feature of Manichaeism was paintings which illustrated his system of redemption. Mani claimed continuous revelations and inspiration from an angel, Syzygos, "the Twin," who, as his heavenly alter ego, prepared and protected him as a teacher and initiated him in the way of salvation. Miraculous healings were also attributed to Mani to authenticate his divine mission.

After the death of Shapur, Mani was charged by Zoroastrian priests with perverting the traditional religion. The new king, Vahram I, imprisoned him and subjected him to torture in chains. He died twenty-six days after giving a final message to his church. His followers memorialized Mani's death in their Bema festival celebrated yearly in March.

W. A. HOFFECKER

See also MANICHAISM.

Manichaeism. A third-century dualistic religion, founded by Mani. It was fought in the West as a virulent Christian heresy. Mani's religion was a complex Gnostic system offering salvation by knowledge. The main features of Manichaeism were enunciated in an elaborate cosmogonical myth of two absolute and eternal principles that manifest themselves in three eras or "moments."

The first moment describes a radical primordial dualism. Light and darkness (good and evil), personified in the Father of Lights and the Prince of Darkness, were both coeternal and independent. In the middle moment Darkness became mixed with Light in a precosmic fall of primal man. This resulted in a second creation of the material world and man by the evil powers in which Light is trapped in nature and human bodies. A series of grotesque acts including passionate seduction, aborted fetuses, incest and cannibalism resulted in the imprisonment of Light particles in plant, animal, and human life. Adam was a microcosm of the universe—entrapped within his corrupt body was a soul that could be awakened through gnosis. Redemption of Light occurs by a cosmic mechanism in the heavens by which particles of Light (souls) are drawn up and fill the moon for fifteen days. In the last phases of the moon Light is transferred to the sun and finally to paradise. Ever since the fall prophets have been sent by the Father of Lights, including Zoroaster in Persia and Buddha in India for the East, and Jesus in the West. But Mani was the greatest prophet who, as the paraclete, proclaimed a salvation by knowledge (gnōsis) consisting of strict ascetic practices. In the last days of the second moment a great war is to be concluded with judgment and a global conflagration lasting 1,468 years. Light will be saved and everything material destroyed. The second coming of Christ initiates the third moment in which Light and Darkness will be separated forever as in the primordial division.

In Mani's myth man is lost and fallen in existence, but in essence he is a particle of Light and thus one in substance with God. Individual salvation consists in grasping this truth by illumination from God's Spirit. Christ appears as merely a prophet and is not really incarnate. His teaching about Light and Darkness was falsified by his apostles, who came from Judaism. Mani restored his essential teachings.

Salvation was exemplified in the Manichaean community, a hierarchy of two classes: the Elect, who consisted of Mani's successor, 12 apostles, 72 bishops, and 360 presbyters; and the Hearers. The Elect were "sealed" with a threefold preservative: purity of mouth—abstaining from all ensouled things (meat) and strong drink; purity of life—renouncing earthly property and physical labor that might endanger Light diffused in nature; and purity of heart—forswearing sexual activity. The lower class of hearers who lived less strenuous lives hoped for later liberation through reincarnation.

Manichaean worship included fasting, daily prayers, and sacramental meals which differed greatly from the Lord's Supper. Hearers served the Elect "alms"—fruit such as melons believed to contain great amounts of Light. Baptism was not celebrated since initiation into the community occurred by accepting Mani's wisdom through preaching. Hymn cycles extolling redeeming knowledge were sung to focus believers' attention on the beauty of Paradise, where rescued souls dwelt.

Manichaeism

Manichaeism spread east from Persia along the Silk Road and reached China. The new religion became especially strong in Central Asia. In the West it was vigorously fought by both the Christian church and Roman emperors. Opposition mounted in Africa under Augustine, who for nine years had been a Hearer. Augustine challenged Manichaeism by denying Mani's apostleship and condemning his rejection of biblical truth. Other critics accused him of inventing fables which made his ideas not a theology or philosophy but a theosophy. Manichaeism survived into the Middle Ages through such sects as the Paulicians, Bogomils, Patarenes, and Cathari, which probably developed from the original tradition.

W. A. HOFFECKER

See also CATHARI; MANI; PAULICIANS.

Bibliography. J. P. Asmussen, Manichaean Literature; R. Cameron and A. J. Dewey, eds., Cologne Mani Codex; J. Finegan, Myth and Mystery: An Introduction to the Pagan Religions of the Biblical World; H. J. Klimkeit, Gnosis on the Silk Road; Manichaean Art and Calligraphy; S. N. C. Lieu, Manichaeism in the Later Roman Empire and Medieval China: A Historical Survey; L. J. R. Ort, Mani: A Religio-Historical Description of His Personality; G. Widengren, Mani and Manichaeism.

Mankind, Doctrine of. In the Old Testament. In the Genesis account of creation man's presence in the world is attributed directly to God. By this act alone, as the God of love and power, man was "created" (bārā, 1:27; 5:1; 6:7) and "formed" (yāšar, 2:7–8). By this creative act man was brought into existence in a duality of relationships—at once to nature and to God himself. He was formed of the dust of the earth and was endowed with soul life by the breath of God. God is the source of his life, and dust the material of his being. Woman, likewise, was created in this duality of relationships to the earthly and the divine, being created from the "stuff" of the created man and the direct life-giving action of God (Gen. 1:27). Thus do man and woman stand from the first in a relationship of equality before God and for the living of life together in that relationship of equal partnership.

Human Nature. Human personhood, then, did not spring out of nature by some natural evolutionary process. It is the result of the immediate action of God, who used already existing created material for the formation of the earthly part of their being. Man and woman have, thus, physiological similarities with the rest of the created order (Gen. 18:27; Job 10:8–9; Ps. 103:14, etc.) and consequently share with the animal world in dependence on God's goodness for their continuance (Pss. 103:15; 104; Isa. 40:6–7). Throughout the Old Testament this relationship of the human persons to nature is everywhere stressed. As men and women share with nature in the constitution of their being, so does nature share with human beings in the actualities of their living. Thus, while nature was made to serve this humankind, so was this humankind on its part required to tend nature (Gen. 2:15). Nature is therefore not a sort of neutral entity in relation to human life. For between the two—nature and humankind—there exists a mysterious bond so that when sin entered the human condition the natural order was also deeply afflicted (Gen. 3:17–18; cf. Rom. 8:19–23). Since, however, nature suffered as a result of sin, so does it rejoice with mankind in its redemption (Ps. 96:10–13; Isa. 35, etc.), for in that redemption it too will share (Isa. 11:6–9).

But however deeply related is the human person to the natural order, he and she are presented nonetheless as something different and distinctive. Having first called the earth into existence with its various requisites for human life, God then made man and woman. The impression that the Genesis account gives is that human personhood was the special focus of God's creative purpose. It is not so much that such was the crown of God's creative acts, or the climax of the process, for although last in the ascending scale, mankind is the first in the divine intention. All the previous acts of God are presented more in the nature of a continuous series by the recurring use of the conjunction "and" (Gen. 1:3, 6, 9, 14, 20, 24). "Then God said, 'Let us make men.'" "Then"—when? When the cosmic order was finished, when the earth was ready to sustain human life. Thus, while humanity stands before God in a relationship of created dependence, it has also the status of a unique and special relation to God in terms of human personhood.

Personal Constituents. The three most significant words in the Old Testament to describe this relation to God and nature are "soul" (nepes̄, 754 times), "spirit" (rūah, 378 times), and "flesh" (bāšār, 266 times). The term "flesh" has sometimes a physical and sometimes a figurative ethical sense. In its latter use it has its context in contrast with God to emphasize human nature as contingent and dependent (Job 10:4; Ps. 56:4; 78:39; Isa. 31:3; 40:6). Both nepes̄ and rūah denote in general the life principle of the human person, the former stressing more particularly human individuality, or life, and the latter focusing on the idea of a supernatural power above or within the individual.

Of the eighty parts of the body mentioned in the Old Testament the terms for "heart" (lēb), "liver" (kābēd), "kidney" (kēlāyôt), and "bowels" (mē'im) are the most frequent. To each of these some emotional impulse or feeling is attributed either factually or metaphorically. The term “heart” has the widest reference. It is brought into relation with total human psychical nature as the seal or instrument of human emotional, volitional, and intellectual manifestations. In the latter context it acquires a force we should call “mind” (Deut. 15:9; Judg. 5:15–16) or “intellect” (Job 8:10; 12:3; 34:10). The term is frequently employed to denote by metonymy one’s thought or wish with the idea of purpose or resolve, for one’s thought or wish is what is “in the heart,” or, as would be said today, “in the mind.”

These several words do not, however, characterize human life as a compound of separate and distinct elements. Hebrew psychology does not divide up human nature into mutually exclusive parts. Behind these usages of words the thought conveyed by the Genesis account, that the human person is twofold, remains. Yet even there the human individual is not presented as a loose union of two disparate entities. There is no sense of a metaphysical dichotomy, while even that of an ethical dualism of soul and body is quite foreign to Hebrew thought. By God’s in-breathing the human person he formed from the dust became a living soul, a unified being in the interrelation of the terrestrial and the transcendental.

Throughout the Old Testament the two concepts of individuality as unique and responsible and as a social and representative being have emphasis. Adam was both a man and yet mankind. In him individual personhood and social solidarity found expression. At times in Israel’s history there is emphasis on individual responsibility (e.g., Ezek. 9:4; 20:38; cf. chs. 18 and 35), while the “Thou shalt” or “Thou shalt not” of the law and the prophets is characteristically singular, being addressed to the individual. Yet generally in Hebrew thought the individual is not viewed atomistically but in intimate connection with, and representative of, the whole community. So does the sin of the single individual involve all in its consequences (Josh. 7:24–26; cf. 2 Sam. 14:7; 21:1–14; 2 Kings 9:26). On the other hand, Moses and Phineas stand before God to plead their people’s cause because they embody in themselves the whole community. In the intertestamental period, however, this awareness of solidarity passes from being a realized actuality in the social consciousness of the nation to being increasingly an idealistic and theological dogma.

From this perspective of racial solidarity in the first man it follows that Adam’s sin involved every individual both in himself and in his social relationships. Because of Adam’s transgression everyone is affected in the whole range of his being and in the totality of his societal living.

In the New Testament. The Teaching of Jesus. In formal statements Jesus had little to say about mankind as such, but by his attitude and actions he showed that he regarded the human person as significant. To Jesus the individual person was not just a part of nature; rather he or she is more precious in God’s sight than the birds of the air (Matt. 10:31) and the beasts of the field (Matt. 12:12). The human persons’ distinctiveness lies in the possession of a soul, or spiritual nature, which to forfeit is the ultimate tragedy and final folly (Matt. 16:26). Human life is consequently life under God and for his glory. It does not consist in the plenitude of earthly possessions (Luke 12:15). The sole wealth is therefore the wealth of the soul (Matt. 6:20, 25). Yet while emphasizing the spiritual aspect of human nature, Jesus did not decry the body, for he showed concern throughout his ministry for total human needs.

This view of every human person as a creature of value was for Jesus an ideal and a possibility. For he saw all individuals, whether man or woman, as blind and lost and their relationship with God broken off. Although he nowhere specified the nature of sin, he clearly assumed its universality. All are somehow caught up in sin’s plight and enmeshed in its tragic consequences. Thus, all who would live to God’s glory and eternal enjoyment must experience newness of life. And it was precisely this purpose that Christ came into the world to accomplish (Matt. 1:21; Luke 19:10). It follows therefore that it is by one’s attitude to Christ as the Savior of the world that individual human destiny is finally sealed.

The Pauline Anthropology. Paul’s declarations regarding the nature of the human individual are generally stated in relation to salvation so that his anthropology throughout serves the interests of his soteriology. Foremost, therefore, in his teaching is his insistence on the human need for divine grace. Paul is emphatic about the universality of sin. Because of Adam’s fall sin somehow got a footing in the world to make human life the sphere of its activity. Sin “entered the world through one man” (Rom. 5:12). Consequent on Adam’s transgression, “all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God” (Rom. 3:23). To meet humanity in its plight, Paul sets forth the gospel as a righteousness of God through faith in Jesus Christ for all who believe (cf. Rom. 3:22–25).

In this context Paul contrasts the “old self [or, man]” of nature (Rom. 6:6; Eph. 4:22; Col. 3:9) who is “according to the sinful nature [flesh]” (Rom. 8:4, 12; Gal. 4:23, 29, etc.) with the “new self [man]” in grace (Eph. 4:24; cf. 2 Cor. 5:17; Gal. 6:15) who is “in accordance with the Spirit” (Rom. 8:5; Gal. 4:29). He speaks also of the outer nature of the human individual which perishes and the inner nature which abides and is daily being renewed in Christ (2 Cor. 4:16; cf. Eph. 3:16) and of the “natural man” (psychikos anthrōpos) and “he who is spiritual” (1 Cor. 2:15 NASB; cf. 14:37).

In contrast with the second Adam, the first Adam was “of the dust of the earth” (1 Cor. 15:47), but was yet “a living being” (v. 45). Though man on his earthly side has borne “the image of the man of dust,” he can by grace through faith be made to “bear the image of the man from heaven” (v. 49). The human individual as such is a moral being with an innate sense of right and wrong which Paul speaks of as “conscience” (21 times). This conscience can, however, lose its sensitivity for the good and become “defiled” (1 Cor. 8:7) and “seared” (1 Tim. 4:2).

As the chief exponent of the application of Christ’s saving work to personal life Paul can hardly avoid reference to the essential nature and makeup of human personhood. Inevitably such allusions will reflect the Old Testament usage of such terms, while being the more precisely applied especially in his epistles. The most significant terms in his anthropological vocabulary are “flesh” (sarx, 91 times), which he uses in a physical and an ethical sense; “spirit” (pneuma, 146 times), to denote generally the higher, Godward aspect of human nature; “body” (sōma, 89 times), most often to designate the human organism as such, but sometimes the carnal aspect of the human individual; “soul” (psychē, 11 times), broadly to carry the idea of the vital principle of individual life. Paul has several words translated “mind” in the English versions to specify man’s native rational ability, which is the aspect of human nature seriously affected by sin (Rom. 1:21; 8:6–7; Eph. 4:17; Col. 2:18; Titus 1:15). But the mind transformed brings God acceptable worship (Rom. 12:2; Eph. 4:23) and so becomes in the believer the mind of Christ (1 Cor. 2:16; cf. Phil. 2:5). The term “heart” (kardia, 52 times) specifies for Paul the innermost sanctuary of an individual’s psychical being either as a whole or with one or another of its significant activities—emotional, rational, or volitional.

Sometimes Paul contrasts these aspects—flesh and spirit, body and soul—to give the impression of dualism in the makeup of individual human nature. At other times he introduces the threefold characterization of body, soul, and spirit (1 Thess. 5:23), which raises the question whether the human person is to be conceived dichotomously or trichotomously. The interchangeable use of the terms “spirit” and “soul” seems to confirm the former view, while the fact that they are sometimes contrasted is held to support the latter. Yet, however used, both terms refer to the human’s inner nature over against flesh or body, which refers to the outer aspect of the individual in space and time. In reference, then, to human physical nature, “spirit” denoted life as having its origin in God and “soul” denotes that same life as constituted in personhood. Spirit is the inner depth of a man’s or a woman’s being, the higher aspect of personality. Soul expresses a person’s own special and distinctive individuality. The pneuma is an individual’s nonmaterial nature looking Godward; the psychē is that same individual’s nature looking earthward and touching the things of sense.

Other New Testament Writings. The rest of the New Testament in its scattered allusions to individual human nature and constituents is in general agreement with the teaching of Jesus and of Paul. In the Johannine writings the estimate of the human person is centered on Jesus Christ as true man and what that human person may become in relation to him. Although John begins his Gospel by asserting the eternal Godhead of Christ as Son of God, he declares in the starkest manner the humanity of the Word made flesh. Jesus was all that God intended human kind should be. What people saw was a “man called Jesus” (John 9:11 NRSV; cf. 19:5). It is against the perfect humanness of Jesus that the dignity of every human person is to be measured. By uniting himself with humanity, God’s Son has made it clear for always that being human is no mean condition. For he took upon himself all that is properly human to restore men and women through his sonship to the relationship of sons and daughters of God (John 1:13; 1 John 3:1). Such, too, is the theme of the epistle to the Hebrews. The epistle of James declares that man was created in the “likeness” (homoiōsin) of God (3:9).

Historical Development. From these biblical statements about human nature, the history of Christian thought has focused on three main issues.

Content of the Image. The most enduring of these concerns is the content of the image. Irenaeus first introduced the distinction between the “image” (Heb. selem; Lat. imago) and “likeness” (Heb. dēmût; Lat. similitudo). The former he identified as the rationality and free will which inhere in man qua man. The likeness he conceived to be a superadded gift of God’s righteousness which man, because of his reason and freedom of choice, had the possibility to retain and advance by obedience to the divine commands. But this probationary endowment was forfeited by acts of willful disobedience by Adam and Eve and their descendants. This thesis of Irenaeus was generally upheld by the scholastics and was given dogmatic application by Aquinas. In Aquinas’s view, however, Adam had need of divine aid to continue in the path of holiness. But this aid, in its turn, was conditioned on Adam’s effort and determination to obey God’s law. Thus from the first, in Aquinas’s scheme, divine grace was made to depend on human merit.

The Reformers denied this distinction between image and likeness upon which the works-salvation of medievalism was reared and insisted upon the radical nature of sin and its effect upon the total being of every person. Thus they maintained that salvation is by grace alone as the gift of God.

Some moderns have revived Irenaeus's distinction under new terms. Emil Brunner, for example, speaks of the "formal" image to express the essential structure of human personhood which is not greatly affected by the fall. The "material" image, on the other hand, he regards as quite lost by sin. Those who do not admit a different connotation for the terms have sought to identify the content of the image as either corporeal form or pure spirit. Schleiermacher speaks of the image as human domination over nature, a view expounded in more recent days by Hans Wolff and L. Verdium. Karl Barth conceived of it in terms of male and female, although he stresses at the same time that only in relation to Christ is there a true understanding of man. The Reformed position is that the image of God consists in human rationality and moral competency, but that it is precisely these realities which were lost or marred through sin. Others consider personality as the ingredient of the image, while still others prefer to see it as sonship, contending that man was created for that relationship, which his sin he repudiated. His sonship can now only be restored in Christ.

The Origin of the Soul. In the light of such passages as Psalm 12:7; Isaiah 42:5; Zechariah 12:1; and Hebrews 12:9, the creationist doctrine that God is the immediate creator of the human soul has been built. First elaborated by Lactantius (ca. 240–ca. 320), it had the support of Jerome and of Calvin among the Reformers. Aquinas declared any other view to be heretical and so followed Peter Lombard, who in his Sentences says, "The Church teaches that souls are created at their infusion into the body."

The alternative view, traducianism (Lat. tradux, a branch or shoot), expounded by Tertullian, is that the substances of both soul and body are formed and propagated together. Favored by Luther, it is consequently generally adopted by later Lutheran theologians. In support of the view is the observation that Genesis 1:27 represents God as creating the species in Adam to be propagated "after its kind" (cf. Gen. 1:12, 21, 25). And this increase through secondary causes is implied in the following verse (cf. 1:22; 5:3; John 1:13; Heb. 7:9–10) and in the passages which suggest the solidarity of the race and its sin in the first man (Rom. 5:12–13; 1 Cor. 15:22; Eph. 2:3).

