From its stress on the continuing kinship of God and man, the Eastern church has favored creationism. Here God is regarded as acting immediately to bring individual life into being. The Western church, on the other hand, by emphasizing God's otherness from the created order and the depth of the yawning gulf between the human and divine consequent on man's sin, sees God's contact with created life in the world as more distant. Traducianism, therefore, in which God's relation to individual conception and birth is held to be mediated, has had from the third century wide support.

The Extent of Freedom. Consonant with his ideas of the imago Dei as grounded in human nature as rational and free, Justin Martyr set in motion the view that every individual is responsible for his own wrongdoing, which was to become a characteristic note of the Eastern church. Thus Adam is seen as the primary type of each individual's sinning, and the fall is the story of Everyman. Western theology, by contrast, regards Adam's transgression as the fountainhead of all human evil, but against Gnosticism refused to locate its source in individual life in the material of the body. Tertullian traced sin to humanity's connection with Adam, through whom it has become a natural element of every human's nature, yet he allowed some free will to remain.

In Pelagius and Augustine these two views came into sharp conflict. Pelagius taught that individual human existence was unaffected by Adam's transgression, his will retaining the liberty of indifference so that each individual possesses the ability to choose good or evil. In the light of Romans 5:12–13 Augustine maintained that Adam's sin has so crippled humanity that each individual can act only to express his or her own sinful nature inherited from their first parents. The inevitable compromise appeared in the semi-Pelagian (or semi-Augustinian) synergistic thesis that, while everyone does inherit a bias to sin, a freedom of decision remains that permits some at least to take the first step toward righteousness. In the Calvinist-Arminian controversy of the seventeenth century the conflict was reenacted. Calvin contended for the total depravity of man; man "has no good remaining in him." Therefore the will is not free to choose the good; so salvation is an act of God's sovereign grace.

Arminius allowed that Adam's sin had dire consequences and that each possesses a "natural propensity" to sin (John Wesley), while maintaining, at the same time, that it belongs to every person of their own free will to ratify this inner direction of their nature. On the other hand, it is possible for any one, by accepting the aid of the Holy Spirit, to opt for God's way, for he or she still possesses an inner ability to do so.

In the Pelagian-humanist scheme all men are well and need only a tonic to keep them in good health. In the semi-Pelagian (semi-Augustinian/Arminian) doctrine man is sick and requires the right medicine for his recovery. In the Augustinian/Calvinist view man is dead and can be renewed to life only by a divinely initiated resurrection.

H. D. McDONALD

See also MAN, NATURAL; MAN, OLD AND NEW; EVOLUTION.

Bibliography. S. B. Babbage, Man in Nature and Grace; G. C. Berkouwer, Man: The Image of God;

Mankind, Doctrine of

E. Brunner, Man in Revolt; D. Cairns, Image of God in Man; G. Carey, I Believe in Man; S. Cave, Christian Estimate of Man; W. Eichrodt, Man in the Old Testament; P. E. Hughes, True Image; W. G. Kümmel, Man in the New Testament; J. Laidlaw, Bible Doctrine of Man; J. G. Machen, Christian View of Man; H. D. McDonald, Christian View of Man; J. Moltmann, Man; J. Orr, God's Image in Man; H. W. Robinson, Christian Doctrine of Man; R. F. Shedd, Man in Community; C. R. Smith, Bible Doctrine of Man; W. D. Stacey, Pauline View of Man; T. F. Torrance, Calvin's Doctrine of Man; C. A. van Peursen, Body, Soul, Spirit; J. S. Wright, What Is Man?

Mankind, Origin of. See EVOLUTION.

Man of Lawlessness. See ANTICHRIST.

Man of Sin. See ANTICHRIST.

Manson, Thomas Walter (1893–1958). British biblical scholar and author. From 1936 to 1958 Manson was Rylands Professor of Biblical Criticism and Exegesis at the University of Manchester. An ordained Presbyterian minister, he also participated vigorously in Free Church activities in England. Manson criticized liberal biblical scholarship with its dogmas of unbreakable natural law and human moral evolution; liberalism reduced God to an impersonal force and the gospel to general moral platitudes. However, he sought to continue liberalism's "quest for the historical Jesus" in different directions. His earliest and probably most important work, Teaching of Jesus (1931), argued that "the Son of Man," as used by Jesus, is not an individual, supernatural savior. Instead, like the OT "remnant," "the servant of the Lord," and the "I" of the Psalms, it stands primarily "for the manifestation of the Kingdom of God on earth in a people wholly devoted to their heavenly King" (227). Jesus first called others to be this "Son of man." But he increasingly had to go the way himself, a way of servanthood and suffering, alone. Thus Jesus alone proved to be the true "Son of man." Yet Manson stressed that Jesus did and still does call people to obedience and servanthood in corporate unity with him—a theme also expressed by the Pauline concept of the church as "the body of Christ."

While Manson wrote occasionally on all parts of the NT, his fundamental approach and interpretations remained fairly consistent throughout his career. His central focus remained the life, and especially the teachings, of Jesus. Jesus was the very presence, the incarnation of the kingdom of God. He proclaimed God's love in contrast to God's judgment. However, Jesus' teachings were neither an afterthought nor an "interim ethic." They described and still describe the way of the kingdom on earth—the way of a people wholly obedient to God's will in union with Christ.

T. N. FINGER

See also NEW TESTAMENT THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. T. W. Manson, Beginning of the Gospel; "Failure of Liberalism to Interpret the Word of God," in Interpretation of the Bible, C. W. Dugmore, ed.; Ministry and Priesthood: Christ's and Ours; Sayings of Jesus; Servant-Messiah; Studies in the Gospels and Epistles; C. H. Dodd, "T. W. Manson and His Rylands Lectures," ExpT 73:302–3; A. J. B. Higgins, ed., New Testament Essays: Studies in Memory of Thomas Walter Manson.

Many. An adjective used in various English versions to translate several words of the biblical text: Hebrew, hāmōn and rab; Greek, hikanos and polys (pleiōn). In scriptural contexts "many" may mean a good many, most, a large quantity, something long, or even "all."

As to God's creation "many" may help clarify chronological ideas such as many days (Num. 9:19; Acts 9:23); physical things, as many (or "surging," NIV) waters (Isa. 17:13); many bulls (Ps. 22:12); the spirit world, such as identifying many demons (Mark 1:34) and many angels (Rev. 5:11). Also the Scriptures speak of God's and of Jesus' "many" good and wonderful works/miracles (Ps. 40:5; John 10:32).

The Bible speaks of "many peoples" (Ezek. 3:6) and "many nations" (Neh. 13:26; Jer. 22:8) of the world. On occasion the expression "the many" (Rom. 5:15, "the many died") is to be taken as equivalent to the expression "all men" (Rom. 5:12, "death came to all men"). Such concepts as these are to be distinguished from expressions identifying the great numbers of God's people, such as the redeemed "many nations" of which Abraham is the spiritual father (Gen. 17:16; Rom. 4:17), the "many nations" which Jesus the Messiah will sprinkle with his blood (Isa. 52:15). In speaking of God's external call and ultimate election, Jesus says, "Many are invited, but few are chosen" (Matt. 22:14), and from the great mass of humanity Revelation 7:9–10 speaks of a "great multitude" (ochlos polys, a great crowd) "from every nation, tribe, people and language" which will stand in heaven before the throne and the Lamb praising God for his salvation. From the mass of humanity God will "justify many" (Isa. 53:11), on the basis of his Son's bearing "the sin of many" (Isa. 53:12).

W. H. MARE

See also ATONEMENT, EXTENT OF; UNIVERSALISM.

Bibliography. J. Jeremias, TDNT 6:536–45; J. Murray, Epistle to the Romans; K. H. Rengstorf, TDNT 3:293–96; W. Sanday and A. C. Headlam, Epistle to the Romans.

Marburg Colloquy (1529). The meeting which attempted to resolve the differences between Lutherans and Zwinglians over the Lord's Supper. These differences had been expressed in a bitter pamphlet controversy between 1525 and 1528. While both Luther and Zwingli rejected the Catholic doctrines of transubstantiation and the sacrificial Mass, Luther believed that the words "This is my body, this is my blood" must be interpreted literally as teaching that Christ's body and blood were present in the sacrament "in, with, and under" the elements of bread and wine. Furthermore, he viewed the sacrament as a means of grace by which the participant's faith is strengthened. Zwingli regarded Luther's position as a compromise with the medieval doctrine of transubstantiation, and he maintained that the words of institution must be taken symbolically to mean that the elements represent Christ's body. Although Zwingli believed that Christ was present in and through the faith of the participants, this presence was not tied to the elements and depended upon the faith of the communicants. In contrast to Luther, he interpreted the sacrament as a commemoration of the death of Christ, in which the church responded to grace already given, rather than a vehicle of grace.

After three years of bitter polemics Philip of Hesse arranged the meeting at Marburg in order to resolve the doctrinal differences that stood in the way of a united political front. The major participants were Luther, Philip Melancthon, Zwingli, and John Oecolampadius.

The public colloquy began on October 2 after preliminary private discussions had been held the previous day which paired Luther with Oecolampadius and Melancthon with Zwingli. Luther based his arguments on the words of institution. His opponents responded that since the body of Christ was "at the right hand of the Father" in heaven, it could not be present simultaneously at altars throughout the Christian world when the Eucharist was celebrated. Although the debate became quite heated at times, it concluded with both sides asking pardon for their harsh words. On October 4, at the request of Philip of Hesse, Luther drew up fifteen articles of faith based on the Schwabach Articles, which had been formulated before the colloquy. To his surprise his opponents accepted fourteen of them with only slight modifications. Even the fifteenth article, on the Eucharist, expressed agreement on five points and concluded with the conciliatory statement: "Although we are not at this present time agreed, as to whether the true Body and Blood of Christ are bodily present in the bread and wine, nevertheless the one party should show to the other Christian love as far as conscience can permit."

Despite this hopeful ending unity was not achieved. Shortly afterward both sides were again making critical remarks about the other. Subsequent writings by Zwingli convinced Luther that he had not been sincere in accepting the Marburg Articles. At the Diet of Augsburg in 1530 Zwinglians and Lutherans presented separate confessional statements which reflected the unresolved differences at Marburg.

R. W. HEINZE

See also AUGSBURG CONFESSION; LORD'S SUPPER, VIEWS OF; LUTHER, MARTIN; ZWINGLI, ULRICH.

Bibliography. G. Beto, "Marburg Colloquy of 1529: A Textual Study," CTM 16:73-94; M. E. Lehmann, ed., Luther's Works; H. Sasse, This Is My Body.

Marcion (d. ca. 160). Second century heretic, founder of churches that rivaled orthodox Christianity. Marcion came from Sinope, Pontus, to Rome and offered the church a large sum of money. He was disfellowshipped in 144 for his teachings, and his money was returned. He used his wealth and organizing ability to set up a rival church which became widespread and lasted for several centuries.

Marcion rejected the OT and issued his own NT, which consisted of an abbreviated Gospel of Luke and ten Pauline epistles (excluding the Pastorals) edited on a dogmatic basis. His Antitheses set forth contradictions between the testaments. His positions are known principally from the five-book refutation by Tertullian, Against Marcion.

Marcion distinguished between creator and redeemer Gods; judgment belongs to the Creator and redemption to the Father, the unknown God before the coming of Christ. The OT was the revelation of the Creator, the God of the Jews, who worked evils and was self-contradictory. Jesus Christ was not the Messiah predicted in the OT but a revelation of the God of love. This Christ was not born but simply appeared; he only seemed to suffer and he raised himself from the dead. The original disciples of Jesus had Judaized, so the Father called Paul to restore the true gospel. But his epistles were interpolated by Judaizers, so Marcion had to restore the "true" readings. The flesh is unclean, so only the unmarried were baptized, except at the end of life. Water was substituted for wine in the Lord's Supper. There was no law, and salvation was by grace alone.

Marcion shared many viewpoints with the Gnostics, but he differed from them in his rejection of speculation and allegory, his concern to organize a church, and in taking his stand on a written revelation alone. Reaction to Marcion speeded up the formulation of the orthodox canon, creed, and organization of the church.

E. FERGUSON

See also GNOSTICISM.

Bibliography. D. L. Balás, "Marcion Revisited: A 'Post-Harnack' Perspective," in Texts and Testaments, W. E. March, ed.; E. C. Blackman, Marcion and His Influence; R. J. Hoffman, Marcion: On the Restitution of Christianity; J. Knox, Marcion and the New Testament;

Marcion

G. Ory, Marcion; R. S. Wilson, Marcion: A Study of a Second-Century Heretic.

Mariology. The commonly held teachings of Mariology can be derived from her function as Mother of God (theotokos), a term first used around 320 and formally approved by the Council of Ephesus in 431. Mariologists argue that Mary, who enabled God the Savior to be born, has a position more exalted than any other creature. She is the Queen of heaven. Moreover, since her motherhood was indispensable to God's redemptive activity, Mary is essential to the final, spiritual perfection of every creature. Accordingly, although she was not involved in their original physical creation, Mary is, in this ultimate sense, the Mother of God's Creatures. This includes being Mother of Humans, a title found in Ambrose but popularized around 1100, and Mother of Angels, a term first found in the thirteenth century.

Mary's involvement in salvation was said to make her coredemptrix along with Christ. Irenaeus contrasted Eve's disobedience, which brought humanity's downfall, with Mary's obedience, which "became the cause of salvation both for herself and the human race." Beginning in the twelfth century references appear to her redemptive work not only in Christ's birth but also at the cross. Most Mariologists insist on both. While Jesus offered his sinless person to appease God's wrath, Mary, whose will was perfectly harmonious with his, offered her prayers. Both atoned for our sins—although Christ's satisfaction was primary and wholly sufficient. Mary's mediatory role includes her present intercession for sinners. This was seldom mentioned before the twelfth century, when popular piety began to regard Mary as more lenient than her Son, the Judge.

Mary's exalted role implies mariological assertions about her life. If Mary had ever been stained by sin, she would have been God's enemy and unfit to bear him. Consequently, she must have been "immaculate" (wholly free from any sin) from the instant she was conceived. The immaculate conception, hotly debated in the Middle Ages and early modern era, was opposed by Thomas Aquinas and his followers. But in 1854 Pius IX declared it an official dogma.

Mary's immaculate conception implies that she possessed a "fullness of grace" from the first instant. Further, she was immune to the slightest sin throughout her life. Mariologists also stress Mary's perpetual virginity. This includes, first, her virginity in partu: that Jesus was born without opening any part of her body; second, that she remained a virgin throughout her life. Though Mary's perpetual virginity, and especially her sinlessness, were challenged by some early fathers, they were generally accepted by Augustine's time. Proponents of perpetual virginity often assumed that anything else would contradict her purity. Finally, Mariologists teach that after her death Mary was assumed bodily into heaven. No clear reference to the assumption of Mary appears before the sixth century. It was not generally accepted until the thirteenth and was promulgated by Pius XII in 1950.

Protestants have criticized Mariology because many assertions lack biblical foundation. Scripture does not mention her immaculate conception or assumption. Her perpetual virginity is challenged by references to Jesus' sisters and brothers (Mark 3:31; 6:3; John 2:12; 7:1–10; Acts 1:14; Gal. 1:19; Mariologists claim they were cousins). Moreover, the Gospels do not present Mary unambiguously as sinless and in continuous accord with Christ's will. Protestants have also argued that Mariology exaggerates the contribution that any human can make to divine redemption. Luther and Calvin saw Mary as a human who in herself was nothing; she was enabled to bear Christ wholly through God's grace. Conservative Protestants argue that most mariological excesses—her roles as Mother of God's creatures, coredemptrix, comediatric intercessor; her immaculate conception; and her "fullness of grace"—spring from overestimating the human role in redemption, which was perhaps already implied by Irenaeus. This ancient theological issue may be the most fundamental one surrounding Mariology.

In recent times there has been a resurgence of mariological speculation in Roman Catholic thought, perhaps given impetus by current feminist interests. It seems to be moving in the direction of granting to Mary salvational status per se (i.e., independent of Jesus Christ's atoning work). If she becomes in fact a coredemptrix in her own right, Roman Catholicism would be in danger of lapsing into paganism.

T. N. FINGER

See also IMMACULATE CONCEPTION; MARY, ASSUMPTION OF; MARY, THE BLESSED VIRGIN; MOTHER OF GOD.

Bibliography. S. Benko, Protestants, Catholics and Mary; L. Bouyer, Seat of Wisdom; E. A. Carroll, "Survey of Recent Mariology," MarS 18:103–21; "Theology on the Virgin Mary: 1966–1975," TS 37:253–89; H. Graef, Mary: History of Doctrine and Devotion; R. Laurentin, Question of Mary; G. Miegge, Virgin Mary; T. A. O'Meara, Mary in Protestant and Catholic Theology; E. Schillebeeckx, Mary, Mother of the Redemption; O. Semmelroth, Mary, the Archetype of the Church; M. Warner, Alone of All Her Sex: The Myth and Cult of the Virgin Mary.

Marion, Jean-Luc. See POSTMODERNISM.

Maritain, Jacques (1882–1973). Philosopher, theologian, and humanist; leading proponent of Thomism. Maritain was born and educated in Paris. He received his university education, chiefly in the sciences, at the Sorbonne, which was at the time dominated almost entirely by positivism. Dissatisfied with this outlook, Maritain first found relief in the philosophy of Henri Bergson. But he did not find full satisfaction until, in 1906, he embraced Catholic Christianity. His wife and fellow student, Raïssa, accompanied him in his conversion. She became a respected scholar as well.

Soon after becoming a Christian, Maritain became a Thomist. He published his first philosophical article in 1910 and began his career of teaching philosophy a year later at the Collège Stanislas. In 1914 came a move to the Institut Catholique of Paris along with his first book, a critique of Bergson. From that time on, book followed upon book, each one of them devoted to shedding light on contemporary issues by means of Thomistic concepts. After World War II Maritain became the French ambassador to the Vatican. In 1948 he moved to Princeton University, from where he stepped into an active retirement in 1956.

In the face of contemporary totalitarian ideologies Maritain developed a political philosophy based on the distinction between an individual and a person. As an individual (the total preoccupation of the Fascist or Marxist) the human being is merely a part of the greater whole—the state—and so exists for the sake of society. But as a person he or she has inherent spiritual value and freedom; thus society must work to promote greater personhood. In this way Maritain recognized democracy as the ideal form of government for this age.

As a Thomist, Maritain emphasized the real distinction between the essence of a thing and its prior act of being. That something is comes before what it is. Maritain called Thomism the first existentialism. Being is known directly through an intuition. An intuition also leads Maritain to posit a “sixth way” of demonstrating the existence of God. The realization of our personal finitude directs us to seek the ground of our existence in God’s eternal being.

Both Jacques and Raïssa Maritain contributed to the understanding of art. Among other contributions Raïssa has made is a definitive work on Marc Chagall (who shared her roots in Russian Jewry). Jacques Maritain’s aesthetic theory focuses on poetic knowledge as emotion-based and nonconceptual, though not inferior to conceptual knowledge.

Maritain was admired by followers and critics alike for his clarity of thought as well as for his consistent personal piety.

W. CORDUAN

See also NEO-THOMISM; THOMISM.

Bibliography. J. Maritain, Approaches to God; Degrees of Knowledge; Existence and the Existent; Peasant of the Garrone; Person and the Common Good; St. Thomas and the Problem of Evil; Three Reformers: Luther, Descartes, Rousseau; True Humanism; J. M. Dunaway, Jacques Maritain; J. Evans, ed., Jacques Maritain: The Man and His Achievement; C. A. Fecher, Philosophy of Jacques Maritain.

Mark, Theology of. A growing consensus has emerged in recent years that the sacred evangelists were both historians and theologians. They produced accurate histories of the life of Christ and at the same time preached its implications for life in the church. Further, each evangelist had a distinctive message, seen in the way he selected and omitted certain scenes and details. It is therefore accurate to speak of a “theology of Mark.” His major themes will here be traced and an attempt made to delineate the way in which each is seen throughout his Gospel.

Christology. The book itself declares that it is “the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God.” There is a great difference of opinion as to the central emphasis in this regard. Many have thought that Christ/Messiah is predominant and expresses Mark’s portrayal of Jesus as the anti-type of the suffering servant of Yahweh. This is then linked to a royal stress in King of Israel (15:32)—i.e., in Mark the servant becomes messianic King. While this is no doubt true, it is not the major stress; in fact, Jesus is seen as demanding that this fact be kept secret. Here we find the primary critical problem of the Gospel. Every group with which Jesus is involved is forced to silence: the demons (1:23–25, 34; 3:11–12), those healed (1:40–44; 5:43; 7:36; 8:26), the disciples (8:30; 9:9). In addition, the leaders are kept from the truth (3:22; 4:10–12; 8:11–12), and Jesus withdraws from the crowds (4:10; 7:17; 9:28) and hides from them (7:24; 9:30). Many have thought that Mark created the theme in order to explain why Jesus was never recognized during his life (Wrede) or to oppose the disciples themselves, whom Mark believed were proclaiming a false gospel (Weeden). However, neither explanation is necessary. The crowds were not allowed to hear such teaching because they considered Jesus to be only a “wonder worker,” and the disciples could not proclaim it due to their own misunderstanding regarding the meaning of his office—i.e., they interpreted it in light of the Jewish expectation of a conquering king rather than a suffering servant. The demons were silenced as part of the “binding of Satan” theme (cf. 3:27 and further below), and the leaders were kept from understanding as a sign of God’s rejection of them. On the whole, Mark stresses that Jesus’ messiahship is essentially incognito, hidden from all except those with spiritual insight. In short, while Jesus is indeed a wonder worker, Mark wishes to clarify the implications carefully.

Mark, Theology of

In this regard we must note “Son of God,” the title which begins the gospel (1:1) and occurs at the climax in the centurion’s cry (15:39). The stress on sonship occurs at the baptism (1:11) and transfiguration (9:7) and is a key element in Jesus’ control over the demonic realm (3:11). Further, Jesus is seen as omniscient (2:8; 5:32, 39; 6:48; 8:17; 9:4, 33; 11:2, 14; 12:9; 13:12) and omnipotent over demons, illness, death, and the natural elements. Yet at the same time Mark stressed his humanity: his compassion (1:41; 6:34; 8:2), indignation (3:5; 9:19; 10:14), and his distress and sorrow (14:33–36). Jesus “sighs” (7:34; 8:12) and shows anger (1:43; 3:5); he becomes weary (4:38) and admits limitations regarding miracles (6:5–6) and knowledge (13:32). The balance between these is important and demonstrates that Mark is probably trying to present a balanced picture in order to correct an overly enthusiastic stress on the supernatural aspects.

Mark’s favorite designation is “Son of Man,” a term which undoubtedly was Jesus’ own self-designation but which also went beyond to picture the heavenly figure of Daniel 7:13. In Mark it speaks of his humanity (2:10, 27–28); his betrayal, suffering, and death (the passion predictions of 9:12; 14:21, 41); and his exaltation and future reign (13:26). It is obvious that here we have the correction of misunderstandings regarding his purpose and personhood, especially since it occurs primarily in the second half of the Gospel, where Jesus begins to correct the disciples’ views. It seems definite that Mark wishes to combine a theologia crucis with a theologia gloria. Therefore the so-called messianic secret centers upon the fact that the cross is the path to glory and that Jesus’ exaltation can be understood only by comprehending the significance of his suffering.

The final aspect of Mark’s emphases is Jesus as teacher. In the past this designation was usually attributed only to Matthew, but recently it has been more and more recognized that Mark gives Jesus’ teaching office prime place in his work. The one who performs such great and mighty deeds is demonstrated as the one who teaches; in fact, the first is subordinate to the second, for it is in his activity as teacher (4:38; 5:35; 9:17, 38; 10:51; 11:21) that both the disciples and the opponents are confronted with the reality of the Christ event. It is in his teaching that the true authority is manifest (1:22), and therefore this may well be the major stress.

Cosmic Conflict. In Mark, Christ is presented as the one who “binds” Satan (3:27 KJV). Where Matthew centers upon healing miracles, Mark stresses exorcism. This is seen by comparing Mark and Matthew with respect to the healing of the demon-possessed/epileptic child. Matthew mentions the demon only at the point of the miracle (17:14–18), while Mark relates an amazingly detailed narrative with four separate descriptions of the effects of the possession (9:18, 20, 22, 26). Jesus is pictured as one who violently assaults sin and the cosmic forces of evil. Moreover, he passes on this eschatological ministry to the disciples, who participate with him in his victory (3:15; 6:7, 13; for the problem of 9:18 see below). Implicit in 3:27 also is the idea of “plundering” Satan’s realm. This is certainly the thrust of the exorcism miracles (1:23–26; 3:11–12; 5:6–13; 9:14–27). When the demons utter Jesus’ name, they are not unwittingly acting as his “PR” agents, but rather are trying to gain control of him. In the ancient world (as in many tribal areas today) one would gain power over a spirit-creature by learning his “hidden name.” When Jesus forced silence upon them (1:25, 34; 3:12) or made them reveal their own names (5:9), this signified his mastery over the satanic forces. The authority and other blessings given Jesus’ followers are the spoil from that victory.

Eschatology. Many have stated that Mark is primarily a proponent of a futuristic eschatology, perhaps even calling the church to the imminent parousia in Galilee (Marxsen). Yet the Markan emphasis goes beyond this. According to 1:15, the kingdom has already come, and the time of fulfillment is here. Jesus’ deeds and words demonstrate the presence of the kingdom within history, and Jesus will continue to mediate this endtime power until the final consummation of the divine plan (8:38; 13:24–27; 14:62). Therefore the disciple exists in present hope, and Mark’s eschatology is “inaugurated” rather than final—i.e., it recognizes the “beginning” of the “end” and the fact that the believer lives in a state of tension between the two.

At the same time we must acknowledge the stress on the future parousia in Mark. The three passages mentioned above (8:38; 13:26; 14:62) show that the suffering of Christ can be understood properly only in light of his coming glory at both the resurrection/exaltation and parousia. One event that illustrates the connection between the resurrection and the eschaton is the transfiguration (9:2–8); when one realizes that it is surrounded by passages on suffering, the point made here becomes clear. The same is true of the Olivet discourse (ch. 13), which demonstrates once more that suffering and persecution lead to glory. Yet even here we are not free of the strong realized stress, for it is seen in the great accent on watchfulness (13:5, 9, 23, 33, 35, 37) that permeates the chapter. The true disciple will be characterized by an expectant alertness in light of the imminent inbreaking of the final kingdom.

The Miracles and Soteriology. One cannot ignore the centrality of the miracle stories, for they form one fifth of the Gospel and almost one half of the first ten chapters. The basic word, as in all the Synoptics, is “power” (dynamis), which points to the power of God operative in his Son. Mark, however, is careful to stress that the miracles do not form apologetic proof that Jesus is the Christ. The central theme in Mark is that the miracles can be understood only by faith; they cannot produce faith. The disciples misunderstand them (4:40; 6:52; 8:17–18), and their effect is diminished by the apparent humanity of Jesus himself (6:1–3; cf. 3:20–21). With the presence of many miracle workers, many of them false prophets (13:22), the common people could draw only erroneous conclusions. Therefore, they needed his teaching and his person to understand properly (1:37–38; 2:5; 4:40; 5:34). Mark was stressing the hiddenness of God in Jesus and wished to demonstrate that even his miracles were only glimmers of the true reality and as such comprehensible only by faith. Further, they are symbols of God's forgiveness; as the miracle is performed, the spiritual need is met (4:35–41; 6:45–52; 7:31–37; 8:22–26).

The connection of the miracles with faith and forgiveness leads to the further point that when faith is present, the miracles point to the salvific power of God in Christ. By actualizing the power and authority of God in the situation, they make the reader cognizant of the radical demands of God. It has often been said that Mark has no true soteriology. Yet that is to deny the implication of such key passages as 10:45, which presents Christ as the one who gave his life “as a ransom for many.” Mark seeks to drive men to decision, which he accomplishes by setting two scenes in contrast, thereby highlighting the issues and demanding encounter with God (e.g., 3:7–12, where the demons acknowledge him, and 3:20–35, where Jesus is called Beelzebul; or 11:12–21, which shows that the cleansing of the temple prefigured the “curse” of God upon Israel). Mark constantly shows men—common people, leaders, and disciples—in the conflict of decision.

Discipleship. The final emphasis in Mark, and in some ways the major emphasis along with Christology, is the discipleship motif. Again there is certainly controversy here, as some have argued that Mark has a negative thrust intended to show the error of the disciples (Weeden). However, this is hardly true of the Gospel as a whole. Mark does wish to stress the radical nature of the call and the difficulties of achieving the goal. However, the reader is expected to identify with the disciples in this dilemma, and it indeed forms the heart of the Gospel.

At the beginning of Mark's Gospel, Jesus fulfills his own message of repentance (1:15) by calling the disciples to be “fishers of men” (cf. Matt. 4:18–22 and Luke 5:1–11, where it comes much later). Then after the conflict narratives (2:1–3:6) Jesus cements his “withdrawal” (3:7) by turning to the disciples and commissioning them (3:13–19), in a scene filled with election terminology and centering upon their authority and responsibility. Finally, the first segment of the Gospel concludes with a missions scene in which Jesus “sends” his disciples, again with authority and in complete dependence upon God (6:7–13). From here, however, the relationship seems to deteriorate, and the central section of Mark (6:7–8:30) has two themes—the withdrawal of Jesus from the crowds combined with his time with the twelve, and the failure of the disciples to comprehend his teaching. They are amazingly obtuse with respect to all aspects of his teaching and are both uncomprehending (6:52; 7:18; 8:17–18) and even “hardened” (6:52; 8:17), a startling term in light of its theological connotations and its presence after the two feeding miracles.

However, once more this failure is not the final point, although it is certainly stressed at the very end, especially if Mark ends at 16:8. Yet in the last section of the Gospel before the passion (8:31–10:52), the solution is seen in the presence of Jesus the teacher, who patiently and lovingly instructs them. Note that in 8:31 Jesus “began to teach” them, an act clearly linked to their failure to understand (8:32–33), which is countered by his instruction (8:34–38). This in itself follows the important healing of the blind man (8:22–26), a two-stage miracle which may have been intended to prefigure a two-stage overcoming of the disciples' blindness (cf. 8:17–21) via first Peter's confession (partial sight, as seen in 8:31–33) and then by the transfiguration, which solidified the revelation of God to the disciples. The passion predictions are followed by very serious failures on their part, and at the healing of the demon-possessed child this comes to a crisis when the disciples are unable to perform that which previously had been a significant sign of their authority (cf. 9:18 with 6:13). The solution is seen in awakened faith (9:24) and its response, prayer (9:29). Steps of this growing awakening are seen in the passion narrative, and there the core of the problem becomes even more evident: discipleship is a call to the cross, and it cannot be understood until the cross. The triumphal entry is an incognito message regarding Jesus' true mission, and it is followed by the judgment on the temple (ch. 11). In three major scenes Jesus begins to lift further the veil, and the disciples are called to understanding—the anointing at Bethany (14:3–9), the eucharistic words at the Last Supper (14:22–25), and Gethsemane (14:32–42). Finally, at the resurrection failure is still seen (16:8, with most scholars realizing that the women are to be identified with the disciples), but it is obviated by the promise of Jesus' presence (16:7). As the reader identifies first with the problem of discipleship and then with Jesus (the solution), victory becomes an act of faith.

G. R. OSBORNE

Mark, Theology of

See also JOHN, THEOLOGY OF; LUKE, THEOLOGY OF; MATTHEW, THEOLOGY OF.

Bibliography. P. Achtemeier, "He Taught Them Many Things': Reflections on Marcan Christology," CBQ 42:465–81; Mark; G. R. Beasley-Murray, "Eschatology in the Gospel of Mark," SwJT 21:37–53; "Parousia in Mark," SwJT 21:565–81; E. Best, Following Jesus: Discipleship in the Gospel of Mark; "Miracles in Mark," RE 75:539–54; J. L. Blevins, "Christology of Mark," RE 75:505–17; W. D. Carroll, "Jesus of Mark's Gospel," BT 103:2105–12; R. T. France, "Mark and the Teaching of Jesus," in Gospel Perspectives, R. T. France and D. Wenham, eds.; J. J. Kilgallen, "Messianic Secret and Mark's Purpose," BTB 7:62–65; R. Martin, Mark: Evangelist and Theologian; W. Marxsen, Mark the Evangelist; R. P. Meye, Jesus and the Twelve; N. P. Petersen, ed., Perspectives on Mark's Gospel; S. P. Puduerry, "Meaning of Discipleship in the Gospel of Mark," Jeev 10:93–110; Q. Quesnell, Mind of Mark; D. Rhoads and D. Michie, Mark as Story; J. Rohde, Rediscovering the Teaching of the Evangelists; D. Senior, "Gospel of Mark," BT 103:2094–2104; R. C. Tannehill, "Disciples in Mark: The Function of a Narrative Role," JR 57:386–405; T. J. Weeden, Mark, Traditions in Conflict; W. Wrede, Messianic Secret.

Mark of the Beast. The importance of this expression is to be seen in its several uses in Revelation (13:16–18; 14:11; 15:2; 16:2; 19:20; 20:4). This mark can be taken to be a brand, stamp, or tag (cf. the philacteries, Deut. 6:8), having economic (Rev. 13:17) and religious significance (14:11).

Revelation 13:18 suggests that the mark of the beast is to be identified with the number of the beast, 666. John could be using an ancient system of numerology called gematria, in which the number concepts (e.g., 600, 60, 6, etc.) are identified with their alphabetic letter equivalents, to be translated then into proper names. Thus, 666 has been identified with Titus, the Latin empire (church), Nero, Nimrod (Gen. 10:8), Napoleon, and Mussolini. In fact, there have been dozens of significant persons throughout history who have been identified as "the beast." Needless to say, all these guesses have been wrong.

The number 666 could well be identified with some future historical Antichrist or situation, but history teaches us to be cautious in trying to be too precise.

W. H. MARE

See also ANTICHRIST.

Bibliography. D. G. Barnhouse, Revelation; J. M. Ford, Revelation; G. E. Ladd, Commentary on the Revelation; R. P. Martin, NIDNTT 2:573–74; H. B. Swete, Apocalypse of St. John.

Marpeck, Pilgram. See MENNONITES.

Marriage, Marriage Customs in Bible Times. After God had established marriage for the good of mankind (Gen. 2:18–25), various customs arose in recognition of the union of man and wife for the procreation of children as well as for the increasing, and thus the strengthening, of the nation. Children assisted in the work of the family and provided sons to be warriors. It was not until early Christian times that marriage came to be regarded as a sacrament.

Eligibility. Marriage within the immediate family group was general, and limits on acceptable consanguinity were imposed. In the early preexilic period a man could marry his half-sister on his father's side (Gen. 20:12); even under David this was so, although probably rare by then, as it was forbidden in Leviticus 20:17. The marriage laws of Deuteronomy 25:5 and Leviticus 18:16 show some discrepancy, and possibly indicate a mild relaxation of the strict Levitical regulations. Close relatives frequently married, and refusal was difficult (Tob. 6:13; 7:11–12). Isaac and Rebekah were first cousins, as were Jacob and Leah and Rachel. Leviticus 18:12–13 and 20:19 would have forbidden the marriage of an aunt and a nephew which produced the infant Moses, or that of Jacob simultaneously to two sisters (Gen. 29:30).

When one was forced to turn outside the tribe or clan, marriage to another Israelite family was easily accepted. However, marriage to a foreigner was fraught with dangers, such as possible dilution of the faith and the Hebrew heritage, as well as the advent of strange gods and religious practices.

Intermarriage with Canaanite women, described in 1 Kings 11:4, was forbidden under Mosaic law (Exod. 34:16; Deut. 7:3–6), although like several other prohibitions this was often ignored. Exceptions were made for women captured in war who were prepared to renounce their country, its customs, and beliefs (Deut. 21:10–14), although it is doubtful whether this was a frequent practice.

Matriarchal marriage occurred when a man went to live with and became part of his wife's family—as Jacob did with Leah and Rachel—either temporarily or permanently. When Samson married a Philistine woman, she continued living with her family, while Samson visited from time to time (Judg. 14:8–20; 15:1–2). Frequent biblical examples show that although marriage to a foreigner was unpopular, it was certainly practiced. Esau married two Hittite women (Gen. 26:34), Joseph an Egyptian (Gen. 41:45), Moses a Midianite (Exod. 2:21), David an Aramean (2 Sam. 3:3), Ahab the Tyrian princess Jezebel (1 Kings 16:31), and Bathsheba a Hittite (2 Sam. 11:3).

So great was the concern of the Hebrews that their religion might be diluted by intermarriage with those of other faiths that in postexilic times wholesale divorce was ordered for those married to foreigners (Ezra 9:2; 10:3; 16–17). Purity of the faith was paramount, regardless of the destruction of homes and families. A similar idea was expressed by Paul, who condemned contracting a marriage with non-Christians (2 Cor. 6:14–15).

Bride and Groom. No precise information exists on the normal age of betrothal or marriage. The bar mitzvah celebrating the coming of age of a young male in later Jewish tradition reflected the earlier idea of a boy being recognized as a man when about thirteen years old. A minimum age of thirteen for boys and twelve for girls was eventually set, although royal families may have held marriages at quite different ages from those considered normal for most people. By early Christian times girls often married between twelve and seventeen, and boys between fourteen and eighteen. Marriages were frequently matters of convenience for the family and rarely a concern of the heart. They were arranged by parents, and in some cases were even considered invalid if parental permission was lacking. Discussions concerning the marriage took place between the parents without the presence, consent, or frequently the awareness of the prospective bride and groom.

It was not necessary for the eldest member of the family to marry first (Gen. 29:26). When Isaac was to be married, a servant was sent by Abraham to his relatives in Mesopotamia to choose a suitable bride and arrange the marriage contract (Gen. 24:33–53), although Rebekah was subsequently asked to give her consent to the proposal (Gen. 24:57–58), a formality which can perhaps be explained by the special interest that a brother might have in his sister's welfare (cf. Gen. 34:5, 31).

Marriages arranged by parents are mentioned frequently in Scripture (Josh. 15:16; Judg. 14:2–3; 1 Sam. 18:17, 19, 21, 27). In the first century B.C., however, the Bar Manasseh marriage deed formally records the consent of the bride. Where a father did not actually choose the bride for his son, strict guidelines and advice were given (Gen. 28:6–9; Tob. 4:12–13), although not always followed (Gen. 26:34–35). Rare indeed were signs of female initiative, such as Michal, Saul's daughter, expressing her love for David (1 Sam. 18:20).

Betrothal. "Betrothal" (Exod. 22:16; Deut. 20:7) was a legally binding contract between the parents of the bride and groom. It had the legal status of marriage (Deut. 28:30; 2 Sam. 3:14), and anyone guilty of seducing a betrothed virgin was stoned for violating his neighbor's wife (Deut. 22:23–24). The prospective groom took possession and established control over his bride by the gift of the bride-price to her father (Gen. 34:12; 1 Sam. 18:25).

The bride-price varied according to the "value" and social status of the bride. In the fifth century B.C. the Elephantine papyri quote sums of 5 and 10 shekels, but the normal bride-price was probably 10 to 30 shekels (Lev. 27:4–5), and by the time of the second temple had become 50 shekels, a sum which was halved for a widow or divorced woman.

The bride-price, often jewelry, was probably returned to the bride at the time of her father's death, or earlier if she became a widow and was in need. Assyrian law required the bride-price to be paid directly to the bride, and the Code of Hammurabi provided a return of double the bride-price to the intended groom where an engagement was broken off. The exchange of gifts was customary among the Hebrews, although few were probably as costly and elaborate as those received by Rebekah (Gen. 24:53). In Babylonian law the husband received gifts from the father of the bride which could be used until the bride became a widow, at which time they became her property.

As the betrothal, which normally lasted one year, was a distinct part of a permanent relationship (Matt. 1:18; Luke 1:27; 2:5), the prospective groom was exempt from military service (cf. Deut. 24:5) and was already termed "son-in-law" by the bride's father from the time of the betrothal (Gen. 19:14). There remained a distinction, however, between betrothal and marriage (Deut. 20:7), and although Mary was considered to be Joseph's wife at the time of their betrothal, he did not have intercourse with her until after the birth of Jesus.

From 1500 B.C. circumcision seems to have been practiced in some areas as an initiatory rite before marriage. It may have been performed at puberty when the Israelites were in Egypt. The legislation given to Moses on Mount Sinai ordered the circumcision of male children on the eighth day (Lev. 12:3), although the practice is mentioned in relation to marriage in Genesis 34.

Marriage Ceremony. The story of Jacob gives the first biblical example of a feast forming part of the marriage celebration (Gen. 29:22; cf. Judg. 14:10), while bridesmaids had a ceremonial place in Samson's marriage festivities (cf. Ps. 45:14). The Elephantine texts record in the marriage ceremony a declaration by the husband, "She is my wife and I am her husband, from this day for ever." In Christian times a simpler format was used, the husband declaring, "Thou shalt be my wife."

There was great family rejoicing at the wedding. Bride and groom acted as royalty for a week of festivity, doing no work. Both were arrayed in special fine clothing (Isa. 61:10; Ezek. 16:9–13), the bridal gown being frequently adorned with jewels. The groom wore a diadem (Song 3:11) and frequently a garland (Isa. 61:10), while the bride wore a veil (Song 4:3). Rebekah was veiled before her fiancé (Gen. 24:65), as the face of the bride always remained covered until she had been escorted by her parents to the bridal chamber. This would also explain the ease with which, on Jacob's wedding night, Laban was able to replace Rachel with Leah (Gen. 29:23–25).

Marriage, Marriage Customs in Bible Times

The procession of the groom and his friends with musical instruments through the streets (Jer. 7:34) was the highlight of the wedding ceremony. Closer to the Christian period, both the bride's and the groom's processions would leave their respective houses to meet at a specific location (1 Macc. 9:37–39), normally returning to the home of the groom for the actual wedding feast (Matt. 22:2).

The feasting, fine food, and merriment sometimes lasted for seven days (Gen. 29:27; Judg. 14:12), or occasionally even fourteen days (Tob. 8:20). Certain symbolic ceremonies may have been part of the wedding ritual. Ruth requested that Boaz spread his skirt over her as a symbol of taking her as his wife, and the ceremonial removal of the bride's girdle by the groom sometimes took place in the wedding chamber; a room or tent prepared especially for the newly married couple. The marriage was expected to be consummated on the first night (Gen. 29:23; Tob. 8:1), the stained linen being retained as evidence of virginity.

By NT times the wedding of a virgin normally took place on a Wednesday. This provided adequate time for the husband to bring charges against her on Thursday if she were found not to be a virgin. Thursday was the day for weddings of widows and those who were divorced, these newlyweds thus having uninterrupted time before the sabbath. If a husband falsely accused his wife of not being a virgin, or if he had lain with her before their marriage, she could not be divorced (Deut. 22:13–19, 28–29). The Elephantine texts provide evidence of several marriage contracts, although they were also common in Greek times and were first recorded in the book of Tobit (7:12). The marriage was valid only after the couple had lived as man and wife for a week (cf. Gen. 29:27; Judg. 14:12, 18). Before this seven-day period Samson left his bride, whose marriage was then declared void, and she remarried (Judg. 14:20). Although marriage as a sacrament dates only from Christian times, it was considered the sacred fulfillment of God's will and purpose, and as such was holy.

Marital Rights and Responsibilities. Despite the fact that the betrothal seemed to imply the purchase and ownership of the bride by the groom, and although the wife and children are frequently listed with other possessions of the husband (Exod. 20:17; Deut. 5:21), it is unlikely that the position of the wife was as inferior as it sounds. The wife could not be sold, although she could be divorced very easily (Sir. 25:26), whereas she could rarely divorce her husband. The commandment to children to "honor thy father and thy mother" implies an equality of status which was not actually present. Yet the Hebrew wife was treated as a worker and not as a beast of burden, as Arabian women were. The primary role of the wife was to be the mother of sons, and when she had fulfilled this requirement her status rose accordingly. If she was unable to fulfill this role, she would often give her handmaid to her husband for this purpose (Gen. 16:3).

A wife's other responsibilities included managing the household, fetching water, gathering fuel, reaping straw, providing clothing, preparing food, welcoming guests, and also overseeing the general education and upbringing of children until they were five years old, when the teaching role for the sons was assumed by the father. The wife was not expected to take any part in financial administration, even her own funds being administered by her husband. If she became a widow, however, she might manage funds and property until her sons came of age.

It was the responsibility of the husband to provide for his wife and family. A wife's promise was invalid unless her husband also gave consent to it (Num. 30:6–15). The power and authority came through the male head of the household to the son, who was frequently named after his father, although the right of naming a child, and thereby conveying authority over him, rested almost equally with both parents (cf. Gen. 4:1, 25–26; 5:29; 35:18; 1 Sam. 1:20; 4:21; Isa. 8:3; Hos. 1:4, 6, 9). Still, the root of the phrase "marry a wife" means to become master (Deut. 21:13), and this was exactly how the husband frequently was treated—and expected to be.

Most marriages in Israel were monogamous, and only in certain periods was polygamy practiced, partly because of the cost that would have been involved in providing several bride-prices. Bigamy was acknowledged in Deuteronomy 21:15–17, although it frequently led to quarrels between wives (1 Sam. 1:6) and other problems (Judg. 8:29–9:57; 2 Sam. 11:13; 1 Kings 11:1–8). Kings were those most likely to indulge in large numbers of wives. Herod had nine wives (Josephus, Antiquities xvii.1.3), David had more than six wives and concubines (2 Sam. 3:2–5; 5:13–16), and Solomon had seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines (1 Kings 11:1–3), many of which probably represented political alliances.

Levirate Marriage. When a man died without issue, it was considered important to preserve both the family name and the inheritance. Even where there were already children, it became the responsibility of the husband's closest male relative to provide for the widow and orphans. The deceased husband's brother normally entered into a levirate (or "brother-in-law") marriage with the widow (Deut. 25:5–10). If she was childless at the time of this marriage, the firstborn of the levirate marriage was considered to be the child of the deceased. Levirate marriages were also known among other societies in the ancient Near East, including the Canaanites, Assyrians, and Hittites.

The most familiar of levirate marriages in the OT is that of Ruth, who needed to find a male relative to marry her so that the family name could be preserved and the property go to her descendants. In this instance the closest male relative declined the responsibility of both maintaining the widow and purchasing the land, knowing that the firstborn child would not even bear his name. Boaz, a relative, agreed to undertake the responsibility for the levirate (Ruth 2:20–4:10). Tamar was also promised under levirate law to be the bride of Onan (Gen. 38:8).

Figurative Use of “Marriage.” The terms “bride” and “groom” are used frequently in the OT to refer to the special relationship of the Hebrew people with God (Isa. 62:4–5; Jer. 2:2). In Hosea, God rejects his wife Israel (Hos. 2:2) but is prepared to forgive her and accept her if she again becomes faithful (2:19–20). Jeremiah contrasts the desolation and horror about to descend on Judah with the joy of a wedding feast (Jer. 7:34; 16:9; 25:10). In the NT John the Baptist is the first to use such imagery, comparing his feeling of joy with that of a groom at a wedding (John 3:29). The parable of the wise and foolish virgins (Matt. 25:1–12) is probably the best-known parable about the preparations for the wedding procession. The concept of the church as the bride of Christ is continued in Corinthians, Ephesians, and Revelation.

Early in the Christian era, when marriage was still a civil contract rather than a sacrament, virginity became recognized as the highest Christian state. Virginity was pure and acceptable to God. A woman who chose celibacy after the death of her spouse was considered to have chosen the second highest route, with marriage ranking third in a scale of preference to God. Thus for a considerable period of time the early church praised celibacy to the detriment of marriage, despite Christ’s own support of the institution of marriage.

H. W. PERKIN

See also MARRIAGE, THEOLOGY OF.

Bibliography. D. S. Bailey, Man-Woman Relation in Christian Thought; M. Burrows, Basis of Israelite Marriage; L. M. Epstein, Marriage Laws in the Bible and the Talmud; Sex Laws and Customs in Judaism; P. H. Goodman, Jewish Marriage Anthology; R. H. Kennett, Ancient Hebrew Life and Social Custom; L. Köhler, Hebrew Man; W. Lacey, Family in Classical Greece; D. R. Mace, Hebrew Marriage; V. H. Matthews, Manners and Customs in the Bible; E. Neufeld, Ancient Hebrew Marriage Laws; O. A. Piper, Biblical View of Sex and Marriage; K. Scott, Perspectives on Marriage; W. R. Smith, Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia; J. A. Thompson, Handbook of Life in Bible Times; E. Westermarck, History of Human Marriage.

Marriage, Theology of. Christians believe that at the heart of the universe is a relationship: Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. When God created man, he said, “Let us make man in our image, in our likeness” (Gen. 1:26). To be made in the image of God is to be made as a social being capable of relationship. The most significant expression of the image of God in relationship is that between a man and a woman. “So God created man in his own image, in the image of God he created him; male and female he created them” (Gen. 1:27). This union between man and woman is most intimately realized in marriage. So in this way the mystery of marriage reflects the very image of God.

Biblical teaching on marriage is epitomized in the statement, “For this reason a man will leave his father and mother and be united to his wife, and they will become one flesh” (Gen. 2:24). This sentence is quoted by our Lord (Matt. 19:5) and the apostle Paul (Eph. 5:31) as authority for their teachings on marriage. The key phrase is the expression “one flesh” (bāsar ʾehād). “Flesh” here implies kinship or fellowship, with the body as a medium. On the occasion of Eve’s creation God observes, “It is not good for the man to be alone” (Gen. 2:18). In this way he indicates the incompleteness of man and woman apart from one another and sets forth marriage as the means for them to achieve completeness.

An Exclusive Relationship. Marriage is an exclusive relationship. The total unity of persons—physically, emotionally, intellectually, and spiritually—comprehended by the concept “one flesh” eliminates polygamy as an option. One cannot relate wholeheartedly in this way to more than one person at a time.

It is also plain from the words of our Lord, “Therefore what God has joined together, let man not separate” (Matt. 19:6), that marriage is to endure for the lifetime of the two partners. Only under certain special conditions may the principle of indissolubility be set aside.

Promiscuity is likewise ruled out. Such unions are neither exclusive nor enduring. Moreover, they violate the holiness that inheres in biblical marriage. God instituted marriage so that men and women might complete one another and share in his creative work through the procreation of children. (Celibacy is not a higher and holier condition—a viewpoint which finds its roots in Greek dualism rather than in the Bible.) Physical union in marriage has a spiritual significance in that it points beyond itself to the total unity of husband and wife, which is essentially a spiritual union. This is underscored by Paul’s use of the conjugal union to symbolize the unity of Christ with his church (Eph. 5:22–33). But to maintain its holiness this union must take place in a relationship committed to enduring exclusiveness. Illicit sexual unions are deemed reprehensible in that they temporarily and superficially establish a one-flesh relationship (1 Cor. 6:16) without proper accompanying intentions and commitments. An act with spiritual significance is made to serve improper ends. Another person is selfishly exploited. What should be a constructive relationship serving as the means to deeper interpersonal communion becomes in promiscuous relationships destructive both to one's capacity for personal unity with a member of the opposite sex and to existing marriage relationships, if any. Hence our Lord made adultery the ground for dissolution of a marriage (Matt. 5:32).

A Definition. When is a couple married? Of what does marriage ultimately consist? Some, arguing from 1 Corinthians 6:16, maintain that marriage is effected through sexual intercourse. A person is considered in the eyes of God to be married to that member of the opposite sex with whom he or she first had sex relations. The sex act is viewed as the agent through which God effects marriage in a manner apparently analogous to the way in which adherents of the doctrine of baptismal regeneration see him make the sacrament of baptism the agent in effecting regeneration.

Others consider marriage to be brought about as the result of a declaration of desire to be married, accompanied by the expression of mutual intentions of sole and enduring fidelity and responsibility toward the other, preferably undergirded by self-giving love, in the presence of accredited witnesses. This view does not undercut the validity of marriages in which the couple cannot bring about physical consummations. It underscores the fact that marriage never has been regarded as solely the concern of the individual couple. This may be seen, for example, in the prevalence of community laws forbidding incest and regulating the degree of consanguinity permissible for marriage. Since the home is the proper medium for the procreation and nurturing of children, church and community have an important stake in the stability and success of the marriages taking place among their constituents.

Marriage relegates other human ties to a secondary role. Spiritual and emotional satisfactions formerly drawn from the parental relationship the marriage partners are now to find in one another. To sunder one's parental relationships and join oneself in intimate, lifelong union with a person who hitherto has been a stranger demands a considerable degree of maturity—as expressed in a capacity for self-giving love, emotional stability, and the capacity to understand what is involved in committing one's life to another in marriage. Marriage is for those who have grown up. This appears to exclude children, the mentally impaired, and those who are psychotic or psychopathic at the time of entering into marriage.

To suggest that marriage is for those who have grown up implies a relative maturity. It is relative, because no one entering into a marriage union could possibly anticipate fully all that will be encountered in this union. In a fallen world, no one's motives could be expected to be perfectly pure. It is in the unique context of marriage that particular graces can be experienced. It is the place where Christlike love for the church is exhibited between two persons. Love and forgiveness, regardless of merit, are to be exercised. This activity is not merely natural, but supernatural. Many Christian traditions celebrate marriage as a sacramental activity and a channel for the grace of God. The high courtesy of the Cross, which says, "I give my life for you," finds its deepest expression in the everyday activities of the married couple. These activities, with their failures and successes, become the canvas on which God paints the evidence of His presence in this relationship.

Marriage and the New Testament. The chief contributions of the New Testament to the biblical view of marriage were to underscore the original principles of the indissolubility of marriage and the equal dignity of women (1 Cor. 7:4; 11:11–12; Gal. 3:28). By raising women to a position of equal personal dignity with men, marriage was made truly "one flesh," for the unity implied in this expression necessarily presupposes that each person be given opportunity to develop his or her full potentialities. This is not possible in a social system in which either men or women are not accorded full human dignity.

Does not this raise difficulties with the biblical doctrine of subordination of married women (Eph. 5:22–23)? Not at all, for this doctrine refers to a hierarchy of function, not of dignity or value. There is no inferiority of person implicit in the doctrine. God has designated a hierarchy of responsibility, hence authority, within the family, and has done so according to the order of creation. But woman's dignity is preserved not only in the fact that she has equal standing in Christ, but also in that the command to submit to her husband's headship is addressed to her. She is told to do this willingly as an act of spiritual devotion (Eph. 5:22) and not in response to external coercion. She is to do this because God rests primary responsibility upon her husband for the welfare of the marriage relationship and for the family as a whole. He, in fact, qualifies for leadership in the church in part through the skill he demonstrates in "pastoring" his family (1 Tim. 3:4–5). In a fallen world this doctrine of subordination has been abused. It must not be seen as means of giving divine sanction to abuse, either physical or emotional. Marriage is a gift from God. Its practices should be attended with the graces which reflect the character of God.

L. I. GRANBERG AND J. R. ROOT

See also ADULTERY; BIRTH CONTROL; DIVORCE; MARRIAGE, MARRIAGE CUSTOMS IN BIBLE TIMES; SEPARATION, MARITAL; SEXUAL ETHICS.

Bibliography. D. Atkinson, To Have and to Hold; D. S. Bailey, Man-Woman Relation in Christian Thought; Mystery of Love and Marriage; G. W. Bromiley, God and Marriage; C. N. L. Brooke, Marriage in Christian History; K. E. Kirk, Marriage and Divorce; M. Mason, Mystery of Marriage; O. Piper, Christian Interpretation of Sex; L. Smedes, Sex in the Real World; E. A. Westermarck, History of Human Marriage.

Marriage Feast of the Lamb. The announcement that the wedding supper of the Lamb is at hand is one of the key moments in the drama of the consummation. The picture in Revelation 19:7–9 conforms to the ancient Near Eastern custom of a wedding ceremony in two parts: a procession to the home of the bride and the wedding banquet itself. Here the announcement that the bride has made herself ready and the wedding is at hand forms the prelude to the description of Christ's triumphal procession from heaven to earth.

The imagery of the wedding banquet is a mixture of two distinct biblical figures. The consummation of the kingdom of God and of the Messiah was depicted as a great feast in the OT and in Jewish literature (Isa. 25:6; 2 Apoc. Bar. 29:1–8; 1 Enoch 62:13–15). This metaphor is employed by Christ as a description of the consummation of his own messianic reign (Matt. 8:11; 22:1–14; 25:10; Luke 14:15–23; 22:29–30). The other figure is that of the marriage between God and his people. Though already an important OT image, it is enriched in its NT form with Christ the bridegroom and the church his bride (John 3:28–29; 2 Cor. 11:2; Eph. 5:23–32). As Christ before him (Matt. 22:1–14; 25:1–13), but more explicitly, John joins the images of the messianic banquet and the marriage between Christ and his church so that in Revelation 19:7–9 the church is at once the bride and the guests at the wedding feast.

This complex metaphor is wonderfully suggestive. It expresses the tender love of Christ for his people, the intimacy of their fellowship in the coming age, and the bounty of that future life. It points to the imperfect and provisional aspects of the church's life in the present age—though she is betrothed to Christ, her marriage itself awaits his return. It indicates the necessity and priority of the divine calling in salvation (Matt. 22:9; Rev. 19:9) and the obligation of the called to prepare themselves for the Lord's return with a life of faith and obedience (Matt. 22:11–12; 25:7–12; 2 Cor. 11:2; Rev. 19:7–8).

R. S. RAYBURN

Marrow Controversy. Between approximately 1717 and 1722 the Church of Scotland was agitated by a controversy between evangelicals, known as "Marrow Men," and moderates, or "neonomians," over the relationship between law and gospel in salvation. Prominent evangelical ministers such as Thomas Boston and Ralph and Ebenezer Erskine had reprinted Marrow of Modern Divinity (ascribed by some to Edward Fisher of London in 1645), which maintained an immediate, free offer of salvation by looking to Christ in faith. This raised the opposition of the controlling party of the church, who as neonomians held that the gospel is a "new law" (neonomos), replacing the OT law with the legal conditions of faith and repentance needing to be met before salvation can be offered. They maintained the necessity of forsaking sin before Christ can be received, whereas the Marrow Men replied that only union to Christ can give us power to be holy. Hence the neonomians considered the call to immediate trust in Christ and to full assurance to be dangerously antinomian. Led by Principal Haddow of St. Andrews, the church condemned Marrow of Modern Divinity in 1720. The evangelicals protested this action without avail. They were formally rebuked by the church's General Assembly in 1722 but not removed from their ministries. Nevertheless, the writings of the Marrow Men (such as Boston's Fourfold State of Human Nature) were as influential in the popular piety of Scotland for the next two centuries as was Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress in English and American piety.

D. F. KELLY

See also BOSTON, THOMAS.

Bibliography. D. Beaton, Marrow of Modern Divinity and the Marrow Controversy; W. M. Hetherington, History of the Church of Scotland; J. MacLeod, Scottish Theology.

Martyr, Justin. See JUSTIN MARTYR.

Martyr, Peter. See PETER MARTYR VERMIGLI.

Mary, Assumption of. In principle this doctrine was a part of the Roman Catholic and Byzantine thinking in the Middle Ages. The apostolic constitution Munificentissimus Deus, promulgated by Pius XIII on November 1, 1950, made it a doctrine necessary for salvation, stating, "The Immaculate Mother of God, the ever-Virgin Mary, having completed the course of her earthly life, was assumed body and soul into heavenly glory."

No basis, biblical, apostolic, or postapostolic, exists in support of the doctrine. Apocryphal documents of the fourth century, Gnostic in character, such as the Passing of Mary, hint at it. Gregory of Tours in his De gloria martyrum of the sixth century quotes an unfounded legend about Mary's assumption. As the story became popular in both East and West it took two forms. The Coptic version describes Jesus appearing to Mary to foretell her death and bodily elevation into heaven, while the Greek, Latin, and Syriac versions picture Mary calling for the apostles, who are transported to her miraculously from their places of service. Then Jesus, after her death, conveys her remains to heaven. The doctrine was first treated in deductive theology about 800. Benedict XIV (d. 1758) proposed it as a probable doctrine.

Mary, Assumption of

Feasts celebrating the death of Mary date from the fifth century. In the East the late seventh-century feasts included the assumption. After the eighth century the West followed suit. Nicholas I by edict (863) placed the Feast of the Assumption on the same level as Easter and Christmas. Cranmer omitted it from the Book of Common Prayer and it has not since been included.

The 1950 action regarding the assumption of Mary is built upon the declaration of "The Immaculate Conception" (Dec. 8, 1854), which declared Mary free from original sin. Both issue from the concept of Mary as the "Mother of God." Her special state, Pius XII felt, demanded special treatment. If Mary is indeed "full of grace" (cf. Luke 1:28, 44) the assumption is a logical concomitant. Like Jesus, she is sinless, preserved from corruption, resurrected, received into heaven, and a recipient of corporeal glory. Thus Mary is crowned Queen of heaven and assumes the roles of intercessor and mediator.

The argument in Munificentissimus Deus develops along several lines. It emphasizes Mary's unity with her divine Son, for she is "always sharing His lot." Since she shared in the past in his incarnation, death, and resurrection, now, as his mother, she is the mother of his church, his body. Revelation 12:1 is applied to Mary; she is the prototype of the church, for she has experienced anticipatorially corporeal glorification in her assumption. Three times Mary is referred to as the "New Eve," working again the parallel of Christ as the new Adam and presenting the glorified Christ as one with the new Eve.

The assumption of Mary continues to be a fruitful field for Roman Catholic theologians even as biblical renewal, charismatic interest, and liberal theology also make their impact.

W. N. KERR

See also IMMACULATE CONCEPTION; MARIOLOGY; MARY, THE BLESSED VIRGIN; MOTHER OF GOD.

Bibliography. V. Bennet and R. Bench, Assumption of Our Lady and Catholic Theology; P. Duggan, Assumption Dogma; M. R. James, Apocryphal New Testament; E. L. Mascall and H. S. Box, eds., Blessed Virgin Mary; L.-J. Suenens, Mary the Mother of God.

Mary, The Blessed Virgin. Except for the Gospels, the Scriptures make little explicit reference to Mary. Certain OT prophecies have been thought to refer to her (Gen. 3:15; Jer. 31:22; Mic. 5:2-3; and, most clearly, Isa. 7:14). The symbolic drama of Revelation 12 has often been similarly interpreted. Paul mentions Mary specifically once (Gal. 4:4). For anything more, we must inquire of the Gospel writers. Luke presents the most detailed portrait. While Matthew also tells the nativity story, his references to Mary are brief, even though he strongly stresses her virginity (Matt. 1:18-25). Luke, however, vividly describes her encounter with the angel, her visit to Elizabeth, her beautiful "Magnificat," the birth of Jesus, and her trips to Jerusalem with the infant and the twelve-year-old Jesus (Luke 1:26-2:51). Mary appears humbly obedient in the fact of her great task (Luke 1:38), yet deeply thoughtful and somewhat perplexed as to its significance (Luke 1:29; 2:19, 33; 50-51). According to an episode recounted by Matthew, Mark, and Luke, Jesus' mother and his "brothers" stand outside the early circle of disciples (Matt. 12:46-50; Mark 3:19b-21, 31-35; Luke 8:19-21; cf. Luke 11:27-28). Elsewhere Jesus complains that he is not without honor save "among his relatives and in his own house" (Mark 6:4; cf. Matt. 13:53-58; Luke 4:16-30). John apparently recounts some misunderstanding between Jesus and Mary at the wedding feast in Cana (John 2:1-12). Yet John pictures Mary remaining faithful beside the cross, while Jesus commends her to his "beloved disciple's" care (John 19:25-27). Finally, Luke lists Mary among the earliest post-Easter Christians (Acts 1:14). Traditionally, Catholics have venerated Mary as entirely sinless and as the most glorious of God's creatures. Feeling that this detracts from the centrality of Christ, Protestants have often neglected her unduly. Radical biblical criticism in doubting the infancy narratives' historicity often furthered this neglect. However, the increasing importance of women's issues has spurred new interests in Mary among both Protestants and Catholics alike.

T. N. FINGER

See also IMMACULATE CONCEPTION; MARIOLOGY; MARY, ASSUMPTION OF; MOTHER OF GOD.

Bibliography. R. E. Brown, "Meaning of Modern New Testament Studies for an Ecumenical Understanding of Mary," in Biblical Reflection on Crises Facing the Church; R. E. Brown et al., eds., Mary in the New Testament; H. Graef, Mary: A History of Doctrine and Devotion; A. Greeley, Mary Myth; J. G. Machen, Virgin Birth of Christ; J. McHugh, Mother of Jesus in the New Testament; G. Miegge, Virgin Mary; H. A. Oberman, Virgin Mary in Evangelical Perspective; P. F. Palmer, Mary in the Documents of the Church; R. Ruether, Mary: The Feminine Face of the Church; M. Warner, Alone of All Her Sex: The Myth and Cult of the Virgin Mary.

Mascall, Eric Lionel (1905-1993). Anglican theologian and philosopher. He read mathematics at Cambridge, was ordained a priest in 1932, and served briefly in the parish. He was the subwarden of Lincoln Theological College for eight years, then taught philosophy of religion at Oxford (1946–62). He delivered the Bampton lectures there in 1956. Later he was professor of historical theology at the University of London (1962–73). His work in natural theology and philosophy reveals a man concerned with both the quest for truth and the vitality of the modern church.

Mascall was a part of the rise of Neo-Thomism, along with fellow Anglican Austin Farrer and Catholics Jacques Maritain and Etienne Gilson. These men all shared a foundation in Thomas and Aristotle, a strong realism, and a belief in the possibility of metaphysics. Though not bound completely to Aquinas, they sought to restate the validity of natural theology in its many forms. To that end, Mascall reworked rational arguments for the existence of God, the Thomistic doctrine of analogy, and problems around time and space, miracles, and the contingency of all creation. It is this universal contingency that lies at the heart of Mascall's natural theology.

However, Mascall was not only interested in reasserting older philosophical doctrines. He critiqued the modern church and its theologians, as he saw it adopting particular philosophies throughout history: Platonism, Aristotelianism, and Idealism. This secularization of the church, Mascall believed, was more often initiated from within than from without. He also wrote and spoke critically in matters of linguistic philosophy, the theology of Paul van Buren, and, later, in opposition to abortion. While willing to look at new ideas critically, he was recognized for avoiding mere philosophical fads or fashions.

There is no doubt that Mascall made a significant contribution to the modern discussion of philosophy and faith, though a Neo-Thomist formulation of theology can be problematic due to its Aristotelianism. Of his many writings, He Who Is and Existence and Analogy have become classics of natural theology because of their justification for the necessary existence of God.

N. E. MAGEE

See also FARRER, AUSTIN MARSDEN; MARITAIN, JACQUES; NATURAL THEOLOGY; NEO-THOMISM.

Bibliography. E. L. Mascall, Christian Theology and Natural Science; Christian Universe; Corpus Christi; Existence and Analogy; He Who Is; Saraband: The Memoirs of E. L. Mascall; Secularization of Christianity: An Analysis and a Critique; Words and Images.

Mass. The word refers to the Eucharist or Lord's Supper and derives from the Latin missio, a term used in churches or law courts to dismiss the people. The expression Ite, missa est is the regular ending of the Roman rite. The term has been used in the West as a name for the whole of the service since at least the fourth century and is presently used by both Roman Catholics and Anglican High Churchmen.

In liturgical terminology there is sometimes a reference to two Masses, referring to a division of the eucharistic service that can be seen as early as Acts 20 and is clearly developed in third and fourth century texts. The first segment is the service of the word, after which catechumens were dismissed, and therefore termed the Mass of the catechumens; the second is the service of the table (the passing of the peace, the Lord's Prayer, and the Eucharist itself), which was reserved for baptized Christians in good standing and called the Mass of the faithful. In this liturgical use "Mass" indicates which group left the church at the dismissal at the end of that part of the service.

While the use of the term "Mass" does not necessarily indicate any particular theology (as, e.g., in the 1549 Book of Common Prayer or Luther's German Mass), in common usage it is connected with the Roman Catholic and Anglo-Catholic doctrine of the Mass in which the priest is considered to participate in the sacrifice of the body and blood of Christ, the transubstantiated host and wine. Usually this is not thought of as a re-sacrifice of Christ, although in some old Catholic theologies that was surely the case, but as a participation in and a making present of the eternal and thus timeless sacrifice of Christ in which the priest represents Christ in terms drawn from Hebrews. Thus the Mass is viewed as eschatological: it is in the here and now the sacrifice offered upon the cross (and indeed all of Christ's work), for in it time is swallowed up in eternity. While this eschatological aspect has never been accepted by Protestants, it allows Catholics to preserve the unity of Christ's work and the sacrificial character of the service.

P. H. DAVIDS

See also LORD'S SUPPER, VIEWS OF; ROMAN CATHOLICISM

Bibliography. G. Dix, Shape of the Liturgy; J. A. Jungmann, Mass of the Roman Rite; E. Schillebeeckx, Eucharist; D. B. Stuart, Development of Christian Worship; M. Turian, Eucharistic Memorial.

Mathews, Shailer (1863–1941). Baptist educator, theologian, ecumenist, and evangelist for modernism. Born in Portland, Maine, Mathews was educated at Colby College, Newton Theological Institute, and, briefly, the University of Berlin. After teaching at Colby (1887–94), he joined the faculty of the University of Chicago Divinity School, where in turn he was professor of NT, systematic theology, and historical and comparative theology (1894–1933). In 1908 he became dean.

Mathews was a champion of theological liberalism during the fundamentalist-modernist controversy. His Faith of Modernism (1924) was a widely read apology for reconstructing Christianity along liberal lines. Using a sociohistorical approach, he argued that all religion is “functional” (it helps people make sense of their environment) and that all theology is “transcendentalized politics” (it grows out of the church’s interaction with the “social mind” of its culture). Thus in order to remain a live option for people in different ages, Christianity must be constantly modernized. In his day, Mathews believed, the faith had to be brought in line with the empirical sciences.

In addition to being a spokesman for the Chicago school of liberal theology, Mathews was an avid churchman. He advocated the social gospel (Social Teachings of Jesus, 1897), served as president of the Federal Council of Churches (1912–16), and promoted the formation of the Northern Baptist Convention, becoming its president in 1915.

T. P. WEBER

See also CHICAGO SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY; LIBERALISM, THEOLOGICAL.

Bibliography. S. Mathews, Atonement and Social Process; Gospel and Modern Man; Growth of the Idea of God; New Faith for Old: An Autobiography; Spiritual Interpretation of History; C. H. Arnold, Near the Edge of Battle; W. R. Hutchinson, Modernist Impulse in American Protestantism; C. Peden and J. A. Stone, eds., Chicago School of Theology—Pioneers in Religious Inquiry.

Matins. See MORNING PRAYER; OFFICE, DAILY (DIVINE).

Matter. In ordinary language, matter means concrete, physical, nonspiritual things, the object of everyday external experience, open to study by physics and chemistry. The Christian faith declares that matter is wholly created by God and subject to his shaping power. Thus, (1) matter is contingent; it does not exist as a coeternal, independent principle; and (2) matter is good and not the principle of evil. It is a permanent element of the world guaranteed by the incarnation and the resurrection of the body.

The idea of a material ingredient common to all things was a central concept in pre-Socratic philosophy beginning with Thales (ca. 580 B.C.), who identified fire, earth, air, and water. Aristotle and Plato distinguished sharply between the material substance of which an object was composed and the form imposed on it. Subsequent philosophers have introduced numerous variations into the debate down through the ages. Descartes’s fundamental division was between mind and matter as absolutely distinct substances. Today almost all the axioms of earlier philosophy have been qualified because of the findings of Einstein, Planck, Heisenberg, and others.

The term “matter” and its cognates (“material,” “materialist,” etc.) have been heatedly debated in theological and philosophical circles throughout intellectual history. Matter has often been placed in opposition to life, mind, soul, or spirit. A preoccupation with matter has traditionally meant a preoccupation with worldly pleasures and bodily comforts, as opposed to the “higher” pleasures of the mind.

The doctrine that the divine Logos has become flesh would seem to mean that supreme spirituality has penetrated the material sphere, showing that matter is capable of expressing the concrete reality of God himself.

M. H. MACDONALD

See also EXISTENCE.

Bibliography. G. Gamow, Biography of Physics; W. Heisenberg, Philosophical Problems of Nuclear Sciences; P. Ricoeur, Main Trends in Philosophy; R. Rorty, Philosophy and the Mirror of Nature; S. Toulmin and J. Goodfield, Architecture of Matter.

Matthew, Theology of. In the literature of the church that remains from the first three centuries the Gospel most often referred to is Matthew’s. Its place in the order of the canon as the first Gospel probably reflects the church’s estimation of its priority theologically rather than chronologically.

In order to understand the theology of Matthew’s Gospel it is helpful to begin at the ending. Its climactic conclusion, the Great Commission (28:16–20), has been called the key to the Gospel’s theology. Several important themes are brought together in these verses.

First is the focus on the resurrected Christ. Each of the Gospel writers portrays a facet of Jesus’ life and ministry. Prominent in Matthew’s Gospel is the picture of Jesus as the Christ, the messianic Son of God who was also the suffering servant.

At this baptism Jesus told John that his ministry was “to fulfill all righteousness” (3:15). Righteousness in Matthew is a term meaning covenant faithfulness, obedience to God. An angel told Joseph that Jesus “will save his people from their sins” (1:21). Later Jesus told his disciples that he had come “to give his life as a ransom for many” (20:28). The prayer of this righteous Son in Gethsemane, “not as I will, but as you will” (26:39), was fulfilled on the cross and affirmed by the Roman soldier’s confession, “Surely he was the Son of God” (27:54). Christ had fulfilled all righteousness. He had been perfectly obedient to the Father’s will. It was this resurrected Christ, possessing the regal authority of God (13:37–42; 26:64), who appeared to the disciples to commission them.

Another aspect of Matthean Christology is the affirmation of Christ’s spiritual presence with the disciples. Jesus assured the disciples, “I am with you always” (28:20). The first of a series of OT texts cited by Matthew is Isaiah’s prophecy of Immanuel (Isa. 7:14). Its significance is made clear in the phrase “God with us” (1:23; Isa. 8:10). Christ’s presence continues. Jesus’ promise to the disciples, “Where two or three come together in my name, there am I with them” (18:20), was additional confirmation of his presence. Matthew wanted his readers to know that the regal ascended Christ was also spiritually present with his disciples (cf. Eph. 1:22–23).

This relates also to the Gospel’s ecclesiology, the doctrine of the church. Alone among the Gospels Matthew used the word “church” (Gr. ekklesiā, 16:18; 18:17). Not without reason has this been called “a pastoral Gospel.” Matthew saw that much of what Jesus had taught the disciples was applicable to the church of his own day. Of great importance in this regard was the commission to make disciples of all nations (28:19).

Jesus preached the good news (4:23) to Jews (Galilee and Judea, 4:25) and Gentiles (Decapolis, 4:25). His disciples and the church which they founded (16:18) were to do the same. John’s Gospel records Jesus’ self-confession, “I am the light of the world” (John 8:12). Matthew, on the other hand, underscored the disciple’s missionary responsibility by recording Jesus’ statement, “You are the light of the world” (5:14). The disciples, and the church, were to continue the ministry of Christ.

They were to make disciples of all nations. Israel, indeed, had been temporarily displaced as God’s chosen instrument of ministry (21:43). But this displacement was not permanent (19:28; 23:39). However hard of heart most Jews might be to the gospel, the mission to Israel was to continue alongside the mission to the Gentiles until Christ returned at the end of the age (10:23; 28:20; cf. Rom. 11:11–12, 25–26).

Making disciples involved more than preaching the gospel, however. Matthew recorded Jesus’ commission to make disciples by “teaching them to obey everything I have commanded you” (28:20). A disciple was to be righteous, to be obedient to God.

The model for the disciple was Jesus, the perfect Son who fulfilled all righteousness by rendering complete obedience to the Father’s will (4:4, 10). That same righteousness was to characterize the disciple (5:20). Obedience to God was to be a priority in the disciple’s life (6:33). Complete devotion to the Father was the goal (5:48).

The will of the Father was made known in the teaching of Jesus. Matthew devoted a considerable portion of his Gospel to the record of Jesus’ teaching. In addition to five distinct units (5–7, 10, 13, 18, 23–24), Jesus’ instruction is repeatedly featured in the Gospel elsewhere (e.g., 9:12–17).

But Matthew was under no illusion that knowledge alone would lead to righteousness. Teaching was essential, but it had to be met with faith. Despite their scrupulous observance of the law,

Jesus had excoriated the Pharisees for lack of faith (23:23). The righteousness recognized by God was first of all inward and spiritual (6:4, 6, 18; cf. Rom. 2:28–29). Those who believed in Jesus had their lives transformed (8:10; 9:2, 22, 29). Not so much the greatness but the presence of faith was important (17:20).

Where faith existed, however, it might be weak and wavering. Matthew reminded his readers that even in the presence of the resurrected Christ, some of the disciples doubted (28:17). Frequently Jesus addressed the disciples as ones of “little faith” (6:30; 8:26; 16:8). This was exemplified in Peter’s experience. He boldly responded to Jesus’ call to come to him on the water but then wavered in his faith because of the fearful circumstances (14:30). Without the intervention of Jesus he might have perished.

Matthew likely saw an application in this for his readers. Jesus had warned his disciples of the persecution facing those who proclaimed the gospel (5:11–12; 10:24–25). They would be opposed by Jew and Gentile (10:17–18). The natural response in the face of such opposition was fear (10:26–31). Self-preservation led to denial of Christ (10:32–33). This was what Peter had done at Jesus’ trial (26:69–74).

Jesus responded to Peter’s failure on the sea by rescuing him. In the same way, failures of faith among the disciples and the sin that resulted should be met not with condemnation but with forgiveness and restoration (18:10–14).

The designation “little ones” in 18:6, 10, 14 may refer to disciples like Peter whose faith was weak in the midst of difficult circumstances. In 10:41–42 Matthew recorded Jesus’ description of prophets and righteous men as “little ones.” The next verses relate the imprisonment of John the Baptist and his question about Jesus as Messiah (11:2–3). Jesus met John’s doubts with assuring words (11:4–6) and went on to commend him (11:7–19). That was the model for ministry to those in need (cf. 10:42; 25:34–40) and the spirit in which the Great Commission could be carried out.

This mission was to continue until the “end of the age” (28:20). When the gospel had been preached to all nations, then the end would come (24:14) and Christ would reign as king (25:31–34). Reference to a kingdom recurs throughout the Gospel. The beginning verses link Jesus to David the king (1:1, 6). Unlike the other Gospels, Matthew uses the phrase “kingdom of heaven” far more frequently (thirty-three times) than the phrase “kingdom of God” (four times), though the meaning is the same (cf. 19:23–24).

The term “kingdom” seems to have a spiritual and a physical aspect to its meaning. The spiritual aspect was present in the ministry of Jesus (12:28) but the physical consummation is anticipated at his return (19:28). The kingdom of heaven about which Jesus preached was entered by repentance (4:17). Forgiveness was based ultimately on Christ's death (26:28).

Matthew, Theology of

Opposed to the kingdom of heaven is the kingdom of Satan (4:8–9; 12:26), from whom those with faith in Christ are delivered (12:27–28). While Satan is powerless before the Spirit of God (12:28), nonetheless he will actively hinder and counterfeit the work of God until the consummation (13:38–39).

The ministry of the kingdom carried on by Christ is continued by the church (16:18). The Spirit who enabled Christ to carry out his work (12:28) will enable the disciples to continue it (10:20). The ministry of the church is thus a phase of the kingdom program of God. Ultimately God's program with Israel will also be completed with a positive response to the gospel of the kingdom (19:28; 23:39; cf. Rom. 9:4–6; 11:25–27). Then the "end of the age" (Matt. 28:20) will come. The king will separate the righteous from the unrighteous (7:21–23), the sheep from the goats (25:31–46), the wheat from the tares (13:37–43). Those who have not done the Father's will (7:21), who have not believed in Christ (18:6), will merit eternal punishment (13:42; 25:46). The righteous will enter into eternal life (13:43; 25:46). Until then, the followers of Christ were to "make disciples of all nations" (28:19).

D. K. LOWERY

See also JOHN, THEOLOGY OF; LUKE, THEOLOGY OF; MARK, THEOLOGY OF.

Bibliography. R. T. France, Matthew: Evangelist and Teacher; R. H. Gundry, Matthew: A Commentary on His Literary and Theological Art; J. D. Kingsbury, Matthew as Story; U. Luz, Theology of the Gospel of Matthew; J. P. Meier, Vision of Matthew; G. Stanton, Gospel for a New People.

Maundy Thursday. The Thursday of Holy Week, said to be named from the command (Lat. mandatum) Christ gave his followers at the Last Supper that they love one another (John 13:34). Possibly the name derives from the Latin mundo, "to wash," referring to Christ's washing the feet of the apostles, an event still commemorated by many Christians, including the Church of the Brethren and Roman Catholics. As the eve of the institution of the Lord's Supper, Maundy Thursday has been kept by Christians from earliest times. By the fourth century it was a feast of the Jerusalem church, and in the sixth century in Gaul it was observed as Natalis Calicis ("Birthday of the Chalice"). In medieval England it was known as Chare Thursday (from the scrubbing of the altar) and in Germany as Green Thursday (Gründonnerstag, either from the green vestments then worn or from grunen, "to mourn"). The day is associated with Tenebrae, a ceremony of the extinguishing of candles in preparation for Good Friday. Observed in the Roman Catholic Church, Maundy Thursday appears on the Lutheran, Anglican, and many Reformed liturgical calendars and is almost universally celebrated with the Lord's Supper.

C. G. FRY

See also CHRISTIAN YEAR; HOLY WEEK.

Bibliography. J. G. Davies, Select Liturgical Lexicon; E. T. Horn III, Christian Year; T. J. Kleinhans, Year of the Lord.

Maurice, John Frederick Denison (1805–1872). Anglican theologian. Son of a Unitarian minister, he was ordained in 1834 only after he had overcome misgivings about the Thirty-nine Articles. In 1840 he became professor of English literature at Kings' College, London, with which he later combined a post in divinity, but he was removed when his Theological Essays (1853) disclosed a denial of everlasting punishment. To Maurice, eternal death meant alienation from God because of unrepented sin. At a time when the Tractarians were rising to do battle with evangelicals, his best-remembered book, Kingdom of Christ (1836), denounced theological factions, including the so-called no-party party. He was in some sense a harbinger of the twentieth-century ecumenical movement in his emphasis on the visible church as a united body transcending human differences and divisions. He saw baptism, the Eucharist, the historic creeds, Scripture, and the episcopate as the signs of the kingdom. His incarnational theology led him to ally himself with Charles Kingsley, J. M. Ludlow, and others in founding the Christian socialist movement and in organizing working men's educational programs. After his ouster from King's College he became the first principal of the Working Men's College (1854); there is reason to suspect that socialist views were as much responsible for his academic deposition as alleged heresy. In 1866 he was elected professor of moral philosophy at Cambridge, and there produced his highly acclaimed Social Morality (1869). Amid all the controversies of his time (Tractarianism, the development of Broad Church theology, Darwin and evolutionary theory, Colenso and the issue of biblical criticism), Maurice both made a profound contribution to theological thought and retained a surprisingly simple faith. He maintained habits of regular prayer and once expressed agreement with Kingsley that "the devil is shamming dead, but was never busier than now." J. D. DOUGLAS

See also KINGSLEY, CHARLES; SOCIALISM, CHRISTIAN.

Bibliography. J. F. D. Maurice, Theological Essays; F. Higham, Frederick Denison Maurice; C. Jenkins, F. D. Maurice and the New Reformation; C. F. G. Masterman, C. F. D. Maurice; F. D. Maurice, Life of Frederick Denison Maurice Chiefly Told in His Own Letters; F. McClain, R. Norris, and J. Orens, F. D. Maurice: A Study; A. M. Ramsey, F. D. Maurice and the Conflict of Modern Theology; A. R. Vidler, Maurice and Company; Witness to the Light: F. D. Maurice's Message for Today.

May Laws. See KULTURKAMPF.

McFague, Sallie (b. 1933). A leading feminist theologian and author. She is professor of theology at Vanderbilt Divinity School. Beginning with an interest in the relationship between literature and theology (Literature and the Christian Life, 1966), she developed a theological method dubbed "metaphorical" theology, which she develops in four books.

She defines the common thread of her work, metaphor, as a word used in an unfamiliar context to produce insight. In Speaking in Parables (1975), she pointed theologians to Jesus' parables (extended metaphors) in the Gospels and advocated a replacement of systematic with narrative theology.

In Metaphorical Theology: Models of God in Religious Language (1982), McFague attacks the patriarchal model of God as incapable of communicating the idea of grace and as oppressive to women. Ironically, she retains the monarchical model when she insists that Christianity's root metaphor is the kingdom of God.

In Models of God: Theology for an Ecological, Nuclear Age (1987), a mini-systematic theology, she rejects her previous conclusion that the theologians' task is to interpret biblical metaphors for the present; rather, it is to create new ones. Consequently, she replaces the concept of the Trinity with three models of God: God as mother, lover, and friend. This "remythologizing" makes possible the liberation of groups of persons who are excluded by traditional models. Using the metaphor of mother, she emphasizes the close relationship between God and the world, which she views as God's body.

In Body of God: An Ecological Theology (1993) McFague applies this organic model of the world as God's body to the environmental crisis. We must jettison the traditional model of God as king because it is outmoded and has led to the abuse of the earth. A far superior model is God as the "inspired body" of the universe. McFague's pantheistic vision excludes Christ's uniqueness and singularity. Her goal is ethical: her ecofeminist theology should result in greater caring for the whole earth community.

Evangelicals should applaud McFague's concern for the oppressed and for ecology, but must part company with her on many issues. She decries Scripture's authority when she views it as a Christian "classic" that contains "a particular fiction." Despite her disclaimers, she is a monist regarding God's relation to the world. Jesus is a metaphor for God and not an incarnation of God, and therefore not the unique Savior. There is no place in her thought for atonement and the forgiveness of sins.

R. A. PETERSON

See also FEMINISM, CHRISTIAN; FEMINISM, FEMINIST THEOLOGY; WOMAN, BIBLICAL CONCEPT OF.

Bibliography. D. Bromell, "Sallie McFague's 'Metaphorical Theology,'" JAAR 61:485-503; A. Kimel Jr., ed., Speaking the Christian God: The Holy Trinity and the Challenge of Feminism; T. Peters, "McFague's Metaphors," Dialog 27:131-140; J. M. Wall and D. Heim, eds., How My Mind Has Changed.

McGiffert, Arthur Cushman (1861-1933). The leading church historian of American liberalism at the beginning of the twentieth century. He studied at Union Seminary in New York and with Adolf Harnack at the University of Marburg in Germany, where he received his doctorate in 1888. He then taught church history for five years at Lane Seminary in Cincinnati before succeeding Philip Schaff, founder of the American Society of Church History, as professor of church history at Union in 1893. From 1917 to 1926 he served as president of that institution. McGiffert was an ordained Presbyterian clergyman who left the denomination to become a Congregationalist during a conflict over the nature of his theological views and his approach to history.

McGiffert stood prominently in the rise of theological liberalism in the United States. His three most important principles involved a concentration upon the life of Jesus, a commitment to "scientific history," and a passion for social ethics. For McGiffert, Jesus had possessed "a vivid realization of God as his father and the father of his brethren." Jesus represented a great "ideal," not as a being who communicated the essence of God to humanity, but as a human who lived purely and simply for the betterment of his fellows. The apostle Paul, on the other hand, propounded a faith "totally at variance with Christ's" and established the historic Christian movement which (until the enlightened nineteenth century) deluded people into thinking that Christianity should focus on the divinity of Christ and the reality of an institutional church.

McGiffert's assumptions about history had much to do with the shape of his theology. From study in Germany he returned to the United States with the idea that "scientific" history, which excluded the supernatural, was somehow more "objective" than that which allowed for the possibility of divine involvement in the events of the world. In accounting for this position he expressed the hope that one day people would not be "obliged to ask what Bible or church or creed require, but what the facts teach." Results of historical investigation were thus not to be subject to orthodox traditions. In reality, however, McGiffert's history grew out of a thorough commitment to the truth claims of the late nineteenth century. He believed that “the new scientific spirit, the new historical sense and the new methods of historical criticism, . . . the new emphasis on evolution, the new estimate of nature and the supernatural” had made it possible to reconstitute the past much more factually than had ever been possible before. This method allowed him to jettison as inessential traditional Christian teachings concerning the origin of the race, the fall, the veracity of OT history, and the supernatural aspects of Jesus’ teaching.

McGiffert’s social ideal extended themes of the social gospel. He believed so thoroughly in the goodness of doing good that virtually every kind of humanitarian service became a form of Christianity. This emphasis also shaped his view of the past, where, for example, Luther became one who exemplified Protestantism because of his “disinterested love to the good of others.”

McGiffert’s books—including History of Christianity in the Apostolic Age (1897), Protestant Thought before Kant (1911), and History of Christian Thought (1932)—remain forceful examples of church history from a liberal perspective.

M. A. NOLL

See also LIBERALISM, THEOLOGICAL; SOCIAL GOSPEL.

Bibliography. W. Bowden, Church History in the Age of Science.

McGrath, Alister E. (b. 1953). Alister E. McGrath was born in Belfast, Ireland. He had a difficult time finding relevance in the Christian message that he grew up hearing and turned to scientific materialism as a worldview. While studying chemistry at Oxford, he began to have doubts concerning his views and to rethink his religious beliefs. He attended a series of lectures given by Michael Green that were a key turning point in his conversion to Christianity.

McGrath completed his undergraduate and research degrees in the natural sciences and began courses in theology at Oxford. McGrath received a research fellowship at St. John’s College, Cambridge, while still plagued with doubt concerning his faith. After much struggle, he resolved the issue of faith in his life and took a position at Wycliffe Hall, Oxford, as lecturer in Christian doctrine and ethics. McGrath is also a research lecturer at Oxford University and professor of systematic theology at Regent College, Vancouver, British Columbia.

McGrath’s personal struggles apparently helped in his affirmation that one should critically reappropriate his or her doctrinal heritage. This task has, too often, been attempted uncritically. In McGrath’s opinion, either an “uncritical affirmation” or an “uncritical rejection” of one’s Christian heritage results.

McGrath’s major contribution to Christian scholarship is in the area of the Reformation. McGrath has taken up Martin Luther’s theology of the cross in several books. His approach to Luther is to trace late medieval thought and to move forward to Luther, recognizing Luther’s historical and theological context. The church of the late medieval period was characterized by apathy and moral failing, an assessment not altogether inappropriate to American evangelicalism according to McGrath in his book Spirituality in an Age of Change.

McGrath points out that it is important to address the issues raised by ancient and medieval theologians, which many Western theologians have failed to do. The dominant motivation behind the writing of his book Making of Modern German Christology: From the Enlightenment to Pannenberg was to bring modern scholars into the discussion concerning key questions that have been raised in the past.

McGrath suggests that one should differentiate between the medieval and Reformed conceptions of justification. He points out that Luther’s early views on the subject of the righteousness of God are close to the modern Protestant view. For McGrath, the doctrine of justification is the Christian church’s central proclamation, the leitmotif of Lutheran theology. This saving action of God toward humankind is, as Augustine pointed out, initiated by God and based on God’s grace, not human achievement.

The Enlightenment period saw the rise of anthropocentric theologies of justification, an assessment that does not figure well with McGrath. The opposition of Enlightenment theologians to the “orthodox” position (i.e., the intellect was blinded and therefore one could not come to enlightenment as an autonomous moral agent) resulted, according to McGrath, in the rejection of the doctrine of original sin, a doctrine that previously predominated theological speculation on the subject. It is generally agreed, though, that Christ has transformed the human tradition based on God’s initiative of grace.

McGrath emphasizes solidarity with the past. McGrath rejects the notion that one should stand on tradition for tradition’s sake, but he also rejects the tendency of the Enlightenment to cut off the theological questions of the past. This dialectic would appear to be one of McGrath’s chief contributions to scholarship: one must deal responsibly with the Christian heritage in order to effectively wrestle with questions of one’s own time.

E. ADAMS

See also EVANGELICALISM.

Bibliography. A. E. McGrath, Intellectual Origins of the European Reformation; Luther’s Theology of the Cross: Martin Luther's Theological Breakthrough; Reformation Thought: An Introduction; M. Bauman, HET 445–65; Roundtable: Conversations with European Theologians.

M'Cheyne, Robert Murray (1813–1843). Widely considered one of the most Christlike men ever to have lived in Scotland. He was born in Edinburgh and educated at the University of Edinburgh, where he won honors in languages and prizes in poetry, music, and drawing. His conversion and call to the ministry followed the death of his saintly young brother, David, who had long prayed for Robert. He studied for the Church of Scotland ministry in Edinburgh under the famous theologian Thomas Chalmers. During this period an evangelical reawakening was sweeping the Church of Scotland, ultimately issuing in the "Disruption," which saw nearly one half the membership leave the Established Church to found the more evangelical Free Church of Scotland in 1843, the year of M'Cheyne's death. M'Cheyne's ministry was part of this national ecclesiastical movement. In 1835 he was assistant minister in the parishes of Larbert and Dunipace, near Stirling. In 1836 he was called to St. Peter's Church of Dundee, which had some four thousand members. His ministry there was marked by deep personal holiness, prayer, compassion for the salvation of the lost, powerful evangelical preaching, and tireless counseling. In 1839 he spent six months in Palestine, exploring possible missionary work among the Jews. Revival broke out in his congregation during his absence. Upon his return he threw himself into this work, which soon spread over the country, resulting in the conversion of thousands. He died at age twenty-nine. His biography retains perennial popularity.

D. F. KELLY

Bibliography. R. M. M'Cheyne, Believer's Joy; A. A. Bonar, Memoir and Remains of the Rev. Robert Murray M'Cheyne; Sermons of Robert Murray M'Cheyne.

McPherson, Aimee Semple (1890–1944). Pentecostalist revivalist and radio pioneer, one of America's best-known religious figures in the 1920s and 1930s. She married first the man who had been influential in her conversion, Robert Semple, a Pentecostal minister, with whom she went to China as a missionary in 1908. When Semple died, his wife returned to the United States. She then married Harold McPherson, from whom she was subsequently divorced. A third marriage and another divorce came later. With her mother as companion Aimee Semple McPherson began after World War I a very successful series of revival tours across the United States. "Sister Aimee" was an attractive woman who knew how to exploit her vibrant personality and captivating energy to win the attention of the media. She broke new ground in radio evangelism (1922) and may have participated in a staged kidnapping of herself in 1926, a case which remains veiled in mystery. Her teaching was probably not as important as her personality in her great success, but it did include standard fundamentalistic and Pentecostal emphases: sanctification, baptism of the Holy Spirit and the gift of tongues, Christ as Savior and healer, faith healing, and the imminent return of Christ. In 1922 she settled in Los Angeles, where she preached to thousands each week at her $1.5 million Angelus Temple. The International Church of the Four-square Gospel arose as a result of her ministry in 1927. It continued under the direction of her son after she died and now numbers well over one hundred thousand members worldwide. Part of the sensation surrounding McPherson's career arose from allegations, romantic and otherwise, which she knew how to exploit to her own advantage. She was a force in American popular religion who blazed trails that others, who did not necessarily share her convictions, have followed.

M. A. NOLL

Bibliography. A. S. McPherson, Story of My Life; A. Austin, Aimee Semple McPherson; E. W. Blumhofer, Aimee Semple McPherson: Everybody's Sister; D. M. Epstein, Sister Aimee: The Life of Aimee Semple McPherson; J. L. Hood, New Old-Time Religion; R. V. P. Steele, Vanishing Evangelist; L. Thomas, Storming Heaven.

Means of Grace. See GRACE, MEANS OF.

Meat Offering. See OFFERINGS AND SACRIFICES IN BIBLE TIMES.

Mediating Theology (Ger. Vermittlungstheologie). The name of a program undertaken by widely differing thinkers, mostly in Germany, in the middle third of the nineteenth century. Their conclusions differed greatly, but they shared a commitment to mediation, the attempt to find truth on a middle ground between opposite extremes.

These thinkers tried to mediate between the influences of Hegel and Schleiermacher, between rationalism and supernaturalism, and between innovation and tradition. For them, both feeling and thought were to be taken into account in theology. Christianity was seen as partly natural and partly supernatural in origin. The mediators tended to support the union of Lutherans and Reformed in the state churches of Germany.

The most important members of the mediating school (vermittelnde Schule) were I. A. Dorner, Julius Koestlin, Julius Müller, C. I. Nitzsch, Richard Rothe, and Karl Ullmann. Mediating theology was represented at many different universities. It can be dated from 1828 with the founding of the periodical Theologische Studien und Kritiken. It was also the theme of Vierteljahrsschrift für Theologie und Kirche (founded 1845) and Jahrbücher für deutsche Theologie (founded 1856).

Mediating Theology

The most important topic for mediating theology was Christology. The historic doctrine of the person of Christ was being challenged by historical criticism. For philosophical reasons historical criticism began with a picture of Jesus that left no room for his deity and so rejected as unhistorical anything in the Gospels that testified to his deity. The biggest bombshell was the book Leben Jesu (Life of Jesus) by D. F. Strauss in 1835. This denial of historic Christian doctrine led to a negative reaction from those who wanted to conserve more of the old doctrine.

The mediators attempted to find a middle course that would both retain some elements of historic Christology and accept many of the assumptions and conclusions of historical criticism. They differed radically from one another in doctrine, but in every case the acceptance of historical criticism led them to modify the historic doctrine of the person of Christ fundamentally. In this sense, kenoticism can be seen as a form of mediating theology. But another form was the direct opposite of kenoticism, namely I. A. Dorner's idea of a growing unity between God and Jesus. Dorner saw that kenoticism had lost sight of the immutability of God. He concluded instead that Jesus had originally been a separate person who was only gradually assumed into the unity of the Logos in a process that was completed only at the ascension.

The varieties in mediating theology indicate that its program did not lead to any conclusive results. Indeed, it could lead to new and opposite extremes. It was ambitious but vague, and faded away once Albrecht Ritschl and his disciples became influential in the last part of the nineteenth century.

J. M. DRICKAMER

See also DORNER, ISAAC AUGUST; KENOSIS, KENOTIC THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. K. Barth, Protestant Theology in the Nineteenth Century; J. M. Drickamer, "Higher Criticism and the Incarnation in the Thought of I. A. Dorner," CTQ 43:197–206; C. Welch, Protestant Thought in the Nineteenth Century.

Mediation, Mediator. The role of a mediator is to bring reconciliation between two parties. The biblical concept of mediation is to bring sinful man to reconciliation with a holy God, a major concern of the Scriptures. The word "mediator" (mesitēs) is used only once in the LXX—Job 9:33, where it is translated "daysman," "umpire," or "someone to arbitrate": "He is not a man like me that I might answer him, that we might confront each other in court. If only there were someone to arbitrate between us, to lay his hand upon us both, someone to remove God's rod from me, so that his terror would frighten me no more" (9:32–34).

Mediation in the OT is seen in the function of the offices of prophet and priest. The prophet was a man who spoke for God to man by way of revelation, instruction, and warning (Exod. 4:10–16; Jer. 1:7, 17; Amos 3:8). The priest was a man who spoke for man to God by way of intercession and sacrifices (Deut. 33:10; Heb. 5:1). These offices complemented each other as mediators between God and man.

In the NT "mediator" is used six times. Twice it is used in connection with Moses as being the mediator of the law (Gal. 3:19–20). The word is used three times in Hebrews, where Jesus is shown to be the mediator of a new or better covenant (8:6; 9:15; 12:24). After discussing the superiority of the new covenant over the old covenant, the author of Hebrews states that with the inauguration of the new covenant there needed to be a new mediator, who is identified as Christ (8:6). Christ as the mediator sacrificed his life in order to inaugurate the new covenant and thereby reconciled man to God. A central verse in the mediatorial work of Christ is 1 Timothy 2:5. Paul states: "This is good, and pleases God our Savior, who wants all men to be saved and to come to a knowledge of the truth. For there is one God and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself as a ransom for all men—the testimony given in its proper times" (1 Tim. 2:3–6). Again there is death in connection with mediation. Beyond the passages which explicitly used the terminology, the NT is replete with examples of Christ being mediator. He represented God to man as a prophet. That Jesus fulfilled the prophetic office as prophesied by Moses (Deut. 18:15–18) was seen by Philip (John 1:45), Peter (Acts 3:22–23), Stephen (Acts 7:37), the Jewish people who heard Christ (Matt. 21:11; Luke 7:16; 24:19; John 6:14; 7:40), and Christ himself (John 5:45–47). Both God the Father and Jesus stated that those who heard Jesus should heed Jesus' words (Matt. 17:5; John 12:48–50). He came from God and spoke the words of God (John 1:18; 6:60–69; 14:9–10). Not only was he God's greatest prophet, but also he was and is the greatest priest representing man to God. First, in the past he offered himself as the sacrificial lamb, giving himself in behalf of men and their sins (Matt. 1:21; John 1:36; 3:16; Rom. 3:21–26; Heb. 2:17; 9:14–15). He was both the priest and sacrifice (Heb. 2:17; 7:26–27; 9:11–15). Also, in the past he offered prayers in behalf of himself (Matt. 26:39, 42, 44; Mark 14:36, 39; Luke 22:41, 44; John 17:1–5; Heb. 5:7) and in behalf of his disciples (Luke 22:32; John 17:6–26). Second, presently he intercedes in behalf of the saints (Rom. 8:34; Heb. 7:25; 9:24). Thus, he can be a true spokesman for God because he is God (John 1:1–5; 2 Cor. 5:19; Col. 2:9; Heb. 1:2; 5:5) and yet a true spokesman for man because he is man and can sympathize with man and his problems (Heb. 2:17; 4:15; 5:1–9).

In conclusion, because of sin there is a great gulf between God and man that needs to be bridged. The Bible portrays God and man as brought together by sacrifice and intercession by means of a mediator. However, in today's parlance the word "mediator" may be misleading, for the role of today's mediator is to effect the reconciliation of two conflicting parties by means of compromise. The biblical idea of mediator is really more closely identified with that of intermediary; God does not compromise his holiness, but rather, with his holiness intact, he communicates through his intermediaries his righteous demands. God has never been lenient with sin, but in his graciousness he has provided the just payment for sin through the death of the intermediary Jesus Christ, who provided reconciliation for man. Thus the intermediary provides the revelation of God's demands and the means by which man can be reconciled (2 Cor. 5:18–21).

H. W. HOEHNER

See also RECONCILIATION.

Bibliography. O. Becker, NIDNTT 1:373–75; E. C. Blackman, IDB 3:320–31; E. Brunner, Mediator; D. Guthrie, New Testament Theology; A. H. Leitch, ZPEB 4:150–58; A. Oepke, TDNT 4:598–624; V. Taylor, Names of Jesus.

Meister Eckhart (ca. 1260–1328). German Dominican mystical theologian. Eckhart studied at Cologne and later at Paris, where he took the master of theology in 1302. In 1304 he became provincial of the Dominican province of Saxony. He taught in Paris from 1311 to 1313, and from 1313 to 1323 served as professor of theology at Strasbourg. At Strasbourg and later at Cologne he developed a reputation as a preacher and spiritual director. Eckhart's significance lies in his elaboration of a mystical theology which stimulated widespread interest and directly influenced such men as J. Tauler and H. Suso. His thought was influenced by Thomas Aquinas, Augustine, Dionysius the Pseudo-Areopagite, and Bernard of Clairvaux. He was cited for heresy in 1326 and died before the proceedings were over. In 1329 John XXII condemned twenty-eight of Eckhart's propositions as heretical.

The essential doctrine which governs Eckhart's whole system is that of divine knowledge. God cannot truly be apprehended by any of the normal means of human knowing, whether by theology, philosophy, or mystical experience, for the unconditioned Godhead transcends all modes of individualized knowledge. Divine knowledge therefore must be an unrestricted knowledge suitable to its transcendent subject. This demands a detached intellection which views all of reality as it were from within the Godhead, from the standpoint of the divine subjectivity.

The possibility for such knowledge lies in a gracious act of the Father whereby he generates his Word in the pure soul. In this man is united with God. The union takes place in the ground of the soul designated the "spark of the soul," scintilla animae, although properly it has no name, being free from all modes as God himself is free. The spark is a power for good, and by virtue of it the soul resembles God.

The interpretation of Eckhart is difficult due to his complex and paradoxical style. Many have understood his theology as fundamentally pantheistic, and there are numerous unguarded statements in his works which tend in that direction. In recent years, however, the tendency has been to interpret him in a more orthodox framework.

D. G. DUNBAR

See also MYSTICISM.

Bibliography. J. M. Clark, Meister Eckhart: An Introduction to the Study of His Works with an Anthology of His Sermons; C. F. Kelley, Meister Eckhart on Divine Knowledge; B. McGinn, Meister Eckhart, Teacher and Preacher; F. J. Tobin, Meister Eckhart, Thought and Language.

Melancthon, Philip (1497–1560). German Reformer, theologian, and educator. Born in Breten, Baden, he earned his A.B. from Heidelberg at the age of fourteen and his M.A. from Tübingen at sixteen. He soon demonstrated his skill in the Greek language and established a reputation as a fine grammarian and then as a biblical humanist, eventually being included in the circle of Erasmus. He became a professor at the University of Wittenberg in 1518. His first public lecture established a close tie with Luther which remained throughout their lives. In 1519 he went with Luther to the Leipzig disputation. By 1521 he wrote Loci Communes, the first systematic statement of Luther's ideas. It gained widespread circulation due to its clear style and irenic tone—two characteristics of Melancthon that were typical of his writing and were most helpful in his contacts with other Lutherans, Protestants, and Roman Catholics.

In 1528 his "Visitation Articles" for schools was enacted into law in Saxony and his work as a public educator became an added dimension to his life. At least fifty-six cities sought his help in reforming their schools. He helped to reform eight universities and to found four others. He wrote numerous textbooks for use in schools and later was called "Preceptor of Germany."

Melanchthon, Philip

At the Marburg Colloquy in 1529 Melanchthon was strongly opposed by Zwingli, particularly over the issue of the real presence in the Lord's Supper. Later Melanchthon would alter his view and receive the wrath of Lutheran purists. In 1530 he wrote the Augsburg Confession, and its Apology in 1531. These two documents, plus the Wittenberg Concord of 1536, soon became the key statements of Lutheran belief. Because of his Christian humanism, which kept him open to new ideas and insights, he changed his position on the Lord's Supper and took a position on the real presence close to that of Calvin. This was revealed in Article X of the 1540 Variata of the Augsburg Confession and caused the Gnesio-Lutherans to accuse Melanchthon of being a crypto-Calvinist.

With the defeat of the Protestant forces at Mühlberg in 1547, Melanchthon proposed the Leipzig Interim, an attempt to salvage some Lutheran ideas in a basically non-Lutheran creedal statement. Melanchthon argued here that certain Roman Catholic rites and beliefs were adiaphora, nonessential to the faith, and thus could be accepted. For this effort he was attacked by Matthias Flacius as a traitor to the Lutheran cause. Later Flacius led another attack against Melanchthon because of his synergistic view, in which he argued that man could accept or reject God's grace and the Holy Spirit after grace was given.

Melanchthon's final years were spent in controversy, and many Lutherans looked upon him with suspicion. His brilliant mind, love for Christian humanism, clarity in expression, gentle demeanor, and openness to new ideas made him an ideal co-worker with Luther but also precipitated much of the controversy that filled his last years. Yet his contributions to the Lutheran movement, to Protestantism, and to the German nation are monumental.

R. V. SCHNUCKER

See also ADIAPHORA, ADIAPHORISTS; AUGSBURG CONFESSION; MARBURG COLLOQUY; SYNERGISM.

Bibliography. K. Aland, Four Reformers: Luther, Melanchthon, Calvin, Zwingli; F. Hildebrandt, Melanchthon: Alien or Ally?; C. Manschreck, Melanchthon, the Quiet Reformer; W. Pauch, ed., Melanchthon and Bucer; D. C. Steinmetz, Reformers in the Wings; R. Stupperich, Melanchthon.

Melchiorites. Term used for the followers of Melchior Hoffman (modernized in German as Hofmann), the Reformer who carried the gospel to Baltic areas such as Estonia and Livonia, to Emden in Friesland, and to Amsterdam. Hoffman was an individualist who did not unite with the Swiss Brethren, and they in turn repudiated him. Nevertheless he did unite with a fringe group of Anabaptists in Strasbourg in 1530. For a time he was a Lutheran, but Luther ultimately repudiated him. In the 1530s he traveled about a great deal. He held to such Swiss Brethren doctrines as believer's baptism, nonresistance, the rejection of oaths, earnest discipleship to Christ, and separation of church and state. He wrote numerous books, mostly on eschatology. He made much of baptism as a covenant (see 1 Pet. 3:21 in the Luther Bible), and his followers were often called Brethren of the Covenant or "Covenanters."

In addition to the usual Anabaptist doctrines Hoffman was obsessed with eschatology, reveling in the anticipated apocalyptic violence against the wicked after Christ's return, and he was naively drawn to "special revelations" through dreams and visions. He also held an eccentric view of the incarnation whereby Mary was understood to be merely a channel through which the "heavenly flesh of Christ made its entrance to the earth." In response to a special revelation through a Melchiorite he hastened back to Strasbourg in 1533, was arrested, and jailed—in the expectation that in six months Christ would return. However, Hoffman lay in prison for ten long years before dying in 1543. His Reformation in the Low Countries slowly matured into two wings: (1) The Peace Wing led by Jan Volkerts Trypmaker (martyred in 1531) and Jacob van Campen (martyred in 1535). Later leaders in this Peace Wing in Friesland were Obbe Philips, his brother Dirk Philips, and from 1536 Menno Simons. (2) The apocalyptic and revolutionary Melchiorites were led by the unstable Jan Matthys, who set up a theocracy in Münster, Germany, and died violently in 1534, and by the unscrupulous "King" Jan van Leyden, who was executed after the 1534–35 Münster "kingdom." Violent Münsterite "ultra-Melchiorism" was kept alive briefly by Jan van Batenburg (executed 1538) and by David Joris, who fled to Basel in 1544 under a false name and successfully posed for the rest of his days as a Zwinglian.

J. C. WENGER

See also RADICAL REFORMATION; ZWICKAU PROPHETS.

Bibliography. H. S. Bender, ed., Mennonite Encyclopedia 2:778–85, 3:565.

Melitian Schisms. Two schisms are known by this name, each revolving around a different Melitius in a different half of the fourth century. The first involves Melitius, bishop of Lycopolis, who in 305, during the Diocletian persecution, for some unclear reason took it upon himself to assume some of the responsibilities of Peter, bishop of Alexandria, while the latter was imprisoned. Most offensive was his unauthorized consecration of presbyters and deacons throughout upper Egypt. Peter soon excommunicated him, refusing to recognize any of his appointments or the baptisms they administered. Melitius took offense at this treatment, especially in light of Peter's generally lenient attitude toward those who apostatized during the persecution.

Returning from a brief imprisonment himself in 311 (during which year Peter was martyred), Melitius set about organizing a schismatic church, which by the time of the Council of Nicaea is reported to have had twenty-eight bishops. Always opposed to the bishop of Alexandria, whomever he might be, Melitius found common cause at times with the Arians (Arius himself is reported to have been an early Melitian appointment who was reconciled with Peter); however, the union was political rather than theological.

The Council of Nicea attempted to heal the division by legitimating the ministry of the Melitian clergy but subordinating it to the authority of the Alexandrian bishop. Melitian bishops were allowed to succeed orthodox bishops only by general election and ordination by the metropolitan. Melitius was allowed the title of bishop but not a see. Unfortunately, the schism was not healed, and the Melitian church continued until the eighth century.

The second Melitian schism concerns Melitius (also Meletius) of Antioch. Prior to his election as bishop of Antioch he had associated with the semi-Arian party, signing the Creed of Acacius at the synod of Seleucia which ambiguously advocated the homoion (likeness) of the Son to the Father while rejecting homoousion, homoioousion, and anomoion. However, after Melitius came to Antioch (361), he embraced the homoousion formulary of the Nicene Creed. His gracious, loving, and holy disposition attracted a loyal following even after his orthodox views brought him exile, during which time the Arian Euzoios was installed as bishop. This split between Arian and orthodox parties was then subdivided by another and more permanent schism on the orthodox side when the older traditional party, retaining the memory of the staunch anti-Arian Eustathius (324), refused to recognize anyone (even if he was orthodox) who had been consecrated by Arians. They elected Paulinus as their bishop. This older conservative party, though small, refused to unite with the Melitians, even after Melitius returned from exile. An arrangement was made, however, that union should be accomplished under the bishop who survived the death of the other. But this arrangement did not hold, for after the death of Melitius, at the Council of Constantinople (381) the council of bishops chose Flavian rather than Paulinus to succeed him. The split remained even after the death of Paulinus until the successor of Flavian, Alexander, achieved the union around 415.

Aside from this schism, Melitius was actually instrumental in reconciling the semi-Arian party to the Nicene. He presided, at the choice of the orthodox emperor Theodosius I, over the initial session of the Council of Constantinople and ordained Gregory of Nazianzus as bishop of Constantinople. He also ordained a young deacon by the name of John Chrysostom in whom he had taken an interest.

C. A. BLAISING

See also HOMOIOUSIOS; NICAEA, COUNCIL OF.

Bibliography. P. Shaff, History of the Christian Church; Socrates, Ecclesiastical History (NPNF); Sozomen, Ecclesiastical History (NPNF); Theodoret, Ecclesiastical History (NPNF).

Melville, Andrew (1545–1622). Scottish educator, biblical scholar, and church reformer. Reared by his brother, who later entered the Reformed ministry, Melville showed intellectual brilliance at St. Andrews University. At nineteen he left Scotland for Paris, where he studied languages and learned the teaching methods of Peter Ramus. After studying civil law and teaching at Poitiers, he arrived in 1569 in Geneva to be welcomed by Theodore Beza and installed in the academy's chair of humanity. He returned home in 1574 to lead a striking revival of Scottish higher learning. First at the University of Glasgow and subsequently at St. Andrews, he modernized educational method and curriculum, enlisted superior faculty, and proved to be a talented biblical scholar, exciting teacher, able administrator, and canny disciplinarian. Scottish universities for the first time became generally attractive to European students.

For some time after returning to Scotland, Melville showed little interest in the organization or polity of the kirk. With thirty other ministers, however, in 1576 he became involved in the two-year-long corporate committee process that, under the guidance of the General Assembly, formulated and revised the Second Book of Discipline in response to the collapse of the crown's effort to reorganize the church along the lines of the English Elizabethan settlement.

General Assembly approved the work in 1578, but did not receive concurrence from the government. There followed a period in which the General Assembly gradually developed and implemented a presbyterian polity, while the crown repeatedly attempted to restore episcopacy. In this contest Melville rapidly emerged as a major ecclesiastical statesman and champion of the liberties of the kirk against the encroachments of civil authority. A bold, energetic, prophetically articulate, and sometimes tactless leader, for almost thirty years he rallied the ministers to defend the right of assembly and to prevent the reassertion of episcopacy and royal domination of the church. Thus he became viewed as successor to John Knox in leading the Scottish Reformation, was referred to as the "father of the Scottish presbytery," and was credited (erroneously) with almost sole authorship of the Second Book of Discipline.

Melville was an internationally recognized Latin poet whose love of writing epigrams led to his final personal defeat. Summoned to London to account for his defense of the ministers' right to assemble freely, he wrote verses satirizing the king's worship, for which treason he was incarcerated in the Tower and eventually exiled to France, where he died.

R. M. HEALEY

Bibliography. T. M'Crie, Life of Andrew Melville; S. Mechie, Fathers of the Kirk; W. Morison, Andrew Melville.

Mennonites. The Mennonites of North America are a religious group with about 310,000 baptized members divided into fifteen separate organized bodies and numerous unaffiliated fragments. Together with their cousins, the Amish and Hutterites, Mennonites have more than 900,000 members worldwide.

Most North American Mennonites trace their roots to either the Swiss or Dutch wings of the sixteenth-century Anabaptists.

Both wings had distinctive Anabaptist beliefs and practices in common. They agreed upon the practices of adult baptism upon confession of faith, rejection of the oath and of military service, and the church as a body of believers who earnestly follow the example and teachings of Jesus. Women had a prominent role in the early movement, and many died for their faith. Yet the differences between the Swiss and the Dutch were notable.

The Swiss and south-German Anabaptists came out of Ulrich Zwingli's reform in Zurich. They were shaped by medieval mystical and monastic roots; by the Peasants Revolt of 1525; by their Schleithem Confession of 1527; by developments in the free city of Strasburg; and by government persecution and repression well into the eighteenth century. The Swiss Brethren hymnbook, the Ausbund (1564), a book of martyr ballads, is used today by the Amish, who separated from the Mennonites in 1693. Mennonites of Swiss background in Europe and America have emphasized the doctrines of humility, nonresistance, and separation from the world.

The Dutch wing of the Anabaptist movement took shape in reaction to a failed apocalyptic kingdom at Münster (1534–35). The writings and leadership of Menno Simons helped consolidate the peaceable Dutch Anabaptists. After severe early persecution, religious toleration came earlier in the Netherlands. In the seventeenth century Dutch Mennonites enjoyed growth and a cultural renaissance. They produced martyrologies (Thieleman Jansz van Braght, Martyrs Mir- ror, 1660), writings of piety (Jan Philip Schabalje, Wandering Soul, 1635), confessions of faith (Dortrecht Confession, 1632), as well as hymns and other literature which strengthened the movement in general. Some early Dutch refugees fled eastward to Prussia, and later southeastward to the Russian Empire. The cultural development of Dutch-background Mennonites, as well as their experience in thriving semi-autonomous colonies in the Ukraine, produced a more positive attitude toward culture than that of the Swiss-background Mennonites.

The Mennonites and Amish who settled in eastern Pennsylvania at the invitation of William Penn, beginning in 1683, were mostly of Swiss and South German background. They established thriving agricultural communities and in time spread out to additional settlements in central and western Pennsylvania, in the Shenandoah Valley of Virginia, and in Ontario. Notable events of the colonial era included their sponsorship of a German edition of the Martyrs Mirror (Ephrata Cloister, 1748), the largest book published in colonial America, and the teaching ministry and writings of Christopher Dock (1698?–1771), of Skippack, Pennsylvania. The American War for Independence challenged the Mennonite doctrine of nonresistance and forced them into renewed isolation as a people apart. The role of warfare and military conscription in the developing American state of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries prompted Mennonites to focus on their teachings of peace as central to their identity.

The traditional European Anabaptist themes of persecution and martyrdom were not perfectly suited to American conditions of economic prosperity and democratic tolerance. American Mennonites adapted by borrowing devotional literature and hymns from pietist and revivalist sources. Anabaptism and pietism had much in common—the desire for conversion and reformation of life, emphasis upon the Bible, and renewal of the church. But pietism was quite different in its focus upon subjective experience and its optimism for world reform. American Mennonites shifted from their inherited Anabaptist gospel of suffering in an evil world to a pietist-influenced gospel of inward humility and yieldedness to God's will. Traditional Mennonite theology (not systematically developed) had placed the life of discipleship in community at the heart of the Christian life, but American revivalist theology tended to treat salvation and ethics as separate realities. The writings of nineteenth-century Mennonite leaders such as Jacob Stauffer (1811–55) and John M. Brennehan (1816–95) attempted to hold on to the inherited faith while redefining it in the new context. A persistent danger was that revivalist theology would weaken the Mennonite ethical commitment to peace and nonresistance.

Dutch-background Mennonites did not come to America until a major migration in the 1870s to the plains frontier of Canada and the United States. Dutch-Russian Mennonite immigrant leaders spoke in behalf of German-American Christian cultural engagement. Cornelius H. Wedel (1860–1910), Mennonite historian and president of Bethel College in Kansas, wrote of his tradition as a Gemeindechristentum (congregation christendom) in which Mennonites had a responsibility for human culture and public order. Spokesmen for the Mennonite cultural engagement position included Henry H. Ewert (1855–1934), Edmund G. Kaufman (1891–1980) and Gordon Kaufman (1925–).

As different Mennonite groups chose at different times to accommodate to American social and religious ways, a tri-polar complex of groups resulted: traditionalists, conservative evangelicals, and progressives. In the late nineteenth and the twentieth centuries progressives seized the initiative and created an array of denominational institutions for Mennonite education, publications, mutual aid, health care, and home and overseas missions. The new institutions offered new opportunities for women in deaconess, missionary, and service societies. After World War I, a crisis in which American Mennonites prospered economically and were spurred to seek a benevolent moral equivalent for military service, they formed a Mennonite Central Committee (MCC) service agency. Through the MCC, Mennonite Disaster Service, and other agencies, North American Mennonites engage in service ministries and celebrate their peoplehood.

North American Mennonites have remained conservative by American religious standards, in part through a strong sense of history. The continuing vitality and growth of traditionalist groups, such as the Old Order Amish and Old Order Mennonites, has been a source of continuity, as traditionalists often become members of more modern Mennonite groups.

The denominational center of (Old) Mennonites in northern Indiana exercised significant influence under the leadership of John Fretz Funk (1835–1930) and Harold S. Bender (1897–1962). Bender, at Goshen College and Seminary, was the primary editor of the Mennonite Encyclopedia (1955–59) and author of the influential essay “The Anabaptist Vision” (1946), which redefined the field of Anabaptist studies and charted a course for twentieth-century Mennonite renewal as a recovery of the Anabaptist vision. Bender saw Anabaptism as a fulfillment of the early ideals of Protestant Reformation leaders.

In the late twentieth century a new generation of scholars found greater complexity and relativity in the Anabaptist movement and shifted attention to the Mennonite experience in North America. Mennonite theology began to mature, with primary attention to Christology and ethics. John Howard Yoder’s theological work, especially Politics of Jesus (1972), restated the Anabaptist position. Yoder located ethics and theology in the story of Jesus, and offered new challenges to orthodox Protestant understandings of the church and the creeds. Yoder influenced new Anabaptist theological statements by Norman Kraus, William McClendon, Thomas Finger, J. Denny Weaver, and others. From a different perspective, Gordon Kaufman of Harvard University with In Face of Mystery (1993) offered a biohistorical “constructive theology” with Anabaptist accents, though addressed to a wider ecumenical and secular audience.

Mennonites today are found on every continent. Some were scattered from Europe by warfare and persecution, while others were converted through missionary witness. Mennonites in Russia suffered terribly in the chaos of the World Wars, Communism, and the Gulag. Growth among churches of non-European background, especially in Africa and Indonesia, has been so rapid that they will soon outnumber those from Europe and North America. The Mennonite World Conference serves as an agency for worldwide fellowship and common ministries. Theological dialogue among Mennonites in different cultural backgrounds is leading to new understandings and applications of the Anabaptist vision.

J. C. JUHNKE

See also ANABAPTISTS; MENNO SIMONS.

Bibliography. H. S. Bender, ed., Mennonite Encyclopedia; C. J. Dyck, ed., Introduction to Mennonite History; F. H. Epp, Mennonites in Canada; J. A. Hostetler, Amish Society; J. H. Kauffman and I. Harder, Anabaptists Four Centuries Later; C. H. Smith, Story of the Mennonites; T. J. van Braagt, Martyrs Mirror; Mennonite Experience in America; J. C. Wenger, Introduction to Theology; Mennonite Church in America.

Menno Simons (ca. 1496–1561). Founder of a loosely related group of Reformation believers known today as Mennonites. In the days of Menno family names were not yet established in the Netherlands; the name Simons is simply a patronymic: “son of Simon.” We know little more of his life than he himself writes in his book directed to the Reformer Jelle Smit, who wrote under the name Gellius Faber. That brief autobiography was written to demonstrate that Menno had no connection with the Münsterites, the militant wing of the Melchiorites.

Menno was born in the Frisian village of Witmarsum and trained for the Roman priesthood. He was consecrated in 1524 at the age of twenty-eight. His first parish service was from 1524 to 1531 at the neighboring village of Pingjum, and from 1531 to 1536 he served in his home town of Witmarsum.

Menno Simons

In the first year of his priesthood Menno came to doubt the doctrine of transubstantiation, and after much distress he fearfully took up the Scriptures for the first time in his life. As a result of reading the NT, he gave up the doctrine of the miraculous change of the bread and wine into the body and blood of the Lord. In 1531 Menno heard of the execution of Sicke Snijder at Leeuwarden, capital of Friesland, for being baptized. This terrified him also, and led to much soul searching. In the end he came to believe that baptism should follow conversion. Finally, Menno's brother joined a nonpeace group of Anabaptists and perished in a struggle with the authorities in 1535. This tragedy broke Menno's heart, and he made a total surrender of himself to Christ. For about nine months he remained in the Catholic Church, preaching his new understanding of the gospel.

On January 31, 1536, Menno renounced his Roman Catholicism and went into hiding. He accepted baptism, probably from the leader of the Peace Wing of the Frisian Anabaptists, Obbe Philips, who also ordained Menno as an elder (bishop) in the province of Groningen in 1537. Menno served in the Netherlands (1536–43), in northwest Germany, mainly in the Rhineland (1543–46), and in Danish Holstein (1546–61). The first major collection of his writings appeared in 1646.

Menno was a good shepherd and leader, and escaped martyrdom only by moving about. He was an evangelical who held to the major doctrines of the Christian faith. He differed from Luther and Calvin by defending the baptism of believers only, by teaching the doctrine of peace and nonresistance, and by rejecting the oath. He assumed the separation of church and state. He held to the Melchiorite doctrine of the incarnation, which taught that Christ brought to earth his own "heavenly flesh," receiving nothing from Mary, not even his humanity. And since no man was the earthly father of Jesus, God must have created a body for him. Our Lord was therefore in Mary prior to his birth, yet he was not of Mary.

J. C. WENGER

See also MENNONITES.

Bibliography. J. C. Wenger, ed., Complete Writings of Menno Simons; H. S. Bender, Menno Simons' Life and Writings; J. Horsch, Menno Simons: His Life, Labors, and Teachings; I. B. Horst, Bibliography of Menno Simons, ca. 1496–1561; C. Krahn, Menno Simons; F. H. Littell, Tribute to Menno Simons; K. Vos, Menno Simons.

Mercersburg Theology. A romantic Reformed theology which during the midnineteenth century stood opposed to the main developments of American religious thought. It was the work of John Williamson Nevin (1803–86), a theologian, and Philip Schaff (1819–93), a church historian, who taught at the seminary of the German Reformed Church in Mercersburg, Pennsylvania, in the 1840s and 1850s.

Nevin had graduated from Presbyterian Princeton, had lectured there briefly, and then taught for a decade at a Presbyterian seminary in Pittsburgh before joining Mercersburg in 1840. He detailed the theological pilgrimage which undergirded his move away from a Princeton form of Calvinism in History and Genius of the Heidelberg Catechism (1841–42). For Nevin the Heidelberg Catechism, doctrinal standard of the German Reformed, exhibited the Reformation at its best before its modern decline into a rationalistic and mechanical "Puritanism." Nevin criticized the direction of American Protestantism in Anxious Bench (1843), a work which attacked revivalism for being too individualistic, too emotional, and too much concerned with the "new measures" (such as the anxious bench for souls under conviction) which drew attention to human foibles and away from the work of Christ and the church. To remedy these ills Nevin proposed a return to classic Reformed convictions about Christ and his work. Mystical Presence (1846) argued that the views of the Reformers, especially Calvin, provided a means to overcome superficial and subjectivistic Protestantism. It began with the dramatic assertion that "Christianity is grounded in the living union of the believer with the person of Christ; and this great fact is emphatically concentrated in the mystery of the Lord's Supper." Against the view of Communion as a mere memorial, Nevin presented a case for the "real spiritual presence." God, he taught, comes to the church objectively, though not materially, in the Lord's Supper. The Supper, in turn, should become the focus of worship, and its presentation of the incarnate Christ the center of theology.

When Philip Schaff came to Mercersburg in 1844 from the University of Berlin, he brought along an appreciation for Germany's new idealistic philosophy and for its pietistic church renewal as well. His early work at Mercersburg urged Protestants toward a fuller appreciation of the Christian past. In Principle of Protestantism (1844) he suggested, for example, that the Reformation continued the best of medieval Catholicism. And he looked forward to the day when Reformed, Lutheran, and even eventually Catholic believers could join in Christian union. Such views led to charges of heresy, from which Schaff cleared himself only with difficulty.

The influence of Nevin and Schaff was slight in the 1840s and 1850s. American Protestants were ill at ease with immigrants and with anyone who spoke a good word for any aspect of Roman Catholicism. They were wholeheartedly given to revivalism. They were busy making plans for interdenominational cooperation and did not look kindly on Mercersburg's new reading of history. And America's dominant Protestant philosophy, commonsense realism, had little room for the developmental ideas of Nevin and Schaff.

The two Mercersburg stalwarts were able to work closely together for barely a decade. Nevin, after editing the Mercersburg Review from 1849 to 1853, retired because of illness and disillusionment. Schaff left Mercersburg in 1863 for teaching posts at Andover and Union Seminaries, where he participated actively in the general evangelical life of America. Nonetheless, the works of the Mercersburg men remain a guidepost for Christians who share their convictions: that the person of Christ is the key to Christianity; that the Lord's Supper, understood in a classic Reformed sense, is the secret to the ongoing life of the church; and that study of the church's past provides the best perspective for bringing its strength to bear on the present. M. A. NOLL

See also SCHAFF, PHILIP.

Bibliography. L. J. Binkley, Mercersburg Theology; J. H. Nichols, Romanticism in American Theology: Nevin and Schaff at Mercersburg; J. H. Nichols, ed., Mercersburg Theology.

Merciful Acts, Gift of. See SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

Mercy. The term may designate both character and actions that emerge as a consequence of that character. As a part of character mercy is demonstrated most clearly by such qualities as compassion and forbearance. With respect to action an act of mercy issues from compassion and forbearance; in a legal sense mercy may involve such acts as pardon, forgiveness, or the mitigation of penalties. In each case mercy is experienced and exercised by a person who has another person in his power, or under his authority, or from whom no kindness can be claimed. Thus God may show mercy toward human beings, who are all ultimately within his power, even though they have no direct claim, in terms of their behavior, to attitudes or actions of mercy. And a human being may be merciful to another, to whom neither compassion nor forbearance is due, by free act or thought toward that person.

From a theological perspective the characteristic of mercy is rooted in God and experienced in relation to God, from whom it may be acquired as a Christian virtue and exercised in relation to fellow human beings. In the Bible a variety of Hebrew and Greek words are used which fall within the general semantic range of the English word "mercy." They include such terms as "lovingkindness" (Heb. hesed), "to be merciful" (Heb. hānan), "to have compassion" (Heb. riḥam), and "grace" (Gr. charis).

In the OT mercy (in the sense of lovingkindness) is a central theme; the very existence of the covenant between God and Israel was an example of mercy, being granted to Israel freely and without prior obligation on the part of God (Ps. 79:8–9; Isa. 63:7). Insofar as the covenant was rooted in divine love, mercy was an ever-present quality of the relationship it expressed; the law, which formed a central part of the covenant relationship, came with the promise of forgiveness and mercy, contingent upon repentance, for the breaking of that law. Yet the divine mercy extended beyond the obligations of the covenant, so that even when Israel's sin had exhausted the covenantal category of mercy, still the loving mercy of God reached beyond the broken covenant in its promise and compassion to Israel.

With the new covenant the mercy of God is seen in the death of Jesus Christ; the sacrificial death is in itself a merciful act, demonstrating the divine compassion and making possible the forgiveness of sins. From this fundamental gospel there follows the requirement for all Christians, who are by definition the recipients of mercy, to exercise mercy and compassion toward fellow human beings (Matt. 5:7; James 2:13).

Throughout Christian history the awareness of the continuing human need for divine mercy has remained as a central part of Christian worship. The kyrie eleison of the ancient church has continued to be used in many liturgical forms of worship: "Lord, have mercy upon us; Christ, have mercy upon us; Lord have mercy upon us." And from the prayer employed in worship for God's mercy, there must follow the practice of mercy in life.

In the religion of Islam, whose historical origins have been influenced profoundly by both Christianity and Judaism, God is most frequently described as "the Merciful, the Compassionate."

P. C. CRAIGIE

See also GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF.

Bibliography. R. Bultmann, TDNT 2:477–87; W. Eichrodt, Theology of the Old Testament; H.-H. Esser, NIDNTT 2:593–601; N. Glueck, Hesed in the Bible; H. Köster, TDNT 7:548–59; W. L. Reed, JBL 23:35–41; N. H. Snaith, Distinctive Ideas of the Old Testament.

Mercy Seat. The term used in most English translations of the Bible to translate the Hebrew kapporet. This word could have the simpler sense of "cover, lid," but the symbolic significance of the item so designated makes appropriate the more conventional rendition "mercy seat."

Mercy Seat

The mercy seat was a slab of gold, rectangular in shape, measuring approximately 3 1/2 feet by 2 feet. It was placed over the ark of the covenant, functioning as a cover or lid, in the innermost room of the tabernacle (and of the temple at a later date). On top of the mercy seat were two cherubim, facing each other, their wings extending over the mercy seat and meeting above it. A full account of the mercy seat is provided in Exodus 25:17–22; its construction is described in Exodus 37:6–9.

The symbolic significance of the mercy seat can be seen most dramatically in the events of the day of atonement (Yom Kippur). The high priest entered the inner sanctuary containing the ark and the mercy seat; incense was burned so that the mercy seat was enveloped in smoke. The blood from a bull was sprinkled on the mercy seat (Lev. 16:11–19). The ritual was part of a larger ceremony in which Israel, through solemn repentance, sought God's forgiveness and mercy for sins committed during the preceding year. The mercy seat symbolized God's mercy, overspreading the breaking of the laws that were contained on the tablets in the ark underneath the mercy seat.

In the NT the mercy seat is referred to by the writer of Hebrews (Heb. 9:5), who demonstrates that the annual sprinkling of blood on the mercy seat in the inner sanctuary is superseded by the more perfect sacrifice of Christ. The shedding of Christ's blood replaced the ancient ritual with bull's blood and served as a final atonement for human sins.

P. C. CRAIGIE

See also ARK OF THE COVENANT.

Bibliography. C. Brown and H.-G. Link, NIDNTT 3:148–66; M. Haran, Temples and Temple Service in Ancient Israel; L. Morris, Apostolic Preaching of the Cross; G. Wenham, Leviticus.

Merit. In theology a meritorious human act is one for which a reward from God is appropriate. Occasionally some subapostolic writings (most notably the Didache, the Shepherd of Hermas, and Second Clement) speak as if conversion and baptism bestowed only forgiveness of past sins and a measure of divine strength. Subsequently individuals, with God's assistance, must earn further blessings and eternal life. If they sin, repentance and other virtuous acts may provide atonement. In dealing with penance, Tertullian systematized these notions by employing the Roman legal terms meritum (merit) and satisfactio (satisfaction). When someone sinned, God was regarded as occupying the position belonging to the injured party under Roman law. Such injury could be set right only by punishment or pardon. But pardon could not occur without a satisfaction, a meritorious act, being paid. For Tertullian, one could not expect forgiveness without paying a price—through confession, self-humiliation, or fasting.

Medieval theologians distinguished merit that strictly deserved a reward (meritum de condigno) from that for which a reward was merely appropriate (meritum de congruo). The latter could be gained by the nonjustified who heeded God's voice as known through reason and conscience or through the church. Though their actions were tainted with sin and, strictly speaking, could not deserve God's favor, God was pleased to reward them with sanctifying grace. But once aided by sanctifying grace, individuals, through the exercise of their free wills, could produce merit de condigno, which strictly deserved divine rewards. Medieval theology also elaborated the doctrine of "supererogation." Sainly individuals accumulate merit exceeding that required for their own blessedness. These surplus merits were commonly thought to be stored in a heavenly "treasury" and to be available to others through prayers to saints, indulgences, and other pious acts.

Martin Luther insisted that these teachings encouraged people to assume that they could obey God's law through their own efforts. Instead, he argued, the law's function is to show us our utter inability to do so and drive us to repentance and faith. We are wholly incapable, both before and after we come to faith, of doing anything that could truly merit God's reward. Following Luther, Protestantism as a whole has rejected the notion that humans can earn rewards from God, even when assisted by grace. For orthodox Protestant theology, however, the notions of merit and satisfaction have remained central in explaining Christ's work. God is still regarded as the supreme lawgiver, who can accept sinners only on the basis of the substitutionary merits earned by Christ.

Contemporary Catholic theory still speaks of merit, but usually with a heavy emphasis on divine grace. No one can merit one's original creation, final salvation, nor God's acceptance of one's efforts de congruo. Ultimately Christ merited all the grace which God bestows—merit de condigno. Hans Küng argues that little real difference exists between Protestants and Catholics on this issue.

However, most contemporary theologians, both Catholic and Protestant, conceptualize God's relationships with humans not in the traditional language of penalties, payments, and rewards, but in relational and developmental terms. Thus Karl Rahner can insist that when the doctrine of merit speaks of individuals being "rewarded" by God (de condigno), it means to affirm that those involved in the sanctifying process really do become holy and pleasing to God and experience his increasing favor. But while recent Protestant theologians speak in similar relational languages, they tend to avoid discussion of “merit” altogether and to affirm that, despite sanctification, we still remain sinners.

T. N. FINGER

See also GRACE; INDULGENCES; JUSTIFICATION; ROMAN CATHOLICISM; SALVATION; SANCTIFICATION; SUPEREROGATION, WORKS OF.

Bibliography. G. Bertram, TDNT 2:635–65; J. Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion; H. Küng, Justification; Luther's Works; J. Morgan, Importance of Tertullian in the Development of Christian Dogma; H. Preisker and E. Würthwein, TDNT 4:695–728; K. Rahner, “Comfort of Time,” in Theological Investigations; T. F. Torrance, Doctrine of Grace in the Apostolic Fathers; P. Watson, Concept of Grace.

Merton, Thomas (1915–1968). Thomas Merton was born in Prades, France, in 1915. His mother, Ruth, was an American Quaker and his father, Owen, was a New Zealander. At the age of twelve, Merton was sent to school in England, where he excelled in academics. He attended Clare College, Cambridge, in 1933 to study modern languages. After one year at Cambridge, Merton decided to return to the United States and become an English major at Columbia University. In Merton's early life, he considered himself a Marxist, though he was one more in theory than in practice. The communal aspect of Marxism remained attractive to him throughout his life.

In 1938 Merton earned his B.A. degree, and the same year he converted to Catholicism. A year later he received his M.A. degree. In 1941 Merton first visited the Abbey of Gethsemani in Bardstown, Kentucky. In 1947 he made his novitiate vows at this abbey, and in 1949 he was ordained a priest and became a Trappist monk. Merton was a prolific writer; one Merton scholar, impressed by the sheer enormity of Merton seminars and journals, used the term “the Merton industry” to refer to the vast influence Merton has had on scholarship. During Merton's career as a monk he wrote over 50 books and numerous articles for periodicals. Much of Merton's writings are autobiographical. Therefore, Merton's writings are more useful when seeking to understand Merton himself and his social context.

Merton has been criticized for over-publication (an assessment he readily admitted to), which attests to his activist nature. Merton wrote hagiography, biography, history, autobiography, philosophy, theology, social criticism, literary criticism, fiction, poetry, and even meditations. He wrote primarily as an amateur, as a way of working out his ideas. His conversational style was concrete and often humorous. His most famous work, Seven Storey Mountain (an autobiographical work published in 1948), contains many of the kernels of ideas that Merton developed in later years. In 1949 Merton published the same book in Great Britain under the title Elected Silence.

Merton rarely traveled far from the abbey in Kentucky. Remarkably, he decided to visit the Far East in 1968—a trip of undetermined length. Merton was asked to speak at a conference on monasticism in Bangkok and then to be a spiritual advisor to Trappist monks throughout the Orient. While Merton was alone in his room in Bangkok between his lectures, he died, apparently from electrocution because of faulty wiring in an electrical fan. He died in 1968 at the age of fifty-three.

It is difficult to sum up Merton's beliefs in a few words, especially because his views changed throughout his life and his belief system was complex. Furthermore, it is impossible to separate Merton's theological outlook from his monastic life. Nevertheless, there are core elements to Merton's thought. Merton was a mystic thoroughly acquainted with historic monasticism, but also erudite in the religions of the East. As a Christian mystic, Merton's spiritual quest was a quest for his true or real self. Merton held that one must lose his or her “exterior” self. One's true identity is lost as if in a forest, and when the seeker finds God, they find their true self. God, then, bears the identity of an individual, and the quest for the true self becomes the quest for God.

Merton's message was a message that rejected self-indulgence. Merton's call to see beyond the self-deception of the world was a representation of the medieval monastic call that Merton popularized with Catholics and non-Catholics alike. Monasticism, Merton thought, was the common thread that tied East and West together. Merton was at home in a dialogue with religions of the East. In Merton's later years Oriental religions played a more significant role, especially Zen Buddhism. It has been thought that Merton's Christian views were weakened because of his interest in divergent religious systems, but a careful reading of Merton's earlier works reveals that he probably never viewed religions of the East as rival systems but as being complementary to Christianity. E. ADAMS

See also MYSTICISM.

Bibliography. R. Bailey, Thomas Merton on Mysticism; J. T. Baker, Thomas Merton: Social Critic; F. Dell'Isola, Thomas Merton: A Bibliography; M. Furlong, Merton, A Biography; D. Grayston and M. Higgins, eds., Thomas Merton: Pilgrim in Process; P. Hart, ed., Message of Thomas Merton; P. Kountz, Thomas Merton as Writer and Monk: A Cultural Study, 1915–51; D. Q. McNerny, Thomas Merton: The Man and His Work; M. Mott, Seven Mountains of Thomas Merton; A. T. Padovano, Human Journey—Thomas Merton: Symbol of a Century; W. H. Shannon, Thomas Merton's Dark Path; C. I. Süßman, Thomas Merton; G. Woodcock, Thomas Merton, Monk and Poet.

Messiah. The study of the rise and development of the figure of the Messiah is primarily historical and then theological. Confusion arises when specifically Christian ideas about the Messiah invade the OT data. Jesus' concept of his messianic mission did not accord with contemporary popular Jewish expectation.

In the OT. "Messiah" is the Hellenized transliteration of the Aramaic mēšīḥā. The underlying Hebrew word mēšīah is derived from māšah, "to anoint, smear with oil." This title was used sometimes of non-Israelite figures—e.g., Cyrus in Isaiah 45:1—sometimes of the altar as in Exodus 29:36, and sometimes of the prophet as in 1 Kings 19:16. But most frequently it referred to the king of Israel as in 1 Samuel 26:11 and Psalm 89:20. It is noteworthy that the word "messiah" does not appear at all in the OT (the KJV of Dan. 9:25 is incorrect; it ought to read "an anointed one"), and only rarely in the intertestamental literature. The primary sense of the title is "king," as the anointed man of God, but it also suggests election, i.e., the king was chosen, elect, and therefore honored. It could scarcely be otherwise than that it referred to a political leader, for in its early stages Israel sought only a ruler, visible and powerful, who would reign here and now. But the entire evidence of later Judaism points to a Messiah who would be not just a king but an eschatological king, a ruler who would appear at the end time. David was the ideal king of Israel, and as such he had a "sacral" character, and this sacral characteristic came to be applied to the eschatological king who was to be like David.

How did the national Messiah come to be a future ideal king? After the death of David, Israel began to hope for another like him who would maintain the power and prestige of the country. But Israel came into hard times with the rupture of the kingdom, and with this event there arose a disillusionment concerning the hope for a king like David. Then after the exile, Zerubbabel, a descendant of David, took the leadership of Judah, but it developed that he was not another David. Gradually the hope was projected into the future, and eventually into the very remote future, so that the Messiah was expected at the end of the age.

This is the mood of the messianic expectations in the latter part of the OT. Such prophecies are common. For example, Jeremiah 33 promises a continuation of the Davidic line; Isaiah 9 and 11 foresee the regal splendor of the coming king; Micah 5:2 looks forward to the birth of the Davidic king in Bethlehem; and Zechariah 9 and 12 describe the character of the messianic kingdom and reign.

The Son of Man figure in Daniel is not identified with the Messiah; it is later in the history of Judaism that the two figures were seen to be one. The suffering servant of Isaiah by reason of his role is yet another figure. So the Messiah, or future ideal king of Israel, the Son of Man, and the suffering servant were three distinct representations in the OT.

In Intertestamental Writings. The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha are the literary remains of the evolution of messianic hopes within Judah between the testaments. As in the OT the formal use of "Messiah" is rare. It is well to remember that in this literature there is a distinction between Messiah and messianic; a book may have a messianic theme but lack a Messiah. The book of Enoch is best known for its doctrine of the Son of Man, which has many messianic overtones. Yet he is not the Messiah, but a person much like Daniel's Son of Man. It remained to the Psalms of Solomon (ca. 48 B.C.) to provide the one confirmed and repeated evidence of the technical use of the term in the intertestamental literature. This literature demonstrates, therefore, a diffuse expectation about the Messiah. It speaks of a Messiah of David, of Levi, of Joseph, and of Ephraim. The Dead Sea Scrolls add to the confusion by referring to a Messiah of Aaron and Israel.

Out of the welter of messianic hopes in this period there emerges a pattern: two kinds of Messiah came to be expected. On one hand, there arose an expectation of a purely national Messiah, one who would appear as a man and assume the kingship over Judah to deliver it from its oppressors. On the other hand, there was a hope for a transcendent Messiah from heaven, part human, part divine, who would establish the kingdom of God on earth. To the popular Jewish mind of the first two centuries before and after Christ these two concepts were not mutually hostile but tended rather to modify each other. It has been argued by some scholars that the conflation of the concepts of Messiah and suffering servant took place in the intertestamental period, but the sole evidence for this is from the Targums, which are post-Christian.

In the NT. It remained for Jesus to fuse the three great eschatological representations of the OT—Messiah, suffering servant, and Son of Man—into one messianic person. Apart from this truth there is no explanation for the confusion of the disciples when he told them he must suffer and die (Matt. 16:21–23). That Christ knew himself to be the Messiah is seen best in his use of the title Son of Man; in Mark 14:61–62 he equates the Christ and the Son of Man. "Christ" is simply the Greek equivalent of the Hebrew "messiah." John 1:41 and 4:25 preserve the Semitic idea by transliterating the word "Messiah." Jesus willingly accepted the appellation Son of David, a distinct messianic title, on several occasions—the cry of blind Bartimaeus (Mark 10:47–49), the children in the temple (Matt. 21:15), and the triumphal entry (Matt. 21:9), to name but a few. It has long been wondered why Jesus did not appropriate the title Messiah to himself instead of the less clear title of Son of Man. The former was probably avoided out of political considerations, for if Jesus had publicly used “Messiah” of himself it would have ignited political aspirations in his hearers to appoint him as king, principally a nationalistic figure, and to seek to drive out the Roman occupiers. This is precisely the import of the Jews’ action at the triumphal entry. Jesus seized on the title Son of Man to veil to his hearers his messianic mission but to reveal that mission to his disciples.

The first generation of the church did not hesitate to refer to Jesus as the Christ and thereby designate him as the greater Son of David, the King. The word was used first as a title of Jesus (Matt. 16:16) and later as part of the personal name (e.g., Eph. 1:1). Peter’s sermon at Pentecost acknowledged Jesus not only as the Christ, but also as Lord, and so the fulfillment of the messianic office is integrally linked to the essential deity of Jesus. Acts 2:36 affirms that Jesus was “made” Christ, the sense of the verb being that by the resurrection Jesus was confirmed as the Christ, the Messiah of God. Romans 1:4 and Philippians 2:9–11, contain the same thought. Other messianic titles attributed to Jesus include Servant, Lord, Son of God, the King, the Holy One, the Righteous One, and the Judge.

D. H. WALLACE

See also CHRISTOLOGY; JESUS CHRIST; SON OF MAN.

Bibliography. C. A. Briggs, Messiah of the Gospels; H. L. Ellison, Centrality of the Messianic Idea for the Old Testament; F. Hahn, Titles of Jesus in Christology; J. Kausner, Messianic Idea in Israel; H. Lockyer, All the Messianic Prophecies of the Bible; R. N. Longenecker, Christology of Early Jewish Christianity; T. W. Manson, Jesus the Messiah; Servant-Messiah; S. Mowinkel, He That Cometh; H. Ringgren, Messiah in the Old Testament; O. P. Robertson, Christ of the Covenants; H. H. Rowley, Servant of the Lord; E. Schürer, History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ; V. Taylor, Names of Jesus; G. Van Groningen, Messianic Revelation in the Old Testament; B. B. Warfield, “Divine Messiah in the Old Testament,” in Biblical and Theological Studies.

Messianic Banquet. See MARRIAGE FEAST OF THE LAMB.

Messianic Judaism. A late twentieth-century movement of Jews who accept the messiahship of Jesus of Nazareth, originated in nineteenth-century missionary efforts among Jewish immigrants in America’s cities. M. Bronstein, a Presbyterian missionary pastor in Chicago, and Arno Gaebelein, a Methodist filling a similar post in New York City, attempted to rectify the existing language and cultural gap between his converts and congregants of existing churches by founding Jewish ethnic congregations, such as the First Hebrew Christian Church in Chicago. They were not alone, and gradually pastors and other leaders of these and similar congregations in Philadelphia, Baltimore, and elsewhere founded similar churches. This process culminated in the national Hebrew Christian Alliance of America, one purpose of which was to unite the congregants of the ethnic congregations with their fellow converts who had settled into “gentile churches,” as traditional denominational churches were sometimes called. The ethnic churches coupled fundamentalist piety with Jewish secular—and sometimes religious—customs, such as the pidyon ha-ben, the redemption of the first-born, a custom dating back to the First Temple if not before. Often, however, this amounted to little more than using Yiddish or Hebrew words from the pulpit and announcing Jewish holidays that were not being congregationally observed.

In the early 1970s Martin Chernoff, the pastor of the Hebrew Christian church in Cincinnati, began to experiment with more intensive use of Yiddishkeit—Jewishness—in religious services. His younger son, Joel, founded a music ministry called Lamb that did much to popularize this new direction among scattered Hebrew Christians. By 1973 the new pastor of the venerable First Hebrew Christian Church in Chicago, Daniel Juster, was being urged by some of his congregants to provide more Yiddishkeit in their worship services. This young clergyman, a graduate of Wheaton College and McCormick Theological Seminary, felt himself unprepared for this task and began to research the implications of biblical Jewish festivals for Jewish believers in Yeshua, as Jesus was increasingly being called within the Hebrew Christian movement. This research led to a gradual, but nonetheless radical, rethinking of how his evangelical principles could be expressed within the contemporary Jewish community, first in his Chicago congregation, and later in a subsequent charge in suburban Washington. From the work of Chernoff, Juster, and other similar leaders within the American and international Hebrew alliances, and the pressure of the re-ethnicization of second- and third-generation Hebrew Christian congregants, Hebrew Christianity entered yet another stage in its development, which was characterized by efforts to actually live lives characterized by varied levels of application of Jewish traditional folkways, including some limited observance of kashrut (food laws), the development of many small (and a few large) messianic synagogues (no longer Hebrew Christian churches), the increased Hebraization of personal and group names as well as religious services, and much greater frequency of services on Saturday—Shabbat. This trend was called the Messianic Jewish movement and differed substantially from the much more negative view of such folkways held by Hebrew Christian leaders of an earlier generation.

Messianic Judaism

Messianic Jews and their organizations customarily have a high view of Scripture, which is often called the Tenakh (OT) and the B'rit haDashah (NT). The Jewish liturgical calendar is almost universally observed, although there remains considerable variety in the ways in which specific services are tailored to local communities. Although there is much disagreement among Messianists concerning the place of the torah she'b'al'peh, the oral Torah (i.e., the Talmud and Jewish tradition), virtually all hold the Hebrew Scriptures to be the revealed Word of God.

The binding which holds together Messianic Jews of diverse congregations with fluid practices and as-yet unsettled traditions is the incorporation to a greater or lesser degree of the basic structure of Jewish synagogue worship, coupled with an intense evangelical faith in a personal Messiah—Yeshua, a Hebraized form of Jesus. Generalizing concerning congregational worship practices is impossible, because of the range between the five to ten percent whose liturgy follows somewhat strictly one of the preexisting traditions (Orthodox, Conservative, Reconstructionist, and Reform) and the ten to twelve percent which ignore Jewish liturgical practice. Most of the Messianic synagogues (approximately seventy-five to eighty percent) fall somewhere in between.

Theologically, the Messianic Movement, especially in the 1970s and 1980s, was significantly influenced by the Charismatic renewal within Christian denominations. This is so because many of the older congregations were originally founded as mission outreaches of Presbyterian, Episcopalian, and Assemblies of God churches. Baptist-founded congregations have frequently tended to be among both the least charismatic and the least liturgical, although this aspect of their influence has diminished as increasing numbers of congregations and their adherents have embraced the Messianic faith through the efforts of already-converted Jews rather than Christian-trained missionaries. Early emphasis on prophetic Scriptures has diminished but little, although eschatologically oriented preaching has largely been replaced by interest in scriptural prognostication concerning the State of Israel. Liberal Christianity has had virtually no influence within Messianic Judaism. Indeed, mainstream (non-Messianic) Jewish New Testament scholarship has tended to be more accepting of the veracity of the Gospel record of events than has liberal and postmodern Christian scholarship; Pinchas Lapide, one of these Jewish scholars, has suggested that Jesus is indeed the Messiah, although only for non-Jews. Consequently, the intellectual climate that influences Messianic Jewish theological thought is considerably more conservative than that within many mainline Christian denominations.

Messianic Judaism remains controversial within the mainstream Jewish community, where it continues to be seen as a missionary proselytizing program rather than as an indigenous part of Jewish religious life. Due in part to past Christian anti-Semitism, a Jewish ethnic exposition of the Gospel has never developed prior to this movement, and it remains questionable whether Messianic Judaism can mature into an accepted religious movement within the community. In part, this questionable status has its basis in the Jewish community's notion that belief in Jesus Christ is by definition apostasy from Judaism. Messianic Judaism is an effort to express what in any other ethnic community would be called evangelical Christianity but which, because of the Jewish community's definition of apostasy, is expressed in other words—a concept which is revolutionary within Jewish religious thought.

Growth has been dramatic in the United States during the last quarter of the twentieth century, and Messianic synagogues have been founded in Israel itself, many under the auspices of Jews whose training occurred in Messianic synagogues in America, and who made aliyah—moved to Israel—subsequently. It is much too early to judge whether such a diaspora-centered movement will be able to sink permanent roots in the Jewish state itself.

K. W. RICK

See also ANTI-SEMITISM; ATONEMENT, DAY OF; BIBLE, AUTHORITY OF; CHARISMATIC MOVEMENT; EVANGELICALISM; FEASTS AND FESTIVALS, OLD TESTAMENT; FUNDAMENTALISM; ISRAEL AND PROPHECY; JOCZ, JAKÓB; JUDAISM.

Bibliography. Y. Eckstein, What Christians Should Know about Jews and Judaism; P. E. Goble, Everything You Need to Grow a Messianic Synagogue; D. A. Rausch, Messianic Judaism: Its History, Theology, and Polity; K. W. Rick, "Messianic Judaism," Services of the Christian Year (Complete Library of Christian Worship 5:44–46), R. E. Webber, ed.; M. Shiffman, Synagogue of the Messiah.

Metaphysics. The branch of philosophy that inquires into the ultimate nature of reality. The term derives from the practice of commentators of calling Aristotle's book on such topics the Metaphysics, since it came after (meta) the book on physics. Since then, it has seemed especially appropriate to use the term to refer to such topics, since they are more fundamental and more abstract than questions about nature.

Metaphysics is widely held to be the central issue in philosophy; central to metaphysics itself is ontology. Ontology is concerned with being as its subject matter. Ontological questions include the following: What is real and what is mere appearance? Is there reality beyond the things that can be seen, tasted, touched, and heard? Are thoughts real? Is the mind real? Is time real? Is there a God? In metaphysics philosophers also inquire into such questions as whether the relation of cause to effect is a feature of events in the world or simply an aspect of our psychological habits of thinking. Also within the scope of metaphysics is the question of human freedom versus universal causal determinism.

Metaphysicians differ as to the goals and methods of metaphysics. Metaphysics has been conceived as a science with nonperceptible reality as the subject matter, as in Leibniz and Wolff, and as an attempt to deduce the complete, all-encompassing system of reality, as in Descartes and Spinoza. This sort of grand-scale metaphysics was dealt a severe blow by Kant, who argued persuasively that human reason was incapable of metaphysical knowledge. More recently logical positivism has denied the meaningfulness of metaphysical language, and analytical philosophy in general has been hostile or indifferent to metaphysics, especially as conceived by the earlier British idealists such as F. H. Bradley. Nonetheless, prominent in contemporary philosophy is P. F. Strawson's "descriptive metaphysics" and the process metaphysics of Alfred North Whitehead and Charles Hartshorne; this latter movement has made itself felt in contemporary theology.

To accept a Christian perspective on reality necessarily involves making metaphysical commitments. A Christian worldview that is faithful to Scripture and Christian doctrine will involve, for example, the belief that reality includes far more than is amenable to direct empirical investigation. The Christian will be interested in God and his relation to the world, in the soul and its relation to the body, and in free will in relation to determinism, to name but a few. Insofar as Christians seek not only to give assent but also to exercise judgment and develop understanding they will pursue metaphysical inquiry.

Metaphysical concerns are certainly very close to the core of Christian thinking in theology and philosophy, and it is for good reason that metaphysical investigation has loomed large in philosophy in the Christian tradition. D. B. FLETCHER

See also PHILOSOPHY, CHRISTIAN VIEW OF; REASON.

Bibliography. Aristotle, Metaphysics; G. Berkeley, Principle of Human Knowledge; D. Emmet, Nature of Metaphysical Thinking; A. F. Holmes, Faith Seeks Understanding; G. W. Leibniz, Monadology; P. F. Strawson, Individuals; R. Taylor, Metaphysics; W. H. Walsh, Metaphysics; J. Weinberg and K. Yandell, eds., Metaphysics; A. N. Whitehead, Process and Reality.

Metempsychosis. See REINCARNATION.

Methodism. A name designating several Protestant groups, Methodism has its roots in the work of John and Charles Wesley, sons of an Anglican rector and his wife, Susannah. A friend and Oxford classmate of the Wesleys, George Whitefield, was also instrumental in forming the Holy Club (ca. 1725), which stressed "inward religion, the religion of the heart." These awakenings, coupled with the club's insistence on exacting discipline in scholastic as well as spiritual matters, earned its members the jeering title of "Methodists" by 1729.

In 1735 the Wesleys sailed to America as missionaries, but not before John, a somewhat troubled young Anglican priest, noted: "My chief motive is the hope of saving my own soul." In the spring of 1738 John Wesley returned to England filled with a sense of failure. He was attracted to the piety and feelings of inward assurance so notably evidenced among the Moravians. Wesley knew this was lacking in his own life despite his outward discipline. He saw himself failing to bear fruits of "inward holiness." Convinced of the necessity for faith and the inner witness, Wesley passed through a torturous spring, fearing that at the advanced age of thirty-five both life and God were passing him by. Unwillingly, he writes later, he was persuaded to attend a Bible study meeting on May 24, 1738, in Aldersgate Street, where an unknown layman was expounding on Luther's commentary on Romans. There, Wesley writes, "I felt my heart strangely warmed. I felt I did trust Christ, Christ alone for salvation; and an assurance was given me that He had taken away my sins." The Aldersgate experience, definitely a turning point in Wesley's life, was not so much an outright conversion experience of the type that came to be associated with the revival movements of England and America as it was a firm receiving of assurance of this priest's own salvation. Aldersgate was what Wesley needed.

By 1739 the distinct and aggressively evangelistic and highly disciplined Methodist movement had spread like wildfire through field preaching, lay preaching, bands, and societies. The "Rules of Bands" demanded a highly disciplined life, an exacting schedule of meetings in which the society members were expected to share intimate details of their daily lives, to confess their sins to one another, to pray for each other, and to exhort members of the class toward inner holiness and good works. The enthusiasm of the revivals came under the control of the bands or societies. The weekly prayer meetings; the use of an itinerant system of traveling preachers; the annual conferences; the establishment of chapels; the prolific outpouring of tracts, letters, sermons, and hymns; and the general superintendency of John Wesley became the hallmark of what emerged as a worldwide Methodist movement.

Methodism

Beginning with Church of England congregations banning John Wesley from their pulpits in 1738—before Aldersgate—tensions with the Established Church were inevitable and eventually disruptive. Wesley's penchant for organization and discipline likely hastened the series of breaks and gave the people called Methodists their several denominations.

As the revivalistic awakening came to include Methodism, work extended from England to Ireland, Scotland, and Wales, where a Calvinistically oriented minority formally established themselves in 1764. Soon lay preachers were active in America, establishing circuits along the mid-Atlantic states under the supervision of Francis Asbury, sent by Wesley in 1771. In 1744 a conference was held in London and standards for doctrine, liturgy, and discipline were adopted. The Wesleys maintained their personal ties (ordination) and devotion to the Church of England with its emphasis on the sacraments and its antipopery views. Episcopal in its organization, the Methodist Connexion was autocratically controlled by John Wesley. By 1784 Wesley concluded that no one individual would be a suitable successor. He therefore moved to record a "Deed of Declaration" in which he declared a group of one hundred of his most able leaders (the "Legal Hundred") his legal successor. This established that Methodist societies were now duly constituted as legal entities, conceived of as ecclesiac in ecclesia but formally separate entities from the Church of England. This also established the Annual Conference as the primary authority in the Methodist system.

In September of that same year Wesley yielded to American pressure to have his preachers administer the sacraments by ordaining two lay helpers as elders and Thomas Coke as general superintendent without consulting with his conference. He was persuaded to this act by Peter King's Account of the Primitive Church (1691) that presbyters held the same spiritual authority as bishops to ordain in the early church and by the bishop of London's refusal in 1780 to ordain any of Methodism's preachers in America. The three newly ordained men were dispatched to build up the full work of Methodism in America. At the Christmas Conference in Baltimore in 1784 Coke ordained Asbury, and the Methodist Episcopal Church was organized. Coke and Asbury were elected general superintendents. A Sunday Service based on the Book of Common Prayer and Twenty-five Articles of Religion abridged by Wesley from the Thirty-nine Articles were adopted by the new denomination.

Continuing his work among the various societies, Wesley ordained a number of presbyters in Scotland and England, and for the mission field. Unlike in America, no formal separation was consummated in England until after Wesley's death in 1791. A conciliar effort by the Church of England in 1793 prompted a formal "Plan of Pacification" in 1795. But final separation occurred in 1797, as the Rubicon had been crossed in 1784, and the formal organization of Methodism was well under way by the beginning of the nineteenth century.

In England a number of Methodist bodies splintered from the main Methodism movement. The Ecumenical Methodist Conferences formalized a renewed conciliar spirit. From 1907 to 1933 various groups united to become part of the Methodist Church. On July 8, 1969, a plan calling for merger of the Methodist and Anglican communions faced defeat at the hands of the Anglican Convocations where the concept of historic episcopacy as an office and not an order proved unacceptable. In Canada the Methodist Church of Canada joined with the Presbyterian Church and selected Union Churches together with the Congregational Churches to form the United Church of Canada.

In the United States numerous Methodist-oriented bodies exist. Some came into being in disputes over doctrinal issues. Others arose out of social concerns. The Wesleyan Methodist Church, organized in the 1840s, drew its inspiration from Orange Scott, a New Englander lacking formal education but committed to the Abolitionist movement. The Methodist Protestant Church, opposing the episcopacy, separated in 1828. By 1860 both doctrinal and social tensions were intense, and the Free Methodist Church was founded, largely under the inspiration of B. T. Roberts. In 1844 the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was formed over the slavery issue.

Other significant Methodist denominations in the United States are the African Methodist Episcopal (1816), the African Methodist Episcopal Zion (1820), and the Christian Methodist Episcopal (1870), all black, totaling more than 2.5 million members. The year 1939 brought the reunion of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, the Methodist Protestant Church, and the Methodist Episcopal Church to form The Methodist Church.

A group of German pietists under Jacob Albright were attracted to Methodism and in 1807 organized the Newly-Formed Methodist Conference or the German Methodist Conference. The English-speaking Methodist lay preachers were unable to serve this German-speaking immigrant group, so the Evangelical Association was formed in 1816. During this same period Phillip Otterbein, friend of Asbury, together with Martin Boehm founded the United Brethren in Christ among German-speaking immigrants with its organizing General Conference in 1815. In 1946 these two German immigrant churches merged to form the Evangelical United Brethren (EUB) Church. With its ethnic distinctiveness on the wane, and clearly Methodist in polity and theology, the EUBs merged in 1968 with The Methodist Church to form The United Methodist Church.

Active in social concerns, Methodism has followed in the footsteps of the Wesleys and Richard Watson. The theological mandate espoused in the 1908 Social Creed continues as a challenge to Methodists and other Christian fellowships in the struggle for social justice. In ecumenical circles G. Bromley Oxnam (1891–1963) and Frank Mason North (1850–1935) were instrumental in developing the Federal and National Council of Churches. E. Stanley Jones (1894–1973), evangelist extraordinary, was also instrumental in the worldwide ecumenical and evangelistic efforts of Methodism. Former EUB bishop Reuben H. Mueller (1897–1982) and Glenn R. Phillips (1894–1970) were principals in the formative days of the Consultation on Church Union. John R. Mott (1865–1955) figured prominently in the formation of the World Council of Churches. Within Methodism, the World Methodist Council meets at five-year intervals and is composed of some fifty delegates representing some fifty-four million Methodists.

Long distinguished by an emphasis on practical faith, Methodism and its various offshoots have sought to avoid a strict confessionalism. The addition of a new section to the 1972 Discipline—"Our Theological Task," which formalizes a posture of doctrinal pluralism that appeals to Wesley's sermon "Catholic Spirit"—was an acknowledgment of the wide diversity of views within modern Methodism over the proper balance of Wesleyan orthodoxy and a theology of experience.

Concurrent with this development North American Methodism is undergoing the emergence of a neo-Wesleyan theology associated with J. Robert Nelson, Albert Outler, Robert Cushman, and Carl Michalson. African Methodist Episcopal minister James Cone combines the insights of black theology with his Methodist heritage. John B. Cobb Jr. and Schubert M. Ogden explore their Wesleyan theology from the perspective of process modes of thought. Finally, the Methodist Federation for Social Action urges Methodism to retain its social conscience, and the Good News movement, an evangelically based Methodist renewal group, seeks to call Methodism to its traditional Wesleyan theological heritage.

P. A. MICKEY

See also CARTER, CHARLES WEBB; COBB, JOHN B., JR.; CONE, JAMES H.; OGDEN, SCHUBERT MILES; WATSON, RICHARD; WESLEY, JOHN; WESLEYAN TRADITION; WILEY, HENRY ORTON.

Bibliography. H. Bett, Spirit of Methodism; E. S. Bucke, ed., History of American Methodism; C. W. Carter, ed., Contemporary Wesleyan Theology; H. Carter, Methodist Heritage; R. Chiles, Theological Transition in American Methodism; C. H. Crookshank, History of the Methodist Church in Ireland; M. Edwards, Methodism and England; G. G. Findlay and W. W. Holdsworth, History of the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Church; I. L. Holt, World Methodist Movement; T. A. Langford, Practical Divinity; F. F. MacLeister, History of the Wesleyan Methodist Church of America; F. A. Norwood, Story of American Methodism; F. A. Norwood, ed., Sourcebook of American Methodism; H. V. Richardson, Dark Salvation: The Story of Methodism As It Developed among Blacks in America; M. Simpson, ed., Cyclopedia of Methodism; G. Smith, History of Wesleyan Methodism; W. W. Sweet, Methodism in American History; W. F. Swift, Methodism in Scotland; W. J. Townsend, C. W. Williams, John Wesley's Theology Today; W. J. Townsend, H. B. Workman, and G. Eayrs, eds., New History of Methodism.

Methodism, Calvinistic. See CALVINISTIC METHODISM.

Metropolitan. See CHURCH OFFICERS.

Metz, Johannes Baptist (b. 1936). Roman Catholic professor at the University of Mainz and leading proponent of the political theology that arose out of Jürgen Moltmann's theology of hope in the 1960s. A student of Karl Rahner, Metz is convinced that the horizon of faith cannot be reduced to the strictly personal, but rather has unavoidably and inherently social and political ramifications. All theology is political in nature; it is not merely a question of application or relationship. Reacting against both the doctrinal authoritarianism of orthodoxy and personalism of existentialist theology, Metz insists that the Word confronts humankind in the midst of the world, bringing both limitation and emancipation. The Christian faith is fundamentally corporate and political in nature, and its calling is the liberation of humanity from enslaving social structures. Faith has to do with the meaning of real life in this world and its history, and thus cannot be reduced to a private or spiritual realm.

By its critical engagement with the world, the discipline of theology serves the historical movement toward liberation. Thus, the theological enterprise is not a parochially Christian concern but rather a public and constructive appraisal of social and historical reality. Christian theology serves the future of humankind by proclaiming a word of censure upon its own present bourgeois reality and a word of hope for the future shape of the world. The Christian "remembrance" of the cross excludes all possibility of quietism in the midst of an enslaved and hurting humanity. The cross and the resurrection challenge the church to political participation and open up the future by setting humanity on the way to new possibilities. Metz describes his political theology as a "critical corrective" aimed at what he calls the "deprivatizing" of Christianity. This critical corrective, however, is also aimed at the authoritarian hierarchy of the Roman Catholic Church, for it also envisions theology as a critical word of judgment against traditionalist and hidebound ecclesiastical arrangements and self-understandings.

Metz, Johannes Baptist

While the opening up of the Christian revelational horizon to the social and political realities of historical existence are to be appreciated, the real danger that the faith may be taken captive by secularist political ideologies and in the process lose the fullness of its mission must not be ignored. Metz's understanding of liberation as the potential to develop latent or natural humanity is an example of this secularist captivity and thus is biblically problematic.

M. WILLIAMS

See also LIBERATION THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. J. B. Metz, Faith in History and Society; Theology of the World; P. J. Albano, "Contributions of Johannes B. Metz to a Political Theology," in Thought: A Review of Culture and Ideas 62:13-25; R. D. Johns, Man in the World: Political Theology of Johannes Baptist Metz; M. V. Maher, Historicity and Christian Theology: Johannes Baptist Metz's Critic of Karl Rahner's Theology; B. Mullady, "Analysis of Christology in Liberation Theology," in Angelicum 58:438-59; S. T. Ostovich, Reason in History: Theology and Science as Community Activities; J. W. Savolainen, Theology in the Shadow of Marx: The Theory-Practice Relationship in the Political Theology of Johannes Baptist Metz and in the Liberation Theology of Hugo Assman; E. I. Steele, Congregational Self-Understanding and the Mission Study Process.

Midtribulation Rapture. See RAPTURE OF THE CHURCH.

Millennium, Views of the. The word "millennium" is derived from the Latin word for a thousand (at times the word "chiliasm," taken from the Greek and meaning the same thing, is used). It denotes a doctrine taken from a passage in Revelation (20:1-10) in which the writer describes the devil as being bound and thrown into a bottomless pit for a thousand years. The removal of Satanic influence is accompanied by the resurrection of the Christian martyrs, who reign with Christ during the millennium. This period is a time when all of humankind's yearning for an ideal society characterized by peace, freedom, material prosperity, and the rule of righteousness will be realized. The vision of the OT prophets who foretold a period of earthly prosperity for the people of God will find fulfillment during this era.

Millennialism addresses problems that are often overlooked in other eschatological views. Although most Christian theologians discuss death, immortality, the end of the world, the last judgment, the rewards of the just, and the punishment of the damned, they often limit themselves to the prospects for the individual in this world and the next. In contrast, millennialism is concerned with the future of the human community on earth. It is concerned with the chronology of coming events, just as history is involved with the study of the record of the past.

Millennialism has appeared within both Christian and non-Christian traditions. Anthropologists and sociologists have found millennialist belief among non-Western people, but they have debated as to whether or not these appearances of the teaching are based upon borrowing from Christian preaching. Most Christian theologians believe that millennialism is based on material written by Judeo-Christian authors, especially the books of Daniel and Revelation. The ideas, events, symbols, and personalities introduced in these writings have reappeared countless times in the teachings of prophets of the end of the world. Each new appearance finds these motifs given fresh significance from association with contemporary events.

Major Varieties of Millennialism. For purposes of analysis and explanation Christian attitudes toward the millennium can be classified as premillennial, postmillennial, and amillennial. These categories involve much more than the arrangement of events surrounding the return of Christ. The thousand years expected by the premillennialist is quite different from that anticipated by the postmillennialist. The premillennialist believes that the kingdom of Christ will be inaugurated in a cataclysmic way and that divine control will be exercised in a more supernatural manner than does the postmillennialist. The premillennialist believes that the return of Christ will be preceded by signs, including wars, famines, earthquakes, the preaching of the gospel to all nations, a great apostasy, the appearance of Antichrist, and the great tribulation. These events culminate in the second coming, which will result in a period of peace and righteousness when Christ and his saints control the world. This rule is established suddenly through supernatural methods rather than gradually over a long period of time by means of the conversion of individuals. The Jews will figure prominently in the future age because the premillennialist believes that they will be converted in large numbers and will again have a prominent place in God's work. Nature will have the curse removed from it, and even the desert will produce abundant crops. Christ will restrain evil during the age by the use of authoritarian power. Despite the idyllic conditions of this golden age there is a final rebellion of wicked people against Christ and his saints. This exposure of evil is crushed by God, the non-Christian dead are resurrected, the last judgment conducted, and the eternal states of heaven and hell established. Many premillennialists have taught that during the thousand years dead or martyred believers will be resurrected with glorified bodies to intermingle with the other inhabitants of the earth.

In contrast to premillennialism, the postmillennialists emphasize the present aspects of God's kingdom, which will reach fruition in the future. They believe that the millennium will come through Christian preaching and teaching. Such activity will result in a more godly, peaceful, and prosperous world. The new age will not be essentially different from the present, and it will come about as more people are converted to Christ. Evil will not be totally eliminated during the millennium, but it will be reduced to a minimum as the moral and spiritual influence of Christians is increased. During the new age the church will assume greater importance, and many economic, social, and educational problems will be solved. This period is not necessarily limited to a thousand years, because the number can be used symbolically. The millennium closes with the second coming of Christ, the resurrection of the dead, and the last judgment.

The third position, amillennialism, states that the Bible does not predict a period of the rule of Christ on earth before the last judgment. According to this outlook there will be a continuous development of good and evil in the world until the second coming of Christ, when the dead shall be raised and the judgment conducted. Amillennialists believe that the kingdom of God is now present in the world as the victorious Christ rules his church through the Word and the Spirit. They feel that the future, glorious, and perfect kingdom refers to the new earth and life in heaven. Thus Revelation 20 is a description of the souls of dead believers reigning with Christ in heaven.

The Rise of Millennialism. Early millennial teaching was characterized by an apocalyptic emphasis. In this view the future kingdom of God would be established through a series of dramatic, unusual events. Such teaching has been kept alive throughout the Christian era by certain types of premillennialism. Apocalyptic interpretation is based upon the prophecies of Daniel and the amplification of some of the same themes in the book of Revelation. These works point to the imminent and supernatural intervention of God in human affairs and the defeat of the seemingly irresistible progress of evil. Numerology, theme figures, and angelology play a major role in these presentations. The apocalyptic worldview was very influential among the Jews in the period between the OT and the NT. Consequently the audiences to which Jesus preached were influenced by it. The early Christians also embraced this outlook.

The book of Revelation, composed during a period of persecution in the first century, used the Jewish apocalyptic interpretation to explain the Christian era. Daniel's Son of Man was presented as Christ, numerological formulas were restated, and the dualistic world of good and evil was provided with a new set of characters. Despite these changes the essential apocalyptic message remained as the book taught the living hope of the immediate direct intervention of God to reverse history and to overcome evil with good. Such an outlook brought great comfort to believers who suffered from persecution by the forces of Imperial Rome. Expressed in a form that has been called historic premillennialism, this hope seems to have been the prevailing eschatology during the first three centuries of the Christian era, and is found in the works of Papias, Irenaeus, Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Hippolytus, Methodius, Commodianus, and Lactantius.

Several forces worked to undermine the millennialism of the early church. One of these was the association of the teaching with a radical group, the Montanists, who placed a great stress on a new third age of the Spirit which they believed was coming among their number in Asia Minor. Another influence which encouraged a change of eschatological views was the emphasis of Origen upon the manifestation of the kingdom within the soul of the believer rather than in the world. This resulted in a shift of attention away from the historical toward the spiritual or metaphysical. A final factor that led to a new millennial interpretation was the conversion of the Emperor Constantine the Great and the adoption of Christianity as the favored Imperial religion.

Medieval and Reformation Millennialism. In the new age brought in by the acceptance of Christianity as the main religion of the Roman Empire it was Augustine, bishop of Hippo, who articulated the amillennial view that dominated Western Christian thought during the Middle Ages. The millennium, according to his interpretation, referred to the church in which Christ reigned with his saints. The statements in the book of Revelation were interpreted allegorically by Augustine. No victory was imminent in the struggle with evil in the world. On the really important level, the spiritual, the battle had already been won and God had triumphed through the cross. Satan was reduced to lordship over the city of the World, which coexisted with the city of God. Eventually even the small domain left to the devil would be taken from him by a triumphant God.

Millennium, Views of the

Augustine's allegorical interpretation became the official doctrine of the church during the medieval period. However, in defiance of the main teaching of the church the earlier apocalyptic premillennialism continued to be held by certain counterculture groups. These millenarians under charismatic leaders were often associated with radicalism and revolts. For example, during the eleventh century in regions most affected by urbanization and social change thousands followed individuals such as Tanchelm of the Netherlands, causing great concern to those in positions of power. In the twelfth century Joachim of Fiore gave fresh expression to the millennial vision with his teaching about the coming third age of the Holy Spirit. During the Hussite Wars in fifteenth century Bohemia the Taborites encouraged the resistance to the Catholic Imperial forces by proclaiming the imminent return of Christ to establish his kingdom. These outbreaks of premillennialism continued during the Reformation era and were expressed most notably in the rebellion of the city of Münster in 1534. Jan Matthys gained control of the community, proclaiming that he was Enoch preparing the way for the second coming of Christ by establishing a new code of laws that featured a community of property and other radical reforms. He declared that Münster was the New Jerusalem and called all faithful Christians to gather in the city. Many Anabaptists answered his summons, and most of the original inhabitants of the town were forced to flee or to live in a veritable reign of terror. The situation was so threatening to other areas of Europe that a combined Protestant and Catholic force laid siege to the place and after a difficult struggle captured the town, suppressing the wave of millennial enthusiasm.

Perhaps it was the Münster episode that led the Protestant Reformers to reaffirm Augustinian amillennialism. Each of the three main Protestant traditions of the sixteenth century—Lutheran, Calvinist, and Anglican—had the support of the state and so continued the same Constantinian approach to theology. Both Luther and Calvin were very suspicious of millennial speculation. Calvin declared that those who engaged in calculations based on the apocalyptic portions of Scripture were “ignorant” and “malicious.” The major statements of the various Protestant bodies such as the Augsburg Confession, the Thirty-nine Articles, and the Westminster Confession, although professing faith in the return of Christ, do not support apocalyptic millenarian speculation. In certain respects, however, the Reformers inaugurated changes that would lead to a revival of interest in premillennialism. These include a more literal approach to the interpretation of Scripture, the identification of the papacy with Antichrist, and an emphasis on Bible prophecy.

Modern Millennialism. It was during the seventeenth century that premillennialism of a more scholarly nature was presented. Two Reformed theologians, Johann Heinrich Alsted and Joseph Mede, were responsible for the renewal of this outlook. They did not interpret the book of Revelation in an allegorical manner but rather understood it to contain the promise of a literal kingdom of God to be established on earth before the last judgment. During the Puritan Revolution the writings of these men encouraged others to look for the establishment of the millennial kingdom in England. One of the more radical of these groups, the Fifth Monarchy Men, became infamous for their insistence on the reestablishment of OT law and a reformed government for England. The collapse of the Cromwellian regime and the restoration of the Stuart monarchy discredited premillennialism. Yet the teaching continued into the eighteenth century through the work of Isaac Newton, Johann Albrecht Bengel, and Joseph Priestley.

As the popularity of premillennialism waned, postmillennialism rose to prominence. First expressed in the works of certain Puritan scholars, it received its most influential formulation in the writings of the Anglican commentator Daniel Whitby. It seemed to him that the kingdom of God was coming ever closer and that it would arrive through the same kind of effort that had always triumphed in the past. Among the many theologians and preachers who were convinced by the arguments of Whitby was Jonathan Edwards. Edwardsean postmillennialism also emphasized the place of America in the establishment of millennial conditions upon the earth.

During the nineteenth century premillennialism became popular once again. The violent uprooting of European social and political institutions during the era of the French Revolution encouraged a more apocalyptic climate of opinion. There was also a revival of interest in the fortunes of the Jews. A new element was added to premillennialism during this period with the rise of dispensationalism. Edward Irving, a Church of Scotland minister who pastored a congregation in London, was one of the outstanding leaders in the development of the new interpretation. He published numerous works on prophecy and organized the Albury Park prophecy conferences, thus setting the pattern of other gatherings of premillenarians during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Irving's apocalyptic exposition found support among the Plymouth Brethren and led many in the group to become enthusiastic teachers of dispensational premillennialism.

Perhaps the leading early dispensational expositor among the Brethren was John Nelson Darby. He believed that the second coming of Christ consisted of two stages, the first a secret rapture or "catching away" of the saints that would remove the church before a seven-year period of tribulation devastates the earth, and the second when Christ appears visibly with his saints after the tribulation to rule on earth for a thousand years. Darby also taught that the church was a mystery of which only Paul wrote and that the purposes of God can be understood as working through a series of periods, or dispensations, in each of which God dealt with people in unique ways.

Most premillennialists during the early nineteenth century were not dispensationalists, however. More typical of their number was David Nevins Lord, who edited a quarterly journal, Theological and Literary Review, which appeared from 1848 to 1861. This periodical contained articles of interest to premillennialists and helped to elaborate a nondispensational system of prophetic interpretation. Lord believed that a historical explanation of the book of Revelation was preferable to the futurist outlook which characterized the dispensational view. This approach was followed by most premillennialists in the United States until after the Civil War, when dispensationalism spread among their number. Darby's interpretation was accepted because of the work of individuals such as Henry Moorhouse, a Brethren evangelist, who convinced many interdenominational speakers to accept dispensationalism. Typical of those who came to believe in Darby's eschatology were William E. Blackstone, "Harry" A. Ironside, Arno C. Gaebelein, Lewis Sperry Chafer, and C. I. Scofield. It is through Scofield and his works that dispensationalism became the norm for much of American evangelicalism. His Scofield Reference Bible, which made the new eschatological interpretation an integral part of an elaborate system of notes printed on the same pages as the text, proved so popular that it sold over three million copies in fifty years. Bible schools and seminaries such as Biola, Moody Bible Institute, Dallas Theological Seminary, and Grace Theological Seminary, along with the popular preachers and teachers who have utilized the electronic media, have made this interpretation popular among millions of conservative Protestants. The new view replaced the older premillennial outlook to such an extent that when George Ladd restated the historic interpretation in the midtwentieth century it seemed like a novelty to many evangelicals.

While the various forms of premillennialism competed for adherents in nineteenth century America, a form of postmillennialism that equated the United States with the kingdom of God became very popular. Many Protestant ministers fed the fires of nationalism and Manifest Destiny by presenting the coming of the golden age as dependent upon the spread of democracy, technology, and the other "benefits" of Western civilization. Perhaps the most complete statement of this civil millennialism was presented by Hollis Read. Ordained to the Congregational ministry in Park Street Church, Boston, he served as a missionary to India but was forced to return to the United States because of his wife's poor health. In a two-volume work, Hand of God in History, he attempted to prove that God's millennial purposes were finding fulfillment in America. He believed that geography, politics, learning, the arts, and morality all pointed to the coming of the millennium to America in the nineteenth century. From this base the new age could spread to the entire earth. As Psalm 22:27 stated, "All the ends of the earth will remember and turn to the LORD; and all the families of the nations will bow down before him." In order to accomplish the purpose of global evangelism Read favored imperialism, because the extension of Anglo-Saxon control over other nations ensured the spread of the gospel. He cited the prevalence of the English language, which made it easier to preach the Word and to teach the native people the more civilized Western culture, as one example of the benefits of Western control. Technological improvements such as the steam press, the locomotive, and the steamship were also given by God to spread enlightenment and the Christian message to all peoples.

Whenever the United States has faced a time of crisis, there have been those who have revived civil postmillennialism as a means to encourage and comfort their fellow citizens. The biblical content of this belief has become increasingly vague as the society has become more pluralistic. For example, during the period of the Civil War many agreed with Julia Ward Howe's "Battle Hymn of the Republic," which described God as working through the Northern forces to accomplish his ultimate purpose. President Wilson's crusade to "make the world safe for democracy," which led his country into World War I, was based upon a postmillennial vision that gave American ideals the major role in establishing peace and justice on earth. Since World War II several groups have revived civil millennialism to counter communism and to resist cosmetic changes such as those brought about by the moves for equal rights for women.

In addition to the premillennial, amillennial, and postmillennial interpretations, there have been groups such as the Shakers, the Seventh-day Adventists, the Jehovah's Witnesses, and the Latter-day Saints (Mormons) who tend to equate the activities of their own sect with the coming of the millennium. There are also movements, including the Nazis and the Marxists, who teach a kind of secular millennialism when they speak of the Third Reich or the classless society.

Millennium, Views of the

R. G. CLOUSE

See also ESCHATOLOGY; RAPTURE OF THE CHURCH; SECOND COMING OF CHRIST.

Bibliography. O. T. Allis, Prophecy and the Church; R. Anderson, Coming Prince; W. E. Blackstone, Jesus Is Coming; L. Boettner, Millennium; P. Boyer, When Time Shall Be No More; D. Brown, Christ's Second Coming; S. J. Case, Millennial Hope; R. G. Clouse, ed., Meaning of the Millennium: Four Views; R. D. Culver, Daniel and the Latter Days; J. Daniélou, Theology of Jewish Christianity; A. A. Hoekema, Bible and the Future; J. M. Kik, Eschatology of Victory; G. E. Ladd, Blessed Hope; P. Mauro, Seventy Weeks and the Great Tribulation; R. Pache, Return of Jesus Christ; A. Reese, Approaching Advent of Christ; C. C. Ryrie, Dispensationalism Today; E. R. Sandeen, Roots of Fundamentalism; G. Vos, Pauline Eschatology; J. F. Walvoord, Millennial Kingdom; B. B. Warfield, Biblical Doctrines; T. P. Weber, Living in the Shadow of the Second Coming; N. West, Studies in Eschatology.

Miller, William (1782–1849). See ADVENTISM.

Mind. A concept that is usually defined in contrast with the concept of body. The two terms have received their meanings in the context of lengthy metaphysical disagreements. Thus it is difficult, if not impossible, to define mind in isolation from the theories in which the controversy has been historically embedded. Most modern theories of mind have arisen in response to the views of Descartes.

What Is Mind? Plato was the first to make the distinction between mind and body. The mind was capable of existence before and after its relationship to the body, and was able to rule over the body during its residence. Aristotle proposed a different solution, one that grew out of his understanding of form and matter. What is form in one sense may be matter in another. The physical body is matter in relation to the soul, which is the form of the body. This view was influential during the Middle Ages and was held by Thomas Aquinas and many scholastics.

It was Descartes who first sought to systematically work out the nature and interrelationship of mind and body. The most important views on the nature of mind are given below.

Mental Substance Theory. Body and mind were both substances for Descartes. They were, however, utterly different in nature. Body is extended and unthinking. Mind, on the other hand, is unextended and thinking. Body was the more original and lasting. Mind is mental substance or pure ego. It is an enduring, immaterial, nonextended stuff that changes in the performance of certain acts. Mental acts are all acts of thinking, broadly defined. These acts included doubting, understanding, conceiving, affirming, denying, willing, refusing, imagining, and feeling. Mental substance, since its essence is to think, is always engaged in one of these acts.

The central objection to this view is the inability to give any content to the notion of a substance. Even Locke, who accepted it, admitted that it was an idea of a something-I-know-not-what, which acts in some-way-I-know-not-how. Hume rejected the notion as without meaning. Kant in the paralogisms argued that the notion of substance is based on the confusion of the need for a logical subject for all judgments with a metaphysical determination that some absolute subject exists.

Bundle Theory. This alternative was advocated by Hume. It is called the bundle theory because he viewed the mind as nothing more than a bundle or collection of perceptions, which follow one another with incredible rapidity and are in constant flux and movement. If all these perceptions were removed, there would not be an enduring substructure. There would be nothing. Hume suggested that these perceptions are related to one another by resemblance, contiguity, and causation, but finally had to admit that he failed to explain the simplicity and identity of the mind. Other conditions for the unity of the perceptions, such as memory, have been advanced, but none have withstood criticism.

Stream-of-Consciousness Theory. William James developed a position somewhere between the mental substance and the bundle theories. Mind is a "stream of consciousness." This view, however, has not resolved the difficulties of definition, because there are states of unconsciousness that are related to the mind. If the stream continues during these states, then there must be some substance. If it does not, then the problem of relating the separate segments becomes the same as in the bundle theory.

The Essence of the Mental. Because of the inability to define what mind is, many philosophers reject talk about minds for mental facts, states, properties, acts, and events. The meaning of such things can be roughly stated by the way in which they are used in reports. From examining these reports it is possible to set out the distinguishing characteristics of the mental.

A popular suggestion for the defining characteristic of the mental is that mental reports are made immediately without inference. This view has been criticized as inadequate in that the same can be said for simple judgments about physical events. For instance, it is possible to judge without inference that one physical event followed another.

This has led to another proposal that the mark of the mental is that reports of mental acts are incorrigible. This means that reports of mental acts are not open to correction in terms of other experience. This is held to be true because the one giving the report has “privileged access” to these events. The objection to this position is that such reports are often corrected by the one reporting or by others.

Franz Brentano argued that the distinctive mark of the mental is intentionality or “intentional in existence.” That is, it is possible for the mind to make some content, existent or nonexistent in reality, the object of mind. The mind can imagine a flying horse or a good book. While this view of the mental is widely held in European philosophy, it is still a matter of dispute.

The Mind-Body Problem. While there are still problems that remain to be worked out concerning what the mind is and what is distinctive about its activities, nevertheless we possess some notion of what the answer to these questions would be. Thus, it is now possible to ask what the relationship between the mind and body is. While there are many theories on this subject, they may be classified under two headings: monistic and dualistic.

Monistic Theories. What follows is a brief description of the major monistic theories of mind-body relation. What characterizes this group of theories is the attempt to reduce either mind or body to the other entity.

Materialism is the oldest mind-body theory. It is the view that matter is fundamental, and that everything that exists is dependent upon it. In its most extreme form materialism is the position that everything that exists is material. When applied to mental events it means that all statements about mind are synonymous or translatable into statements about physical phenomena. The inability to provide this translation has cast doubt on the tenability of this position.

A more sophisticated form of materialism called identity theory is widely held today. At the heart of this view is the distinction between sense/significance and reference, or connotation and denotation. Mentalistic and physicalistic expressions have different senses or connotations, but will be shown as science advances to have the same physical referent or denotation, most likely states of the brain. An example that is similar from another area of knowledge is that “morning star” and “evening star” both refer to Venus. There is a de facto rather than a logical identity. There are at least two objections that make this theory unlikely. Physical events have location, but mental events seem to lack this. Moreover, if mental events are in fact reducible to physical events, then this seems to call into question the privileged position that a subject has with respect to his or her mental acts.

There is a monistic theory which attempts to reduce events in the direction of mind. It is called idealism. Bishop Berkeley held that only minds and their perceptions exist. Thus, to exist is either to be perceived or to be a perceiver. So-called physical objects exist only in the mind as constructions of perceptions. Because of its strongly counterintuitive claims, this position has never had many adherents.

Dualistic Theories. What unites dualistic theories is their emphasis on the fact that mentalistic and physicalistic statements differ not only in meaning but in reference.

Interactionism was given its classical formulation by Descartes. He held that there are two kinds of substances in the world, mental and corporeal. Mental events can sometimes cause physical events and vice versa. Man then is so constituted that events in one (e.g., fear) can cause events in the other (e.g., adrenalin in the blood). Two major objections have been repeatedly raised against interactionism. It is thought to violate the principle of the conservation of matter and energy. If interactionism were true, then physical energy would be lost in the production of mental events and gained when mental events caused physical changes. A second objection arises from the fact that mental and physical events are said to be so dissimilar. If this is so, how can there be any causal connection between them? Neither of these objections, however, has been taken to be decisive by a large group of thinkers.

A second dualistic theory of the mind-body relationship is occasionalism. This view grows out of the Cartesian distinction between mind and body and the insistence on their utter dissimilarity. Occasionalists go beyond Descartes in claiming that because of their similarity, there can be no natural causal connection. Therefore, they propose God as the intermediary link between mind and body. For example, one wills to move one’s arm, and that is the occasion for God to cause that one’s arm to move. There is no real causality, as God’s intervention is necessary for one ball to strike another: God becomes the one true cause. Because of this, occasionalism has never had many adherents.

Parallelism is the theory that mental and physical events are correlated in a regular way but without any causal relationship, direct or indirect. To understand how this might be possible Leibniz suggested two clocks with perfect mechanisms and possessing a preestablished harmony as a model. The major objection to this view is that it runs contrary to established empirical procedures. The harmony between the mind and body is said to be merely accidental. However, from observation in science it can be concluded that a high degree of correlation does not occur accidentally. Chance leads to randomness, not harmony.

An old but attractive dualistic theory is epiphenomenalism. Simply put, epiphenomenalism is the view that causality goes in only one direction, from body to mind. Mental events then are effects, never causes, of physical events. How is it that it sometimes appears that a mental event causes a physical change? That, it is argued, is an illusion.

Mind

The mind-body problem has implications for a biblical view of man. Traditionally Christian theologians have been dualistic at a minimum. Dichotomy, the view that man has a material and immaterial part, has been widely accepted. The chief alternative to dichotomy until recently has been trichotomy, which sees man as a tripartite: body, soul, and spirit.

More recently it has been popular to talk of a unitary view of man. Such discussions are characteristically ambiguous. It is not clear that unitary is synonymous with monistic. If it is, then there is the question as to what survives death and remains of the person between death and resurrection. A number of the advocates of this view accept annihilation. If, on the other hand, those who hold this view mean only that man functions as a unity (i.e., one cannot disassemble mind and body without destroying man), then mind and body may be different parts of a single whole.

P. D. FEINBERG

See also DICHOTOMY; MANKIND, DOCTRINE OF; TRICHOTOMY.

Bibliography. J. C. Eccles, ed., Brain and Conscious Experience; Facing Reality; S. L. Jaki, Brain, Mind, and Computers; D. M. MacKay, Brains, Machines and Persons; E. P. Polten, Critique of the Psycho-Physical Identity Theory; G. N. A. Yessey, ed., Body and Mind.

Minister. It is the consistent NT teaching that the work of ministers is “for the perfecting of the saints, . . . for the edifying of the body of Christ” (Eph. 4:12 KJV). The minister is called of God to a position of responsibility rather than privilege, as the words for “minister” show (diakonos, “table waiter”; hypēretēs, “under-rower” in a large ship; leitourgos, “servant,” usually of the state or a temple).

There are two passages in the NT which are of especial importance in this connection, 1 Corinthians 12:28 and Ephesians 4:11–12. From the former we gather that included in the ministries exercised in the early church were those of apostleship, prophecy, teaching, miraculous gifts of healings, helps, governments, diversities of tongues (possibly also interpretations, v. 30). The latter adds evangelists and pastors. In every case these appear to be the direct gift of God to the church. Both passages seem to say this, and this is confirmed elsewhere in the case of some of the people mentioned. Thus in Galatians 1:1 Paul insists that his apostolate was in no sense from man. He entirely excludes the possibility of his receiving it by ordination. We are to think, then, of a group of men directly inspired by the Holy Spirit to perform various functions within the church by way of building up the saints in the body of Christ.

But there are others also. Thus from early days the apostles made it a habit to appoint elders. Some hold that the seven of Acts 6 were the first elders. This seems very unlikely, but there were certainly elders at the Council of Jerusalem (Acts 15). It is very striking that even on their first missionary journey Paul and Barnabas appointed elders “in every church” (Acts 14:23). There is every reason for thinking that these men were ordained with the laying on of hands, as in the case of the elders of the Jewish synagogue. Then there were the deacons of whom we read in Philippians 1:1 and 1 Timothy 3:8–13. We know nothing of their method of appointment, but it is likely that it also included the laying on of hands, as it certainly did somewhat later in the history of the church.

It is sometimes said that the first group of ministers is opposed to the second in that they possessed a direct gift from God. This, however, cannot be sustained. In Acts 20:28 we read, “The Holy Spirit has made you overseers,” and in 1 Timothy 4:14, “Your gift . . . was given you through a prophetic message when the body of elders laid their hands on you.” It is clear that the act of ordination was not thought of as in opposition to a gift from God, but as itself the means of the gift from God. Indeed the only reason that a man might minister adequately was that God had given him the gift of ministering. The picture we get then is of a group of ministers who had been ordained, men like bishops and deacons, and side by side with them (at times no doubt the same people) those who had a special gift of God in the way of prophecy, apostleship, or the like. The meaning of some of those gifts has long since perished (e.g., prophecy, apostleship). But they witness to the gifts that God gave his church in the time of its infancy.

There are some who think of the ministry as constitutive of the church. They emphasize that Christ is the head of the body, and that he gives it apostles, prophets, etc., that it may be built up. They infer that the ministry is the channel through which life flows from the head. This does, however, seem to be reading something into the passage. It is better to take realistically the NT picture of the church as the body of Christ, as a body, moreover, with a diversity of functions. The life of Christ is in it, and the divine power puts forth whatever is needed. In the Spirit-filled body there will emerge such ministerial and other organs as are necessary. On this view the ministry is essential, but no more essential than any other function of the body. And it preserves the important truth that the body is that of Christ, who does what he wills within it.

His blessing is not confined to any particular channel.

L. L. MORRIS

See also CHURCH OFFICERS; MINISTRY; ORDAIN, ORDINATION.

Bibliography. M. Green, Called to Serve; R. P. C. Hanson, Christian Priesthood Examined; D. T. Jenkins, Gift of Ministry; K. E. Kirke, ed., Apostolic Ministry; J. B. Lightfoot, Commentary on Philippians; T. W. Manson, Church's Ministry; L. Morris, Ministers of God; S. Neil, ed., Ministry of the Church; J. K. S. Reid, Biblical Doctrine of the Ministry; A. Russell, Clerical Profession; E. Schweizer, Church Order in the New Testament; H. B. Swete, Early History of the Church and Ministry; M. Thurian, Priesthood and Ministry.

Ministry. The biblical concept of ministry is service rendered to God or to people. Ministry in the church had as its goal the edification of individuals with a view toward corporate maturity in Christ (Eph. 4:7–16).

The concept of ministry as service is seen in the words diakoneō (“serve”) and douleuō (“serve as a slave”) and their corresponding nouns. The word hypēretēs indicates one who gives willing service to another, e.g., servants of the “word” (Luke 1:2), of Christ (John 18:36; Acts 26:16; 1 Cor. 4:1), and of Paul and Barnabas (Acts 13:5).

The word leitourgia and its corresponding verb, leitourgeō, often refer to the priestly service of the Old Testament. They are used figuratively in the New Testament to indicate financial “ministry” (Rom. 15:27; 2 Cor. 9:12) and the pouring out of Paul’s life sacrificially in his ministry (Phil. 2:17). This terminology describes Christian service in general, but in the postapostolic period it is increasingly applied to the distinctive service of clergy as the Christian counterpart of the Old Testament Levitical ministers and priestly order. This is seen in 1 Clement and in the Apostolic Constitutions.

Types of ministry seen in Scripture include the service of priests and Levites in the Old Testament, of apostles, prophets, evangelists, and pastor-teachers in the New Testament, along with the general ministry of elders and the individual mutual ministries of all believers. The term “ministry” therefore refers to the work both of those commissioned to leadership and of the whole body of believers.

Ministry is the expression of God’s various gifts, natural and spiritual, to his people. In Ephesians 4:7–13 the gifted people are themselves gifts to the church. The source of verse 8, Psalm 68:18, seems connected with Numbers 8:5–19; 18:6 where the Levites are set apart and given to the priests for service. Since the whole church is a priesthood (1 Pet. 2:9), it may be said that in this analogy the church leaders in Ephesians 4 are humble servants of the priesthood, the whole people of God. This is an ongoing process, in which the “saints” are equipped for the work of ministry. Thus the leaders are not the only ministers, but facilitate the ministry of others, with the goal being spiritual and doctrinal maturity in Christ.

The ideals of ministry are portrayed in the servant-leadership of Christ. Acts 6:3 provides guidelines as to the spiritual qualities sought in leaders, and 1 Timothy 3:1–13 (cf. Titus 1:6–9) specifies the necessary qualities in greater detail.

There is a considerable difference of opinion regarding the historical development of ministry in the New Testament and in the early church. Many have seen a development from a simple charismatic ministry, exercised by every Christian in an individual way, to an organized or “official” ministry restricted to a few, ultimately issuing in the monarchical episcopate in the post-apostolic period. The Reformation reversed this trend to a degree. From time to time in the history of the church and again in recent times various groups have emphasized the charismatic aspect of ministry. Most recently, concepts of ministry have been modified by such diverse movements as the worker priests, the stress on lay leadership and ministries, the development of multiple church staffs, and the modern charismatic movement.

It is far from certain, however, that the New Testament church experienced a simple linear development from charismatic to institutional ministry, and even less plausible that there was an antithesis in the early church between these two forms of ministry. It is true that there is little indication in most of Paul’s letters of an institutional ministry, and that elders and deacons are mentioned mainly in the Pastorals. However, the mention in Philippians 1:1 of overseers and deacons accords with the picture in Acts 14:23 of Paul ordaining elders in every church. Also 1 Timothy 3:1–13 and Titus 1:6–9 concerning overseers and deacons stress their character and function, not their “office.” Further, the specific function exercised by elders, deacons, apostles, prophets, evangelists, and pastor-teachers is never set over against, or intended to eclipse, the mutual (“one another”) ministries of the individual Spirit-gifted believers (Rom. 12:3–8; 1 Cor. 12:1–31).

There are a number of additional issues surrounding the theology of ministry. These include (1) whether the New Testament ever described a prerequisite “call” to ministry other than the general commands of Christ and the recognition of the local church; (2) whether there is a sacramental aspect to ministry which is restricted to those ordained as priests by the church; (3) whether Paul’s practice of restricting the ministry of women was intended (given that it is not expressed as a command in 1 Tim. 2:12) as a permanent pattern; (4) whether lifestyle (e.g., homosexuality) or prior experiences such as divorce should preclude ministry; (5) whether there is a ministerial "office"; and (6) what the relationship is, if any, between ministry and authority.

Ministry

The concept of a dual view of ministry, i.e., that all believers were to exercise a ministry in accordance with their spiritual gift, but that authoritative teaching, leadership, and discipline were limited to a recognized body of elders—is commonly held in varying degrees and forms. Specifically the restriction of women is becoming more of a doctrinal issue. Yet in many churches, including post-Vatican II Catholicism, the trend is to find increasing opportunities for lay people to minister, even in areas formerly restricted to ordained clergy. In fact, some, recognizing that the common understanding of the terms "lay," "clergy," and "ordained" do not have New Testament precedent, now attempt to avoid these in describing ministry. Ministry, by whatever persons and in whatever form, is essentially a continuation of the servant ministry of the Lord Jesus Christ. In Protestant evangelicalism it is also largely a ministry of the Word of God. The purpose of ministry extends, of course, even beyond the edification of the church. It is, as in all Christian life and worship, for the glory of God.

W. L. LIEFELD

See also CHURCH OFFICERS; MINISTER; ORDAIN, ORDINATION.

Bibliography. P. Achtemeier, "Ministry of Jesus in the Synoptic Gospels," Int 35:157-69; R. Anderson, ed., Theological Foundations for Ministry; C. K. Barrett, Church, Ministry and Sacraments in the NT; W. J. Bausch, Ministry; P. Bernier, Ministry in the Church; H. W. Beyer, TDNT 2:81-93; K. Giles, Patterns of Ministry among the First Christians; R. A. Harrisville, Ministry in Crisis; E. B. Holifield, History of Pastoral Care in America; F. J. A. Hort, Christian Ecclesia; J. T. Lienhard, Ministry; J. B. Lightfoot, "Christian Ministry," in Saint Paul's Epistle to the Philippians; T. M. Lindsay, Church and the Ministry in the Early Centuries; T. W. Manson, Church's Ministry; H. R. Niebuhr, Purpose of the Church and Its Ministry; H. R. Niebuhr and D. D. Williams, Ministry in Historical Perspectives; T. F. O'Meara, Theology of Ministry; K. B. Osborne, Ministry: Lay Ministry in the Roman Catholic Church; J. K. S. Reid, Biblical Doctrine of the Ministry; E. Schillebeeckx, Ministry; D. S. Schuller et al., eds., Ministry in America; E. Schweizer, Church Order in the New Testament; E. Sheip and A. Sunderlands, eds., Biblical Basis for Ministry; H. Strathmann, TDNT 4:215-31; H. B. Swete, ed., Essays on the Early History of the Church and the Ministry; H. von Campenhausen, Ecclesiastical Authority and Spiritual Power.

Minor Orders. Those orders of ministry below the major orders in the Roman and Orthodox churches. In the former, subdeacons were usually reckoned as a minor order until they were officially classed as a major order in 1207. The minor orders since then are acolytes, exorcists, readers or lectors, and doorkeepers or porters. In the Eastern church acolytes, exorcists, and doorkeepers have been merged with the subdiaconate, but readers and cantors remain. The functions of the acolyte were lighting the candles, carrying them in procession, preparing the water and wine for the Holy Communion, and generally assisting the higher orders. The exorcist originally was concerned with casting out demons. Later he looked after the catechumens. The reader, or lector, as his name denotes, read from the Scriptures. The doorkeeper, or porter, originally had the duty of excluding unauthorized persons.

Nowadays practically nothing of the functions of any of the minor orders survives. They are little more than a steppingstone to the higher orders and are all conferred at the one time. They are conferred usually by the bishop (though others on occasion may do so). There is no laying on of hands, but some symbol of office is delivered—e.g., a candlestick for the acolyte, a key for the doorkeeper.

L. L. MORRIS

See also CHURCH OFFICERS; MAJOR ORDERS.

Miracle. It is sometimes claimed that the culture of the late twentieth century is "post-Christian." Those who put forward this claim point out that while the presuppositions and concepts of the historic Christian faith remain intelligible to modern man, they are no longer foundational to our worldview. They claim that man has now "come of age," that we now have a scientific and empirical worldview that is obviously linked up with reality and which cannot take miracles seriously. In fact, this perspective finds the biblical emphasis on miracles to be somewhat offensive.

It is clear that orthodox Christians cannot accept this worldview with its suspicion of miracles. Belief in miracles lies at the heart of authentic Christian faith. Without the miracle of the first Easter, Christianity would no doubt long since have passed from the scene, and would certainly not be around to offend the "modern" man.

It should be equally clear, however, that this worldview is a part of the cultural milieu in which modern Christians find themselves. Understanding the role of miracles in the genesis and spread of our faith is therefore an imperative for today's Christian.

Unlike the modern world, the ancient world was not suspicious of miracles. They were regarded as a normal, if somewhat extraordinary, part of life. Ancient people typically believed not only that supernatural powers existed, but also that they intervened in human affairs. Miracles, then, did not present a problem to the early Christians as they attempted to explain and relate their faith to the culture around them.

In understanding miracles it is important to bear in mind that the biblical concept of a miracle is that of an event which runs counter to the observed processes of nature. The word "observed" is particularly important here. This was emphasized as early as Augustine, who stated in his City of God that Christians must not teach that miracles are events which run counter to nature, but rather that they are events which run counter to what is known of nature. Our knowledge of nature is a limited knowledge. Clearly there may be higher laws which remain unknown to man. In any case, miracles are not correctly conceived of as irrational disruptions of the pattern of nature, but only as disruptions of the known part of that pattern. This understanding of the biblical conception may well erode some of contemporary man's objections to miracles. It is purely a corrective to the erroneous view that miracles are complete violations of nature.

Biblical miracles have a clear objective: they are intended to bring the glory and love of God into bold relief. They are intended, among other things, to draw man's attention away from the mundane events of everyday life and direct it toward the mighty acts of God.

In the context of the OT, miracles are viewed as the direct intervention of God in human affairs, and they are unquestionably linked to his redemptive activity on behalf of man. They help to demonstrate that biblical religion is not concerned with abstract theories about God's power, but with actual historical manifestations and experiences of that power. The most significant miracle of the OT is God's action on behalf of the Hebrews in opening up the Red Sea as they escaped the Egyptians. This miracle is the centerpiece of Hebrew history and of OT religion. It is a demonstration of God's power and love in action. And this action became the theme of much of the Hebrew religion and literature which came after it. It was the Hebrew view that man does not know the being of God so much as he knows the acts of God. God is therefore known as he acts on man's behalf, and the miracle at the Red Sea is the paradigm of God's acting.

This emphasis on miracles as the redemptive activity of God is continued in the NT, where they are a part of the proclamation of the good news that God has acted ultimately on man's behalf in the coming of Jesus Christ into history. Miracles are a manifestation of the power that God will use to restore all of creation to its proper order, to restore the image of God in man to its full expression, and to destroy death. Again we see the theme of biblical religion as centered not on theory but on action.

The central miracle of the NT, indeed of the Judeo-Christian Scriptures, is the resurrection of Christ. Every book in the NT canon either proclaims or assumes the resurrection of Christ on the third day after his crucifixion. It is discussed thoroughly in each Gospel and is declared by Paul in 1 Corinthians 15 to be the keystone of Christian faith. The reference to it in 1 Corinthians is much earlier (in date) than those of the Gospels.

When the ancient acceptance of miracles is considered along with the wholly depressing circumstances surrounding the ending of Jesus' mission on the first Good Friday, it can be seen that the best evidence for the resurrection is the existence, energy, and growth of the early church itself. After the crucifixion the apostles were utterly defeated persons, and their movement was sputtering to a humiliating stop. After watching Jesus die as a criminal, they were completely without hope. Yet within a few weeks these same men were boldly proclaiming Christ's resurrection to the very people who had brought about the condemnation of Christ. They were preaching to any and to all that Jesus was the risen Lord. And these apostles were normal, rational, sane men. Individually and corporately they had undergone a dramatic change after the crucifixion—from depressed, insecure, and despairing men to confident and bold preachers. Surely it is reasonable, on almost any criterion of reasonableness, to consider that witnessing the risen Christ was what brought about this dramatic change. It should also be noted that one of the earliest acts of Christian worship was the breaking of bread, with its attendant symbolism of Christ's broken body. This phenomenon would be unexplainable without the knowledge of the risen Christ—unless, that is, one wishes to dismiss the early apostles as irrational masochists, which they clearly were not.

It should be clear then that the central miracle of NT religion is the resurrection of Christ. Without this miracle the early church would not have come into being, and we who live two thousand years later would no doubt never have heard of the other NT miracles. Indeed, we would probably never have heard of Jesus of Nazareth, who would have been forgotten along with hundreds of other obscure preachers and miracle workers who wandered about the ancient Middle East.

The Gospels teach that the significance of all the miracles of Christ is that they are the prophesied works of the Messiah. The miracles are signs rather than merely wonderful works. They are, however, signs only to those who have the spiritual discernment to recognize them as such. Without the enlightenment that accompanies Christian commitment they are only "wonders," or wonderful works, and their true theological significance cannot be recognized.

Belief in the biblical miracles has always been a central feature of Christian faith. Christian faith is informed by the revelation of God to man in Scripture and in the mighty acts recorded there. Christian faith is not to be conformed to the culture around it but is intended to be a transforming influence in the midst of its cultural milieu. The continuing work of the church in the world may itself be viewed as evidence for the truth of the biblical concept of miracle. Certainly the Christian's experience of God as Redeemer and Sustainer is the experience of miracle. It renders the posture of skepticism untenable.

Miracle

J. D. SPICELAND

Bibliography. H. S. Box, Miracles and Critics; C. Brown, Miracles and the Modern Mind; That You May Believe: Miracles and Faith—Then and Now; R. M. Burns, Great Debate on Miracles; D. Connelly, Miracles: What the Bible Says; H. H. Farmer, Are Miracles Possible?; N. Geisler, Miracles and Modern Thought; A. C. Headlam, Miracles of the New Testament; H. C. Kee, Miracle in the Early Christian World; E. M. L. Keller, Miracles in Dispute; R. Lee, Miracles Still Happen; C. S. Lewis, Miracles; H. Lockyer, All the Miracles of the Bible; C. F. D. Moule, Miracles; J. B. Mozley, Eight Lectures on Miracles; R. Swinburne, Concept of Miracle; B. B. Warfield, Counterfeit Miracles; J. Wimber, Power Evangelism.

Miracles, Gift of. See SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

Missiology. A term generally referring to the formal academic study of all aspects of the missionary enterprise. Inherent in the discipline is the study of the nature of God, the created world, and the church, as well as the interaction among these three. To study that interaction, it is necessary to combine insights from the disciplines of biblical studies, theology, and the social sciences. Being identified with the missionary task, however, missiology must go beyond each of these disciplines to engage not only in understanding but in effecting change as part of the missionary endeavor.

The foundations for missiology are the biblical and theological roots. This, however, does not reduce missiology to a subset of theology. Rather, it merely shows the necessity of theological foundations for the discipline. The human contexts of missionary work, including the social, historical, and religious settings, provide the ever-changing structure. Understanding this structure requires deep engagement in the social sciences, including but not limited to anthropology, communication, economics, education, history, linguistics, political science, psychology, and sociology. Because of the ever changing nature of human contexts and missiology's ongoing involvement in those contexts, Bosch is right in stating, "There is no such thing as missiology, period. There is only missiology in draft" (Transforming Mission, 498).

Historical Considerations. While mission activity and thinking have been part of the church since its inception, formal study of missiology did not emerge until the middle ages. The earliest known efforts include more than three hundred works by Raymond Lull (ca. 1235–1315) and his development of a missionary training school at Majorca in 1276. Other Catholic protomissiologists include José de Acosta (1540–1600), a Jesuit author who was a missionary to Peru and Mexico, Thomas à Jesu (1564–1627), a brilliant Carmelite, who wrote On Procuring the Salvation of All Men (1613); and Lorenzo Brancati (1612–93), a Franciscan who developed a systematic work on the spread of the faith. Catholic missiological reflection, after this promising beginning, slowed significantly during the eighteenth century.

On the Protestant side, it was the Dutch who provided the early stimuli. Hadrianus Savaria (1531–1613) proposed an apostolic type of ordination for missionaries entering service. In 1618 Justus Heurnius (1587–1651) published a treatise warning the Dutch East India Trading Company of the dangers of pursuing riches while neglecting the gospel. Shortly thereafter, at the request of the Company, a missions seminary curriculum was developed at the University of Leiden. The Company allowed the school to operate for only twelve years; the graduates were apparently too well trained to silently comply with Company policy!

Gisbert Voetius (1589–1676), professor at Utrecht and a student of Catholic mission writing, provided the first systematization of Protestant mission theology. Johannes Hoornbeeck (1617–66), Voetius's student, argued that the church needed to be training and sending out missionaries, citing Catholic examples. The great Moravian missionary thrust arose in part as a result of the influence of these early Dutch thinkers.

In the eighteenth century, among the many important precursors of contemporary missiologists were August H. Francke (1663–1727), evangelist-theologian Jonathan Edwards (1703–58), mission entrepreneur William Carey (1761–1834), and theologian Friedrich D. Schleiermacher (1768–1834). Franke established a missions curriculum at the University of Halle in the early 1700s. Edwards's revival preaching and theological works, in which he brilliantly investigated conversion and revival, provided important foundations for the discipline. Carey's Inquiry into the Obligations of Christians to Use Means for the Conversion of the Heathen (1792) refuted the Reformers' position that the Great Commission was only for the apostles and proposed the establishment of mission societies. Schleiermacher proposed integrating mission study into the discipline of practical theology, which offered a niche within the theological academic curriculum.

In the United States, Samuel Mills's (1783–1818) tireless efforts promoting both missions and missionary associations such as the Society of Inquiry on the Subject of Missions (founded in 1811) provided an important foundation for the acceptance of missiology. Princeton University appointed Charles Breckenridge to the position of Professor of Practical Theology and Missionary Instruction in 1836, the first such position in the world (though it lasted only until 1839). That mission was attached to practical theology demonstrates the influence of Schleiermacher's earlier proposal.

In continental scholarly circles it was Karl Graul (1814–64) who vigorously sought to establish a place for the formal study of mission as an accepted academic discipline. Graul died before his goal was accomplished. Only three years after his death came the appointment of Alexander Duff (1806–78), who returned from India to accept the position of chair of evangelistic theology at New College in Edinburgh in 1867. This was the first full appointment exclusively in mission studies ever established. In Germany, Carl H. Plath (1829–1901) worked hard to establish missiological appointments in universities. However, it was Gustav Warneck (1834–1910), the Protestant “father of missiology,” who established missiology as an accepted academic discipline. This was formalized in his appointment to the first full professorship of missiology at the University of Halle beginning in 1896. Among the many accomplishments of Warneck the work that stands out is his multi-volume Evangelische Missionslehre (subtitled “An Attempt at a Theory of Missions”). In Germany missiology was further enhanced when Deutsche Gesellschaft für Missionswissenschaft (German Society for Missiology) was organized in 1918.

On the English speaking side, missionary statesmen and promoters Henry Venn (1796–1873), Rufus Anderson (1796–1880), and Roland Allen (1868–1947) wielded great influence. Venn and Anderson independently developed the theoretical foundation for indigenous church development known as the three-self formula, in which they advocated that churches be self-propagating, self-governing, and self-supporting. Their model and its variations continue to significantly influence contemporary missiology. Allen's Missionary Methods: St. Paul's or Ours (1912) is still used today in mission classes in North America.

Catholic missiological efforts were restimulated during the nineteenth century at least in part due to the surge of Protestant mission work. The controversial Johann B. Hirscher (1788–1865) was the first Catholic to integrate mission within practical theology. Robert Streit (1875–1930) laid the foundation for the systematic study of mission by initiating Bibliotheca Missionum, a bibliographic journal of mission-related writings. He was also influential in Joseph Schmidlin's (1876–1944) appointment in 1910 as professor of mission science at Münster. Schmidlin's impact came through his career of writing, lecturing, and establishing missiological journals, research institutes, and organizations. Though he is appropriately accorded the title of “father and founder of Catholic missiology,” his life and work were largely influenced by Warneck.

In American Protestant circles, the Student Volunteer Movement, begun in 1886, exercised great influence. Though largely a pragmatic venture, it produced not only many scholars who worked in missiological circles but also was part of the seedbed of the whole ecumenical movement through which twentieth-century missiology has been so heavily influenced. As a result of the pressure of these and other student movements, lectureships were founded and positions in mission and missiology were established. In contrast to the Europeans, Americans were pragmatic, focusing on training and promoting mission more than on developing an academic discipline. This ethos continues in American missiology and is seen, for example, in the contemporary emphasis on planning and management, the numerous strategies for world evangelization, and the focus on developing tools to facilitate the accomplishment of objectives.

By 1910 and the Edinburgh World Missionary Conference, only three full mission professorships existed. As a result of the work at Edinburgh and the influence of the International Missionary Council (organized in 1921), that number increased steadily over the century. The Kennedy School of Missions at Hartford was founded in 1911, the International Review of Missions (IRM; the “s” was dropped from “Missions” in 1969) started publication in 1912, and Union Theological Seminary (New York) began a mission department in 1914, the same year Princeton added a mission chair. Since the early 1940s, other professional associations of missiology have been formed, including the Fellowship of Professors of Mission (launched from a series of discussions around 1917 and constituted in 1940), the American Professors of Mission (1952), the Association of Evangelical Professors of Mission (AEPM; formed in 1967), the International Association for Mission Studies (1972), the American Society of Missiology (ASM; 1973), and the Evangelical Missiological Society (1991; formed out of the AEPM). Important contemporary American Protestant missiological journals in addition to IRM include Evangelical Missions Quarterly (1964); Missiology (1973; incorporating Practical Anthropology, started in 1954), International Bulletin of Missionary Research (1977; started as Occasional Bulletin of Missionary Research in 1950), and International Journal of Frontier Missions (1984).

Catholic missiologist Louis Luzbetak declared that the discipline “came of age” in 1975 when the ASM was admitted into the Council on the Study of Religion. Since then there have been major educational developments, especially in evangelical institutions. One recent directory lists over 200 North American institutions offering more than 1250 mission courses, further evidence that missiology is now established as a full academic discipline.

Concerns within Missiology. Missiology has three central concerns: the identity or nature of mission, the goal of mission, and the means or method of mission. Each of these will be examined briefly.

The Nature of Mission. In this century, missiologists have engaged deeply in debate over the nature of mission, including both the what and the why. At least until the late nineteenth century, even though North American missiology was more pragmatic and European missiology more theological and philosophical, both shared a common view of the nature of the mission of the church as the task which the Church was uniquely called and fitted to do: reaching those who had not heard of Christ with the good news. This was certainly not limited to preaching the gospel, as the innumerable mission-founded hospitals, schools, and clinics still functioning in much of the world testify.

From the late 1800s on, however, the rise in theological liberalism, the early world missions conferences and the resulting ecumenical movement, two world wars fought largely among “Christian” nations, and the death of political colonialism provided overwhelming impetus for a continual examination of missionary assumptions and paradigms. Space allows the presentation of only five of the more significant developments which arose within the ecumenical movement. Their impact on evangelical missiology will also be noted.

First, the demise of colonialism exposed the implicit assumption that the direction of missions was only from the West to the rest of the world. The concept of the “white man’s burden” was rejected, and the missionary enterprise was acknowledged as both to and from all six continents. Partnership and globalism came to the forefront as new ways to view the mission task.

Second, mission was no longer seen as being limited to what the church is doing. Rather, mission was what God was doing in the world both through and outside of the church to communicate salvation. In 1934 Karl Hartenstein coined the term missio Dei to express this, though it did not gain general acceptance until the World Council of Churches’ 1952 Willingen Missionary Conference.

Third, focus shifted from the work of Christ on the cross to the incarnation as the starting point for mission. For some ecumenicals, a combination of universalism and rejection of the biblical teaching on Hell required a new focus for missionary engagement, and the incarnation became that focus. With the doctrine of the virgin birth problematic, it was the attitude of the theological concept of the incarnation that was more important than the historical reality. That God became as one of us was the new foundation which replaced the outmoded idea of the need for a savior from sin and Hell.

Fourth, advocacy of a “missiology from below” was articulated. Built on the theological assertion of the preferential treatment of the poor by God, mission was to no longer be seen “from above,” whether that be God looking down on the world, the West looking out at the rest, or the saved looking at the lost. Rather, the view of the oppressed was to be the starting point for mission reflection.

Fifth, and most recently, pluralistic and post-modernist challenges to the uniqueness of Christ and the Christian message have had an ever deepening impact on missiology and mission. Even though pluralism in its most radical post-modern expressions has the potential to bring the demise of the entire missionary enterprise, voices of its advocates are becoming increasingly popular in conciliar circles. The impact of this trend on the nature and scope of ecumenical missiology deserves close scrutiny in the coming decades.

How have these developments affected evangelical missiology? Generally evangelicals still hold to the integrating core of reaching the lost for Christ. At the same time, the shifts in the broader missiological discussion have impacted evangelical thinking. Biting critiques of ongoing Western neo-colonial attitudes, the emergence of significant non-Western evangelical missiologists such as Kwame Bediako, Bong Ro, and Samuel Escobar, and the rise of a huge missionary movement from the non-Western nations have contributed to an acknowledgment that we are indeed in an era of “mission on six continents.”

Missio Dei is a term used in evangelical circles, though not as broadly as in ecumenical discussion and without the loss in focus on the church as the means God has established for missionary work. Evangelicals have also recognized the validity of the incarnation as a paradigm for mission. While we cannot lose our emphasis on the work on the cross at the heart of mission without losing our evangelical distinctiveness, there is also a need to integrate within mission the necessity of an incarnational lifestyle and attitude.

Though debate continues over the theological validity of a preferential option for the poor, evangelicals working among the marginalized have championed seeing mission from the perspective of the downtrodden. In a parallel discussion, recent evangelical debate has also focused on the relationship between social concern or action (often called the cultural mandate) and evangelism. While some define mission as evangelism and distinguish it from the cultural mandate, others maintain that mission involves their inextricable intertwining. There is also debate over the meaning and extent of the cultural mandate, which is reflected in the variety of evangelical perspectives on ecology and the environment, relief and developmental work, social justice issues, and the necessity for and means of accomplishing change in unjust social structures.

Finally, there has been increasing leaning towards inclusivistic pluralism even in evangelical circles. Multiculturalism as a whole has rightly exposed our implicit ethnocentrism and other biases. However, to move to a full-blown religious pluralism is to lose any uniqueness we have as a faith. Such a move is an unacceptable compromise of the clear biblical teachings of Christ, let alone established evangelical distinctives. It is this trend that will probably generate the most significant debates among evangelical missiologists for the foreseeable future. At stake is the very heart of the meaning and practice of the mission enterprise.

The Goal of Mission. The fact that mission has a goal reminds us that the discipline of missiology can never be an end-in-itself. It will always have the purpose of not only understanding mission but of undergirding the missionary task. In light of the debate over the nature of mission, it is understandable that proposals for the goal of mission vary widely. For many within ecumenical churches the goal is the promotion of justice and freedom in human societies and institutions. Recently evangelical mission agencies have been promoting the planting of a church movement among every people group as the goal. Others promote holistic approaches which see church planting as only part of the picture of enabling people to live humanely in their social settings.

Whatever the ultimate answer to this question, we do well to remember John Piper's admonition that mission was from the beginning intended to be only a temporary activity. It naturally follows that missiology is only a temporary discipline. When worship of God in Christ is complete, then the need for mission and missiology will be gone.

The Method of Mission. This third concern of missiology especially engages the study of people in their social, historic, and religious contexts. The method of mission, of course, will depend on the nature and goal of mission. For example, if the nature of mission is missio Dei, and the goal of mission is just human societies, then the method for mission will revolve around historic, economic, social, and political agendas. Alternatively, if the nature of mission is to celebrate Jesus as only one of the many possible ways to God, then the method will be dialogue in which the goal is to simply learn how to celebrate differences, and evangelism will either be redefined or discarded altogether.

If, however, as evangelical missiology continues to maintain, the nature of mission is the human responsibility to serve as ambassadors of Christ in communicating the message he commissioned to the church, then we will seek to discover appropriate means of entering new cultures, sensitively and competently communicating the good news and meeting the needs of the whole person. This is to be done without surrendering to a pragmatism that only evaluates methodologies in light of their success. Rather, they must be examined in light of their fidelity to the appropriate principles found in Scripture.

Finally, missiology should not only study the method; as an intentional discipline it must actively lead to engagement in the missionary task. While for some this assertion will too closely echo North American pragmatism, missiology that does not lead to engagement in mission does not distinguish itself as a discipline separate from a simple conglomeration of theology, biblical studies, history, and social sciences. Understanding the task must lead to engagement in the task, or missiology loses its distinctive nature as a discipline.

Conclusion. As Bosch noted, missiology inherently involves the crossing of frontiers, the entrance (or, as the case may be, the reintroduction) and establishment of the truth of the good news among the peoples created by God. The church is essentially a missionary enterprise of God, and every member of the church is to be engaged in that enterprise. Therefore, until all have been given the opportunity to worship God in spirit and truth, missiology cannot be relegated to the fringe or be seen as having relevance only to cross-cultural Christian workers. Rather, it is a critical discipline for all Christians in all cultures at all times.

A. S. MOREAU

Bibliography. D. J. Bosch, Transforming Mission: Paradigm Shifts in Theology of Mission; R. E. Hedlund, Mission of the Church in the World; W. R. Hogg, "Teaching of Missiology," Missiology 15:487-506; H. Kasdorf, "Missiology as a Discipline in Historical Perspective," in Reflection and Projection: Missiology at the Threshold of 2001, H. Kasdorf and K. W. Müller, eds.; K. S. LaTroutte, History of the Expansion of Christianity; O. G. Myklebust, Study of Missions in Theological Education; New Catholic Encyclopedia; S. Neill, History of Christian Missions; E. C. Pentecost, Issues in Missiology: An Introduction; J. Piper, Let the Nations Be Glad; J. A. Scherer, "Missiology as a Discipline and What it Includes," Missiology 15:507-22; A. Tippett, Introduction to Missiology; C. Van Engen, Mission on the Way: Issues in Mission Theology; J. Verkuyl, Contemporary Missiology: An Introduction; F. J. Verstraelen, A. Camps, L. A.

Missiology

Hoedemaker, and M. R. Spindler, eds., Missiology: An Ecumenical Introduction.

Modalism. See MONARCHIANISM.

Moderator. See CHURCH OFFICERS.

Modernism. See LIBERALISM, THEOLOGICAL.

Modernism, Catholic. See CATHOLICISM, LIBERAL.

Molinos, Miguel de. See QUIETISM.

Moltmann, Jürgen (b. 1926). Born in Hamburg, Germany, and pressed into the army in 1944, Moltmann spent three years as an internee in British prison camps, an experience which shattered his nominal Christian upbringing. However, reading a New Testament with appended Psalter led to a gradual renewal and deepening of his faith, as through its pages Moltmann sensed the reality of God in the midst of suffering. After returning to Germany in 1948, he studied theology at Göttingen, where he came under the influence of Karl Barth's theology. Since 1967 Moltmann has been professor of systematic theology at Tübingen.

In that same year Moltmann's first, and perhaps most influential work, Theology of Hope, appeared in English. He followed this up with two complementary volumes: Crucified God (1974) and Church in the Power of the Spirit (1977). This trilogy seeks to reexamine theology from a radically eschatological perspective. Moltmann rejects the classical theological propositions of divine impassability and immutability in favor of what he sees as a more biblical understanding of God as revealed in an "apocalypse of the promised future." The crucifixion and the resurrection form the core dialectic of this promised future. On the cross God enters into human suffering, sin, and death not only in the experience of the Son, the crucified one, but also in that of the Father, who suffers in giving the Beloved over to the cross. The resurrection brings the promise of a new creation, giving meaning to human suffering, hope for God's final triumph over evil in the future, and impetus for Christian involvement in overcoming suffering in the meantime, through the power of the Spirit. Ecological concerns have moved to the forefront of his most recent theological writings.

Moltmann's theology has been a seminal influence upon the development of liberation theologies since he allows for revolution to be an eschatological event in which the divine future hope becomes realized in the present through a radical reorientation of society. As a result, Moltmann's thought can be characterized as Marxism with a religious soul, leaving many Marxists with doubts about its religious core and many Christians with questions about its optimistic view of human nature in revolution, especially in light of the basic human propensity toward evil experienced by Moltmann himself in World War II and by Jesus in the crucifixion. D. A. CURRIE

See also BARTH, KARL; HOPE, THEOLOGY OF.

Bibliography. J. Moltmann, God in Creation; Spirit of Life; Trinity and the Kingdom of God; Way of Jesus Christ; R. Bauckham, Moltmann: Messianic Theology in the Making; M. Bauman, Roundtable: Conversations with European Theologians; A. J. Conyers, God, Hope, and History: Jürgen Moltmann and the Christian Concept of History; M. D. Meeks, Origins of the Theology of Hope; C. Morse, HCT 660-76; Logic of Promise in Moltmann's Theology.

Monarchianism. In its most general sense monarchianism (also called patripassianism or Sabellianism) refers to the primarily Western attempts in the third century to defend monotheism against suspected tritheism by denying the personal distinctiveness of a divine Son and Holy Spirit in contrast to God the Father. The term is first used by Tertullian to describe those who desired to protect the monarchy (of the one God) from improper thoughts about the economy (of the three: the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit). There were two forms of monarchianism, which were not only distinctly independent but even opposed to each other.

Dynamic, or adoptionistic, monarchianism proposed a monotheism of God the Father in relation to which Jesus was viewed as a mere man who was endowed with the Holy Spirit. This view was first put forward in Rome about 190 by Theodotus of Byzantium and continued by his successor, Artemon (also called Theodotus), who tried to argue that this teaching was the heir of the apostolic tradition. Artemon was refuted by Hippolytus, who condemned the teaching as an innovative attempt to rationalize the Scripture according to the systems of Hellenic logic (most likely that taught by the physician and philosopher Galen).

Although there has been some disagreement on exactly how to classify him, it seems most likely that Paul of Samosata held to a more advanced form of this dynamic monarchianism. He depersonalized the Logos as simply the inherent rationality of God, which led him to formulate a doctrine of the homoousia of the Logos and the Father that necessarily denied the personal subsistence of the preincarnate Word. It was for this reason that both his teaching as a whole and the use of the word homoousia were condemned by the Synod of Antioch in 268. Also in working out the consistency of the dynamic monarchian position, Paul taught that the Holy Spirit was not a distant personal entity but simply a manifestation of the grace of the Father.

Although in basic agreement with dynamic monarchianism on the foundational issue of limiting the term theos to the person of the Father alone, modalistic monarchianism, also known simply as modalism, nevertheless attempted to speak of the full deity of the Son. The earlier modalists (operating between the second and third centuries), such as Noetus, Epigonus, and Praxeas, achieved this objective by identifying the Son as the Father himself. This led to the charge of patripassianism, which became another label for modalism. Patripassianism is the teaching that it was the Father who became incarnate, was born of a virgin, and who suffered and died on the cross. Praxeas attempted to soften this charge by making a distinction between the Christ, who is the Father, and the Son, who was simply a man. In this way the Father co-suffers with the human Jesus.

A more sophisticated form of modalism was taught by Sabellius in Rome early in the third century and was given the name Sabellianism. Although much of his teaching has been confused historically with that of Marcellus of An-cyrca (fourth century), some elements can be reconstructed. It seems that Sabellius taught the existence of a divine monad (which he named Huiopator), which by a process of expansion projected itself successively in revelation as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. As Father it revealed itself as Creator and Lawgiver. As Son it revealed itself as Redeemer. As Spirit it revealed itself as the giver of grace. These were three different modes revealing the same divine person. Sabellius, as well as the modalists preceding him, shared the same view of the Logos as that of Paul of Samosata. This, along with the fact that modalism was much more popular than dynamic monarchianism (so much so that it alone is sometimes simply called monarchianism), is perhaps why Paul is classified by later patristic writers as a modalist.

C. BLAISING

See also ANTIOCHENE THEOLOGY; HOMOIOUSIOS; PAUL OF SAMOSATA.

Bibliography. J. F. Bethune-Baker, Introduction to the Early History of Christian Doctrine; Eusebius, Church History; Hippolytus, Contra Noetum; J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines; J. L. Neve, History of Christian Thought; G. L. Prestige, God in Patristic Thought; R. Seeberg, Textbook of the History of Doctrines; Tertullian, Against Praxeas.

Monasticism. The origins of early Christian monasticism may be found in Jewish tradition, in the Christian Gospels, and in the conditions of Christian life in the late Roman Empire. Monastics drew their spiritual strength from Christ's emphasis on poverty (Mark 10:21) and on the "narrow way" (Matt. 7:14) to salvation. Many early Christians embraced celibacy under the influence of Paul's teachings (1 Cor. 7:8). The first nuns were probably Roman widows unwilling to contract second marriages.

The first monks of whom we have a good record represent an extreme phase in the evolution of monasticism. These are the so-called desert fathers, hermits, living in the eremitical style in the deserts of Egypt, Syria, and Palestine. In part, they wished to follow the Jewish tradition of withdrawal, fasting, and prayer that was exemplified in the sojourns of Jesus and John the Baptist in the wilderness. Often, enraged by sin and fearful of damnation, these "desert fathers" left the towns for solitary struggles against temptation. Some, like Simeon Stylites, lived very exotic lives and became tourist attractions. More typical, however, was Anthony of Egypt (ca. 250–356), whose commitment to salvation led him back to the towns to evangelize unbelievers. His extreme asceticism deeply touched the sensibilities of the age.

The word "monk" is derived from a Greek word meaning "alone." The question for the desert fathers was one of lonely, individual struggle against the devil as opposed to receiving the support that came from living in some sort of community. Pachomius (ca. 290–346), an Egyptian monk, preferred the latter. He wrote a rule of life for monks in which he emphasized organization and the rule of elder monks over the newly professed. The rule became popular, and the movement toward communal life was ensured. To the idea of community, Basil the Great (ca. 330–79) added another element. In his writings, and especially in his commentaries on the Scriptures, this father of Eastern monasticism defined a theory of Christian humanism which he felt was binding on the monasteries. According to Basil, monastics were bound to consider their duty to the whole of Christian society. They should care for orphans, feed the poor, maintain hospitals, educate children, even provide work for the unemployed.

During the fourth through the sixth centuries monasticism spread throughout the Christian world. From Asia Minor to Britain its idea flourished. However, the Celtic monks tended to follow the old eremitical tradition, whereas Latin monasticism, under the Great Rule of Benedict of Nursia (ca. 480–547), codified itself into a permanent, organized communal form. To the original vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience to Christ, the Benedictines added stability. Monks could no longer drift about from monastery to monastery but were bound to one for life. The essence of Benedict's rule is its sensible approach to Christian living. It forbade excess and provided practical advice for every aspect of monastic life. It gave an elaborate description of the role of each person in the community, from the abbot, who represented Christ in the Community, to the lowliest postulant. For this reason the Benedictine Rule became the standard in Western Europe. Because of their devotion to the rule, monks came to be known as the “regular” orders, from the Latin regula, “rule.”

Monasticism

The great work of the monasteries of the Middle Ages was the Opus Dei, the work of God, prayer and praise to the Almighty throughout the day and night. This “work” was organized into the offices of the monastic day. These varied somewhat according to place and season, but generally, vigils, lauds, terce, sext, vespers, and compline were chanted throughout Christendom. In addition, monks and nuns performed physical labor, provided charitable services, and kept learning alive. They studied and copied the Scriptures and the writings of the church fathers as well as classical philosophy and literature. They were leaders in the Carolingian Renaissance, during which time (eighth to ninth centuries) writing was reformed and the liberal arts defined. In monastic hands writing became an art. The monasteries had a monopoly on education until the evolution of the cathedral school and the university in the High Middle Ages.

Early medieval monasticism may have reached its height in the foundation of the abbey of Cluny in Burgundy in the tenth century. Cluny set a new standard of liturgical splendor. It also established its freedom from the feudal order by placing itself and its dependencies under the direct authority of the papacy. Cluny and its “daughters” (houses which it founded and disciplined) exercised enormous spiritual authority in the eleventh century and were the vehicle for a substantial reform of the Benedictines.

By 1100 monasticism was on the defensive. It was no longer clear that monastic service to God and society was commensurate with the praise and gifts which society had lavished on the monasteries. Great donations of land and other forms of wealth made some monks rich at a time when other medieval institutions were assuming societal duties formerly the responsibility of the monasteries. The popularity of the monasteries attracted less than devout postulants, and the aristocracy used the great houses as a repository for spinster daughters and younger sons.

Yet even as monasticism approached its crisis, new reformed orders appeared. The Cistercians, under their most influential leader Bernard of Clairvaux (d. 1153), sought a new life of evangelical purity. They confined membership to adults, simplified services, abandoned all feudal obligations, and tried to restore the contemplative life. The Carthusians tried to recapture the old eremitical spirit of the desert fathers. They retreated from society and became an important feature of the medieval frontier, cutting down forests and opening new ground for agriculture. Their role in the evolution of sheep farming and the wool industry was invaluable.

Perhaps the last great revival of monastic spirit came in the autumn of the Middle Ages with the appearance of the mendicant orders. The Dominicans and Franciscans captured the collective imagination of a society in crisis. Francis of Assisi (d. 1226) represented the perfection of both monastic and Christian idealism in his effort to imitate the life of Christ in all its purity and simplicity. By taking the apostolic ideal outside the monastery, Francis gave it one last flowering in the culture which had given it birth.

In modern history, monasticism suffered a substantial diminution at the time of the Protestant Reformation. Generally, the leaders of the Reformation believed that monastics did not in fact conform to a simple gospel rule of life, that their repetitive prayers, fasts, and ceremonies were meaningless, and that they had no real value to society. In Protestant thought, the pious family tended to replace the monastery as the ideal style of Christian life. Wherever the Reformation was triumphant, the monasteries were disestablished. However, there was also a revival of Roman Catholic monasticism during the Counter or Catholic Reformation, with the Society of Jesus, founded by Ignatius Loyola (1491–1556), being the most famous. The Jesuits held back the rapid spread of Protestantism and also successfully reclaimed large areas that had been lost by Catholicism.

In some reformed liturgy, especially Lutheran and Anglican, large portions of the monastic “hours” have been synthesized into Matins (morning prayer) and Evensong, thus preserving a part of these great medieval services for ordinary use, and the Anglican tradition restored monasticism for men and women in the nineteenth century. Today, in spite of the contemporary culture of secularity, the spirit of brilliant modern monastics like Thomas Merton and Mother Teresa of Calcutta keeps the life of the Rule alive.

C. T. MARSHALL

See also BASIL THE GREAT; BENEDICT; FRANCISCAN ORDER.

Bibliography. C. Brooke, Monastic World; C. Butler, Western Monasticism; E. C. Butler, Benedictine Monachism; O. Chadwick, Western Asceticism; K. Hughes, Church in Early Irish Society; D. Knowles, Christian Monasticism; C. H. Lawrence, Medieval Monasticism; J. Leclercq, Love of Learning and the Desire for God; L. J. Lekai, Cistercians: Ideals and Reality; W. Nigg, Warriors of God.

Monergism. The position that “the grace of God is the only efficient cause in beginning and effecting conversion.” The opposite of synergism, this position is consistently upheld by the Au-gustinian tradition within Christianity. Representative is the attitude of Martin Luther: Luther believed that salvation was by grace alone through faith, arriving at this position from his study of Romans 1:16–17. The believing faith that receives this grace is itself the gift of God. In his explanation of the third article of the Creed, Luther commented: “I believe that by my own reason or strength I cannot believe in Jesus Christ, my Lord, or come to him. But the Holy Spirit has called me through the Gospel, enlightened me with his gifts, and sanctified and preserved me in true faith.” The same teaching was embodied in his Bondage of the Will, where he affirmed, “Man’s will is like a beast standing between two riders. If God rides, it wills and does what God wills. . . . If Satan rides, it wills and goes where Satan wills. Nor may it choose to which rider it will run, or which it will seek but the riders themselves fight to decide who shall have and hold it.” Luther regarded repentance as the work of God in man, citing such texts as Acts 5:31 and 2 Timothy 2:25. While the human will was free in civil matters, concerning spiritual choices it was bound in sin. This view was reflected in the Formula of Concord, which stated that “man of himself, or from his natural powers, cannot contribute anything or help to his conversion, and that conversion is not only in part, but altogether an operation, gift and present and work of the Holy Ghost alone, who accomplishes and effects it, by his virtue and power, through the Word, in the understanding, heart and will of man.”

The implication of this doctrine is that if one is saved, it is entirely the work of God; if one is lost, it is entirely the fault of man, who, while not free to accept the gospel, is by nature able to reject it. Calvin developed his theology in a different direction. Like Luther upholding the sovereignty of God in conversion, Calvin differed from the German Reformer in affirming the perseverance of the saints (Luther felt it was possible to fall from grace) and in teaching that the lost were condemned because God willed them lost (damnation was a theological, not an anthropological, mystery, as it had been for Luther). Differing from both Calvin and Luther was the predominant position of the Roman Catholic Church, that grace plus faith (itself a good work) brought conversion. Later Protestants such as James Arminius and John Wesley stressed human responsibility as well as divine sovereignty in the matter of conversion.

C. G. FRY

See also SYNERGISM.

Bibliography. D. W. H. Arnold and C. G. Fry, Way, the Truth, and the Life: An Introduction to Lutheran Christianity; L. Berkhof, Systematic Theology; J. T. Mueller, Christian Dogmatics.

Money. See WEALTH, CHRISTIAN VIEW OF.

Monism. Although the term was first used by German philosopher Christian Wolff (1679–1754), monism is a philosophical position with a long history dating back to the pre-Socratic philosophers who appealed to a single unifying principle to explain all the diversity of observed experience. Notable among these thinkers is Parmenides, who maintained that reality is an undifferentiated oneness, or unity, and that, consequently, real change or individuality of things is impossible. Monism is a position taken on the metaphysical question, “How many things are there?”

Substantival monism (“one thing”) is the view that there is only one substance and that all diversity is ultimately unreal. This view was maintained by Spinoza, who claimed that there is only one substance, or independently existing thing, and that both God and the universe are aspects of this substance. In addition to having many eminent proponents in the Western philosophical tradition, substantival monism is a tenet of Hinduism and Buddhism. In Hinduism each element of reality is part of maya or prakriti, and in Buddhism all things ultimately comprise an interrelated network.

Attributive monism (“one category”) holds that there is one kind of thing but many different individual things in this category. Materialism and idealism are different forms of attributive monism. The materialist holds that the one category of existence in which all real things are found is material, while the idealist says that this category is mental. All monisms oppose the dualistic view of the universe, which holds that both material and immaterial (mental and spiritual) realities exist. Attributive monism disagrees with substantival monism in asserting that reality is ultimately composed of many things rather than one thing. Many leading philosophers have been attributive monists, including Bertrand Russell and Thomas Hobbes on the materialistic side, and G. W. Leibniz and George Berkeley in the idealist camp.

The Christian intellectual tradition has generally held that substantival monism fails to do justice to the distinction between God and creature, and that of attributive monisms only idealism is theologically acceptable.

D. B. FLETCHER

See also BERKELEY, GEORGE; IDEALISM; LEIBNIZ, GOTTFRIED WILHELM.

Bibliography. F. H. Bradley, Appearance and Reality; F. C. Copleston, “Spinoza,” in History of Philosophy; R. Hall, “Monism and Pluralism,” Encyclopedia of Philosophy; J. Passmore, Hundred Years of Philosophy; A. M. Quinton, “Pluralism and Monism,” in EncyBrit; B. Spinoza, Ethics.

Monophysitism

Monophysitism. Derived from monos, “single,” and physis, “nature,” monophysitism is the doctrine which holds that the incarnate Christ had only a single, divine nature, clad in human flesh. It is sometimes called Eutychianism, after Eutyches (d. 454), one of its leading defenders. Since the Council of Chalcedon, which confirmed as orthodox the doctrine of two natures, divine and human, monophysitism has been considered heretical. Its roots probably go back to Apollinaris (ca. 370), who laid tremendous stress on the fusion of the divine and human. Alexandria (as opposed to Antioch) became the citadel of this doctrine, and Cyril, although deemed orthodox, furnished fuel for the fire kindled by his successor, Dioscorus, and Eutyches, who denied that Christ’s body was the same in essence as the bodies of men. Their chief opponent was Leo I of Rome, whose formulation of the doctrine of two natures in one person triumphed at Chalcedon.

Monophysites tended to divide into two main groups: Julianists, who held to the immortality and incorruptibility of Christ’s incarnate body and the more orthodox Severians, who rejected the Eutychian view that the human and divine were completely mingled in the incarnation. In the remnant of Syrian Jacobites and in the Coptic and Ethiopian churches (and to a limited extent in the Armenian) it survives to the present day.

D. A. HUBBARD

See also MONOTHELITISM.

Bibliography. W. H. C. Frend, Rise of the Monophysite Movement; E. R. Hardy, Christian Egypt: Church and People; A. A. Luce, Monophysitism Past and Present; R. V. Sellers, Council of Chalcedon; Two Ancient Christologies; W. A. Wigram, Separation of the Monophysites.

Monotheism. The belief that there is only one God. Related terms are polytheism (the belief that there are many gods), henotheism (belief in one supreme god, though not necessarily to the exclusion of belief in other lesser gods), monolatry (worship of only one god, though not necessarily denying that other gods exist), and atheism (denying or disbelieving in the existence of any gods at all).

Atheism was not particularly attractive to the Israelite people in ancient times. They were convinced that only fools would be so spiritually ignorant as to deny the existence of a supreme being (Pss. 14:1; 53:1). For the people of God, the fear of the Lord was the beginning of wisdom and knowledge (Ps. 111:10; Prov. 1:7; 9:10). But if the Israelites did not doubt that there was at least one God, the nations on their borders faced them with the tantalizing possibility that there might be more than one. Egypt, Phoenicia, Aram, Ammon, Moab, Edom—these and other nations were polytheistic, henotheistic, or monolatrous throughout their history in ancient times. One of the questions raised by the OT is whether Israel would remain monotheistic or be attracted by the religious options preferred by its pagan neighbors.

Students of comparative religion have suggested that the religions of mankind evolved from lower stages to ever higher stages, the highest of all being monotheism. They have proposed that Israelite religion began as animism, the belief that every natural object is inhabited by a supernatural spirit. After animism, we are told, the idea developed in Israel that some spirits were more powerful than others and deserved to be called “gods.” Eventually the most powerful of all became preeminent above the others, and the people believed in his supreme authority and worshiped him alone. Finally, Israel became willing to admit that the lesser gods had no existence whatever. Comparative religion, then, often teaches that Israel’s religion underwent a process of evolution from animism to polytheism to henotheism to monotheism.

But it cannot be shown that polytheistic religions always gradually reduce the number of their gods, finally arriving at only one. For example, there are innumerable Hindu deities (estimates range from several hundred thousand to 800 million, depending on how deity is defined), and the number seems actually to be increasing. Since a religion may add more and more deities as its followers become aware of more and more natural phenomena to deify, it is just as plausible to assume that polytheism is the end product of evolution from an original monotheism as it is to assume the reverse.

Monotheism and World Religions. Far from having evolved through the centuries of Israel’s history, monotheism is an inspired insight revealed by God to his people. The God of the Bible, the Creator of all that exists, stands outside the universe and is not a part of it. Only three modern religions share this viewpoint, and all of them are based on the revealed religion of ancient Israel. (1) Judaism’s synagogue services always begin with Deuteronomy 6:4, a creedal statement known as the Shema: “Hear, O Israel: The LORD our God, the LORD is one” (emphatically approved by Jesus in Mark 12:28–29). (2) Christianity’s greatest apostle defined monotheism in its most classic form in 1 Timothy 2:5: “There is one God.” (3) Islam claims millions of followers who recite this prayer as they prostrate themselves toward Mecca five times a day: “There is no god but God.”

Certain other modern religions, such as Zoroastrianism and Sikhism, teach forms of monotheism that are derived from former dualistic or polytheistic systems. Unlike the three religions based on the Bible, they suggest that God is a part of the universe and not separate from it. Only OT religion and its derivatives proclaim one God who is transcendent by nature and immanent by condescension and grace (see Isa. 57:15).

Monotheism and the OT. The book of Genesis begins by assuming that there is only one true God, and that assumption is maintained throughout the OT. Against materialism, which teaches that matter is everything and eternal, Genesis 1 teaches that matter had a beginning and that God created it and is therefore above it. Against pantheism, which teaches that God is (or gods are) in everything, Genesis 1 teaches that God is above everything and separate from it. Against dualism, which posits a continuing struggle between two gods or principles (one evil and the other good), Genesis 1 posits one benevolent God who declares each of his creative works to be “good” and summarizes the week of creation by proclaiming it “very good” (Gen. 1:31).

But other alternatives, commonly held by ancient Near Eastern religions in general, influenced the spiritual struggles of the Hebrew people from the patriarchal period and onward. Polytheism characterized Abraham’s ancestors (Josh. 24:2), kinsmen (Gen. 31:19), and descendants (Gen. 35:2). Although all three biblically derived monotheistic religions claim Abraham as their founder, Abraham’s monotheism was perhaps more practical than theoretical. God monopolized his allegiance to the extent that Abraham had neither room nor time for competing deities, but nowhere in Genesis does he clearly deny their existence.

By contrast, Moses defined the nature of God in a clearly monotheistic fashion (Deut. 4:35, 39; 32:39). The first of the Ten Commandments, “You shall have no other gods before/besides me” (Exod. 20:3; Deut. 5:7), insists that Israel is to have only one object of faith and worship. Elijah on Mount Carmel likewise demanded that the people choose either the Lord or another god (see also Josh. 24:15), because it was both unseemly and unwise to continue to “waver between two opinions” (1 Kings 18:21).

The writing prophets of the eighth century B.C. and afterward strengthened monotheistic doctrine by constantly reminding Israel of the vast gulf that separated the Lord from pagan idols and the so-called gods that they represented (Isa. 2:8; 20; 17:8; 31:7; Jer. 10:5, 10; Hos. 4:12). After Jerusalem was destroyed in 586 B.C. the people of Judah forsook idolatry once and for all. The excessive polytheism of Babylon was revolting to the exiles and helped to make the Jews a truly monotheistic people. Judaism today shares with Christianity a firm belief in the Lord’s affirmation as mediated through Isaiah: “There is no God apart from me” (Isa. 45:21).

Monotheism and the Trinity. God did not reveal himself in clearly defined trinitarian terms in the OT. To do so would have provided needless temptations to polytheism in the light of ancient culture. But the OT prepares for the doctrine of the Trinity in several ways: (1) It uses a plural word for God (‘ēlohîm) with singular verbs (Gen. 1:1 and often). (2) It employs various triadic formulas in reference to God (e.g., the three-man visitation of Gen. 18:2, the triple name of the God of the patriarchs in Exod. 3:15 and elsewhere, and the thrice-spoken “Holy” of Isa. 6:3). (3) The “angel of God/the Lord” sometimes refers to God as his sender, and sometimes speaks as though he himself were God. (4) Father, Spirit, and Word are all active in creation (Gen. 1:1–3; see also John 1:1–3).

Monotheism and the NT. Although the NT affirms trinitarianism (see, e.g., Matt. 28:19; 2 Cor. 13:14), it is outspokenly monotheistic as well (see, e.g., Acts 17:22–31). For the NT writers no conflict existed between the teachings that God is one and that at the same time he is three in one. Paul the monotheist can state with confidence that “there is no God but one” (1 Cor. 8:4), and in the very next breath, using a partial trinitarian formula, he can declare with equal confidence that “there is but one God, the Father, from whom all things came and for whom we live; and there is but one Lord, Jesus Christ, through whom all things came and through whom we live” (8:6).

R. YOUNGBLOOD

See also GOD, DOCTRINE OF; THEISM.

Bibliography. W. F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity; C. Geffré and J-P Jossua, eds., Monotheism; P. Lapede and J. Moltmann, Jewish Monotheism and Christian Trinitarian Doctrine; H. H. Rowley, From Moses to Qumran; R. Youngblood, Heart of the Old Testament.

Monothelism. A heresy especially prevalent in the Eastern church in the seventh century which said that as Christ had but one nature (Monophysitism) so he had but one will (Greek monos, “alone”; thelein, “to will”). Emperor Heraclius attempted to reconcile the Monophysite bishops, who held that the human and divine natures in Christ were fused together to form a third, by offering in his ecthesis (statement of faith) in 638 the view that Christ worked through a divine-human energy. This compromise was at first accepted by Constantinople and Rome, but Sophronius, soon to be bishop of Jerusalem, organized the orthodox opposition to monothelism. A fine defense of the person of Christ as one in two natures with two wills was given by John of Damascus. The Council of Chalcedon had declared that “Christ has two natures.” This was now amended by the Council of Constantinople, which declared that Christ had two wills, his human will being subject to his divine will.

W. N. KERR

Monothelism

See also MONOPHYSITISM.

Bibliography. John of Damascus, Exposition of the Orthodox Faith; A. Harnack, History of Dogma; H. P. Lid-don, Divinity of Our Lord; A. A. Luce, Monophysitism.

Montanism. A prophetic movement that broke out in Phrygia in Roman Asia Minor (Turkey) around 172. It attracted a wide following, chiefly in the East, but won its most distinguished adherent in Tertullian. After a period of uncertainty, especially at Rome, it was condemned by synods of bishops in Asia and elsewhere. A residual sect persisted in Phrygia for some centuries.

The main associates of Montanus, who was a recent convert and held no church office, were the prophetesses Prisca (Priscilla) and Maximilla. What they called “the New Prophecy” was basically a summons to prepare for the return of Christ by heeding the voice of the Paraclete speaking, often in the first person, through his prophetic mouthpieces. They claimed to stand in the line of Christian prophecy well attested in Asia—e.g., by John of Revelation—but their ecstatic manner of utterance was (falsely) alleged to run counter to the tradition of Israelite and Christian prophecy. They also incurred the hostility of church leaders by the women’s unusual prominence, a boldness that seemed to court martyrdom, their confident predictions of the imminent consummation (shown in time to be false by their nonfulfillment), the hallowing of obscure Phrygian villages like Pepuza as harbingers of the new Jerusalem, and their stern asceticism which disrupted marriages, protracted fasting, and allowed only a dry diet (xerophagy). Nothing strictly heretical could be charged against Montanism. Any link with monarchianism was accidental. Although none of its catholic opponents doubted the continuance of prophecy in the church, Montanism erupted at a time when consolidation of catholic order and conformity to apostolic tradition preoccupied the bishops. The prophets’ extravagant pretensions, while not intended to displace the emergent NT of Christian Scripture, were felt to threaten both episcopal and scriptural authority. Recognition of the Paraclete in the New Prophecy was their touchstone of authenticity.

Tertullian, whose religious rigorism graduated naturally to the New Prophecy, neglected some of the more eccentric features of the Phrygian movement, stressing the development of ethics inculcated by the Spirit in fulfillment of Christ’s promises in John 14–16. The “greater things” to come from the Paraclete were the more demanding standards of discipline required of spiritual Christians, such as the denial of remarriage to the widowed and of postbaptismal forgiveness for serious sins. The contemporary African Passion of Perpetua similarly exalted recent happenings, especially fearless martyrdoms, as evidence of the superabundant grace of the Spirit decreed for the last days. As Tertullian put it, if the devil’s ingenuity escalates daily, why should God’s work have ceased advancing to new heights? The New Prophecy seemed almost to claim for itself a special place in salvation history. D. F. WRIGHT

Bibliography. R. E. Heine, Montanist Oracles and Testimony; D. Powell, “Tertullianists and Cataphrygians,” VC 29:33–54; H. von Campenhausen, Ecclesiastical Authority and Spiritual Power in the Church of the First Three Centuries; Formation of the Christian Bible; D. F. Wright, “Why Were the Montanists Condemned?” Them 2:15–22.

Moon, Sun Myung. See UNIFICATION CHURCH.

Moral Argument for God. See GOD, ARGUMENTS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF.

Moral Inability. See DEPRAVITY, TOTAL.

Moral Influence Theory of Atonement. See ATONEMENT, THEORIES OF.

Moral Re-Armament. In our century the tensions between humanitarian and biblical religion are typified in Frank Buchman (1878–1961) and the Oxford Group movement, later known as Moral Re-Armament (MRA). After graduating from the Lutheran Theological Seminary at Philadelphia (1902), Buchman spent a graduate year abroad visiting church institutions in Germany dedicated to social welfare and reform. Filled with a passion to help his fellow humanity, he founded the first Lutheran hospice for young men in this country and later a settlement house in Philadelphia. In 1908 Buchman had a falling out with the board of trustees who supervised his work; they wanted to balance the budget, whereas his concern was to feed the hungry. As a result he resigned in anger, nursing ill will against the six board members.

In poor health because of overwork, Buchman left for England to attend a Keswick conference on the spiritual life. There in a small church in an English village he heard a simple sermon by a lay woman preacher on the meaning of the cross. For the first time he realized the yawning abyss that separated him from the suffering Christ, and he was convicted of sin—“selfishness, pride, ill-will.” He emerged from this life-renewing experience no longer a divided, tormented soul but now devoted exclusively to the service of his Savior and Master. Set free from his resentment against the six members of his board, he proceeded to write to each one individually asking for forgiveness. Though receiving no reply from any of these men, he at once experienced a sense of relief.

Before his conversion Buchman was a humanitarian dedicated to the welfare of his fellow human beings. He believed in God, but he did not yet see that people must be changed inwardly before there can be lasting changes in society. The conviction dawned on him that the disease that was eroding the moral fabric of society was sin in the human heart and that the only cure was Christ. Buchman became known for his “house parties” on university campuses (including Oxford, from which the movement derived its name). On these occasions fun and fellowship were combined with open confession of sin and the public sharing of the joy of emancipation from the burden of guilt.

Buchman was not wrong in his belief that the key to social reformation lies in personal transformation, but his downplaying of the continuing effects of sin in the believer tended to make his social policy simplistic and even utopian. Moreover, when the Oxford Group movement became Moral Re-Armament in the late 1930s, the experience of personal conversion was even more dissociated from the objective work of Christ’s atoning sacrifice on the cross, and a humanistic emphasis began to supplant the evangelical basis that remained central in Buchman’s own life. To the end, Buchman insisted that “only God can change human nature”; yet the focus of attention in Moral Re-Armament was much more on the realization of the moral ideal than on divine grace.

The first World Assembly of Moral Re-Armament was held at Caux, Switzerland, in 1946. Caux remains the center of MRA, but since Buchman’s death the movement has lost much of its momentum.

Theological critics of Buchman have been quick to point out the subjectivism and mysticism in his piety without recognizing that in Buchman we have a modern saint, a holy man who was able to read hearts and perform soul surgery even upon a first meeting with people. Moreover, he was a man of prayer who rose early every morning to receive counsel from God. Like Francis of Assisi, with whom he has been compared, he embarked on a vocation of itinerant evangelism, living in celibacy and virtual poverty, depending only on freewill donations for his livelihood. He was often accused of hobnobbing with the wealthy, but it is well to remember that Christ came to seek and save the lost, and this includes the up-and-outs as well as the down-and-outs. Buchman believed that the way to reach those who are crippled by sin is not to demonstrate the superiority of our wisdom but to expose the lie that hides the human condition by speaking the truth in love.

Buchman’s life and thought have much to teach evangelical Christianity today, where the emphasis is on correct understanding over practical living. His witness is a timely reminder that life and doctrine belong together. While he tended to neglect the latter, many of his critics have sorely neglected the former.

D. G. BLOESCH

Bibliography. H. Begbie, More Twice-Born Men; F. Buchman, Remaking the World; W. H. Clark, Oxford Group: Its History and Significance; T. Driberg, Mystery of Moral Re-Armament; B. Entwistle and M. Roots, Moral Re-Armament: What Is It?; P. Howard, Frank Buchman’s Secret; G. Lean, Frank Buchman: A Life; On the Tail of a Comet: The Life of Frank Buchman; A. Lunn, Enigma: A Study of Moral Re-Armament; A. J. Russell, For Sinners Only; J. P. Thornton-Duesbery, Open Secret of Moral Re-Armament.

Moral Theology. The Roman Catholic equivalent to what Protestants commonly call Christian ethics. It is related to dogmatic theology and moral philosophy in Catholic tradition in ways parallel to the Protestant relationship of Christian ethics to systematic theology and philosophical ethics. General moral theology deals with the broad questions of what, from the point of view of moral agency and moral action, it means to live as a Christian. Its questions address methods of moral discernment, the definitions of good and evil, right and wrong, sin and virtue, and the goal or end of the Christian life. Special moral theology addresses specific issues of life such as justice, sexuality, truth-telling, and the sanctity of life.

While the first five centuries of the church provided important guidance (above all in the works of Augustine) in the development of Catholic moral theology, even more influential was the rise in importance during the sixth century of the sacrament of reconciliation. A series of compendiums known as penitential books was prepared to assist priest-confessors in determining appropriate penance for various individual sins. Despite the great achievement of Bonaventure and Thomas Aquinas in the thirteenth century in developing a systematic, unified philosophy and theology, the tendency to treat morality as a discipline separate from dogmatics was continued and confirmed by the Counter-Reformation, which emphasized the connection between moral teaching and canon law.

During the seventeenth and eighteenth century debates about Jansenism and the precise meaning of the law, Alphonsus Liguori emerged as the most famous and influential moral theologian. Liguori’s manuals noted the various alternatives and then urged a prudent, reasonable middle course on various questions. Casuistry in the style of these manuals, aimed primarily toward the preparation of priests for their role as confessors, remained the dominant approach to moral theology in Catholic circles into the twentieth century.

Moral Theology

The renewal and reformation of Catholic moral theology that has become so visible since Vatican II is the fruition of the work of such moral theologians as John Michael Sailor (1750–1832), John Baptist Hirscher (1788–1865), Joseph Mausbach (1861–1931), Theodor Steinbuchel (1888–1949), and contemporaries Bernard Häring and Josef Fuchs. The new spirit in moral theology since Vatican II is represented by scholars such as Fuchs, Häring, Charles Curran, Timothy O'Connell, Edward Schillebeeckx, and Rudolf Schnackenburg.

Traditionally moral theology was based on the authority of reason, natural law, canon law, and the tradition and authority of the Roman Catholic Church and its magisterium. While Scripture has always been acknowledged as divine revelation, it is only in the new Catholic moral theology that the whole shape as well as specific content of moral theology has been aggressively reworked in relationship to authoritative Scripture. Natural law (or general revelation) continues to be important but is now supplemented by attention to the human and social sciences. The parochialism and separatism of the past have given way to ongoing ecumenical dialogue with Protestant ethicists. The traditional preoccupation with specific sins and the role of moral guidance in the confessional have been subsumed in a broader inquiry about the total and positive meaning of the Christian life. The legalism, formalism, rationalism, and traditionalism which used to characterize Catholic ethics are no longer present to the same degree. The prospects have never been better and the need more urgent for Protestants and Catholics to work together on a biblical base, informed by the whole history of the church and responsive to the massive challenges of a secular world. D. W. GILL

See also CASUISTRY; ETHICAL SYSTEMS, CHRISTIAN; ETHICS, BIBLICAL; ROMAN CATHOLICISM.

Bibliography. C. C. Curran, New Perspectives in Moral Theology; J. M. Gustafson, Protestant and Roman Catholic Ethics; B. Häring, Free and Faithful in Christ; T. E. O'Connell, Principles for a Catholic Morality.

Moravian Brethren. See BOHEMIAN BRETHERN.

More, Henry (1614–1687). Cambridge Platonist. Born at Grantham and educated at Eton and Christ's College, Cambridge, where he became a fellow in 1639 and remained the rest of his life. Following his rejection of the Calvinism of his early youth, he suffered through a period of skepticism while a student at Cambridge before finding intellectual and spiritual direction from the Platonists, especially Plotinus. He was a prolific writer whose interests included theology, philosophy, ethics, and poetry. The majority of his work was given to the vindication of theism and immortality and to proving the reality of the spiritual world in an attempt to check the contemporary trend toward atheism encouraged by the two main philosophies of his day, those of Thomas Hobbes and René Descartes. Two early works, Antidote against Atheism (1653), and Immortality of the Soul (1659) offer a carefully developed refutation of Hobbes's materialism and an argument for belief in God. His Enchiridion Metaphysicum (1671) contains one of the most penetrating attacks against Cartesianism the age produced. Initially an enthusiastic advocate of Descartes, More later perceived that by affirming "spirit" as a mere abstraction, Descartes had reduced all spiritual reality into nothing and thus opened the door to materialism and atheism. The heart of More's concern was the experience of "true religion." Only the real presence of God in the soul, he believed, attained through ethical purification, could sublimate reason to achieve divine knowledge. Consequently, true spiritual understanding is made clear and confirmed by moral experience. He assigned great importance to revelation and to the role played by Scripture, but repudiated Puritan dogmatism, denied the doctrine of predestination, calling it "the black doctrine of absolute reprobation," and left unstressed the evangelical parts of Christianity. Equally important were his Enchiridion Ethicum (1667) and Divine Dialogues (1668).

C. W. MITCHELL

See also CAMBRIDGE PLATONISM.

Bibliography. F. Mackinnon, Philosophical Writings of Henry More; G. Cragg, From Puritanism to the Age of Reason; G. Cragg, ed., Cambridge Platonists; F. J. Powicke, Cambridge Platonists: A Study; B. Willey, Seventeenth Century Background.

Mormonism. The Mormons, as they are usually known, represent one of the most successful of the new religious movements of the nineteenth century. Today they are divided into two main groups, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, organized from Salt Lake City, Utah, and the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, based in Independence, Missouri. In addition to these major groups a number of smaller "fundamentalist" groups exist. Today the Utah church claims over 3 million members, while the Reorganized Church claims about 600,000 adherents.

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints was first organized on April 6, 1830, at Fayette, New York, by Joseph Smith. Soon after its formation its members moved to Kirtland, Ohio, and then Jackson County, Missouri, as a result of the intense opposition they encountered. They finally settled at a place they called Nauvoo on the Mississippi River in Illinois. Here they prospered and built a thriving city.

On July 12, 1843, Smith received a revelation allowing polygamy, which caused four disillusioned converts to found an anti-Mormon newspaper. Smith was denounced on June 7, 1844, in this paper, the Nauvoo Expositor, in its single publication. For that the brothers of Smith burned down the newspaper office. As a result Joseph Smith and his brother Hyrum were placed in Carthage jail, where on June 27, 1844, they were brutally murdered when a mob stormed the jail.

Following the assassination of Joseph Smith the majority of Mormons accepted the leadership of Brigham Young. A minority rallied around Joseph's legal wife and family to form the Reorganized Church. Under the leadership of Young the Mormons left Nauvoo in 1847 and trekked westward to Utah. Here for more than thirty years Brigham Young ruled the Mormon Church and laid the foundation of its present strength. He also served as the first Governor of Utah (1850–57).

Mormonism has a dual foundation. The first is the claim of Joseph Smith to have received golden plates upon which ancient scriptures are alleged to have been written. Smith claimed to have translated these plates and subsequently published them in 1830 as Book of Mormon. The second foundation is Smith's claim to have had an encounter with the living Jesus and subsequently to receive continuing revelations from God. The substance of these continuing revelations is to be found in the Mormon publication Doctrine and Covenants, while an account of Joseph Smith's encounter with Jesus and the discovery of Book of Mormon is to be found in Pearl of Great Price. Pearl of Great Price also contains the text of two Egyptian papyri that Joseph Smith claimed to have translated plus his translation of certain portions of the Bible. Together Book of Mormon, Doctrine and Covenants, and Pearl of Great Price form the basis of the Mormon continuing revelation. Since the death of Smith these revelations have been supplemented by what the church claims to be further revelations given to its leaders.

Book of Mormon itself is a fairly straightforward adventure story written in the style of biblical history. The tale concerns two ancient civilizations located on the American continent. The first was founded by refugees from the Tower of Babel. These people crossed Europe and emigrated to the eastern coast of central America. The founders of the second civilization emigrated from Jerusalem around 600 B.C. This group is said to have crossed the Pacific Ocean in arklike boats. After their arrival in America both these groups are said to have founded great civilizations. The first civilization was known as that of the Jardeites. This was totally destroyed as a result of their corruption. The second group were righteous Jews under the leadership of a man named Nephi. Initially Nephi's group prospered and built great cities. But like their forefathers in Palestine, many apostatized and ceased to worship the true God. As a result their civilization was plagued by civil wars and eventually destroyed itself. The descendants of the apostates remained on the North American continent as native Indians. In The Book of Mormon the Indians are known as the Lamanites who, as a result of the apostasy, received the curse of a dark skin.

Book of Mormon claims that Christ visited America after his resurrection and revealed himself to the Nephites, to whom he preached the gospel and for whom he founded a church. The Nephites were eventually destroyed by the Lamanites in a great battle near Palmyra, New York, around A.D. 428. Almost 1,400 years later, according to Mormon claims, Joseph Smith had revealed to him the record of these civilizations in the form of "reformed Egyptian hieroglyphics" written upon golden plates. With the aid of supernatural spectacles, known as the urim and thummim, he translated the unknown language into English and it became Book of Mormon. According to the Articles of Faith of the Mormon Church and to the theology of Book of Mormon, Mormonism is essentially Christian. These present views that are similar to those of many other Christian churches, but this similarity is misleading. Mormon theology is not based upon its declared Articles of Faith or the teachings of Book of Mormon. Rather, the essence of Mormon theology comes from the continuing revelations received by Joseph Smith and later Mormon leaders.

Mormonism teaches that God the Father has a body and that man's destiny is to evolve to Godhood. This teaching is summed up in the popular Mormon saying, "As man is, God once was: as God is, man may become." This belief includes the notion of preexisting souls who gain a body on earth and become human as part of the probationary experience which determines their future heavenly existence. Contrary to the teachings of the Bible, humanity's rebellion against God, known in Christian theology as the fall, is considered necessary. Mormon theology teaches that if Adam had not eaten the forbidden fruit, he would never have had children. Therefore, to propagate the race and fulfill his heavenly destiny Adam had to disobey God. Thus in a very real sense it is the fall of humanity which saved humanity. This doctrine is built into an evolutionary view of eternal progression that reflects popular thinking and scientific speculation at the time of Joseph Smith. In keeping with the idea of a probationary state the doctrine of justification by faith is rejected in Mormon theology in favor of salvation by works as the basis of determining one's future mode of existence. The purpose of Christ's atonement is then said to be the assurance that humans will be raised from the dead. At the resurrection, however, human beings will be assigned a place in one of three heavenly realms according to the life they have lived on earth.

Mormonism

The Mormon Church claims that it is the only true church because its leaders continue to receive revelation from God. In addition it claims to possess the powers of the priesthood of Aaron and Melchizedek into which its male members are expected to be initiated.

As a social organization the Mormon Church exhibits many admirable qualities. It promotes extensive welfare programs for members, operates a large missionary and educational organization, and promotes family life. Mormons are expected to participate in what is known as "temple work." This involves proxy baptism for deceased ancestors and "celestial marriage." Mormons believe that in addition to temporal marriages church members may be sealed to their families "for time and eternity" through a process known as celestial marriage.

During the 1960s the Mormon community was troubled by its denial of the priesthood to blacks. However, in 1978 the president of the church declared that he had received a new revelation that admitted blacks to the priesthood. Today one of the most troublesome issues within the Mormon Church is the place of women, who are also excluded from the priesthood. In addition to these social problems a number of historical challenges have rocked Mormon intellectual life of the past two decades. These include serious questions about the translation of Book of Abraham and Pearl of Great Price and about Joseph Smith, visions, and historical claims.

Much of the criticism has come from ex-Mormons disillusioned by what they see as the refusal of the church hierarchy to face serious questioning. Among the more important ex-Mormon critics are Fawn Brodie, whose biography of Joseph Smith, No Man Knows My History, seriously undermines official Mormon histories, and Gerald and Sandra Tanner, whose Modern Microfilm Company has produced numerous documents challenging the official version of early Mormon history and the development of Mormon doctrine. Within the Mormon Church itself a vigorous debate has been conducted in journals such as Dialgo and Sunstone. The rigor with which younger Mormon scholars have addressed the study of their own history in these journals is clear indication of the power of Mormonism to survive sustained criticism.

Although young Mormon missionaries may often present Mormonism as a slightly modified American form of Christianity, this approach does little justice to either Mormon theology or the Christian tradition. As a new religious movement Mormonism represents a dynamic synthesis that combines frontier revivalism, intense religious experience, and popular evolutionary philosophies with a respect for Jesus and Christian ethics. This combination of beliefs holds strong attraction for many people uninterested or unschooled in Christian history and theology.

I. HEXHAM

Bibliography. J. Heinaman and A. Shupe, Mormon Corporate Empire; T. O'Dea, Mormons; G. E. Talmage, Study of the Articles of Faith; G. and S. Tanner, Mormonism: Shadow or Reality; W. Turner, Mormon Establishment; J. R. White, Letters to a Mormon Elder.

Morning Prayer. "The Order for Daily Morning Prayer" from the Book of Common Prayer of the Church of England, long the principal service in Anglican and Episcopal churches. Morning prayer or English matins owes its origin to the work of Thomas Cranmer. Believing daily morning and evening worship to have been the custom of the ancient church, Cranmer developed the offices of morning prayer and evening prayer (evensong). Influenced by Lutheran precedents, the Sarum Breviary, and the monastic offices of matins, lauds, and prime, morning prayer was designed for use on weekdays and on Sundays before Holy Communion. Minor changes were made in 1928; more major ones were authorized in 1965.

C. G. FRY

See also BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER; OFFICE, DAILY (DIVINE); WORSHIP IN THE CHURCH.

Bibliography. J. G. Davies, ed., Westminster Dictionary of Worship; S. L. Ollard, ed., Dictionary of English Church History.

Mortality. One does not need to appeal to an Aristotelian syllogism (all men are mortal, etc.) to demonstrate one's mortality. It is self-evident. As certainly as a person has been born, just as certainly he or she will experience death. The fact is incontrovertible; the "why" of mortality needs to be explored. As we probe the NT we find that the cause of mortality is not open to speculation. "The wages of sin is death" (Rom. 6:23); "Sin entered the world . . . and death through sin" (Rom. 5:12). Thus mortality is not a biological problem but a theological one. A person has turned his or her back upon God, "who gives life to the dead and calls into existence the things that do not exist" (Rom. 4:17 NRSV), and as a result has severed himself or herself from the root of his or her existence and become subject to death. It is only through the substitutionary death and resurrection of Jesus Christ that the power of sin has been broken and the Christian is delivered from the frightful circle of sin and death (Rom. 4:25; 5:6–21; 1 Cor. 15:3–57; 2 Cor. 5:14–17; 1 Thess. 5:10; Heb. 2:9–15; 1 Pet. 3:18; Rev. 1:17–18). Those who refuse God's offer of life through Christ choose in its place the "second death," an eternal and irrevocable existence separated from the God whom they have spurned (John 8:21, 24; 2 Thess. 1:8–9; Heb. 10:26–27, 31; Jude 12–13; Rev. 20:12–15).

Seventh-day Adventist theology sees people as mortal and immortality as bestowed upon the righteous dead at the second coming of Christ. The finally impenitent, including Satan, will be reduced to a state of nonexistence by the fires of the last day.

Christian Science understands mortality to be an illusion. Mrs. Eddy stated that the only reality of sin, sickness, and death is the awful fact that unrealities seem real to human, erring belief, until God strips off their disguises.

New Thought, represented by its most prolific exponent, Ernest Holmes, sees mortality as real but offers no substantive reason for its existence. Sin is simply a misnomer; there are no sins, only mistakes, and no punishment, only consequences. God does not punish sin. As we correct our mistakes, we are in effect forgiving ourselves.

Karl Rahner, while espousing the view that mortality results from sin, moves on to suggest that this does not mean that apart from sin humanity would have continued endlessly on earth. Human life would certainly have ended, but in a manner which would have permitted the perfect consummation of a personal life in bodily form without the violent dissolution of the physical constitution through an external power. Such an end would have been "a death without dying," the pure, active affirmation of the whole person from within, including that openness to the cosmos in its totality which is now possible only to the redeemed.

There are three essential ethical implications to the fact of human mortality. First, although one bears no responsibility for the fact of his or her existence, there are moral issues implicit in the fact of mortality. God has reserved the right to determine the hour of one's birth and death. However, when the Decalogue states, "Thou shalt not kill," it implies one's freedom to usurp that authority and precipitate one's own death or that of another, which carries the weight of responsibility.

Second, mortality adds ethical dimensions to the experience of human procreation. Married persons who choose to have children must realize that they join in creating not only a new life but also an entity subject to death. The moral responsibility for sustaining the new physical life is certainly implied. Christian families also recognize that they carry the responsibility of Christian witness and nurture for their offspring, who need to be prepared for life's inevitable moment of judgment after death.

Third, implicit in the above are such critical issues as abortion, birth control, euthanasia, organ transplants, the whole spectrum of questions related to war, and many others.

F. R. HARM

See also ANNIHILATIONISM; CONDITIONAL IMMORTALITY.

Bibliography. M. B. Eddy, Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures; F. R. Harm, How to Respond to the Science of Religions; E. Holmes, Science of Mind; F. B. James, Truth and Health; K. Rahner, On the Theology of Death; W. Schmithals, NIDNTT 1:430–41.

Mortal Sin. See SIN, MORTAL.

Moses. Often called the founder of the religion of Israel; one of the most striking and important figures of the OT. The Pentateuch attests to his central role in the exodus of the Israelites from Egypt and in the giving of the law on Mount Sinai.

Although Moses is not mentioned in historical sources outside the Bible, the OT traditions form a rich tapestry of interpretation of his life and mission. His name (derived from the Egyptian mś, "to give birth" or "to bear"; cf. Thutmose, "Thoth is born") and the Egyptian provenance of the Exodus account are incontrovertible evidence of the historical basis of Moses' role; and the biblical tradition, while complex, focuses on Moses and no one else for this portion of sacred history.

Traditionally Moses' life has been divided into three forty-year stages (Acts 7:20–34). Moses was threatened at birth by Pharaoh's decree aimed at the annihilation of the people of Israel; his mother's daring ploy to save him led to his adoption into the Egyptian royal family (Exod. 2:1–10). The young man Moses, now a man with two national identities, defended a Hebrew slave, killed an Egyptian officer, and fled into exile from Egypt. During the second period of his life Moses was adopted into the Midianite (Kenite) family of Jethro (or Reuel) as a "stranger in a strange land" (Exod. 2:11–22).

God, however, had not forgotten his covenant with the patriarchs and called Moses in the burning bush to be his spokesman before Pharaoh and agent of deliverance for Israel (Exod. 3:1–10). God revealed his sacred name (YHWH) to Moses and equipped him with miraculous powers (Exod. 3:11–7:13). After calling down God's judgment against Egypt in plagues and passover (Exod. 7:14–13:16), Moses led the people out of Egypt, and the Lord saved Israel by the miracle at the Red Sea (Exod. 14–15). Thus the people "believed in the Lord and in his servant Moses." Then at Mount Sinai the Lord revealed himself in a theophany and dictated the Decalogue (Exod. 19:16–20:17); however, the people demanded that Moses alone conclude God's covenant with them (Exod. 20:18–24). Moses prescribed the law of God (Torah) for Israel: its sanctuary and priesthood (Exod. 25–31; 35–40), its sacrifices and laws of purity (Leviticus), and a census of its tribes (Num. 1:1–10:10). Moses led the people in the wilderness for forty years (Num. 10:11–36) and uttered a final exhortation to obey the Torah as the people gathered on the verge of the promised land (Deuteronomy). Moses himself was not allowed to enter Canaan (cf. Num. 20:2–13; Deut. 1:37; 3:27; 4:21; Ps. 106:32–33) and was buried somewhere in Moab (Deut. 34).

Moses

Although Moses is mentioned remarkably infrequently elsewhere in the OT (Josh. 24:5; 1 Sam. 12:6,8; Pss. 77, 105–6; Isa. 63:11; Hos. 12:13; Mic. 6:4), his preeminent status and foundational mission are assumed. No other OT figure can compare with Moses (cf. Joshua, Josh. 1:10–11; Elijah, 1 Kings 19; the prophets, Deut. 34:10). Indeed he is the type par excellence of OT expectation. He is the “servant of the Lord” (Num. 12:7–8; Deut. 34:5; Josh. 1:1). He alone spoke “mouth to mouth” with God; therefore, he is the first and greatest of the prophets (Exod. 33:7–23; Num. 12:6–8; Deut. 18:15–18). As lawgiver he dominates the Pentateuch, which can thus be called “the law of Moses” (1 Kings 2:3; Neh. 8:1; Mal. 4:4). His voice is not only authoritative for the wilderness generation, but resounds throughout Israel's history (Deut. 6:20–25; 31:16–22).

Moses is a man zealous for the Lord (Num. 16–17); yet he is also described as “the meekest man on earth” (Num. 12:3). He intercedes on Israel's behalf when it sins, risking his own election for the sake of the people (Exod. 32:32; Num. 11:10–15). He even sets up the bronze serpent as a perpetual sign of God's saving mercy (Num. 21:4–9). Finally, Moses is the founder of the cultic system by which Israel was to seek reconciliation with God, and he and his brother Aaron functioned as priests before the tabernacle (Exod. 40:31–38).

In postbiblical Jewish tradition the role of Moses is extended to that of sage and founder of civilization. Moses is thought to have ascended directly into heaven. For the Jewish halakah Moses was giver of the oral law which authoritatively interprets the Pentateuch (cf. Jub.; M. Aboth 1:1).

The NT assumes the role of Moses as mediator of the covenant (John 1:17; Gal. 3:19) and author of the Pentateuch (Luke 24:27). Numerous passages compare or allude to Moses and Jesus as type and antitype (e.g., Mark 9:2–10; John 3:14; 1 Cor. 10:2–11). Paul's typology emphasizes the inferiority of the revelation to Moses. At other times Paul likens his own apostleship to the mission of Moses (2 Cor. 3:7–18; cf. Rom. 9:3). John likewise sees Jesus as the prophet like Moses (John 6:14); he also sees Moses (and Abraham) as the father of “the Jews” who reject Jesus' revelation (John 9:28). For the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews, the Mosaic covenant is merely a shadow of the true reality, but Moses himself is a model of faith (Heb. 3:1–6; 11:24–28).

S. F. NOLL

Bibliography. W. F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity; W. Michaels, EJ 12:371–411; D. M. Beegle, Moses, the Servant of Yahweh; R. deVaux, Early History of Israel; J. G. Griffiths, “Egyptian Derivation of the Name Moses,” JNES 12:225–31.

Most Holy Place. See TABERNACLE, TEMPLE.

Mother of God. This title was accorded to Mary, the mother of Jesus, at the Council of Ephesus in 431. A bishop named Nestorius—formerly presbyter at Antioch and then made patriarch of Constantinople, but deposed by the council—had found it difficult to accept that the infant born of Mary was “God,” and his difficulty came to expression in a refusal to describe Mary as the “Mother of God,” as she was now commonly styled to emphasize the deity of Christ. The council decreed that the title could rightly be given to Mary because he who was conceived of her was by the Holy Spirit, and was the Son of God and therefore “God” from the moment of his conception.

Unfortunately, the term soon came to be regarded as expressing an exaltation of Mary, and by the sixth century false notions about Mary, originally framed by Gnostics and a sect known as Collyridians, were taken up by the church itself, and the way was open for the worship of Mary, which has since grown so greatly, especially in the Roman Catholic Church.

In the NT Mary is often referred to as the “mother of Jesus” (e.g., John 2:1; Acts 1:14). She was given special grace by God to perform a service to him that was unique. In this regard she stands alone amongst humankind and is regarded by all generations as “blessed.” But Scripture is silent as regards any special standing of Mary herself. The title “mother of God” (theotokos) is thus to be used with caution as regards its implications for Mary, though evangelical theology recognizes its appropriateness when employed, as at Ephesus, to state the true deity of Jesus Christ even in his incarnate life.

W. C. G. PROCTOR

See also MARIOLOGY; MARY, THE BLESSED VIRGIN.

Bibliography. J. McHugh, Mother of Jesus in the New Testament.

Mott, John Raleigh (1865–1955). The chief architect of twentieth-century ecumenism. As a youth he had a Methodist conversion experience and devoted himself to Christian service with boundless enthusiasm and energy. Neither theologically trained nor ordained, he spent his professional career as an official of the American YMCA, first directing the student and foreign work departments and then as general secretary (1915–28). A prodigious speaker, writer, and traveler, he also headed a myriad of committees and boards responsible for missionary and ecumenical ventures.

Deeply influenced by D. L. Moody, from whom he learned the value of total commitment to Christ and the ecumenical ideal, Mott rejected an invitation to direct the evangelist's Chicago Bible Institute and concentrated instead on promoting student involvement in foreign missions. In 1888 he founded the Student Volunteer Movement and in 1895 the World's Student Christian Federation, chairing both until 1920. His vision of transforming the world through the advance of Christianity led to the convening of the Edinburgh Missionary Conference in 1910. He was intimately involved in its planning, was a presiding officer, and chaired its Continuation Committee.

A close friend of President Woodrow Wilson, Mott enthusiastically backed American participation in World War I but afterward worked diligently for reconciliation among the foes. He played a key role in the formation of the International Missionary Council in 1921 and chaired it for twenty years. He also took part in the various ecumenical gatherings that culminated in the founding of the World Council of Churches in 1948. He was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1946.

Mott was no systematic theologian, but his beliefs could best be categorized as liberal evangelical, with an emphasis upon "now" as the time of crisis, promise, and action. He combined Methodist perfectionism with social Christianity and stressed the primacy of ethics over dogma. Through the missionary outreach of the gospel, all nations would be brought into the body of Christ, and every race and people would find expression and be perfected. The task of Christians was to break down every barrier to racial and international understanding and the establishment of world peace. For him the universality of Christian experience and fellowship was more important than doctrinal exclusiveness, and as he said in 1928, he was obliged "to make Jesus Christ known, trusted, loved, and obeyed in the whole range of one's individual life and in all relationships."

R. V. PIERARD

See also MISSIOLOGY.

Bibliography. J. D. Douglas, ed., Twentieth-Century Dictionary of Christian Biography; G. M. Fisher, John R. Mott: An Appreciation; W. R. Hogg, Ecumenical Foundations; C. H. Hopkins, John R. Mott 1865–1955: A Bi- ography; R. C. Mackie, Layman Extraordinary: John R. Mott 1865–1955; B. J. Mathews, John R. Mott: World Citizen; H. Welch, Men of the Outposts.

Movable Feast. A day of the church calendar which depends upon a phase of the moon and thus falls on different dates annually, such as Easter. They are in contrast to fixed feasts, which always occur on the same date, such as Christmas. The contrast is due to the way in which the Christian year developed. Part of it is based on the seven-day week inherited from Judaism. Thus Sunday, the principal day of worship, happens regularly. Other dates, such as Christmas and All Saints, were fixed arbitrarily for annual observance. The dates for the movable feasts are based on cycles of the moon. Chief of these is Easter, the oldest and major festival of the church. Easter is to be "the first Sunday after the first full moon after the vernal equinox" and may fall between March 22 and April 25. The season of preparation for Easter is variable. Lent, which is forty days before Easter (not counting Sundays), starts with Ash Wednesday (which may fall between February 4 and March 10). Major feasts in Lent, including Palm Sunday, Maundy Thursday, Good Friday, and Holy Saturday, are movable. The season of celebration after Easter is variable, including Ascension Day (forty days after) and Pentecost, the climax of "the great fifty days."

C. G. FRY

See also FIXED FEAST.

Bibliography. C. Jones, G. Wainwright, E. Yarnold, Study of Liturgy; A. McArthur, Evolution of the Christian Year.

Muhlenberg, Henry Melchior (1721–1787). Patriarch of colonial American Lutheranism. Muhlenberg was born in Eimbeck, Hanover. A lifelong Lutheran, he was baptized the day he was born and confirmed when he was twelve. He was a precocious child, excelling in languages and music, but his poverty seemed to preclude the possibility of advanced study. Receiving "beneficiary aid," however, he enrolled in 1735 at the new and nearby University of Göttingen, where he studied theology and converted to pietism. For fifteen months following his graduation Muhlenberg served at the orphanage in Halle, a city famed for the ministry of Lutheran pietist August Hermann Francke. Though Muhlenberg aspired to be a missionary to India, he accepted a call to pastor a Lutheran congregation in Grosshennersdorf, Saxony, located a few miles from Herrnhut, the center of revived Moravianism under Nikolaus von Zinzendorf. In the autumn of 1739 he was ordained at Leipzig.

On his thirtieth birthday Muhlenberg had dinner with Johann Gotthilf Francke, son of the famed pietist. Francke shared with Muhlenberg a letter from “dispersed Lutherans in Pennsylvania” who needed a pastor. Muhlenberg’s missionary fervor returned, and he determined to go to America. On December 9, 1741, “under considerable emotion” he preached his farewell sermon to his congregation, then spent some time with Lutherans in England, sailing for Charleston, South Carolina, on June 13, 1742. A voyage of “unusual peril and exhaustion” followed. Arriving on September 23, Muhlenberg began his American ministry. Historian Henry Eyster Jacobs observed that the history of the Lutheran Church in America from 1742 until Muhlenberg’s death was “scarcely more than his biography.” After an initial visit with Salzburger Lutherans at Ebenezer, Georgia, Muhlenberg traveled north to Pennsylvania, arriving unannounced in Philadelphia on November 25. He took charge of three Lutheran congregations within a month—one at New Hanover, another at the Trappe, nine miles south of New Hanover, yet another in Philadelphia itself. Installed on December 27, 1742, as the pastor of “the United Congregations,” Muhlenberg soon added a fourth charge, Germantown. He began a work of “catechizing, confirming, teaching, reconciling, establishing, building, preaching, and administering the sacraments.” His diary, letters, and Halle Reports detail his labors. In 1748 Muhlenberg organized the first permanent Lutheran synod in America, later known as the Pennsylvania Ministerium. Founding Christian day schools, Muhlenberg is “the father of Lutheran parochial education.” In 1749 he purchased ground for a Lutheran seminary in Philadelphia, though one was not founded in that community until after the Civil War. An orphans’ home was established in Philadelphia. The “Savoy Liturgy” of the Lutherans of London was commended to American Lutherans by Muhlenberg in 1748, and in 1782 an American hymnal was prepared under his guidance. A model Lutheran church constitution was adopted by St. Michael’s parish, Philadelphia, at his suggestion. Catechists, evangelists, and pastors were trained at his behest.

Muhlenberg, Henry Melchior

Soon Muhlenberg had a “ministry of reconciliation” among Lutherans from New York to Georgia, speaking Dutch, German, Swedish, and English. By 1771 some eighty-one congregations were under his oversight. Himself a church planter, frontier preacher, and circuit rider-evangelist, Muhlenberg, according to legend, was called by the Indians “the preacher whose words should go through hard hearts of men like a saw through a gnarled tree.” What Francis Asbury was to Methodism and John Carroll to Roman Catholicism, Muhlenberg was to Lutheranism in America. His sound work enabled Lutherans to survive both the American Revolution and the Age of Enlightenment.

C. G. FRY

Bibliography. Journal of Henry Melchior Muhlenberg: Notebook of a Colonial Clergyman: An Anthology of the Journals of Henry Melchior Muhlenberg, T. G. Tappert and J. W. Doberstein, trans.; W. J. Mann, Life and Times of Henry Melchior Muhlenberg; L. R. Riforginto, Missionary of Moderation: Henry Melchor Muhlenberg and the Lutheran Church in English America.

Mullins, Edgar Young (1860–1928). Baptist theologian and educator, best remembered as the president of Southern Baptist Theological Seminary from 1899 to his death in 1928. Mullins was born in Franklin County, Mississippi, January 5, 1860, graduated from Texas A & M (1879), Southern Baptist Theological Seminary (1885), undertook further graduate work at Johns Hopkins University (1891–1892), and served in various pastorates before assuming the presidency of S.B.T.S.

Mullins’s particular genius was administrative and theological. He managed to steer S.B.T.S. through some difficult times to a position of stability when controversy was wracking the nation in terms of the fundamentalist-modernist controversy. Theologically, Mullins’ views were historically evangelical, affirming Jesus’ virgin birth, full deity and sinlessness, his substitutionary death, bodily resurrection, and imminent second coming. In formulating his theological position, Mullins tried to steer between the fundamentalists (while affirming their historic doctrines) and the modernists (while rejecting their antisupernaturalism). His attempt to establish a moderate position in the middle led him away from nineteenth-century doctrinal formulations and time-honored options such as Calvinism and Arminianism to what he felt was an empirically based, scientifically justified biblical position that made use of the latest biblical research, while still affirming the historic Christian faith. Mullins was convinced that scientific facts (as opposed to speculations) would never ultimately contradict Christian truth (as opposed to dogmas). As a result of this fundamental stance, he boldly submitted the Scriptures to empirical evaluation and would not take refuge in a priori reasoning, such as the doctrine of plenary, verbal inspiration (which he probably accepted). Hence he could say in 1905, “Scientific exegesis yields the doctrine of the deity of Christ, and his atoning death and resurrection from the dead. There is no longer any serious controversy on the interpretation of these passages” (Why Is Christianity True? 284). He would later back away from such naive overstatements in Christianity at the Crossroads (1924), moving him into a more conservative stance.

Because of his attempt to establish a centrist position Mullins is variously evaluated today. Some see him as a stalwart defender of the faith, while others see him as making too many concessions to the then-current form of modernity. There is probably truth in both of these contentions. Mullins never wavered from his fundamental commitments, but he does rather naïvely assume the neutrality of scientific studies and their ability to prove the truths of Christianity.

W. A. ELWELL

Bibliography. W. E. Ellis, Man of Books and a Man of the People; W. A. Mueller, History of Southern Baptist Theological Seminary; I. M. Mullins, Edgar Young Mullins: An Intimate Biography; T. J. Nettles, HET 54–66.

Müntzer, Thomas. See ZWICKAU PROPHETS.

Murray, Andrew (1828–1917). South African churchman, educator, and author. Son of the Dutch Reformed Church (DRC) minister in the frontier town of Graaf-Reinet, South Africa, Andrew Murray was educated in Aberdeen, Scotland, and in Utrecht, Holland. He was ordained in the Netherlands and returned to South Africa in 1849, where he became the first regular DRC minister north of the Orange River. His parish covered fifty thousand square miles, and Murray's ministry required frequent long and dangerous journeys to reach the nineteen thousand people in his charge.

After nine years of frontier ministry Murray published his first book, Jesus the Children's Friend, in 1858. He opened Grey College, later to become the University of the Orange Free State, in 1859, and became its first rector. In 1860 he returned to the Cape Colony to a parish in Worcester. In 1862 he was elected moderator of the DRC and became involved in a long theological, political, and legal battle with liberal ministers who were attempting to wrest control of the DRC from evangelicals like Murray.

He moved to Cape Town in 1864 and to Wellington in 1871. In 1879 Murray began what was to become the first of seven great evangelistic tours. Adopting the methods of Moody and Sankey, he toured South Africa organizing revival meetings, which were an astounding success. These activities, plus his growing stature as a theological writer, led to his being invited to preach in 1895 at the Northfield convention in the United States and the Keswick convention in England.

In South Africa he took great interest in missionary work and education. He helped found the DRC missionary union, a mission institute in Wellington, and several other educational foundations. He encouraged the growth of the Student Christian Association in South Africa and founded an interdenominational prayer union in 1904.

Murray was a systematic thinker who wrote over 250 books and many articles. His best-known works are Abide in Christ (1882), Absolute Surrender (1895), and With Christ in the School of Prayer (1885). Through his mystically inclined theology and Second Blessing (1891) he became associated with the charismatic movement. His book Divine Healing (1900) increased his links with Pentecostalism, although following the tragic death of a close friend his views on healing were considerably modified from his earlier ones.

Throughout his life Murray took an active role in South African society. In 1852 he helped organize, and acted as the official interpreter for, the important Sand River Convention, which led to the British recognition of the South African Republic in the Transvaal. He took a keen interest in the welfare and education of Africans and held enlightened views on the race question. One of his last works, Godsdienst en Politiek (Religion and Politics), was a warning against the practice of Afrikaner Nationalist politicians in promoting their political views, which led to the development of apartheid, as "Christian politics." Later, in the 1930s, followers of Murray were to fight a losing battle against Nationalists in the DRC who ignored Murray's evangelical insights and sought to reform the DRC in terms of Abraham Kuyper's neo-Calvinism.

I. HEXHAM

See also KESWICK CONVENTION; NORTHFIELD CONFERENCES.

Bibliography. L. Choy, Andrew Murray: Apostle of Abiding Love; W. M. Douglas, Andrew Murray and His Message; J. du Plessis, Life of Andrew Murray; J. Murray, Young Mrs. Murray Goes to Bloemfontein.

Murray, John (1898–1975). Presbyterian theologian and writer. Born in Sutherland, Scotland, he was brought up in a strict but loving Free Presbyterian home where Calvinistic theology and piety shaped the course of his life. Between studies at Dornoch Academy and the University of Glasgow, he served in France during World War I. His heart's desire to pastor eventually led him in 1924 to prepare at Princeton Seminary. In 1929 he returned to Princeton from studies at Edinburgh to become assistant professor of systematic theology. Caught in the struggle between historic Christianity and liberalism within the Presbyterian Church in the USA, he joined Gresham Machen in the new Orthodox Presbyterian Church in 1930. For the next thirty-six years he taught and wrote at Westminster Theological Seminary.

Above all else, John Murray was a spiritually mature biblical and systematic theologian. His meticulous exegetical and intellectual skills, honed at Princeton under Hodge, Machen, and Vos, forged the core of his theology that stressed the majesty of God, human depravity, and the glories of the person and work of Christ. Murray was no parrot however, for rather than treating the whole of systematics, as his predecessors had done, he produced penetrating insights into particular aspects of theology. All of his work was integrated in a holistic approach to biblical revelation which sought to apply biblical theology and exegesis to the task of systematics. All the while his efforts evidenced the rare combination of theological acumen and spiritual sagacity.

Taken as a whole, his adult life was given to the defense and propagation of the historic Reformed faith and piety. He argued patiently and effectively against encroaching modern views concerning the nature and authority of holy Scripture. His writings are valued today, especially his two-volume commentary on Romans and his various ethical works. As a man who felt and lived his theology, he spent his summers church-planting in New England, led Bible studies on his many boat passages to and from Scotland, and edified many churches and students with his passionate preaching. J. MITCHELL JR.

See also CALVINISM.

Bibliography. J. D. Douglas, ed., Twentieth-Century Dictionary of Christian Biography; S. Ferguson, HET 168–81; I. H. Murray, Life of John Murray.

Music in the Evangelical Tradition. Music has been the art form elected from among all others to give voice to Christian worship, to be joined to the words of the poet-evangelists, and to be used by the church to teach and correct the saints. Servant to the very Word of God itself, music has been the chosen messenger for confession, praise, thanksgiving, edification, and proclamation. Christians may have argued how to sing or what to sing, but few have ever disputed that singing was the natural response of the creature to the Creator.

Biblical Teaching. The Bible is quite comprehensive in its illumination of major issues related to music. There is a record of the first musician, Jubal (Gen. 4:21). There is assent to the emotional impact of music in the story of David and Saul, an early case study in music therapy (1 Sam. 16:14–23). There is the song of Moses, an early example of how music is composed to mark important events (Exod. 15:1–18), as well as countless commands to sing and play instruments to God in the Psalms (Pss. 96, 98, 100, etc.), and these passages have inspired more Christian singing than any others. Christ himself sang a hymn with the disciples in the upper room (Matt. 26:30). Paul opened the door for music as ministry in the epistles (Eph. 5:19). And John in Revelation described the eternal song sung by angels and saints sing around the throne of God (Rev. 5:11–14). While sacred music is not primarily apologetic today, earlier generations of evangelical Christians sang gospel songs to proclaim the truth of the gospel story. The most obvious biblical example is the angels who broke into song when they announced Christ's birth to the shepherds (Luke 2:8–15).

These references, coupled with the statements about excellence (1 Cor. 10:31–11:1), goodness (Phil. 4:8, 9), the declaration of the creation (Ps. 19:1–4), and the inner workings of the body of Christ (1 Cor. 12:27–31), give a comprehensive picture of the ways in which music is to function if it is to please God. But one must also note the ominous warning about the misuse of music that comes from the prophet Amos as he records God's scathing rejection of Israel's worship: "Away with the noise of your songs! I will not listen to the music of your harps" (Amos 5:23).

A Glance Backward. Throughout Christian history, music for worship has existed primarily to serve the liturgy of the local church. The actual form and style of music during the first millennium remains somewhat mysterious because musical notation had not yet been invented. We do know, however, that there was music for the mass and daily prayer times, i.e., corporate worship, and music for private and family devotion. Hymns not based on Holy Scripture were used primarily for the latter. A few hymn texts from the first thousand years are still in use. The Te Deum Laudimus was probably written in the fourth century by Niceta, a bishop in Dacia, north of the Danube. Niceta used his hymns to persuade pagans in his diocese to accept Christ. Niceta may have been among the first to use music for evangelistic purposes.

Early Christian leaders referred to music occasionally in their writings, typically with reference to its function in the liturgy. The music itself was composed of single-line melodies. Prudentius, a fourth-century Spaniard, composed hymns which were considered to have more warmth and glow than those of his contemporary, Ambrose, bishop of Milan. But Prudentius's hymns were used for private devotion, not public worship. Ambrose is remembered for the hymns he composed and taught to his congregation. His most famous convert, Augustine, remarked on how moved he was by Ambrose's hymns. In Hymnal 1982, there are seven of Ambrose's hymns.

Multipart music did not appear until well into the second millennium. The twelfth-century canons at the Notre Dame Cathedral, Léonin and Perotin, were renowned as composers of organum, a simple two-part style which elaborated on the chant melodies of the mass. After organum, other more complex forms developed for two or more voice parts. Gradually choral movements were substituted where congregational song once had been.

When the Reformers Martin Luther, Ulrich Zwingli, and John Calvin emerged, careful attention was paid to the style of music and its appropriateness for worship. Calvin forbade instruments and prescribed Psalm-only singing. Zwingli was a trained musician with more interest in polyphonic choral music than in congregational song. Luther drew on more extensive resources, including traditional chant melodies and even German folk tunes. These were among the significant sources that fueled the genius of Johann Sebastian Bach. It could be argued that Bach set the ultimate standard for music in a formal worship tradition. Regrettably his music is virtually unknown to Western Christians today.

It was under Calvin's influence that metrical Psalm singing became common practice in the Protestant church. The practice of metrical Psalm singing continues to the present day, with the most universal example being the tune Old Hundredth, to which was sung William Kethe's paraphrase of Psalm 100, All People That on Earth Do Dwell. The tune is attributed to Louis Bourgeois, who included it in the 1562 Genevan Psalter. This book was profoundly influential and was translated into several languages by the end of the sixteenth century. It is significant that metrical psalmody was quickly embraced in England and then transplanted to America.

The debate over the use of hymn texts continued just as it had in previous centuries. Yet not even Calvin could stem the tide of hymn writing which poured forth. Many church leaders, like the Baptist pastor Benjamin Keach, endured much criticism as they attempted to reinstate the simple act of hymn singing into worship following the Lord's Supper. Isaac Watts, the father of English hymnody, was a towering example of someone whose imagination flowed with words of praise from the creature to the Creator.

"Christian song was never the same after the Wesleys" (Reynolds and Price, 51). And it was under their intercontinental ministry that the evangelical fervor propelling Western hymnody found brilliant advocates. Charles Wesley composed 6,500 hymn texts, and a significant number are still found in contemporary hymnbooks.

John Newton, the ex-slave trader, pastored two Anglican churches in England. As long as hymns of faith are sung, Newton will be remembered for Amazing Grace. This beloved hymn is the archetype for evangelical hymnody during the two hundred years since it first appeared in Olney Hymns, one of the most important hymnbooks ever published. Newton and his friend and collaborator, William Cowper, were not content with a steady diet of the metrical psalms, such as they found in Sternhold and Hopkins' Certaine Psalmes chose out of the Psalter of David . . ., so they began writing hymns.

The German chorales, the French psalms, and the English hymns all impact the worship of American Christians to the present day. Generations of immigrants came for religious liberty and brought their music with them. The vast body of European hymnody has provided inspiration for those Americans who wrote more formal music, like William Billings, those who wrote the gospel songs, like Fanny Crosby and Robert Lowry, and those who write Christian contemporary music today, like Twila Paris. Paris's For the Glory of the Lord, for example, is written in German chorale style.

Any attempt to summarize the rich and varied tapestry of worship music in the Western church over the last two thousand years is to look through a glass darkly. This heritage is not possessed by one theological tradition alone, but has come from the hearts of believers everywhere.

Today in the Church. The great heritage of worship and music summarized above has perpetuated history, theology, and even literacy in the church for generations. Yet profound changes are taking place and long-held assumptions are being called into question. In the very late twentieth-century evangelical church four broad categories of common practice exist:

- Blended worship is worship that consciously embraces useful forms and styles regardless of their source or connotation. In a time of tremendous diversity, blended worship is seen as a means of weaving together all the music and worship dialects known to people within a local congregation.
- In contemporary worship, most of the conventions of the passing generation are being set aside, including choral programs, organs, and non-popular, non-contemporary music. Contemporary churches place a premium on congregational singing, usually referred to as "praise and worship."
- Traditional worship tends to draw upon the past and to eschew the forms and styles of popular worship. An adult choir and organ will continue to play a central role. Congregational singing is based almost exclusively on the hymnal.
- Increasingly, there are churches with contemporary and traditional worship services. By allowing for the coexistence of two distinct worship services, the personal preference of the individual is accommodated so that other objectives within the congregation can be achieved.

Multimedia. The implementation of various media in the church includes everything from the printed worship folder to the most advanced computer projection systems. Print media is still widely used to communicate news of the congregation, words to songs, and the order of the worship service. Words to songs, sermon notes, and announcements are also being projected onto screens with personal computers, slide and overhead projectors, and LED signboards.

Music in the Evangelical Tradition

Some of the largest churches have programmable lighting systems with a full array of lighting instruments. Sound systems are in use almost everywhere, and it is not uncommon for such systems to supplant natural acoustics.

Instrumental Programs. The organ is probably losing its place as the central accompaniment instrument in evangelical worship. But acoustical pianos are common, and keyboard synthesizers are a widely embraced, low-cost alternative to a piano or an organ.

The term orchestra is used very loosely to describe an assemblage of instrumentalists available within a particular congregation. Church orchestras exist primarily to accompany congregational hymns and, to some extent, adult choirs. A band (or praise band), on the other hand, usually refers to some type of combo including bass guitar, drums, guitars, and some wind instruments.

Choral Programs. While instrumental programs have increased in size and scope, choral programs are diminishing. It is not uncommon to see choirs of various sizes give way to vocal ensembles of four to twelve singers. This shift in emphasis may have an effect on choral programs for younger singers. While junior high and high school choirs have been steadily diminishing since rock and roll, junior choirs (children K–5th grade) may experience decline as well.

Music Repertoire. The gospel song came as a result of the Christian's call to go into all the world to preach the gospel. Most could not withstand critical comparison with the sacred music from Europe, however. Gospel songs were extremely popular among the laity yet judged inferior by the musical establishment. Many thousands of gospel songs were written; Fanny Crosby may have written 9,000 or more herself (Hustad, 232). Although gospel or "experience" songs were written by educated and celebrated people of their day—Robert Lowry was a literature professor; Crosby was known by five American presidents—very few of these songs remain in common usage at present.

On the other hand, classic hymns like Holy, Holy, Holy, continue the European tradition. They are generally well-written musically, and the lyrics are of higher quality than that of gospel songs. Yet this great body of congregational songs has met with much the same fate as the gospel songs. Critics of this music fault it for being too old, using archaic language and a musical style which is formal and impersonal, albeit transcendent. Regrettably, those who love this music tradition have done little to expand it.

There are several notable modern hymnwriters, e.g., Bishop Timothy Dudley Smith and Carl Daw, both Anglican, but very few new hymns which have entered the common practice.

Such songs as Lord, I Lift Your Name on High have enjoyed remarkable popularity. Key writers include Keith Green (There Is a Redeemer); Ralph Carmichael (The New 23rd Psalm); Michael W. and Debbie Smith (Great Is the Lord); Jimmy Owens (Holy, Holy); and, from Britain, Graham Kendrick (Shine, Jesus, Shine). Though thousands of these songs have been written, a much smaller number have found their way into the common practice of the evangelical church today.

Traditional choral music is being sung less and less in evangelical churches. Basic pieces like Jesu, Joy of Man's Desiring, and He, Watching Over Israel are heard more as novelty pieces than as being capable of giving voice to Christian worship. Arrangements of hymns and choral settings of Christian contemporary songs form the core of the common choral repertoire.

Grammatical Perspective. There has been a noticeable shift in the perspective of song lyrics since the praise and worship movement began in the last half of the twentieth century. Now-obsolete gospel songs either addressed the sinner, the Christian, or described attributes of God.

In contrast, the perspective of the praise and worship movement is predominantly directed Godward. Though there is a similarity of perspective between praise and worship music and the classic hymns, the hymns do not enjoy the same affection of the congregations.

Various Considerations. Evangelical churches have been drifting away from European sacred classical music for decades. This growing estrangement is a leading indicator of a host of social and theological issues dividing the liberal and conservative churches. The liberal church, for example, is maintaining a curious alliance with traditional music on one hand and social justice on the other. This is curious because the poor and the marginalized peoples normally have little exposure to traditional sacred classical music.

- Inclusive Language—A variety of issues are being advanced in the hymn and song lyrics of the church. In the case of inclusive language, a hot issue among the evangelical elite, the words of long dead hymn writers are being changed to satisfy contemporary opinions about language. For example, in the eighth-century Irish hymn, Be Thou My Vision, the traditional text as it appears in Hymns for the Living Church reads, "Thou, my great Father, I Thy true son . . ." In Hymnal 1982, gender inclusivity is accommodated as follows, “Thou my great Father; thine own may I be . . .” In Worshiping Church, the entire verse is deleted from the hymn.

- Ageism—As the church tries desperately to attract new converts, special attention is being given to younger families and assumptions are being made about their native musical dialects. The wholesale adoption of contemporary popular musical idioms as the mandated dialect of the advancing generation comes at great cost if the passing generation, i.e., those 50 years of age and older, is lost as a result. Some in this generation who should be looked to as spiritual elders are discovering that their established traditions of worship and fellowship are no longer welcome.

Conclusion. These considerations prompt many questions. Praise and worship music has been implemented among many congregations without due respect for the traditions they displace. But the traditional musicians have failed the church at times, too, by placing such a high value on the created art that the Creator it exists to serve is left in the shadows.

These are the dilemmas that challenge us all to keep searching for the more excellent way. In its rightful place, our great heritage of Christian song, ancient and modern, schooled and amateur, classical and popular, must itself stand in the shadows in order to be a true servant to the Word of God.

T. L. PAYNE

Bibliography. J. G. Anton and P. Wild, Music at the Parish Church; H. M. Best, Music through the Eyes of Faith; A. T. Davison, Church Music; E. Dickinson, Music in the History of the Western Church; L. Ellinwood, History of American Church Music; D. J. Grout, History of Western Music; A. Heilbut, Gospel Sound; W. L. Hooper, Church Music in Transition; D. P. Hustad, Jubilate! Church Music in the Evangelical Tradition; Jubilate II: Church Music in Worship and Renewal; A. R. C. M. MacDermott, Old Church Gallery Minstrels; P. Maulsby, Afro-American Religious Music; W. J. Reynolds and M. Price, Survey of Christian Hymnody; J. Riedel, ed., Cantors at the Crossroads; E. Routley, Twentieth Century Church Music; Words, Music and the Church; A. Wilson-Dickson, Story of Christian Music.

Mystery. The concept of mystery has played an important role in Christian theology. The best theology has always maintained that the known must be balanced by the unknown, that God is a mysterium tremendum et fascinans, compelling the worshiper with awe toward him but remaining ultimately beyond the grasp of human reason and imagination. The mystical tradition, which seeks to use all available means to approach God (reason, prayer, meditation, spiritual imagination, the sacraments), finds its biblical roots in apocalyptic and in such passages as Colossians 2:2–3, where Paul longs that his readers may “have all the riches of assured understanding and the knowledge of God’s mystery, of Christ, in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge” (RSV).

For Paul “mystery” is an important term. Of the twenty-eight NT occurrences twenty-one are from his pen. It was once widely maintained that he used it because of his contacts with adherents of the pagan mystery religions, ecstatic cults laying much emphasis on personal communion with their deity through knowledge of special secrets, and that his own thinking was considerably shaped by these religions. It is now recognized, however, that there are fundamental differences between Paul’s theology and theirs, and that he uses the term “mystery” in a distinctive way. He frequently associates it with words for revelation (e.g., Rom. 16:25; Eph. 3:3–9), and this has led some to assert that, paradoxically, “mystery” is for Paul something no longer mysterious but clearly revealed. This is certainly true of Ephesians 1:9 and Colossians 1:26–27 and accounts for the fact that “mystery” is often virtually identical with “gospel” (e.g., 1 Cor. 2:1; Eph. 6:19; 1 Tim. 3:9). Other scholars, however, feel that it must indicate a continuing degree of hiddenness, even if it is part of Paul’s revelation vocabulary. Paul does seem to use it to convey the ideas of ultimate ungraspability (e.g., 1 Cor. 2:7; 13:2; Eph. 5:32; Col. 2:2), or of present incomprehensibility (Rom. 11:25; 1 Cor. 14:2), or of something eschatological which transcends our present experience (1 Cor. 15:51; 2 Thess. 2:7). These two sides of Paul’s usage—revealed and hidden—are not contradictory. They correspond to the two facets of all our knowledge of God, whose judgments are unsearchable and ways inscrutable (Rom. 11:33), even though “he had made known to us in all wisdom and insight the mystery of his will” (Eph. 1:9, RSV).

S. MOTYER

Bibliography. G. Bornkamm, TDNT 4:802–28; R. E. Brown, Semitic Background of the Term “Mystery” in the New Testament; F. F. Bruce, Paul and Jesus; W. D. Davies, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism; G. Finkenrath, NIDNTT 3:501–6; E. Jünger, God as the Mystery of the World; H. A. A. Kennedy, St. Paul and the Mystery Religions; C. F. D. Moule, IDB 3:479–81; T. E. Wilson, Mystery Doctrines of the New Testament.

Mystery of Iniquity. This phrase is the KJV translation of the Greek to mysterion tes anomias, which Paul employs in 2 Thessalonians 2:7—a passage about which Augustine declared, “I freely confess that I have no idea what he meant.” Detailed interpretation is difficult, but the basic outlines of Paul’s meaning are clear. He wishes to correct the Thessalonians’ mistaken belief that the return of Christ is already past by pointing out that certain events which must precede that day have plainly not taken place. "The rebellion comes first, and the man of lawlessness [anomias] will be revealed" (v. 3). At present this eschatological figure is being "restrained," pending eventual revelation, "for the mystery of lawlessness [iniquity] is already at work." The phrase therefore seems to indicate the presence in the world now, in a veiled but active form, of that which will be the clear characteristic of the "man of lawlessness" when he appears. Because his appearance is eschatological, it seems certain that he is not to be identified with Nero or the pope, as some have maintained. But his precise identity is impossible to determine, as is that of the restrainer, whose activity means that this eschatological "mystery" is prevented from bursting upon the world now. The restrainer has been identified as God, Satan, the Holy Spirit, the Roman Empire, Israel, the principle of order in society, and Paul himself. Certainty is impossible. However, Paul's thought finds a parallel in 1 John 2:18; 4:3. Antichrist is coming, but "the spirit of antichrist" is already seen in the rejection of Jesus the Christ.

Mystery of Iniquity

S. MOTYER

See also ANTICHRIST.

Bibliography. G. E. Ladd, Theology of the New Testament; H. N. Ridderbos, Paul: An Outline of His Theology.

Mystery Religions. During the NT and subsequent eras the most popular religious forms in the Greco-Roman world were those of the mystery religions. Some of these had been imported from Egypt and the Orient, while others were indigenous to Greece. The traditional cults of the Olympic gods were no longer perceived as able to fulfill the common person's spiritual needs, and so there was a turning to those religions that promised salvation and a blessed afterlife. Immortality could be obtained through initiation into a secret experience that was intended to save the soul after death. Aristotle said that the initiated did not learn anything so much as they felt certain emotions and were put into a certain frame of mind. Cicero could maintain that Athens had given to the world no greater institution than that of the Eleusinian mysteries. They provided a reason to live with joy and to die with better hopes. Moreover, a civilized way of life had been established through the rites, which were properly called "initiation" since they taught the beginnings of life. Women in particular responded to the promise of a brighter future, as well as to the increased recognition and participation that were theirs in the mystery cults.

The essence of the mysteries lay in their secrecy. One could incur the death sentence by revealing the mysteries through speech, pantomime, dance, or depiction. Thus it was that a complete understanding of their secrets perished with the last of their adherents. Their influence permeated ancient society so deeply, however, that the general outlines can be constructed with a considerable degree of certainty. Literally thousands of allusions to the mysteries remain in the form of literary references, vase paintings, reliefs, frescoes, inscriptions, funerary statues, and so forth. We are further aided by the confessions of certain of the church fathers who had been initiated into one or more of the mysteries, although their accounts are far from unbiased. Much religious detective work has been expended upon these ancient mysteries.

Seasonal celebrations marked the birth and death of vegetation gods and of yearly changes in the forces of nature. The mystic rites reenacted a myth concerning a divine figure who suffered some sort of violence, was mourned, and then restored to the grateful worshipers amid general jubilation. Beside the reenactment—which was usually accompanied with music, dancing, and sometimes stunning stage effects—there were acts performed, words spoken, objects revealed, a sacrifice offered, and a sacramental meal shared. Sexual symbols and activities were significantly present. Death, marriage, and adoption by the deity were often simulated, and in some cases the initiate was actually supposed thereby to attain divinity. While noise and wild tumult often accompanied the earlier stages of initiation, silence was attendant upon the ultimate unveiling of the truth. In the Mithras cult the initiate had to lay his finger on his lips, address Silence as the symbol of the living, imperishable God, and pray, "Guard me, Silence." The culmination of the Eleusinian rites was said to be the display in complete silence of a newly reaped ear of corn. Such beatific visions guaranteed a blessed afterlife to the initiate.

There were within the mysteries successive grades of initiation in which truth might be perceived in a progressive series. On several occasions Plato likened the discovery of philosophic truth to these levels of initiation. Theon of Smyrna described five stages, the first of which was purification. The second communicated some sort of explanation of the rite and an exhortation. There followed a revelation of a sacred spectacle, after which the initiate was crowned with a garland. Then came the final stage, the happiness of knowing that one was beloved of the gods. The objective was indeed participation in the divine life.

Each of the mysteries had its distinctives, although there were great similarities and much syncretism in late antiquity. The most famous was that of Eleusis, whose cult was officially adopted by Athens. It centered upon Demeter, the Earth Mother, and her daughter Persephone, who was abducted to the underworld by its god, Hades. There she became his bride and queen of the dead. Each year she returned for nine months to her mother, who then caused the corn to grow and returned fertility to the earth. Demeter, bringing her gift of agriculture and civilization, had commanded Eleusis to establish her rites, to which anyone who spoke Greek—even women and slaves—might be admitted. The Isis cult retold the search of the sorrowing Isis for her dead husband, Osiris, who had been slain and dismembered by the wicked Set. The cult, closely associated with Egypt, celebrated the discovery of the god's scattered members and his restoration to life. Apuleius described his own initiation into the mysteries of Isis at Corinth. Wildly popular with women was the cult of Dionysus, with its altered state of consciousness and escape from home life. Usually celebrated at night, the rites featured dancing on the mountains, the use of wine and occasionally drugs, ecstatic madness, sex reversal, promiscuity, ritual shouting, the music of flutes and castanets, and in earlier times the rending and eating raw of wild animals. Certain of these rites were accessible only to female adherents, who were called "maenads," or mad women. The cult of Mithras, often embraced by Roman soldiers, admitted only men. The male worshippers of Cybele, great mother of the gods, sometimes castrated themselves in the frenzy of her rites, and the goddess was served by eunuch priests. Both the Cybele and Mithras cults employed the practice of taurobolium, the slaughter of a bull whose blood dripped through a grate down onto the worshiper who stood beneath. The singer Orpheus, who managed to descend to the nether world and return to earth, was credited with having instituted various mysteries. Small groups adopted an "Orphic" theology, which centered on purification and the means whereby the soul might escape the prison tomb of the body and ascend to the realm of the blessed.

Christian and pagan authors alike inveighed against some of the gross and barbarous elements associated with the mysteries. Even human sacrifice on a few rare occasions may have played a part. Clement of Alexandria complained that the mysteries gave instruction in "adulterous trickery" and that they consisted of murders and burials. W. M. Ramsay has suggested that the initiate was first exposed to sordid scenes of rape and violence, later to visions of tranquility, civilization, and productivity. Especially after the advent of Christianity, the myths which related the manifold vices of the gods, as well as the more offensive practices, were spiritualized into allegories of a more sublime nature. Many features of Christianity were adopted into the mysteries of late antiquity. The concept of resurrection, for instance, is not attested in these cults until after the first century A.D.

Scholars have been quick to note the similarities between Christianity and the mystery religions. It should be noted that Christianity is based upon a historical person, while the mysteries were based upon myths of gods whose experiences were repeated yearly. The mysteries were mainly devoid of a written revelation and were constantly subject to change. Nevertheless, Christianity owed a debt to mystery religion. Church fathers such as Eusebius, Justin Martyr, and Ignatius held that the mysteries were a preparatory stage in Christian enlightenment. Just as Philo of Alexandria explained Judaism in terms of Greek mystery religion, so the apostle Paul declared that he imparted the wisdom of God in the form of a mystery (1 Cor. 2:7). Examples of mystery concepts applied to Christian truth may be found in Colossians 1:26–2:8; Romans 16:25–26; 1 Corinthians 15:42–49; and Philippians 3:12, 15; while 2 Peter 1:16 contrasts initiation practices with those used in Christian revelation. Here, as elsewhere, technical language is borrowed from the mysteries. While there might be such borrowings of concept and language in the NT, actual vestiges of pagan religion were vigorously denounced. There are numerous indications that many members of the congregation at Corinth were newly converted from mystery cults and still clung to old ways such as ceremonial drunkenness, fornication, participation in an idol's feast, the noisy clamor of worship, and the ritual cries of women. It was a syncretization of Christianity and mystery religion which, according to Hippolytus and others, produced the heresies known as Gnosticism.

R. C. KROEGER AND C. C. KROEGER

See also Gnosticism.

Bibliography. S. Angus, Mystery-Religions and Christianity; Religious Quests of the Graeco-Roman World; U. Bianchi, Greek Mysteries; C. Brown, NIDNTT 3:506–11; F. Cumont, Oriental Religions in Roman Paganism; M. Detienne, Dionysos Slain; E. R. Dodds, Greeks and the Irrational; L. R. Farnell, Cults of the Greek States; F. Finegan, Myth and Mystery; J. Godwin, Mystery Religions in the Ancient World; J. G. Griffiths, Isis Book; W. K. C. Guthrie, Orpheus and Greek Religion; S. K. Heyob, Cult of Isis among Women in the Graeco-Roman World; C. Kerényi, Dionysus: Archetypal Image of Indestructible Life; I. M. Linforth, Arts of Orpheus; G. Mylonas, Eleusis and the Eleusinian Mysteries; M. P. Nilsson, Dionysiac Mysteries of the Hellenistic Age; A. D. Nock, Conversion; Early Gentile Christianity and Its Hellenistic Background; W. F. Otto, Dionysus: Myth and Cult; W. M. Ramsay, "Relation of St. Paul to the Greek Mysteries," in Teaching of St. Paul in Terms of the Present Day; M. I. Rostovtzeff, Mystic Italy; D. Ulansey, Origins of the Mithraic Mysteries; M. H. Vermaseren, Cybele and Attis; R. E. Witt, Isis in the Graeco-Roman World.

Mystical Sense of Scripture

Mystical Sense of Scripture. See INTERPRETATION OF THE BIBLE.

Mystical Union. See UNIO MYSTICA.

Mysticism. As recognized by all writers on this subject, whether they claim direct personal mystical experience or not, both the definition and description of the mystical encounter are difficult. It is clear, however, that mysticism is not the same as magic, clairvoyance, parapsychology, or occultism, nor does it consist in a preoccupation with sensory images, visions, or special revelations. Nearly all Christian mystics relegate these phenomena to the periphery and avoid the occult arts entirely. Briefly and generally stated, mystical theology or Christian mysticism seeks to describe an experiential, direct, nonabstract, unmediated, loving knowing of God, a knowing or seeing so direct as to be called union with God.

History. A brief historical survey of Christian mysticism is essential to an understanding of the varied ways in which it is explained and defined. Although the terms “mystery” and “mystical” are related etymologically to ancient mystery cults, it is doubtful that NT and patristic writers were dependent theologically upon these sources. A distinct mystical or mystery theology emerged in the Alexandrian school of exegesis and spirituality with Clement of Alexandria and Origen and their search for the hidden meaning of Scripture and their exposition of the mystery of redemption. The Cappadocian fathers, especially Gregory of Nyssa; leading monastics, especially Evagrius of Pontus (346–99) and John Cassian (ca. 360–435); Augustine of Hippo; and the obscure personage known as Dionysius the Pseudo-Areopagite created the formative legacy for medieval mysticism. The term generally used until the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries to describe the mystical experience was “contemplation.” In its original philosophical meaning this word (Gr. theōria) described absorption in the loving viewing of an object or truth.

Only in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, with the writings of Richard of Saint Victor and Thomas Aquinas, do systematic descriptive analyses of the contemplative life appear. Late medieval concern with practical and methodical prayer contributed to a turning point in the sixteenth century Ignatian and Carmelite schools (Ignatius Loyola, Teresa of Ávila, John of the Cross). Spiritual writers from these traditions were concerned primarily with empirical, psychological, and systematic descriptions of the soul’s behavior in order to assist spiritual directors. Protestants generally rejected mystical theology. Despite his acquaintance with medieval mystical writings, Martin Luther cannot be called a mystic, recent attempts to arrange his theology around a mystical center notwithstanding. Some Protestants in most periods retained an interest in the mystical tradition, although they should not necessarily be considered mystics (Erb on Gottfried Arnold). But mainstream Protestantism has generally mistrusted or been openly hostile toward a mystical dimension of the spiritual life.

In Catholic circles mystical theology was virtually submerged under a tide of enlightenment rationalism in the eighteenth century. A mystical reaction to rationalism and naturalism, aided by the development of psychological science in the later nineteenth century, is still bearing fruit in the late twentieth century. A controversy over the relation of mystical theology to “ordinary” prayer and the Christian striving for holiness or perfection dominated the early decades of the twentieth century. In general, whereas many Catholic theologians reacted to the challenge of rationalism, naturalism, and modernism with renewed attention to mystical and liturgical spiritual theology, many Protestant evangelicals have responded with a generally rational theology of the letter of Scripture. Others gave renewed attention to spirituality in the 1970s but still prefer a “Reformation faith piety” or “prophetic spirituality” to mystical contemplation, partly because of the rejection of mystery in liturgical and sacramental theology and practice. But contemporary evangelical antipathy toward mysticism is also partly the result of Barthian influence that reduces mysticism (and pietism) to an unbiblical subjectivity and anthropocentrism that denies the utterly transcendent reality of God.

The Nature of Mysticism. Beyond a general descriptive definition as offered above, explanations of the nature and characteristics of the mystical experience vary widely. Throughout Christian history and especially since the sixteenth century, many Roman Catholic authors have distinguished ordinary or “acquired” prayer, even if occurring at a supraconceptual level of love, adoration, and desire for God, from the extraordinary or “infused” contemplation that is entirely the work of God’s special grace. Only the latter is mystical in a strict sense, according to this view. Other writers, both Catholic and Protestant, would apply the term “mystical” to virtually all communion with God. In the twentieth century some Catholic theologians (e.g., L. Bouyer, A. Stolz, H. U. von Balthasar) in conjunction with the movement for liturgical renewal, have sought to locate mystical theology in a scriptural and liturgical context, emphasizing the believer’s participation in the mystery of God’s reconciliation with his creatures in Christ, especially in the sacraments. In his masterful survey of the history of Western Christian mysticism, Bernard McGinn has proposed “preparation for, consciousness of, and reaction to . . . the immediate or direct presence of God” as the best general rubric.

Many attempts have been made to describe the fundamental characteristics of mystical experience. Traditionally it has been asserted that the experiential union of creature and Creator is inexpressible and ineffable, although those who have experienced it seek imagery and metaphors to describe it, however imperfectly. As noted above, it is experienced union or vision, not abstract knowledge. It is beyond the level of concepts, for reasoning, ideas, and sensory images have been transcended (but not rejected) in an intuitive union. Thus it is suprarational and supraintellectual, not antirational or anti-intellectual. In one sense the soul is passive, because it experiences God’s grace poured into itself. Yet the union is not quietistic, because the soul consents to and is activated by the spiritual marriage (Martin). Although some authors also stress the transient and fleeting nature of mystical union, others describe it as lasting for a definite, even prolonged period of time. More recent theological and liturgical understandings of mystical theology, unlike the systematic phenomenological and “empirical” manuals of the early twentieth century, define characteristics less precisely and seek to fit mystical theology more centrally into an ecclesial and soteriological framework.

The Mystical Way. The various stages of the mystical way have also been described in immensely varying manner. Virtually all writers agree, however, that purification (purgation or cleansing) and discipline are prerequisites. Each of the three classic stages—the way of purification or purgation; the way of illumination; and the unitive way or the mystical union itself (not necessarily occurring in a fixed sequence but rather in interaction with each other)—may be described as consisting of various degrees or gradations. It should not be forgotten that the monastic life, the standard path of ascetic purification throughout much of Christian history, has served as the foundation for much Christian mysticism. Unfortunately, this foundation has been overlooked by some modern scholars who consider mystics to be individualistic seekers after noninstitutional, extrasacramental religious ecstasy.

Teachings about the mystical union have often brought charges of pantheism upon their exponents. Although most mystics seek to transcend the limits of the (false) self, they have been careful to insist on the preservation of the soul’s identity in the union with God, choosing such imagery as that of iron glowing in the fire of unitive love, taking on fire in union with the fire, yet without loss of its properties as iron. Indeed, one should rather stress that, far from losing itself, the soul finds its true identity in the mystical union. Many Protestants have found palatable only those mystical writers who are thought to have limited mystical union to a “conformity of human and divine wills,” rather than those who teach an ontological union, a union of essence or being. This distinction is problematical, since the meaning of either “ontological union” or “conformity of will” depends on the presuppositions about human nature held by the author in question. Others have stressed a “prophetic faith piety” or “Reformation” alternative to supposed pantheistic or panentheistic mysticism (e.g., Heiler, Bloesch, in part under the influence of Brunner and Barth).

Scriptural sources for Christian mysticism are found largely in the Logos-incarnation doctrine of John’s Gospel, in imagery such as that of the vine and branches (John 15) or Christ’s prayer for union (John 17), as well as in aspects of the Pauline corpus. The latter include the description of Paul’s rapture into the third heaven (2 Cor. 12:1–4) or statements such as that referring to a life “hid with Christ in God” (Col. 3:3). In all of these the essential theological presuppositions involve belief in a personal God and in the centrality of the incarnation. For medieval mystics Moses’ “vision” of God (Exod. 33:12–34:9) and his reflection of God’s glory upon leaving Mount Sinai (Exod. 34:29–35; cf. 2 Cor. 3:7) served as proof texts, and the allegorized spiritual marriage of the Song of Solomon, together with the other OT Wisdom literature, provided unlimited scriptural resources until the shift from spiritual to literal-grammatical humanist and Reformation hermeneutics took place.

Anthropologically, Christian mystical theology presupposes a human capacity or fittedness for God, drawing especially upon the doctrine of human beings created in the image of God and on the doctrine of God become human in Christ. Christian mystics have traditionally understood mystical union as a restoration of the image and likeness of God that was distorted or lost at the fall from innocence. The image of God, distorted but not destroyed, remains as the foundation for the journey from the land of unlikeness to restored likeness and union. Especially in the fourteenth-century German Dominican school (Eckhart, Tauler), this teaching on the image of God in humans was expressed with terms such as the “basic will” or “ground” (Grund) of the soul or the “spark of divinity” in the human soul. In any case, although it stresses union with God who transcends all human limitations, mystical theology is incompatible with either an exclusively transcendent or an exclusively immanent doctrine of God—the God who transcends also became incarnate in Christ and he is immanent in his creatures created in his image. For this reason many representatives of both the social gospel and neo-orthodox theology have been stridently antimystical.

Mysticism

Conclusion. Christian mysticism has often been portrayed as having modified and imported into Christianity the Platonic (Neoplatonic) doctrine of cosmological emanation in creation from the idea of the One and, in mystical union, a corresponding return to the One. While a concern to relate the Creator to creation both immanently and transcendently has from the earliest centuries led Christian mystics to make use of Neoplatonic philosophy, equally prominent are those (especially in the Franciscan school) whose theology is Christocentric, ecclesial, and liturgical. One of the most cosmologically sophisticated medieval mystics, Nicolas of Cusa (1401–64), drew deeply from Neoplatonic and Eckhartian emanationism but was also profoundly Christocentric. The issue cannot be resolved solely with broad brushstrokes of meta-historical categories such as Neoplatonism.

Of the other issues that have recurred in mystical writings and studies of mystical writings, one of the most enduring is the question of the relation between cognitive, intellectual, or speculative elements, on the one hand, and affective, loving, or supraconceptual and suprarational elements on the other. The negative way that “ascends” by stripping off all cognitions and images until one “sees” God in a “cloud of unknowing” darkness differs from the philosophical systems that claim mystical knowledge to be the human reason (including will, intellect, and feeling) exploring the sphere above that of limited rationalism (Inge), as well as the simple clinging to God in love alone posited by some mystics. Such distinctions, however, are not absolute, and most mystics stress the interrelatedness of love and cognition.

The problem of the objective quality of mystical experience that so preoccupied the psychological-empirical writers of the early twentieth century has become less significant for Christians dealing with mysticism theologically in its scriptural, ecclesial, and liturgical context. At the same time, for students of the philosophy of religion the question of objective content has gained renewed attention as nineteenth-century naturalism wanes and Western interest in Eastern mysticism and religions grows.

D. D. MARTIN

See also BOEHME, JAKOB; CLOUD OF UNKNOWING, THE; DEVOTIO MODERNA; DIONYSIUS THE PSEUDO-AREOPAGITE; GREGORY OF NYSSA; HESYCHASM; ILLUMINATIVE WAY, THE; JOHN OF THE CROSS; JONES, RUFUS MATTHEW; MEISTER ECKHART; MERTON, THOMAS; PRAYER; PURGATIVE WAY, THE; SPIRITUALITY; TAULER, JOHANNES; TERESA OF ÁVILA; UNDERHILL, EVELYN; UNIO MYSTICA; UNITIVE WAY, THE; VON HÜGEL, FRIEDRICH.

Bibliography. L. Bouyer, F. Vandenbroucke, and J. Leclercq, History of Christian Spirituality; C. Butler, Western Mysticism; H. D. Egan, What Are They Saying about Mysticism?; P. C. Erb, Pietists, Protestants, and Mysticism: The Use of Late Medieval Spiritual Texts in the Work of Gottfried Arnold (1666–1714); G. Harkness, Mysticism: Its Meaning and Message; F. Heiler, Prayer; W. James, Varieties of Religious Experience; C. Jones, G. Wainwright, and E. Yarnold Jr., eds., Study of Spirituality; R. M. Jones, Studies in Mystical Religion; S. T. Katz, ed., Mysticism and Philosophical Analysis; T. S. Kepler, comp., Anthology of Devotional Literature; V. Lossky, Mystical Theology of the Eastern Church; A. Louth, Origins of Christian Mystical Theology; D. Martin, “Trinitarian and Mystical Receptivity: Modern Theory and a Medieval Case Study,” TS 56:696–708; B. McGinn, Presence of God: A History of Western Christian Mysticism; T. Merton, New Seeds of Contemplation; P. Murray, Mysticism Debate; A. Nygren, Agape and Eros; R. Otto, Idea of the Holy; A. Poulain, Graces of Interior Prayer; A. W. Tozer, Knowledge of the Holy; E. Underhill, Mysticism; Mystics of the Church; H. U. von Balthasar, “Understanding Christian Mysticism,” in Explorations in Theology, E. T. Oakes, trans.; F. von Hügel, Mystical Element of Religion; R. C. Zaehner, Mysticism, Sacred and Profane.

Myth. The etymological origin of myth is debated, its origin in time unknown, its nature hard to define, its truth value questioned, and its usage as an interpretive tool difficult. Indicating in Greek a thought, word, or account, mythos originally was used of ancient stories about human encounters with supernatural beings. Later, myth increasingly became distinct from logos (understood as the historically true word).

In popular usage today myth is equated with fable, legend, and untruth. Scholars of mythology, ethnology, literature, and folklore, however, understand that a story being a myth does not by definition preclude that some of its elements can be historically true. In academic circles the concept of myth refers to an entertaining yet authoritative narrative expressive of a given culture’s worldview. Archetypal situations meaningful to a culture are usually located in some primordial time (at the beginning or end of time) and in some pristine place (usually taking one’s own geographical location as the axis mundi). A myth can make these situations come alive for a believer so that the eternal mysteries of origins, good, evil, life, and death—as well as the everyday questions of identity, social role, guilt, sexuality, heroic model, and life in community—can be imaginatively worked through on a deeper level using profound ancient symbols that reorient the self and revitalize the community. To believers these myths and corresponding rituals are “alive” (unquestioned and meaningful), but to unbelievers they are “dead” (broken).

Myths have been given many different explanations throughout history: literal, allegorical (Stoics, Origen), rationalist (Sophists, Euhemerus), romantic (Herder, Schelling), anthropological (Tylor, Malinowski), structuralist (Levi-Strauss, Leach), existentialist (Bultmann, Tillich), linguistic-metaphorical (Muller), symbolical (Cassirer, Ricoeur), and psychological (Freud, Jung). More recent approaches analyze how myths function in a given society (Eliade, Campbell).

Myths function like worldviews within a given community: (1) to explain past, present, and future realities, (2) to sanction common values, goals, and institutions, (3) to reinforce beliefs in times of crisis and transition, (4) to integrate one's experiences of the universe, the community, and the self, and (5) to enable adaptation and revitalization (based on Charles Kraft, Christianity in Culture).

There are five references to myth in the New Testament. Strong rejection among Christians of unresolvable myths and endless Jewish genealogies is urged in 1 Timothy 1:3–7; 4:7–8; 2 Timothy 4:1–5, and Titus 1:13–14. Though they involve entertaining stories, Paul views myths as profane, unhealthy, and useless because they teach strange doctrines that oppose the sound truth of the gospel and detract from the discipline development of a godly character and a good conscience (see also Titus 3:9). Second Peter 1:12–21 also contrasts sharply the appeal of some cleverly invented mythoi (fables or allegories) with the truth of the Christian tradition, based upon apostolic eyewitness accounts which confirm God's prophetic word of the Old Testament.

In 1835 D. F. Strauss appealed to myths as legendary embellishments in the gospels, based on the Old Testament, as a way to avoid skeptical rationalism as well as gullible supernaturalism in reading the New Testament. In 1941 Rudolf Bultmann used the concept of myth to give an existentialist interpretation of the New Testament. The eschatological elements of the kerygma, couched in Gnostic mythological concepts, were not to be rejected (Reimarus) or replaced by ethics (Ritschl) but reinterpreted in the kind of categories found in Heidegger's existentialist philosophy ("demythologization"). Thus he believed the Christian kerygma fulfilled the modern search for authentic existence. In 1977 the authors of Myth of God Incarnate sought parallels in Samaritan, Galilean, and the "divine man" eschatological mythologies to explain how the church transformed the man Jesus into God incarnate.

Many scholars have concluded that the Bible has no mythology (see, for instance, R. K. Harrison, G. E. Wright, G. Stahlin, F. F. Bruce). Some critical scholars using literary criticism (Gunkel, De Wette) claim the Bible presents its own unique mythology borrowing mythological themes (like the flood) and terms (for instance, Tiamat and Leviathan). However, even if words echoing Babylonian or Canaanite mythologies can be found in the Bible, the validity of a concept should not be based on the linguistic origins of the terms used (the genetic fallacy). Second, biblical stories and mythic stories should not be naively equated as being identical simply because both include supernatural elements (the fallacy of the undistributed middle term). And, in a different approach, C. S. Lewis proposed that in the incarnation of Christ myth became fact without ceasing to be myth (in God in the Dock).

J. D. CASTELEIN

See also BULTMANN, RUDOLF; DEMYTHOLOGIZATION; MYTH OF GOD INCARNATE DEBATE.

Bibliography. F. F. Bruce, "Myth," in NIDNTT 2:643–47; Rudolf Bultmann, et al., Kerygma and Myth: A Theological Debate, H. W. Bartsch, ed.; J. Campbell, Power of Myth; M. Erickson, "Logical Problem: Mythological Christology," in Word Became Flesh; G. Stahlin, "Muthos," TDNT 4:762–95.

Myth of God Incarnate Debate. In 1977 seven scholars (Don Cupitt, Michael Goulder, John Hick, Leslie Houlden, Dennis Nineham, Maurice Wiles, Frances Young) published views (Myth of God Incarnate) calling in question the Christian understanding of Christ's incarnation. Their views were not unprecedented but touched a nerve in the press and among the public, especially in Britain. Four convictions were common to this group. (1) Historical critical reading of the New Testament indicated that its earliest texts do not support the incarnation as understood in later texts (e.g., John's Gospel) and church confessions. (2) To talk of Jesus as both God and man is logically incoherent and therefore to be rejected as unbecoming of modern reason. (3) The incarnation adds nothing essential to the Christian faith, which can get along well enough without it. (4) The incarnation as traditionally understood is a great barrier between Christianity and other world religions, e.g., Islam; for the sake of a suitably global theology, the incarnation must be either jettisoned or radically reformulated.

Conservative Christian response was immediate and predictably negative. No less critical was reaction from thinkers denying any ties with fundamentalists or uncritical Christian belief: Brian Hebblethwaite, Nicholas Lash, Charles Moule, Stephen Sykes, Graham Stanton, Lesslie Newbigin, and John Rodwell (Incarnation and Myth: Debate Continued; cf. The Truth of God Incarnate). In the decades since the debate exploded, discussion has continued, often in a calmer vein, with Hick now claiming that a "new global consciousness" makes traditional incarnational doctrine unacceptable, because if Jesus "was God incarnate, Christianity is the only religion founded by God in person, and must as such be uniquely superior to all other religions" (Metaphor of God In- carne). This is a view which Hick, like other “myth” proponents, feels bound to reject.

Myth of God Incarnate Debate

Arguing that the incarnation as traditionally confessed may be both intellectually viable and practically necessary, Hebblethwaite sees the following as lost when the incarnation is viewed as untrue or at best metaphor: (1) our knowledge of God in person, (2) our knowledge of God as love, (3) the experience of Christ as the living Lord, (4) our understanding of the cross in its fullest sense, and (5) Christian conviction that “through the risen Christ . . . God will sum up all things in the consummated life of heaven.” John Macquarrie may have already said the last word, however, in the same year the debate began. It would be anachronistic, he concedes, to regard the myth-of-God arguments “as Arian, deist or Unitarian, but unquestionable there are affinities, and it is hardly likely that an updated Christianity without incarnation will prove any more successful than these dead ends of the past” (Truth of God Incarnate, 144).

R. W. YARBROUGH

See also CHRISTOLOGY.

Bibliography. M. Goulder, ed., Incarnation and Myth: The Debate Continued; M. Green, ed., Truth of God Incarnate; B. Hebblethwaite, “Myth and Truth Debate,” in Crisis in Christology, W. R. Farmer, ed.; J. Hick, Metaphor of God Incarnate; J. Hick, ed., Myth of God Incarnate; T. Morris, Logic of God Incarnate.

Nn

Nag Hammadi Codices. In 1945 twelve plus codices (books) were discovered by Egyptian farmers in cliffs that border the Nile River about six miles outside Nag Hammadi, just north of Luxor. Not all of the circumstances surrounding the discovery are clear. Likewise, there is mystery about the events that eventually brought the various documents to their present home in the Coptic museum in Cairo. The story contains clan rivalry, intrigue, and even murder. Parts of at least one codex were burned as cooking fuel.

There are forty-two different tractates in the collection, some being represented by more than one copy, bringing the total to fifty-two. The documents were translated from Greek into Coptic about A.D. 400. Most originated in Christian Gnostic circles, probably as early as the second century. Two of the texts, Teachings of Silvanus and Sentence of Sextus, are Christian but not Gnostic. A few short sections from Plato's Republic are included in the collection.

The general outlines of Gnosticism in the Nag Hammadi writings are familiar from what is contained in other ancient sources. They state or imply that matter is inherently evil, propound salvation by knowledge of both the inner self and the cosmos (which makes Gnosticism appealing to such groups as Jungian psychology and New Age movements), employ esoteric speculations, and use symbolic language—including the affirmation that women, representatives of the material, will be made "male" so that "she too may become a living spirit resembling you males" (Gospel of Thomas 114).

The documents can be classified by literary type, such as gospels, acts, epistles, apocalypses, discourses, dialogues, worship materials, doctrine, and others. Another way to arrange them is by their religious orientation, particularly the type of Gnosticism they represent.

The importance of the Nag Hammadi find can be appreciated by noting two facts. (1) Along with Jewish legalism, Gnosticism was the major internal threat to Christianity in the earliest centuries. (2) A number of the early Christian writers, including (but not limited to) Hippolytus, Eusebius, and Irenaeus describe Gnosticism. Some, such as Irenaeus, seem to have done so fairly accurately. Nevertheless, before this discovery virtually all we knew of Gnostic thought came from its enemies.

At the same time, the Nag Hammadi documents display Gnosticism as a more complex phenomenon than do their antagonists. Although Hippolytus mentions Sethian Gnosticism, it is missing from Irenaeus's list. The Nag Hammadi documents contain a number of representative writings from this school. Valentinianism seems to have been one of the more important Gnostic systems. Irenaeus describes it in some detail. The Nag Hammadi collection contains a number of writings from a clearly Valentinian origin. Gospel of Truth was most probably written by Valentinus himself.

Some NT figures appear prominently in the Nag Hammadi writings. The titles of at least three tractates each bear the names of John and James, two each are associated with Peter, Philip, Paul, and Thomas. Of these Gospel of Thomas has attracted the most attention. It is essentially a collection of isolated "sayings" by Jesus. Some are identical, others similar, and still others quite different from NT statements; attempts have been made to identify Gospel of Thomas with the hypothetical "Q" source from which Luke and Matthew allegedly drew material.

"James, the brother of Jesus" (or "The Just") plays an important role in Jewish Christian tradition. Gospel of Thomas (12) says that for James' "sake heaven and earth came into being." Although the Nag Hammadi books with which he is associated sometimes confuse him with James, the brother of John, his prominence here suggests a stronger Gnostic element than previously suspected in some aspects of Jewish Christianity.

Although they relate to vastly different areas, the Nag Hammadi documents rank with the Dead Sea Scrolls as the most important twentieth-century discoveries for Christian studies. They have contributed to the study of the Coptic language and literature as well as to papyrology. The Nag Hammadi collection provide sizable, significant new data for the study of Gnosticism and opened the door to almost countless new studies, theories, monographs, and articles on the subject. These include both the fields of Jewish sectarianism and early Christian heresiology.

Nag Hammadi Codices

Because of the importance of Gnosticism in early Christianity, it goes without saying that the Nag Hammadi documents have impacted church history and historical theology in general, especially of the earliest periods. One case may be cited as an example of particular significance. In 1934 Walter Bauer (Orthodoxy and Heresy) proposed the hypothesis that in the early second century there was no universally accepted "orthodoxy," but rather various geographical areas had their own distinctive, legitimate views of Christianity. Gnosticism, he said, was one of the popular options. Since the discovery of the Nag Hammadi documents, his theory has been revised and argued with renewed intensity, and is widely held among nonevangelical scholars.

Note has already been made of something of the effects of Gospel of Thomas in Synoptic studies. Bultmann's efforts to associate the Johannine writings with Gnosticism have also been encouraged by these Coptic documents. The same could be said for Pauline studies and other parts of the NT.

No serious work in the fields of biblical, historical, and theological studies touched by the Nag Hammadi documents can ignore them or their impact. At the same time, it must be remembered that both the documents themselves and the theological position they represent were weighed in the balances by the church and found wanting. They provide important evidence of that with which such Christian illuminaries as the second-century missionary-pastor Irenaeus (Against All Heresies) wrestled and rejected as contrary to the revelation of God in Scripture. Modern readers of these ancient Gnostic documents should also not fail to pay attention to the analyses and refutations by those who lived in close proximity with proponents of Gnosticism and rejected as inadequate their view of the Christian faith.

J. J. SCOTT JR.

See also Gnosticism.

Bibliography. A. K. Helmbold, Nag Hammadi Gnostic Texts and the Bible; B. Layton, Gnostic Scriptures; E. Pagels, Gnostic Gospels; A. B. Pearson, "Nag Hammadi Codices," ABD 4:984-93; S. Pétremont, Separate God: The Origins and Techniques of Gnosticism; J. M. Robinson and M. Meyer, eds., Nag Hammadi Library in English; D. Scholer, Nag Hammadi Bibliography 1948-1969 (supplemented annually in Novum Testamentum, beginning with vol. 13 [1971]); G. A. Vallée, Study in Anti-Gnostic Polemics: Irenaeus, Hippolytus, and Epiphanies; R. McL. Wilson, Gnostic Problem; E. M. Yamauchi, Pre-Christian Gnosticism.

Names in Bible Times, Significance of. The very fact that the word name occurs more than a thousand times in the Bible attests to its theological importance. In the ancient world a name was not merely a label but was virtually equivalent to whoever or whatever bore it. First Samuel 25:25 is a key passage: "Nabal . . . is just like his name—his name is Fool, and folly goes with him." The Greek word for "names" is correctly translated "people" in Revelation 3:4. Name often means (or is translated as) reputation (Mark 6:14; Rev. 3:1), authority/power (Matt. 7:22; Acts 4:7), or character (Matt. 6:9). In the OT it is frequently found in parallelism with memory, remembrance, or renown (e.g., Exod. 3:15; Job 18:17; Ps. 135:13).

Giving a name to anyone or anything was tantamount to owning or controlling it (Gen. 1:5, 8, 10; 2:19-20; 2 Sam. 12:28), and changing a name signified promotion to a higher status (Gen. 17:5; 32:28; to this day in orthodox Judaism a dying person's name is sometimes officially changed in the hope that a new name will bring health and a new life) or demotion to a lower status (2 Kings 23:34-35; 24:17). Blotting out or cutting off the name of a person or thing meant destroying that person or thing (2 Kings 14:27; Isa. 14:22; Zeph. 1:4; see also Ps. 83:4).

The name and being of God are often used in parallelism with each other (Pss. 18:49; 68:4; 74:18; 86:12; 92:1; Isa. 25:1; Mal. 3:16), stressing their essential identity. Belief in Jesus' name is the same as believing in Jesus himself, as John 3:18 demonstrates. Prayer in Jesus' name, therefore, is not mystical reliance on a traditional formula but is praying in accord with Jesus' character, his mind, his purpose. He is just like his name—a name that means Savior (Matt. 1:21), a name "that is above every [other] name" (Phil. 2:9).

R. YOUNGBLOOD

See also GOD, NAMES OF.

Bibliography. J. Barr, "Symbolism of Names in the Old Testament," BJRL 52:11-29; H. Bietenhard and F. F. Bruce, NIDNTT 2:648-56; J. Pedersen, Israel: Its Life and Culture.

Narrative Theology. The use of narrative in theology, both to understand and order theological thought, is of recent interest but represents the persistent concern with the historical narration of Christian redemption. Deriving its impetus from the various influences of theories of literary criticism, social science's interest in personal and biological histories, and philosophical and linguistic attention to the influence of tradition and character, narrative has become a common topic within Christian theology.

What Is Narrative Theology? The recognition that vast portions of the Bible are narrative in form, and that the Gospels in particular, which serve as the interpretive center for Christian theologians, are narratives is not itself something new. Yet the suggestion that narrative represents something fundamental to human identity or that biblical narratives share common and possibly universal features of narrative that should shape how we understand Scripture and theology are concerns that belong to our current setting.

Characteristically, theologians employing narrative charge that modern theology sought a prescriptive, organizing principle, theme, or system on the basis of which the biblical text was to be understood, usually isolated from the actual shape of Scripture as a narrative. Instead of narrative simply being the means to what is truly important behind or beyond the text, narrative theologians argue that it is important precisely because narrative is the revelation of God's identity, particularly in Jesus Christ, and in a corresponding fashion for some, in the life of the church as God's people. Thus, knowledge of God and our identity are available through some form of narrative.

Varieties of Narrative Theology. There are at least four discernible ways in which narrative has been used in recent theology: postliberal, philosophical and ethical, biblical and literary, and evangelical. These types are not mutually exclusive but represent various ways of employing narrative in theology.

Postliberal concern for narrative stems from the confession that the interpretive center of the Bible is the narration of Jesus' identity, and in turn this narration serves as the basis for early theological characterizations of Jesus' deity and humanity (in the creed of Nicea and the definition of Chalcedon). Karl Barth is hailed as a theologian who conceived of Scripture as "one vast, loosely structured non-fictional novel" (Kelsey). Hans Frei's interest in Scripture's literal sense focused on this literary characterization of the Gospels as historylike (for Frei, the story is the meaning of the doctrine rather than the doctrine being the meaning of the story), and Ronald Thiemann offered that Scripture is a narrative depicting God's identity. These theologians tend to avoid assigning any particular status to narrativity; narratives are important for Christian theologians because God uses the story of the gospel of Jesus Christ and the life of the church to save humans.

Philosophical and ethical interest in narrative represents a sociohistorical understanding of human identity. For H. Richard Niebuhr God's revelation illumines "the story of our life" in terms of Scripture's story; for Stephen Crites there is a "narrative quality of experience"; and Paul Ricoeur develops a general theory of narrative interpretation in which a narrativist phenomenology gives rise to human consciousness and understanding. Somewhat different is the approach of Alasdair MacIntyre, who argues that morality is rooted in a particular tradition or narrative but in a manner more akin to social and ethical constructs. Building upon MacIntyre, Stanley Hauerwas maintains that the church is uniquely God's story wherein ethical character finds its appropriate setting, rather than in the individual or dominant culture. And James McClendon argues that biography is essential for theology because narrative is essential to understanding character and community.

The emphasis on narrative in theology parallels interest in narrative within literary criticism (narrative criticism), biblical scholarship (including interest in narrative theory, the Bible as literature, or canonical forms of criticism), and in theories of biblical narratology or poetics (how meaning is made or explained by putting it into a plot). In these differing perspectives narrative encompasses more than an instance of literary genre, it is used to understand how texts function and hold together by stressing the thematic or theological unity of a group of texts or the biblical story viewed as a whole (creation to consummation). Narrative captures the story, but the narrative is not the same as the story, exhaustive of the story, or meant to replace the story; yet the story is not given apart from its telling in narrative.

Evangelicals have embraced narrative for theology in a variety of ways (literary, theological, and ethical) but most commonly to account for the narrational focus of Scripture in relation to questions of truth and history and thus to form a doctrine of Scripture (Pinnock). Accounting for the prominence of narrative is necessary in order to relate historical and theological interests (McGrath) or to account for the identity of God's people (Grenz). For example, evangelical theologian Gabriel Fackre construes narrative in terms of an account of characters and events in a plot, moving in time through conflict to resolution; he further distinguishes between "canonical story" (biblical text), "life story" (personal narratives), and "community story" (the merging of biblical and life stories in the Christian faith community).

Conclusion. The use of narrative in theology tends to blur the modern distinctions between strictly historical, literary, and theological disciplines, as well as provide an alternative to dualistic accounts of story and fiction, history and truth. Narrative emphases usually concentrate on how the text is received and used within Christian faith, sometimes deferring questions of historical reference (which causes discomfort among some evangelicals). The study of narrative reminds us that biblical scholars are practitioners of theology, and theologians are also interpreters of the biblical narrative.

J. P. CALLAHAN

Bibliography. G. Aichele, Limits of Story; R. Alter, Art of Biblical Narrative; C. Campbell, Preaching Jesus;

Narrative Theology

G. Fackre, Christian Story; Ecumenical Faith in Evangelical Perspective; H. Frei, Eclipse of Biblical Narrative; Theology and Narrative; Types of Christian Theology; M. Goldberg, Theology and Narrative; G. Green, ed., Scriptural Authority and Narrative Interpretation; S. Grenz, Revisioning Evangelical Theology; Theology for the Community of God; S. Hauerwas, Christian Existence; S. Hauerwas and L. G. Jones, Why Narrative?; D. Kelsey, Uses of Scripture in Recent Theology; A. and F. Kermodé, Literary Guide to the Bible; G. Lindbeck, Nature of Doctrine; G. Loughlin, Telling God's Story; A. MacIntyre, After Virtue; J. W. McClendon, Biography as Theology; A. McGrath, Passion for Truth; P. Nelson, Narrative and Morality; H. R. Niebuhr, Meaning of Revelation; T. Phillips and D. Okholm, Nature of Confession; C. Pinnock, Scripture Principle; Tracking the Maze; P. Ricoeur, Time and Narrative; G. Stroup, Promise of Narrative Theology; R. Thiemann, Revelation and Theology; T. Tilley, Story Theology.

Nations, Judgment of. See JUDGMENT OF NATIONS.

Naturalism. The view that the “natural” universe, the universe of matter and energy, is all there really is. This rules out God, so naturalism is atheistic. It rules out other spiritual beings as well as God, so naturalism is materialistic. By ruling out a spiritual part of the human person that might survive death and a God who might resurrect the body, naturalism also rules out survival after death. In addition, naturalism usually but not always denies human freedom on the grounds that every event must be explainable by deterministic natural laws. It usually but not always denies any absolute values because it can find no grounds for such values in a world made up only of matter and energy. And finally, naturalism usually but not always denies that the universe has any meaning or purpose because there is no God to give it a meaning or purpose and nothing else that can give it a meaning or purpose.

Anyone who accepts the first three denials—of God, spiritual beings, and immortality—might be called a naturalist in the broad sense, and anyone who adds to these the denial of freedom, values, and purpose might be labeled a naturalist in the strict sense, or a strict naturalist. Communists, for instance, are not strict naturalists, for their worldview includes a purpose in history—at least in human history—and perhaps in the whole history of the universe. Some religious humanists are not strict naturalists, for they argue for free will and even for values that are independent of known wants and needs. Some opponents of naturalism would argue that naturalists in the broad sense are at least somewhat inconsistent and that naturalism in the broad sense leads logically to strict naturalism. Many strict naturalists would agree with this.

Those who reject naturalism in both the strict and broad sense do so for a variety of reasons. They may have positive arguments for the exist-

tence of some of what naturalists deny, or they may have what seem to be decisive refutations of some or all of the arguments for naturalism. But, in addition to particular arguments against naturalist tenets or their grounds of belief, some opponents of naturalism believe that there is a general argument that holds against any form of naturalism. These opponents hold that naturalism has a “fatal flaw” or, to put it more strongly, that naturalism is self-destructing. If naturalism is true, then human reason must be the result of natural forces. These natural forces are not, on the naturalistic view, rational themselves, nor can they be the result of a rational cause. So human reason would be the result of nonrational causes. This, it can be argued, gives us a strong reason to distrust human reason, especially in its less practical and more theoretical exercises. But the theory of naturalism is itself such an exercise of theoretical reason. If naturalism is true, we would have strong reasons to distrust theoretical reasoning. If we distrust theoretical reasoning, we distrust particular applications of it, such as the theory of naturalism. Thus, if naturalism is true, we have strong reasons to distrust naturalism.

M. H. MACDONALD

Bibliography. G. Dworkin, ed., Determinism, Freewill, and Moral Responsibility; A. Flew, God and Philosophy; Rational Animal; C. S. Lewis, Miracles; J. R. Lucas, Freedom of the Will; M. MacKay, Human Science and Human Dignity; R. Rorty, Philosophy and the Mirror of Nature; G. Watson, ed., Freewill.

Natural Law. A moral order divinely implanted in humankind and accessible to all persons through human reason. It should not be confused with the “laws of nature,” which became so prominent in natural science during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries—though there was, historically, some overlap and connection between the two. Natural law is chiefly a matter of ethics and is primarily associated with Roman Catholic theology. It has enabled that church to address socioeconomic, legal, moral, and political issues on what is held to be a philosophical foundation common to all humankind.

The roots of this notion lie in antiquity. Aristotle taught that the moral order and human rights should be derived by reason from the objective cosmic order, which he saw best realized in the city-state. The Stoics universalized this idea and heavily influenced Roman ethical and legal thought, which is to say, the intellectual world of the NT and especially the Latin church fathers. In Romans 2:4–15 Paul describes a law “written on the hearts” of Gentiles by which they will be judged, and elsewhere (Rom. 1:24–27; 1 Cor. 11:14) he refers to certain sexual matters as “against nature.” Augustine argued over against pagans and Manichaeans that God’s will is the eternal law, both natural and moral, behind the entire cosmos; but he, like Paul, saw this moral order in the light of faith and revelation rather than of reason and philosophy.

It was Thomas Aquinas, the great synthesizer of the gospel and Greek philosophy, who first formulated the notion of natural law in a way still foundational and largely normative for Roman Catholics today. Thomas taught that the “eternal law” by which God established all things became, when impressed upon humans and their nature, a “natural law” (ius naturae), through which humans potentially participated in their divinely ordered true end, but which in their freedom they could also choose to disobey. Because it was of the essence of things, people could perceive and logically deduce it through reason, though it was also taught in Scripture and received simply in faith. For Thomas, the natural law was essentially “to do good and avoid evil,” the Golden Rule (Matt. 7:12), and the second table of the Law, but it included as well such social matters as monogamous marriage and the right to hold property. It was the task of conscience to apply to particular cases the immutable general principles perceived by reason.

Scotus and Ockham located natural law in the will of God rather than in the very essence of things. So also the Protestant Reformers did not reject the term and notion as such, but they equated it with the will of God revealed in Scripture and fundamentally questioned fallen human’s ability to reason their way to it. In modern times, beginning perhaps with Hugo Grotius, natural law grew increasingly independent of its religious framework and deeply influenced social and political thought as humankind’s universal and inalienable natural rights. Kant and most modern philosophers have denied any demonstrable connection between ethics and a rational law perceivable in the nature of things. Nevertheless, during the past century natural law theory experienced a renaissance in Roman Catholic circles. It underlies much of Pope Leo XIII’s social legislation and influenced Pope Paul VI’s famous ruling on matters of sexual conduct (Humanae Vitae). American Catholic universities still have many institutes and journals that seek to apply natural law theory to contemporary social, moral, and legal issues. Several modern Protestant thinkers (e.g., certain Scottish commonsense realists, Emil Brunner, and, in their own distinctive way, Abraham Kuyper and his disciples) have seen the advantages of natural law theory in treating of social and ethical matters with non-Christians. But most Protestants, especially Karl Barth, continue to hold that ethical matters cannot be known in truth apart from the revelation of God’s will in Jesus Christ and Holy Scripture.

J. VAN ENGEN

See also REVELATION, GENERAL.

Natural Man. See MAN, NATURAL.

Natural Revelation. See REVELATION, GENERAL.

Natural Theology. Truths about God that can be learned from created things (nature, man, world) by reason alone. The importance of natural theology to Christian thought has varied widely from age to age, depending largely upon the general intellectual climate. It first became a significant part of Christian teaching in the High Middle Ages and was made a fixed part of Roman Catholic dogma in 1870 at Vatican Council I. Its dogmatic Constitution on the Catholic Faith made it a matter of faith to believe that God has revealed himself in two ways, naturally and supernaturally, and that “God can certainly be known [certo cognosci] from created things by the natural light of human reason.” The council sought thus to reaffirm, over against nineteenth-century secularized skeptics and especially philosophical movements since Kant, that God is indeed knowable by reason and that such philosophical truths are a legitimate and true form of theology. This teaching was one among several factors that stimulated the growth of Neo-Thomism (Gilson, Maritain, et al.) in the early twentieth century. But quite apart from the original intent and later influence of this teaching, the Catholic Church now stands committed to the belief that there are two theologies.

Ancient philosophers spoke of a “natural theology,” by which they meant philosophical discourse on the essential, “divine” nature of things as distinguished from the accidental and transient, and also philosophical truths about God as distinguished from state cults and religious myths. Scripture, however, spoke of the world as created in time and sustained by its Creator. Creation points still toward its Creator (what Protestants later called general revelation), but that it does so is chiefly taught by Scripture (that is, special revelation) and confirmed in experience rather than deduced by reason alone. Only when the Judeo-Christian notion of “creation” is made equivalent to the Greek philosophical notion of “nature,” something never done directly by the Greek and Latin church fathers, is the stage set for the development of a “natural theology.”

The first great proponent of a natural theology distinguishable from revealed theology was Thomas Aquinas, the synthesizer of Greek philosophy and the gospel, who also laid the groundwork for notions of “natural law,” the ethical equivalent of natural theology. Aquinas defined theology as a “science” in the Aristotelian sense, that is, a definable body of knowledge with its own sources, principles, methods, and content, and he insisted that beyond the truths derived from the study of Scripture there was another body of (compatible) truths based on the application of reason to the created world. He supported this, as nearly all Catholics have, with reference to Romans 1:20–21 and to the actual accomplishments of pagan philosophers, especially Aristotle. Such truths included especially the existence of God, which he laid out in five famous proofs near the beginning of his Summa (all of them essentially arguments for an Ultimate Cause) and the attributes (eternity, invisibility, etc.) that described God's nature. These were then complemented and enriched by supernaturally revealed truths, such as the trinity of persons in the Godhead and the incarnation of God in Jesus.

Natural Theology

Nearly all Catholic scholars of natural theology have built upon, refined, or qualified the position first articulated by Thomas. In doing natural theology, first of all, they do not mean to have reason replace faith or philosophical discourse the grace of God revealed in Christ. Faith and grace remain primary for all believers, but natural theology offers the opportunity to establish certain truths by means common to all persons. Second, those truths are not taken to be "grounds" or "foundations" for additional, revealed truths. Yet if these truths are established, it can be seen as "reasonable" to accept revealed truths as well. And thus Catholics are in fact inclined to see a continuum between natural theology, that which is known of God by the light of natural reason, and revealed theology, that which is known by the light of faith.

The Protestant Reformers objected to the impact of philosophy on theology and insisted on a return to Scripture. They assumed that all people had some implicit knowledge of God's existence (Calvin's "sense of divinity"), but they declared it useless apart from the revelation of God's will and grace in Jesus Christ. Several early confessional documents (e.g., the Westminster and the Belgic) do speak of God revealing himself in nature (citing still Rom. 1:20–21), but this is revelation not fully comprehensible apart from Scripture. Orthodox Protestants have generally raised three major objections to natural theology.

First, it lacks scriptural basis. Read in context, Romans 1 and 2 teach that the pagan's natural knowledge of God is distorted and turned only to his judgment, in no way to the reasonable deduction of theological truths.

Second, and perhaps most importantly, natural theology effectively exempts human reason from the fall and the effects of original sin. Human reason is now as perverse as any other human faculties and therefore is not capable, apart from God's gracious intervention, of finding its way back to God and truly knowing him. This point, which involves quite different anthropological views, will doubtless continue to divide Protestants and Catholics.

Third, conceding the knowledge of God arrived at by pagan philosophers (his being, invisibility, omnipotence, etc.), Protestants object that this is wholly abstract and worthless. This Supreme Being has little to do with the God of judgment and mercy, of righteousness and love, revealed all through Scripture and preeminently in Jesus Christ. When Protestants retain descriptions of God's attributes, as they often have at the beginning of formal theologies, they argue and illustrate them from Scripture, not from philosophical discourse.

In modern times the impact of the Enlightenment drove both Catholic and Protestant thinkers to reduce the supernatural, miraculous elements and to construct a "natural theology" open to reason and common to all people. Kant rejected all proofs for the existence of God and sought to place religion "within the bounds of reason." This more liberal form of natural theology became very common in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries: the famous Gifford Lectures, for instance, are supposed to promote "Natural Theology." Scottish commonsense realism may represent a unique effort to blend philosophy with fairly orthodox Christianity, but in general the miraculous grace of God had disappeared from these forms of theology. In the twentieth century the so-called dialectical theologians vigorously objected against theologies that glossed over the radical intervention of God through Jesus Christ and his Word. Karl Barth in particular saw such natural religion as the great foe of true faith and rejected the Catholic "analogy of being" as an unwarranted jump (rather than deduction) from creation to Creator. Several others in turn, especially Emil Brunner, objected that Barth's exclusive emphasis on Christ and the Word denied the reality of God's "general revelation" of himself in creation and especially human creatures, his image-bearers, something attested in Scripture.

In recent times natural theology has received comparatively little attention apart from a few Catholic philosophers, although that might, in fact, be changing. One interesting and related development has occurred in the field of the history of religions. Certain such historians (especially G. van der Leeuw and M. Eliade) have discovered patterns of religious belief and practice (a High God, a fall from a past Golden Age, various salvation motifs, etc.), which do not make up a natural theology in the traditional sense, but which they believe could yield an instructive prolegomenon to the study of Christian theology.

Another related development has to do with the extent to which general revelation can operate in bringing a person to a saving knowledge. Must one actually hear the gospel proclaimed, or is general revelation sufficient by itself to lead a person to salvation? Although not natural theology as such, this question does raise a fundamental question of natural theology, that is, What can one know about God independently of Scripture, and how valid is that knowledge?

J. VAN ENGEN

See also GOD, ARGUMENTS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF; NEO-THOMISM; REVELATION, GENERAL; THOMAS AQUINAS.

Bibliography. K. Barth and E. Brunner, Natural Theology; G. Berkouwer, General Revelation; F. H. Cleobury, Return to Natural Theology; B. Demarest, General Revelation; J. F. Donceel, Natural Theology; M. Holloway, Introduction to Natural Theology; E. L. Miller, God and Reason; B. S. Mitchell, Justification of Religious Belief; G. F. Stout, God and Nature; R. Swinburne, Coherence of Theism; Existence of God; Faith and Reason.

Nature, Theology of. Theology is the study of God and his relationship to all the worlds—visible and invisible—his hands have made. The realm of nature is the whole visible creation, especially the precious ecosystem of earth and humankind.

Although some theologians have elevated the category of history over nature in biblical interpretation so that nature becomes “a kind of backcloth for the drama of human history” (Lampe), surely it is more accurate to take the view that God created nature to “the theater of his glory” (Calvin) in which his invisible qualities would be visibly and magnificently displayed (Rom. 1:20). It is this truth that prompts the litany of the seraphim in the invisible world (Isa. 6:3), and the psalmist, as the anointed representative of the visible world, joyfully joins the chorus (Pss. 8:1; 19:1). This is not to deny the central importance of the category of history, but rather to broaden its scope, so that the drama of redemption finds meaning within the larger narrative of the history of the cosmos from creation to consummation.

God and Nature. If anything is clear from Scripture, it is that God transcends his creation and is not to be identified with nature or any part of it (Exod. 20:4; Rom. 1:23). Still, he is no remote “clockwinder,” as in the mechanistic world posited by deism. He is the living God (Acts 14:15) who gives life to everything (Neh. 9:6). The “possessor” (creator-owner) of heaven and earth (Gen. 14:19) is no absentee landlord; he is the “faithful Creator” (1 Pet. 4:19) who keeps his covenant with the day and with the night, so that they come at their appointed time (Jer. 33:20). The “laws of nature” hold because God has established his covenant with creation (Jer. 33:25). Lest there be any doubt about his commitment to the earth following his judgment of human sin, God renews his covenant after the flood (Gen. 8:22).

God’s great faithfulness is shown also in his care for the earth. Psalm 104 is devoted to this theme. “How many are your works, O LORD! In wisdom you made them all; the earth is full of your creatures” (v. 24). “These all look to you to give them their food at the proper time” (v. 27). “When you send your Spirit, they are created, and you renew the face of the earth” (v. 30). Jesus incorporates this perspective in his teaching, recalling how the Father feeds the birds and clothes the lilies of the field (Matt. 6:26, 28). His eye is on the sparrow (Luke 12:6), as well as on the planets in their orbits. The apostle Paul finds in God’s earthkeeping an evangelistic point of contact (Acts 14:17).

God’s delight in nature also figures prominently in the biblical record (cf. Ps. 104:31). Six times in the course of the days of creation “God saw all that he had made, and it was very good.” Inherent in this affirmation is the divine pleasure and satisfaction in the natural world. So also the creatures God calls to Job’s attention—the preying lion, the soaring eagle, the speeding ostrich, the pawing war-horse, the gaping hippopotamus (Job 39–40)—are presented in such a way as to show the divine appreciation of their unique qualities. Moreover, the nature symbolism that pervades Scripture—the flourishing palm tree, the nesting swallow, rain falling on a mown field, thunder and lightning—does not mean that nature is valued only as a vehicle for “spiritual truth.” The symbolism is obviously dependent on a prior appreciation of the value of nature in its own right as the work of God’s hands.

Human Beings in Nature. The unique role of human beings in nature derives from their unique identity as biophysical beings in the image and likeness of God: “Then God said, ‘Let us make man in our image, in our likeness, and let them rule . . . over all the earth’” (Gen. 1:26). As biophysical beings, humans are part of the natural world that is their environment; as the image of God they are personally related to the Creator and morally responsible to him for fulfilling their calling in ruling the earth for his glory. Psalm 8 can barely contain the wonder of it all. The Lord whose name is majestic in all the earth, whose heavens are the work of his fingers, has crowned humankind with glory and honor in making him ruler over the works of his hands.

Although human beings are elevated over the other creatures in their dominion, the fact remains that “the earth is the LORD’s and everything in it” (Ps. 24:1). The human calling to rule the earth is thus that of a royal priest, rather than a sovereign monarch. That is to say, human beings have a right to the use of natural resources, for God “richly provides us with everything for our enjoyment” (1 Tim. 6:17). But the proper way to receive them by those who know the truth of the biblical revelation is with a priestly blessing (1 Tim. 4:5). Priestly use stands in opposition to secular abuse; God did not place everything under humanity's feet to be trampled on. The purpose is to further God's glory by an intelligent, respectful, obedient governance that images God's own love and care for the earth.

The calling of human beings to subdue the earth (Gen. 1:28) is sometimes termed "the cultural mandate" to express the duty of humankind to interact purposefully with the environment in order to bring out its latent potentialities in all their rich diversity for the glory of God and human flourishing. The original environment was the garden planted by God in Eden, to be worked, cared for, and used according to God's direction. Although exiled from the garden for disobedience, humankind is still called to dominion as stewardship (Hall). Life may be harsher after the fall, but that does not justify the reckless disregard of ecology, the delicately balanced interrelationships of the whole natural order. Particularly relevant to the human degradation of the environment (DeWitt) is the warning of the Apocalypse: "The time has come for judging . . . for destroying those who destroy the earth" (Rev. 11:18).

Christ and Nature. It is in the relationship of Christ to the cosmos that a theology of nature comes to its most profound and provocative biblical theme. God the Son is both the agent and the heir of creation (Heb. 1:2), the "firstborn" by whom and for whom all things were created (Col. 1:16). He is the Lord of providence as well, "sustaining all things by his powerful word" (Heb. 1:3). Incarnate in Jesus, he showed himself to be the ruler of all nature by stilling the wind and the waves with a brief command (Mark 4:39). When the situation called for it, the incarnate Word overrode his own physical laws: turning water into wine, multiplying loaves and fishes, walking on water, entering a locked room (John 2:9; 6:11, 19; 20:19).

Most important, God the Son became incarnate in Jesus to consummate God's purpose for the whole creation. The dominion described in Psalm 8 is ultimately fulfilled in Jesus, to whom, as the head of a new humanity redeemed by his own blood, God has subjected the age to come (Heb. 2:5-9). The eschatological consummation of Christ's redemptive work is alternatively termed the restoration or reconciliation of all things (Acts 3:21, Col. 1:20), or simply "the renewal" (hé palingenesia, Matt. 19:28). The only other NT instance of palingenesia is with reference to personal regeneration in Titus 3:5, providing a linguistic link between the human and environmental dimensions of Christ's redemptive work (cf. James 1:18).

The New Testament passage that more than any other probes the connection is Romans 8:18-25. There we are informed that the creation was temporarily subjected to frustration on account of the fall, but in hope of its eventual release from that bondage. The "groanings" of creation in this age are the labor pains of a rebirth of freedom in which the divine purpose for the earth will be brought to fruition. Thus, the creation now waits in eager expectation for the sons of God to be revealed, for it will share in that glorious liberation at the second coming of Christ when believers will experience the redemption of the body in the resurrection and enter full possession of the rights and privileges of their adoption. Not without reason does the psalmist anticipate singing mountains and applauding rivers at the coming of the Lord to judge the earth (Ps. 98:8).

The judgment at the second coming is good news for the creation because from it emerges, as God has promised, "a new heaven and a new earth, the home of righteousness" (2 Pet. 3:13). The eternal abode of redeemed humanity is not some totally other universe, but the present one "gloriously renewed" (Hoekema). It is renewed by fire, to be sure (2 Pet. 3:7), but this is the fire of purification rather than annihilation. This eschatological perspective on Christ and the cosmos and the scope and unity of his redemptive is found already in Irenaeus, whose theology of nature is important for what might be called "an ecological hermeneutic of history" (Santmire).

D. C. JONES

Bibliography. M. Cromartie, ed., Creation at Risk? C. B. DeWitt, "Seven Degradations of Creation" in Environment and the Christian; J. M. Gustafson, Sense of the Divine; D. J. Hall, Imaging God; G. S. Hendry, Theology of Nature; A. A. Hoekema, "New Earth," in Bible and the Future; G. W. H. Lampe, "New Testament Doctrine of ktisis," SJT 17:449-62; J. Maritain, Science and Wisdom; J. Moltmann, God in Creation; J. Nash, Loving Nature; E. Rust, Nature: Garden or Desert?; H. P. Santmire, Travail of Nature; F. A. Schaeffer, Pollution and the Death of Man; S. E. Schreiner, Theater of His Glory; L. Wilkinson, ed., Earthkeeping in the Nineties: Stewardship of Creation.

Nazarene. See CHRISTIANS, NAMES OF.

Neander, Johann August Wilhelm (1789-1850). German church historian and theologian. Born David Mendel, he came under the influence of romanticism, especially Schleiermacher, and in 1806 converted from Judaism to Protestantism, taking the name Neander (Greek for "new man"). He then studied theology and from 1813 taught church history at the University of Berlin, where as a member of the "mediating school" he resisted both the extremes of pantheistic metaphysics and rigid orthodoxy and was a determined opponent of the rationalism of F. C. Baur and D. F. Strauss. His pietistic ideal of service was reflected in the part he played in forming the Berlin Missionary Society and his impact on the young J. H. Wichern, founder of the Inner Mission.

Author of the General History of the Christian Religion and Church (6 vols., 1825-52) and several monographs on persons and movements in the early and medieval church, Neander is commonly regarded as the founder of modern church historiography. His works were based on extensive use of original sources but tended to concentrate more on personalities than institutions. He saw the main theme of church history as the continuing conflict between the Spirit of Christ and the spirit of the world. Functioning in effect as the history of piety, its task was to bring about a higher and purer type of faith by stimulating confidence in the power of the divine Word to overcome the world and spiritually uplift believers. Neander's romantic conception of the role of church history was summed up in his famous phrase: "The heart (pectus) is the motivating force of theology."

R. V. PIERARD

See also MEDIATING THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. W. W. Gasque, NIDCC 696; E. Simons, SHERK 8:95–96.

Necessary Being. See BEING.

Nee, Watchman. See WATCHMAN NEE.

Negation, Way of. See VIA NEGATIVA.

Neoevangelicalism. See EVANGELICALISM.

Neonomianism. See MARROW CONTROVERSY.

Neo-orthodoxy. History. Neo-orthodoxy is not a single system; it is not a unified movement; it does not have a commonly articulated set of essentials. At best it can be described as an approach or attitude that began in a common environment but soon expressed itself in diverse ways. It began in the crisis associated with the disillusionment following World War I, with a rejection of Protestant scholasticism, and with a denial of the Protestant liberal movement that had stressed accommodation of Christianity to Western science and culture, the immanence of God, and the progressive improvement of humankind.

The first important expression of the movement was Karl Barth's Römerbrief, published in 1919. Soon a number of Swiss and German pastors were involved. In the two years 1921–22 Friedrich Gogarten published his Religious Decision, Emil Brunner his Experience, Knowledge and Faith, Eduard Thurneysen his Dostoevsky, and Barth the second edition of his Commentary on Romans. In the fall of 1922 they established Zwischen den Zeiten, a journal whose title characterized the crisis element in their thinking in that they felt they lived between the time when the Word was made flesh and the imminent appearance of the Word again. Although at this point most of the early members of the movement held to some common points of view, such as the absolute transcendence of God over all human knowledge and work, the sovereignty of the revelation in Jesus Christ, the authority of Scripture, and the sinfulness of humankind, it was not long before their dialectical approach led them to disagreements and a parting of the ways.

However, the disagreements seemed to make the movement all the more vigorous and intriguing. Soon it spread to England, where C. H. Dodd and Edwyn Hoskyns became involved; in Sweden Gustaf Aulén and Anders Nygren became followers; in America the Niebuhr brothers were identified as neo-orthodox; and others in other churches and lands began to read about the movement and watch what was happening. With the rise of the Nazi movement in Germany, many of the leaders of the neo-orthodox movement met with other German Christians in Barmen in 1934 and issued a declaration against the evils of Nazism. The resulting crackdown by Hitler forced some into exile, as Paul Tillich; some back to their homeland, as Barth; some underground, as Dietrich Bonhoeffer; and some ultimately into concentration camps, as Martin Niemoeller. The movement continued throughout the period of World War II and into the postwar period, but with the death of the main leaders, it tended to lose its cutting edge in theology.

The movement was called neo-orthodox for a number of reasons. Some used the term in derision, claiming it had abandoned the traditional Protestant creedal formulations and was advocating a new "off" brand of orthodoxy. Others saw the movement as a narrowing of the traditional stance of Protestantism and thus to be avoided in favor of a more liberal stance. Those in sympathy with the movement saw in the word orthodoxy the effort to get back to the basic ideas of the Protestant Reformation and even the early church, as a means of proclaiming the truth of the gospel in the twentieth century; and in the prefix neo they saw the validity of new philological principles in helping to attain an accurate view of Scripture, which in turn and in combination with orthodoxy would provide a powerful witness to God's action in Christ for those of the new century.

Methodology. The methodological approach of the movement involved dialectical theology, theology of paradox, and crisis theology. The use of dialectical thinking goes back to the Greek world and Socrates' use of questions and answers to derive insight and truth. It was used by Abelard in Sic et Non and is the technique of posing opposites against each other in the search for truth. Barth and the early leaders were probably attracted to the dialectic as the result of their study of Søren Kierkegaard's writings. For Kierkegaard, propositional truths are not sufficient; assent to a series of religious formulations or creeds is not enough. Kierkegaard believed theological assertions of the faith to be paradoxical. This requires the believer to hold opposite “truths” in tension. Their reconciliation comes in an existential act generated after anxiety, tension, and crisis, and which the mind takes to be a leap of faith.

Neo-orthodoxy

The neo-orthodox took the position that traditional and liberal Protestantism had lost the insight and truth of the faith. The nineteenth-century theologians had taken the paradoxes of faith, dissolved their tension, used rational, logical, coherent explanations as a substitute, creating propositions, and thus had destroyed the living dynamic of the faith. For the neo-orthodox, paradoxes of the faith must remain precisely that, and the dialectic method that seeks to find the truth in the opposites of the paradoxes leads to a true dynamic faith. As an example of this consider the statement: “In the No found in God’s righteous anger one finds the Yes of his compassion and mercy.”

Some of the paradoxes identified by the neo-orthodox movement are the absolute transcendence of God in contrast with the self-disclosure of God, Christ as the God-man, faith as a gift and yet an act, humans as sinful yet free, and eternity entering time. How is it possible to have a wholly other God who reveals himself? How is it possible for the man Jesus of history to be the Son of God, the Second Person of the Trinity? How can one speak of faith as God’s gift and yet involve human action? How is it possible for humans to be simultaneously sinful and saved? How is it possible for eternity, which is apart from time, to break in on time? In struggling with these, the temptation is to rationalize answers and avoid the crisis of faith; but the neo-orthodox eschewed such a solution. It is only in crisis/struggling that one can rise above the paradox and be grasped by the truth in such a way as to defy rational explanation. Crisis is that point where yes and no meet. It is that theological point where the human recognizes God’s condemnation of all human endeavors in morals, religion, thought processes, scientific discoveries, and so on, and the only release is from God’s Word. The neo-orthodox, in summarizing their methodology, used dialectics in relation to the paradoxes of the faith, which precipitated crises, which in turn became the situation for the revelation of truth.

Some Key Beliefs. Perhaps the fundamental theological concept of the movement is that of the totally free, sovereign God, the wholly other in relation to his creation as to how it is controlled and redeemed, and how he chooses to reveal himself to it. Next is God’s self-revelation, a dynamic act of grace to which humankind’s response is to listen. This revelation is the Word of God in a threefold sense: Jesus as the Word made flesh; Scripture that points to the Word made flesh; and the sermon that is the vehicle for the proclamation of the Word made flesh. In its first sense, the Word made flesh, it is not a concern for the historical Jesus, as in Protestant liberalism, but a concern for the Christ of faith, the risen Christ testified to and proclaimed by the apostles. In the second sense, Word as Scripture, it is not intended that the two be seen as one. The Scripture contains the Word but is not the Word. In the third sense, the Word is proclaimed and witnessed to, in, and through the body of Christ through the work of the Holy Spirit.

The movement also stressed the sinfulness of humankind. The sovereign, free God who reveals himself does so to a sinful fallen humanity and creation. There is a vast chasm between the sovereign God and humankind, and there is no way humankind can bridge that chasm. All of humankind’s efforts to do so by religious, moral, and ethical thoughts and actions are as nothing. The only possible way for the chasm to be crossed is by God, and this he has done in Christ. And now the paradox and the crisis: when the paradox of the Word’s No against humankind’s sin is given along with the Yes of the Word of grace and mercy, the crisis humankind faces is to decide either yes or no. The turning point has been reached as the eternal God reveals himself in humankind’s time and existence.

Significance. The neo-orthodox movement has made a number of important contributions to twentieth-century theology. With its stress on Scripture as the container of the Word, it emphasized the unity of Scripture and helped to precipitate a renewed interest in hermeneutics. With its rejection of nineteenth-century Protestant liberalism and its return to the principles of the Reformation, it helped to rejuvenate interest in the theology of the sixteenth-century reformers and in the early church fathers. With its threefold view of the Word, the doctrine of Christology has been more carefully examined, and the Word as proclamation has reemphasized the importance of preaching and the church as the fellowship of believers. The use of dialectic, paradox, and crisis introduced an effort to preserve the absolutes of the faith from every dogmatic formulation and, by so doing, aided the cause of ecumenism. Finally, the urgency found in the writings and in the title of its first journal has encouraged a renewed interest in eschatology.

Neo-orthodoxy is tied to its own Zeitgeist and thus does not have the popularity it enjoyed earlier in the century. Certain inherent elements have precluded its continuing influence. For example, its dialectic has presented confusing concepts, such as “the impossible-possibility” and “the history beyond time”; its view of Scripture, “The Bible is God’s Word so far as God lets it be his Word” (Barth, Church Dogmatics, 1/2:123), has been seen as a rejection of the infallible sola Scriptura of conservative Protestantism. The reliance of some of the neo-orthodox upon existentialism and other nineteenth- and twentieth-century concepts has meant that when those concepts became unfashionable neo-orthodoxy became unfashionable. Perhaps the greatest weakness within the movement has been its pessimism concerning the reliability and validity of human reason. If human reason cannot be trusted, then it follows that since neo-orthodoxy relied on human reason, it could not be trusted. Finally, some have criticized neo-orthodoxy for lacking a plan for the reformation of society; most theologies, however, are susceptible to this charge. Neo-orthodoxy's stance toward the conservatives and the liberals has satisfied neither group, and the moderates have not embraced it. Thus, although one cannot ignore the movement, its ultimate place in the history of theology is not yet clear.

R. V. SCHNUCKER

See also AULÉN, GUSTAF EMANUEL HILDEBRAND; BARTH, KARL; BRUNNER, HEINRICH EMIL; BULTMANN, RUDOLF; GOGARTEN, FRIEDRICH; KIERKEGAARD, SØREN; NIEBUHR, REINHOLD.

Bibliography. G. C. Berkouwer, Half Century of Theology; E. Brunner, Theology of Crisis; W. Hordern, Case for a New Reformation Theology; C. W. Kegley and R. W. Bretall, eds., Reinhold Niebuhr; A. J. Klassen, ed., Bonhoeffer Legacy; J. Livingston, Modern Christian Thought; J. Macquarrie, Twentieth-Century Religious Thought; C. Michalson, ed., Christianity and the Existentialists; W. Nicholls, Systematic and Philosophical Theology; J. Pelikan, Twentieth-Century Theology in the Making; J. M. Robinson, ed., Beginnings of Dialectical Theology; W. Schmithals, Introduction to the Theology of Rudolf Bultmann; H. U. von Balthasar, Theology of Karl Barth; O. Weber, Foundations of Dogmatics.

Neo-Pentecostalism. See CHARISMATIC MOVEMENT.

Neoplatonism. The principal form of Greek philosophy from the third to the sixth centuries A.D. It is usually described as founded by Plotinus (205–70), but perhaps a more accurate statement would be that Plotinus was the most creative thinker within later Platonism. Plotinus stands in continuity with second-century philosophers, such as the middle Platonist Albinus and the Neo-Pythagorean Numenius. Middle Platonism had begun the assimilation of Pythagorean, Aristotelian, and Stoic elements into Platonic thought. Plotinus created a new synthesis by shaping these strands into a coherent religious philosophy.

Plotinus was born in Egypt and studied in Alexandria under Ammonius Saccas. After accompanying the emperor Gordian on a campaign in the East, he settled in Rome about 244 and began his own school there. He wrote essays for his students about their philosophical discussions. His pupil Porphyry collected these and arranged them in a somewhat systematic manner into six Enneads (groups of nine), the major source for Plotinus's philosophy. Porphyry published the Enneads shortly after A.D. 300 and accompanied them with a Life of Plotinus. He reported that Plotinus had the mystical experience of union with the divine on four occasions, and the description of union in the Enneads is one of the classics of mysticism.

Plotinus's system begins with the One, the supreme transcendent principle, which can be described only by negation. It is immaterial and impersonal. As the number one is different from all other numbers yet makes them possible, so the One is the ground of all being and source of all values. The One transcends all duality, both of thought and reality and of being and nonbeing. Out of the One, but without any change in the One, there proceeded by emanation Mind (nous), the intellectual principle. Mind is the principle of divine intelligence, the "eternal consciousness," the highest really knowable entity. This element already partakes of duality, for consciousness contains the knower and the known. The next emanation was the World Soul (psyche). This is the moving power behind the whole universe. The World Soul is intermediary between Mind and bodily reality; it is the principle at work in the moving stars, animals, plants, and humans but transcends individual souls. The lowest creative principle is Nature (physis). As the descent from the One is characterized by increasing individuation and multiplicity, so Nature finds itself in direct contact with matter. Bare matter is the limiting principle of reality.

Humans are microcosms of reality, containing matter, nature, soul, and mind in themselves. Manifoldness longs to be reunited to the One, and humans by contemplation have the possibility of return to the One. Contemplation is the most perfect human activity, and by it may be achieved a state of ecstasy, an experience of unification. The importance of mental concentration is the reason for describing Plotinus's view as intellectual mysticism. It is unlike Christian mysticism in that the experience of union is not the result of divine grace. Union is rarely achieved, and then as a result of asceticism and prolonged effort of the will and understanding. One cannot control the experience or determine when it will come. Plotinus thinks, therefore, in a circular movement in which the manifold returns to the One; nothing gets lost in this circular movement of emanation and return.

Evil is not an ontological reality in this system. Nothing is evil in its nature. Rather, evil is nonbeing, but Plotinus did not mean by this unreal. Nonbeing is a state of privation, and it is a real possibility for beings to turn away from life toward nonbeing.

Neoplatonism

After Plotinus and Porphyry, important later Neoplatonists include Iamblichus (ca. 250–ca. 325), who incorporated theosophy and theurgy into Neoplatonism and wrote works important for the religious thought (influenced by magic) of late antiquity; Sallustius, who ca. 362 wrote a manual of Neoplatonic religion in support of Julian's efforts to reestablish paganism; and Proclus (410–485), an encyclopedic thinker who systematized the Greek philosophical inheritance.

Neoplatonism provided the philosophical basis for the pagan opposition to Christianity in the fourth and fifth centuries. Porphyry, in addition to numerous philosophical treatises, wrote a massive work in fifteen volumes, now lost, Against the Christians. Julian, emperor from 361 to 363, besides official measures against the Christians, wrote Against the Galilaeans, which can be reconstructed from Cyril of Alexandria's refutation of it. On the other hand, Neoplatonism provided the intellectual framework for the thought of several Christian theologians: Gregory of Nyssa, Victorinus, Ambrose, Augustine, and especially Dionysius the Pseudo-Areopagite.

The Neoplatonist Damascius was head of the academy in Athens when Justinian closed it in 529. Neoplatonic influence continued, however, in both the Western and Eastern churches. Neoplatonism inspired the thought of John Scotus Erigena in Gaul in the ninth century, of Michael Psellus in Byzantium in the eleventh century, and of various thinkers in the Renaissance (notably Marsilio Ficino). Elements of the Neoplatonic approach are to be found in as recent a thinker as Paul Tillich. The great minds that have been stimulated by this philosophy are a testimony to its attraction and creative powers.

E. FERGUSON

See also AUGUSTINE OF HIPPO; DIONYSIUS THE PSEUDO-AREOPAGITE; ERIGENA, JOHN SCOTUS.

Bibliography. A. H. Armstrong, ed., Cambridge History of Later Greek and Early Medieval Philosophy; S. R. L. Clark, God's World and the Great Awakening; E. R. Dodds, Proclus: Elements of Theology; Select Passages Illustrating Neoplatonism; C. Eusebe, Neoplatonism in Relation to Christianity; J. Geffcken, Last Days of Greco-Roman Paganism; A. D. Nock, Sallustius Concerning the Gods and the Universe; D. J. O'Meara, Neoplatonism and Christian Thought; P. V. Pistorius, Plotinus and Neoplatonism; J. M. Rist, Plotinus: The Road to Reality; R. T. Wallace, Neo-Platonism.

Neo-Thomism. A philosophical school that in the twentieth century attempted to apply the thought of St. Thomas Aquinas to theological and other intellectual problems.

Thomism, which had experienced failures and successes from the time of Aquinas on, appeared to have triumphed in 1880 when Pope Leo XIII declared it to be the official (though not exclusive) philosophy of Catholic schools.

However, at its very moment of triumph, Thomism was severely questioned by the dominant philosophies based on the thought of Immanuel Kant. Consequently, the movement bifurcated. Transcendental Thomism, represented by Joseph Maréchal, Bernard Lonergan, and Karl Rahner, self-consciously adapted itself to Kantian thought. But another wing, under the leadership of Étienne Gilson and Jacques Maritain, sought to recover a pure, Aristotelian version of the teachings of Aquinas himself. Eventually this understanding crossed confessional boundaries to include such Protestants as E. L. Mascall. This article will concentrate on this latter movement.

The metaphysical distinctive of neo-Thomism may be found in its insistence on the maxim that "existence precedes essence." For that reason Maritain has claimed that Thomism is the original existentialism. Put simply, this means that one has to know that something exists before one knows what it is, and before one knows that something exists, one has to accept that anything exists. This latter conviction is not the result of a rational deduction; it is an immediate awareness. Thus, the act of being, apprehended in a direct intuition, precedes its various modalities.

This apprehension of being leads the Thomist to posit the existence of God via the cosmological argument. For even though the reality of being is an inescapable fact, it is not a logically necessary truth. Being exists but need not exist. Thus, being is inherently contingent, and its contingency makes it finite. If it exists in view of having no inherent necessity to do so, it must be caused to exist. Also, the very forms that being assumes are due to the interplay of various causes; and the fact of change, so characteristic of being, must be the result of causal actions as well. Therefore, being is bounded by causes wherever it appears. However, since it is a logical absurdity for anything to cause itself, there must be an external cause of being. Now if that cause is also finite, we have not grounded finite being yet, and it still should not exist. A chain of finite causes would carry the same problem with it. Hence, the Thomist posits an original uncaused cause of all being, viz. God.

The understanding of God as unconditioned necessary existence goes far in providing the basis for Thomistic natural theology. For if God is uncaused, he is unlimited. Then he contains all perfections infinitely; e.g., he is all-good, omnipresent, omniscient, all-loving, perfect person, etc. There can be only one such God, since a God who possesses all perfections cannot differ from any other God who would also possess all the identical possessions. Thus, Thomists feel confident that their philosophical arguments concern the same God they worship in church.

Thomism understands the relationship between God the Creator and the created order to be analogical. God is the source of all being, and finitude participates in his being, but only with limitations. In the matter of applying language to God, predication proceeds analogically as well. Language is derived from the finite world. But then it is applied to God with the understanding that he is the source of all named properties and that he possesses all those properties without limitation. For example, one may apply the word love to God even though it is a word learned within human finite relationships, because God is pure love and the originator of all human love.

The insistence on being over essence also makes itself felt in Thomism's understanding of the human person. Thomism avoids both a Platonic mind-body dualism and a reductive materialism. With the understanding of the soul as the form of the body, the human is seen as a unit, composed of soul and body in mutual dependence. Thus, for instance, cognition combines both the physical/empirical (sensation) and the spiritual (abstraction). Thomistic writings have consistently defended the dignity and integrity of human personhood, particularly against totalitarian ideologies.

In theology Thomism has usually been linked to conservative expressions of orthodox doctrines, partially due to the close dependence on Aquinas's own formulations. Since the Second Vatican Council it has lost much ground in Catholic circles to philosophies of more recent origin, e.g., phenomenology or process thought, due to a certain impatience with Thomism's supposedly outmoded Aristotelianism. At the same time there has been some movement in evangelical Protestantism to adopt Thomistic philosophical principles for purposes of apologetics and theological enhancement, e.g., by Norman L. Geisler.

W. CORDUAN

See also MARITAIN, JACQUES; RAHNER, KARL; THOMAS AQUINAS.

Bibliography. N. L. Geisler and W. Corduan, Philosophy of Religion; É. Gilson, Christian Philosophy of St. Thomas Aquinas; H. J. John, ed., Thomist Spectrum; B. J. F. Lonergan, Insight: A Study of Human Understanding; J. Maritain, Degrees of Knowledge; Scholasticism and Politics; E. L. Mascall, Existence and Analogy.

Nestorius, Nestorianism. A native of Germanicia in Syria, Nestorius became patriarch of Constantinople in 428. Having studied in a monastery in Antioch, probably under Theodore of Mopsueta, he became a fierce opponent of heterodoxy, his first official act as patriarch being the burning of an Arian chapel.

In 428 Nestorius preached a series of sermons in which he attacked the devotionally popular attribution of the title Theotokos ("God-bearing") to the Virgin Mary. As a representative of the Antiochene school of Christology, he demurred at what he understood to be in that title a mixing of the human and divine natures in Christ. This seemed to him Apollinarian. He is reported to have affirmed that "the creature hath not given birth to the uncreatable," "the Word came forth, but was not born of her," and "I do not say God is two or three months old." In place of Theotokos, Nestorius offered the term Christotokos ("Christ-bearing"). He preferred to attribute human characteristics to the one Christ.

Nestorius's denunciation of Theotokos brought him under the suspicion of many orthodox theologians who had long used the term. His most articulate and vehement opponent was Cyril of Alexandria. Apparently a significant portion of the debate between them is traceable to the ecclesiastical rivalry between the two important sees. In any case, the two traded opinions, and when Cyril read of Nestorius's rejection of the term "hypostatic union" as an interpenetration and thus a reduction of both the divine and the human natures of Christ, he understood Nestorius to be affirming that Christ was two persons, one human, one divine. "He rejects the union," stated Cyril.

In August of 430 Pope Celestine condemned Nestorius, and Cyril pronounced twelve anathemas against him in November of the same year. In 431 the General Council at Ephesus deposed Nestorius, sending him back to the monastery in Antioch. Five years later he was banished to Upper Egypt, where he died, probably in 451.

The dispute between Nestorius and Cyril centered in the relationship between the two natures in Christ and represents the divergence between the two major schools of ancient Christology, the Antiochene and the Alexandrian. The former emphasized the reality of Christ's humanity and was wary of any true communicatio idiomatum, or communication of the attributes from one nature to the other (hence Nestorius's aversion to the notion of the Logos's being born or suffering; later Reformed theologians have maintained the same kind of concerns). The latter emphasized Christ's essential deity, tended to affirm a real communicatio, and was equally wary of what sounded like division in Christ's person (Lutheran theologians have tended to follow the Alexandrian emphases). Cyril rejected Nestorius's notion of the unity of Christ's person consisting in a unity of wills rather than a unity of essence. Both Cyril and Cassian understood this as a kind of adoptionism, wherein the Father adopted the human Jesus, making him his Son (a position similar to the modern so-called Christologies from below). They saw a link between Nestorius's understanding of Christ's person and Pelagius's understanding of Christ as a "mere moral example," and such a connection understandably was anathema to them.

Nestorius, Nestorianism

Ironically, modern research has discovered a book written by Nestorius known as Bazaar of Heracleides, in which he explicitly denies the heresy for which he was condemned. Rather, he affirms of Christ that “the same one is twofold,” an expression not unlike the orthodox formulation of the Council of Chalcedon (451). This points to the high degree of misunderstanding that characterized the entire controversy. After 433 a group of Nestorius’s followers constituted themselves a separate Nestorian church in Persia.

H. GRIFFITH

See also ALEXANDRIAN THEOLOGY; ANTIOCHENE THEOLOGY; COMMUNICATION OF ATTRIBUTES, COMMUNICATIO IDIOMATUM; CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA.

Bibliography. K. Baus et al., Imperial Church from Constantine to the Early Middle Ages; J. F. Bethune-Baker, Nestorius and His Teaching; G. R. Driver and L. Hodgson, eds., Bazaar of Heracleides; A. Grillmeier, Christ in Christian Tradition; R. V. Sellers, Two Ancient Christologies.

New, Newness. The very name “the New Testament” expresses the importance of “newness” for Christianity. This title was plainly intended to summarize the relationship between Christ and what preceded him as that of “new” to “old”; correspondingly, theologians have long grappled with the question, “To what extent, following God’s final revelation of himself in Christ, is the same passage from old to new to be a feature of the life of the church?” The question has been revived in this century through the rediscovery of the importance of eschatology, both within the NT and for the church. In addition, renewal movements in the church and in Christian groups campaigning for social change have compelled theologians to consider anew the triangular relationship between Christ’s establishment of the New Covenant (Testament), the present position and responsibility of the church in the world, and the future hope of the renewal of all things in him.

According to Harrisville, the words for “new” and “newness” in the NT (kainos, neos, kainotēs, neotēs: seventy-two times in all) must consistently be interpreted eschatologically, signifying the appearance of the new age in Christ. With qualifications (e.g., neos sometimes means simply “young”) we must affirm that expressions like “new wine” (Matt. 9:17; et al.), “new commandment” (John 13:34; et al.), “new covenant” (Luke 22:20; et al.), “new creation” (2 Cor. 5:17; et al.), “new man” (Eph. 2:15; et al.), “new teaching” (Mark 1:27; et al.), “new heaven and a new earth” (2 Pet. 3:13; et al.) all denote this revolution; but they also point ahead to a revolution yet to be. This paradox is typical of NT eschatology and should be carefully maintained in contemporary Christian evaluations of the present and the hoped-for and the passage between them.

S. MOTYER

See also ESCHATOLOGY; ISRAEL, NEW; MAN, OLD AND NEW; NEW CREATION, NEW CREATURE; NEW HEAVENS AND NEW EARTH.

Bibliography. F. F. Bruce, IDB 3:542–43; R. A. Harrisville, “Concept of Newness in the NT,” JBL 74:69–79; J. Moltmann, Church in the Power of the Spirit; Theology of Hope.

New Age Movement. A widely divergent, non-Christian belief system borrowing directly or indirectly from many sources. It affirms that humans can resolve all personal and social problems with the help of unseen forces accessible through spiritual insight, meditative techniques, and other psychological and sometimes technological means.

The movement is not institutionally unified. Participants might identify with Eastern religions, Wiccan (witch) spirituality, astrology, channeling (receiving messages through spirits), or parapsychology. Homeopathic healing, animal rights, “deep ecology,” or UFO’s might likewise signal underlying New Age (NA) convictions.

Unifying such disparate interests is the conviction that the two thousand-year Piscine period, to use astrological language, is coming to an end, to be followed by the Aquarian or “New” age, a time of utopian fulfillment. Historical foreshadowing of NA views in the West can be traced to Hinduism, Buddhism, nineteenth-century spiritism, and New England Transcendentalism (Whitman, Thoreau, Emerson). NA conviction regarding the power of mind in healing may be traced to such figures as Phineas Quimby and Mary Baker Eddy (Christian Science) and such organizations as the Unity School of Christianity.

NA views have gained popularity in the fields of medicine (holistic health), politics (globalism), education (values clarification), religion (meditation), ecology (Green movement), science (Capra’s Tao of Physics), music (Yanni), psychology (“fourth force” psychology), and business (Transformation Technologies). Prominent figures contributing to NA views include Joseph Campbell, Deepak Chopra, Marilyn Ferguson, Matthew Fox, Shirley MacLaine, and David Spangler.

Chief NA convictions include the following. (1) Humanity’s problem is perception. A Christian or secular naturalist view of humanity and nature that regards humanity as distinct within creations must be replaced by an Eastern spirituality that views humanity as one with the totality of all existence. (2) God is not the personal, holy, and transcendent being of the Bible. “God” rather describes the totality of an impersonal cosmic reality, a oneness possessing neither individual personality nor moral distinction. "God" is thus an energy field to be tapped into, not a being to be reconciled with and worshiped. "God" is, moreover, conceived in pantheistic terms, since he is ultimately the sum of all that exists, whether mind or matter. (3) Humans have somehow come to be cut off from their inherent organic oneness with "God." Through mind expansion, transformed consciousness, this link can be regained. (4) Through experiences in this life and reincarnation in successive lifetimes, humans are enlightened and thereby brought nearer to the Oneness that is their destiny. In essence, at least potentially, humans are divine. After death they face spiritual progression in some form, not a Christian heaven or hell. (5) Spirit guides can and should be utilized to assist in spiritual self-fulfillment. (6) The goal of sought-for NA awareness is loss of individual ego and incorporation into the Universal Self that is "God." Movement in this direction will make for a better temporal world, presumably because it foreshadows the eternal order. Why the eternal order must be an improvement on the present one is not clear.

It is difficult to deny that "rather than being a mere fad, the NA movement is a substantial cultural trend that is not destined quickly to blow away in the wind" (Groothuis). Arthur Beisser's Flying Without Wings offers an example of NA views more subtle and less wacky-sounding to noninitiates than those stated by its gurus and intentional popularizers. Something of a secularist Joni Ericson Tada, Beisser was a medical school graduate, military officer, and tennis champion before polio struck him down in the early 1950s. Nevertheless, he eventually completed his doctorate in clinical psychology. His story is one of resilience, courage, and determination. Yet NA convictions and lingo have crept into his formerly secular humanist outlook: he adopts NA use of Einstein, the idea of karma, egocentrism, monism, an "elevated plane" from which to see that all is One, and uncritical faith in evolution. He represents Western secular religion in transition. Secularism is giving way to neopaganism, the return of "ancient wisdom" (a term Beisser uses more than once) about the divine awareness innate to humans apart from any special revelation or the cross of Christ. Western spirituality that is chic as the twenty-first century dawns is predominately NA in nature.

New Agers' commendable spiritual interest can often be turned in a gospel direction through compassion, dialogue, prayer, and effective communication (Strohmer). Conspiracy theories of the New Age movement's role in society are overblown. But the wide dissemination of NA views in the United States (and they are even more rampant in western Europe), where church or synagogue attendance is common, is a standing indictment of the theological education taking place in homes and churches. While world evangelization is surely a priority of the Western church, the NA movement is a tacit call to repentance and renewal in its own backyard.

R. W. YARBROUGH

Bibliography. M. Albrecht, Reincarnation; H. G. Cox, Turning East; R. S. Ellwood, Alternative Altars; D. R. Groothuis, Confronting the New Age; Unmasking the New Age; D. Halverson, ed., Compact Guide to World Religions; C. T. Jackson, Oriental Religions and American Thought; C. A. Raschke, Interruption of Eternity; C. Strohmer, Gospel and the New Spirituality.

New Birth. See REGENERATION.

New Commandment. See COMMANDMENT, NEW.

New Covenant. See COVENANT, NEW.

New Creation, New Creature. These phrases are translations of kainē ktisis, a term used in 2 Corinthians 5:17 and Galatians 6:15. "Creation" (ERV, RSV, NIV) is undoubtedly a better translation than "creature" (KJV), for on only one occasion out of eleven in Paul's writings (Rom. 8:39—RSV is misleading) does ktisis certainly mean "creature" (i.e., "a created object"). It usually signifies God's act of creation (e.g., Rom. 1:20) or the result of that act, the cosmos (e.g., Rom. 8:19–20). The use of ktisis here rather than ktisma, which always means "creature" (e.g., 1 Tim. 4:4), is significant.

Three factors contribute to the meaning of this expression: (1) The OT background. In the OT "new" is a word especially associated with the age to come, when God will "do a new thing" (Isa. 43:19), "make a new covenant" (Jer. 31:31), even "create new heavens and a new earth" (Isa. 65:17). Compare also Psalm 96:1; Isaiah 42:9–10; Ezekiel 11:19; and 18:31. Isaiah 43:14–21 especially pictures the redemption of Israel as a new creation/exodus (the two are closely associated). Paul proclaims the fulfillment of these eschatological expectations.

(2) The balance between future and present in Pauline eschatology. Paul would not feel that Revelation 21:1–5, where the same OT expectations are used to picture a reality not yet fulfilled, contradicted 2 Corinthians 5:17 or Galatians 6:15. He expresses the same future thought himself in Romans 8:18–23. And it would be wrong to reconcile the two sides of his mind by saying that the person in Christ is a "new creation" in that a new life has been conceived in that person by the Spirit, a life that must yet grow to fullness. Because Christ is Christ, the promised new creation is now a reality: from the eternal perspective the person in Christ is "created" (past tense, Eph.

New Creation, New Creature

2:10), just as he or she is “justified” (Rom. 5:1), “sanctified” (1 Cor. 6:11), and “glorified” (Rom. 8:30), even though these things are not fully realized in experience.

(3) The balance between individual and corporate in Pauline anthropology. Both 2 Corinthians 5:17 and Galatians 6:15 are formally statements about the significance of Christ for the individual, but both are phrased in such a way as to direct the mind beyond the individual. Paul’s terse “If any one in Christ, new creation!” (2 Cor. 5:17a, literal translation) invites us to see the individual participating in a much greater eschatological reality. In Christ, God has created “one new man” (Eph. 2:15)—a complex expression that moves between the person of Christ himself, who is the new Adam of God’s new creation, and the new humanity, which is the church “in” Christ; so each must take care to “put on the new self, created to be like God” (Eph. 4:24, cf. Col. 3:10) and to express in practice the newness of life (Rom. 6:4) proper to this new creation.

S. MOTYER

See also CREATION, DOCTRINE OF; MAN, OLD AND NEW; NEW, NEWNESS.

Bibliography. C. K. Barrett, Second Epistle to the Corinthians; F. F. Bruce, IDB 3:542–43; H. Haarbeck, H.-G. Link, and C. Brown, NIDNTT 2:669–76; G. E. Ladd, Theology of the New Testament.

New England Theology. The name given to a theological tradition arising from the work of Jonathan Edwards (1703–58) and continuing well into the nineteenth century. The tradition was not unified by a common set of beliefs, for in fact Edwards’s nineteenth-century heirs reversed his convictions on many important particulars. It was rather united in its fascination for common issues, including the freedom of human will, the morality of divine justice, and the problem of causation behind the appearance of sin.

Jonathan Edwards. Edwards’s theological labors grew out of his efforts to explain and defend the colonial Great Awakening as a real work of God. In the process he provided an interpretation of Calvinism that influenced American religious life for over a century.

Edwards’s treatment in the Freedom of the Will (1754) presented Augustinian and Calvinistic ideas on the nature of humanity and of salvation in a powerful new shape. His basic argument was that the “will” is not an entity, but an expression of the strongest motive in a person’s character. He supported the thrust of this work with Original Sin (1758), in which he argued that all humankind was present in Adam when he sinned. Consequently, all people share the sinful character and the guilt Adam brought upon himself.

Earlier, in 1746, Edwards had explored the practical side of theology in Religious Affections

(or emotions). Here he argued that genuine Christianity is not revealed by the quantity or intensity of religious emotions. Rather, true faith is manifest where a heart has been changed to love God and seek his pleasure. After his death Edwards’s friends published Nature of True Virtue (1765), which defined the good life as “love to Being in general.” By this he meant that true goodness characterized those actions that honored God as purest Being and other people as derivative beings made in the image of God.

Jonathan Edwards was overwhelmed by the majesty and the splendor of the divine. The major themes of this theology were the greatness and glory of God, the utter dependence of sinful humanity upon God for salvation, and the supernatural beauty of the life of holiness. Edwards was not only a fervent Christian person; he was also a theological genius unmatched in American history. Thus, it is little wonder that those who followed him were not successful in maintaining the fullness of his theology. What they did maintain was his revivalistic fervor, his concern for awakening, and his high moral seriousness.

The New Divinity. The next phase of the New England theology was known as the “new divinity.” Its leading proponents were Joseph Bellamy (1719–90) and Samuel Hopkins (1721–1803), New England ministers who had studied with Edwards and had been his closest friends. Much as Edwards had, Bellamy argued for the sovereignty of God in redemption and against the idea that humankind could save itself. He also developed Edwards’s convictions that churches should allow none into membership who could not testify to a personal experience of God’s grace. Hopkins extended Edwards’s discussion of virtue into a complete ethical system. He used the phrase “disinterested benevolence” to construct guidelines for practical ethics. Out of this thinking Hopkins developed a vigorous opposition to slavery as an institution that treated people in a way that was not fitting for their character as ones bearing the image of God. Hopkins also maintained a heightened sense of God’s sovereignty by insisting that people should be willing even “to be damned for the glory of God.”

With Bellamy and Hopkins occurred also the first modifications of Edwards’s ideas. Bellamy propounded a “governmental” view of the atonement, the idea that God’s sense of right and wrong demanded the sacrifice of Christ. Edwards, by contrast, had maintained the traditional view that the death of Christ was necessary to take away God’s anger at sin. Hopkins, again in contrast to Edwards, was more concerned about eternal principles of duty, goodness, and justice than about personal confrontation with the divine. He felt that a Calvinistic theologian should, and could, demonstrate how sin resulted in an overall advantage to the universe. He held that the human sinful nature arose as a product of the sinful acts all people commit rather than as a direct result of Adam's guilt. And Hopkins spoke of Christian duties more as legal necessities for the believer than as the natural outflow of a changed heart.

The Nineteenth Century. Modifications made in the New England theology by Hopkins and Bellamy were subtle ones. Their successors moved more obviously beyond the teaching of Edwards. Timothy Dwight (1752–1817), Edwards's grandson and president of Yale College, took a broader view of human abilities in salvation and emphasized more the reasonable nature of the Christian faith. Jonathan Edwards Jr. (1745–1801), who had studied with Joseph Bellamy, extended Bellamy's idea of a governmental atonement and also placed a stronger emphasis on the law of God for the Christian life. Both he and Dwight continued the general trend to view sin as an accumulation of actions rather than primarily a state of being issuing in evil deeds.

By the time Timothy Dwight's best student, Nathaniel W. Taylor (1786–1858), assumed his position as professor of theology at Yale Divinity School in 1822, the movement from Edwards's specific convictions was very pronounced. Taylor's New Haven theology reversed the elder Edwards on freedom of the will by contending for a natural power of free choice. And he brought to a culmination the teaching that sin lies in the exercise of sinful actions rather than in an underlying condition.

The influence of the New England theology continued to be great throughout the nineteenth century. It set the tone for theological debate in New England and much of the rest of the country. Its questions dominated theological reflection at Yale until midcentury and at Andover Seminary even longer. Andover, founded in 1808 by Trinitarian Congregationalists, had brought together "moderate Calvinists" and the more rigid followers of Samuel Hopkins. Its last great theologian who self-consciously regarded himself as an heir to Edwards was Edwards Amasa Park (1808–1900). Park represented a moderate reaction to the theology of Taylor when he spoke up more strongly for God's sovereignty in salvation. Yet Park also held to a wide variety of nineteenth-century assumptions about the capacities of human nature that distanced his thinking from Edwards. Park proved too liberal for the nineteenth-century champions of Calvinism at Presbyterian Princeton Seminary, who attacked his ideas as a sell-out of Calvinism to the optimistic spirit of the age. For their part, the Princeton Calvinists, who also attacked Taylor and his like-minded colleagues for their deviations from Calvinism, could respect Edwards but were not able to fathom his sense of God's overmastering beauty.

The New England theology was at its best in careful, rigorous theological exposition. This strength sometimes turned into a weakness when it led to a dry, almost scholastic style of preaching. But with Edwards, Dwight, or Taylor, who did differ markedly among themselves on important questions, there remained a common ability to communicate a need for revival and ardent Christian living.

The changes in the content of the New England theology, and indeed its passing, had much to do with the character of the United States in the nineteenth century. A country convinced of the nearly limitless capabilities of individuals in the New World had increasingly less interest in a theology that had its origin in the all-encompassing power of God. It is significant that when twentieth-century theologians like H. Richard Niebuhr and Joseph Haroutunian rediscovered the New England theology, they returned to its fount, Edwards, as the source of its most valuable and enduring insights.

M. A. NOLL

See also DWIGHT, TIMOTHY; EDWARDS, JONATHAN; NEW HAVEN THEOLOGY; TAYLOR, NATHANIEL WILLIAM.

Bibliography. G. Boardman, History of New England Theology; A. C. Cecil Jr., Theological Development of Edwards Amasa Park; J. A. Conforti, Samuel Hopkins and the New Divinity Movement; F. H. Foster, Genetic History of the New England Theology; J. Haroutunian, Piety Versus Moralism: The Passing of the New England Theology; B. Kuklick, Churchmen and Philosopher: From Jonathan Edwards to John Dewey; S. E. Mead, Nathaniel William Taylor; H. R. Niebuhr, Kingdom of God in America; B. B. Warfield, "Edwards and the New England Theology," in Works of Benjamin B. Warfield, Vol. 9: Studies in Theology; R. C. Whittemore, Transformation of the New England Theology.

New Evangelicalism. See EVANGELICALISM.

New Hampshire Confession (1833). Published by a committee of the Baptist Convention in that state, the New Hampshire Confession is one of the most widely used Baptist statements of faith in America. The confession was reissued with minor changes in 1853 by J. Newton Brown of the American Baptist Publication Society and in this form attracted greater attention among Baptists in America. The confession has influenced many Baptist confessions since, including the influential Statement of Baptist Faith and Message of the Southern Baptist Convention in 1925.

The confession is relatively brief, containing sixteen short articles ranging from "the Scriptures" to "the World to Come." Much of it recapitulates the faith of orthodox Protestants generally. Its article on Scripture, "the supreme standard by which all human conduct, creeds, and opinions should be tried," contains this often repeated statement: "It has God for its author, salvation for its end, and truth, without any mixture of error, for its matter." Similarly evangelical are the articles on God ("the Maker and Supreme Ruler of heaven and earth") and salvation ("wholly by grace; through the Mediatorial Office of the Son of God").

New Hampshire Confession

Other parts of the confession are more baptistic. It defines "a visible Church of Christ" as "a congregation of baptized believers, associated by covenant," and the "only proper officers" for such a church are "Bishops or Pastors, and Deacons." Baptism "is the immersion of a believer in water" as "a solemn and beautiful emblem" of "faith in a crucified, buried, and risen Saviour."

The general tendency of the confession is moderately Calvinistic. It speaks of the "voluntary transgression" of the fall, "in consequence of which all mankind are now sinners." God's election ("according to which he regenerates, sanctifies, and saves sinners") is said to be "perfectly consistent with the free agency of man." The blessings of salvation, furthermore, "are made free to all by the Gospel." True believers "endure to the end."

When it was first published, the New Hampshire Confession provided a common standard for a wide range of Baptists—strict Calvinists and moderate Arminians, revivalistic Separates and orthodox Regulars, Landmarkers and others who did not believe in a universal church along with those who did. Today many modern Baptists, though still unwilling to treat the statement as a binding rule of faith, still find the New Hampshire Confession a sound standard of Christian belief.

M. A. NOLL

See also BAPTIST TRADITION, THE; CONFESSIONS OF FAITH.

Bibliography. E. T. Hiscox, Baptist Directory; W. L. Lumpkin, ed., Baptist Confessions of Faith; W. J. McGlothlin, Baptist Confessions of Faith; R. G. Torbet, History of the Baptists; J. T. Wayland, Theological Department in Yale College, 1822–1858.

New Haven Theology. A late stage of the New England theology that had originated in efforts of Jonathan Edwards to defend the spiritual reality of the first Great Awakening (ca. 1740). It was also a theology developed for the needs of the Second Great Awakening (ca. 1795–1830). It thus served as a bridge between the Calvinism that dominated American Christianity in the 1700s and the more Arminian theology that came to prevail in the nineteenth century.

Timothy Dwight, grandson of Jonathan Edwards and president of Yale College from 1795 to 1817, laid the groundwork for the New Haven theology. Dwight's concern for revival led him to place more emphasis on the natural abilities of individuals to respond to the gospel than had Edwards. His efforts to provide a rational defense of Christianity led him to stress its reasonable character over the sense of wonder that had been so important for Edwards.

Dwight's best pupil, Nathaniel William Taylor, carried the New Haven theology to its maturity. Taylor was the first professor at the new Yale Divinity School, where he came in 1822 after a successful pastorate in New Haven. Taylor regarded himself as the heir of the tradition of Jonathan Edwards, particularly as he combated the rising tide of Unitarianism in New England. His theology, however, departed from Edwards's, especially in its beliefs about human nature. Most importantly, he argued in a famous phrase that people always had a "power to the contrary" when faced with the choice for God. He also contended—as Edwards's son, Jonathan Edwards Jr., had suggested—that human sinfulness arose from sinful acts, not from a sinful nature inherited from Adam. Everyone did in fact sin, Taylor believed, but this was not a result of God's action in predetermining human nature. More than other heirs of Edwards, Taylor also accepted the Scottish philosophy of common sense, which also made much of innate human freedom and the power of individuals to shape their own destinies.

The New Haven theology was a powerful engine for revival and reform in the first half of the nineteenth century, particularly through the work of Taylor's fellow Yale graduate, Lyman Beecher. Beecher and like-minded colleagues employed the principles of the New Haven theology to promote moral reform, to establish missions and educational institutions, and to win the frontier for Christianity. The New Haven theology arose out of the distinctive Calvinism of New England, but it came to represent—with Methodists, Disciples, and some Baptists—a contribution to the generally Arminian theology that dominated American Christian thought in the nineteenth century.

M. A. NOLL

See also DWIGHT, TIMOTHY; GREAT AWAKENINGS; NEW ENGLAND THEOLOGY; TAYLOR, NATHANIEL WILLIAM.

Bibliography. F. H. Foster, Genetic History of the New England Theology; J. Haroutunian, Piety Versus Moralism: The Passing of the New England Theology; S. E. Mead, Nathaniel William Taylor, 1786–1858; E. A. Pope, "Rise of the New Haven Theology," JPH 44:24–44.

New Heavens and New Earth. The biblical doctrine of the created universe includes the certainty of its final redemption from the domination of sin. The finally redeemed universe is called "the new heavens and new earth."

In the OT the kingdom of God is usually described in terms of a redeemed earth; this is especially clear in the book of Isaiah, where the final state of the universe is already called new heavens and a new earth (65:17; 66:22). The nature of this renewal was perceived only very dimly by the OT authors, but they did express the belief that a human's ultimate destiny is an earthly one. This vision is clarified in the NT. Jesus speaks of the "renewal" of the world (Matt. 19:28), Peter of the restoration of all things (Acts 3:21). Paul writes that the universe will be redeemed by God from its current state of bondage (Rom. 8:18–21). This is confirmed by Peter, who describes the new heavens and the new earth as characterized by righteousness and as the Christian's hope (2 Pet. 3:13). Finally, the book of Revelation includes a glorious vision of the end of the present universe and of the creation of a new universe, full of righteousness and of the presence of God. The vision is confirmed by God in the awesome declaration: "I am making everything new!" (Rev. 21:1–8).

The new heavens and the new earth will be the renewed creation that will fulfill the purpose for which God created the universe. It will be characterized by the complete rule of God and by the full realization of the final goal of redemption: "Now the dwelling of God is with men" (Rev. 21:3).

The fact that the universe will be created anew shows that God's goal for humans is not an ethereal and disembodied existence, but a bodily existence on a perfected earth. The scene of the beatific vision is the new earth. The spiritual does not exclude the created order and will be fully realized only within a perfected creation.

It has been usual to discuss whether the new heavens and new earth will involve a renewal of the present universe or a complete destruction followed by re-creation ex nihilo. Both views have ardent proponents, the Reformed tradition favoring renewal and the Lutheran tradition favoring re-creation. Both views seem to have adequate biblical support (e.g., for renewal, Matt. 19:28; Acts 3:21; Rom. 8:18–21; for re-creation, 2 Pet. 3:7–13). The best view seems to be that there is both continuity and discontinuity; the universe will be renewed, but this transformation will be so complete as to introduce a radically new order of existence.

F. Q. GOUVEA

See also APOKATASTASIS; KINGDOM OF CHRIST, GOD, HEAVEN; NEW, NEWNESS; NEW CREATION, NEW CREATURE.

Bibliography. G. C. Berkouwer, Return of Christ; A. Hoekema, Bible and the Future; P. E. Hughes, Interpreting Prophecy.

New Hermeneutic. A post–World War II development based on Rudolf Bultmann's radical critical methodology in interpreting Scripture. Bultmann had held that the world of the historical is closed to supernatural revelation, since science is normative and does not allow such miraculous intrusions as prophecy, incarnation, resurrection, and eschatology. Working from a radically modern Lutheran interpretation of gospel versus law, he viewed the OT in human terms as the negative background to positive grace in the NT. But NT grace is shrouded in myth, which is unacceptable to the modern mind and accordingly must be demythologized and reinterpreted in existentialist terms. Employing the existentialism of Kierkegaard and Heidegger, Bultmann emphasized the importance of decision in responding to the kerygma, or proclamation, of the NT. In the moment of decision as he hears the Word of God proclaimed, the hearer "stands outside of himself" (existere, from Gr. ek + histēmi) and has the possibility of entering a new understanding of himself. The preaching of the word is therefore central in Bultmann's hermeneutic (Ger. Hermeneutik) because it summons one to the possibility of new existence.

The new hermeneutic of Bultmann's disciples accepts the basic truth of his method and affirms the correctness of his interpretation of Luther's "justification by faith alone." Grace lies in the sphere of faith, not in the sphere of historical facts, hence radical biblical criticism can go on relatively unabated without danger to faith, since faith resides largely in a higher realm of history (Geschichte or Urgeschichte; primal history), while the relative events of the Bible reside in the changing realm of profane history (Historie). While Bultmann had extended the older view of hermeneutics far beyond its concern for detailed principles of exegesis and interpretation to a broad inquiry into the meaning of language as existential address, following Heidegger, his disciples felt he had not gone far enough. Ernst Fuchs and Gerhard Ebeling both sought to develop Heidegger's hermeneutical theory of language more comprehensively than had Bultmann and to see that speech itself is profoundly hermeneutical and existential. Hermeneutik becomes a deep inquiry into the function of speech and word, and of listening to and being submissive to the call of being itself as being graciously opens itself to Dasein, the person who "is there" in the world. For Heidegger, being is not God; but it is an easy step for the followers of Bultmann to adapt this language of "grace" and apply it to Christian proclamation.

The clearest exposition of this new development in post-Bultmannian hermeneutics is to be found in New Hermeneutic (ed. James M. Robinson and John B. Cobb Jr., 1964), which was written virtually on the scene and contains valuable focal articles by Ebeling and Fuchs, American reactions by Robinson, John Dillenberger, Robert Funk, Amos Wilder, and John Cobb, with a response by Fuchs. In brief, the new hermeneutic took a more positive turn toward the language of Jesus as mediating kerygma, not mere historiography as Bultmann had insisted. Fuchs and Ebeling saw the language of Jesus as “word-happening” or “speech-event” and were ready to argue, in the larger context of Heidegger’s hermeneutic, that not just the Easter kerygma but Jesus’ word as well mediates an eschatological self-understanding to the listener. Jesus’ claim of authority is not limited simply to a point in Palestinian history, as Bultmann required, but speaks today with equal authority in the church’s proclamation. Hence the word kerygma, insofar as it had distinguished the proclamation of the church as over against the historical and no longer relevant proclamation of Jesus, is replaced by the word-event or language-event in the new hermeneutic.

Existentialist interpretation is therefore broadened to bridge the gap that had been created by Bultmann between Historie (Jesus) and Geschichte (the church’s kerygma), to bring together historical and systematic theology in terms of the recurring language-event that moves from Jesus to the contemporary preacher. Ebeling especially, as the historical and systematic theologian deeply immersed in Luther’s hermeneutic as well as Heidegger and Bultmann, goes beyond the latter by insisting that all the words of Scripture have to do with the incarnate Son of God, Jesus Christ. Fuchs, his close friend and collaborator on the NT side, speaks of Jesus as standing in the place of God as he speaks of new possibilities for existential self-understanding.

All of the foregoing sounds like a return to orthodox concern for the Jesus of history and his identity with the Christ of faith. But the new hermeneutic is more subtle than to allow for a simple return to classical evangelicalism and too indebted to the basic methodology of Bultmannian radical criticism, which Bultmann himself inherited from his predecessors, notably Dilthey. The critical assumptions of the new hermeneutic remain basically unchanged, only broadened, from those of Bultmann. Fuchs continues to speak of Jesus primarily in terms of his language, but fails to appreciate that language does not have independent status apart from the person who speaks and therefore cannot be apotheosized or separated from the intentionality of the speaker.

This serious fault in the later Heideggerian hermeneutic—to view language as something that speaks without reference to God or persons—feeds into the abortive attempt of the new quest of the historical Jesus. As long as the school of the new hermeneutic centered upon the event of Jesus’ language and did not see that language as revelatory of Jesus’ own self-understanding and messianic self-consciousness, it was bound to reflect the same fundamental skepticism regarding the person of Jesus as did Bultmann. James M. Robinson’s attempt to undertake a new quest of the historical Jesus was shortly abandoned, mainly because the quest focused on the understanding of existence that emerges from Jesus’ linguistic activity, not on Jesus’ self-understanding, which is disclosed in that activity. Similarly, Fuchs speaks of Jesus’ language and his concept of time but appears disinterested in what this says of Jesus as a person. Amos Wilder has ably criticized Fuchs on this point. One of the foremost new questers, Ernst Käsemann, likewise shows a methodological fault in his desire to allow Jesus a more prominent position than did his mentor Bultmann. Conceding that Jesus makes a good many unusual claims that might suggest a messianic consciousness, he nonetheless holds back and declares that it is his personal opinion that Jesus did not think of himself in those terms.

This has led critics of the school who have been appreciative of the early promise of the new hermeneutic to bemoan the fact that the methodology is too closely allied to Heidegger’s notion of language that mysteriously speaks on its own without reference to the intentionality of the speaker. The present writer early expressed his concerns in Jesus, Persons, and the Kingdom of God and more recently in New Approaches to Jesus and the Gospels, suggesting that a more adequate approach to Jesus’ words and activity will need to employ a descriptive phenomenology that views the speaker, and perforce the self-understanding of the person who speaks, as standing within and revealed through what he says and does. Several helpful models may be employed in this more useful enterprise, among them the later Wittgenstein, Marcel, Polanyi, and the British school of person analysts, including G. E. M. Anscombe and P. F. Strawson. This approach is extremely valuable in bringing the new hermeneutic to a satisfactory conclusion in its search for the unity of the Jesus of history and the Christ of faith, and finding that solution in what all along has been the orthodox view of Jesus as the self-conscious Messiah who, in his speaking and acting, is the originator of the church’s christological tradition.

That there have been gains in NT exegesis as a result of the renewed interest in the vitality of Jesus’ language, especially the parables, should be gratefully acknowledged by all, in spite of the fact that Jesus’ christological claims implicit in that language have not been widely appreciated. On the theological side of the new hermeneutic, recent developments have reached something of a stalemate over the question of “horizons.” The most prominent exponent of the new hermeneutic in the Bultmannian tradition, Hans-Georg Gadamer, and a more recent evangelical interpreter, Anthony Thistleton, argue for a fusion of the church’s horizon and ours. This, after all, lay at the center of the new hermeneutic as originally conceived, and it is popularly accepted in theological thought today that the text and the interpreter share in the meaning of the encounter. Evangelicals will want to be wary of speaking too hastily of a fusion of horizons of meaning, however, and will likely be more impressed with E. D. Hirsch's approach to hermeneutics, which allows the original meaning of the speaker or text to remain intact. There can be an appropriation of significance for the interpreter that may vary depending on one's setting, but the authoritative meaning of the speaker or text is their prerogative to establish. The issue is a serious and fundamental one, for at stake is the very intentionality and authority of Jesus and of the early church. There are signs that, at least from the NT side of the new hermeneutic, the intentionality of Jesus is beginning to receive renewed interest, a fact attested by two recent studies, New Testament Prophecy by David Hill and Aims of Jesus by Ben Meyer.

R. G. GRUENLER

See also BULTMANN, RUDOLF; COBB, JOHN B., JR.; DEMYTHOLOGIZATION; EBELING, GERHARD; EXISTENTIALISM; GADAMER, HANS-GEORG; HEIDEGGER, MARTIN; HISTORIE AND GESCHICHTE; KERYGMA; KIERKEGAARD, SØREN.

Bibliography. H. W. Bartsch, ed., Kerygma and Myth I; Kerygma and Myth II; R. Bultmann, Jesus Christ and Mythology; G. Ebeling, Nature of Faith; Word and Faith; R. W. Funk, Language, Hermeneutic, and Word of God; H.-G. Gadamer, Truth and Method; V. A. Harvey, Historian and the Believer; M. Heidegger, Being and Time; D. High, Language, Persons, and Belief; E. D. Hirsch Jr., Validity in Interpretation; S. M. Ogden, Christ Without Myth; S. M. Ogden, ed., Existence and Faith: Shorter Writings of Rudolf Bultmann; M. Polanyi, Personal Knowledge: Towards a Post-Critical Philosophy; J. M. Robinson and J. B. Cobb Jr., Later Heidegger and Theology; New Frontiers in Theology; New Hermeneutic; A. Thistleton, Two Horizons; C. Van Til, New Hermeneutic.

New Jerusalem, Church of The. See SWEDENBORG, EMANUEL.

New Jerusalem. See JERUSALEM, NEW.

New Light Schism. A division in the Presbyterian and Congregational denominations in the mideighteenth century primarily over practical matters of Christian experience. Presbyterian schism occurred in 1741 when the Old Lights, who were predominantly of Scotch-Irish heritage, ejected the New Light faction and formed the Old Side synod of Philadelphia. The New Light party, with their English Puritan background, grew out of the Great Awakening and revived a more experiential interpretation of the Christian life. They organized the New Side presbyteries of New Brunswick and Londonderry.

Both parties professed traditional Calvinist and Puritan doctrine, but they differed substantially on its practical implications. Old Light ministers, interpreting Calvinism in a rationalistic manner, claimed that holding orthodox theology was more important than Christian living. For them God's sovereign decree determined who was elect, and correct theological belief, not manner of life, was the only major practical sign of salvation. Moral laxity often resulted from such de-emphasis on religious experience, leading to several Old Light pastors being tried by presbyteries for persistent immoral living and drunkenness.

In contrast, New Lights William and Gilbert Tennent stressed Puritan piety as indispensable to Calvinist theology. They preached conviction of sin, teaching their hearers that true faith in Christ required a vital conversion experience leading to moral obedience and personal holiness. Gilbert Tennent, in "Danger of an Unconverted Ministry," contended that some Old Light clergy were actually unregenerate, and he encouraged believers to seek spiritual nurture elsewhere. Old Light members countered that New Lights were guilty of "enthusiasm" and defamatory accusations. Their itinerant preaching and their encouragement of laymen to pressure fellow church members into New Light experience violated Presbyterian polity.

During the schism New Siders experienced dramatic growth and founded the College of New Jersey (Princeton) to educate their ministers. Meanwhile the Old Side generally failed in its educational efforts and actually declined in number. In 1758 New Side initiatives produced reunion on conditions favorable to that group.

Congregationalists also experienced schism over the Great Awakening. After George Whitefield's and Gilbert Tennent's evangelistic tours in 1740–41 brought a general revival to New England, James Davenport's incendiary preaching and incitement of emotional excesses brought sharp Old Light reprisals. Charles Chauncey argued that revivals were not the work of God because emotional outbursts were not produced by God's Spirit. Charging New Lights with antinomianism and enthusiasm, he claimed that religion, rather than pertaining to human emotions, primarily appeals to the understanding and judgment.

Jonathan Edwards defended revivalism. He admitted that instances of doctrinal and ecclesiastical disorder existed, but he argued that believers could distinguish between genuine and counterfeit awakenings by examining whether they brought love for Christ, Scripture, and truth and opposition to evil. Edwards defined the essence of true religion as "holy affections." Religious experience is not limited to the mind. When regenerated by the Holy Spirit, a person's whole being—heart, mind, will, and affections—is engaged.

This schism helped Edwards and his followers revive a balanced, vital Calvinism. Chauncey and other Old Lights, on the other hand, broke from

New Light Schism

Calvinism and began to advocate Arminianism and eventually Unitarianism. W. A. HOFFECKER

See also EDWARDS, JONATHAN; GREAT AWAKENINGS; WHITEFIELD, GEORGE.

Bibliography. C. Chauncey, Enthusiasm Described and Cautioned Against; Seasonable Thoughts on the State of Religion in New England; J. Davenport, Rev. Mr. Davenport's Confessions and Retractions; J. Edwards, Distinguishing Marks of a Work of the Spirit of God; Some Thoughts Concerning the Present Revival of Religion in New England; Treatise concerning the Religious Affections; E. S. Gaustad, Great Awakening in New England; G. Tennent, Danger of an Unconverted Ministry; L. J. Trinterud, Forming of an American Tradition.

New Man. See MAN, OLD AND NEW.

Newman, John Henry (1801–1890). The most famous English convert to Roman Catholicism in the nineteenth century. First led to personal faith in Christ in his teens in the most Calvinistic section of evangelical Anglicanism, he proceeded to Oxford, where his intellectual ability, subtlety of mind, and singular powers of expression were recognized and developed. Remaining after graduation as a fellow of Oriel College, he was renowned for his piety and preaching. He was also exposed to more liberal currents of thought, which he overtly rejected but which never left him and, once in the secure confines of Catholicism, found a measure of expression.

Repelled by the more extreme forms of liberalism, Newman feared the introduction of such theology to England; and in common with many nurtured in strongly Calvinistic evangelicalism, he was critical of the entrepreneurial optimism of much early nineteenth-century evangelicalism as well. While many of those of similar background were finding their answer in a return to the Reformation, his romantic temperament sought for an era in which the power of God was even more evident. His brother Francis, who had followed a somewhat similar pilgrimage, sought his orientation in the first-century church among the early Plymouth Brethren before shifting to agnosticism. John's friends and patristic studies pointed him to the church of the great fathers of the fourth and fifth centuries. Here he saw an authoritative leadership able to rout the forces of heterodoxy through the effusion of the Spirit vouchsafed to the historic episcopate. In his search for the channel of the Spirit's presence and power, he was in some ways as charismatic as Edward Irving. But he believed that the answer for Christianity lay not in the gifts of the Spirit in general but particularly in the gift of apostleship, which he came to believe had always been present in the apostolic succession of the episcopate.

In 1833 Newman, together with such associates as Keble and Pusey, launched the movement of Catholic Anglicanism known as Tractarianism. Its particular stress lay on the power and authority of the bishop as the way to renewal and strength for the Church of England. Evangelical Anglicans were horrified and broad churchmen were appalled. When Newman realized that the Church of England as a whole would not follow the Tractarian program, he joined the Roman Catholic Church in 1845, taking some followers with him but leaving others to create major changes in large sections of Anglicanism.

Settled within the security of the apostolic church, he gave great attention to the development of doctrine. While Newman wished to exalt the pontificate by indicating how the teaching office of the church had taken doctrine from its embryonic NT condition and brought it to rich fullness under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, many traditional Roman Catholics feared that the faith was being undercut by insufficient emphasis on Scripture. As a result, Newman was under something of a cloud during his Roman Catholic experience, although his intellectual brilliance was recognized and he was made a cardinal in his later years. Since his death, and particularly in more recent years, his influence has been of great importance for developments in Roman Catholic theology. I. S. RENNIE

See also ANGLO-CATHOLICISM; HIGH CHURCH MOVEMENT; KEBLE, JOHN; KINGSLEY, CHARLES; OXFORD MOVEMENT; PUSEY, EDWARD BOUVERIE; VIA MEDIA.

Bibliography. C. S. Dessain et al., eds., Letters and Diaries of John Henry Newman; G. Biemer, Newman on Tradition; L. Bouyer, Newman's Vision of Faith; O. Chadwick, Newman; C. S. Dessain, John Henry Newman; Spirituality of John Henry Newman; G. Faber, Oxford Apostles; I. T. Ker, John Henry Newman; N. Lash, Newman on Development; D. Nicholls and F. Kerr, eds., John Henry Newman; T. J. Norris, Newman and His Theological Method; W. Ward, Life of John Henry, Cardinal Newman; H. L. Weatherby, Cardinal Newman in His Age.

New Morality. See SITUATION ETHICS.

New Quest of the Historical Jesus. See JESUS CHRIST.

New School Theology. New School Presbyterianism embodied mainstream evangelical Christianity in the middle decades of the nineteenth century. Its modified Calvinist theology, enthusiasm for revivalism, moral reform, and interdenominational cooperation were its most notable characteristics.

New School theology had its remote roots in the Calvinism of Jonathan Edwards, but its immediate predecessor was the New Haven theology of Nathaniel Taylor, who advocated a theology of moral government. He synthesized moralistic elements from Scottish commonsense philosophy with reinterpretations of traditional Calvinism to construct a semi-Pelagian foundation for revivalism. Denying the imputation of Adam's sin and claiming that unregenerate humans can respond to moral overtures, especially Christ's death, Taylor argued that people need not wait passively for the Holy Spirit to redeem them. His views reflected a long-standing American faith in human freedom.

While Old School leaders roundly attacked Taylor's theology, revivalists and ministers such as Charles G. Finney, Lyman Beecher, and Albert Barnes popularized it. Finney used Taylor's theology to redefine revivals as works people can perform using means God has provided. With such a theological basis he introduced his famous "new measures," such as referring to his hearers as "sinners" and calling them to sit on an "anxious bench" while they contemplated converting to Christ.

Schism divided the two schools of Presbyterians in 1837 when an Old School majority expelled New School members for tolerating theological errors. Differences over a plan of union with Congregationalists and slavery played a secondary role. Those ejected published the Auburn Declaration, which denied sixteen accusations alleged by the Old School. The declaration affirmed a weakened view of imputation—Adam's sinful act was not counted against all people, but all people after Adam were sinners—supported Christ's substitutionary atonement, and asserted that the work of the Holy Spirit, not human choice, was the basis of regeneration. It was a compromise between New England theology and the Westminster Confession.

This modified Calvinism was used to champion activism in American social life. Voluntary societies consisting of members from various denominations carried out missionary activity and combated social ills. These constructive crusades, in which New School Presbyterians played a leading role, were inspired by postmillennial expectations of progress.

In the decades after 1840, New School theology became more conservative. Its proponents widely criticized Finney's perfectionism. They attacked Darwinism, early biblical criticism, and German philosophy and theology. Henry B. Smith of Union Theological Seminary emerged as the leading spokesman. His defense of systematic theology and biblical infallibility and his perceptions that New Schoolers had become more orthodox were influential in the reunion of the Presbyterian Church in 1869. W. A. HOFFECKER

See also AUBURN DECLARATION; BARNES, ALBERT; FINNEY, CHARLES GRANDISON; NEW HAVEN THEOLOGY; OLD SCHOOL THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. S. J. Baird, History of the New School; A. Barnes, Notes on the Epistle to the Romans; C. G. Finney, Lectures on Revivals of Religion; G. M. Marsden, Evangelical Mind and the New School Presbyterian Experience; "New School Heritage and Presbyterian Fundamentalism," WmTJ 32:129–47; T. L. Smith, Revivalism and Social Reform; N. W. Taylor, Lectures on the Moral Government of God.

New Testament. See BIBLE.

New Testament Canon. See BIBLE, CANON OF.

New Testament Theology. That branch of the Christian disciplines that traces themes through the authors of the NT and then amalgamates those individual motifs into a single comprehensive whole. Thus, it studies the progressive revelation of God in terms of the life situation at the time of writing and then delineates the underlying thread that ties it together. This discipline centers upon meaning rather than application, i.e., the message of the text for its own day rather than for modern needs. The term employed most frequently for the current state of biblical theology is crisis, due to the growing stress on diversity rather than unity and the failure to attain any consensus whatever as to methodology or content. This, however, is hyperbolic.

Historical Survey. In the centuries following the apostolic era, dogma dominated the church and biblical theology was forced to take a subordinate role. The "rule of faith," or the magisterium, of the church, was the guiding principle. The change began with the Reformation, when sola Scriptura replaced dogma as the hermeneutic of the church. The true beginning of "biblical theology" came after the Enlightenment within German pietism. The mind replaced faith as the controlling factor, and the historical-critical method developed. J. F. Gabler in 1787 defined the approach in purely descriptive terms, and after him critics treated the Bible like any other book.

In Tübingen, F. C. Baur in 1864 developed "tendency criticism," which reconstructed NT history under Hegel's thesis (Petrine church), antithesis (Pauline church), and synthesis (the later church of the second century). Later in the century the history of religion school with Wilhelm Bousset and William Wrede looked at the sources of Christianity in terms of the surrounding religions. From that time the basis of NT theology was said to be the early church rather than Jesus. The conservative reaction, via Schlatter and Zahn in Germany, the Cambridge trio (Lightfoot, Westcott, and Hort), and the Princetonians (Hodge, Machen, Warfield, and Vos) argued for the interdependence of biblical theology with exegesis and systematics.

Karl Barth and dialectical theology (1919) rescued the old liberalism after its collapse following World War I. He said that God speaks to humans through the Bible. Therefore, the testaments were studied along theological rather than historical-critical lines. Oscar Cullman with his salvation-history approach represented the conservative wing, and Rudolf Bultmann with his demythologization and existential interpretation controlled the liberal faction. Following Bultmann, Ernst Fuchs and Gerhard Ebeling developed the new hermeneutic, an influential school that considered the Bible to be encounter or “word-event.” They reacted against the Bible as propositional truth and said that in it people are called to a new relationship with God.

There are several more recent approaches, such as Wolfhart Pannenberg’s return to the historical approach as a scientific discipline and Brevard Childs’s canon process, which considers the Bible as a unity and states that biblical theology must begin with the final canonical form rather than the developing stages of the biblical books. The major characteristic, however, has been disunity. No voice has gained ascendancy and no single system dominates as did Baur, Bousset, or Bultmann in the past. However, the interest is greater than ever before, and several voices, notably those of the canon-critical camp, are turning interest back to biblical theology.

Relationship to Other Disciplines. To Systematic Theology. Since biblical theology began as a reaction against dogmatics, there has always been tension between the two. Many like Ernst Käsemann have argued that the fragmentary nature of the NT data makes any attempt to unify the diverse theologies impossible. This is doubtful, however (see below), and the two are interdependent. Biblical theology forces systematics to remain true to the historical revelation, while dogmatics allows the categories to integrate the data into a larger whole. Yet the organization itself stems from the text; Scripture must determine the integrating pattern or structure. Biblical theology is descriptive, tracing the individual emphases of the sacred writers and then collating them to ascertain the underlying unity. Systematics takes this material and reshapes it into a confessional statement for the church; it bridges the gap between “what it meant” and “what it means.” At the same time, systematics provides the preunderstanding that guides the interpreter; so the two disciplines interact in a type of “hermeneutical circle” as each informs and checks the other.

To Exegesis. There is constant tension within biblical theology between diversity and unity, and a holistic consideration of the biblical material is a necessary corrective to a fragmented approach to the Bible. Thus, biblical theology regulates exegesis (Gaffin). Yet exegesis also precedes biblical theology, for it provides the data with which the latter works. The theologian correlates the results of the exegesis of individual texts to discover the unity between them. Therefore, the hermeneutical circle is now a three-way enterprise.

To Historical Theology. “Tradition” controls not only Roman Catholic dogma but Protestant thinking as well. All interpreters find their database in their community of faith. Historical theology makes the theologian aware of the ongoing dialogue and thus functions both as a check against reading later ideas into a passage and as a store of knowledge from which to draw possible interpretations. This discipline also enters the hermeneutical circle, within which the text challenges our preunderstanding and both draws upon and reforms our tradition-derived beliefs.

To Homiletical Theology. Nearly every theologian realizes that theology dare not merely describe the past thinking of the biblical authors. It must demonstrate the relevance of those ideas for contemporary needs. This is the task of homiletical theology. Of course, no one is either a theologian or a homiletician; in a very real sense the two converge. Yet it is still valid to differentiate the levels at which we work, so long as we realize that true interpretation must blend all five aspects—biblical, systematic, exegetical, historical, and homiletical. The task itself has been explained best by missiology’s “contextualization.” The preacher/missionary takes the results of the first four disciplines and communicates this to the current “context” of the church/mission field.

Specific Problem Areas. Unity and Diversity. Many argue that the biblical books are circumstantial and linked to irreversible historical contingency; therefore, there was no true unifying theology. Some go so far as to state there was no true “orthodoxy” in the earliest church but only a series of different groups struggling for control. Certainly there is tremendous diversity in the Bible, since most of the books were written to defend God’s will for his people against various aberrations. Further, there is a great variety of expressions—e.g., Paul’s “adoption” motif or John’s “newborn” imagery. This does not mean, however, that it is impossible to compile divergent traditions into a larger conceptual whole (cf. Eph. 4:5–6). Through all the diverse expressions a unified perspective and faith shine through. The key is linguistic/semantic; the differences can often be understood as metaphors that point to a larger truth. At this level we can detect unity.

Tradition-History. Many believe that doctrines and traditions developed in stages, and that inspiration should be applied to the originating event, the stages in the subsequent history of the community, and the final stage in which it was “frozen” into the canon. This makes detection of any biblical theology very difficult and usually leads to multiple interpretations. There is another way, however, that depends on the final form and traces only that which is evident in the text. Moreover, we must not allow a concept of tradition to replace the search for a unifying center. Tradition-critical speculation becomes an end in itself, with very little in the way of fruitful results. Still, when placed within the context of the whole process, the method can highlight individual emphases, e.g., in the four Gospels.

Analogia Fidei and Progressive Revelation. When one places too much stress on unity, “parallelo-mania” can result, i.e., the tendency to apply any parallel (even if a wrong one) to a text. Actually, as evidenced even in the Reformers, “the faith” or dogma can control our exegesis. A better phrase would be analogia Scriptura, “Scripture interpreting Scripture.” Here too we must exercise care and stress a proper use of parallels, studying the use of the terms in both passages to determine whether the meanings truly overlap. Progressive revelation ties together the seemingly disparate notions of tradition-history and analogia Scriptura. One must trace the historical process of revelation and determine the continuities between individual parts.

History and Theology. James Barr says that ambiguity about the connection between revelatory events and historical causation and between revelation and the biblical text itself causes problems for the possibility of biblical theology. Yet history is necessary for theology. While there is theology in narrative sections like the Gospels, this does not obviate the historical core. Lessing’s “ugly broad ditch” between “accidental truths of history” and “necessary truths of reason” is based on the philosophical skepticism of the Enlightenment. In the post-Einsteinian age this position is no longer viable. There is no reason that theology must be divorced from the possibility of revelation in history. Indeed, history and its interpretation are united, and recent approaches to historiography demonstrate not only the possibility of seeing God’s revelation in history but the necessity of doing so. In Kings–Chronicles or the Gospels, for instance, history and theology are inseparable. We know Jesus as he has been interpreted for us through the sacred evangelists.

Language, Text, and Meaning. Recent theorists have drawn such a sharp contrast between modern conditions and the ancient world that the interpreter seems forever separated from the intended meaning of the text. They assert that a text once written becomes autonomous from the author, and the interpreter cannot get behind his or her preunderstanding to make an “objective” reading. The world of the interpreter cannot interpenetrate the world of the Bible. Gadamer argues for a fusion of horizons between the interpreter and the text, and Ricoeur speaks of the “world-referential” dimension—i.e., Scripture draws the reader into its own world. More recent approaches such as structuralism go beyond the text to stress the “deeper structure” beneath it—i.e., the universal patterns of the mind that speak to every generation. It is said that we are moving further and further from the original meaning of Scripture. This is not necessarily the case, however. Wittgenstein talked of the “language games” that language plays, and E. D. Hirsch speaks of the “intrinsic genre” of the text—i.e., the rules of the language game that narrow the possibilities and facilitate interpretation. Meaning in the text is open to the interpreter, who must place his or her preunderstanding “in front of” the text (Ricoeur) and enter its own language game. Within this the original meaning is a possible goal. When we recognize the NT as stating propositional truth, the intended meaning becomes a necessary enterprise.

Old Testament and New Testament. Any true biblical theology must recognize the centrality of the relationship between the testaments. Again the issue is diversity versus unity. The various strata of both must be allowed to speak, but the unity of these strata must be recognized. Several aspects demand this unity: the historical continuity between the testaments; the centrality of the OT for the NT; the promise-fulfillment theme of the NT; the messianic hope of the OT and its place as a “pedagogue” (Gal. 3). Many, from Marcion to Bultmann, have posited an absolute dichotomy between the testaments, yet to do so is to separate the NT from its historical moorings and to cause it to founder in a sea of historical irrelevance. Others elevate OT over NT (A. A. van Ruler) or take a purely christological approach to the OT (Hengstenberg, Vischer). None does full justice to the two testaments. For instance, while a completely christological approach guards against the tendency to historicize the OT away from promise-fulfillment, it leads to a subjective spiritualizing of the OT that denies its intended meaning. Therefore, I would posit “patterns of unity and continuity” (Hasel) as the OT looks forward to the NT and the NT depends upon the OT for its identity. Both are valid aspects of God’s ongoing redemptive activity in history.

Theology and Canon. Brevard Childs has made the final form of the canon the primary hermeneutical tool in determining a biblical theology. He believes that the parts of Scripture must maintain a dialectical relationship with the whole of the canon. Therefore, there is no true biblical theology when only the individual voices of the various strata are heard. However, many critics demur, saying that biblical authority and inspiration are dynamic rather than static, centering not only on the final form of the text but also on the individual stages within the tradition process, both before the “final” form and after it, even up to the present day. Childs responds that while the tradition process has validity, any true theology must depend upon the canon itself and not on the speculative results of historical criticism. Childs’s concern is valid, but there are certain problems. First, both the original community and the current interpreter have priority over the author and text. Second, Childs admits that with his approach the original meaning of the text cannot be recovered. Many canon critics see the true meaning as encompassing not only the canonical thrust but also the meaning of the original event/saying, subsequent developments, and current interpretations. The text is reduced to a mere voice in a cacophony of sounds. Third, many other critics reduce Scripture to a “canon within the canon” (e.g., Käsemann). One chooses a theme as center and stresses only those passages that fit this so-called core of Scripture. This reductionism must be avoided and the whole of Scripture allowed to speak.

Authority. Since biblical theology is descriptive, dealing with “what it meant,” critical scholars deny its authority. True biblical authority, it is said, rests upon its “apostolic effectiveness” in fulfilling its task (Barrett) or upon the community behind it (Knight) or its content (Achte-meier). In actuality, the authority of Scripture transcends all these; as the revelation of God, it has propositional authority; as the revelation of God to man, it has existential authority. The text is primary, and the authority of the interpreter is secondary—i.e., it derives its authority from the text. Theology as interpreted meaning has authority only to the extent that it reflects the true message of the inspired Scriptures. The Barthian separation between the living Word and the written word, with the latter having only instrumental authority, is an inadequate mode, for it fails to understand properly the claims of Scripture for itself. The Bible is both propositional revelation and the dynamic instrument of the Holy Spirit. The authority of biblical theology stems not just from the fact that it speaks to the contemporary situation (which is the task of systematics and homiletics) but from the fact that it communicates divine truth.

A Proper Methodology. The Synthetic Method traces basic theological themes through the strata of Scripture in order to note their development through the biblical period. Its strength is stress on the unity of Scripture. Its weakness is its tendency toward subjectivity: one can force an artificial pattern upon the NT material.

The Analytical Method studies the distinctive theology of individual sections and notes the unique message of each. The strength is the emphasis upon the individual author’s meaning. The weakness is the radical diversity, which results in a collage of pictures with no cohesiveness.

The Historical Method studies the development of religious ideas in the life of God’s people. Its value is the attempt to understand the community of believers beyond the Bible. Its problem is the subjectivity of most reconstructions, in which the scriptural text is at the mercy of the theorist.

The Christological Method makes Christ the hermeneutical key to both testaments. Its strength is its recognition of the true center of the Bible. Its weakness is its tendency to spiritualize passages and force interpretations foreign to them, especially in terms of the OT experience of Israel. One should not read everything in the OT or NT as a “type of Christ.”

The Confessional Method looks at the Bible as a series of faith statements that are beyond history. Its value is its recognition of creed and worship in NT faith. Its danger is its radical separation between faith and history.

The Cross-Section Method traces a single unifying theme (e.g., covenant or promise) and studies it historically by means of “cross-sections” or samplings of the canonical record. Its strength is the understanding of major themes that it provides. Its weakness is the danger of arbitrary selection. If one selects the wrong central theme, other themes can be forced into harmony with it.

The Multiplex Method (Hasel) combines the best of these and proceeds hermeneutically from text to theory. It begins with grammatical and historical analysis of the text, attempting to unlock the meaning of the various texts within their life settings. Here a sociological analysis is also helpful, since it studies those life settings in terms of the social matrix of the believing communities. As the data are collected from this exegetical task, they are organized into the basic patterns of the individual books and then further of the individual authors. At this stage the interpreter has delineated the emphases or interlocking forces in the strata. Once these various traditions (e.g., Markan, Johannine, Pauline) have been charted, the student looks for basic principles of cohesion between them, for metaphorical language that discloses larger patterns of unity between the authors. One must seek the unified whole behind statements of election and universal salvific will, on the one hand, or behind realized and final eschatology, on the other. Paul’s stress on justification by faith will be united with John’s use of new-birth language. These larger unities are charted on two levels, first with respect to overall unity and second concerning the progress of revelation. Finally, these motifs are compiled into major sections and subsections, following a descriptive (biblical) method rather than an artificial reconstruction. In other words, the data rather than the dogmatic presuppositions of the interpreter control the operation.

From this will emerge a central unifying theme around which the other subthemes gather themselves. Within this larger unity the individual themes maintain complementary yet distinct roles. The larger cohesive unity must result from rather than become the presupposition of the theological enterprise—i.e., the texts determine the patterns.

Themes in New Testament Theology. These final two sections will apply the above proposals first to the basic theological messages of individual NT authors and then to the quest for a unifying central theme in the NT. Since there are separate articles in this volume on the theologies of Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, and Paul, we will present here the rest of the NT corpus, namely, the themes of the General Epistles and of Revelation.

Hebrews was written to a group of Jewish Christians, perhaps in Rome, who were in danger of “apostasizing” due to persecution. As a result, the author stresses the pilgrimage aspect of the Christian life (see Käsemann). The believer is to recognize that he or she lives between two worlds, the present age of trouble and the future age of salvation. The key is a faith that makes hope a concrete reality (11:1) and makes the “powers of the coming age” a present reality (6:4–5). In light of the superiority of Christ over the old Jewish economy, the Christian must cling to the high priest “in the order of Melchizedek” (6:20–7:3). While many have made the high priestly Christology the major theme of Hebrews, it is more likely that the pilgrimage aspect, rooted in the exhortation passages, is central.

James, probably the first NT book written, is addressed to a Jewish Christian audience, perhaps in Palestine. The church was poor, without influence, and passing through a time of persecution in which wealthy Jews were confiscating their property (2:6; 5:1–6). The book is immensely practical, dealing in a pastoral way with weak believers and their tendencies. It draws upon wisdom themes regarding trials and temptation, social concern, the problem of the tongue, and interpersonal conflicts to underscore the necessity of putting one’s faith into practice in the Christian life.

First Peter utilizes a great deal of creedal or catechetical material—i.e., formal statements on Christian doctrine composed by the apostles for the early church—to speak to a further situation of persecution on behalf of a mixed church of Jewish and Gentile Christians in northern Galatia. It combines an eschatological perspective (i.e., the end has begun and glory is near) with an ethical emphasis (i.e., exemplary behavior must result from the experience of God’s salvation in light of the world’s opposition). Christ is the model of the righteous sufferer (3:18), and his exaltation is shared by the one who endures similar hostility. Therefore, in the midst of this evil world the believer is an alien whose true citizenship is in heaven and who rejoices even when suffering (1:6–7) because it is a participation in the humiliation/exaltation of Christ.

Second Peter and Jude are sister epistles written to combat false teaching of the Gnostic type, which rejected the lordship of Christ (2 Pet. 2:1) and the parousia (2 Pet. 3:3–4) and degenerated into immorality (Jude 4). In light of this, there is a decided emphasis on the primacy of apostolic teaching (2 Pet. 1:16, 20–21; 3:2) and on the return of Christ in judgment (2 Pet. 3:3–4; Jude 5–6). The coming day of the Lord is central in 2 Peter, and the judgment of those who oppose God, either human or angelic/demonic, comes to the fore in Jude. Both stress the stringent responsibility of the church to oppose the false teachers.

Unifying Themes. Five criteria are necessary to the search for a central motif that binds together the individual emphases and diverse doctrines of the NT: (1) the basic theme must express the nature and character of God; (2) it must account for the people of God as they relate to him; (3) it must express the world of humankind as the object of God’s redemptive activity; (4) it must explain the dialectical relationship between the testaments; and (5) it must account for the other possible unifying themes and truly unite the theological emphases of the NT. Many proposed themes will fit one or another of the strata of OT and NT—e.g., the narrative or the poetic or the prophetic or the wisdom or the epistolary portions—but will fail to summarize all. This theme must balance the others without merely lifting one above its fellow motifs.

The Covenant (Eichrodt, Ridderbos) has often been utilized to express the binding relationship between God and his people. It includes both the legal contract and the eschatological hope that results, and both the universal dimension of the cosmic God who creates as well as sustains and the specific communion that results. The problem is that this is not universally attested in the testaments as the central core. A better theme might be “election” as expressing the act of God or “promise” as the hope that results (see below).

God and Christ (Hasel) have been stressed a great deal lately, noting the theocentric character of the OT and the christocentric character of the NT. This is much better than stressing aspects, such as the holiness or lordship or kingship of God, and better than making either God or Christ the center, which would do a disservice to OT or NT respectively. However, while we may view the theme dynamically to allow for the individual expression of subthemes, this too may be narrow since the community of God’s people is not a natural part of it.

Existential Reality or Communion has been stressed (Bultmann et al.) as the true purpose of the Bible. Proponents argue that this ties together the other themes and expresses the dynamic work of God among his people. Yet as expressed by many it ignores too readily the propositional and creedal content of Scripture. While communion is certainly a primary motif, it is not the unifying theme.

New Testament Theology

Eschatological Hope (Kaiser) is often stressed, in either the sense of promise or of hope. The strength of this is the way it unites the testaments, since both look to the future consummation of God's activity in history. It also unifies the other three above, which can be said to express aspects of this hope. Its weakness, as often noted by various scholars, is the absence of stress on this in many portions of Scripture, e.g., the wisdom literature or the Johannine writings. Again, this is a major emphasis but not the unifying theme.

Salvation History (von Rad, Cullmann, Ladd) may be the best of the positions, for it recognizes God's/Christ's redemptive activity on behalf of humankind, in terms of both present and future communion. More than the others above, it subsumes each of the categories into itself. Those who oppose this as the unifying theme argue from two directions: (1) its artificial nature, since there is no single instance in the OT or NT where it is directly stated; and (2) the lack of emphasis on it in the entire NT—e.g., it fits Luke–Acts but not John. Any “unifying theme,” however, is by its very nature artificial, since it is a principle derived from the individual themes of Scripture. Also, while it is not “central” to every book, it is behind those diverse motifs and is thereby able to bind them together. Every theme here has a viable claim, so we must see which of the five best summarizes the others. Therefore, salvation history has the best claim to the title “unifying theme.”

G. R. OSBORNE

See also JOHN, THEOLOGY OF; LUKE, THEOLOGY OF; MARK, THEOLOGY OF; MATTHEW, THEOLOGY OF; OLD TESTAMENT THEOLOGY; PAUL, THEOLOGY OF.

Bibliography. J. Barr, Scope and Authority of the Bible; C. K. Barrett, “What Is New Testament Theology? Some Reflections,” Horizons in Biblical Theology; H. Boers, What Is New Testament Theology?; B. Childs, Biblical Theology in Crisis; R. Gaffin, “Systematic Theology and Biblical Theology,” New Testament Student and Theology III, J. H. Skilton, ed.; L. Goppelt, New Testament Theology; D. Guthrie, New Testament Theology; G. Hasel, New Testament Theology: Basic Issues in the Current Debate; A. M. Hunter, Introducing New Testament Theology; E. Käsemann, “Problem of a New Testament Theology,” NTS 19:235–45; G. E. Ladd, Theology of the New Testament; U. Mauser, ed., Horizons in Biblical Theology: An International Dialogue; R. Morgan, Nature of New Testament Theology: The Contributions of William Wrede and Adolf Schlatter; L. Morris, New Testament Theology; K. H. Schelkle, Theology of the New Testament; J. D. Smart, Past, Present, and Future of Bib- lical Theology; E. Stauffer, New Testament Theology; G. Vos, Biblical Theology.

Niagara Conferences. A series of summer meetings for Bible study that marked the beginning of the Bible and Prophetic Conference movement in the United States. The idea for holding summer Bible conferences originated in 1868 among a group of American evangelicals associated with the millenarian journal Waymarks in the Wilderness. For the next few years conferences were held in different cities, but in 1883 sponsors secured a permanent location at Niagara-on-the-Lake, Ontario.

At first called the Believers' Meeting for Bible Study, the Niagara Conferences met for one week during the summer. The schedule usually commenced with a Wednesday evening prayer meeting. Then for the next week conferees attended two study sessions each morning, two in the afternoon, and one in the evening. On Sunday the slightly abbreviated schedule included a worship service, an observance of the Lord's Supper, and a meeting on missionary themes. Speakers, who were drawn from across the country, emphasized a traditional evangelical understanding of the Bible. Many practiced a new kind of exposition called the “Bible reading.” In contrast to more standard preaching and teaching, the Bible reading consisted of a collection of various biblical passages on a given theme that were read together with very few connecting comments. In this way, the audiences were assured, they heard only what the Holy Spirit had to say on the subject.

Because of the nonsectarian spirit of the sessions, the conferences were able to draw a cross-section of North American evangelicals. But the leadership of the meetings remained under the control of millenarian teachers and pastors. Men such as Nathaniel West, H. M. Parsons, A. J. Gordon, W. J. Erdman, A. T. Pierson, George Needham, Robert Cameron, and most importantly James H. Brookes made sure that the still suspect premillennialism was taught alongside more traditional evangelical theological fare. When controversy arose over the doctrinal slant of the 1877 conference, James Brookes issued a fourteen-point “Niagara Creed” in 1878. The statement contained articles on the verbal inerrancy of the Bible, a Calvinist understanding of human depravity, salvation by faith in the blood of Christ, the personality and continuing work of the Holy Spirit in the lives of believers, the need for personal holiness, and the premillennial second coming of Christ.

After the death of James Brookes in 1897 the conference moved from Niagara-on-the-Lake and eventually disbanded in 1901 when its leadership could no longer agree on the timing of the “rapture” in relation to the tribulation of the last days. Nevertheless, the Niagara Conference spawned other Bible and Prophetic Conferences and spread premillennial views, especially the dispensationalism of J. N. Darby. In addition, the conferences forged alliances among conservative evangelicals that played a significant role in the beginnings of the fundamentalist movement after World War I.

T. P. WEBER

See also DISPENSATION, DISPENSATIONALISM; FUNDAMENTALISM; MILLENNIUM, VIEWS OF THE.

Bibliography. G. Marsden, Fundamentalism and American Culture; L. D. Pettegrew, "Niagara Bible Conference and American Fundamentalism," CBQ 19–20; E. R. Sandeen, Roots of Fundamentalism; T. P. Weber, Living in the Shadow of the Second Coming.

Nicea, Council of (325). The first ecumenical council in the history of the church was convened by the emperor Constantine at Nicea in Bithynia (now Iznik, Turkey). The main purpose of the council was to attempt to heal the schism in the church provoked by Arianism. This it proceeded to do theologically and politically by the almost unanimous production of a theological confession (the Nicene Creed) by over three hundred bishops representing almost all the eastern provinces of the empire (where the heresy was chiefly centered) and by a token representation from the West. The creed thus produced was the first that could legally claim universal authority as it was sent throughout the empire to receive the agreement of the churches (with the alternative consequences of excommunication and imperial banishment).

The issue that culminated at Nicea arose out of an unresolved tension within the theological legacy of Origen concerning the relation of the Son to the Father. On the one hand, there was the attribution of deity to the Son in a relationship with the Father described as eternal generation. On the other hand, there was clear subordinationism. Almost appropriately, the dispute erupted at Alexandria about 318, with Arius, a popular presbyter of the church district of Baucalis, developing the latter strain of Origenism against Bishop Alexander, who advocated the former line of thinking. Arius was a quite capable logician who attacked Alexander (with motives not entirely scholarly) on the charge of Sabellianism. After a local synod heard his own views and dismissed them and him as unsound, Arius demonstrated his popularizing literary and political talents, gathering support beyond Alexandria. His theological views appealed to left-wing Origenists, including the respected Eusebius, bishop of Caesarea. His closest and most helpful ally was his former fellow student in the school of Lucian, Eusebius, bishop at the imperial residence of Nicomedia. After Constantine's personal envoy, Hosius of Cordova, failed to effect a reconciliation in 322 between the two parties in Alexandria, the emperor decided to convene an ecumenical council.

The teaching of Arianism is well documented. The central controlling idea is the unique, incommunicable, indivisible, transcendent nature of the singular divine being. This is what the Arians referred to as the Father. Logically pressing this definition of the Father and making use of certain biblical language, the Arians argued that if the error of Sabellius was to be avoided (and everyone was anxious to avoid it), then certain conclusions about the Son were inescapable. And it is this view of the Son that is the central significance of Arianism. He cannot be of the Father's being or essence (otherwise that essence would be divisible or communicable or in some way not unique or simple, which is impossible by definition). He therefore exists only by the Father's will, as do all other creatures and things. The biblical description of his being begotten does imply a special relationship between the Father and the Word or Son, but it cannot be an ontological relationship. "Begotten" is to be taken in the sense of "made," so that the Son is a ktisma or poiema, a creature. Being begotten or made, he must have had a beginning, and this leads to the famous Arian phrase, "there was when he was not." Since he was not generated out of the Father's being and he was, as they accorded him, the first of God's creation, then he must have been created out of nothing. Not being of perfect or immutable substance, he was subject to moral change. And because of the extreme transcendence of God, in the final respect the Son has no real communion or knowledge of the Father at all. The ascription of theos to Christ in Scripture was deemed merely functional.

The council of Nicea opened June 19, 325, with Hosius of Cordova presiding and the emperor in attendance. Despite the absence of official minutes, a sketch of the proceedings can be reconstructed. Following an opening address by the emperor in which the need for unity was stressed, Eusebius of Nicomedia, leading the Arian party, presented a formula of faith that candidly marked a radical departure from traditional formularies. The disapproval was so strong that most of the Arian party abandoned their support of the document and it was torn to shreds before the eyes of everyone present. Soon thereafter Eusebius of Caesarea, anxious to clear his name, read a lengthy statement of faith that included what was probably a baptismal creed of the church of Caesarea. Eusebius had been provisionally excommunicated earlier in the year by a synod in Antioch for refusing to sign an anti-Arian creed. The emperor himself pronounced him orthodox with only the suggestion that he adopt the word homoousios.

Nicea, Council of

For a long time the confession of Eusebius was believed to have formed the basis of the Nicene Creed, which was then modified by the council. It seems clear that such was not the case, however, the structure and content of the latter being significantly different from the former. Most likely a creed was introduced under the direction of Hosius, discussed (especially the term homousia), and drafted in its final form requiring the signatures of the bishops. All those present (including Eusebius of Nicomedia) signed except two who were subsequently exiled.

It should be noted that this creed is not that which is recited in churches today as the Nicene Creed. Although similar in many respects, the latter is significantly longer than the former and is missing some key Nicene phrases.

The theology expressed in the Nicene Creed is decisively anti-Arian. At the beginning the unity of God is affirmed. But the Son is said to be "true God from true God." Although confessing that the Son is begotten, the creed adds the words, "from the Father" and "not made." It is positively asserted that he is "from the being (ousia) of the Father" and "of one substance (homousia) with the Father." A list of Arian phrases, including "there was when he was not" and assertions that the Son is a creature or out of nothing, are expressly anathematized. Thus, an ontological rather than merely functional deity of the Son was upheld at Nicea. The only thing confessed about the Spirit, however, is faith in him.

Among other things achieved at Nicea were the agreement on a date to celebrate Easter and a ruling on the Melitian Schism in Egypt. Arius and his most resolute followers were banished but only for a short time. In the majority at Nicea was Athanasius, then a young deacon, soon to succeed Alexander as bishop and carry on what would become a minority challenge to a resurgent Arianism in the East. The orthodoxy of Nicea, however, would eventually and decisively be reaffirmed in 381 at the Council of Constantinople.

C. BLAISING

See also ARIUS, ARIANISM; ATHANASIUS; CONSTANTINOPLE, FIRST COUNCIL OF; MELITIAN SCHISMS; MONARCHIANISM.

Bibliography. Athanasius, Defense of the Nicene Council; A. E. Burn, Council of Nicea; Eusebius, Life of Constantine; J. Gonzalez, History of Christian Thought; R. C. Gregg and D. E. Groh, Early Arianism; A. Grillmeier, Christ in Christian Tradition; H. M. Gwatkin, Studies of Arianism; J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Creeds; Early Christian Doctrines; C. Luibheid, Eusebius of Caesarea and the Arian Crisis; Socrates, Ecclesiastical History; Sozomen, Ecclesiastical History; Theodoret, Ecclesiastical History.

Nicea, Second Council of (787). The seventh ecumenical council provided the climax (though not yet the end) of the iconoclastic controversy by decisively authorizing the veneration of images of various sorts but especially those of Christ, Mary, the holy angels, and the saints. The controversy had begun when the emperors Leo III (beginning in 725) and his son after him, Constantine V, tried to abruptly end the practice of worshiping images, which had been growing in the church for over three centuries. This seems to have been partly in response to the threat of Islam, which attributed its success to an unidolatrous monotheism. Constantine V convened a council in 754 that rendered an iconoclastic definitio based on the second commandment, the earliest fathers, and the concern that images were attempts to circumscribe the divine nature.

These actions were opposed by certain influential figures in the East, including Germanus of Constantinople and John of Damascus, and also by the Roman popes Gregory II, Gregory III, and Hadrian I. After the death of Constantine V, his wife, Irene, reversed his policies while acting as regent for their son, Leo IV (whom she later murdered). She convened the council that met at Nicea in 787 and was attended by more than three hundred bishops. At this council the iconoclasts were anathematized and the worship of images upheld. But a distinction was drawn between worship defined as proskynesis, which was to be given to images or rather more properly through the images to their prototypes, and worship defined as latria, which was to be given to God alone. The authority for image worship was considered to be the worship of the angel of the Lord in the OT and the incarnate Christ in the NT, the teaching and practice of the latter fathers, and the practice of venerating Mary and the saints that had become so established that not even the iconoclasts opposed it (they only opposed the worship of their images). Despite a brief outbreak of iconoclasm, the position of this council became standard orthodoxy in Greek and Roman churches.

The distinction between proskynesis and latria—or, as later put in the West, between dulia and latria—is so fine as to be imperceptible in common practice. As Calvin argued, the biblical usage of the words certainly does not recognize the distinction that Nicea attempted to establish. Thus, the Reformation rejected the decision of this council as encouraging idolatry.

C. BLAISING

See also DULIA; HYPERDULIA; LATRIA.

Bibliography. H. Bettenson, Documents of the Christian Church; J. Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion; J. Gonzalez, History of Christian Thought; E. J. Martin, History of the Iconoclastic Controversy; P. Schaff, History of the Christian Church.

Nicene Creed. See NICEA, COUNCIL OF.

Niebuhr, Helmut Richard (1894–1962). The brothers Reinhold and Richard Niebuhr were the leaders of a new “Christian realism” that represented an American counterpart to European neo-orthodoxy. H. Richard Niebuhr was ordained in the German Evangelical Synod of North America after attending the denomination’s schools, Elmhurst College and Eden Theological Seminary. He served three years as a pastor in St. Louis (1916–18), taught theology at Eden Seminary, pursued doctoral studies at Yale Divinity School, served as president of Elmhurst and again as theological professor at Eden. In 1931 he accepted a position at Yale Divinity School, where he remained until his death.

Niebuhr occupied a middle ground between the greatest of nineteenth-century liberal theologians, Friedrich Schleiermacher, and the greatest of twentieth-century neo-orthodoxy, Karl Barth, even as he embraced aspects of classical orthodoxy. From the older liberalism he took a commitment to the essentially experiential nature of religion and the conviction that humankind, immersed in history, can never grasp truth unbiased and whole. With European neoorthodox theologians he sharply criticized liberal optimism concerning human potential. And from Augustine, the Protestant Reformers, and Jonathan Edwards he adopted a high view of divine sovereignty and a firm belief in the utter dependency of all existence upon God.

Niebuhr’s interests ranged widely. One group of his works treated matters of the church in society. Social Sources of Denominationalism (1929) demonstrated how thoroughly Christian institutions were intertwined with the cultural customs of the West. Kingdom of God in America (1937) provided a brilliant portrait of the way in which the idea of God’s kingdom had shifted in American history—from God’s sovereignty in the time of Jonathan Edwards, to the kingdom of Christ during the 1800s, and finally to the coming kingdom for twentieth-century liberals. The book looks most fondly on the earliest period, when some Americans truly believed in the ultimacy of God. It also contains the best short critical description of theological liberalism ever written: “A God without wrath brought men without sin into a kingdom without judgment through the ministrations of a Christ without a cross.” Christ and Culture (1951) offered a classic schematization of the different ways in which believers over the centuries have interacted with their surrounding worlds. Its five categories—Christ against culture, Christ of culture, Christ above culture, Christ and culture in paradox, and Christ the transformer of culture—have become indispensable tools for describing Christian approaches in political, economic, and social affairs.

Niebuhr’s more directly theological and ethical works continue to have a broad appeal. Meaning of Revelation (1941) contended that when God reveals himself, all other events and questions become relative. The work has been criticized by evangelicals for slighting Scripture and for making revelation overly subjective, but here and elsewhere Niebuhr pointed to the Christian community as a body providing standards (though they are relative also) for describing and communicating that revelation. Radical Monotheism and Western Culture (1960) was Niebuhr’s last full statement of his convictions. In it he looked to God as the source of all being, as Being itself, and decried all that would detract from his all-sufficiency. Throughout his work Niebuhr pointed to Jesus Christ as God’s supreme revelation. In much the same way as Barth would frame the issue, Niebuhr held that Jesus was the most dramatic manifestation of the Ultimate Being that destroys the estrangement that alienates people from God and from each other.

M. A. NOLL

See also NEO-ORTHODOXY.

Bibliography. H. R. Niebuhr, Faith on Earth, R. R. Niebuhr, ed.; J. Diefenthaler, H. Richard Niebuhr: A Lifetime of Reflections on the Church and the World; J. W. Fowler Jr., To See the Kingdom: The Theological Vision of H. Richard Niebuhr; L. A. Hoedemaker, Theology of H. Richard Niebuhr; C. A. Holbrook, HCT 375–95; D. B. Meyer, Protestant Search for Political Realism, 1919–1941; P. Ramsey, ed., Faith and Ethics: The Theology of H. Richard Niebuhr.

Niebuhr, Reinhold (1892–1971). The best-known spokesman for American “Christian realism” from the early 1930s until his death. Although Niebuhr’s position resembled European neo-orthodoxy in its distrust of liberalism, it was more concerned with ethics than with theology proper, it focused more on the doctrine of man than on the doctrine of God, and it showed more concern for life in society than for life in the church.

Niebuhr was the son of a pastor in the German Evangelical Synod of North America. As did his brother H. Richard, who also became an influential theologian and ethicist, Reinhold attended his denomination’s college and seminary (Elmhurst and Eden) before doing graduate work at Yale. In 1915 he accepted the pastorate of Bethel Evangelical Church in Detroit, where he served for thirteen years. Niebuhr came of age theologically in this urban church as his liberalism encountered the harsh realities of industrial America. He was particularly troubled by the demoralizing effects of industrialism on the workers. He wondered particularly what hope there was for American civilization when “naive gentlemen with a genius for mechanics suddenly become the arbiters over the lives and fortunes of hundreds of thousands.”

Niebuhr, Reinhold

While still in Detroit, Niebuhr began to advocate radical solutions to the human crisis as he perceived it—socialism and pacifism for life in society, a new “Christian realism” for theology.

Niebuhr moved to New York’s Union Theological Seminary in 1928, where he immediately entered a wider circle of activity. World War II led him to abandon his socialism and pacifism, but he remained a dedicated social activist—serving on scores of committees in the 1930s and 1940s, helping to form Americans for Democratic Action and New York’s Liberal Party, editing the journal Christianity and Crisis, and writing prolifically for newspapers and magazines.

Niebuhr’s theological ethics were developed in a long list of major books, the two most important being Moral Man and Immoral Society (1932) and Nature and Destiny of Man (1941, 1943). The first repudiated liberal optimism concerning humanity. It pointed out that social groups are selfish almost by their very definition, and it rebuked the notion that human beings were perfectable as individuals or inherently good in groups. The second provided a more systematic discussion of what Niebuhr called man’s “most vexing problem: How shall he think of himself?” Here and elsewhere Niebuhr proposed a series of “dialectical” relationships to answer his own question: humanity was both “free and bound, both limited and limitless,” sinner and saint, subject to history and social forces but also the shaper of history and society, creature of the Creator but potential lord of the creation, egotistical but capable of living for others. Niebuhr drew on the Bible to expound these paradoxes, especially what he called the biblical “myth” of creation. Scripture shared the human potential because humankind was made in the image of God, for good and for ill. Humans sinned by failing to believe that God could overcome the bondage to pride and to “the will to power” that is the common human fate. In the person of Christ, Niebuhr found a unique example of power used only for good and not—as with all other people—for evil. The cross of Christ was a particularly important theme for Niebuhr since it revealed the great paradox of powerlessness turned into power, of a love in justice that overcame the sinful world.

Niebuhr showed little concern for traditional theological topics except where they aided his study of humanity. As a result, he has been criticized for showing more interest in the paradoxes of human life than in the salvation offered through Christ. A similar criticism concerns his use of Scripture. The Bible seemed to mean more to him because it was relevant to the modern condition than because it was God’s written Word. These criticisms notwithstanding, Niebuhr’s work remains among the most widely studied of all American theological efforts from the first two-thirds of the twentieth century.

M. A. NOLL

See also NEO-ORTHODOXY.

Bibliography. C. C. Brown, ed., Reinhold Niebuhr Reader; C. M. Brown, Essential Reinhold Niebuhr; R. W. Fox, Reinhold Niebuhr: A Biography; R. Harries, Reinhold Niebuhr and the Issues of Our Time; H. Hofmann, HCT 355–74; D. B. Meyer, Protestant Search for Political Realism, 1919–1941.

Nietzsche, Friedrich Wilhelm. See EXISTENTIALISM.

Nihilism. First popularized by the Russian novelist Turgenev, nihilism signified total rejection of tradition, morality, authority, and the social order that enshrined them. “What can be smashed should be smashed; what will stand the blow is good, what will shatter is rubbish” (Pisarev) expresses its anarchic, revolutionary application. The czarist order in Russia was oppressive and doomed, yet no basis existed for a better order.

Later this mood sought justification in total philosophic skepticism, denying objective bases to both truth and morality. Nietzsche declared, “One interpretation of existence [religion] has been overthrown, but since it was held the interpretation, it seems no meaning is left in existence.” Empiricism engendered agnosticism: all investigation beyond sense-experience being illusory, theological statements are meaningless—expressions of feeling, not truth. Sense-experience being individual, no generalized, objective truth is possible. What cannot be verified by sense experience cannot be known.

Similarly, moral standards are subjective, arbitrary, emotive, and nonrational. “If God does not exist, everything is permitted” (Dostoyevsky); alternatively, if God does not exist, “the most meaningful reality is individual freedom, its supreme expression suicide.” Morality is the product of social conditioning, mere feeling, or free unmotivated choice.

Some existentialism is nihilistic: one is nothing but what one makes one’s self; others exist only as related to the individual, limiting his or her life; systems, authorities, and obligation are academic fictions. Motiveless choices, feelings of responsibility, contradictory paradoxical existence, death, and ideas of God are all absurd. We must draw full consequences of God’s absence—abandonment. Humanity “thrown into the world,” lives in anguish, dread, finitude, guilt, and mortality.

Less academic nihilism is expressed in the robotlike, conformist, indifferent attitude of the industrial human, relieving toil (or worklessness) with entertainment, stimulants, seeking no meaning, explanation, or future.

Bertrand Russell accepted ultimate nothingness with a dignified stiff upper lip. Camus asserted the dignity and fraternity of humans rebelling against absurd predicament; social activists argue for worthwhile personal contributions to society. Christian existentialists seek deeper analysis of Being, personal relationship as clue to existence, and an existential confrontation with God. The value of persons and the presence of purpose in the universe are lines along which nihilism will be answered. "Taking consequences of atheism seriously serves only to emphasize the importance of the problem of God."

R. E. O. WHITE

See also ATHEISM.

Bibliography. S. Rosen, Nihilism, a Philosophical Essay; H. Thielicke, Nihilism.

Ninety-five Theses. (1517). A series of propositions dealing with indulgences which Martin Luther drew up as the basis for a proposed academic disputation. They were written in reaction to abuses in the sale of a plenary indulgence by Johann Tetzel, who gave the impression that it would not only remit the guilt and penalties of even the most serious sins, but that its benefits could be applied to the dead in purgatory. Luther challenged this teaching because it led people to believe that forgiveness could be bought and to neglect true repentance.

The theses began by arguing that true repentance involves a turning of the entire self to God and not simply the desire to evade punishment. Luther also maintained that only God could remit guilt and that indulgences could only excuse the penalties imposed by the church. In addition, he denied the pope's power over purgatory, stated that the believer always has true forgiveness without indulgences, and condemned the interest shown in money rather than souls. Although written in Latin and not intended for public distribution, the theses were translated into German and soon spread throughout Germany. Even though they do not reveal the full development of Luther's theology, October 31, 1517, the day they were supposedly posted on the Wittenberg Castle Church door, has traditionally been considered the starting point of the Reformation. Recent scholarship has questioned both the dating of the theses and whether they were actually posted. Although the debate has not been resolved, most scholars still accept the traditional interpretation.

R. W. HEINZE

See also LUTHER, MARTIN.

Bibliography. K. Aland, ed., Martin Luther's 95 Theses; H. Grimm, ed., Luther's Works; E. Iserloh, Theses Were Not Posted; F. Lau, "Posting of Luther's Theses—Legend or Fact?" CTM 38:691–703.

Nominalism. The theory of knowledge that maintains that "universals" (general concepts representing the common elements belonging to individuals of the same genus or species) are empty concepts that have no reality independent of their existence in the thought of an individual. In contrast to Platonic realism, which held that universals had a separate existence apart from the individual object, nominalism insisted that reality was found only in the objects themselves. This debate on universals, found in Porphyry's Isagogue, caused great controversy during the Middle Ages. Roscellinus of Compiègne, a teacher and priest in Brittany in the eleventh century, has been called the father of nominalism because he argued that universals are derived from one's observation of individuals and that concepts of genus and species are just abstractions. This affected his theology, because it led him to the belief that "God" was no more than a word, an empty abstraction, and that the divine reality was actually found in the three individuals of the Godhead. He was condemned by the Synod of Soissons (1092) for holding to tritheism.

In the fourteenth century William of Ockham devised a nominalistic system of theology based on his belief that universals were only a convenience of the human mind. According to this view, the fact of a resemblance between two individuals does not necessitate a common attribute; the universals one forms in one's mind more likely reflect one's own purposes rather than the character of reality. This led William to question scholastic arguments built upon such abstractions. As he argues in his Centilogium, systematization of theology must be rejected, for theology can ultimately be based only on faith and not on fact. Therefore, through grace and not knowledge, he accepted the teachings of the Roman Catholic Church, bowed to the authority of the pope, and declared the authority of Scripture. His follower, Gabriel Biel, would carry his thought to its logical conclusion and declare that reason could neither demonstrate that God was the First Cause of the universe nor make a distinction between the attributes of God, including God's intellect and will. The reality of the Trinity, as well as any theological dogma, can be found only in the realm of faith, not in the realm of reason. This was diametrically opposed to the natural theology of medieval scholasticism.

Nominalism continued to have an effect on theology. Its influence can be discerned in the writings of David Hume and John Stuart Mill.

D. A. RAUSCH

See also WILLIAM OF OCKHAM.

Bibliography. D. M. Armstrong, Universals and Scientific Realism: Nominalism and Realism; F. J. Copleston, History of Philosophy; R. A. Eberle, Nominalist Systems; R. Seeberg, Text-book of the History of Doctrines.

Nonconformity

Nonconformity. In general terms nonconformity is the refusal to conform to the established or majority religion. Thus, Episcopalians are a nonconformist body in Scotland, and Wycliffe and the Lollards are sometimes depicted as England's first nonconformists.

Specifically it denotes those Protestants who could not conscientiously conform to the established religion of the reformed Church of England, especially after 1662, when the Dissenters comprised Independents (Congregationalists), Presbyterians, Baptists, and Quakers. The first three became the main nonconforming denominations, being joined in the eighteenth century by the Methodists and later by other smaller bodies. Since the later nineteenth century they have been known as the English Free Churches. Following a Free Church Congress in 1892, the National Council of the Evangelical Free Churches was formed (1896), followed by the Federal Council of Evangelical Free Churches (1919) on an officially representative basis. The two merged in 1940 in the Free Church Federal Council. A majority of Presbyterians and of Congregationalists formed the United Reformed Church in 1972, but other ecumenical schemes have proved abortive.

From ca. 1619 the term Nonconformists designated those Puritans who adhered to the doctrine of the established English church but dissented in matters of practice and order, at first chiefly in vestments and ceremonies like kneeling at Communion, but soon in deeper issues of a set liturgy and episcopal polity. Thomas Fuller's Church History (1655) traced Nonconformists back to the reign of Edward VI, when John Hooper, "the father of English Nonconformity," opposed episcopal vestments. Elizabeth I's Act of Uniformity (1559), which imposed the 1552 Prayer Book with minor conservative revisions, was not strenuously applied at first. But it provoked Nonconforming "gathered" communities from ca. 1567, the first Presbyterian congregational order in 1572, and Separatist Independent churches from ca. 1567. Persecution drove many to America and to Holland, from which base the first Baptist congregation in England was organized in London in 1612.

But Nonconformity before 1662 was an inconsiderable minority compared with afterward. During the Commonwealth the established order was Presbyterian (so that Independents remained Nonconformists), but the Restoration of 1660 brought back episcopacy. The Act of Uniformity required of all ministers "unfeigned assent and consent" to the 1662 Prayer Book (slightly revised from 1559) and episcopal ordination if not already received. Some two thousand were ejected for refusing to comply. Some, like Richard Baxter, had lost their charges by an act of 1660. In 1661 the Corporation Act effectively excluded Nonconformists from city and town councils, and the Test Act of 1673 extended this to civil or military office under the government. The Conventicle Acts (1664 and later) banned meetings in private houses, and the Five Mile Act (1665) debarred ministers from contact with former congregations.

Nonconformist attitudes and practice varied considerably, as earlier under Elizabeth. Some objected not to episcopal ordination but to renouncing their previous ordination. Episcopacy might be acceptable, but not its English diocesan embodiment. An imposed liturgy was intolerable for others. Baxter's nicely principled Nonconformity was "essentially for the sake of the Church's unity and of others' liberty" (Nuttall) and carefully avoided separatism or sectarianism. Above all, total endorsement of the Prayer Book involved an abandonment of Puritan principles.

Occasional conformity was variously viewed. This was the practice of taking Communion in the established church at least once a year, which from 1661 qualified Dissenters for public office. John Owen opposed it, but Thomas Goodwin allowed it with "godly" Anglican congregations. After 1662 Presbyterians favored it most, as those who most hoped for accommodation within a comprehensive establishment as advocated by some Latitudinarians. Some Dissenters would attend Anglican sermons but not communicate, except perhaps privately with godly fellowships.

Nonconformists campaigned ardently for freedom of conscience and religion. Their fortunes varied with royal and parliamentary policies. Charles II's Declaration of Indulgence (1672) was rejected by Parliament, but the Toleration Act of William and Mary brought relief in 1689 and launched Nonconformity on its independent career. It exempted from the Conventicle Acts ministers and teachers who took the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, but meeting places had to be registered. Ministers had also to subscribe to the Thirty-nine Articles, except on infant baptism. In 1779 subscription was replaced by adherence to the Christian faith and Scriptures. By 1700, 2,500 meeting places had been licensed, Nonconformist denominational dividing lines were hardening (although Independents-Congregationalists and Presbyterians often acted together), a church-chapel distinction was appearing in English life, and Nonconformity's distinguished contribution to education had begun with the first Dissenting academies.

But civil disabilities persisted. Until 1868 Nonconformists had to support the established religion by payment of church rates. The Test and Corporation Acts were repealed only in 1828 (although Dissenters had regularly been excused their penalties), and not until 1871 could Nonconformists graduate from Oxford and Cambridge. After 1836 they no longer had to be married in an Anglican church, although until 1898 a chapel wedding needed a civil registrar.

Behind these advances lay the lobbying of the Protestant Dissenting Deputies, drawn from the three main denominations and first organized in 1732. They aligned naturally with Whigs and later Liberals against Tories. Nonconformist church life was a proving ground for democratic aspirations. By the midnineteenth century Nonconformity was a political force, having strongly supported Catholic Emancipation (1829) and the Reform Bill (1832). The Nonconformist conscience found outlet in social reform and philanthropy, just as earlier Nonconformists were pioneers of the modern missionary movement, exporting England's church divisions worldwide. After decline in the later eighteenth century the Free Churches experienced considerable growth in the nineteenth.

Nonconformity's social and political contributions to English life are undoubted. Its significance has been greater for church ("a free church in a free state"), hymnody (Watts and Wesley), and religious experience (what B. L. Manning calls "intensity"—a Puritan legacy) than for theology. Although its ranks have included theologians such as John Owen and P. T. Forsyth, scholars like C. H. Dodd, and churchmen like R. W. Dale and C. H. Spurgeon, it has proved too easy a prey to liberalism, from the Unitarianism of the later eighteenth century to R. J. Campbell's "new theology." Vigorous evangelical groups now operate in all the Free Churches, and Baptists in particular are recovering confidence in biblical Christianity. But the chapel-and-church domination of English religion and the corporate identity of "nonconformity" or "the Free Churches" have continued to weaken, through secularism, proliferation of independents and charismatics, and almost irreconcilable theological pluralism, alongside the Church of England's internal disorders, more confident Catholicism, growing ethnic-faith communities, and the diminishing relevance of the establishment of Anglicanism.

D. F. WRIGHT

See also PURITANISM.

Bibliography. D. W. Bibbington, Nonconformist Conscience: Chapel and Politics 1870–1914; H. Davies, English Free Churches; C. Hill, "Occasional Conformity," Reformation, Conformity and Dissent, R. B. Knox, ed.; B. L. Manning, Protestant Dissenting Deputies; Making of Modern English Religion; G. F. Nuttall et al., Beginnings of Nonconformity; G. F. Nuttall and O. Chadwick, eds., From Uniformity to Unity 1662–1962; J. H. Primus, Vestments Controversy; W. B. Selbie, Nonconformity: Its Origin and Progress; I. Sellers, Nineteenth-Century Nonconformity; D. M. Thompson, ed., Nonconformity in the Nineteenth Century; M. R. Watts, Dissenters.

Northfield Conferences. A series of summer Bible conferences inaugurated by D. L. Moody in Northfield, Massachusetts. Northfield had been Moody's boyhood home, and after his rise to fame as an evangelist in the 1870s, he returned and made Northfield his home base. In 1879 he hit upon the idea of using the site for summer Bible conferences. Moody planned the conferences for laypeople to augment their understanding of the Bible and the Christian faith, to discuss methods of Christian work, and to promote spiritual renewal. He hoped men and women would return to their churches and exert a similar influence there. After a ten-day conference in 1880 and a thirty-day conference in 1881, there was a three-year break while Moody was in the British Isles. The conferences resumed in 1885, and he was their guiding light until his death in 1899.

Although Moody was the dominant personality at these summer conferences, he was not the main speaker. He brought some of the best-known Bible teachers to the Northfield platform, such men as A. T. Pierson, A. J. Gordon, D. W. Whittle, George Needham, W. G. Moorehead, Nathaniel West, William E. Blackstone, James H. Brookes, C. I. Scofield, and R. A. Torrey. But Moody created no small stir by some of the other people he brought to Northfield as speakers: Henry Drummond (synthesizer of evolution and theology), Josiah Strong (proponent of the social gospel), William Rainey Harper (NT critic and later president of the University of Chicago), and George Adam Smith (famous OT critic). Some of Moody's more conservative supporters objected to these men speaking at Northfield, but he would not be dissuaded. Although very conservative in his own theological views, he maintained that these men were true Christians and had much to offer. Moody was also trying to establish a middle ground between extremists on the left and right. During the modernist-fundamentalist debate (in particular 1923–26), the two sides argued in published letters and articles over the significance of Moody's associations with these men.

Themes emphasized at the summer conferences were a reflection of the concerns of Moody and the speakers. There was a strong element of premillennialism and, at times, dispensationalism. One can even discern in the sermons given at Northfield the beginnings of those stresses that would eventually lead to a break between dispensational and nondispensational premillennialists over the rapture question. Although Moody was not sympathetic to perfectionism or the extremes of the Keswick movement, there was also a Keswick element in the conferences and an emphasis on holiness and the higher life. And there was a strong emphasis on evangelism, both home and foreign.

Northfield Conferences

It is difficult to determine what the precise impact of these conferences was. Did the laity who returned to their churches make a significant impact? Were the conferences effective in the spread of Keswick and dispensational themes? Or were these conferences just an echo of themes and tensions already prevalent in American evangelicalism? Without totally discounting their impact, it must be said that the conferences were a mirror in which these themes and tensions came into focus.

But without question, there was one outgrowth of the Northfield Conferences that had an incalculable impact on not just American but world Christianity. In 1886 the Northfield Conference was expanded to include a month-long conference for college students. From this student conference, the first of many at Northfield, one hundred men dedicated themselves to foreign missionary service when they completed college. By the following June this number had grown to two thousand. Out of this grew the Student Volunteer Movement seeking "the evangelization of the world in this generation." It spread across America to the British Isles and Europe with globe-circling effects. Collegians who visited the Northfield Student Conference and came under Moody's influence included Robert Speer, Robert Wilder, Sherwood Eddy, and John R. Mott. The Northfield student conferences were the birthplace of the Student Volunteer Movement and, through that organization, of the early twentieth-century ecumenical movement.

The Northfield Conferences continued after Moody's death. But without Moody's vision and magnetic personality, they were no longer to have the significance they once had. In fact, the Northfield Conferences gradually became less and less a reflection of their earlier theological themes and emphases.

S. N. GUNDRY

See also KESWICK CONVENTION; MILLENNIUM, VIEWS OF THE.

Bibliography. J. F. Findlay Jr., Dwight L. Moody: American Evangelist 1837-1899; S. N. Gundry, Love Them In: The Life and Theology of D. L. Moody; Northfield Echoes, 1894-1904; Record of Christian Work; T. J. Shanks, ed., College of Colleges; College Students at Northfield (or A College of Colleges No. 2); D. L. Moody at Home; Gems from Northfield.

Novatian Schism. This schism began as a debate over the proper treatment the church should accord to Christians who had denied their faith during times of persecution. In the widespread persecution under Decius, Pope Fabian was martyred in January of 250, but the church was in such dire straits that his successor was not elected until spring of 251. The majority vote was cast for Cornelius, who favored full acceptance of those who had lapsed in the terrible peril. The choice was repudiated by the clergy who had been most staunch during the persecution, and in opposition they consecrated Novatian, a Roman presbyter who was apparently already acclaimed for his important and orthodox theological work, On the Trinity. Christendom was thus faced with two rival popes, each seeking support of the wider church.

As each pope defended the legitimacy of his own position, the demarcation became more pronounced. Questions arose as to how the church should deal with those who had purchased from a magistrate false certificates affirming that they had offered a pagan sacrifice as over against those who had actually performed the sacrifice—a practice in which even bishops had engaged. The Novatianists maintained that only God might accord forgiveness for such grievous sin, while the Cornelius party argued for a judicious use of "the power of the keys" in forgiving the lapsed after a proper period of penance. Cyprian of Carthage became the major spokesman for this Catholic position of clemency. He opined that salvation was impossible outside the communion of the church and that true penitents must be received back into the fold as expeditiously as possible, while Novatian and his supporters maintained that the church must be preserved in its purity without the defilement of those who had not proved steadfast. They were later to go so far as to deny forgiveness for any serious offense (such as fornication or idolatry) after baptism, though pardon might be offered to those deemed near death.

When they were excommunicated by a synod of bishops at Rome, the Novatianists, wishing to avoid compromise and complacency with sin, established a separate church with its own discipline and clergy, including bishops. Their emphasis on purity and rigorism as well as a vehement clash of personalities drew significant support throughout the church at large, and especially from a Carthaginian presbyter named Novatus, himself at odds with Cyprian. There was a strong following in Phrygia, especially among Montanist groups. The Novatian Church continued for several centuries and was received by the Council of Nicea as an orthodox though schismatic group. In particular its affirmation of Christ as being of one substance with the Father was applauded. Later the sect fell under imperial disfavor, was forbidden the right of public worship, and had its books destroyed. The majority of its members were reabsorbed into the mainstream of the Catholic Church, although the Novatian Church was an identifiable entity until the seventh century.

R. C. KROEGER AND C. C. KROEGER

See also CYPRIAN.

Bibliography. A. Roberts and J. Donaldson, eds., ANF 5:319–47, 412–20, 611–50, 657–63; Eusebius, History of the Church; A. Harnack, SHERK 8:197–202.

Numerology, Biblical. Numbers are used in the Bible in much the same way as in other books. They are regularly spelled out despite the fact that numerical signs were early in use. Spelling out the numbers would favor accuracy of transmission. The use of the letters of the Greek alphabet to represent numbers is late and belongs to the period of Greek influence.

Numbers are used both exactly, e.g., the three hundred eighteen trained servants of Abraham (Gen. 14:14), and inexactly, e.g., the forty years of wandering, which include the year and a half before the rejection at Kadesh took place.

Some numbers are used much more frequently than others. Seven is the sacred number because it is the number of the sabbath. Ten is a very natural number, since the fingers and thumbs of the two hands count ten. But we cannot be sure that that is the real explanation of the number that appears most conspicuously in the Decalogue. Twelve is the number of the months, of the sons of Jacob, of the apostles of the Lord. Aside from this, no special significance attaches to the number. The fact that it can be regarded as made up of seven and five has no significance. Many elaborate efforts have been made to attach special meanings to numbers, but none is satisfactory. The number forty, for example, is used in both a good sense (Acts 1:3) and a bad sense (Ps. 95:10). The number seventy is used of the sons of Jacob (Exod. 1:5; 24:1), of the sons of Ahab (2 Kings 10:1), and of the years of the Babylonian captivity (Jer. 25:11). See also Ezekiel 8:11 and Luke 10:1. In prophecy numbers are sometimes used in an enigmatical sense, as in the case of the “seventy ‘sevens’” of Daniel 9 or the “two thousand and three hundred” evenings and mornings of 8:14. But this does not justify us in taking the numbers themselves in anything other than a literal sense. The only number in Scripture that is seen as symbolic is 666, which is the number of the beast (Rev. 13:18).

In recent years the name of Ivan Panin has been connected with a most elaborate attempt to find numerical significance in every word and letter in the Bible. But his system is far too complicated to commend itself to the careful student. The Bible does not have an intricate numerical pattern that only a mathematical expert can discover. The strict and obvious meaning of words—and this applies to numbers—should be adhered to unless it is quite plain that some further meaning is involved. We know that the souls that were on the ship that was wrecked near Melita numbered two hundred seventy-six (Acts 27:37). Why this was the number we do not know, and it would be idle to try to find a mysterious or mystical meaning in this simple historical fact.

The desire to find symbolic and significant meanings in numbers can be traced back to ancient times, notably to the Pythagoreans. The Babylonian Creation Tablets record the fifty names of Marduk. Contenau has pointed out that Sargon declared that the number of his name was the same as the circuit of the walls of his palace, 16,283 cubits. A familiar modern example is the attempt of Piazzzi Smyth (1867) to find an elaborate and mysterious numerical system in the construction of the Great Pyramid at Gizeh. On the assumption that “the spiritual significance of numbers is seen in their first occurrence,” E. W. Bullinger in How to Enjoy the Bible worked out an ingenious system of interpretation of the numbers in Scripture. But a little testing makes it quite clear that the first occurrence theory in the case of numbers as of other words, while ingenious, is quite unworkable. To infer from Genesis 14:4 that the number thirteen in Genesis 17:25 is “associated with rebellion, apostasy, and disintegration” (311–12) will hardly commend itself to the sober-minded student of Scripture.

Renewed interest in numerology has been aroused by Michael Drosnin’s Bible Code (1997). Based upon some highly abstruse mathematical calculations developed by Doron Witztum, Yoav Rosenberg, and Eliyahn Rips, the Bible Code theory asserts that encoded in the Massoretic Text of the Hebrew Old Testament are all the future events of the world, from the names and dates of famous Rabbis to the assassination of Yitzak Rabin. The odds that such precision would occur by chance is less than 1 in 50 quadrillion; (a quadrillion is one with 15 zeros after it). The alarm generated by this comes from seemingly precise prophecies about the near end of the world. Most Biblical scholars are decidedly cool to this theory. The liberals because, ironically, it might prove the Bible to be true and the conservatives because Jesus is apparently left out of the picture.

It is odd that Drosnin, who is an atheist, should take the seemingly astounding message from beyond our world so seriously, since he denied that a transcendent dimension exists. His best speculation as to the source of this information is that of benign extra-terrestrials, who are trying to warn us of impending disaster if we do not mend our ways.

O. T. ALLIS

Bibliography. M. Drosnin; Bible Code; J. Satinover; Cracking the Bible Code; “Divine Authorship? Computer Reveals Startling Word Pictures” Bible Review, October 1995:28–31, 44–45; P. J. Tanner, Bible Code: Holy or Hoax?

Numinous, The. In his book Idea of the Holy (1917) the German theologian Rudolf Otto investigated, among other things, the basic human experience, which to his understanding is the “innermost care” of all religions. This is the experience of “the holy,” and it contains a very specific element or “moment” that distinguishes it from human’s rational experience and which is in fact inexpressible. This innermost care is clearly there, indeed it is the heart of all religion, yet it cannot be apprehended in terms of concepts, and this of course makes the task of understanding and discussing it very difficult. It is part of the theologian’s task, however, to attempt this.

Numinous, The

The word holy has moral meaning—a holy person is a righteous or good person. It also has a rational aspect. But neither of these isolates the heart of religious experience. The purpose of Otto’s investigation is to uncover this “heart” or foundation. When all that can be said about the experience of the holy has been said, there is still something there, something that can only be felt. It is, he says, a “clear overplus of meaning.” One is aware that he or she is in the presence of something, or someone, but the awareness is so primitive as to preclude a clear description of what or who. One thing is certain, however: the experiencer stands in awe of that of which he is in the presence.

In his attempt to find a word that will point at this incomprehensible innermost core, and will isolate it from the moral and rational aspects, Otto coined a word adopted from the Latin numen. And claiming that since omen has given us the word “ominous,” there is no reason why numen should not form the root of “numinous.” There is, then, a numinous state of mind that is perfectly sui generis and is irreducible to any other. It is absolutely primary and therefore cannot be strictly defined; it can only be discussed.

One person cannot lead another directly to this experience. But it is possible to lead one through the ways of his or her own mind to the point at which the numinous in the individual begins to stir, begins to live in one’s consciousness. All of this is to say that numinous cannot be taught; it can only be evoked or awakened.

This experience of the numinous is what lies behind all the world’s great religions. It is the experience that generates all the moral and ethical responses of religion as well as the dogmas and doctrines. It is the experience of the other, the holy, the incomprehensible—of God.

J. D. SPICELAND

See also OTTO, RUDOLF.

Nygren, Anders (1890–1978). Swedish Lutheran minister and bishop, professor of theology and ethics at the University of Lund, leading ecumenist as a delegate to several ecumenical councils and as a member of the central committee of the World Council of Churches, and president of the Lutheran World Federation.

Influenced by biblical criticism and Kantian philosophy, Nygren argued that theology must have its own subject matter, language, and method over against science, ethics, and art. Each religion is incommensurable with other religions as a way to fellowship with God; religions are unique in their conceptions of the eternal, our relationship to the eternal, and the consequent social and ethical implications. This was most clearly demonstrated in Nygren’s influential work Agape and Eros, in which he used “motif research” to find the fundamental idea underlying systems of thought or general attitudes of life, specifically Christianity, Hellenism, and Judaism. This method uncovers the “fundamental motif” of the religion, which is the answer given to the “fundamental question”: “How is fellowship with God conceived or realized?” The fundamental motif colors everything in the system, and its centrality can be traced through the history of a religion. The fundamental category of Christianity is agape as taught by Jesus, Paul, John, Marcion, Irenaeus, and Luther. Accordingly, the Christian religion is a “theocentric” way of salvation: God comes to humans with a love that is independent of external motivation, indifferent to the value of the loved object, creative of value in the loved object, and the initiator in divine-human fellowship; such a religion encourages a selfless human love of neighbor. Contrastingly, the eros motif in Hellenism (found in Plato, Aristotle, Neo-Platonism, Gnosticism, and Alexandrian theology) represents an “egocentric” way of salvation in which humans who have an original divine dignity seek God out of an acquisitive love. These two motifs were in tension during the history of the early and medieval church, but they were combined in Augustine’s caritas synthesis, which was challenged by the Renaissance revival of Hellenism’s religious ideas and the Reformation’s revival of the biblical agape motif. Nygren also traced the nomos motif of Judaism, particularly in the apostolic fathers and Tertullian.

Nygren’s historical theology and ethics (along with his work in the philosophy of religion, biblical exegesis, and pastoral concerns) is impressive, but not without detractors. His interpretation of Plato’s treatment of eros is not completely accurate, he is deficient in his understanding of the relationship of the Old Testament to New Testament Christianity, and he oversimplifies the tension between nomos and agape in the early church.

D. L. OKHOLM

Bibliography. A. Nygren, Agape and Eros, Philip S. Watson, trans.; C. W. Kegley, ed., Philosophy and Theology of Anders Nygren; Reply to Interpreters and Critics; W. A. Quanbeck, HCT 297–307; G. Wingren, Theology in Conflict.

O o

Obedience. The whole of biblical theology centers on the notion of divine revelation and the receptive response of man: God speaks his word, man hears and is required to obey. The connection between hearing and obeying is therefore essential. Hearing is always viewed as a process of the mind. When divine revelation is its subject, man must respond with obedience. This connection is borne out in particular by the language of obedience in the Bible. In the OT, šāma' conveys the meaning of both "to hear" and "to obey." Israel must hear Yahweh's voice and act in obedient response. In the Torah the theme of responsive obedience is underscored (Exod. 19:5, 8; 24:7; Deut. 28:1; 30:11–14). Abraham was blessed because he heard and obeyed the Lord's voice (Gen. 22:18). This theme lies behind the prophetic injunction, "Thus says the Lord." The prophetic word reveals both who God is and what he is calling Israel to do. Disobedience, then, is any hearing that is not attentive, and this too is the story of Israel: "They have ears, but do not hear" (Ps. 115:6; cf. Jer. 3:13; Isa. 6:9–10).

In the LXX šāma' is regularly translated by words in the akouein word group, and this again expresses the inner relation between hearing and response. Emphatic forms hypakouein (lit. "to hear beneath") and hypakoē convey the meaning "obey/obedience" (in the NT the verb appears 21 times; the noun 15 times, esp. in Paul). The NT brings out this OT background in full when Jesus demands that he "who has ears to hear, let him hear" (Matt. 11:15; 13:9, 15–16; Mark 4:9, 23; 8:18; Luke 14:35). This kind of constructive response to divine revelation is illustrated in the parable about the man who built his house on the rock. The story follows the exhortation of Christ: "Why do you call me 'Lord, Lord,' and do not what I say?" (Luke 6:46–49). In Matthew this same parable concludes the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 7:21–27), clearly indicating the seriousness of personal response to Jesus' ethical injunctions.

Jesus stands in the OT prophetic tradition when he calls Israel to a discipleship which essentially involves "doing"—ethics. When a voice in the crowd praises Jesus' mother, the Lord replies by saying, "Blessed rather are those who hear the word of God and obey it" (Luke 11:28; cf. John 10:16, 27; 15:5, 10). Bonhoeffer remarks: "The actual call of Jesus and the response of single-minded obedience have an irrevocable significance. It is only to this obedience that the promise of fellowship with Jesus is given."

Bultmann points out that Jesus' call has radicalized an obedience already well known in Judaism. First-century Judaism had emphasized cultic and ceremonial rules to such an extent (365 prohibitions, 278 positive commands) that any notion of virtue was almost unknown. Jesus presses beyond the casuistic rules and expects a true obedience, not blind obedience: "You give a tenth of your spices—mint, dill, and cummin. But you have neglected the more important matters of the law—justice, mercy, and faithfulness" (Matt. 23:23). Man, in effect, must exceed the demands of the law (Matt. 5:20) and perceive for himself what God commands. That is, single-minded obedience grasps the spirit of God's intentions (cf. Mark 10:2–9 on how Jesus applies this to one law) and exceeds God's desires—not with the measured efforts of a servant (Luke 17:7–10), but as people who enjoy a vital and responsive relationship with him. Bultmann sums up: "Radical obedience exists only when a man inwardly assents to what is required of him, . . . when the whole man stands behind what he does; or better, when the whole man is in what he does, when he is not doing something obediently, but is essentially obedient."

Paul regards obedience as being one of the constituent parts of faith. Initially Christ stands as the model of obedience (Phil. 2:5–8), and through his obedience, which is contrasted with Adam's disobedience, "many will be made righteous" (Rom. 5:19; cf. Heb. 5:8–9 for the parallel thought). Paul views his task as bringing about the "obedience of faith" among the nations (Rom. 1:5 NASB; 16:26). For him, every thought should be made "captive to obey Christ" so that the Christian's obedience might be complete (2 Cor. 10:5–6). This means that Paul too despairs of any faith that is either simply cognitive (a Hellenistic weakness) or mechanistically legal (a Jewish fault). Obedience is of the essence of authentic saving faith and should provide evidence of the responsive relation of the Christian to his God (cf. James 1:22–25; 2:14–20; 1 Pet. 1:22; 1 John 3:18).

Obedience

G. M. BURGE

Bibliography. D. Bonhoeffer, Cost of Discipleship; W. Brueggemann, Interpretation and Obedience; G. Kittel, TDNT 1:216–25; R. J. Mouw, God Who Commands; W. Mundle, NIDNTT 2:172–80; A. Richardson, Introduction to the Theology of the New Testament; F. W. Young, IDB 3:580–81.

Obedience of Christ. The NT speaks explicitly of the obedience of Christ only three times: “through the obedience of the one man the many will be made righteous” (Rom. 5:19); “he humbled himself and became obedient to death” (Phil. 2:8); and “he learned obedience from what he suffered” (Heb. 5:8). But the concept these verses contain is clearly alluded to in many other places, e.g., (1) the several contexts in which Christ is called “servant” (Isa. 42:1; 52:13; 53:11; cf. Matt. 20:28; Mark 10:45); (2) the numerous passages where he declares that his purpose in coming to earth is to do his Father's will (Ps. 40:7–8; John 5:30; 8:28–29; 10:18; 12:49; 14:31; Heb. 10:7); (3) the oft-made assertion by himself and both friends and enemies alike of his sinless and righteous life (Matt. 27:4, 19–23; Mark 12:14; Luke 23:4, 14–15; John 8:46; 18:38; 19:4–6; 2 Cor. 5:21; Heb. 4:15; 7:26); and (4) the passages that affirm his submission to authority (Matt. 3:15; Luke 2:51–52; 4:16).

Evangelical theologians have reasons, other than the mere fact that the Bible teaches that Christ was an obedient servant, to interest themselves with this aspect of Christ's life and ministry. They have rightly discerned that both Christ's own right to minister as God's Messiah-Savior and the salvation of those he came to save directly depend on his personal, perfect, and perpetual obedience to God's holy law. To make this clear, theologians customarily distinguish between the active and passive obedience of Christ. These are not at all satisfactory terms inasmuch as nothing that Christ performed did he do passively, that is, resignedly, without full desire and willingness on his part. Much better are the terms “preceptive” and “penal,” which are becoming increasingly preferred respectively to “active” and “passive.” By preceptive obedience is meant Christ's full obedience to all the positive prescriptions of the law; by penal obedience is intended his willing, obedient bearing of all the sanctions imposed by the law that had accrued against his people because of their transgressions. By the former—i.e., his preceptive obedience—he made available a righteousness before the law that is imputed or reckoned to those who trust in him. By the latter—i.e., his penal obedience—he took upon himself by legal imputation the penalty due his people for their sin. His preceptive and penal obedience, then, is the ground of God's justification of sinners, by which divine act they are pardoned (because their sins have been charged to Christ, who obediently bears the law's sanctions against sin) and accepted as righteous in God's sight (because Christ's preceptive obedience is imputed to them).

John Murray has neatly captured the essence of Christ's obedience in four terms: inwardness, progressiveness, climax, and dynamic. Inwardness means that Christ's obedience was willingly accomplished from the heart; never was his obedience mechanically, perfunctorily, or just externally carried out. Progressive refers to what the Scriptures imply when it is said that he “grew . . . in favor with God” (Luke 2:52) and that he “learned obedience” (Heb. 5:8). This does not mean that he learned by moving from disobedience to obedience. Rather, it is to be construed to mean that he moved from obedience at any given stage to an obedience at ever deeper and deeper cost. In other words, his will to obey was being forged throughout his life to face ever stiffer and more severe trials in preparation for his final ordeal of the cross. By climax Murray intends to do justice to what he perceives as the unparalleled testing that Christ faced in the Gethsemane experience (Matt. 26:36–46; Mark 14:32–42; Luke 22:39–44) and then in his death on the cross. Finally, by dynamic Murray denotes the means by which our Lord was taught obedience—namely, his suffering (Heb. 2:10; 5:8). His trials, temptations, deprivations, etc., became the instrument in his Father's hand by which he was taught obedience and was, as “author of salvation,” made thereby perfect, that is, everything he had to be in order to bring many to glory. R. L. REYMOND

Bibliography. G. Aulén, Eucharist and Sacrifice; L. Berkhof, Systematic Theology; J. O. Buswell Jr., Systematic Theology of the Christian Religion; J. Denney, Death of Christ; P. T. Forsyth, Cruciality of the Cross; A. Hodge, Atonement; J. Murray, “Obedience of Christ,” in Collected Writings of John Murray; Redemption—Accomplished and Applied.

Oberlin Theology. The fruit of a strong revivalistic, perfectionistic, and reforming tradition in nineteenth-century American evangelical life. It was closely associated with the work of Charles Finney, America's most famous antebellum revivalist, and with the faculty at Oberlin College, Ohio (founded 1833), of which Finney was a part. But the theology also contained emphases that were shared widely in American Christianity among New School Presbyterians, Methodists, many Baptists, members of Disciples and Christian churches, and even some Unitarians.

Finney's theology was shaped by his own experience (a dramatic conversion in 1821) and by his early approval of the work of Congregationalist N. W. Taylor. With Taylor, Finney came to conclude that individuals possessed the power within themselves to make the choice for Christ and for holy living. Finney's own evangelism stressed the fact that, with God's help, strenuous personal effort could lead to the spread of the gospel. Early in his ministry he also explored the effects of such conversions on the reform of society. After Finney left the Presbyterians and took a pastorate in new York City, he came to the conclusion, as he put it, "that an altogether higher and more stable form of Christian life was attainable, and was the privilege of all Christians." Shortly after this Finney encountered John Wesley's Plain Account of Christian Perfection, which confirmed his belief in "entire sanctification." When Finney became professor of theology at Oberlin College in 1835, he carried with him the outlines of a distinctive theological emphasis. And in 1839, during a revival season at Oberlin, the emphasis received distinct articulation as a perfectionistic theology.

Along with Finney the Oberlin theology was promoted by Asa Mahan, first president of the college and a driving force in its establishment; Oberlin professor Henry Cowles; and many of the students who went out from Oberlin to evangelize and reform America. The theology emphasized a belief in a second, more mature stage of Christian life. This second stage carried different names—"entire sanctification," "holiness," "Christian perfection," or even "the baptism of the Holy Ghost." Finney took it to be more a matter of perfect trust in God and commitment to his way rather than complete sinlessness. And he also came to feel that this state of spirituality would be reached through steady growth rather than through a single, dramatic "second blessing." Other teachers emphasized more a distinct second work of grace and spoke as if the state of the sanctified would be nearly without sin. In these discussions, which also included a consideration of the relative place of human exertion and God's free grace in going on to sanctification, the Oberlin theology showed remarkable parallels with the development of Methodist theology stretching back to the time of John Wesley.

The Oberlin theology represented an immensely important strand of nineteenth-century evangelical belief, not only because of its influential convictions but also because of its practical effects. Finney had earlier pioneered new measures in revivalism (including the "anxious bench" and the protracted meeting). And he also had actively encouraged a heightened concern for reforming evils in American society such as slavery, intemperance, and economic injustice. The perfectionistic emphases of the Oberlin theology greatly aided its revivalist and reforming concerns. Some of its exponents also believed that the millennial age was at hand, and this conviction added to the widespread social impact of the theology.

The Oberlin theology retained an important place at Oberlin into the twentieth century. It contributed also to many strands of modern evangelicalism such as the Holiness Movement, more indirectly to Pentecostalism, and to the Higher Life and Keswick movements.

M. A. NOLL

See also FINNEY, CHARLES GRANDISON; HOLINESS MOVEMENT, AMERICAN; PENTECOSTALISM; PERFECTION, PERFECTIONISM.

Bibliography. C. G. Finney, Lectures in Systematic Theology; C. E. Hambrick-Stowe, Charles Finney and the Spirit of American Evangelicalism; E. H. Madden and J. E. Hamilton, Freedom and Grace: The Life of Asa Mahan; G. M. Rosell and R. A. G. Dupuis, eds., Memoirs of Charles G. Finney; T. L. Smith, Revivalism and Social Reform.

Oblation. See OFFERINGS AND SACRIFICES IN BIBLE TIMES.

Obscenity. Anything that is filthy, repulsive, impure, lewd, offensive, and indecent. Etymologists debate whether the Latin roots mean "against filth" or "off the scene" (i.e., not worthy of occupying our attention at center stage). The United States Supreme Court, in the 1966 Fanny Hill case, gave three tests for obscenity. First, obscene material appeals to prurient interest (i.e., it is intended to arouse lascivious thought and desire). Second, it is patently offensive to prevailing community standards. Third, it is utterly without redeeming social importance. Discussions, as well as legal battles, have ordinarily restricted the discussion of obscenity to sexual matters, though the essential meaning of the term could well include other forms of obscenity (e.g., violence).

The difficulty of combating obscenity through censorship and prosecution of the merchants of obscenity is due to several reasons. First, there is understandable fear of any encroachments on freedom of speech and assembly. Second, it is sometimes difficult to distinguish between an appeal to artistic or aesthetic interest and an appeal to prurient interest. Third, "redeeming social importance" can be argued on very indirect grounds. Fourth, it is difficult to determine "community standards," especially in an age of great ferment and decline in those standards. As a result most legal restrictions against obscenity have been eliminated or seriously undermined in recent decades.

Obscenity

A Christian response to obscenity begins with the summary of Paul: "Whatever is true, whatever is noble, whatever is right, whatever is pure, whatever is lovely, whatever is admirable—if anything is excellent or praiseworthy—think about such things" (Phil. 4:8). Much in the Bible, of course, urges us to consider, sometimes in graphic, realistic terms, the problem of evil around us. We are to consider the plight of our neighbor and our city. Obscenity, however, is to leave the situation as it is or, worse yet, to find gratification or pleasure in viewing degradation (sexual or otherwise). The Christian disciple is called to grasp the situation realistically and then to work toward the redemption of the neighbor. Obscenity is wrong because it dehumanizes both the participant and the observer. Both are left at a level considerably less than what God intends.

A more difficult issue has to do with social policy and the Christian's responsibility outside of the Christian community. Since standards of dress and the meaning of language are historically conditioned (even for the church), and thus the perception of obscenity varies from one generation to the next, it is essential that moral discernment take place in prayerful Christian community. Out of genuine love for one's neighbor, however, it seems clear that Christians ought to struggle for restrictions, including censorship, on obscene material that portrays persons in cruel and dehumanizing fashion and contributes to the rapacious atmosphere of this era. It is also out of genuine neighborly love that Christians struggle to protect children from the frontal assaults of obscene material on newsstands and television and through the mail.

While sexual sins receive full censure in Scripture, Christians must be careful not to allow their zeal against sexual obscenity to overshadow their zeal to combat violence, dishonesty, greed, and other sins condemned in the Bible. Finally, Christians must remember that their primary calling is not to act negatively as the restrainers of evil but to act positively as the promoters of the gospel and the good. The Christian answer to sexual obscenity is to promote a true appreciation for sexuality in terms established by the Creator and Redeemer. The answer to all forms of obscenity is to promote the interests of the kingdom of God.

D. W. GILL

See also PORNOGRAPHY.

Bibliography. P. C. Cotham, Obscenity, Pornography, and Censorship; G. D. Everett, DCE 466–68; N. Gallagher, How to Stop the Porno Plague; J. J. Kilpatrick, Smut Peddlers.

Occam, William of. See WILLIAM OF OCKHAM.

Occult. The term refers to "hidden" or "secret" wisdom; to that which is beyond the range of ordinary human knowledge; to mysterious or concealed phenomena; to inexplicable events. It is frequently used in reference to certain practices (occult "arts") which include divination, fortune telling, spiritism (necromancy), and magic.

Those phenomena collectively known as "the occult" may be said to have the following distinct characteristics: (1) the disclosure and communication of information unavailable to humans through normal means (the five senses); (2) the placing of persons in contact with supernatural powers, paranormal energies, or demonic forces; (3) the acquisition and mastery of power in order to manipulate or influence other people into certain actions.

In an attempt to achieve legitimation and acceptance from the larger society, advocates of occultism have in recent years portrayed the occult as basically amenable to scientific investigation. Parapsychology and graphology are two fields in which the claim to scientific status is often advanced. There is considerable disagreement in both the academic world and the religious world as to whether parapsychology, for example, is the "scientific" study of occult phenomena. It would appear that the very character of the occult indicates that it deals with contradictory or dissonant knowledge claims that are difficult, if not impossible, to investigate or validate.

However, recent developments not only in science but in the arts, politics, psychology, and religion indicate a broad shift in Western culture to increased acceptance of a common set of presuppositions that parallel the occult/mystical worldview, which is in stark contrast to the biblical worldview of historic Christianity. The classical systems of occult philosophy and their more recent "new age" variants are fundamentally identical with the "cosmic humanism" that characterizes much of the contemporary world. Likewise, these ideas can be linked with such Eastern religious practices as yoga and meditation and an accompanying philosophy which asserts a definition of reality that ultimately denies the personal God of the Bible, promotes the essential divinity of man, and rejects any absolute statement of moral values.

The occult/mystical world view and its associated religious expression—especially in the Eastern cults presently active in the West—can be analyzed in terms of the following components:

1. The promise of godhood—man is a divine being. All forms of occult philosophy proclaim that the true or "real" self of man is synonymous with God. Such views are all patterned after the archetypal lie of the serpent in Genesis 3:4, "You will be as gods."

2. The notion that "all is one"—God is everything (pantheism). There is only one reality in existence (monism), and therefore everyone and everything in the material world is part of the Divine. It follows that there is no distinction between supernatural and natural, between good and evil, between God and Satan.
3. Life's purpose is to achieve awareness of the Divine within—self-realization. The path to salvation ("illumination," "enlightenment," "union") is an experiential one. It is the path to gnōsis, the seeking of experiential "knowledge" through metaphysical insight.
4. Humankind is basically good—evil is an illusion or imperfection. Ignorance, not sin, is at the root of the human dilemma. An "enlightened" person will transcend moral distinctions. There is no need of redemption or forgiveness, only self-realization.
5. Self-realization via spiritual technique leads to power—the God-man is in charge. By employing spiritual technology such as meditation, chanting, and yoga, and through the application of universal laws, the realized being becomes master of his own reality; he attains the status of guru, or "light bearer," and can influence the lives of others.

With this broad occult/mystical framework in mind, it can be said that the ultimate objective of psychic/occult power is to validate the lie of Satan—that man is God and that death is an illusion. In the deceptive quest for godhood and power, men and women are brought under the power of Satan himself. They are able to manifest a degree of counterfeit power by engaging in occult experiences. Such paranormal manifestations represent an imitation of authentic spirituality and demonstrate Satan's true nature as the archdeceiver.

Both the OT and NT proscribe such spiritually impure occult activities as sorcery, mediumship, divination, and magic. In the OT they are referred to as the "abominable practices" of the pagan cultures that surrounded the Israelites. Involvement with the occult arts was frequently compared to adultery. Jesus and the NT writers also describe the dynamic of Satan's counterfeit spirituality and call for discernment of spiritist activity.

While Scripture acknowledges both the reality and the power of occult practices, it proclaims that God through Christ has disarmed the principalities and powers. At the cross of Calvary the works of the devil were destroyed and the powers of darkness were conquered in an ultimate sense.

R. ENROTH

See also DEMON, DEMONIZATION; NEW AGE MOVEMENT; PRINCIPALITIES AND POWERS; SATAN; SATANISM; WITCHCRAFT.

Bibliography. B. Alexander, Occult; Occult Philosophy and Mystical Experience; T. W. Chandler, Satan, Demons and the Occult Scene Today; H. Freeman, Deliverance from Occult Oppression and Subjection; D. Hunt, Cult Explosion; K. E. Koch, Between Christ and Satan; Christian Counseling and Occultism; Occult Bondage and Deliverance; Satan's Devices; F. Leahey, Satan Cast Out; J. McDowell, Understanding the Occult; G. North, Unholy Spirits: Occultism and New Age Humanism; R. C. Palms, Christian and the Occult; J. S. Wright, Christianity and the Occult.

Ockham, William of. See WILLIAM OF OCKHAM.

Oden, Thomas C. (b. 1931). Methodist theologian, best known as an irenic critic of modernism and liberalism, and apologist for classic orthodoxy. Oden's principal theological theme is that the death of modernity offers the occasion to return to the paleo-orthodoxy of consensual exegetical and confessional theologians, within the intellectual climate of a world that is post-modern.

Oden's own theological pilgrimage exemplifies the widespread intellectual shift away from enlightened modernity, which Oden characterized as individualistic, hedonistic, naturalistic, and morally relativistic, all typified by utopianism, and toward a post- (simply meaning, after) modern world characterized by more modest, organic, and regional forms of understanding. His Agenda for Theology offered his diagnosis of modernity's death and mapped the path backward toward orthodoxy.

Oden's theological hermeneutic is devoted to recovering the consensual tradition of the Vincenian method with its threefold test of catholicity: "that which has been believed everywhere, always, and by all." Stressing the centrist orthodoxy and the heterodox periphery, Oden advocates a paleo-orthodoxy that embraces the seven ecumenical councils, patristic synods, greater theologians of both Eastern and Western traditions, pan-Reformation theologians and consensus-bearing Protestant formularies consistent with ancient consensual exegesis.

Oden's systematic theology, Living God, Word of Life, and Life in the Spirit, represents his endorsement of classic orthodoxy. His anthology, Classical Pastoral Care, catalogs pre-modern texts as a resource for contemporary pastoral challenges. And his topical commentary, Timothy and Titus, offers a demonstration of the tradition-nurturing, proto-catholic tradition that Oden contests characterizes the early Christian church.

Oden's devotion to a classical consensus is appealing to many evangelicals in search of orthodoxy and scriptural traditions, and his plea for a definable center and corresponding heretical periphery appears to be both acerbic and intolerant to his critics. Oden's self-styled understanding of postmodernism leaves him susceptible to the charges of ideological and theological narrowness. His writings make available the valuable resources of premodern theological texts, and his methodological commitments test the boundaries of contemporary orthodox theology.

J. P. CALLAHAN

Bibliography. T. Oden, After Modernity What?: Agenda for Theology; Life in the Spirit; Living God; "Long Journey Home" JETS 34:77-92; Pastoral Theology; Requiem: A Lament in Three Movements; Timothy and Titus; Two Worlds: Notes on the Death of Modernity in America and Russia; Word of Life.

Offerings and Sacrifices in Bible Times. The biblical teaching on offerings and sacrifices lies at the heart of the redemptive history. Any theological attempt to penetrate the mysteries of reconciliation, ecclesiology, and eschatology presupposes a proper understanding of what God requires from his people before and after Christ.

To begin with, a distinction must be made between offering and sacrifice. The word "offering" denotes several categories of gifts to the Lord: (1) a required offering to be burnt wholly or partially on the altar; (2) a voluntary offering to be burnt partially on the altar and to be consumed by the priests and the Israelites as a communal meal; (3) the tithe of the produce of the land and the offspring of the flocks. The word "sacrifice" denotes the particular way of presenting certain offerings. The word zēbah ("sacrifice") is related to the word mizbēah ("altar"), and both nouns are connected with the Hebrew verb meaning "to slaughter." Only three categories of offerings are to be considered sacrifices: the sin offering, the guilt offering, and the burnt offering. Thus it can be said that all sacrifices are offerings, but not all offerings are sacrifices. Since the word offering also covers sacrifices, reference will be made to the several offerings. The word for offering derives from the Hebrew verb meaning "to bring near" (Lev. 7:16), as an expression of the physical act of bringing an object as an offering to the Lord. Offerings are also to be distinguished from the tithe.

The tithe was one of the tributary offerings imposed on Israel. There were strict regulations pertaining to the tithe (ma'āsēr, Lev. 27:30-33; Num. 18:21-32; Deut. 14:22-29; 26:2-15). All crops and the increase in cattle were subject to the tithe. The tithe of grain and fruit could first be exchanged for silver, but the Israelite was required to add 20 percent of the market value before taking the silver to the temple. He was not permitted to redeem the tithe of the herd or flock. In Jerusalem the people were permitted to exchange the silver for grain, wine, oil, and whatever would promote the joy of the people in the presence of their God (Deut. 14:23-27). The Levites and the poor also enjoyed a portion of the tithe. However, every third year the tithe was reserved for the Levites and those in financial need (14:28-29). The tithe also functioned as a kind of a tax to support the temple and its personnel. The tithe was retained by the temple personnel for their own use. Animals were marked to indicate temple ownership, and grain, vegetables, and fruits were stored or sold. An administration was in charge of the storehouse for the continued welfare of the personnel (Neh. 13:13; cf. Mal. 3:10; Neh. 10:38-39; 12:44; 13:5; 2 Chron. 31:4-14).

The practice of sacrifice has been widely discussed since J. Wellhausen's Prolegomena to the History of Israel (1885). According to Wellhausen the sacrificial system was a late development of the custom of enjoying a sacrificial meal (cf. 1 Sam. 9:13; 16:2-5). In OT circles the assumption prevailed that the OT offering could best be analyzed by reference to the practices of primitive societies such as the bedouin. The study of W. R. Smith (Religion of Semites, 1894) supported Wellhausen's conclusion in that he argued that the sacrificial meal, as an expression of fellowship between God and people, was the rudimentary expression of the sacrificial idea. Wellhausenism held that the idea of sacrifice as atonement for sin developed and was systematized in the postexilic period.

Archeological excavations have contributed greatly to a better understanding of sacrifice in the ancient Near East. The findings of temples, bones of sacrificial animals, cultic objects, and collections of documents have shown how the nations had elaborate rituals and highly developed ideas on sacrifice. In Mesopotamia the purpose of sacrifices was to provide food for the gods. The Ugaritic materials show a highly developed terminology that has many words in common with Hebrew sacrificial terms. Parallelism in practice and terminology between the OT sacrificial laws and the Near East is instructive, but in this article the sacrificial system will be limited to the OT and its practices in the time of Jesus.

Categories of Offerings. Offerings can be classified as (1) propitiatory (expiatory atonement): sin offering, guilt offering; (2) dedicatory (consecratory): burnt offering, grain (or cereal) offering, drink offering; (3) communal (fellowship): fellowship (or peace) offering, wave offering, thank (or thanksgiving) offering, vow, freewill offering.

The first mention of an offering in the Bible is in the story of Cain and Abel. Both Cain and Abel offered a type of dedicatory offering (minhâ, Gen. 4:3-4). After the flood Noah presented a dedicatory offering ('ōlâ, Gen. 8:20). There is room for discussion as to the nature of the patriarchal offerings. Some scholars argue that it was a communal meal, and others argue in favor of the 'ōlā (dedicatory) offering. It is significant that the offerings mentioned or alluded to prior to the Mosaic legislation are either dedicatory or communal, not expiatory. The distinction is important because the expiatory offering makes sense only when the law has been introduced.

The OT practice of bringing offerings and sacrifices was carefully regulated. There were certain types of offerings, particular occasions for bringing an offering, qualifications pertaining to the kind of animal and the soundness of that animal, and prescribed rites depending on the offering. The purposes of the prescriptions were to teach Israel that (1) God has ordained ways as to how he is to be approached; (2) because of sin and guilt, one cannot freely approach the Lord; (3) all one possesses has been received from the Lord, and consequently one owes continual recognition to the Lord for his mercies. The presentation of any offering required careful adherence to the prescribed regulations as well as love for the Lord. The prophets often called for obedience rather than sacrifices (1 Sam. 15:22–23; Isa. 1:10–20), for praise of the Lord rather than offerings (Hos. 14:2), and for humility (Mic. 6:8). The prophets were not opposed to offerings, as has been posited by some. They were inspired by the vision of a faithful Israel responding freely in faith and obedience to the regulations given in the law.

Several passages in the Pentateuch describe the offerings in great detail (Exod. 20:24–26; 34:25–26; Lev. 1–7; 17; 19:5–8; Num. 15; 28–29; Deut. 12). Leviticus 1–7 sets forth the order of the various types of offerings. The order in which the offerings are discussed is neither logical nor chronological. Several offerings are categorized according to their nature. Those offerings which are described as producing “an aroma pleasing to the Lord” (NIV) are detailed in chapters 1–3. They are the burnt offering (1:3–17), the grain offering (2:1–16), and the fellowship offering (3:1–17). Leviticus 4:1–6:7 describes the two types of expiatory offerings: the sin offering (4:1–5:13) and the guilt offering (5:14–6:7). The remainder of chapters 6 and 7 gives the regulations on the disposal of the priests’ portions and the communal meal. The material of the offerings consisted of those possessions with which the Israelites made their living, such as cattle, sheep, goats, grains, wine (grapes). A commonly held misconception is that the Israelites could present to God any food that was ritually clean to them (fish, Lev. 11:9, and wild animals, Deut. 12:22). However, this is not the case, as fish and wild animals were never included in the types of offerings specified by the Lord. Ritually unclean food could not be brought as an offering, and not all “clean” food was to be offered to the Lord.

In addition to the many texts found in the Mosaic legislation, the historical books also provide information regarding the practice of offering to the Lord. The Scriptures suggest that there was a certain order in which offerings were presented to God. The sin or guilt offering had to be presented first as an atonement for sin. The dedicatory offering, either a burnt or grain offering, could then be presented. In addition to the dedicatory offering, a fellowship offering was given to symbolize the gratitude of the people and their desire for fellowship with God. This order is exemplified in Exodus 29:10–34, the account of the consecration of the priests. First a bull was sacrificed as a sin offering (v. 14). A ram was then presented as a burnt offering (v. 18). Finally, portions of a ram, a loaf of bread, a cake made with oil, and a wafer (vv. 22–23) were presented as a fellowship offering.

Propitiatory Offerings. An expiatory offering was required when an Israelite had become ritually unclean or had unwittingly sinned against God or his neighbor. The two types of expiatory offering are the sin offering and the guilt offering.

Sin Offering (ḥāṭṭā't, Exod. 29:14, 36; Lev. 4). Every Israelite, whether he was a commoner or a high priest, was required to make a sin offering. What was offered depended upon the individual’s status within the community. A poor person could satisfy his requirements by sacrificing two pigeons or turtledoves (Lev. 5:7), or he could offer a tenth of an ephah of fine flour (Lev. 5:11; cf. Heb. 9:22). The Israelite of modest income could bring a female goat (Lev. 4:28) or a lamb (4:32) to the altar. The leaders in the community were expected to offer a male goat (4:23) and the high priest as well as the people as a congregation had to sacrifice a young bull (4:3, 14).

A sin offering was presented under three circumstances. First, it was required for ritual cleansing. Women after childbirth (Lev. 12:6–8), victims of leprosy (14:13–17, 22, 31), those who suffered from abscesses and hemorrhaging (15:15, 30), and Nazirites who had contact with a corpse (Num. 6:11, 14, 16) were among those who needed to make a sin offering in order to be considered ceremonially clean. A second occasion for which a sin offering was required was when an Israelite unintentionally sinned against the law of God (15:25–29). Finally, sin offerings were made at each of the Hebrew festivals such as the Passover (28:22–24), the Feast of Weeks (28:30), the Feast of Tabernacles (or booths 29:16, 19), the new moon festival (28:15), the festival of trumpets (29:5), and the Day of Atonement (29:11).

Guilt Offering ('āšām, Lev. 5:14–6:7; 7:1–7; KJV, “trespass offering”). The second kind of expiatory offering was the guilt offering, which consisted of a payment of damages or a fine. The guilt offering was a means of making restitution when social, religious, or ritual expectations had not been observed. It was required of any Israelite who had defrauded God or a fellow Israelite. Whether the offense was against God or another person, the guilty party had to pay full restitution. Furthermore, the offender was required to pay a penalty of a fifth of the value of the goods which he had defrauded. This additional offering was usually a ram (Lev. 5:15).

A guilt offering was necessary whenever a person unknowingly failed to meet his obligation before God in sacrifice, service, or covenantal obedience. Also, if an individual sinned against a fellow Israelite in the same manner, he was expected to make a guilt offering. This entailed sacrificing a ram to God and paying restitution plus a 20 percent penalty to the offended party. The guilty individual was to make his offering while confessing his sin. If his sin was against another Israelite, he had to make full restitution, including the 20 percent penalty, before his offering to God would be accepted (cf. Matt. 5:23–24).

Dedicatory Offerings. Three offerings are characterized as being “pleasant” to the Lord. These are the burnt offering (Lev. 1), the grain offering (Lev. 2), and the fellowship offering (Lev. 3). The phrase “an aroma pleasing to the Lord” (NIV) or a “sweet savor” (KJV) is a standardized idiom denoting God’s acceptance of and pleasure with Israelite offerings. Noah’s sacrifice following the flood was such an offering (Gen. 8:21). The dedicatory offerings presuppose the existence and observance of the expiatory offerings in the period of the Mosaic revelation. The dedicatory offerings were not accepted by God unless Israel had first presented any required expiatory offerings.

Burnt Offering (’ōlā, Lev. 1:3–17; 6:8–13). Any Israelite could present a burnt offering. A bull (1:3–5), a sheep or goat (1:10), and a bird (1:14) were all considered appropriate sacrifices. The offering was made by having the offender place his hand upon the animal before it was killed (1:4). After the animal was killed its blood was drained on the altar (1:5) or on the side of the altar (1:15). The priest then carefully washed and cut the offering into pieces and arranged the pieces on the altar (1:6–9, 12–13).

The Scriptures indicate a close association between the burnt offering and the sin offering. These two types of offerings were required together during the new moon festival (Num. 28:11–14), Passover (28:19–24), the Feast of Weeks (28:26–29), the Festival of Trumpets (29:2–4), Day of Atonement (29:8), and the Feast of Tabernacles (29:12–38). Also the burnt offering was required in addition to the sin offering following childbirth (Lev. 12:6–8), abscesses (15:14–15), hemorrhages (15:29–30), and defilement during the Nazirite vow (Num. 6:10–11). The association between the sin and the burnt offerings suggests that before the worshiper can fully devote himself to the Lord (symbolized by the burnt offering), he must know that his sins have been atoned for (symbolized by the sin offering).

The relationship that existed between the sin offering, burnt offering, and thank offering can be seen in 2 Chronicles 29:20–31, in which the offerings were made under the leadership of King Hezekiah. After the cleansing of the temple and the consecration of all the vessels, King Hezekiah and the leaders of Jerusalem brought animals as a sin offering “to atone for all Israel.” Burnt offerings were then presented to the Lord. During the sacrifice of the burnt offerings the Levites and priests sang and played their instruments. Following the sacrifices the entire assembly worshiped God. After this time of worship more burnt offerings and thank offerings were made. This combination of sin offering, burnt offering, and thank offering expressed the Israelites’ need for atonement, their devotion to God, and their gratitude for his blessing.

Grain Offering (minhâ, Lev. 2:1–16; KJV, “meat offering,” RSV, “cereal offering”). The Hebrew term minhâ needs further clarification. The root meaning is “offering,” and in its most basic sense is found some thirty-five times, meaning tribute or gift (cf. Gen. 43:15; Judg. 3:15–19). In a cultic context it may refer to any sacrifice (Isa. 66:20). As a dedicatory offering the minhâ generally accompanied other consecratory offerings (’ōlā and nēsak).

The offering was presented by all Israelites, including priests. It consisted mainly of fine flour (Lev. 2:1–3), wafers, unleavened bread, and cakes (2:4–10), or ears of grain (2:14–16). A portion of the grain offering was burned together with incense (2:1–2). The ’azkārâ is the technical name of the portion. It is related to the Hebrew verb zākar, “to remember,” as it is a reminder to God of the sweet smell of the incense burned together with the cereal offering.

The offering was generally made together with the burnt offering (cf. Num. 28–29) and fellowship offering (Lev. 7:12–14; Num. 15:4–10). There were additional occasions that called for the grain offering: the ceremonies associated with the ritual purification of a leper (Lev. 14:10; 20–22), the completion of a Nazirite vow (Num. 6:15–21), and possibly also with the ritual purification after childbirth, etc. (see the occasions for the burnt offering above). It may be that the offering was not made on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16). The grain offering was always made together with the peace offering.

Drink Offering (nēsak, Num. 28:14; 29:6). As with the grain offering, anyone could present a drink offering. It accompanied both burnt and fellowship offerings (Num. 15:1–10). The amount of wine depended on the size of the animal to be sacrificed (half a hin for a bull, a third for a ram, and a fourth for a lamb). The offering was intended to please the Lord (5:7), and was expected as a daily offering (28:7) and on the sabbath (28:9), new moon (28:14), and the annual festivals.

Communal Offerings. In addition to the required offerings the worshiper could present voluntary offerings. They did not atone for sins but were complementary to the expiatory and dedicatory offerings. The communal offerings are at times more difficult to distinguish, since several offerings are aspects of one type of offering.

Fellowship Offering (šĕlāmîm, Lev. 3; 7:11–36; NASB, RSV, “peace offerings”). Any Israelite could make a fellowship offering in addition to the sacrifices made for atonement and consecration. Since it was a voluntary offering, some qualifications of the sacrificial animals were more relaxed (both male and female animals were permitted, 3:1, 6). The animal was killed at the entrance of the outer court (3:1–2, 7–8, 12–13), and its blood was thrown against the altar (3:2, 8, 13). The entrails were completely burned. The priest was permitted to take the breast and eat it with his family in a clean place. Before taking it as his own, the priest was required to recognize it as a heave offering (tĕrûmâ; NIV, “thigh that is presented”) (Lev. 7:34). He was expected to lift up his portion to signify that it was the Lord’s (Exod. 29:27–28; Lev. 7:34). Then he would wave it as a wave offering (tĕnûpâ) to symbolize that it was the Lord’s and that it became his for food by divine appointment. The offerer also could present unleavened cakes as a part of the thank offering (zĕbah tôdâ, Lev. 7:12; KJV, “thanksgiving”; NIV, “expression of thankfulness”). Thank offering is generally viewed as a synonym for fellowship offering. The priest was also permitted to take one of the unleavened cakes, wave it as a wave offering, and consume it.

The last stage of the fellowship offering was the communal meal, where the offerer and his family would enjoy those parts of the offering which had not been burned or taken by the priest (Lev. 7:15–17). Strict rules detail that it was to be eaten by ritually clean people, in a place near the sanctuary, a ritually clean place, and detail the time period during which the food could be enjoyed.

The fellowship offering was regularly made during the Feast of Weeks (Lev. 23:19–20) as a token of gratitude to God. It was associated with the Nazarite vow (Num. 6:17–20) and the ordination of a priest (Exod. 29:19–34; Lev. 8:22–32). The fellowship offering was often made during or after periods of national threats, adversity, or spiritual renewal, such as war, famine, pestilence, the dedication of the temple, and reforms.

Voluntary Offerings. These included those gifts presented in fulfillment of a vow (votive offerings, Lev. 7:16–17; 22:21; 27; Num. 6:21; 15:3–16; 30:11). The vow was made either as part of a request of God and then fulfilled when the request was granted, or it could be a voluntary response to the goodness of God. The fulfillment of the latter vow falls together with the thanksgiving offering (tôdâ, Lev. 7:12–13, 15; 22:29; 2 Chr. 33:16; Pss. 50:14, 23; 116:17). Another type of voluntary offering was the freewill offering (nĕdābâ, Exod. 35:27–29; 36:3; Lev. 7:16; Num. 15:3; Deut. 12:17; 16:10; 23:23; Ezek. 46:12). Because of the voluntary nature of the freewill offering, an imperfectly developed ox or sheep was acceptable (Lev. 22:23).

The emphasis on sacrifices and offerings in the OT is God’s revelation for Israel. It signifies the gravity of sin and the grace of God that by the shedding of blood man’s sins can be expiated so that the Israelite could know himself to be reconciled with God. The complex system of sacrifices and offerings made the point that man must know what God requires of man and that man must be sure to please God by the renewal of his heart and motivations as he gives of his possessions to Almighty God. However, the expiatory sacrifices did not atone for all sins. Only unintentional sins, inadvertent acts of default, and particular cases of dishonesty could be atoned for, but any trespass of the Decalogue required the death penalty.

Sacrifices and Offerings in the NT. Jesus upheld the sacrificial system. He went to the temple at Passover and participated in the Passover meal. He commanded the lepers to go to the priests to undergo ritual cleansing and to bring the required offerings (Matt. 8:4; cf. Luke 17:14). In the Sermon on the Mount our Lord did not reject offerings, but stressed that one must first be reconciled to one’s brother before one can be reconciled with God (Matt. 5:23–24). Following the crucifixion and ascension of Jesus, the apostles applied the OT language of sacrifice and expiation to Jesus’ sacrifice of himself (Rom. 3:25; 8:3). Especially the Epistle to the Hebrews shows how the OT sacrificial system is fulfilled by Jesus as the high priest of the new covenant, by whose blood all sins can be atoned for and by whom the Christian can be strengthened to do works pleasing to God (Heb. 13:20–21). Paul likewise exhorted the Christians in Rome to offer themselves as a living sacrifice to God as a dedicatory offering (Rom. 12:1–2). W. A. VAN GEMEREN

Bibliography. R. Abba, “Origin and Significance of Hebrew Sacrifice,” BTB 7:123–38; H. C. Brichto, “On Slaughter and Sacrifice, Blood and Atonement,” HUCA 47:19–55; D. Davies, “Interpretation of Sacrifice in Leviticus,” ZAW 89:387–99; P. A. H. de Boer, “Aspect of Sacrifice,” VT Supplement 23:27–47; N. H. Gadegaard, “On the So-called Burnt Offering Altar in the OT,” PEQ 110:35–45; G. B. Gray, Sacrifice in the Old Testament; M. Haran, “Passover Sacrifice,” VT Supplement 23:86–116; B. A. Levine, “Comments on Some Technical Terms of the Biblical Cult,” Leshonenu 30:3–11; “Descriptive Tabernacle Texts of the Pentateuch,” JAOS 85:307–18; D. J. McCarthy, “Further Notes on the Symbolism of Blood and Sacrifice,” JBL 92:205–10; J. Milgrom, “Alleged Wave-Offering in Israel and in the Ancient Near East,” IEJ 22:33–38; “Chapter in Cultic

Offerings and Sacrifices in Bible Times

History," Tarbiz 42:1–11; "Function of the hattat Sacrifice," Tarbiz 40:1–8; "Prolegomena to Leviticus 17:11," JBL 90:149–56; H. H. Rowley, "Meaning of Sacrifices in the Old Testament," BJRL 23:74–110; N. H. Snaith, "Sacrifices in the Old Testament," VT 7:308–17.

Office, Daily (Divine). Prescribed daily services of worship of the Roman Catholic, Anglican, and Lutheran Churches. The word office is from the Latin officium, meaning performance of duty and implying a religious ceremony. Sometimes called the "hour services," the daily offices have antecedents within Judaism. Jews prayed at the third, sixth, and ninth hours of the day (i.e., 9 A.M., 12 noon, 3 P.M.). This custom carried over into the NT. In Acts it is said Peter and John went up into the temple at "the hour of prayer" (Acts 3:1 NASB) and that Peter went up on the housetop to pray "about the sixth hour" (Acts 10:9 NASB). This Jewish tradition was adopted by Islam, which has five hours of daily prayer (morning, noon, midafternoon, evening, and nighttime). By the fourth century bishops of the Catholic Church were "to charge the people to come regularly to Church in the early morning and evening of each day."

Congregational morning and evening prayers were further developed by the monastic communities. There the daily offices or canonical hours (so called from the canons or rules of Benedict of Nursia) were regularized. Perhaps the inspiration was a passage in the Psalter: "Seven times a day I praise you for your righteous laws" (Ps. 119:164). Monks prayed together at eight appointed times: (1) matins, or nocturns, which began at midnight; (2) lauds, following immediately; (3) prime, at sunrise; (4) terce, at mid-morning (9 A.M.); (5) sext, at noon; (6) nones at midafternoon (3 P.M.); (7) vespers, at eventide; and (8) compline, at bedtime. Each office contained readings from Scripture, recitations from the Psalter, prayers, hymns, and perhaps a sermon. Eventually each hour took on a unique character.

While all offices were retained by the Roman Catholics, the Anglican and Lutheran Reformers placed the main emphasis on matins and vespers (or evensong) as acts of congregational worship. Matins (from Lat. "of the morning") had been the opening service of the day. The primary and most popular and varied of the canonical hours, it became normative Sunday worship for Anglicans (morning prayer) and a daily rite for Lutherans (when no communion was celebrated). Vespers (from Lat. "evening") had been a service at twilight. It was retained by Lutherans and Anglicans as evensong or evening prayer. Lauds (from Lat. "praise") was less common, though it has been restored recently as a service of praise among Protestants.

C. G. FRY

See also EVENING PRAYER, EVENSONG; MORNING PRAYER; WORSHIP IN THE CHURCH.

Bibliography. P. F. Bradshaw, Daily Prayer in the Early Church: A Study of the Origin and Early Development of the Divine Offices; J. G. Davies, Select Liturgical Lexicon; L. Duchesne, Christian Worship, Its Origin and Evolution; L. D. Reed, Lutheran Liturgy.

Officers, Church. See CHURCH OFFICERS.

Offices of Christ. As the only Redeemer of his church, Jesus Christ performed his saving work in the threefold role of prophet (Deut. 18:15; Luke 4:18–21; 13:33; Acts 3:22), priest (Ps. 110:4; Heb. 3:1; 4:14–15; 5:5–6; 6:20; 7:26; 8:1), and king (Pss. 2:6; 45:6; 110:1–2; Isa. 9:6–7; Luke 1:33; John 18:36–37; Heb. 1:8; 2 Pet. 1:11; Rev. 19:16). Theologians refer to these as the three offices of Christ, with all the other christological designations such as apostle, shepherd, counselor, intercessor, and head of the church being subsumed under one of these three general offices.

Fulfilling his office work of prophet, Christ (1) brings the Father's message (John 8:26–28; 12:49–50), (2) proclaims his message to the people (Matt. 4:17) and his disciples (Matt. 5–7), and (3) foretells or predicts future events (Matt. 24–25; Luke 19:41–44). He continues to exercise his work as prophet in "revealing to us, by his word (John 16:12–15) and spirit (1 Pet. 1:10–11) the will of God for our salvation" (Westminster Shorter Catechism, Q.24) and edification (Eph. 4:11–13).

Executing his office work of priest, Christ (1) offered himself up to God as a sacrifice to satisfy divine justice and to reconcile the church to God (Rom. 3:26; Heb. 2:17; 9:14, 28) and (2) makes continual intercession for all those who come unto God by him (John 17:6–24; Heb. 7:25; 9:24).

Performing his office work of king, Christ (1) calls out of the world a people for himself (Isa. 55:5; John 10:16, 27); (2) gives them officers, laws, and censures by which he visibly governs them (Matt. 18:17–18; 28:19–20; 1 Cor. 5:4–5; 12:28; Eph. 4:11–12; 1 Tim. 5:20; Titus 3:10); (3) preserves and supports them in all their temptations and sufferings (Rom. 8:35–39; 2 Cor. 12:9–10); (4) restrains and overcomes all their enemies (Acts 12:17; 18:9–10; 1 Cor. 15:25); (5) powerfully orders all things for his own glory and their good (Matt. 28:19–20; Rom. 8:28; 14:11; Col. 1:18); and (6) finally takes vengeance on those who do not know God or obey the gospel (Ps. 2:9; 2 Thess. 1:8).

This delineation of Christ's execution of his three offices indicates that he exercises his offices in the estates of both his humiliation and his exaltation (Ps. 2:6; Isa. 9:6–7; Rev. 19:16). That is to say, one must not think that it was his prophetic and priestly ministries which he exercised before his death and entombment while it is his kingly office which he has exercised since his resurrection from the dead. To the contrary, the Scriptures clearly represent him as exercising all three offices in both estates—both during his earthly ministry prior to his death and now, since his resurrection and ascension.

In filling these offices Christ fulfills all the needs of humankind. “As prophet he meets the problem of man’s ignorance, supplying him with knowledge. As priest he meets the problem of man’s guilt, supplying him with righteousness. As king he meets the problem of man’s weakness and dependence, supplying him with power and protection” (J. B. Green, Harmony of the Westminster Presbyterian Standards, 65–66).

R. L. REYMOND

Ogden, Schubert Miles (b. 1928). Methodist process-liberationist theologian. Ogden has taught theology as a United Methodist Church minister in the Perkins School of Theology at Southern Methodist University since 1956. He also has taught briefly at the University of Chicago from 1969–72, the school from which he received his Ph.D. in 1958. He was president of the American Academy of Religion in 1977.

Ogden’s postliberal theology in three ways seeks to be faithful both to the norm of the earliest apostolic witness and to contemporary demands for intellectual credibility. First, Ogden correlates Christian faith answers to existentialism’s questions about the nature of human existence. He believes the demythologized Christian kerygma vindicates the universal and inescapable human resolve that life is worthwhile.

Defending, however, the idea that humans find redemption only by a decisive emancipating “act of God,” Ogden anchors his God-talk in the panentheistic concept of God (Whitehead and Hartshorne). He believes process thought’s dipolar God (“neoclassical” theism) is more plausible than classical theism’s monopolar concept, because God is not one unchanging reality but consists of an unchanging abstract pole (“primordial nature”) and an actualized pole experiencing change within space and time (“consequent pole”).

And, in the 1970s, focusing on freedom and justice, Ogden also incorporated liberation theology’s “de-ideologizing” critique into his theology. There is question, however, how the liberationist theological norm of solidarity with the poor (praxis) can be grafted onto the abstract metaphysical priorities (truth) in Ogden’s theology.

Within this framework, the “point of Christology” is an existential point: that the sine qua non event expressed in the symbols of the Jesus-kerygma (from Willi Marxsen) liberates us all as humans to live out God’s pure boundless love in our lives because Jesus Christ explicitly represents for us our common primordial human possibility of responding to God’s call.

Evangelicals believe that the existentialist correlating answers in Ogden’s post-Bultmannian theology have not made it more credible, but actually replaced the earliest apostolic witness concerning the nature and work of the historical person of Jesus Christ, as prophesied in the Old Testament and presented in the New Testament. Furthermore, along with other critics, evangelicals object that Ogden’s God is not fully personal, ultimate (the principle of “creative becoming” is ultimate), omnipotent (God’s power lures the world into cooperation), or creator ex nihilo (existing independent of some world). J. D. CASTELEIN

See also PANENTHEISM; POSTMODERNISM; PROCESS THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. S. M. Ogden, Christ without Myth: A Study Based on the Theology of Rudolf Bultmann; Doing Theology Today; On Theology; Point of Christology; Reality of God and Other Essays; N. Geisler, “Process Theology,” in Tensions in Contemporary Theology S. Gundry and A. Johnson, eds.; “Process Theology and Inerrancy,” in Challenges to Inerrancy: A Theological Response, G. Lewis and B. Demarest, eds; A. Min, “How Not to Do a Theology of Liberation,” JAAR 57:83–102; R. Nash, ed. Process Theology; D. Peel, “Is Schubert Ogden’s ‘God’ Christian?,” JR 70:147–66; T. Peters, “Theological Methods of Schubert Ogden,” Dialog 29:125–34; M. L. Taylor, “Boundless Love of God and the Bounds of Critical Reflection,” JAAR 57:103–47; T. Tracy, “Enacting History: Ogden and Kaufman on God’s Mighty Acts,” JR 64:20–36.

Oil, Anointing with. See ANOINT, ANOINTING.

Old Lights, The. See NEW LIGHT SCHISM.

Old Man. See MAN, OLD AND NEW.

Old Roman Creed. See APOSTLES’ CREED.

Old School Theology. Old School Presbyterians maintained Calvinist orthodoxy from the 1830s to the 1860s. Princeton theologians Archibald Alexander and Charles Hodge believed that their theology faithfully reflected Reformed beliefs and should be central in American Presbyterianism. They contended that their Calvinism was historically aligned with the Westminster Confession of Faith, John Calvin, Augustine, and the Bible itself. The very term “Old School theology” indicates that its adherents wanted to retain traditional Reformed doctrines. They wanted a “consistent Calvinism” and developed distinct views on confessionalism, revivalism, and church polity. Because of their stand on these issues, the Old School faction expelled the New School from the church in 1837 for having diverged from them.

Old School Theology

Believing that doctrinal orthodoxy was of primary importance in Christian faith, Old School men desired a strict confessionalism or subscription to the Westminster Confession. Several New School leaders such as Albert Barnes and Lyman Beecher were accused of holding sub-Calvinist views related to the New Haven theology of Nathaniel W. Taylor. Alexander and Hodge answered Taylor in seven articles in the Princeton Review (1830–31) by stressing Reformed doctrines such as the imputation of Adam's sin (Adam acted as a representative for all men and his sin was counted against them), Christ's substitutionary atonement, and the regenerating work of the Holy Spirit.

Many Old School men, including Alexander and Hodge, were greatly influenced by revivals in their younger days and acknowledged a continuing need for revival in the church. But they sharply criticized contemporary revivalists for expressing Taylorite views in their preaching. They condemned emotional excesses and demanded that true revivals be carried out within the church guided by its confessional stance on God's sovereignty and human inability. Charles G. Finney's theology and Lectures on Revivals of Religion (1835) were thoroughly criticized. Hodge preferred Horace Bushnell's concept of Christian nurture to revivalism as the primary means of bringing people to faith in Christ.

The Old School party also strongly supported Presbyterian polity as most consistent with a Reformed view of the church. Arguing that church order was matter of faith, they opposed a plan of union with Congregationalists and claimed that Presbyterian polity provided discipline necessary to prevent errors in doctrine and practice which Congregationalism lacked. They also repudiated the social activism of voluntary societies, preferring that education and mission activities take place within the institutional church, where it also could be guided by the church's confession.

In 1869 New and Old Schools reunited, primarily because during the schism New School theology had become more orthodox.

W. A. HOFFECKER

See also ALEXANDER, ARCHIBALD; HODGE, CHARLES; NEW HAVEN THEOLOGY; NEW SCHOOL THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. A. Alexander, Evidences of the Authenticity, Inspiration and Authority of the Holy Scriptures; S. J. Baird, History of the New School; A. A. Hodge, Life of Charles Hodge; C. Hodge, Systematic Theology; L. Loetscher, Brief History of the Presbyterians.

Old Testament. See BIBLE.

Old Testament Canon. See BIBLE, CANON OF.

Old Testament Theology. Each of the terms in the phrase Old Testament theology carries a component of meaning. First, the term “Old Testament” implies that there is a “New Testament,” and somewhere in the structure of OTT the relationship between the two Testaments must come into view. It also implies a new community, the Christian community, which has espoused the OT as part of its own canon of Scripture, but which also has a unique canon that has come into being because the God of the OT has revealed himself in Jesus Christ. The Hebrew Scriptures were the only Bible Jesus and his apostles had, and the NT writers often engaged in explaining the OT in terms of Christ, thus engaging themselves in OTT, even though they did not call it by our phrase. Most often their concern was to show how the OT prophecies had spoken about him and been fulfilled in him. The Gospel of Matthew is a good example, for Matthew gives special weight to the prophets' predictions of Christ in no less than fourteen instances (e.g., Matt. 1:22; 2:5; 2:15, 17).

Second, “Old Testament theology” deals, as the name implies, with the canon of Scripture which was formulated by the Jewish community and accepted by those who believed in Jesus as the Messiah. Compared to systematic theology, its focus is textual, rather than philosophical. The standard categories of God, humanity, and salvation, which characterize systematic theology, do not necessarily impose themselves upon OTT, even though some theologians accommodate these categories in the structure of their theology.

Third, “Old Testament theology” means “study of God.” Even though it is etymologically a rather limiting term, it is not intended so restrictively. In fact, one might say that it is impossible to study God without studying human beings. While, then, theology deals primarily with God, who is the subject of Scripture, it is a subject which cannot be explicated without the interaction of God with his creation, and the creation with God. Therefore, OTT is two-dimensional: it studies God and his relationship to the human community of Israel and the larger world, and Israel's and the world's relationship to God. This latter dimension may be called the kingdom of God, or community of faith, to indicate the corporate entity which divine action creates, or it may be called by an instrumental term, like covenant (W. Eichrodt), or promise (W. Kaiser), or design (E. Martens).

The vertical relationship, God's revelation of himself to men and women, is linked, moreover, to the horizontal relationship of human beings to other human beings on a personal scale. The Ten Commandments outline that perspective. The first four commandments regulate the relationship between the Lord and humanity, while the last six regulate the human/human relationships, or interpersonal relationships within the community of faith. In the OT that community of faith is called Israel, and in the NT the Church.

In view of these observations, we may define OTT as the study of God and his relationship to humanity, especially the people of Israel, as divinely revealed in the canon of OT Scripture. This simply means that there are two centers of attention, God and humanity, and that the foundation of our knowledge comes from the OT canon, with its basic theological paradigms of faith (Torah, Prophets, and Wisdom), written in varying historical periods as a record of and response to God's self-revelation.

A Brief History of the Discipline. As already noted, even Jesus and the apostles engaged in the discipline of OTT, and thus we should not assume that modern scholars are the first. Of course, the apostles did not do OTT in a scientific way, but rather as a response of faith to divine revelation given in the OT and fulfilled in Christ.

The development of the modern discipline parallels the rise and movement of historical criticism. Beginning in the eighteenth century, the Bible was subjected to a literary scrutiny of the type that was not necessarily motivated by faith. As source analysis took shape as a critical method of looking at the OT, and subsequent critical methods, like form and redaction criticism, took their place in the arsenal of critical methodology, OTT as a scholarly discipline began to take form also. The tendency of Western thought was to draw a line of demarcation between the teachings of the Church (dogmatic theology) and the Bible as viewed through rationalistic eyes (Hayes and Prussner, 37–38). Rationalism tended to throw off the view that the Bible was divinely inspired, and insisted that its literature be studied under the same rules as any other ancient literature.

Ever since the young German scholar Johann Philipp Gabler (1753–1826) gave his inaugural address to the faculty of the University of Altdorf in 1787, biblical theology has been distinguished from systematic theology (or dogmatic theology) in the fact that the ideas of the Bible must be studied in their historical context and periods. Thus biblical theology became an historical discipline, as compared with systematic or dogmatic theology, which was philosophical in nature. The twentieth century has had its objectors to this distinction, most notably Gerhard von Rad. Yet, despite the objections, history remains a critical factor in doing OTT.

As a historical discipline, Georg Lorenz Bauer (1755–1806) wrote the first OTT under the title Theologie des Alten Testaments. In his work OTT and NTT were separated from each other, yet he did not depart from the systematic structure. Rather he organized his theology in the categories of theology, anthropology, and Christology (Hasel, 17).

The rationalistic approach moved to the side as philosophy came to influence the discipline, and in 1835 Wilhelm Vatke (1806–1882) incorporated

Hegel's scheme of thesis (nature religion), antithesis (spiritual or Hebrew religion), and synthesis (universal religion or Christianity) into his theology Die biblische Theologie (Hasel, 21).

A conservative reaction to this humanistic trend took place in the middle of the nineteenth century, represented particularly by E. W. Hengstenberg's Christology of the Old Testament (1829–1835). Opposed to the historical-critical approach to Scripture, Hengstenberg minimized the distinction between the Old and New Testaments by focusing upon Christ as the theological apex of the Bible.

G. F. Oehler's theology, Theology of the Old Testament (1845), was one of the most significant works of this conservative reaction. His work was in part a reaction against the tendency to depreciate the OT in favor of the NT, and yet to maintain a uniformity of the two, as Hengstenberg had tried to do. Instead of the historical-critical approach, he proposed a grammatical-historical method. Combined with an "organic process of development" of OT religion, Oehler laid out the most important salvation-history presentation of biblical theology of the nineteenth century (Hasel, 21).

The twentieth century has been witness to a forward thrust in the development of OTT. The publication of Otto Eissfeldt's article, "Has Old Testament Theology Still a Self-Justification within Old Testament Studies?" introduced the view that OTT is a non-historical discipline which is done from the vantage point of the theologian's faith commitment, thus, as some critics held, imposing a gap between knowledge and faith. The publication of Walther Eichrodt's Theology of the Old Testament (1933–1939) challenged Eissfeldt's thesis and espoused the historical emphasis of Gabler. Further, by introducing covenant as center, Eichrodt inaugurated the debate about the center of OTT.

Gerhard von Rad's Old Testament Theology (1957–1960) brought an additional dimension to the discipline in that von Rad applied the form- and tradition-critical approaches to the study of OTT, proposing that the proper object of the study of OTT was what Israel believed about God. That shift moved the discipline more in the direction of the history-of-religions approach, since von Rad's emphasis on Israel's belief system rather than the belief system of the theologian or the church was his focus.

One of the major issues among OT theologians, raised also by von Rad's objective approach, is whether an OTT should be normative (explaining the text for "what it means" to the current generation as well as to the past), or merely descriptive (explaining the text only for "what it meant" to the ancient recipients). Von Rad's methodology directed him toward the descriptive approach, that is, describing what Israel believed about God. On the other hand, B. S. Childs, an American theologian, published an important work in 1970, Biblical Theology in Crisis, in which he made a strong case for the normative approach, observing that the descriptive and normative are linked inseparably together, and he stressed the need for the Bible to speak to the church in every new age (Childs, 141). In his works he has championed the canonical approach to Scripture, stressing the need to take seriously the form in which the books have come to us. That is the final form of Scripture which the interpreter must deal with, even though Childs does not downplay the critical methods as a means of understanding how the final form of Scripture came to be.

Center of Old Testament Theology. As stated above, since Walther Eichrodt introduced covenant as the theological center of the OT, the question of center has been a standard issue in the theological studies of the OT. And, indeed, it is of great importance because how one answers this question will affect both method and structure of OT theology. So important is a center to OT theology that Otto Kaiser says it may not be possible to write an OTT theology if there is no center (O. Kaiser, 93).

Affirming a Center. It might seem that the problem could be solved by saying that the center of the OT is God, and not many scholars would disagree that the OT is about God. Yet, to leave the matter there might ignore the relational aspect of theology. We can agree with Fohrer when he says, "The Old Testament does not place God in its center in an isolated manner, but speaks of him with regard to his action in the lives and destinies of nations and men, in creation and nature" (G. Fohrer, 199). He thus locates the center in the dual concept of the rule of God and the communion between God and humanity, and he observes that the possibility exists of designing a theology of the whole Bible on this dualism.

Similarly, T. C. Vriezen's concentration is upon the knowledge of God "as the real, decisive element of religion. This knowledge of God is a communion with that God whose Being as such remains a secret and who is holy" (Vriezen, 131). E. Jacob proposes a similar center, citing the OT affirmation of the sovereignty of God as the unifying concept.

When Samuel Terrien looked for the "driving force" of the OT, as he calls it, he found it in the concept of "divine presence." G. A. F. Knight is no less emphatic in his view that the "central theme of the Old Testament is nothing less than the revelation of the redemptive activity of God in and through the Son, Israel" (Knight, 13). Further, he proceeds in his theology to elucidate the Person and activity of God in his book, A Christian Theology of the Old Testament. Elmer Martens has pinpointed "God's design" as the unifying element. He defends this by making a case for design as a constituent concept in the OT. Martens even delineates a natural place for the wisdom material in that it "both affirms and wrestles with the questions of order and meaning in the world" (Martens, "Tackling Old Testament Theology," 130). The shape of this "design" appears in the anchor text of Exodus 5:22–6:8, and incorporates four components: (a) deliverance, (b) community, (c) knowledge of God, and (d) the abundant life (Martens, 23–25). Walter Kaiser, using much the same methodology as Martens, employs anchor texts to explicate his center of promise (Toward an Old Testament Theology), yet neither Martens's or Kaiser's structure has a natural place for wisdom.

H. D. Preuss has written one of the more recent OT theologies and focused upon election as the theological center. He recognizes, as any theologian should, that the center is not the entire OT, but it provides a mark of identity, a strong clue to the self-image of the OT. In Preuss's view, Yahweh's historical activity by which he elected Israel for communion with the world and for obedient action, was both for Israel and the nations (Preuss, 25). This study, while choosing a specific divine activity as center, has the added benefit that it sees the center as expanding in concentric circles of Israel's and the world's obedience to the demands of Yahweh.

Disavowing a Center. Gerhard von Rad, in his Old Testament Theology, moved away from the idea of center, and used the results of his form-critical study to shift the focus of theology from Yahweh's action in history to Israel's interpretation of history, even though he later admitted that "one can say, Yahweh is the center of the Old Testament" (cited by Hasel, 114). Claus Westermann also disavows a center for the OT, but defines the task of OT theology to be "summarizing and viewing together what the Old Testament as a whole, . . . says about God" (Westermann, 9). Brevard Childs joins company with these theologians and insists that the OT has no theological center (Old Testament Theology in a Canonical Context). Following the theology of von Rad, Christoph Barth has written a very helpful theology of the acts of God in history (God with Us), while at the same time not giving accent to von Rad's methodology.

The Relationship of Structure and Center. The OT presents three paradigms of faith, that is, three models of viewing and describing God, Israel, and the larger world. They are law (Torah), prophecy, and wisdom. It is well known that the three major religious offices of the OT are associated with three corresponding bodies of literature: the priest with Torah, the prophet with prophecy, and the sage with wisdom (Job, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes). This is a significant fact, and it means that, in broad terms, when we have described and explicated these three literatures, with their view of God, Israel, and the world, as well as their relationship to each other, we will have basically written a theology of the OT (Scott, 4–5).

Other books in the OT, such as the Psalms, Song of Songs, and Esther, which do not fit so easily into any one of these categories, nevertheless do not represent a different major religious paradigm. Therefore, the fact that they stand somewhat apart from the other models in no way disqualifies the thesis that OT theology is constituted of these major religious constructs.

Torah as Center. When one looks at the religion of the OT with a wide-angle lens, the exodus, Sinai, and conquest of the land occupy a central place. In fact, the literary design of the Pentateuch shines the spotlight on these three events. While the events and contents of the book of Genesis have an inestimable value of their own apart from these central events, Genesis is nevertheless an introductory narrative to this trilogy of events. First, the book of Genesis incorporates allusions to and prophecies of the exodus (Gen. 15:13–14; 50:34–25). Second, the book predicts that the Israelites who went into Egypt would return to Canaan in the fourth generation (15:15), and further, Genesis develops the Canaanite theme to help the generation of the conquest understand why it had been so long delayed (“the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet complete”), as well as to motivate them to action in the light of the challenge of the conquest that lay on the horizon. Third, the writer of Genesis distributed information throughout the book about the prepatriarchal and the patriarchal observance of the law, which had not yet even been given, but was only formally given to Israel on Sinai. How could the patriarchs observe the law which had not yet been received? the clincher of that apologetic comes in Genesis 26:5, which affirms that Abraham “obeyed my voice and kept my charge, my commandments, my statutes, and my laws,” implying perhaps that the law was already written in Abraham’s heart. Thus, in Genesis we have the key to the center of the Pentateuch, indeed, the key to the entire OT. Once these events are enacted in the narrative, the remainder of the Pentateuch focuses upon the law and the future course of Israel’s history, a course that would lead to the conquest of Canaan.

Yet the events of the exodus and conquest are like bookends to the giving of the law on Sinai. On the one side, the exodus provides historical equilibrium to the OT and becomes the archetype of salvation. It further becomes the prelude to Sinai and the law. On the other side, the conquest of the land is an anchor of Israelite history, or we might call it the epilogue to Sinai. Thus the law is really the controlling agent. It is the law that regulates Israel’s life in general and their life in the land in particular. Indeed, the degree to which Israel keeps the law will determine the degree of stability they experience in the land of Canaan (Deut. 28:58–68).

The book of Genesis presents a pre-Mosaic law as regulating the lives of the prepatriarchal and patriarchal figures, presaging the law of Moses which became the controlling agent in the life of ancient Israel as they faced the conquest (Josh. 1:8). The law or Torah is therefore the “canon” within the canon (Kaiser, 96). If we are to understand ancient Israel and the OT, we must keep this control in view.

If we take our cue from the canonical structure of the OT, the position of the Torah as standing first in the order of the books has theological significance (Merrill, 8). And, as observed, the major saving events of the exodus and Sinai form the historical backbone of the Torah and present the theological heart of the OT. Even those scholars who still affectionately hold to the documentary hypothesis have come to recognize that the Torah is much more foundational than Wellhausen and his early patrons thought.

To illustrate the point, the former prophets (Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings) open with a view of the Torah: “This book of the law shall not depart out of your mouth, but you shall meditate on it day and night” (Josh. 1:8). This affirmation of the deuteronomic principle (see Deut. 28) underwrites the picture of the largely successful conquest of Canaan set forth in Joshua. Moreover, references to the Torah occur ten different times in the book (Josh. 1:7, 8; 8:31, 32, 34 [2x]; 22:5; 23:6; 24:26), and Joshua’s concluding act on Israel’s behalf was to enlarge the book of the law of God and erect a stone in the sanctuary of Shechem as a witness against Israel in the event they disobeyed the Torah (Josh. 24:26).

Another significant word of Torah-affirmation in the former prophets is spoken by David as he gave his final instructions to Solomon to “keep the charge of the LORD your God, walking in his ways and keeping his statutes, his commandments, his ordinances, and his testimonies, as it is written in the law of Moses, that you may prosper in all that you do and wherever you turn” (1 Kings 2:3). The reverse side of this mandate is seen in 1 Kings 11:11, where the Lord tore the kingdom from Solomon because he had not kept “my covenant and my statutes which I have commanded you. . . .” Israel’s epitaph as a nation contains the same negative assessment (2 Kings 17:13–14). Nor was the southern kingdom exempt from this life of apostasy, and in one final attempt to reverse Judah’s free-fall toward destruction, Josiah called Judah to renew their devotion to the Torah (2 Kings 22–23).

The latter prophets (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Twelve) pose a more complicated challenge, but keeping with the Torah was a tenet of prophetic theology as well (Amos 2:4b). In fact, the prophetic corpus concludes with an admonition to “remember the law of my servant Moses, the statutes and ordinances that I commanded him at Horeb for all Israel” (Mal. 4:4).

One last word on this matter—perhaps one of the final editorial touches of the OT canon—is the installation of Psalms 1 and 2 as a preface to the Psalter. The Torah is the constant and delightful companion of piety (Ps. 1). When the community is totally preoccupied with such an enterprise, then the Messiah will come (Ps. 2) (O. Kaiser, 98–99).

Torah: A Description. By Torah we are referring first to the laws in the Pentateuch which were given to Moses on Sinai plus other laws that were added during Moses' lifetime, of which the ten commandments comprise the ethical core (Exod. 20, Deut. 5). While these laws are cultic and social, they are basically detailed instructions on how the covenant relationship between the Lord and Israel is to be kept. In this sense, they provide the framework of relationship, Israel's relationship to God, to neighbor, and to the wider world. Second, the laws of the Pentateuch are fitted into a narrative frame, and this narrative sets the historical stage for Israel's life. Through it we learn by example. For instance, in Numbers 15:30–31 the Torah stipulates that the person who sins defiantly (with a high hand) must be cut off from the congregation. Then the story that immediately follows, the man who gathered sticks on the Sabbath, is an illustration of one who sinned defiantly. Therefore, Torah is, in the second level of understanding, the laws of the Pentateuch set in their narrative frame.

At the third level of understanding, however, the essence of Torah is found in the Lord's statement, "I will take you as my own people, and I will be your God" (Exod. 6:7), a statement that is reiterated in Leviticus 26:12, "I will walk among you and be your God, and you will be my people." Everything else in the Torah is merely commentary.

Prophecy and Wisdom in Their Torah-serving Function. Prophecy and wisdom as expressions of OT faith basically had a Torah-serving function. They represented Israel's response to the Torah. This is what Roland E. Murphy called a "shared approach to reality," shared by prophets, priests, and sages alike in varying degrees (Murphy, 39).

The Torah-serving Function of Prophecy. The prophets, therefore, must be understood within the framework of Torah theology. The logical starting point is Deuteronomy 18, which brings the prophet under the authority of Torah, where the Lord promised that he would raise up another prophet like Moses to whom he would commit his words. The framework of the former prophets reinforces this analogy of Moses, first in the person of Joshua who is billed as a "new" Moses (Josh. 4:14; 5:15), and second, in the person of Elijah (1 Kings 17–19), a Moses-like figure (Cross, 190–194).

Moreover, the classical prophets also carry forth this mode of interpretation. Hosea reflected upon Moses' prophetic role in history and declared, "By a prophet the LORD brought Israel up from Egypt," and by a prophet he was preserved" (Hos. 12:13). In his view, Torah and prophecy were united in the person of Moses, and the rejection of prophecy was a rejection of Torah (Hos. 8:12).

Perhaps, however, the most revealing evidence is Jeremiah's promise of a new covenant (Jer. 31:31–34) and Ezekiel's prediction of a new heart and a new spirit (Ezek. 11:19–20; 18:31; 36:26–32). Jeremiah's point of reference was the Lord's covenant made with Israel when they came out of Egypt. This new covenant, in contrast to the old, would be written in Israel's heart rather than on stone tablets. Further, the object of the new covenant would be the same as the old, "I will be their God, and they shall be my people." Ezekiel's prophecy aims in the same direction. The reason for this transformation is stated in Ezekiel 11:20, "that they may walk in my statutes and keep my ordinances and obey them; and they shall be my people, and I will be their God." In keeping the Lord's laws Israel would realize the end and purpose of the covenant, that he would be their God and they would be his people.

The Torah-serving Function of Wisdom. The third angle of our canonical triangle is wisdom. When first put alongside the Torah, wisdom might seem grossly deficient as compared to prophecy. Its lack of historical references, its emphasis upon creation theology rather than redemption, and its focus on the individual and universal constructs, might seem to make wisdom theologically impaired in relation to the Torah. Yet, that is not the case at all. Rather, wisdom functions theologically as Torah-serving in much the same way as prophecy.

While Job is concerned with the issues of justice and righteousness, the book does not frame these issues in the classic language of Torah and covenant. Sinai and Moses never come into view, perhaps because of the period of composition, or because of the cultural/theological context of Job. However, in view of the concern of Torah for justice and righteousness, the theological circle of Torah is wide enough to encompass the book.

Despite the skepticism of Ecclesiastes, the book concludes on a note that is not only compatible with, but embraces Torah: "Fear God, and keep his commandments; for this is the whole duty of man" (Eccles. 12:13).

Yet, it is the book of Proverbs which is the bulwark of this thesis. Wisdom as represented by the book of Proverbs was a religious expression which extracted the moral essence of Torah and set it to the front of theological consciousness. The sage's instruction is called Torah (3:1; 4:2; 7:2), as is also the teaching of parents (1:8; 6:20). Proverbs is conscious of Torah language and the institutions of Torah. For example, this book uses the language of Torah-keeping to demand that the patrons of wisdom keep her teachings. The language of "binding" the words of Torah upon one's hand, typical of Deuteronomy (Deut. 6:8; 11:18), commands loyalty and faithfulness: "Let not loyalty and faithfulness forsake you; bind them about your neck" (3:3). This same language of "binding" is used to command the keeping of the father's mitzvah (commandment) and the mother's torah (teaching) (6:21), and in 7:3 it commands the keeping of the teacher's instruction.

Further, the language of the Shema' (Deut. 6:9 and 11:20) is in view in both Proverbs 3:3 and 7:3 when the teacher instructs the patrons of wisdom to "write them on the tablet of your heart." The word "heart" is substituted for the phrase "the doorposts of your house and on your gates." Wisdom borrows from the language of Torah-keeping in order to associate her teachings with the authority of Torah. To have wisdom's precepts commanded in the same language as the words of Torah carried a certain weight of urgency. It may not be an overstatement to say that one who keeps wisdom's teachings also keeps the Torah. To summarize, Proverbs presents the moral urgency of wisdom in the language of Torah-keeping and thus highlights both the authority and the urgency of the moral life.

To summarize, OTT seeks to explicate the meaning of the OT in terms of God, Israel, and the world. At the center of this endeavor stands the Torah which reveals God's will, and at the center of the Torah stands God's intention to become Israel's God and to make Israel his people.

C. H. BULLOCK

Bibliography C. Barth, God with Us: A Theological Introduction to the Old Testament; B. S. Childs, Biblical Theology in Crisis; Old Testament Theology in a Canonical Context; F. M. Cross, Canaanite Myth and Hebrew Epic: Essays in the History of the Religion of Israel; W. Eichrodt, Theology of the Old Testament; G. F. Hasel, Old Testament Theology: Basic Issue in the Current Debate; J. H. Hayes, and F. C. Prussner, Old Testament Theology: Its History and Development; O. Kaiser, "The Law as Center of the Hebrew Bible," in Sh'arei Talmon: Studies in the Bible, Qumran, and the Ancient Near East Presented to Shemaryahu Talmon, M. Fishbane and E. Tov, eds.; W. C. Kaiser Jr., Toward an Old Testament Theology; G. A. F. Knight, Christian Theology of the Old Testament; E. A. Martens, God's Design: A Focus on Old Testament Theology; "Tackling Old Testament Theology," JETS 20 (1977): 123–32; E. H. Merrill, "Theology of the Pentateuch," in Biblical Theology of the Old Testament, R. B. Zuck, ed.; R. E. Murphy, "Wisdom—Theses and Hypotheses," in Israelite Wisdom: Theological and Literary Essays in Honor of Samuel Terrien, J. G. Gammie et al., eds.; H. D. Preuss, Old Testament Theology; J. H. Sailhamer, Introduction to Old Testament Theology; R. B. Y. Scott, "Priesthood, Prophecy, Wisdom, and the Knowledge of God," JBL 80 (1961): 1–15; S. Terrien, Elusive Presence: The Heart of Biblical Theology; T. C. Vriezen, Outline of Old Testament Theology; von G. Rad, Old Testament Theology, D. M. G. Stalker, trans.; C. Westermann, Elements of Old Testament Theology, D. W. Stott, trans.

Olevianus, Caspar (1536–1587). German Reformed pastor and theologian. While earning a doctorate in civil law, he dedicated himself to theology and studied under Calvin, Peter Martyr, Beza, and Bullinger. In 1559 he tried to win Trier, his hometown, for the Reformation but was expelled for his efforts. As Calvinism was replacing Lutheranism in Heidelberg in 1560, he earned a doctorate at Sapia College of the University of Heidelberg and served with distinction as professor of systematic theology there for two years.

He then became pastor of the Holy Spirit Church in Heidelberg and attempted to reorganize the city's churches after the model of Geneva. Here he clashed with Thomas Luber (Erastus) over church discipline. Erastus, following Bullinger, gave the right of excommunication to the civil magistrates, while Olevianus, following Calvin, gave it to the elders of the church. Olevianus made a lasting contribution when he and Zacharias Ursinus authored the Heidelberg Catechism (1563) following the pattern of Calvin's catechism. It continues to enjoy popularity today in Reformed churches as one of the three doctrinal standards along with the Belgic Confession and the Canons of Dort.

When Lutheranism returned to power in Heidelberg in 1576 due to a change of electors, Olevianus was deposed and had to flee. Later that year he began establishing Reformed churches in the Wetterau region of Germany. In 1584 he was one of the founders of the Herborn Academy in Nassau, where he taught with the renown exegete Johannes Piscator (Fischer). Here he published his major work, On the Substance of the Free Covenant between God and the Elect (in Latin, in 1585). God's Covenant of Grace appeared posthumously in 1590. As Lyle D. Bierma has demonstrated, these works establish Olevianus as an important intermediary figure in the development of Reformed covenant theology. He was the first to use the covenant of grace as a dominant recurring theme in a systematic theology. He was also the first to teach the existence of a pact of redemption between the Father and Son before creation.

R. A. PETERSON

See also COVENANT THEOLOGY; HEIDELBERG CATECHISM.

Bibliography. J. R. Beeke, "Faith and Assurance in the Heidelberg Catechism and Its Primary Composers," CTJ 27:39–67; L. D. Bierma, "Covenant or Covenants in the Theology of Olevianus?" CTJ 22:228–50; German Calvinism in the Confessional Age: The Covenant Theology of Caspar Olevianus; "Lutheran-Reformed Polemics in the Late Reformation: Olevianus's Proposal," in Controversy and Conciliation: The Reformation and the Palatinate, 1559–83, D. Visser, ed..

Oman, John Wood (1860–1939). A leading British liberal theologian of the early twentieth century. Born on the Orkney Islands, he obtained his advanced education at Edinburgh and the United Presbyterian College in his native Scotland, and at Erlangen, Heidelberg, and Neuchâtel on the continent. Oman spent most of his career in the service of the English Presbyterian Church, first in a lengthy pastorate at Alnwick, Northumberland (1889–1907), and then as professor of systematic theology and apologetics at Westminster, the Presbyterian theological college at Cambridge (1907–35).

Oman was strongly influenced by liberal German thought, especially that of Schleiermacher, whose Speeches on Religion he translated (1893) and whose emphasis upon the importance of subjective, personal religious experience he reflected. In his major writings, including Grace and Personality (1918) and Natural and the Supernatural (1931), he emphasized that each person (1) has the ability to acquire an immediate self-authenticating awareness of the supernatural as he pursues it with sincerity and reverence, (2) is utterly free to interpret the divine meaning of the experiences of his life, and (3) finds liberation from the dominion of his physical environment as he understands and accepts the dominion of the divine.

W. C. RINGENBERG

See also LIBERALISM, THEOLOGICAL; SCHLEIERMACHER, FRIEDRICH DANIEL ERNST.

Bibliography. J. W. Oman, Church and the Divine Order; Concerning the Ministry; Vision and Authority; F. G. Healey, Religion and Reality: The Theology of John Oman.

Omission, Sins of. In both the OT and NT there are a number of Hebrew and Greek words used to convey the concept of sin. This means no single word is able to exhibit the full nature of sin. As these words are used in the various contexts we learn that sin is to miss the mark of God's standard, to fall aside from God's requirements, to pervert that which is right, to trespass against God's law, to rebel against God, to betray a trust, and to fail to meet obligations.

However, sin is not only committed when one does that which is wrong; sin is also failing to do what is right. The former would be a sin of commission; the latter a sin of omission. Negligence can also be sin. Ignorance of an offense does not absolve one from guilt (Lev. 4:13, 22, 27; 5:2–4, 17, 19; 6:4; cf. James 4:17).

In Scripture terrible punishments are given because of ignorance and/or negligence. Failure to "help the Lord" resulted in a curse (Judg. 5:23), and an anathema is pronounced upon those who love not the Lord (1 Cor. 16:22). Failure to minister to Christ's brethren results in everlasting destruction and damnation (Matt. 25:45–46).

R. P. LIGHTNER

Omnipresence. See GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF.

Omniscience. See GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF.

Only Begotten. The word monogenēs occurs nine times in the NT, referring to Isaac (Heb. 11:17), the widow's son (Luke 7:12), Jairus's daughter (8:42), the demoniac boy (9:38), and Jesus Christ (John 1:14, 18; 3:16, 18; 1 John 4:9). In the LXX it is used to render yāhîd, meaning "only one" (Judg. 11:34, e.g.). Wisdom is monogenēs (Wis. Sol. 7:22), having no peer, unique.

The second half of the word is not derived from gennaō, "to beget," but is an adjectival form derived from genos, "origin, race, stock." Monogenēs, therefore, could be rendered "one of a kind." The translation "only" will suffice for the references in Luke and Hebrews. But what about the passages in the Johannine writings? "The adjective 'only begotten' conveys the idea, not of derivation and subordination, but of uniqueness and consubstantiality: Jesus is all that God is, and He alone is this" (B. B. Warfield, Biblical Doctrines, 194). Cremer finds a parallel in the Pauline idios huios (Rom. 8:32). Since the Synoptists used "beloved" (agapētos) of the Son, some have concluded that the two words agapētos and monogenēs are equivalent in force. But "beloved" does not point to the uniqueness of the Son's relation to the Father as monogenēs does.

Though the translation "only" is lexically sound for the Johannine passages, since in all strictness "only begotten" would require monogennētos, the old rendering "only begotten" is not entirely without justification when the context in John 1:14 is considered. The verb genesthai occurs at the end of 1:13 ("born of God") and ginesthai in 1:14. These words ultimately go back to the same root as the second half of monogenēs. Especially important is 1 John 5:18, where the second "born of God" must refer to Christ according to the superior Greek text. As a sample of patristic interpretation, see Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 105. At the very least it is clear that the relationship expressed by monogenēs is not confined to the earthly life so as to be adaptable to an adoptionist Christology. The sonship in John is linked to preexistence (17:5, 24, and the many references to the Son as sent of the Father).

In its significance monogenēs relates to several areas: (1) being or nature (uniquely God's Son), (2) the revelation of God to man (John 1:18), and (3) salvation through the Son (John 3:16; 1 John 4:9).

The Apostles' Creed is content with "only Son," which is the usual form of the Old Roman Symbol. In the Old Latin Version of the NT monogenēs was rendered by unicus, but in the Vulgate it became unigenitus due to the influence of the Nicene christological formulation upon Jerome.

E. F. HARRISON

Omnipotence. See GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF.

See also FIRSTBORN; GOD, DOCTRINE OF.

Bibliography. K. H. Bartels, NIDNTT 2:723–25; E. Best, One Body in Christ; R. E. Brown, Gospel according to John I; F. Büchsel, TDNT 4:737–41; C. H. Dodd, Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel; R. H. Lightfoot, St. John's Gospel; D. Moody, "God's Only Son: The Translation of John 3:16 in the Revised Standard Version," JBL 72:213–19; G. Vos, Self-Disclosure of Jesus; B. F. Westcott, Epistles of John.

Ontological Argument for God. See GOD, ARGUMENTS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF.

Ontology. See METAPHYSICS.

Oosterzee, Jan Jakob Van (1817–1882). Dutch Reformed pastor and theologian. Born in Rotterdam, he graduated from the University of Utrecht, and after ordination briefly served churches at Eemnes-Binnen and Alkmaar before ministering in Rotterdam (1844–62). He found no place for dogmatic speculation in the pulpit, holding that the preacher's task was to edify rather than to instruct. He therefore stressed the preaching of the gospel, the proclamation of Christ according to the Scriptures, and the announcing of salvation. He described himself as "Evangelical, or Christian Orthodox." More than a dozen volumes of his sermons were published, including one on Moses.

He nonetheless developed an interest in theological science, from which preoccupation came works including Image of Christ as Presented in Scripture and commentaries on Luke, the Pastoral Epistles and Philemon, and James (with L. P. Lange). In 1863 came his appointment as professor of practical theology at Utrecht, and within a decade of arrival there he published Theology of the New Testament and Christian Dogmatics. In discussing the anger of God he suggested in a much quoted sentence, "Not without reason has this wrath been termed 'the extreme burning point of the flame of love.'" He wrote also a popular devotional volume, Year of Salvation: Words of Life for Every Day. Then came his magnum opus, the wide-ranging and highly-acclaimed Practical Theology. In 1877 Oosterzee was somewhat inhibited when the passage of sweeping legislation banned the theological faculty from lecturing on biblical, dogmatic, and practical theology and confined teachers to the philosophy of religion, New Testament introduction, and the history of Christian dogma. J. D. DOUGLAS

Oppression. The sin of man's inhumanity to man. It is the violation of human rights and dignity, the exploitation of human labor, the repression of moral values, and the robbery of self-identity. Oppressors may arise from an elite who have the power to subjugate others because of their wealth and privileged position, or they may arise from the masses who have the power to oppress a minority because of the strength of their number. Oppression may occur in the family or at the factory or in society at large. Oppressors may be conscious of their efforts to hold down others or they may be oblivious to the consequences of their sinful activities. Their primary motive may be fear, pride, or greed. Oppression is a complex evil bearing psychological, spiritual, economic, and political consequences and frequently renders the oppressed defenseless and unaware of their true situation.

Economic and political oppression is a major concern in contemporary theological thought. Theologies of liberation share the conviction that the essence of the gospel is the liberation of the oppressed from sociopolitical exploitation. It is claimed that material reality provides the proper context for understanding spiritual reality. Salvation is achieved through overcoming unjust social structures and the emergence of exploited and oppressed classes to a place of dignity and equality.

It is claimed that only those who side with the poor and oppressed are able to do authentic theology and identify with the God of the oppressed. According to the broad spectrum of liberation theologies, oppression results from racial, sexual, political, and economic exploitation. Dehumanization is a key concept in understanding the nature of oppression. Whatever prevents people from becoming more fully human is considered oppressive.

Critical awareness of oppressive social structures comes through "conscientization," a process whereby the oppressed learn to understand their situation and begin their struggle for radical change. Critical awareness of the social situation does not come about before the consciousness of the oppressed has been liberated. Through enculturation the consciousness of the oppressed has been submerged in the mentality of the oppressors. The oppressed have internalized the perspective of their exploiters to the point that sharing the oppressors' way of life becomes an "overpowering aspiration" (Paulo Freire). The poor understand success in the same terms as the rich: to be is to have. Meaning and fulfillment become a matter of possessing material things. The racially oppressed understand their personal identity and worth after the manner of their oppressors: to be is to dominate. Conscientization is the reversal of this mentality by restoring to the oppressed their human dignity and strengthening their resolve for social justice and equality. Instead of aspiring to be like the oppressors, the oppressed struggle for the full humanity of all people, including the oppressors.

Black theologian James Cone speaks for many theologians of liberation when he writes, "To know Jesus is to know Him as revealed in the struggle of the oppressed for freedom" (God of the Oppressed, 34). For Cone, oppression is social oppression, and freedom is brought about by political struggle—a struggle in which "the poor recognize that their fight against poverty and injustice is not only consistent with the gospel but is the gospel of Jesus Christ."

Oppression

The emphasis on social oppression has challenged evangelicals to examine biblical perspectives on oppression and become more aware of the influence of social conditioning in shaping theological perspectives. Words like "tribulation," "suffering," and "affliction," found in many English translations of the Bible, do not convey the social and political impact that the word "oppression" does, even though both the Hebrew and Greek original and the context are clearly concerned with social oppression. The use of the term "oppression" in more recent English translations (e.g., NIV) reveals the importance of the theme throughout the Bible.

Many evangelicals have tended to spiritualize clear biblical references to social and economic oppression. There are a number of reasons for this position, including the biblical stress on patience in suffering, the association of economic struggle with greed and covetousness, the longstanding Christian tradition of obedience to the ruling powers, the dismissal of social action as a worthy pursuit for spiritually minded Christians, the reduction of social concern to works of compassion, and the post-World War II upward social mobility and affluence of the evangelical churches.

While the Bible acknowledges that poverty may result from laziness and divine punishment, it emphasizes in both the OT and NT that its major cause is injustice, exploitation, and class conflict. God is continually portrayed as the defender and refuge of the oppressed. God upholds their human rights and promises judgment on the oppressor. The biblical meaning of oppression exposes the complexity of evil and traces injustice back to a fundamental rejection of God (Rom. 1:18–21). Oppression may be political, racial, sexual, economic, generational, religious, spiritual, or demonic. It is not simply economic, nor is it confined to one social class. Job felt oppressed (Job 10:3), and King David prayed for deliverance and guidance because of his oppressors (Ps. 27:11).

Evangelical theology should not obscure the practical social dimensions of oppression. Poverty results from sin and evil. It is to be neither accepted nor idealized. Concern for man's spiritual condition of lostness and separation from God does not justify indifference toward the justice and well-being of those who are economically poor or racially outcast. The evident complexity of evil in human history does not rationally or spiritually allow for a one-dimensional view of oppression that divorces social realities from personal sin and rebellion against God, and from the dominating and destructive influence of the principalities and powers. To declare that all are oppressed because of man's sinful condition is wrongly motivated if the practice behind the concept reinforces the position of the oppressor. But the concept is true if it is understood that all people stand under God's judgment and are in need of God's forgiveness and deliverance from the suprahuman forces of evil.

Salvation cannot be equated with the emergence of a "new man" who has been set free from a particular social evil through the means of political struggle. Biblically understood, salvation begins with the restoration of man's relationship to God and the reconciliation brought about through the atoning death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. Christ has accomplished victory over the powers of evil and has secured ultimate judgment and justice. Christians are called to work for social justice in the certain hope that the living Lord Jesus will one day rule and reign. Until that day Christians are required to work for the liberation of the oppressed through the power and wisdom of the Spirit. D. D. WEBSTER

See also LIBERATION THEOLOGY; SOCIAL GOSPEL.

Bibliography. L. Boff, "Christ's Liberation via Oppression: An Attempt at Theological Construction from the Standpoint of Latin America," in Frontiers of Theology in Latin America, R. Gibellini, ed.; J. H. Cone, God of the Oppressed; T. Hanks, Oppression, Poverty and Liberation; C. F. H. Henry, God, Revelation, and Authority; S. Mott, Biblical Ethics and Social Change; W. Scott, Bring Forth Justice.

Opus Operatum. The term is used in connection with sacramental theology, particularly that of unreformed Christendom. With the cognate term ex opere operato, it sums up the view that the benefit of a sacrament avails "by virtue of the work wrought." As first given by Duns Scotus, it was meant to emphasize the grace of God without the deservings of inward goodness in the communicant, so long as no bar was placed within. Gabriel Biel developed the term to suggest the mechanical efficacy of sacraments by virtue of the proper liturgical action by celebrant and receiver. After the Council of Trent incorporated the term into Canon VIII De Sacramentis it became authoritative Roman Catholic doctrine. However, Cardinal Bellarmine, for example, accepted the need of faith and repentance instead of a purely passive attitude. Nevertheless, he added that it is "the external act called sacrament, and this is called opus operatum," which "actively, proximately, and instrumentally" affects the passive recipient; "it confers grace by virtue of the sacramental act itself, instituted by God for this purpose." This view thus rejects all suggestion of dependence not only on the minister (ex opere operantis) but also on the receiver. So much is grace and rite conjoined that the due administration of the latter must necessarily involve the former. G. J. C. MARCHANT

See also EX OPERE OPERATO; SACRAMENT.

Ordain, Ordination. These words come from the Latin ordinare meaning “to set in order,” “to arrange,” “to organize.” In later Latin they came to mean “to appoint to office.” The KJV uses the verb “to ordain” to render about thirty different Hebrew and Greek words, which shows that the English word has many different shades of meaning. Some of the more prominent of these meanings are discussed below.

Converted Israel will sing of the peace which the Lord will “ordain” for it (Isa. 26:12); the idea of “appoint” is in view. God has “ordained” the moon and stars (Ps. 8:3); these heavenly bodies were prepared by God for their work. The idea of arrangement is seen in connection with making one’s living by preaching the gospel; the Lord has thus “ordained” (1 Cor. 9:14). The king “ordained” or appointed a man (Arioch) to fulfill his dire words of judgment; he specified who was to lose his life. Paul told Titus to “ordain” or set down certain individuals to be elders in the church (Titus 1:5). The Lord “ordained” Jeremiah to be a prophet to the Gentile nations (Jer. 1:5); this meant he gave Jeremiah to the nations along with his ministry. Certain truths were set aside by the apostles and elders as essential to the faith; these “decrees” were ordained of God (Acts 16:4). God “ordained” a specific place for his people to dwell (1 Chron 17:9); that is, he reserved it exclusively for them. Jesus “ordained” twelve men to serve in special ways (Mark 3:14). He set them apart for a specific office and duties; he appointed them.

This sampling illustrates the theological meaning of “ordain” or “ordination.” The words have a close relationship with God’s word of election and predestination. It is impossible to talk about God’s sovereignty without talking about his preparation, his appointment, his choices, and even his predetermined ways. If God’s pretemporal selections, appointments, and plans are not seen, he becomes the servant of man and time, both of which he created in the first place. In such a view God is no longer God.

Scripture also speaks of man “ordaining” certain things. The creature “ordains” or appoints in a much different sense than God, the Creator, has done. He has “ordained” as the infinite, all-knowing God; man “ordains” in a very limited way.

There is a nontechnical sense in which local churches and sometimes denominations “ordain” those who minister among them. This is usually accompanied by the laying on of hands. Support is often found for this from the following: (1) God chose Aaron, his sons, and the whole tribe of Levi (Exod. 4:14–15; 28:41; 29:9; Judges 17:13). (2) Traditionally, group approval has thus been given. (3) The OT speaks of priests, Levites, prophets, and kings being set aside for their work in this way. (4) Christ called, appointed, and commissioned the twelve, though without formal ordination. (5) The apostles gave special recognition to the choice of Matthias to take the place of Judas Iscariot.

Both Paul and Barnabas were chosen and commissioned at Antioch (Acts 13:1–4). Timothy was told to appoint, set apart, others for the work of the ministry (1 Tim. 5:22).

The Roman Catholic and Orthodox churches regard ordination as a sacrament instituted by Christ and conferring grace upon the recipient. The ceremony of ordination as practiced by Rome was condemned by Calvin. Lutheran and Reformed confessions stress the need for the individual to be called of God, though these two bodies do practice ordination to the ministry. The Church of England and the Episcopal Church give great prominence to ordination, some of their number believing in apostolic succession.

Church bodies associated with what might be called the Free Church movement usually view ordination in a less rigid way and practice it simply as group approval upon the individual after he has been examined doctrinally. In these circles the ordination of an individual indicates the group’s approval of the individual and his doctrinal views, and accordingly promises prayer support and a base for accountability of the individual.

Churches or church bodies who ordain individuals are currently confronted with the question of whether or not they should ordain women. The answer to the question is determined by how the role of women in the local church is defined.

R. P. LIGHTNER

See also APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION; MINISTRY; ORDERS, HOLY; PREDESTINATION; WOMEN, ORDINATION OF.

Bibliography. D. M. Edwards, ISBE 4:2199–2200; C. S. Meyer, WBE 2:1252–53; J. Piper and W. Grudem, Recovering Biblical Manhood and Womanhood.

Order of Salvation. This phrase (Lat. ordo salutis) appears to have been brought into theological usage in 1737 by Jakob Karpov, a Lutheran. But the doctrine is of much greater antiquity. Necessarily, there is a wide divergence between the Roman Catholic and the Reformed view in this connection, for although they both agree that there can be no salvation apart from the work of Jesus Christ, the Roman Catholic Church teaches that it is the divinely appointed dispenser of saving grace through the sacraments, which, of themselves, convey grace to the recipients. The stages of Rome’s order of salvation may be taken as marked by its sacraments of (1) baptism, in which the soul is regenerated; (2) confirmation, in which baptized persons receive the gift of the Holy Ghost; (3) the Eucharist, in which they partake of the very body and blood of Christ in the transubstantiated wafer; (4) penance, by which the benefit of Christ’s death is applied to those who have fallen after baptism; and (5) extreme unction, which prepares the re-recipient for death and cleanses him from the remains of sin.

Order of Salvation

Luther's order of salvation consisted simply in repentance, faith, and good works; but the Lutheran order was elaborated by later theologians into something closely resembling the Reformed order. It rests, however, upon the assumption that Christ's death on the cross was intended to save all men and that grace is resistible.

The Reformed order of salvation may be found in outline in Calvin's Institutes of the Christian Religion, vol. 3; but again, this order has been further elaborated by later Reformed theologians. In the Reformed view the application of the redemption wrought by Christ on the cross is an activity of the Holy Spirit and is to be traced in a series of acts and processes until perfect blessedness is reached. The Reformed order may be taken as (1) effectual calling, issuing in (2) regeneration, (3) faith, leading to (4) justification, and (5) sanctification, ultimately resulting in (6) glorification. Some of these experiences are synchronous, however, and the stages in such cases must be regarded as of logical rather than of chronological sequence. G. N. M. COLLINS

See also ARMINIANISM; INFRALAPSARIANISM; SUPRALAPSARIANISM.

Bibliography. H. Kuiper, By Grace Alone; J. Murray, Redemption Accomplished and Applied.

Orders, Holy. Holy orders usually refers to the major orders of the ministry in an episcopal church. In the Anglican and the Orthodox churches these are the bishops, priests, and deacons. In the Roman Church, where the episcopate and the presbyterate are counted as one order, the three are bishop-priests, deacons, and subdeacons. The minor orders are not usually included in the term "holy orders," for they really refer to laymen set apart for special tasks rather than to clergy in the proper sense of the term. Admission to holy orders is by ordination, the important ceremony being the laying on of hands. It is this which distinguishes ordination to the major orders from that to the minor orders. In the former the minister of ordination is always the bishop (though certain exceptions appear to have occurred occasionally), but the minor orders may sometimes be conveyed by others.

Unlike Roman Catholics and the Orthodox, Anglicans do not officially regard ordination as a sacrament (though some Anglicans do in point of fact hold this view). The official formularies restrict sacraments to ordinances instituted by Christ. Since there is no conclusive evidence that he enjoined ordination, it is not properly a sacrament. It would naturally be expected that a man cannot receive orders outside the church; but, especially in the West, it is usually held that a validly consecrated bishop conveys valid orders, even though he be in heresy or schism. On this principle the Roman Church does not reordain those it receives from Orthodoxy. L. L. MORRIS

See also MAJOR ORDERS; ORDAIN, ORDINATION.

Orders, Major. See MAJOR ORDERS.

Ordination of Women. See WOMEN, ORDINATION OF.

Ordo Salutis. See ORDER OF SALVATION.

Origen (ca. 185–ca. 254). In his fusion of Greek thought with biblical exposition, Origen was the greatest theologian of the early Greek Church. The famed Catechetical School at Alexandria reached its zenith under his tutelage. The son of a martyr, he took Matthew 19:12 literally and castrated himself in order to instruct his female students without fear of scandal. At the request of a church sorely beset by a multiplicity of deviant doctrines, he traveled widely and defended the orthodox faith against pagans, Jews, and heretics. His Against Celsus, a response to a pagan treatise attacking Christianity, stands as a monument of Christian apologetic.

His Fundamental Doctrines sets forth Christian theology on a scale previously unknown to the church. He argued powerfully for the inspiration and authority of Scripture, though he valued allegorical and typological meanings above the literal sense. In his concern for biblical scholarship he produced the Hexapla, an edition of the OT with Hebrew text, Greek transliteration, and available Greek translations in parallel columns—a monumental work. He held that certain cardinal principles were clearly laid out in Scripture, while on other matters Christians were free to speculate. Among his speculations were the beliefs that souls who had erred in a former life were placed upon earth in a human body as part of a purifying process and that all beings, even the devil and his angels, would ultimately be reclaimed and restored by God's grace.

Origen affirmed God as Creator of all things, Christ as eternal Son and Word, and the Holy Spirit—each member distinct from the others yet together forming a unity. This Trinitarianism provided a basis for orthodox thinkers such as Athanasius, Jerome, and the Cappadocians. On the other hand, he sometimes spoke of the Son and Holy Spirit as subject to the Father, a view that led others into subordinationism and ultimately Arianism.

He died as a result of the Decian persecution. Though three centuries later, in 553, he was declared a heretic, Origen must chiefly be remembered for the power and understanding with which he developed, propounded, and defended the major doctrines of the Bible. C. C. KROEGER

See also SUBORDINATIONISM.

Bibliography. C. Bigg, Christian Platonists of Alexandria; H. Chadwick, Christianity and Classical Tradition; H. Crouzel, Origen; J. Daniélou, Origen; B. Drewery, Origen on the Doctrine of Grace; W. Fairweather, Origen and Greek Patristic Theology; R. M. Grant, Earliest Lives of Jesus; R. A. Greer, Origen; R. P. C. Hanson, Allegory and Event; Origen's Doctrine of Tradition; J. M. Rist, Eros and Psyche: Studies in Plato, Plotinus, and Origen; J. W. Trigg, Origen: The Bible and Philosophy in the Third-Century Church.

Original Righteousness. See RIGHTEOUSNESS, ORIGINAL.

Original Sin. See SIN.

Origin of Mankind. See EVOLUTION.

Origin of the Soul. See SOUL.

Origin of the Universe. Hebrews 11:3 tells us that the universe was created by God and implies that our full comprehension of this awesome event, or process, comes by faith.

If there are two laws accepted by all scientists, they are the first and second laws of thermodynamics. The first one states that neither energy nor matter can be created or destroyed, but that both are eternally existent in some form. The second may be stated as follows: in a closed system, disorder is always increasing. There are, or course, those who doubt the existence of a God who supernaturally created the universe. If there is no God, the first law of thermodynamics demands that the universe has always existed. But, by the second law, if the universe has always existed it would have become completely disordered, or run down, by now. Obviously this is not the case. Therefore naturalism leads to a dilemma. Either the laws of thermodynamics are not correct, or the universe is not a closed system. Although this dilemma is not always recognized, it is real. A common method of bypassing this dilemma is to propose that the universe began with a giant explosion. However, the "big bang" theory, whether it is correct or not, does not solve the dilemma. For the Christian there is no dilemma. The universe is not a closed system but has been acted on by an external God.

Another problem for naturalists is the question of contingency. Why are the laws of nature what they are? There is no rational explanation for them, no reason they could not have been something else, nothing for laws and physical constants to be contingent on. This is no problem for believers, who assume nature's laws and constants to be contingent upon the activity of a supernatural God, who has designed them for the good of his creation.

Belief in a timeless God, who created the universe from nothing, is certainly intellectually defensible as well as taught by Scripture. Some versions of the Bible interpret Genesis 1:1 as referring to the origin of the entire universe, but this interpretation is not certain. It may refer to the creation of the solar system, or the earth in a universe which had been created previously. Genesis 1:14-19 may mean that the universe at large, including the other bodies of the solar system, was created after the earth was. However, this interpretation is not required. It seems more likely that the events of the fourth day are described as if from the earth's surface and that the earth's cloud cover was parted for the first time on the fourth day to reveal heavenly bodies that had already been in existence since the first day, or because of previous creative acts.

Ephesians 1:19-20 speaks of the power of God at work in raising Christ from death. Such power is incomprehensible to scientists, economists, and energy experts, because it is power able not just to move something but to reverse time. No governmental agency or university in the world can turn a single fallen brown leaf, however small, into a live green one. But God raised the dead to life. In other words, God's power is somehow able to stop or reverse the effects of the second law of thermodynamics, preventing disorder from occurring or creating order out of disorder. This same divine power was used to create the universe from nothing, again going miraculously above and around this law. An amazing aspect of this concept, according to Ephesians 1:19-20, is that this same power, the power that created all things, is working now in Christians.

Since there is ambiguity about whether or not Genesis 1:1, 14-19 refers to the earth or to the entire universe, the role of the Trinity in the origin of the universe is not certain. However, it seems likely that each person of the Trinity played a role in that origin. Genesis 1:2 may refer to the Holy Spirit, and Genesis 1:26 probably refers to all three persons of the Trinity. Certainly the Son was involved as a creative agent (John 1:3-4, 10; Col. 1:15-17). Not only was he involved in the creation, but he continues to sustain it (Col. 1:17).

The Bible teaches that God is separate from, preexistent to, but intimately involved in, the universe he originated. M. LA BAR

See also CREATION, DOCTRINE OF.

Bibliography. R. E. D. Clark, Universe: Plan or Accident?; W. L. Craig, "Philosophical and Scientific Pointers to Creatio ex Nihilo," JASA 32:5-12; S. L. Jaki, Road of Science and the Ways to God; C. S. Lewis, Miracles; G. Mulfinger, "Examining the Cosmogonies: A Historical Review," in Why Not Creation?, W. E. Lammerts, ed.; D. Ratzsch, Battle of Beginnings; H. Ross, Creation and Time; Creator and the Cosmos; Fingerprint of God; F. Schaeffer, Genesis in Space and Time.

Orr, James (1844-1913). Noted Scottish theologian. Born in Glasgow, he graduated from Glasgow University as M.A. and then B.D. (1872). For the next twenty years he served as parish minister in the United Presbyterian Church. In 1891 he left his parish in Hawick to become professor of church history in the United Presbyterian Divinity Hall. He became professor of apologetics and dogmatics in the newly formed Trinity College of Glasgow in 1900, retaining this position until his death. An influential writer as well as lecturer, Orr won a prize for Sabbath: Scripturally and Practically Considered (1886). More famous was Christian View of God and the World (1893). In 1897 he gave two series of lectures in the United States (at Western and Auburn theological seminaries), which were later published as Progress of Dogma (his masterpiece) and Neglected Factors in the Study of the Early Progress of Christianity.

Orr had profound firsthand knowledge of modern German and British philosophy and theology. Like his colleagues George Adam Smith and James Denney he held a basic evangelical position but wished to restate the faith in interaction with modern trends in philosophy and theology. He accepted theistic evolution and endeavored to explain the development of Christian doctrine in terms of a divinely implanted law of continual progress. Over against the liberal German Adolf Harnack, who saw the development of dogma as an ultimate "Hellenization" and falsification of the original "simple gospel," Orr explained the advance of church doctrine as a natural, wholesome movement, following a divine logic according to which the church discovers more about the inner connections and implications of the living truth recorded in Scripture. Orr believed there was a parallel between the historical course of dogma and the scientific order of the textbooks on systematic theology. Thus textbooks (without knowing it) begin—as did doctrinal history—with apologetics, and develop—as did history—with the doctrine of God; then go to man, to the person of Christ, to salvation, and finally to eschatology. Hence, Orr theorized that by divine inner necessity the logical, systematic statement of theology is a reflection of its temporal development.

D. F. KELLY

Bibliography. T. Coke, "Reconsidering James Orr," Reformed Journal Vol. 12 (1980): 20–22; G. G. Scorgie, Call for Continuity: The Theological Contribution of James Orr; "James Orr," in HET, W. A. Elwell, ed., 12–25; A. P. F. Sell, Defending and Declaring the Faith: Some Scottish Examples 1860–1920; P. Toon, Development of Doctrine in the Church; "James Orr: Defender of the Faith," GM (Aug. 1972).

Orthodox Tradition. The theological tradition, generally associated with the national churches of the eastern Mediterranean and eastern Europe and principally with the Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople, whose distinguishing characteristic consists in preservation of the integrity of the doctrines taught by the fathers of the seven ecumenical councils of the fourth through eighth centuries. Through medieval times the churches of the Orthodox tradition were mainly Greek-speaking; in modern times they have been predominantly Slavic.

Nature of Orthodox Theology. The first two councils, Nicaea I (325) and Constantinople I (381), laid the foundation of Orthodox theology by their adoption of the statement known commonly as the Nicene Creed. This formula established the primary principle of Trinitarianism, declaring the substantial equality of God the Son with God the Father, specifically in refutation of Arianism.

The third council, Ephesus (431), rejected Nestorianism by affirming that in Christ divinity and humanity united in a single person, the Word made flesh. In its primary thrust this affirmation set the premise of Orthodox Christology; it also set the premise for the development of doctrine concerning Mary. In that the Christ was God incarnate, the Virgin was "Mother of God" (theotokos, "god-bearer"); she was not simply mother of an ordinary human. In consequence of this declaration, Orthodoxy expressed high regard for Mary, positing her perpetual virginity and sinless life while remaining skeptical of the later Catholic dogmas of the immaculate conception and assumption.

The next three councils, Chalcedon (451), Constantinople II (553), and Constantinople III (680), confronted the heresy of monophysitism in its evolving forms, further defining for Orthodoxy its Christology, which states that in the one person of Christ there are two entire natures, the human and the divine, including two wills.

The seventh council, Nicaea II (787), in the midst of the struggle over iconoclasm, defined the doctrine of images representing Christ and the saints, requiring that the faithful venerate, but not worship, them. In the aftermath of this council, whose decrees were not approved by the Roman papacy (although they did not conflict with Catholic teaching), the divergence of Orthodoxy from Western Christian theology became increasingly pronounced. In a special way painted icons became symbols of Orthodoxy, inasmuch as they were held to unite correct doctrine and correct worship—the twin meanings of the word—and this perception led to the designation of the final restoration of icons in Byzantine churches on the first Sunday of Lent in 843 as the "triumph of Orthodoxy." For Orthodoxy, the artistic image reiterated the truth that the invisible God had become visible in the incarnate Son of God who was the perfect image of God; the image channeled the presence of the person depicted to the one contemplating it, as the incarnate Word had brought God to man.

Since Nicaea II no genuinely ecumenical council has been possible, owing to the defection (in Orthodoxy's view) of the Roman See, and thus no new absolutely definitive declaration of Orthodox dogma has been possible. From this fact derives Orthodoxy's self-conscious identity as the church of the seven councils and its sense of mission in preserving the faith of the ancient fathers of the church. But Orthodox theology did not stagnate in subsequent centuries, as changing circumstances and developments in others' theologies challenged Orthodox thinkers to refine and restate their conceptions of the faith presupposed by the patristic decrees. Such formulations have acquired considerable authority by approvals enunciated in local councils or by long-term common consent within Orthodoxy, although they do not have the canonical authority of the ecumenical decrees, which Orthodoxy views to have been divinely inspired and therefore infallible. When a statement receives widespread acceptance among Orthodox churches, it acquires the status of "symbolic book."

The theological dimension of the schism with Western Catholicism rested primarily in Orthodoxy's rejection of Rome's claim that its bishop was the unique successor of Peter with the consequent prerogative to define dogma. While granting a certain primacy of honor to the papacy, Orthodoxy saw all right-teaching bishops as equally successors of Peter, from which derived the requirement that only genuinely ecumenical, episcopal councils possessed the power of binding the conscience of the faithful. Therefore Orthodoxy has resisted those doctrines that it views as Roman innovations.

The most celebrated point of controversy between Orthodoxy and Western theology arose over the insertion of the filioque clause into the Nicene Creed sometime after the eighth century. Besides rejecting this nonconciliar tempering with the decrees of the fathers, Orthodoxy saw in the assertion that the Holy Spirit "proceeds from the Father and the Son" the presupposition of two originating principles within the Godhead, negating the integrity of the Trinity. Most Orthodox thinkers could accept a formulation whereby the Spirit proceeds "from the Father through, or with, the Son," following the chief medieval Orthodox teacher, John of Damascus. But until an ecumenical council acted, this would remain merely "theological teaching" (theologoumena).

On the other doctrinal questions where Catholic innovations might be identified, Orthodoxy has been less firm in its denunciations than in the filioque issue. Regarding the state of persons after death, Orthodoxy rejects the notion of purgatory as a place distinct from heaven and hell. At the same time it concedes that there is an intermediate period of temporal pain in which penance for sins is carried out by those destined for heaven; moreover, full blessedness, even for saints, is not achieved until after Christ's final judgments. Prayers for the dead, therefore, can have efficacy. Following the Western resolution of the dogma of the real presence in the Eucharist, Orthodox writers adopted the literal translation of "transubstantiation" into Greek (metousiōsis). But in a distinction that had both theological and liturgical significance, Orthodoxy insisted that the miracle of transformation did not occur through the celebrant's enunciation of the words, "This is my body," but by the invocation of the Holy Spirit in the epiclesis: "Send the Holy Spirit . . . so as to make the bread to be the body of thy Christ." This difference signifies Orthodoxy's greater sensitivity to the Spirit than has generally been evident in the West.

Orthodoxy agreed with Catholicism in acknowledging seven sacraments while not insisting upon the absolute significance of the number. The two sacraments that were clearly evangelical, baptism and Communion, along with confirmation (called chrismation by Orthodoxy and administered immediately after baptism), occupied a higher place than the rest. Orthodox writers regularly criticized the West's failure to use immersion as the proper mode of baptism, although most acknowledged the validity of aspersion in the Triune name. The Orthodox baptize by triple immersion, baptizing both adults and infants. Orthodoxy's use of leavened bread in the Eucharist, instead of the unleavened wafers of the West, was mostly a liturgical matter, although it was given theological meaning by the explanation that the leaven signified evangelical joy in contrast to the "Mosaic" regime of Catholic practice.

Its doctrine of the church distinguishes Orthodoxy most clearly from all other theologies. According to this doctrine the visible church is the body of Christ, a communion of believers, headed by a bishop and united by the Eucharist, in which God dwells. As such, although individual members are fallible sinners, the church is held to be infallible. This true church by definition is the Orthodox Church, which is "one, holy, catholic, and apostolic," from which other churches are separated. That is, the church consists of those believers who remain in fellowship with, and submission to, the concert of historic patriarchates, Jerusalem, Antioch, Alexandria, Constantinople, and Rome. (When Rome separated from the concert, Moscow assumed membership in the pentarchy, although Rome's place remains reserved for it to resume if it will renounce its obstinacy.)

The infallibility of the church validates the authority of tradition on a par with that of Scripture. Moreover, tradition established both canon and interpretation of that Scripture and thus takes logical precedence over it. How to determine precisely what tradition teaches, however, remains a partially open question for Orthodoxy, since no single office is acknowledged to have definitive authority for the whole church, such as the papacy has for Roman Catholicism. In principle the church speaks authoritatively through episcopal councils; but this claim only moves the issue back one step because it raises the question of what validates meetings of bishops as genuine rather than “robber” councils (as the Council of Constantinople of 754 is regularly designated). In the end, Orthodoxy trusts that the Holy Spirit abides in the church and in his own mysterious way leads and preserves his people in all truth. This trust produces, in practice, a measure of freedom within what could otherwise be a stifling traditionalism.

Orthodox Tradition

History of Orthodox Theology. The history of Orthodoxy may be divided into two periods: Byzantine and modern. During the millennium of the Empire of Byzantium, to 1453, Orthodox theology matured in close association with it. Emperors convoked councils, after the example of Constantine I and the Nicene Council, and pronounced on theological matters, providing some weak basis for speaking of “caesaropapism” in the Byzantine age. In this period three distinctive emphases of Orthodoxy emerged: theology as apophaticism, knowledge as illumination, and salvation as deification.

Relying principally on the sixth century writer Dionysius the Pseudo-Areopagite, Orthodox writers insisted that God in his nature is beyond any understanding. Humans can know nothing about the being of God, and therefore all theological statements must be of a negative, or apophatic, form: God is unchanging, immovable, infinite, etc. Even a seemingly positive affirmation has only negative significance; for example, to say, “God is Spirit,” is actually to affirm his noncorporeality. Theology, then, is not a science of God, which is impossible, but of his revelation. That which is known is not necessarily true of God but is what God chooses to disclose, although in that sense it is indeed true knowledge.

Such a theology of negation led to the elevation of spiritual experience to at least an equal role with rationality as an epistemological principle in theology. Maximus Confessor, Orthodoxy’s chief twelfth century teacher, affirmed: “A perfect mind is one which, by true faith, in supreme ignorance knows the supremely unknowable one.” Knowledge of God comes from illumination, the inner vision of true light, for “God is light.” From this perception derived Orthodoxy’s characteristic fascination with the transfiguration of Jesus, when the light of his deity was supremely revealed to the apostles. It also fostered hesychasm, in which the mystic’s vision of divinity became a theologically significant enterprise. It is for this reason that what is called Orthodox theology is also designated with equal validity “Orthodox spirituality.” The chief synthesizer of this aspect of Orthodoxy was Gregory Palamas in the fourteenth century.

The Orthodox concept of salvation as deification undergirded the contemplative methodology implied in the illumination view. Only the “pure in heart” see God, and purity comes only by divine grace in the economy of redemption. Those who are redeemed through the incarnation, whom the NT designates “sons of God” and “partakers of the divine nature,” are deified; that is, they become created, in contrast to uncreated, gods. “God became man that we might be made God,” said Athanasius of Alexandria; and Maximus Confessor declared: “All that God is, except for an identity in nature, one becomes when one is deified by grace.” With this personalistic view of salvation, Orthodoxy diverged from the juridical emphasis inherited by the West through Augustine of Hippo, whom Orthodoxy could not comfortably accept as a Doctor of the Church. Orthodox theology viewed man as called to know God and share his life, to be saved, not by God’s external activity or by one’s understanding of propositional truths, but by being himself deified.

In sum, the Byzantine period established Orthodoxy’s greater mysticism, intuition, and corporatism in contrast to the West’s philosophical, scholastic, and forensic orientation.

In the period after 1453 the two events that most influenced the evolution of Orthodoxy were the fall of the Byzantine Empire and the division of Western Christianity. Termination of imperial patronage increased the autonomy of the episcopacy and promoted the Russian contribution to the Orthodox heritage; Reformation theology made it possible for Orthodoxy to select from several alternative expressions of Christian doctrine. To be sure, these developments tended to place Orthodoxy on the defensive and cast it in the role of respondent rather than actor, in which it frequently appeared to be the reactionary wing of Christendom. Nevertheless, that Orthodoxy’s vigor remained was evidenced in the writings of several theologians, and the ecumenism of the twentieth century has opened new possibilities for an Orthodox contribution to theology.

Melanchthon made the initial Protestant overture to Orthodoxy when he sent a Greek translation of the Augsburg Confession to Patriarch Joasaph of Constantinople, requesting that the latter find it a faithful rendition of Christian truth. His successor, Jeremiah, responded over twenty years later, condemning numerous Protestant “errors,” including justification by faith alone, sola Scriptura, rejection of icons and invocation of saints, Augustinian predestination, and filioque.

A quite different response to the Reformation came from the patriarch elected in 1620, Cyril Lucaris, who composed a confession that articulated an essentially Calvinist system. Cyril’s work proved to be an aberration in the history of Orthodoxy; it was formally condemned after his death in 1638 by a synod of Constantinople and by a patriarchal synod in Jerusalem thirty-four years later. But it elicited two important statements of Orthodox doctrine. In the first, Russian leadership appeared when Metropolitan Peter Mogila of Kiev composed his confession, a thorough refutation of Cyril's, in affirmation of the received body of Orthodoxy. Mogila's work was approved, with amendments, by the Eastern patriarchs in 1643. The second was the confession of Patriarch Dositheos of Jerusalem, approved by the synod of 1672.

These two documents remained the standard definition of Orthodoxy in the modern period. They aligned Orthodoxy with the Catholic side in most of its chief doctrinal disputes with Reformed theology, e.g., the relation of tradition to Scripture, veneration of saints and images, number and meaning of sacraments, faith and works in salvation. On only two questions did they sympathize with Protestants: papal authority and canon of Scripture. Orthodoxy continued to resist both Protestants and Catholics in their mutual agreement on filioque and the Augustinian understanding of original sin. Orthodoxy rejects original sin; man is born mortal and therefore sins, instead of the other way around, as the West commonly states the matter.

But the significance of Orthodoxy's agreements with either Catholicism or Protestantism was more apparent than real inasmuch as the respective principles of authority differed fundamentally. For Orthodoxy, dogmatic authority remained rooted in the community of the church, represented by the episcopal succession from the apostles, not in the supremacy of the papacy nor in evangelical exegesis of Scripture, both of which to the Orthodox mind represented the domination of rationalism, legalism, and individualism over the true believing and worshiping fellowship of the faithful. To designate this community principle modern Russian theologians provided the definitive, but untranslatable, word sobornost' (approximately, "communion"). "Sobornost' is the soul of Orthodoxy," declared the nineteenth-century lay theologian Alexis Khomiakov.

After the middle of the nineteenth century the most creative developments within Orthodoxy came from Russian writers, such as Vladimir Solov'yev, Nikolai Berdyaev, Sergei Bulgakov, and Georges Florvosky, and from professors of the Russian seminaries in Paris and New York, notably Alexander Schmemmann and John Meyendorff. Their work is too recent for it to be incorporated into the essence of Orthodoxy, but it testifies to the continuing vitality of the tradition. These men have, each in his own way, worked actively for the reunification of Christendom. The burden of their ecumenical testimony has been that genuine unity can be achieved not on the basis of the least common denominator among Christian churches but in agreement upon the totality of the common tradition contained in the ecumenical councils and authentically preserved only by Orthodoxy. P. D. STEEVES

See also BERDYAEV, NICKOLAI ALEKSANDROVICH; CONSTANTINOPLE, FIRST COUNCIL OF; DIONYSIUS THE

PSEUDO-AREOPAGITE; EPHEBUS, COUNCIL OF; FILIOQUE; FLOROVSKY, GEORGES; HESYCHASM; IMAGES, VENERATION OF; MYSTICISM; NICEA, COUNCIL OF; PHILOKALIA; SIMEON THE NEW THEOLOGIAN; THEOSIS.

Bibliography. John of Damascus, Writings; V. Lossky, Mystical Theology of the Eastern Church; G. Maloney, History of Orthodox Theology since 1453; J. Meyendorff, Byzantine Theology; Orthodox Church: Its Past and Its Role Today; J. Pelikan, Christian Tradition; Seven Ecumenical Councils of the Undivided Church; Spirit of Eastern Christendom; P. Schaff, ed., Creeks of Christendom; A. Schmemmann, Historical Road of Eastern Orthodoxy; K. Ware, Orthodox Way; N. Zernov, Eastern Christendom.

Orthodoxy. The English equivalent of Greek orthodoxia (from orthos, "right," and doxa, "opinion"), meaning right belief, as opposed to heresy or heterodoxy. The term is not biblical; no secular or Christian writer uses it before the second century, though the verb orthodoxein is in Aristotle (Nicomachean Ethics 1151a19). The word expresses the idea that certain statements accurately embody the revealed truth content of Christianity and are therefore in their own nature normative for the universal church. This idea is rooted in the NT insistence that the gospel has a specific factual and theological content (1 Cor. 15:1–11; Gal. 1:6–9; 1 Tim. 6:3; 2 Tim. 4:3–4; etc.), and that no fellowship exists between those who accept the apostolic standard of christological teaching and those who deny it (1 John 4:1–3; 2 John 7–11).

The idea of orthodoxy became important in the church in and after the second century, through conflict first with Gnosticism and then with other trinitarian and christological errors. The preservation of Christianity was seen to require the maintenance of orthodoxy in these matters. Strict acceptance of the "rule of faith" (regula fidei) was demanded as a condition of communion, and creeds explicating this "rule" were multiplied.

The Eastern church styles itself "orthodox," and condemns the Western church as heterodox for (among other things) including the filioque clause in its creed.

Seventeenth-century Protestant theologians, especially conservative Lutherans, stressed the importance of orthodoxy in relation to the soteriology of the Reformation creeds. Liberal Protestantism naturally regards any quest for orthodoxy as misguided and deadening. J. I. PACKER

See also HERESY; SCHISM.

Bibliography. R. M. Bowman, Orthodoxy and Heresy; G. K. Chesterton, Orthodoxy; H. E. W. Turner, Pattern of Christian Faith.

Osiander, Andreas (1498–1552). German theologian and Reformer, follower of Martin Luther. Osiander was ordained a Roman Catholic priest at Eichstätt in 1520. Within two years he had embraced Lutheranism, attending the Marburg Colloquy of 1529 and the Augsburg Diet of 1530, and signing the Smalcald Articles of 1537. His niece, Margaret Osiander, became the wife of English reformer Thomas Cranmer. A biblical scholar, Osiander prepared a revised version of the Vulgate and a harmony of the four Gospels. By the midsixteenth century he was caught up in controversy. In 1548 Emperor Charles V proclaimed as imperial law the Augsburg Interim, a document prepared by theologians of various religious backgrounds and intended to facilitate cooperation between Protestants and Roman Catholics until a national church council could settle "the religious question." Osiander's refusal to consent to the Augsburg Interim caused his removal as preacher and reformer in Nürnberg. Then he became a professor of theology at the newly founded University of Königsberg in Prussia and afterward was appointed vice president of the bishopric of Samland.

His work De Justificatione, published in 1550, involved Osiander in disputes over the nature of justification. This "Osiandrian controversy" needs to be seen in the broader context of Lutheran church life in this period. Following the death of Martin Luther the Lutherans had divided over several issues. Two parties appeared: the Philippists (followers of Philip Melancthon) and the Gnesio-Lutherans (followers of Matthias Flacius). The adiaphoristic controversy was occasioned by the Augsburg Interim and Melancthon's willingness to make concessions in what he felt to be adiaphora ("neutral areas"), such as episcopacy and the ceremonies of the Mass. Gnesio-Lutherans denied that there were adiaphora. Then came the Majoristic controversy, when Georg Major maintained that good works were essential to salvation. This led to the antinomian controversy (over the role of the law in the believer's life), the synergistic controversy (over the role of the will in salvation), and the sacramentarian controversy (over the mode of Christ's presence in the Lord's Supper). Into this context came the Osiandrian controversy, over the doctrine of justification. Osiander wrote of the orthodox Lutherans: "They teach [doctrines] colder than ice, that we are accounted righteous only on account of the remission of sins, and not also on account of the righteousness of the Christ dwelling in us by faith. God is not indeed so unjust as to regard him as righteous in whom there is really nothing of true righteousness." For Osiander the justification of the sinner was not simply an imputation of Christ's righteousness through a forensic declaration of innocence; it was an actual impartation of righteousness through the "indwelling" of Christ in the believer. Justification becomes renovation, Christ living within "to recall the dead to life." This position, neither Roman Catholic nor Philippist nor Gnesio-Lutheran, caused Osiander's condemnation. Duke Albert of Prussia executed Osiander in 1552 before a psalm-singing crowd, and in 1556 Osiandrians were banned from Prussia.

C. G. FRY

See also ADIAPHORA, ADIAPHORISTS; ANTINOMINISM; IMPUTATION; MAJORISTIC CONTROVERSY; SYNERGISM.

Bibliography. W. D. Allbeck, Studies in the Lutheran Confessions; R. Seeberg, Textbook of the History of Doctrines; D. Steinmetz, Reformers in the Wings.

Osterwald, Jean Frederic (1663–1747). Swiss pietist preacher who so revived the church at Neuchâtel that his influence spread to Geneva and thence to England, France, and the Netherlands. Osterwald's strength was his ability to teach a vibrant Christianity. He first attracted notice through his effective catechetical instruction of children. His sermons also were primarily a means to teach revival of the church through the cultivation of personal piety and the denunciation of doctrinal disputes. He was such an effective teacher of this view that his sermons were very popular.

Osterwald believed, with the Germany pietists, that Christianity had become especially vulnerable to atheistical attacks and doctrinal wrangling due to a lack of piety. In 1699 he published a book based on his sermons entitled Treatise Concerning the Causes of the Present Corruption of Christians and the Remedies Thereof. It was so popular that it was republished in England. This book has value for at least three reasons. First, it is a systematic examination of those forces which destroy Christian piety. The book is divided into the study of nine personal and seven external causes for the decline of Christian piety. Each cause is further analyzed into its several parts. Thus it offers a clear analysis that is still useful today. Second, the book is valuable as a compendium of excuses raised by Christians to avoid piety and offers effective answers to those excuses. It is therefore a useful handbook for the pietist who would like to revive his own church. Finally, the book offers a perspective on Christian attitudes of Osterwald's day. He regarded Anabaptists and Quakers as fanatics who were not sufficiently pious. His remedy for notorious sinners in the church, such as drunkards, was to excommunicate them.

J. E. MENNELL

Otto, Rudolf (1869–1937). German theologian and student of world religions whose work has had considerable influence in the middle and late twentieth century. Otto was born at Peine, near Hanover. He was educated at Erlangen and Göttingen, and in his mature years taught theology at Göttingen, Breslau, and Marburg.

He was a scholar who possessed a broad knowledge of comparative religion, Oriental thought, and the natural sciences. His knowledge of Oriental religion was enhanced by considerable travel in the East. Otto's interests were not merely scholarly, however. He was a committed churchman who believed that there was much room for improvement in the public worship experiences of Lutheran people. Part of the motivation for his scholarly work, therefore, was a concern for the worship experiences of the Lutheran Church. This emphasis on the experience of public worship was only one expression of Otto's wider interest in understanding the basic experience that underlies religious belief and commitment.

This concern and interest led to the research which culminated in Das Heilige (1917: ET Idea of the Holy), which was his major work and which was hailed as one of the classics of religious psychology. The book went through fourteen German editions and was translated into several other languages. This work attempts to understand and explain those uncommon but very real moments when the soul is captured by an "ineffable Something." This dramatic religious experience is both nonrational and universal—we all encounter it at some time. Otto's claim is that this experience is the innermost core of all religions.

The claim that this experience is nonrational should not be misunderstood; Otto was aware of the important place of reason in religion. This is seen in the full title of the book: Idea of the Holy: An Inquiry into the Nonrational Factor in the Idea of the Divine and Its Relation to the Rational. It is also seen in the fact that he often referred to the rational and the nonrational as the "warp and woof" of religion. It was his conviction, however, that the theologians of his day had so overemphasized the place of reason in religion that a proper understanding of its nonrational aspect had been lost. Idea of the Holy was his attempt to uncover the hidden nonrational experience that lay at the heart of all true religion.

This experience is difficult to define; it is perhaps best expressed as the sense of the Holy, although this too is inadequate. It is inadequate because this experience includes a clear "overplus of meaning," which he associates with the term "numinous," which in turn relates to an awareness of an object, a nonrational apprehension of a presence "out there." It is the awareness of something totally beyond our rational facilities, yet it is certainly "there." Man responds with humility and worship, since he is in the presence of the Holy. This experience, says Otto, is prior to all other religious phenomena. Otto's other works include Mysticism East and West, Philosophy of Religion, Religious Essays, Supplement to "The Idea of the Holy", and Science and Religion.

J. D. SPICELAND

See also MYSTICISM; NUMINOUS, THE.

Bibliography. P. C. Almond, Mystical Experience and Religious Doctrine; Rudolf Otto: An Introduction to His Philosophical Theology; R. F. Davidson, Rudolf Otto's Interpretation of Religion; B. E. Meland, HCT 169–91; E. L. Miller, God and Reason; J. M. Moore, Theories of Religious Experience, with Special Reference to James, Otto, and Bergson; N. Smart, Philosophers and Religious Truth.

Overseer. The Greek word for "overseer," episkopos, was used in both religious and secular literature to describe one, divine or human, who watched over others for their good. Jesus is so described in 1 Peter 2:25, where the concept of oversight is linked with that of shepherding. The same connection appears in Acts 20:28, addressed to the Ephesian elders. The fact that the episkopoi are here called both shepherds and elders (presbyteroi) suggests an identity between elder, pastor, and overseer. Episkopoi is used in Philippians 1:1 instead of presbyteroi, along with diakonoi (deacons). In Titus 1:5–9 the same group is called both presbyteroi and episkopoi (cf. 1 Tim. 3:1–7). Episkopos came to be used of an officer of increasingly greater responsibility and dignity, and particularly of the bishop who cared for several congregations and their ministers.

W. L. LIEFELD

See also BISHOP; ELDER; ORDAIN, ORDINATION.

Owen, John (1616–1683). Puritan theologian committed to the congregational way of church government. Educated at Queen's College, Oxford, he became sympathetic to the cause of Puritanism within the Established Church. After his ordination he saw himself first as a Presbyterian Puritan, but after careful study he adopted the congregational way and became its chief exponent for the rest of his life. He was a parish minister at Fordham and then Coggeshall in Essex from 1643 to 1651. During this period he accompanied Cromwell with the armies of Parliament first to Scotland and then to Ireland. In 1651 he was appointed dean of Christ Church, Oxford, a position which allowed him to seek to train godly and learned ministers for the Cromwellian state church, of which he was the senior architect. He added to this duty that of the vice-chancellorship of the university from 1652 to 1657. The 1650s saw Owen very influential not only at Oxford but also in matters of state in London. His commitment to congregational church government is seen in the part he played in the writing of the Savoy Declaration of Faith and Order (1658). With the change of political and religious direction in England in 1660, Owen was ejected from Christ Church and became a Nonconformist. He felt unable to minister within the national church, for he rejected not only episcopacy but also the idea of a written liturgy. For the next twenty years he was a leader of English Nonconformity and a pastor of a congregational church in London.

He is remembered today not primarily because of his important career as an educator and statesman but because of his theological writings, which were numerous and spread over forty years. He wrote on the major themes of high Calvinism (particular redemption, divine election, etc.), of traditional Catholic orthodoxy (trinitarianism and Christology), of church polity, and of the pursuit of holiness. While he has great depth and insight as a writer; his style is heavy and his thoughts are complex. P. TOON

Owen, John

See also CALVINISM; PURITANISM.

Bibliography. P. Toon, ed., Correspondence of Dr. John Owen; A. C. Clifford, Atonement and Justification: English Evangelical Theology 1640–1790; D. M. Everson, Puritan Theology of John Owen; J. I. Packer, Among God's Giants; P. Toon, God's Statesman: The Life of Dr. John Owen.

Oxford Group Movement. See MORAL REARMAMENT.

Oxford Movement. An important religious development within the Church of England in the nineteenth century in response to the critical rationalism, skepticism, lethargy, liberalism, and immorality of the day. Emphasizing a return to the traditions of the church, the leaders of the movement longed for a higher standard of worship, piety, and devotion among clergy and church members.

Guided by and receiving its impetus from Oxford University men, the movement also protested state interference in the affairs of the church. On July 14, 1833, in response to the English government's bill reducing bishoprics in Ireland, John Keble preached the sermon "National Apostasy" from the university pulpit. He accused the government of infringing on "Christ's Church" and of disavowing the principle of apostolic succession of the bishops of the Church of England. Insisting that salvation was possible only through the sacraments, Keble defended the Church of England as a divine institution. During the same year John Henry Newman began to publish Tracts for the Times, a series of pamphlets by members of the University of Oxford that supported and propagated the beliefs of the movement. They were widely circulated, and the term "Tractarianism" has often been used for the early stages of the Oxford Movement or, indeed, as a synonym for the movement itself.

It is ironic that these tracts (which were supposed to argue "against Popery and Dissent") would lead some of the writers and readers into embracing the Roman Catholic Church. These men found it increasingly impossible to adhere to church polity and practice on Protestant terms. When Newman argued in Tract 90 (1841) that the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England were in harmony with genuine Roman Catholicism, he was attacked with such furor that the series of tracts was brought to an end. Early in 1845, realizing that they would never be allowed to be Anglicans while holding Roman Catholic views, several Oxford reformers joined the Roman Catholic Church. Newman defected later that year, and by 1864 nearly one thousand ministers, theological leaders, and Anglican church members had followed his lead. In 1864 Newman's Apologia pro Vita Sua was published, explaining his departure from the Church of England and defending his choice of the Roman Church as the one true church. Newman was made a Roman Catholic cardinal in 1879.

After the defections in 1845 the movement was no longer dominated by Oxford men and became more fragmented in its emphases. Edward B. Pusey, professor of Hebrew at Oxford and a contributor to Tracts, emerged as the leader of the Anglo-Catholic party, which continued to push for doctrinal modifications and a reunion between the Anglican and Roman churches. Other groups sought to promote High Church ritual within Anglicanism. Many of the sympathizers the Oxford Movement had gained at its inception (before anti-Reformation tendencies were observed) continued to uphold the primary goals and spiritual fervor of the movement. This has had a great influence upon the theological development, polity, and religious life of the Church of England for over a century. Anglican eucharistic worship was transformed, spiritual discipline and monastic orders were revived, social concern was fostered, and an ecumenical spirit has developed in the Church of England.

While the Oxford Movement was opposed in print by traditional churchmen as well as liberal academic thinkers, perhaps no one group matched the evangelicals in their enormous output of literature—printed sermons, tracts, articles, books, and pamphlets against the Tractarians. These dissenting "peculiar," as some Oxford reformers called them, believed that the Oxford "heresy" was both anti-Reformation and antiscriptural. They fought to ensure that the English church would maintain the Protestant character of its theology. And yet even evangelical writers in England at the end of the nineteenth century noted that the Oxford Movement also brought positive contributions to English Christianity—contributions that could not be disregarded. D. A. RAUSCH

See also ANGLO-CATHOLICISM; KEBLE, JOHN; NEWMAN, JOHN HENRY; PUSEY, EDWARD BOUVERIE.

Bibliography. J. Carrick, Evangelicals and the Oxford Movement; O. Chadwick, Spirit of the Oxford Movement: Tractarian Essays; O. Chadwick, ed., Mind of the Oxford Movement; R. W. Church, Oxford Movement, 1833–1845; T. Dearing, Wesleyan and Tractarian Worship; E. Fairweather, ed., Oxford Movement; J. R. Griffin, John Keble, Saint of Anglicanism; G. Rowell, ed., Tradition Renewed: The Oxford Movement Conference Papers; P. Toon, Evangelical Theology, 1833–1856: A Response to Tractarianism.

Pp

Pacifism. A term, derived from the Latin word for peacemaking, that has been applied to a spectrum of positions covering nearly all attitudes toward war. On one extreme pacifist designates any person who desires peace, thus describing those who wage war as much as those who refuse participation in war. On the other extreme pacifism also describes renunciation of force and coercion in all forms. A mediating definition sometimes distinguishes nonresistance, which renounces force in all forms, from pacifism, which rejects participation in war but allows the use of nonviolent kinds of force such as sanctions. It makes most sense to reserve the term “pacifism” for that part of the spectrum which includes at least a refusal to participate in war. Those individuals who refuse to do this are called conscientious objectors.

History. Pacifism is one of three historic attitudes of the church toward war. In some form it has existed throughout the entire history of the Christian church. Since the fourth century it has often been overshadowed by the just war theory and the concept of crusade, or aggressive war for a holy cause. The early church was pacifist. Prior to A.D. 170–80 there are no records of Christian soldiers in the Roman army. Following that epoch there are both Christians in the army and also writings which opposed the practice from church fathers such as Tertullian. Some Christian writers sanctioned police functions and military service, provided these did not entail bloodshed and killing. Under Emperor Constantine, who closely identified the interests of the empire with the interests of Christianity, Christian soldiers were common. During the rule of Theodosius II only Christians could serve as soldiers. When confronted by the barbarian invasions that seemed to threaten Roman civilization and thus the Christianity identified with it, Augustine of Hippo developed the idea, rooted in Roman Stoic philosophy and first given a Christian formulation by Ambrose, that has come to be called the just war theory. It intended not to advocate war but to limit the conditions under which Christians could participate in war, accepting it as an unfortunately necessary tool for preserving the civilization to which Christianity belonged.

Since Augustine some form of the just war theory has been the majority position of most Christian traditions.

In the Middle Ages, the idea of the crusade developed from another attempt by the church to limit warfare. The peace of God and the truce of God limited times for fighting and banned clerical participation in war. To enforce these limitations the church itself came to conduct warring activity. This act associated war with a holy cause, namely the enforcement of peace. This association developed into the crusades, the holy cause of rescuing the Holy Land from the Moslems. Pope Urban II preached the first crusade in 1095. In either religious or secular versions the crusade has been a part of the church's tradition ever since.

During the Middle Ages it was the sectarians who kept alive the pacifist tradition. Groups of Waldensians and Franciscan Tertiaries refused military service. The Cathari were pacifist. The Hussite movement developed two branches, a crusading one under blind general Jan Zizka and a pacifist one under Peter Chelciky.

The period of the Renaissance and Reformation saw assertions of all three attitudes toward war. Renaissance humanism developed a pacifist impulse, of which Erasmus is one of the most important examples. Humanist pacifism appealed to such philosophical and theological principles as the common humanity and brotherhood of all persons as children of God, the follies of war, and the ability of rational individuals to govern themselves and their states on the basis of reason.

All Protestant churches except the Anabaptists accepted the inherited tradition of the just war. Luther identified two realms—that of God and that of the world. While he rejected the idea of crusade, his respect for the state as ordained by God to preserve order and to punish evil in the worldly realm made him a firm supporter of the just war approach. The Reformed tradition accepted the crusade concept, seeing the state not only as the preserver of order but also as a means of furthering the cause of true religion. Zwingli died in a religious war; Calvin left the door open to rebellion against an unjust ruler; and Beza developed not only the right but the duty of Christians to revolt against tyranny. Cromwell's pronouncement of divine blessing on the massacre of Catholics at Drogheda illustrates the crusade idea in English Puritanism.

Pacifism

Alongside the wars of religion of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries arose the pacifist traditions, which for the most part have preserved their opposition to war until the present time. While a number of early Anabaptists were not pacifists, an apolitical pacifism became a defining characteristic of the Anabaptism which survived to become an ongoing tradition. Although their identification of two realms paralleled Luther's analysis closely, the Anabaptists denied that Christians could engage in political life or wield the sword either in war or as a magistrate in the worldly realm. When Alexander Mack organized the Church of the Brethren in 1708, Anabaptism was the major impulse in dialectic with pietism. While Quakers, who emerged in the midseventeenth century, distinguished the kingdom of God from that of the world, they did not utterly despair of the world and involved themselves in its political processes up to the point of war. Appeals to individual conscience played an important role in Quaker nonviolent political activity on behalf of justice and peace. Anabaptists, the immediate predecessors of the Mennonites, were the most withdrawn from participation in government, with the Quakers the least separated. The Brethren occupied a median position.

Wars in North America, from Puritan conflicts with the Indians through the Revolutionary War to the World Wars, have all been defended in religious and secular versions of the just war theory or the crusade idea. For example, World War I, fought "to make the world safe for democracy," was a secular crusade. Throughout the North American experience Mennonites, Brethren, and Quakers maintained a continuing if at times uneven witness against war as well as a refusal to participate in it. In the twentieth century they have come to be called the historic peace churches.

The nineteenth century saw the formation of a number of national and international pacifist societies. The Fellowship of Reconciliation was founded as an interdenominational and international religious pacifist organization on the eve of World War I and established in the United States in 1915. It continues today as an interfaith activist force for peace. In reaction to the horror of World War I and buttressed by an optimistic belief in the rationality of humanity, the period between the World Wars saw another wave of pacifist sentiment, both inside and outside the churches. These efforts to create peace included political means such as the League of Nations and nonviolent pressure such as the activities of Mohandas Gandhi to influence British withdrawal from India. Spurred by the growing possibility of a nuclear holocaust and the realization that military solutions do not fundamentally resolve conflicts, the era begun in the late 1960s is experiencing another round of increasing attention to pacifist perspectives. In addition to the historic peace churches, denominations which have traditionally accepted the just war theory or the crusade idea have also issued declarations accepting pacifist positions within their traditions. Two significant examples are Vatican II's Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, which for the first time endorsed pacifism as compatible with Catholic teaching, and the declaration of the United Presbyterian Church (USA), Peacemaking: The Believer's Calling.

Intellectual Basis for Pacifism. Pacifism encompasses many kinds of oppositions to war, deriving support from a variety of overlapping philosophical, theological, and biblical sources, not all of which are explicitly Christian.

Pacifism may proceed from various pragmatic and utilitarian arguments. Consideration of the destructiveness of modern warfare and the realization that it fails to resolve conflicts can lead to the conclusion that avoidance of war best serves the interests of humanity at all levels, from the individual person to the human race as a whole. The threat of nuclear war has given these arguments particular weight in recent times, resulting in what has been called nuclear pacifism.

Varying individual and collective impulses may support these arguments. Pacifism can appear as the only logical extension of the categorical imperative. Convictions concerning the uniqueness or sanctity of human life, whether based on intuition, logic, or divine revelation, proscribe war. Others may adopt pacifist suffering not only as a means of unilaterally breaking the chain of violence which more violent acts will only prolong but also as an instrument to touch the conscience of the oppressors and turn them into friends.

Pacifism informs or is an outgrowth of a number of social and political strategies. Some argue that political measures such as the negotiation of nuclear weapons bans and promotion of international cooperation are more effective than war in promoting peace. Nonviolent techniques attempt not only to prevent the outbreak of violence but also to move society—even against its will—toward a more just disposition. Notable examples are the efforts of Gandhi and the movement of Martin Luther King Jr. in the United States to acquire civil rights for black people.

As the dominant view of the early church pacifism stands squarely within the Christian tradition and has theological and biblical bases more specific to Christianity. Pacifists appeal to the authority of the Bible, using texts such as the Decalogue and the Sermon on the Mount. The incarnation and the priestly office of Jesus make his specific teachings authoritative and therefore binding on his followers. Pacifism also finds support in broader biblical injunctions such as the call to express God's love to all persons or to witness to the presence of the kingdom of God on earth.

The examples of Jesus and of the early church also support Christian pacifism. The incarnation defines Jesus' actions as reflective of the will of God. The ideas of imitation of Christ and obedience to his command to "follow me" then demand pacifism of those who understand Christians as followers of Jesus. Following includes specifically the idea that with Jesus they will endure suffering for the kingdom of God without violent resistance. Beginning with the generation that experienced Jesus' personal headship, the church of the first century exemplifies obedience to the pacifist example of Jesus.

Theological motifs central to Christianity also support pacifism. For one, since life is sacred and a gift from God, no individual has the right to take it. This divine source of life leads directly to the brotherhood of all persons and their divinely given purpose of living for God as his children. With every human being then either actually or potentially a child of God, no Christian may take the life of a fellow member of the family of God. The presence of the kingdom of God on earth similarly links all persons under God's rule and therefore proscribes violence toward anyone.

J. D. WEAVER

See also WAR.

Bibliography. R. H. Bainton, Christian Attitudes toward War and Peace; P. Brock, Pacifism in the United States; L. S. Cahill, Love Your Enemies: Discipleship, Pacifism and Just War Theory; R. G. Clouse, ed., War: Four Christian Views; J. G. Davies, Christians, Politics and Violent Revolution; J. Dear, God of Peace: Toward a Theology of Nonviolence; V. Eller, War and Peace from Genesis to Revelation; J. Ellul, Violence: Reflections from a Christian Perspective; J. Ferguson, Politics of Love; E. Guinan, ed., Peace and Nonviolence; G. R. Hershberger, War, Peace, and Nonresistance; A. F. Holmes, ed., War and Christian Ethics; J. M. Hornus, It Is Not Lawful for Me to Fight; J. Lassere, War and the Gospel; M. C. Lind, Yahweh Is a Warrior; G. H. C. Macgregor, New Testament Basis of Pacifism; P. Mayer, ed., Pacifist Conscience; R. McSorley, New Testament Basis of Peace Making; W. R. Miller, Non-Violence: A Christian Inter- pretation; G. Nuttall, Christian Pacifism in History; C. G. Rutenber, Dagger and the Cross; G. Sharp, Exploring Nonviolent Alternatives; Politics of Nonviolent Action; R. J. Sider, Christ and Violence; W. M. Swartley, ed., Love of Enemy and Nonretaliation in the New Testament; J. C. Wenger, Pacifism and Biblical Nonresistance; J. H. Yoder, Nevertheless: Varieties of Religious Pacifism; Original Revolution; Politics of Jesus; What Would You Do?; P. B. Yoder, Shalom: The Bible's Word for Salvation, Justice and Peace; P. B. Yoder and W. M. Swartley, eds., Meaning of Peace: Biblical Studies.

Packer, James Innell (b. 1926). Evangelical Anglican theologian. Born in Gloucester, England, he was raised in a nominal Anglican home, but came to personal faith as an undergraduate at Oxford. His experiences there made a lasting impact upon him, for his intellectual powers blossomed (B.A. 1948, D. Phil. 1954), he was ordained in the Church of England (1954), and he discovered the Puritans. What followed were a wide range of posts at Tyndale Hall, Oxford, and Trinity College (Bristol), as well as a stream of books, articles, and pamphlets. In 1979 he left England for Regent College in Vancouver, B.C., where he continues to have worldwide impact as one of the foremost evangelical theologians of today.

Packer's contribution is marked by basically three factors. His early encounter with the Puritans, particularly Richard Baxter and John Owen, influenced him toward his Reformed perspective. He evidenced this in his first works with an unequivocal commitment to the absolute authority and inerrancy of the Scriptures and to a high view of God as personal and absolutely sovereign. A richly informed historical perspective lends a balance and saneness to his conclusions as well. Finally, Packer is unequivocally evangelical. Knowing God personally through the person and work of Jesus Christ is a hallmark of his labors.

Throughout his life, he has faced several controversies and addressed a variety of prickly theological issues. Through it all he has prosecuted his convictions, whether through his pen or as an active participant in transdenominational councils and interfaith dialogues, with a charitable spirit, avoiding sectarian extremes. At the same time he has addressed popular and academic concerns with clarity, simplicity, and profundity without abandoning scholarship. J. MITCHELL JR.

See also EVANGELICALISM.

Bibliography. C. Catherwood, Five Evangelical Leaders; J. D. Douglas, ed., Twentieth-Century Dictionary of Christian Biography; R. Nicole, HET 379–87.

Paedobaptism. See BAPTISM, INFANT.

Pain

Pain. A series of concepts surround the biblical teaching on pain. The term itself is used most often in Scripture to refer to a physical sensation of ill feeling. It can be used to denote emotional or mental stress as well. A related term designating such concepts is “anguish.” While pain and anguish are portrayed in Scripture as the physical and emotional effects one experiences, affliction, tribulation, and trouble appear as the causes of such pain and anguish. Scripture is rich in its teaching on the subject of pain, and the biblical data concerning pain can be organized around three major topics: (1) the biblical words for pain, anguish, and affliction; (2) the biblical usage of such terms; and (3) the biblical teaching concerning the purposes of such pain and affliction.

Throughout Scripture there are ten basic words for “pain.” The OT words are hēbel (pang, Isa. 66:7), hīl (writhing, pain, Ps. 48:6), halḥālā (great pain, Isa. 21:3), kē’ēb (pain, Jer. 15:18), mak’ōb (pain, sorrow, Job 33:19), mēšar (straitness, distress, Ps. 116:3), ’ānāl (labor, Ps. 25:18), and šūr (pain, pang, 1 Sam. 4:19). The NT uses two basic words for pain, ponos (labor, Rev. 16:10–11) and ōdīn (pang, Acts 2:24). In verbal forms there is also variety in biblical usage of the terms for pain. For example, the OT uses hūl, hīl (to be pained, to writhe) in such passages as Isaiah 13:8 and Micah 4:10. Kā’ab is also used in Job 14:22 to refer to having pain or being in pain. Finally, hālā is used in Jeremiah 12:13 to mean “to become sick, grieved, pained.” In the NT basanizō is used in Revelation 12:2 to mean “try, torture.”

The basic biblical words for “tribulation” are šar (distress, Deut. 4:30) and šārā (distress, Judg. 10:14) in the OT and thlibō (press, squeeze, afflict, 1 Thess. 3:4) and thlipsis (pressure, affliction, Matt. 13:21; John 16:33) in the NT. There is also a richness of biblical usage for “anguish.” The basic words in the OT are māšōq (anguish, Ps. 119:143), mēšūqā (anguish, Job 15:24), šar and šārā, which are also used for “tribulation” (in such passages as Job 7:11 and Jer. 4:31 they have the meaning of anguish or distress), qōšer (distress, Exod. 6:9), and šābās (anguish and confusion, 2 Sam. 1:9). In the NT thlipsis is sometimes used for pressure and anguish, as in John 16:21. Other NT words are stenochōria (Rom. 2:9) and synochē (2 Cor. 2:4).

Finally, there is a series of words used for “afflict.” In the OT such verbs as yāgā (Isa. 51:23), lāḥaš (Amos 6:14), ’ānā (Gen. 15:13; Ps. 88:7), šārar (Ps. 129:1), and rā’ā’ (Num. 11:11; Jer. 31:28) are used, while in the NT thlibō (2 Cor. 1:6) is the basic word. The noun “affliction” has various biblical words associated with it. In the OT “affliction” is a rendering of such words as ’āwen (Jer. 4:15), lahāš (1 Kings 22:27), mū’āqā (Ps. 66:11), ’ānāh (Ps. 132:1), ’ōnī (Gen. 16:11; 1 Sam. 1:11; Lam. 1:3, 7, 9), šārā (1 Sam. 26:24; Jer. 14:8), šeber (Jer. 30:15), and ra’ (Ps. 34:19; Jer. 48:16). In the NT thlipsis (Mark 4:17; Phil. 1:17) is the main word, but kakōsis (Acts 7:34) and pathēma (2 Tim. 3:11; 1 Pet. 5:9) are also used.

Not only is there variety in the words for pain, anguish, and affliction; there is also a multiplicity of usages of such words. In regard to words for pain, one of the most frequent uses is for physical pain (e.g., Job 14:22; 33:19; Jer. 15:18; Rev. 21:4). A second major usage refers to mental and emotional problems or anguish (Ps. 25:18; Isa. 13:8; Jer. 4:19; Joel 2:6). Sometimes mental and emotional pain is referred to as leading to physical pain, as in Isaiah 21:3. The most common literary figure in regard to pain—whether physical, emotional, or even national problems—is the pain of childbirth (Isa. 26:17–18; Jer. 22:23; Mic. 4:10). Occasionally pain is used to refer to divine judgment upon a person, city, or nation, or simply to refer to the destruction of that city or nation. Often in such cases pain is used metaphorically to speak of the destruction and judgment (Jer. 51:8; Ezek. 30:16; Nah. 2:10). In one instance (Acts 2:24) there is a reference to the pains of death being loosed, using pain as a general term to refer to the whole death experience. Finally, there is a reference to birth pangs used metaphorically in relation to the nation of Israel “giving birth” to the Messiah (Rev. 12:2).

The biblical words for tribulation seem to be used in four basic ways. (1) Tribulation refers to political and national trouble and problems, and such problems normally refer to a nation’s relationships with other nations (Deut. 4:30; Judg. 10:14; 1 Sam. 10:19). (2) The words for tribulation are used in various passages to refer to the eschatological event, the tribulation (Matt. 24:21, 29; Mark 13:24; Rev. 7:14). (3) In at least one passage (Rom. 2:9) tribulation is used to refer to trouble in the sense of divine judgment. (4) The largest group of references to tribulation deals with personal problems, afflictions, troubles, and persecutions which befall the believer (John 16:33; Acts 14:22; Rom. 5:3; 12:12; 2 Cor. 1:4; 2 Thess. 1:4, 6; Rev. 2:9–10, 22).

The biblical words for anguish are also used in various ways. (1) Anguish is used to refer in general to one’s problems or troubles (Ps. 119:143; Isa. 30:6). (2) Anguish is used quite often to refer to mental and emotional turmoil (Job 7:11; Gen. 42:21; 2 Cor. 2:4). Included in such turmoil is dependency or depression and sorrow (Exod. 6:9; 2 Sam. 1:9). (3) Another type of mental turmoil that is frequently signified by anguish is fear (Deut. 2:25; Job 15:24; Jer. 6:24; 49:24; 50:43). (4) Anguish is used on one occasion to refer to trouble in the sense of divine judgment (Rom. 2:9). (5) On several occasions anguish is used to refer to pain that is seemingly physical in nature (Jer. 4:31; John 16:21).

Finally, the biblical words for affliction seem to be used most often in two broad ways—viz., to refer to national affliction or trouble and individual problems and suffering. Some references to national problems concern such events as the Egyptian bondage of Israel (Exod. 1:11; Neh. 9:9). In other cases the reference is to national affliction during the time of the prophets (Lam. 1:5). Some references refer to afflictions and troubles on a national scale during the end times (Hos. 5:15; Mark 13:19). In regard to personal afflictions there is again a wide variety. Affliction is used to refer to the forecast sufferings of Christ (Isa. 53:4, 7). It is also used to refer to the harsh treatment Hagar received at the hands of Sarai because of the contempt she showed Sarai after Ishmael was conceived (Gen. 16:11). In some instances it refers to persecution that the believer undergoes as he takes his stand for Christ and battles Satan (1 Pet. 5:9). Clearly, there is richness in usage of the term.

Though there are various words used for pain, affliction, trouble, and anguish, and though they are used in various contexts, there is more to the biblical teaching on pain. Scripture is full of comments about the purposes of suffering. In regard to the unbeliever and the disobedient, Scripture teaches that often God sends pain and affliction as a means of judgment for sin (e.g., Job 4:7–9). Sometimes such pain and affliction may come to turn the individual back to the Lord (e.g., Jonah) or to bring a person or nation to salvation (Israel in the tribulation, Zech. 12). In regard to why the righteous suffer, the Bible is also most helpful. Sometimes the believer will be afflicted as a means of chastisement (Ps. 94:12–13; cf. Heb. 12:6). God uses affliction to keep his servants humble, as in the case of Paul (2 Cor. 12:7). On some occasions the purpose of human affliction is to demonstrate to Satan that there are those who serve God because they love him, not because it pays to do so (Job 1–2). According to Peter, suffering promotes sanctification (1 Pet. 4:1–2). It does so in various ways such as refining the believer's faith (1 Pet. 1:6–7), educating the believer in such Christian virtues as endurance and perseverance (Rom. 5:3–4; James 1:3–4), teaching the believer something more of the sovereignty of God so that he understands his Lord better (Job 42:2–4), and giving the believer an opportunity to imitate Christ (1 Pet. 3:17–18). If any of these occurs in the life of the believer, it will be evidence of sanctification, and such sanctification is worked through affliction. Affliction and pain offer an opportunity for the believer to minister to others who are undergoing affliction (2 Cor. 1:3–4). On some occasions God's purpose in afflicting the righteous is to prepare them for judgment of their works for the purpose of rewards. Believers someday will give account of their works before the Lord, and affliction helps prepare the believer so that on that day his faith will be found unto honor and glory at the coming of the Lord (1 Pet. 1:7). If that happens, the believer will be rewarded, so affliction ultimately is a means to reward in such cases. Finally, God uses affliction as a prelude to exaltation of the believer. The theme of suffering and glory is prevalent throughout Scripture, especially 1 Peter. The example of Christ is the pattern (Phil. 2:5–11; 1 Pet. 3:17–22), and God wants to do the same for the believer who will humble himself before God, even if that humbling involves affliction (1 Pet. 5:6).

This list of purposes for pain and affliction is not meant to be exhaustive but only indicative of the richness of biblical teaching on the purposes of pain. One does not get the impression from Scripture that pain is purely gratuitous.

J. S. FEINBERG

See also EVIL, PROBLEM OF; PROVIDENCE OF GOD; THEODICY.

Bibliography. O. F. Clarke, God and Suffering; M. C. D'Arcy, Pain and the Providence of God; I. de Beausobre, Creative Suffering; A. Farrer, Love Almighty and Ills Unlimited; J. Hick, Evil and the God of Love; H. E. Hopkins, Mystery of Suffering; C. S. Lewis, Problem of Pain; H. Lockyer, Dark Threads the Weaver Needs: The Problem of Human Suffering; E. Madden and P. Hare, Evil and the Concept of God; R. W. Sockman, Meaning of Suffering; F. von Hügel, Essays and Addresses on the Philosophy of Religion, Second Series, 167–213; J. Wenham, Goodness of God; J. S. Whale, Christian Answer to the Problem of Evil.

Pain of God Theology. In 1946, right after World War II, when Japan went through a time of devastation and suffering, Kazoh Kitamori, a Japanese theologian teaching at the Tokyo Theological Seminary, introduced a new indigenous Japanese theology in his book Theology of the Pain of God.

To Kitamori the central meaning of the Christian gospel is the pain of God. Kitamori starts with Jeremiah 31:20: "Ephraim, my dear son, is he a delightful child? Indeed, as often as I have spoken against him, I certainly still remember him; therefore, my heart yearns for him; I will surely have mercy on him, declares the Lord." Here the context of the passage is God suffering for Ephraim, his son. The KJV translation reads, "My bowels are troubled for him." The key word in the phrase is the Hebrew verb hāmâ, which Kitamori interprets as "pain." He believes that God suffered for Ephraim and God suffers for his people. To him suffering exhausts the meaning of the Christian gospel. The theology of suffering is the entirety of Christian theology.

There are four constituents in the pain of God. First, God's love and forgiveness for sinners who deserve his wrath and judgment engender pain in

Pain of God Theology

God. Kitamori writes, "When the love of God bears and overcomes his wrath, nothing but the pain of God takes place. The solution to the wrath of God must be sought in the pain of God before it can be sought in the hidden God." The second constituent is simply human suffering and pain—hunger, thirst, exhaustion, fear, rejection, and the excruciating pain of the historical Jesus at his crucifixion. This pain can be healed, redeemed, and made meaningful only when it unites with the pain of God. The suffering of the historical Jesus as the Son of God is expressed in the pain of God. Third, God the Father suffers when he lets his only beloved Son suffer and die on the cross. This suffering of the Father is expressed in the pain of God. Fourth, God becomes immanent in the historical reality of human suffering. Jesus' last sermon (Matt. 25:31–46) illustrates his identity with the one who suffers hunger, thirst, sickness, and imprisonment, when he says, "I tell you the truth, whatever you did for one of the least of these brothers of mine, you did for me." God does not want us to approach him directly but rather indirectly through love for our neighbors.

After explaining these four constituents in the pain of God, Kitamori goes into the relationships between God's pain and man's pain. Man's pain is the reality of the wrath of God against sin (Rom. 6:23) and is the consequence of his estrangement from God. Man's pain also symbolizes God's pain; therefore, the bridge between God and man is pain. Kitamori explains how the love of God is related to the pain of God by what he calls "three orders of love." The first order is called the immediate "love of God," characterized as smooth, flowing, and intense like parental love. Nevertheless, man's sin has spoiled God's love and has caused the "pain of God." The third order of love is the synthesis of the love and pain of God which is expressed in the phrase "love rooted in the pain of God," which appears more than thirty times throughout his book.

In fact, he makes the astounding claim that due to the influence of Greek philosophy and German theology throughout the centuries the Christian church has failed to discover the centrality of the gospel until this Japanese Christian discovered the truth through the pain of God theology. Kitamori made this discovery because the Japanese concept of tsurasa (pain) is deeply rooted in the Japanese mind. The Japanese believe the depth and intelligence of man is measured by his understanding of tsurasa.

The significance of the pain of God theology is twofold. First, Kitamori took the tragedies of World War II and the sufferings of the Japanese people very seriously. His attempt to contextualize the gospel in the life situation of Japanese at a crucial time was one of the first such attempts in Asia. Furthermore, the concept of suffering and pain is at home in Japan, where the traditional Buddhist teaching of suffering (dukka) has been prevalent. Second, Kitamori developed the first significant Asian contextual theology to be widely publicized in the West. His theology pioneered a string of other Asian theologies existing today.

B. R. RO

See also ASIAN THEOLOGY; KAGAWA, TOYOHICO; PAIN.

Bibliography. W. Dyrness, ed., Emerging Voices in Global Christian Theology; D. J. Elwood, ed., What Asian Christians Are Thinking; P. S. Fiddes, Creative Suffering of God; C. Hargraves, Asian Christian Thinking; K. Koyama, Waterbuffalo Theology; C. Michalson, Japanese Contributions to Christian Theology.

Palamas, Gregory. See GREGORY PALAMAS.

Paley, William (1743–1805). Anglican theologian. Graduate of Cambridge, he became a fellow of Christ's College there and lectured in philosophy and divinity. He held that the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England contained "about two hundred and forty distinct propositions, many of them inconsistent with each other." He defined virtue as "doing good to mankind, in obedience to the will of God, and for the sake of everlasting happiness." He was a prolific writer, especially after he forsook Cambridge in 1775 and assumed a succession of increasingly lucrative incumbencies in Cumberland, where he was archdeacon of Carlisle from 1782. His most notable work was View of the Evidences of Christianity (1794), which for more than a century was required reading for entrance to Cambridge University. His Natural Theology (1802) argued teleologically for God's existence. The exquisite detail in an insect or in a human eye could be explained only in terms of a master craftsman. Only a divine watchmaker could have conceived the mechanical regularity of a watch that kept perfect time.

Often accused of unoriginality, and even of plagiarism, Paley retorted on one occasion that he was writing a textbook, not an original dissertation. Far from laying any claim to creativity, Paley advised his students that they should "make one sermon and steal five." His theology sometimes went beyond liberalism to unitarianism. He was good at whist, conscious of class (he left a sizable fortune), and is immortalized in secular history by a single plaintive question: "Who can refute a sneer?"

J. D. DOUGLAS

See also GOD, ARGUMENTS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF.

Bibliography. M. L. Clarke, Paley: Evidence for the Man; D. L. LeMahieu, Mind of William Paley; G. W. Meadley, Memoirs of William Paley.

Palm Sunday. The Sunday before Easter Sunday, considered to be the second Sunday of the passion of our Lord Jesus Christ. The use of palms was introduced in Rome as late as the twelfth century. The palms help symbolize the last entry of Jesus into Jerusalem before his crucifixion, during which the people strewed palms in his path as a sign of reverence. In today's reenactment of that entrance into Jerusalem, people are encouraged to carry palms as part of the liturgical experience.

T. J. GERMAN

See also CHRISTIAN YEAR; HOLY WEEK.

Bibliography. W. J. O'Shea, Meaning of Holy Week.

Panentheism. A doctrine of God that attempts to combine the strengths of classical theism with those of classical pantheism. The term is particularly associated with the work of Charles Hartshorne. Hartshorne contends, however, that other philosophers and theologians have elaborated panentheistic doctrines of God, especially Alfred North Whitehead but also Nikolai Berdyaev, Martin Buber, Gustaf T. Fechner, Mohammad Iqbal, Charles S. Peirce, Otto Pfleiderer, Sarvepalli Radhakrishnan, Friedrich W. J. von Schelling, Allan Watts, and Paul Weiss.

According to Hartshorne, God, while including an element that may be described as simple, is a complex reality. God knows the world—a world in which change, process, and freedom are real elements. For this freedom and change to be real, and for God's knowledge of this freedom and change to be perfect, Hartshorne reasons that God's knowledge must itself grow and change. That is, as new facts come into being, God comes to know those new facts (some of which are the result of genuinely free will), and thus God's knowledge grows. A perfect knower includes within himself the object which is known. Through perfectly knowing the world, God therefore includes the world (as it comes to be) within himself. As the world grows, God grows. God becomes. Through perfectly knowing and including the world, God is the supreme effect. That is, everything that happens affects God and changes God—e.g., God's knowledge changes. Therefore, the concrete God, the complex God who is actual, is the God who knows, includes, and is changed by the world. This, according to Hartshorne, is the God who loves the world and who shares the joys and sorrows of each creature in the world.

To be the supreme effect, God must not only be affected by each event in the world, he must also retain his own integrity and wholeness during this process. If God's reality were destroyed or his purpose (for goodness) deflected by the events in the world, then God would not be the supreme effect, the perfect receptacle for the world. Therefore, there must be some element in God which remains the same regardless of what happens in the world—i.e., an element that is not affected by any particular event in the world. This element, since it is not changed by any event, is eternal. It is also abstract. (The fact that God's eternal, abstract, essential self-identity is compatible with any state of affairs in the world is the basis for Hartshorne's well-known revival of the ontological argument.) Since God's eternal, abstract self-identity is presupposed by any state of affairs whatsoever, it follows that God is the universal and supreme cause.

It should be noted that while God (as eternal, abstract, essential self-identity) is independent of any particular state of affairs in the world, he (even as abstract self-identity) still requires that a world (of some sort or the other) exist. We may explain as follows. God as supreme cause refers to God's eternal, abstract, essential self-identity which is presupposed by every event in the world. But that which is eternal and abstract is deficient in actuality and can exist only as an element in a larger whole which is temporal and concrete. Thus God's eternal, abstract, essential self-identity exists only as an element in the temporal, concrete, complex reality which is God in his completeness. But God can be temporal, concrete, and complex only if there are contingent states of affairs to which he is related. These states of affairs are the world (which is included in God). These states of affairs are accidental (as opposed to essential) qualifiers of God's character. Thus God even as eternal, abstract, essential self-identity requires some world to exist, without requiring any particular world to exist.

Some of the events in the world are evil. God knows and includes those events within himself. Does it follow that God is evil? Hartshorne answers no. Consider this analogy. A certain event happens in my body. I know and include that event within myself. And yet as a person, while including that event, I remain in an important sense distinct from that event. Not only is my abstract and timeless essence as a man distinct from that event, but even my concrete and changing consciousness (while including that event) is distinct from it. Likewise, God, while including the evil event within himself, is yet distinct from that event. God is distinct from the event not only in his abstract, eternal, essential self-identity but also in his concrete, temporal, and complex consciousness. That is, God's consciousness, while aware of and including the evil event, is more than and distinct from that event.

Is it possible for a panentheistic God to be perfect? The problem is this. If God changes, and if total perfection is not compatible with change, it would follow that the panentheistic God is not perfect. Hartshorne's response runs as follows. The challenge as stated assumes that there is one type of perfection—specifically, changeless perfection. But in fact there are two types of perfection: changeless and changing perfection. God is perfect in both senses. God's abstract, essential, eternal self-identity is perfect. His drive toward goodness in general does not waver. To this extent God's perfection is changeless, but this perfection is abstract. As a concrete reality God changes, as does his perfection. That is, at any time, God infinitely surpasses the perfection of the world, regardless of whether we consider the perfection of the world at that same time, at some previous time, at some future time, or at any combination of these. As time progresses, however, God does surpass his own previous states of perfection—e.g., his knowledge grows, and he has more opportunities to love his creatures. God's perfection changes in that he perfectly surpasses his own previous states of perfection.

Panentheism

While Whitehead's doctrine of God is quite similar to Hartshorne's, Whitehead does have several distinctives worth noting. In Whitehead's metaphysics the basic building blocks of the universe are called actual entities. Actual entities are units of energy/experience. Electrons, rocks, stars, and people are composed of actual entities. For Whitehead, God is a single, everlasting (but continually developing) actual entity. The contemporary theologian John B. Cobb Jr. argues that on his own principles Whitehead should have conceived God to be a series of actual entities. Cobb's proposal would make God more like a human person, which, according to Whitehead, is a series of actual entities. It should be further noted that in Whitehead's system it is the very nature of an actual entity to incorporate other (past) actual entities into its own identity. Therefore, whether on Whitehead's original definition of God as a single everlasting actual entity or on Cobb's revisionary understanding of God as a series of actual entities, it is the very nature of God to include the (past) world within himself as a part of his very identity.

Perhaps the most striking aspect of Whitehead's doctrine of God is his distinction between God and creativity. Creativity is, in Whitehead's metaphysics, the power of being/becoming. Thus the fact that anything exists at all is ascribed not to God but to creativity (which in conjunction with the notions of the "one" and the "many" constitute Whitehead's category of the ultimate). In contrast, God's primary function is to help shape the character of the world. Thus that a thing exists must be referred to creativity; what a thing is must be referred, in part, to God. As a consequence, in Whitehead's system God's own existence is explained by reference not to God but to creativity. To put it bluntly, we may say that both God and the world are creatures of creativity.

Whitehead's postulation of creativity (in conjunction with the "one" and the "many") as an ul-timinate that is more fundamental than God is, perhaps, the most problematic aspect of his doctrine of God, not only for evangelical theologians but for other Christian thinkers as well. While a few Christian scholars, such as John Cobb, affirm Whitehead's distinction between God and creativity, others, such as Langdon Gilkey, insist that creativity must be "put back" into God before the pantheistic doctrine of God can really be made available for Christian theology. S. T. FRANKLIN

See also BERDYAEV, NICKOLAI ALEKSANDROVICH; BUBER, MARTIN; COBB, JOHN BOSWELL, JR.; GILKEY, LANGDON BROWN; HARTSHORNE, CHARLES; PANTHEISM; PROCESS THEOLOGY; WHITEHEAD, ALFRED NORTH.

Bibliography. J. B. Cobb Jr., Christian Natural Theology; J. B. Cobb Jr. and D. R. Griffin, Process Theology: An Introductory Exposition; B. Z. Cooper, Idea of God: A Whiteheadian Critique of St. Thomas Aquinas' Concept of God; L. Ford, Line of God; L. Gilkey, Naming the Whirlwind: The Renewal of God Language; Reaping the Whirlwind: A Christian Interpretation of History; C. Hartshorne and W. L. Reese, eds., Philosophers Speak of God; R. E. James, Concrete God: A New Beginning for Theology; R. C. Neville, Creativity and God: A Challenge to Process Theology.

Pannenberg, Wolfhart (b. 1928). German Lutheran theologian. As a student of Karl Barth's in the 1950s, Pannenberg grew uneasy with Barth's radical distinction between revelation and human experience of the world. His own theological agenda would emphasize God's revelatory action not as a negation of man's experience of the world, but as the completion of creation. Fundamental to his program is the notion that faith is centered in history. Historical events must underlie faith if faith is to be valid. Truth is not to be found in self-authenticating religious experience or in deductions from unchanging essences. Rather, truth is historical in nature and meaning. Christian theology deals not with events that are visible only to the eye of faith, but with public events that take place upon the plain of secular temporality. Theology is thus a public discipline related to the quest for universal truth. Pannenberg criticizes all attempts to divide faith from fact or to shield the Christian faith from rational inquiry. Rather, theological affirmations must be based upon an analysis of publicly accessible history.

As the field of revelatory activity in which God discloses and establishes his character, history cannot be fully known before the eschaton. The same holds true for the nature of God. Thus Pannenberg speaks of God as "the ontological priority of the future." God's deity is connected with, and even dependent upon, the demonstration of his lordship over the world, a demonstration that will not be complete until the eschaton. While the truth of God and history will remain partial and provisional until the eschaton, the future alone is the locus of ultimate truth. Yet the meaning and end of history, and the nature of God, is disclosed proleptically in the history of Jesus Christ, as Christ represents the final manifestation of the coming God. As a preview of the eschaton, the resurrection of Jesus from the dead is the final disclosure of God's deity and lordship, and the objectively historical anticipation of the future of creation.

There is much to commend in Pannenberg's program. His insistence upon the objective, historical reality of the resurrection and his emphasis upon the centrality of Jesus Christ to universal history and the historical acts of God in Jesus as the ground of faith offer important correctives to the post-Enlightenment turn toward the religious subject. Yet there are areas of concern within Pannenberg's program. While a trinitarian, he is less than fully clear regarding the personhood of the Father or the Spirit, or the distinction between them: "God is a field of force without limits of extension or power, pervading all reality. . . . This the Bible calls Spirit and is identified by Jesus Christ as fatherly love." Pannenberg's rationalism also minimalizes the role of the Spirit in the epistemological and interpretative process. He criticizes the traditional understanding of faith as a gift of the Spirit and the Holy Spirit's role in the illumination of Scripture as historical acts of God in which the believer loses all contact with ordinary human experience. Rather, the Holy Spirit forges faith from understanding and binds the believer to historical reality. The question of truth can be answered only in reference to the content of what is believed, not the miracle of the Holy Spirit.

M. WILLIAMS

Bibliography. W. Pannenberg, Apostles' Creed; Basic Questions in Theology; Idea of God and Human Freedom; Jesus—God and Man; Systematic Theology; Theology and the Kingdom of God; Theology and the Philosophy of Science; What Is Man?; M. A. Andjelic, Resurrection of Pannenberg's Reality as History; M. Bauman, Roundtable: Conversations with European Theologians; C. E. Braaten and P. Clayton, eds., Theology of Wolfhart Pannenberg: Twelve American Critiques, with an Autobiographical Essay and Response; A. D. Galloway, Wolfhart Pannenberg; S. Grenz, Reason for Hope: The Systematic Theology of Wolfhart Pannenberg; J. McConkey, Theology as History; D. McKenzie, Wolfhart Pannenberg and Religious Philosophy; D. H. Olive, Wolfhart Pannenberg; E. F. Tupper, Theology of Wolfhart Pannenberg.

Pantheism. The word, coming from the Greek pan and theos, means "everything is God." It was coined by John Toland in 1705 to refer to philosophical systems that tend to identify God with the world. Such doctrines have been viewed as a mediating position between atheism and classical theism by some, while others have concluded that pantheism is really a polite form of atheism because God is identified with everything.

Pantheism may be contrasted with biblical theism from a number of perspectives. Pantheism either mutes or rejects the biblical teaching of the transcendence of God in favor of his radical immanence. It is typically monistic about reality, whereas biblical theism distinguishes between God and the world. Because of pantheism's tendency to identify God with nature, there is a minimizing of time, often making it illusory. The biblical understanding of God and the world is that God is eternal and the world finite, although God acts in time and knows what takes place in it. In forms of pantheism where God literally encompasses the world, man is an utterly fated part of the universe which is necessarily as it is. In such a world freedom is an illusion. Biblical theism, on the other hand, holds to the freedom of man, insisting that this freedom is compatible with God's omniscience.

It would be erroneous to conclude, however, that pantheism is a monolithic position. The more important forms are as follows:

Hylozoistic pantheism. The divine is immanent in, and characteristically regarded as the basic element of, the world, giving movement and change to the whole. The universe, however, remains a plurality of separate elements. This view was popular among some of the early Greek philosophers.

Immanentistic pantheism. God is a part of the world and immanent in it, although his power is exercised throughout its entirety.

Absolutistic monistic pantheism. God is both absolute and identical with the world. Thus, the world is also changeless though real.

Relativistic monistic pantheism. The world is real and changing. It is, however, within God as, for example, his body. God is nevertheless changeless and unaffected by the world.

Acosmic pantheism. God is absolute and makes up the totality of reality. The world is an appearance and ultimately unreal.

Identity of opposites pantheism. Discourse about God must of necessity resort to opposites. That is, God and his relationship to the world must be described in formally contradictory terms. Reality is not capable of rational description. One must go beyond reason to an intuitive grasp of the ultimate.

Neoplatonic or emanationistic pantheism. In this form of pantheism God is absolute in all aspects, removed from and transcendent over the world. It differs from biblical theism in denying that God is the cause of the world, holding rather that the universe is an emanation of God. The world is the result of intermediaries. These intermediaries are for a Neoplatonist like Plotinus ideals or forms. He also sought to maintain the emphasis on immanence by positing a world soul that contains and animates the universe.

Pantheism

From a biblical standpoint pantheism is deficient to a greater or lesser degree on two points. First, pantheism generally denies the transcendence of God, advocating his radical immanence. The Bible presents a balance. God is active in history and in his creation, but he is not identical with it to either a lesser or a greater degree. Second, because of the tendency to identify God with the material world, there is again a lesser or greater denial of the personal character of God. In Scripture, God not only possesses the attributes of personality, in the incarnation he takes on a body and becomes the God-man. God is pictured supremely as a person. P. D. FEINBERG

See also NEOPLATONISM; PANENTHEISM; PROCESS THEOLOGY; THEISM.

Bibliography. N. Geisler, Christian Apologetics; H. P. Owen, Concepts of Deity; C. E. Plumptre, History of Pantheism; J. Royce, Conception of God; W. S. Urquart, Pantheism and the Value of Life.

Papacy. As head of the Roman Catholic Church the pope is considered the successor of Peter and the vicar of Christ. He is also, and first of all, the bishop of Rome and, for Eastern Christians, the patriarch of the West. The term pappa, from which the word "pope" is derived, originated in ancient colloquial Greek as an endearing term for "father," and was then applied, beginning in the third century, to Eastern patriarchs, bishops, abbots, and eventually parish priests (of whom it is still used today). In the West the term was never very common outside Rome (originally a Greek-speaking church) and from the sixth century increasingly became reserved for the bishop of Rome, until in the later eleventh century Pope Gregory VII made that official. The term "papacy" (papatus), meant to distinguish the Roman bishop's office from all other bishoprics (episcopatus), also originated in the later eleventh century.

For Catholics the papacy represents an office divinely instituted by Christ in his charge to Peter (Matt. 16:18–19; Luke 22:31–32; John 21:15–17) and therefore something to be revered and obeyed as a part of Christian faith and duty. But the papal role has in fact varied from age to age, and a historical survey is required first to put papal claims into perspective.

History. The first three and a half centuries of papal history have left remarkably little record. That Peter ministered and died in Rome now seems beyond doubt, but a monarchical episcopate emerged there only in the early second century, and a half-century later still came those lists of successive bishops designed to show their preservation of the original apostolic faith. The church at Rome nevertheless enjoyed a certain prominence, owing to its apostolic "founders" and to its political setting, and this eventually inspired its bishops to exercise greater leadership. Victor (ca. 190) rebuked the churches of Asia Minor for celebrating Easter on the incorrect date, and Stephan (254–57), for the first known time explicitly claiming to stand on the Petrine deposit of faith, ruled against the churches of North Africa on sacraments administered by heretics.

Between the midfourth and the midfifth centuries, the apogee of the Western imperial church, Roman popes developed and articulated those claims which were to become characteristic. Over against emperors and patriarchs in Constantinople, who claimed that their church in "new Rome" virtually equaled that of "old Rome," the popes asserted vehemently that their primacy derived from Peter and not from their political setting, making theirs the only truly "apostolic see." Siricius (384–98) and Innocent (401–17) issued the first extant decretals, letters modeled on imperial rescripts in which popes ruled definitively on matters put to them by local churches. Leo the Great (440–61), who first appropriated the old pagan title of pontifex maximus, intervened with his Tome at the Council of Chalcedon to establish orthodox Christology, told a recalcitrant archbishop that he merely "participated in" a "fullness of power" reserved to popes alone (this later to become an important principle in canon law), and provided in his letters and sermons a highly influential description of the Petrine office and its primacy, drawing in part upon principles found in Roman law. Gelasius (492–96), finally, over against emperors inclined to intervene at will in ecclesiastical affairs, asserted an independent and higher pontifical authority in religious matters.

Throughout the early Middle Ages (600–1050) papal claims remained lofty, but papal power diminished considerably. All churches, East and West, recognized in the "vicar of St. Peter" a certain primacy of honor, but the East virtually never consulted him and the West only when it was expedient. In practice, councils of bishops, with kings often presiding over them, ruled in the various Western territorial churches. Reform initiatives came from the outside, even when (as with Boniface and Charlemagne) they sought normative guidance from Rome. Two innovations deserve mention: in the mideighth century the papacy broke with the Eastern ("Roman") emperor and allied itself henceforth with Western royal powers; at the same time popes laid claims to the papal states, lands in central Italy meant to give them autonomy but in fact burdening them with political responsibilities which became very damaging to their spiritual mission during the later Middle Ages and were not finally removed until the forcible unification of Italy in 1870.

The papacy emerged during the High Middle Ages (1050–1500) as the real leader of Western Christendom, beginning with the so-called Gregorian reform movement (its claims nearly epitomized in twenty-seven dicta noted down by Pope Gregory VII), culminating initially in the reign of Pope Innocent III (his reforms permanently inscribed in the Fourth Lateran Council), and waning again during the Great Schism and the conciliar movement. In 1059 a new election law (with modifications made in 1179, the same as that in force today) raised the pope above all other bishops, who were in principle still elected by their clergy and people. Henceforth the pope would be elected solely by cardinals, themselves papal appointees given liturgical and administrative responsibilities, and he could be chosen from among all eligible clergymen (preferably cardinals) rather than, as the older law held, only from among Romans. Papal decretals replaced conciliar canons as the routine and normative form of regulation, and this “new law” (little changed prior to the new codes issued in 1917 and 1982) reached down uniformly into every diocese in the West. The papal curia or court, reorganized and massively expanded, became the center of ecclesiastical finance and administration. Legates carried papal authority into all parts of Europe. The papal call to crusade brought thousands of laymen to arms and eventually had important implications in the area of clerical taxation and the issuing of indulgences. Above all, this revitalized papacy constantly asserted the priority of the spiritual over the material world and adopted for itself a new title as head of the church, that of “vicar [or placeholder] of Christ.”

The early modern papacy (1517–1789) began with a staggering defeat. Protestant Reformers, persuaded that the papacy had corrupted the gospel beyond all hope of reform, revolted. The so-called Renaissance papacy had largely lost sight of its spiritual mission and was forced reluctantly into the reforms articulated by the Council of Trent (1545–63). The papacy then took charge of deep and lasting reforms in, e.g., training clergy, upholding new standards of the episcopal and priestly offices, and providing a new catechism. The number of cardinals was set at seventy (until the last generation), and “Congregations” were established to oversee various aspects of the church’s mission.

The critical attack of Enlightenment thinkers (Josephinism in Austria) together with growing national (Gallicanism in France) and episcopal (Febronianism in Germany) resistance to papal authority culminated in the French Revolution and its aftermath, during which time two popes (Pius VI, Pius VII) endured humiliating imprisonments. But the forces of restoration, combined with the official indifference or open hostility of secularized governments, led to a strong resurgence of centralized papal authority known as ultramontanism. Pope Pius IX (1846–78) made this the program of his pontificate, codified it as a part of the Catholic faith in the decrees on papal primacy and infallibility in Vatican Council I (1869–70), and enforced it with an unprecedented degree of Roman centralization that characterized the Catholic Church into the 1960s. Leo XIII (1878–1903), the first pope in centuries to have chiefly spiritual obligations following the loss of the papal states, approved neo-Thomism as an official challenge to modern philosophy and defined a Catholic position on social justice over against radical labor unions. Pius X (1903–14) condemned scattered efforts to bring into the Catholic Church the critical study of Scripture and divergent philosophical views known collectively as “modernism.” Pius XII (1939–58) used the papacy’s infallible authority for the first time to define the bodily assumption of Mary as Catholic dogma. Throughout the last century mass media, mass transportation, and mass audiences have made the popes far better known and more highly revered in their persons (as distinguished from their office) than ever before. Vatican Council II (1962–65) brought deep reforms, in particular a much greater emphasis upon bishops acting collegially with one another and the pope. Protestants are pleased to see a return to Scripture in the papacy’s conception of the church’s mission and the priest’s office, together with a far greater openness toward other Christian churches.

Papal primacy rests upon the power of the keys that Christ conferred upon Peter and his successors, though it has obviously varied in principle and especially in practice throughout the centuries. Leo the Great and the high medieval popes claimed for themselves a “fullness of power” that Vatican Council I defined as “ordinary” and “immediate” jurisdiction over the church and all the faithful in matters of discipline and ecclesiastical authority as well as faith and morals, thus potentially transforming the pope into a supreme bishop and all other bishops into mere vicars, an imbalance which Vatican Council II sought to redress with far greater emphasis upon the episcopal office. The triumph of papal primacy has nevertheless at least three noteworthy results. (1) In the continuing tug of war between papal and conciliar/episcopal authority, the pope has effectively gained the upper hand. He alone has the divinely given power to convoke councils and to authorize their decisions (something reaffirmed at Vatican Council II). (2) Since the fourteenth century, and especially since the nineteenth, episcopal appointments have been removed from local clergy and laymen and reserved to Rome (which tends to preserve loyalty to the pope but also prevents churches from falling prey to local factions and national governments). (3) In general, Rome’s approval is needed for all laws which govern the church's institutions, liturgies which shape its worship, courts which enforce its discipline, orders which embody its religious life, and missions sent around the world—though there has been some decentralization in the immediate aftermath of Vatican Council II. Like all monarchical structures, primacy can be and usually is a very conservative force, though it can also initiate sweeping change, as in the reforms of the last two decades.

Papacy

Until the last century, when papal pronouncements on a host of religious issues first became a regular feature of the Catholic Church, primacy in matters of faith and morals received far less attention than primacy of jurisdiction. Down to the sixteenth century and beyond, popes normally adjudicated matters first argued in schools and local churches, rather than initiating legislation themselves. All bishops originally possessed the magisterium, or the authority to preserve and to teach the faith handed down from the apostles, and general councils of bishops were called (usually by emperors) to resolve controverted doctrinal issues. Rome eventually gained a certain preeminence, owing partly to the fame of its apostolic "founders" (Peter and Paul) and partly to its enviable record of orthodoxy, though this was not always above reproach, as in the condemnation of Honorius I (625–38) for his position on monothelism, something which entered into the debate on infallibility. In the High Middle Ages the unfailing faith Christ promised to pray for (Luke 22:31–32) was understood to apply not to the whole church but to the Roman Church and then more narrowly to the Roman pope. Infallibility was first ascribed to him in the fourteenth century and defined as binding dogma after much debate and some dissent in 1870. This was intended to guarantee and preserve the truths of the apostolic faith. When Protestants disagree about Scripture's teaching on a certain doctrine, they appeal to a famous founder (Calvin, Wesley, etc.), their denominational creeds, or their own understanding; Catholics appeal to the authority they believe Christ conferred upon his vicar. Though popes are careful to distinguish fallible from infallible statements and have in fact made only one of the latter, their Petrine authority and frequent modern pronouncements can tend, as Luther first charged, to generate a new law and obscure the freedom of Christ.

Comparative Views. It is helpful to compare the position of the Eastern Orthodox, contemporary dissenting Catholics, and Protestants with the traditional view of the papacy. The Orthodox considered the church to be organized around five patriarchates, with the see of Peter in the West holding a certain primacy of honor but not final authority. They have consistently refused to recognize any extraordinary magisterial authority (which resides in the teachings of general councils). The catalyst that finally divided the Eastern and Western churches in 1054 was Rome's revitalized claim to primacy, worsened by papal support for the crusades and establishment of a Latin hierarchy in the East. As hostility toward Rome increased, the Orthodox became ever clearer in their exegesis of the keys: the church was built upon Peter's confession of faith (which the Orthodox had preserved intact), not upon Peter himself or his sometime wayward successors. More recently, the Orthodox found the declaration of infallibility almost as offensive as did Protestants.

Catholics have never uniformly revered the papacy to the degree that most Protestants believe and that the ultramontane movement of the last century might have suggested. Outright repudiation nevertheless was rare. The so-called Old Catholics split away after the infallibility decree, and a small conservative group has denounced the changes wrought by Vatican Council II. But in the last generation some theologians, led by Hans Küng, have openly questioned infallibility, and many faithful Catholics have rejected the stand on contraception enunciated in Pope Paul VI's Humanae Vitae (1968). There is increased suspicion of Roman primatial claims and considerable ferment in favor of episcopal and conciliar authority. But whether this is merely a momentary reaction or something of lasting significance is not yet clear.

Until the last generation Protestants have had almost nothing but evil to say of the papacy. Luther, contrary to popular myth, did not revolt easily against papal authority and for a long time held to the conviction of a Petrine office charged with the care of souls in the church; but when he became convinced that the vicar of Christ had in fact distorted and obstructed the proclamation of the gospel, he labeled him instead the "antichrist," and that label stuck for centuries. Indeed "popery" and its equivalent in other languages came to stand for all that was wrong with the Roman Catholic Church. Liberal Protestants have meanwhile dismissed the papacy as a vestige of superstition, while several extremely conservative groups, often in gross misunderstanding of the papacy and its actual function, continue to link it with all that is evil in the world. Since Vatican Council II evangelical Christians have come better to understand and to appreciate the pope as a spokesman for Christ's church, yet few would go so far as some ecumenically minded Lutherans, who suggested that a less authoritarian papacy could function as the rallying point for a reunited church. Most Protestants still consider the notion of a primatial Petrine office, instituted by Christ and conferred upon the bishops of Rome, to be scripturally and historically unfounded. Therefore the doctrine and office of the papacy will probably continue to divide Catholic from Protestant and Orthodox Christians for the foreseeable future.

J. VAN ENGEN

See also INFALLIBILITY; KEYS OF THE KINGDOM; VATICAN COUNCIL I; VATICAN COUNCIL II.

Bibliography. P. C. Empie, ed., Papal Primacy and the Universal Church; S. Hendrix, Luther and the Papacy; J. D. Holmes, Triumph of the Holy See; T. G. Jaland, Church and the Papacy; W. Ullmann, NCE 10:951-70; 11:779-81; K. von Aretin, Papacy and the Modern World.

Paraclete. See HOLY SPIRIT.

Paradise. A word probably of Persian origin, appearing as pardēs in the OT three times ("orchard," Song 4:13; "forest," Neh. 2:8; "parks," Eccles. 2:5). The Greek word paradeisos is found from the time of Xenophon, appearing in the papyri, inscriptions, LXX (twenty-seven occurrences, some of which refer to Eden, e.g., Gen. 2:8, 9, 10, 15, 16), Philo, and Josephus. The NT employs paradeisos three times, to denote the place of blessedness promised to the thief (Luke 23:43), the third heaven (2 Cor. 12:4), and the location of the promised tree of life (Rev. 2:7).

Since the paradise of Eden was the place of bliss man had lost, rabbinical literature used the term to portray the place of blessedness for the righteous dead, in contrast to Gehenna, the place of torment. Elaborate and highly imaginative descriptions were drawn.

Jesus used the term once (Luke 23:43), and some see here only a reference to heaven. However, Jesus may be exhibiting essential agreement with traditional Jewish opinion by employing "Abraham's bosom" as an alternate term for "Paradise" in Luke 16:22. Then Paradise as the abode of the righteous is viewed as a separate section of Hades (a term equivalent to Sheol, Ps. 16:10; cf. Acts 2:27, 31). Because the remaining references to Paradise in the NT are to heaven, some have concluded that since the resurrection and ascension of Christ, Paradise has been removed from Hades to the third heaven, and that the "host of captives" who ascended with Christ were the OT saints (Eph. 4:8, RSV).

If Paradise means heaven as the dwelling place of God in all NT instances, then the choice of the term "Abraham's bosom" may have been deliberate. Then Jesus promised to the thief the bliss of heaven on that very day, which prospect belongs to all Christian believers (Luke 23:43; 2 Cor. 5:8; Phil. 1:23).

H. A. KENT JR.

See also ABRAHAM'S BOSOM; HEAVEN.

Bibliography. H. Bietenhard and C. Brown, NIDNTT 2:760-64; L. S. Chafer, Systematic Theology; J. Jeremias, TDNT 5:765-73; H. K. McArthur, IDB 3:655-56.

Paradox. A paradox is (1) an assertion which is self-contradictory, or (2) two or more assertions which are mutually contradictory, or (3) an assertion which contradicts some very commonly held position on the matter in question.

Paradoxes may be either rhetorical or logical. A rhetorical paradox is a figure used to shed light on a topic by challenging the reason of another and thus startling him. The NT contains many effective examples of this use of the paradox (e.g., Matt. 5:39; 10:39; John 11:25; 2 Cor. 6:9-10).

Logical paradoxes arise from the attempt by the human mind to unify or to coordinate the multiple facets of experience. Because of the diversity and complexity of reality and also because of the limitations of finite and sinful human reason, man's best efforts to know reality bring him only to the production of equally reasonable (or apparently so) yet irreconcilable (or apparently so) truths. In such cases man may be nearer the truth when he espouses both sides of a paradoxical issue than when he gives up one side in favor of the other.

Two differing interpretations of the logical paradox have emerged in the history of the church. One asserts actual paradoxes in which what is really true also really contradicts a right application of the laws of human thought. The other holds that paradoxical assertions are only apparent contradictions. Often this difference resolves itself into a mere difference of psychological attitude. Those who take the first interpretation of the paradox are willing to find rest of mind with incoherent elements lying unresolved in their thinking. Those who take the second believe that all truth must make its peace with the laws of human thought such as the law of contradiction and, therefore, do not find mental rest in incoherencies.

Medieval thought was not uniform on the question of paradox but in its ultimate rejection of doubt truth seemed to veer away from an acceptance of actual paradoxes in favor of apparent paradoxes. Martin Luther's objection to the denial of double truth by the Sorbonne was in reality a defense of actual paradoxes.

In modern theology the concept of paradox has assumed a prominent role in the writing of Søren Kierkegaard and his twentieth-century followers, Karl Barth, Reinhold Niebuhr, and others. The infinite, timeless, and hidden God can reach into finite time of human history through events which can be discerned only by faith, and even then necessarily appear as logical paradoxes.

For theists of any period, of course, a paradoxical "setting aside" of the laws of logic is understood as provisional; a true synthesis is always to be found in the mind of God.

K. S. KANTZER

Bibliography. E. J. Carnell, Philosophy of the Christian Religion; H. De Morgan, Budget of Paradoxes; V. Fern, ed., Encyclopedia of Morals; C. F. H. Henry,

Paradox

God, Revelation, and Authority; R. W. Hepburn, Christianity and Paradox; H. R. Mackintosh, Types of Modern Theology; D. Runes, Dictionary of Philosophy; S. D. F. Solmond, HDB 3:668–72.

Paradox, Theology of. See NEO-ORTHODOXY.

Pardon. See FORGIVENESS.

Parker Society. The London-based Anglican society which printed in fifty-four handsome volumes the works of the leading English Reformers of the sixteenth century. It was formed in 1840 and disbanded in 1855 when its work was completed. Its name is that of Matthew Parker, the first Elizabethan archbishop of Canterbury, who was known as a great collector of books. The stimulus for the foundation of the society was provided by the Tractarian movement, led by John Henry Newman and Edward B. Pusey. Some members of this movement spoke disparagingly of the English Reformation, and so some members of the Church of England felt the need to make available in an attractive form the works of the leaders of that Reformation. Thus the society represented a cooperation between traditional High Churchmen and evangelical churchmen, both of whom were committed to the Reformation teaching on justification by faith. The society had about seven thousand subscribers who paid one pound each year from 1841 to 1855; thus for fifteen pounds the subscribers received fifty-four volumes. The level of critical scholarship is uneven in the volumes, since twenty-four editors were used and the task of arriving at the best text was far from easy. While some of the volumes have been superseded by more recent critical editions, this collection remains today one of the most valuable sources for the study of the English Reformation.

P. TOON

Bibliography. P. Toon, "Parker Society," HMPEC 46–53.

Parousia. See SECOND COMING OF CHRIST.

Pascal, Blaise (1623–1662). Mathematician, scientist, and religious thinker; one of the greatest figures in Western intellectual history. Pascal was born in Clermont, France, and raised by his widowed father, a brilliant lawyer and civil official who educated his children himself. He spent his formative years in Paris and Rouen, where he moved in intellectual circles and made his earliest scientific and mathematical discoveries. In his work he relied upon the experimental method, and among his contributions were the first mechanical calculator, basic research on vacuums and hydraulics, formulating probability theory, and laying the foundations for differential and integral calculus. His religious training was nominal, but he underwent a "conversion" in 1646 to an austere teaching of world renunciation and submission to God advocated by the disciples of Jean du Vergier. This resulted in a temporary cessation of his intellectual labors, but he soon left the group. In 1654 he experienced a far more significant "second conversion" to the Jansenist doctrine at Port Royal, and he fervently embraced the Christian faith, as seen in his later works, the Provincial Letters (1657) and the posthumously published Pensées (Thoughts on Religion and Some Other Subjects).

In his religious writings Pascal was an apologist rather than a systematic thinker. In arguing the existence of God he was not a complete fideist, as he felt unbelievers could be shown that religion was not contrary to reason, but he rejected metaphysical proofs like those of Descartes as being inadequate to lead one to the living God. In effect he argued psychologically, believing that the heart was the key. God could be perceived intuitively by the heart, not through reason. This involved combining knowledge, feeling, and will and establishing the personal, mystical relationship with Christ that gives life. As Pascal brings out in his wager argument, probability compels us to take the risk of faith in God. He saw the human condition as one of "greatness and wretchedness." Rejecting Jesuit Pelagianism, Pascal accepted the Jansenist restatement of the Augustinian view of original sin. He said man possesses a special moral and religious status that elevates him far above animals, but he is controlled by sin and desperately needs God's special grace in order to be saved. Although he felt that "the heart has its reasons, of which reason knows nothing," he nevertheless maintained that the self-validating Scriptures, prophecies, existence of the Jews, miracles, and witness of history all serve to authenticate Christianity.

R. V. PIERARD

See also JANSEN, CORNELIUS OTTO; PASCAL'S WAGER.

Bibliography. P. M. Bechtel, NIDCC 749; M. Bishop, Pascal: The Life of Genius; J. H. Broome, Pascal; E. Caillet, Pascal: The Emergence of Genius; H. M. Davidson, Blaise Pascal; Encyclopedia of Philosophy 6:51–55; Origins of Certainty; M. Ernest, Blaise Pascal: The Life and Work of a Realist; R. Hazelton, Blaise Pascal: The Genius of His Thought; A. Krailsheimer, Pascal; J. Mesnard, NCE 10:1046–48.

Pascal's Wager. A famous apologetic advanced by Blaise Pascal in his Pensées. Pascal prepares for the ostensibly unreasonable step of faith by pushing reason to its own limits. He argues first that we can know the existence and nature of finite space because we are limited and extended in space, even though we do not know the quality of unboundedness. However, because we do not possess God's attributes of infinity and nonextension and thus cannot know his existence or nature, rational proof of his being is impossible. Moving from rational knowledge to reasonable surmise, Pascal affirms: "Either God exists, or he does not," and proposes that we wager on the matter. To bet that he is means a modest surrender of reason, but to opt for divine nonexistence is to risk the loss of eternal life and happiness. The stake (one's reason) is slight compared to the prize that may be won. If the gambler for God is right, he will win everything, but he loses nothing should this turn out to be wrong. Since the reasonableness of betting has been demonstrated, one can now move from the realm of the probable to the practical action of placing one's faith in God.

R. V. PIERARD

See also PASCAL, BLAISE.

Bibliography. N. Rescher, Pascal's Wager: A Study of Practical Reason in Philosophical Theology.

Paschal Controversies. Disputes in the Christian church about the dating of Easter (Gr. pascha). Differences first arose in the late second century on whether Easter celebrations should be held always on a Sunday or should vary according to the precise day of the Jewish lunar month (the 14th of Nisan) that marked the resurrection of Christ. The Eastern church preferred the latter dating; the Western church rejected this because it clashed with the Jewish Passover and opted for the following Sunday.

Later controversy centered on the different ways in which the paschal moon was calculated, the principal disagreement being initially between Antioch and Alexandria. Antioch followed the Jewish custom; Alexandria always put Easter after the vernal equinox. The Council of Nicea decided on the latter practice.

Then came differences between Gaul, Rome, and Alexandria. Alexandria used a nineteen-year cycle, Rome an eighty-four-year one. Augustine said in 387 that Easter was observed in Gaul on March 21, in Rome on April 18, and in Alexandria on April 25. The Alexandrian calculation, adopted formally at the instigation of Dionysius Exiguus in 525, remains in use.

Gaul, however, was out of step because in 457 Victorius of Aquitaine had devised a 532-year cycle in Rome which, although never much favored there, caused confusion in Gaul until the time of Charlemagne.

The Celtic churches meanwhile had their own method of computation which led to differences after Roman missionaries came. In the mid-seventh century, for example, those who followed the Roman system were keeping Palm Sunday and fasting while the Celtic adherents were celebrating Easter. The Synod of Whitby (664) decided on the Roman system.

In Eastern Orthodoxy, Easter is often observed on a later Sunday than in the West because the Eastern church follows the Julian calendar. The Second Vatican Council in 1963 said there was no objection to a fixed Sunday (probably early in April) for Easter, but differences still remained two decades later.

J. D. DOUGLAS

See also CHRISTIAN YEAR; EASTER.

Passion of Christ. See CROSS, CRUCIFIXION.

Passover. See FEASTS AND FESTIVALS, OLD TESTAMENT.

Pastor. See SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

Patriarch. This term, recalling the OT patriarchs who were heads of their families or of tribes, is an ecclesiastical title used in both Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox churches. It describes a bishop who has been exalted over other bishops. The authority and duties of the patriarch differ between Eastern and Western churches. Where the patriarch has significant authority (mainly in the Eastern churches), this would be in legislation, administration, and teaching. The patriarchate is not a universal office; only a few cities have patriarchs. By the fourth/fifth century there were only five such cities: Rome, Alexandria, Antioch, Constantinople, and Jerusalem. Currently, Moscow has replaced Rome in Orthodox thought and has a patriarch.

W. L. LIEFELD

See also BISHOP; CHURCH OFFICERS.

Patripassianism. See MONARCHIANISM.

Pattern. See TYPE, TYPOLOGY.

Paul, Theology of. Paul gives two different accounts of the source of his theology. In Galatians 1:11-12 he insists that he did not receive it from men but "through a revelation of Jesus Christ," referring to his experience on the Damascus Road. But in 1 Corinthians 15:3-8 he pictures himself as simply passing on the tradition he had received about Christ's atoning death, burial, and resurrection. Some scholars (e.g., Drane) maintain that two different Pauls are speaking in these passages: the former an enthusiastic individualist, whose theology was based on the immediate inspiration of the Holy Spirit; the latter an older, more sober Paul, whose individualism has been curbed by the experience of conflict and the need to come to terms with the other apostles' understanding of the faith. Others (e.g., Bruce) argue that Paul's acceptance of the radically new tradition about Jesus, in opposition to “the traditions of my fathers” (Gal. 1:14), was a direct result of the Damascus Road revelation, so that the one complements the other.

Either way, it is a problem to know why Paul presents the gospel in terms so different from those which Jesus himself used. For instance, why is “justification by faith”—scarcely present in Jesus’ teaching—so prominent in Paul’s, and why does Paul virtually ignore Jesus’ great theme of the kingdom of God? Plainly Paul felt himself empowered, as an apostle of Christ, to speak in his name (2 Cor. 13:3) under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit (1 Cor. 2:12–13, 16) in ways in which the earthly Christ had never spoken. In fact, his thought is a fantastically creative combination of elements drawn together, under the orchestration of the Spirit, from many different sources: from Jesus’ earthly teaching (e.g., 1 Cor. 7:10–11; 9:14), from his own background in Pharisaism (e.g., Rom. 10:6–9; Gal. 4:22–26), from earlier Christian traditions (e.g., Rom. 3:24–25; 1 Cor. 15:3–7; Phil. 2:6–11), from secular Greek thought (e.g., Rom. 2:15; Col. 3:18–4:1), from his own insight (Eph. 3:4), and from the OT (Rom. 15:4; 2 Tim. 3:15–16). Opinions are of course divided as to whether Paul thus distorted the message of Jesus or not.

The basic lines of Paul’s theology can be summarized under four headings:

The Nature of God. Morris has pointed out that in Romans God is mentioned 153 times, whereas Christ appears 65 times. Statistics can be misleading, but in this case they seem to show where the real foundation of Pauline thought rests. Two key words highlight the center of his thinking about God:

Creation. His belief in the one God who created all that is shaped Paul’s theology fundamentally.

He could not accept that God had no purpose for the Gentile nations. “Is God the God of Jews only? Is he not the God of Gentiles too? Yes, of Gentiles too, since there is only one God” (Rom. 3:29–30). His belief in the equality of Jews and Gentiles before God (Rom. 1:16; 10:12; Gal. 3:28) is based on this oneness of God (cf. Deut. 6:4), who, unlike pagan deities, cannot be bound to a particular geographical area or nation but extends his saving love to all men equally (1 Tim. 2:3–5). Paul’s whole ministry as apostle to the Gentiles (rejected by many Jewish Christians) grew out of this presupposition.

The foundation for this new Jew-Gentile unity was to be found in the person of Christ, who for Paul was a second Adam (1 Cor. 15:47), the head of a newly created humanity balancing and repairing the old. “New creation” thinking often finds expression in Paul (see esp. Rom. 5:12–21; 1 Cor. 15:42–54): Jews and Gentiles have been united into “one new man,” the crucified Christ who breaks down the old barriers (Eph. 2:11–16).

This new man has been raised to God’s right hand (Eph. 1:20), where he fulfills the role envisaged for man by the OT: he has all things under his feet (Ps. 8:6; 1 Cor. 15:25–27; Eph. 1:22). As the head of a new humanity, he provides a pattern to be stamped on his descendants, just as Adam’s race was marked by his fall (Rom. 5:18–19; 1 Cor. 15:49; Eph. 4:22–24; Col. 3:10).

God is the one who “calls into existence the things that do not exist” (Rom. 4:17 NRSV). The light of the gospel, shining in believers’ hearts, is comparable to the original light of creation (2 Cor. 4:6). Against this background Paul’s thought moves on a cosmic scale; God has something more glorious in mind than just a new humanity: the transformation of creation is his ultimate goal (Rom. 8:18–25; Eph. 1:9–10; Col. 1:15–20).

History. For Paul history is purposeful, developing toward a goal and along a route predetermined by its one Lord. Therefore he continued to accept the OT as the word of God and argued strenuously that the “new” in Christ must be integrated into the “old” previously given. He fought tremendous battles over the precise nature of this integration. Jewish Christians who thought that the coming of Christ introduced no alteration into God’s purposes with Israel were told that, on the contrary, Christ marks the beginning of the new age in which the gates of salvation are opened to all alike (Rom. 10:13). Gentile Christians who argued that God’s purposes with Israel had been annulled or that the new age was fully manifest in their life and worship were told that, on the contrary, God’s word to Israel still stands (Rom. 9:6; 11:1, 26) and that a final consummation is yet to be: the Holy Spirit pledges something more glorious to come (2 Cor. 1:22; 5:5; Eph. 1:14). Behind all his epistles lies Paul’s concern to establish this subtle balance between old and new in different situations of imbalance.

The Son of God. The OT helped Paul to understand how Christ is the last Adam in God’s purposes and led him to see Christ’s death as the vital turning point between the two ages. Isaiah 53 showed him that Christ’s death was substitutionary, for our sins, so that God’s people could be made righteous through his righteousness (Rom. 4:25; 5:18; Phil. 2:7–8). Reflection on Deuteronomy 21:23, which seemed at first to speak against Christ, produced the revolutionary view that Christ was “cursed” for us (Gal. 3:13). The ritual of the day of atonement (Lev. 16) helped him to see Christ as God’s appointed offering and place of atonement, whereby his people are thoroughly and finally cleansed (Rom. 3:24; 8:3; 2 Cor. 5:21). The passover ritual of Exodus 12 showed how Christ was “our paschal lamb,” sacrificed to redeem the people of God from bondage and set them on the hard road to glory (1 Cor. 5:7–8; 11:23–32; Eph. 1:7; Col. 1:11–14). His reflection on Jesus’ use of Daniel’s “Son of Man” vision (Dan. 7) led him to see that, paradoxically, the death that looked like a final defeat was actually a tremendous victory over the powers of this world (Rom. 8:31–39; 1 Cor. 2:6–8; Gal. 6:14; Col. 2:15). The resurrection he learned to see as God’s response to Christ’s death (Rom. 1:4; 6:4; 1 Cor. 15:15; Phil. 2:9–11), and thus as God’s response to the whole new humanity, which will likewise be raised to glory (Rom. 6:5; 8:11; 1 Cor. 6:14; 15:20–22; Eph. 2:4–7; Phil. 3:8–11; Col. 2:13–14; 1 Thess. 4:14) and must begin to express that new life now (Rom. 6:4, 11; Col. 2:20–3:5).

The People of God. Paul’s conversion took him from one “people of God” to another. The tension inevitably produced by these rival claims meant that he had to establish his theology of the church from first principles upward. The most important issue in this struggle was justification, because of the common conviction that God will one day judge the world (cf. Rom. 3:6). Who will then be acquitted, “justified”? Paul rejected his Jewish contemporaries’ view (which he had previously accepted) that God’s covenant with Israel assured it of forgiveness and acquittal. If this alone were necessary, why did Christ die (Gal. 2:21)? The bald fact of the death of God’s Son showed Paul that justification could not come through “works of the law” (Rom. 3:20; Gal. 2:16; 3:10)—i.e., through mere dependence, however heartfelt and zealous, on the status conferred by God’s gift of the law. Even the most impeccable Jewish record, such as Paul himself had (Gal. 1:14; Phil. 3:4–7), was useless. Though prompted to this view by his sudden encounter with Christ, Paul yet came to see that the OT points to its own weakness, by offering nothing more secure than a precarious existence “under a curse” (Gal. 3:10), where human weakness might at any moment trigger the curses listed in Deuteronomy 28:15–68. Christ alone could give assurance of justification, because Christ alone had overcome the sin which has made the law incapable of giving the promised blessing (Rom. 7:7–8; 8:3). But this dethroning of the law as the central salvific principle demolished the barriers of Israel and opened justification to all who would simply embrace Christ and, through reception of his Holy Spirit, begin to evidence the faith and love for God for which the OT longed in vain (Deut. 6:4; 9:13–14; 29:4; Ezek. 18:31; 36:26; Rom. 5:5; 6:17; Gal. 3:14, 23–26). Paul was thus able to claim that he, with his “law-free gospel” offered to all alike, was more faithful to the law (Rom. 3:31) than were those who urged that salvation could be enjoyed only within the borders of Israel. Through Christ, who is its “end” (Rom. 10:4), the law is delivered from its bondage to sin (Rom. 7:10–11) and its nationalist limitations (Gal. 5:3) and restored to its proper role as the guide of the people of God. Hence Paul’s confident handling of the OT.

The Will of God. Some scholars (e.g., Knox) argue that Paul’s theology contains no essential ethic, because his gospel of justification is about eschatological status before God and does not touch everyday life. This view can be held only when justification is removed from its essential context in Paul’s missionary activity—namely, the debate over who are the people of God. For the people of God do not merely exist eschatologically but are also an earthly reality. They will exist supremely at the end, at “the revealing of the sons of God” (Rom. 8:19), but their justification is also present (Rom. 5:1) and constitutes them a distinctive entity. When Paul writes that the Gentiles who did not pursue justification have attained it (Rom. 9:30), he is referring to something obvious here and now, to the incorporation of the Gentiles into the distinctive new lifestyle of the church. Hence the “therefore” of Romans 12:1 (introducing the practical section of the epistle) is truly logical, and continues the exposition of justification in Romans 1–11.

The new Christian lifestyle is thus integral to Paul’s theology. Its keynotes are the outworking of the love principle (Rom. 12:9–21; 1 Cor. 13; Eph. 5:2; Col. 3:14) through the formation of a Christian mind (Rom. 8:5; 12:2, 17; 1 Cor. 2:15–16; Eph. 4:17–24; Phil. 4:8) under the empowering presence of the Holy Spirit (Rom. 8:13; 12:11; Gal. 5:22–25; Eph. 3:14–18; 5:18–20; 1 Thess. 1:6) in the context of an interdependent community life (Rom. 12; 1 Cor. 12; Eph. 4:1–16; Col. 3:12–4:1) inspired by a constant awareness of the imminent eschatological goal (Rom. 8:23–25; 13:11–14; 1 Cor. 7:29–31; 2 Cor. 5:9–10; Gal. 6:8; Phil. 3:12–14; 1 Thess. 5:4–11).

S. MOTYER

Bibliography. G. Bornkamm, Paul; F. F. Bruce, Paul and Jesus; J. W. Drane, Paul: Libertine or Legalist?; V. P. Furnish, Theology and Ethics in Paul; M. D. Hooker, From Adam to Christ: Essays on Paul; J. Knox, Chapters in a Life of Paul; L. L. Morris, “Theme of Romans,” in Apostolic History and the Gospel, W. W. Gasque and R. P. Martin, eds.; H. N. Ridderbos, Paul: An Outline of His Theology; T. R. Schreiner, Law and Its Fulfillment; G. B. Stevens, Pauline Theology; J. M. G. Volf, Paul and Perseverance; D. Wenham, Paul: Follower of Jesus or Founder of Christianity?; D. E. H. Whiteley, Theology of St. Paul; B. Witherington III, Paul’s Narrative Thought World: The Tapestry of Tragedy and Triumph; N. T. Wright, Climax of the Covenant; J. A. Ziesler, Pauline Christianity.

Paulicians. A highly independent Christian sect that arose in the heart of the Eastern church about A.D. 750. They are frequently interpreted as either “early Protestants” or “radical oriental dualists,” neither view giving the entire truth. They were the most influential sect of their time, but their formative force on later reform parties is problematical. Though much maligned in contemporary polemical literature, they are seen in the ancient Paulician work, Key of Truth, translated by F. C. Conybeare in 1898, as a true reform party.

Paulicians

They were anti-Romanists, repudiating Mariolatry, intercession of saints, and the use of relics and images. They strongly despised the Roman hierarchy, having themselves only one grade of ministry. In rejecting infant baptism they taught that thirty was the age for immersion, during which ordinance the Holy Spirit was received. Repentance was also a sacrament and the Agape was practiced with the sacrament of "the body and the blood."

In Christology they were adoptionists but not docetics, as often thought. They valued the Pauline writings very highly but made use of other NT and OT books in Key of Truth.

W. N. KERR

See also ADOPTIONISM.

Bibliography. W. F. Adeney, Greek and Eastern Churches; R. A. Knox, Enthusiasm; C. A. Scott, HERE; C. H. Williams, Radical Reformers.

Paul of Samosata. Bishop of Antioch from 260 to 272. Questions about his orthodoxy generated synodal efforts against him early in his tenure. In 268 a large synod was held at Antioch which, under the dominance of Malchion, a local presbyter, excommunicated him. The portions of the synodal letter preserved by Eusebius deal only with Paul's misconduct, but other sources reveal that the real issue was his Christology. Paul refused to be deposed but was finally ejected from the church building by Emperor Aurelian in 272.

Although Paul's beliefs are obscured by the polemical nature of the sources which preserve them, certain features do stand out. His theology was monarchian and his Christology a form of adoptionism. Jesus was a mere man, begotten by the Holy Spirit and born of the Virgin Mary, properly called Christ because of his anointing by the Holy Spirit. The Logos (wisdom) was an impersonal quality of God that came together with and indwelt the man Jesus Christ, but remained in essence distinct. Having enabled Jesus Christ to become great, the Logos returned to God. For his sinlessness Jesus Christ was granted the titles Redeemer and Savior and secured an eternal union of his will with God. Paul's doctrine of the Holy Spirit is unclear.

Modern attention on the controversy has centered as much on his opponents' theology, which resembled later Apollinarianism, as on Paul's. Eusebius regarded Paul as the theological heir of the heresy of Artemon/Artemas, and there appears to have been some connection between Paul's followers and later Arians.

G. T. BURKE

See also ADOPTIONISM; ANTIOCHENE THEOLOGY; ARIUS, ARIANISM; MONARCHIANISM.

Bibliography. Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History; H. J. Lawlor, "Sayings of Paul of Samosata," JTS 19:20-45; R. L. Sample, "Christology of the Council of Antioch (268 C.E.) Reconsidered," CH 48:18-26.

Peace. The primary and basic idea of the biblical word "peace" (OT šālôm; NT eirēnē) is completeness, soundness, wholeness. It is a favorite biblical greeting (Gen. 29:6; Luke 24:36) and is found at the beginning or end of all the NT epistles except James and 1 John. To this day it is one of the commonest words among the Semites. Dismissal is also expressed by the word (1 Sam. 1:17). It means cessation from war (Josh. 9:15). Friendship between companions is expressed by it (Gen. 26:29; Ps. 28:3), as well as friendship with God through a covenant (Num. 25:12; Isa. 54:10). Contentment or anything working toward safety, welfare, and happiness is included in the concept (Isa. 32:17-18).

Peace has reference to health, prosperity, well-being, security, as well as quiet from war (Eccles. 3:8; Isa. 45:7). The prophet Isaiah pointed out repeatedly that there will be no peace for the wicked (Isa. 48:22; 57:21), even though many of the wicked continually seek to encourage themselves with a false peace (Jer. 6:14).

Peace is a condition of freedom from strife, whether internal or external. Security from outward enemies (Isa. 26:12), as well as calm of heart for those trusting God (Job 22:21; Isa. 26:3), is included. Peace is so pleasing to the Lord that the godly are enjoined to seek it diligently (Ps. 34:14; Zech. 8:16, 19). It is to be a characteristic of the NT believer also (Mark 9:50; 2 Cor. 13:11). Peace is a comprehensive and valued gift from God, and the promised and climaxing blessing in messianic times (Isa. 2:4; 9:6-7; 11:6; Mic. 4:1-4; 5:5).

"To hold one's peace" means simply to be silent (Luke 14:4). The words in the OT (e.g., hāraš) and the NT (e.g., siōpaō) have nothing in common with the words now under consideration.

In the NT the word eirēnē has reference to the peace which is the gift of Christ (John 14:27; 16:33; Rom. 5:1; Phil. 4:7). The word is used many times to express the truths of the mission, character, and gospel of Christ. The purpose of Christ's coming into the world was to bring spiritual peace with God (Mark 5:34; 9:50; Luke 1:79; 2:14; 24:36). There is a sense in which he came not to bring peace but a sword (Matt. 10:34). This has reference to the struggle with every form of sin. Christ's life depicted in the Gospels is one of majestic calm and serenity (Matt. 11:28; John 14:27). The essence of the gospel may be expressed in the term "peace" (Acts 10:36; Eph. 6:15), including the peace of reconciliation with God (Rom. 5:1) and the peace of fellowship with God (Gal. 5:22; Phil. 4:7).

The innumerable blessings of the Christian revolve around the concept of peace. The gospel is the gospel of peace (Eph. 6:15). Christ is our peace (Eph. 2:14–15); God the Father is the God of peace (1 Thess. 5:23). The inalienable privilege of every Christian is the peace of God (Phil. 4:9) because of the legacy of peace left by Christ in his death (John 14:27; 16:33). These blessings are not benefits laid up in eternal glory only but are a present possession (Rom. 8:6; Col. 3:15). Thus, peace is “a conception distinctly peculiar to Christianity, the tranquil state of a soul assured of its salvation through Christ, and so fearing nothing from God and content with its earthly lot, of whatever sort that is” (Thayer, 182).

C. L. FEINBERG

Bibliography. D. J. Atkinson, Peace in Our Time?: Some Biblical Groundwork; H. Beck and C. Brown, NIDNTT 2:776–83; R. Burggraave, Swords into Plowshares; A. C. Cochrane, Mystery of Peace; W. Foerster and G. von Rad, TDNT 2:400–401; U. Mauser, Gospel of Peace; E. Stauffer, New Testament Theology; J. H. Thayer, Greek–English Lexicon of the New Testament; J. H. Yoder, He Came Preaching Peace.

Peace Offering. See OFFERINGS AND SACRIFICES IN BIBLE TIMES.

Pelagius, Pelagianism. Pelagianism is that teaching, originating in the late fourth century, which stresses one’s ability to take the initial steps toward salvation by one’s own efforts, apart from special grace. It is sharply opposed by Augustinianism, which emphasizes the absolute necessity of God’s interior grace for salvation.

Pelagius was an eminently moral person who became a fashionable teacher at Rome late in the fourth century. British by birth, he was a zealous ascetic. Whether he was a monk or not we cannot say, but he clearly supported monastic ideals. In his early writings he argued against the Arians but fired his big guns against the Manichaeans. Their dualistic fatalism infuriated the moralist in him.

While in Rome, Pelagius studied Augustine’s anti-Manichaean writings, particularly On Free Will. He came to oppose passionately Augustine’s quietism, reflected in his prayer in the Confessions: “Give what thou commandest—and command what thou wilt” (10.31.45).

When the Visigoths surged upon Rome in 410/411, Pelagius sought refuge in Africa. After avoiding an encounter with Augustine, he moved on to Jerusalem, where he gained a good reputation. No one took offense at his teaching.

Meanwhile in Africa, Pelagius’s pupil Coelestius, a less cautious and more superficial man, had pointedly drawn out the consequences of Pelagius’s teaching on freedom. Churchmen in the area of Carthage solemnly charged him with heresy. According to Augustine, Coelestius did not accept the “remission of sins” in infant baptism. Such an assertion of “innocence” of newborn babies denied the basic relationship in which all men stand “since Adam.” It was claiming that unredeemed man is sound and free to do all good. It was rendering salvation by Christ superfluous.

Augustine sent his own disciple Orosius to the East in an attempt to gain the condemnation of Pelagius. But in the East churchmen were unable to see anything more than an obstinate quarrel about trivialities. They acquitted Pelagius, a decision that infuriated the Africans, who turned toward Rome and compelled Pope Innocent I to expressly condemn the new heresy.

The keystone of Pelagianism is the idea of unconditional free will and moral responsibility. In creating humanity God did not subject persons, like other creatures, to the law of nature but gave them the unique privilege of accomplishing the divine will by choice. This possibility of freely choosing the good entails the possibility of choosing evil.

According to Pelagius there are three features in human action: power (posse), will (velle), and the realization (esse). The first comes exclusively from God; the other two belong to humans. Thus, as one acts, one merits praise or blame. Whatever his followers may have said, Pelagius himself held the conception of a divine law proclaiming to people what they ought to do and setting between them the prospect of supernatural rewards and punishments. If one enjoys freedom of choice, it is by the express bounty of the Creator; he or she ought to use it for those ends that God prescribes.

The rest of Pelagianism flows from this central thought of freedom. First, it rejects the idea that a person’s will has any intrinsic bias in favor of wrongdoing as a result of the fall. Since each soul is created immediately by God, as Pelagius believed, then it cannot come into the world soiled by original sin transmitted from Adam. Before a person begins exercising his will, “there is only in him what God has created.” The effect of infant baptism, then, is not eternal life but “spiritual illumination, adoption as children of God, citizenship of the heavenly Jerusalem.”

Second, Pelagius considers grace purely an external aid provided by God. He leaves no room for any special interior action of God upon the soul. By “grace” Pelagius really means free will itself or the revelation of God’s law through reason, instructing us in what we should do and holding out to us eternal sanctions. Since this revelation has become obscured through evil customs, grace now includes the law of Moses and the teaching and example of Christ.

Pelagius, Pelagianism

This grace is offered equally to all. God is no respecter of persons. By merit alone one advances in holiness. God's predestination operates according to the quality of the lives God foresees people will lead.

Theologians often describe Pelagianism as a form of naturalism. But this label scarcely does justice to its religious spirit. Defective though the system is in its recognition of humanity's weakness, it does reflect an awareness of humanity's high calling and the claims of the moral law. Yet Pelagianism's one-sidedness remains an inadequate interpretation of Christianity. This was especially so after Coelestius pushed into the foreground the denial of original sin, the teaching that Adam was created mortal, and the idea that children are eligible for eternal life even without baptism. This rosy view of human nature and inadequate understanding of divine grace was finally condemned in 431 at the Council of Ephesus.

B. L. SHELLEY

See also AUGUSTINE OF HIPPO.

Bibliography. G. Bonner, Augustine and Modern Research on Pelagianism; P. Brown, Religion and Society in the Age of St. Augustine; R. F. Evans, Pelagius: Inquiries and Reappraisals; J. Ferguson, Pelagius; B. R. Rees, Pelagius, A Reluctant Heretic.

Penal Theory of the Atonement. See ATONEMENT, THEORIES OF.

Penance. Derived from the Latin poena ("penalty"), the term refers to disciplinary measures adopted by the church against offenders. In early days it applied to those guilty of such glaring offenses as apostasy, murder, or adultery, who were allowed only one chance of restoration after undergoing a course of fastings, etc., on public confession of their sin in renewal of the baptismal profession, and on acceptance of certain lasting prohibitions—e.g., continence in the case of the unmarried. With the barbarian invasions this severe discipline was mitigated, and in the Celtic Penitentials we find that secret confession is allowed and restoration begins to precede the penances, which become much more formal and may be replaced by cash payments according to current notions of satisfaction.

Two notable developments took place in the Middle Ages. First, penance at least once a year was made compulsory from 1215. Second, the whole understanding was developed in a new way that ultimately found codification at the Council of Trent, when penance was officially accepted as a sacrament. It was still agreed that the eternal guilt of mortal sins after baptism could be met only by the atoning work of Christ, true contrition, and the word of absolution. From this angle penance properly speaking remained disciplinary. But it was now argued that the temporal guilt of either mortal or venial sin may be met in part by the actual penances, thus mitigating the final expiation demanded in purgatory. In addition, voluntary alms, Masses, and drawings on the so-called treasury of merit—e.g., by indulgences—could be used for the same purpose and could even take the place of penances. Quite apart from the obviously nonscriptural nature of this whole system, five main evils may be seen in it: (1) it misunderstands the problem of postbaptismal sin; (2) it detracts from the atonement; (3) it promotes related errors such as purgatory, Masses, indulgences, and invocation of saints; (4) it creates legalism and formalism; and (5) it gives rise to the moral evils of the confessional.

The Reformers cut through the whole falsification of theory and practice by insisting that what the NT demands is not penance but penitence or repentance, though they saw a real value in the restoring of true discipline and of course the private counseling of those troubled in conscience as individually required.

G. W. BROMILEY

See also ABSOLUTION; INDULGENCES; PENITENCE; REPENTANCE.

Bibliography. J. Macquarrie, Reconciliation of a Penitent; R. C. Mortimer, Canons and Decrees of the Council of Trent; Origins of Private Penance in the Western Church; Catechism of Trent; J. R. W. Stott, Confess Your Sins; O. D. Watkins, History of Penance.

Penitence. Among Protestants penitence is considered a synonym for repentance, sorrow for sin, and the turning away from it to lead a new life. It should not be confused with penance, a sacrament in the Roman Catholic Church that stresses the performance of ecclesiastically prescribed acts to make satisfaction for postbaptismal sins.

Jesus' message, as well as that of his immediate disciples, was characterized by the call for men to repent (Mark 1:15; 6:12; Luke 10:13). The Greek term metanoō holds two ideas: "to change one's mind" and "to regret or feel remorse." Thus, repentance is one aspect of conversion, the other being faith. Together they form one experience in which a person turns from sin to Christ.

B. L. SHELLEY

See also REPENTANCE.

Pentecost. A term derived from the Greek pentēkostos, meaning fiftieth, which was applied to the fiftieth day after Passover. It was the culmination of the Feast of Weeks (Exod. 34:22; Deut. 16:10), which began on the third day after Passover with the presentation of the first harvest sheaves to God and which concluded with the offering of two loaves of unleavened bread, representing the first products of the harvest (Lev. 23:17–20; Deut. 16:9–10). After the exile it became one of the great pilgrimage feasts of Judaism, at which many of those who lived in remote sections of the Roman world returned to Jerusalem for worship (Acts 2:1–12). For that reason it served as a bond to unite the Jewish world of the first century and to remind them of their history.

In the Christian church Pentecost is the anniversary of the coming of the Holy Spirit. When Jesus ascended, he instructed his disciples to remain in Jerusalem until they should receive power from on high. As a group of 120 were praying in an upper room in Jerusalem fifty days after his death, the Holy Spirit descended upon them with the sound of a great wind and with tongues of fire which settled upon each of them. They began to speak in other languages and to preach boldly in the name of Christ, with the result that three thousand were converted. This tremendous manifestation of divine power marked the beginning of the church, which has ever since regarded Pentecost as its birthday.

In the church year Pentecost covered the period from Easter to Pentecost Sunday. The day itself was observed by feasting and was a favorite occasion for administering baptism. It was the third great Christian feast after Christmas and Easter. In the liturgy of the Anglican Church it is called Whitsunday, from the custom of wearing white clothing on that day.

M. C. TENNEY

See also CHRISTIAN YEAR; FEASTS AND FESTIVALS, OLD TESTAMENT.

Pentecostalism. An evangelical charismatic reformation movement that usually traces its roots to an outbreak of tongues-speaking in Topeka, Kansas, in 1901 under the leadership of Charles Fox Parham, a former Methodist preacher. It was Parham who formulated the basic Pentecostal doctrine of “initial evidence” after a student in his Bethel Bible School, Agnes Ozman, experienced glossolalia in January 1901.

Basically Pentecostals believe that the experience of the 120 on the day of Pentecost, known as the “baptism in the Holy Spirit,” should be normative for all Christians. Most Pentecostals believe, furthermore, that the first sign or “initial evidence” of this second baptism is speaking in a language unknown to the speaker.

Although speaking in tongues had appeared in the nineteenth century in both England and America, it had never assumed the importance attributed to it by the later Pentecostals. For instance, glossolalia occurred in the 1830s under the ministry of Presbyterian Edward Irving in London, in the services of Mother Anne Lee’s Shaker movement in England and America, and among Joseph Smith’s Mormon followers in New York, Missouri, and Utah. The Pentecostals, however, were the first to give doctrinal primacy to the practice.

Though Pentecostals recognize such sporadic instances of tongues-speaking and other charismatic phenomena throughout the Christian era, they stress the special importance of the Azusa Street revival, which occurred in an abandoned African Methodist Episcopal church in downtown Los Angeles from 1906 to 1909 and launched Pentecostalism as a worldwide movement. The Azusa Street services were led by William J. Seymour, a black Holiness preacher from Houston, Texas, and a student of Parham.

The Topeka and Los Angeles events took place in a turn-of-the-century religious environment that encouraged the appearance of such a Pentecostal movement. The major milieu out of which Pentecostalism sprang was the worldwide Holiness movement, which had developed out of nineteenth-century American Methodism. Leaders in this movement were Phoebe Palmer and John Inskip, who emphasized a “second blessing” crisis of sanctification through the “baptism in the Holy Spirit.” English evangelicals also stressed a separate Holy Spirit experience in the Keswick Conventions beginning in 1874.

From America and England “higher life” Holiness movements spread to many nations of the world, usually under the auspices of Methodist missionaries and traveling evangelists. Although these revivalists did not stress charismatic phenomena, they emphasized a conscious experience of baptism in the Holy Spirit and an expectancy of a restoration of the New Testament church as a sign of the end of the church age.

Other teachings that became prominent in this period were the possibility of miraculous divine healing in answer to prayer and the expectation of the imminent premillennial second coming of Christ. The outstanding leader in the early healing movement was R. Charles Cullis, a Boston physician who built his first “healing home” for the sick in 1864 where patients would be treated with prayer rather than medicine. Others included A. B. Simpson and A. J. Gordon, who emphasized healing in the atonement. The most flamboyant was the Australian healer Alexander Sowie, who built “Zion City” near Chicago in 1900 to bring “leaves of healing” to the nations. The teaching of a “premillennial rapture” of the church was first promoted in Britain and the United States by John Nelson Darby, founder of the Plymouth Brethren. At the same time these doctrines were being emphasized, a greater emphasis on the person and work of the Holy Spirit elicited the publication of many books and periodicals devoted to teaching seekers how to receive an “endowment of power” through an experience in the Holy Spirit subsequent to conversion.

In the quest to be filled with the Holy Spirit, many testimonies were given concerning emotional experiences that accompanied the “second blessing," as it was called. In the tradition of the American frontier some received the experience with eruptions of joy or shouting, while others wept or spoke of surpassing peace and quietness.

Pentecostalism

By 1895 a further movement was begun in Iowa that stressed a "third blessing" called "the fire," which followed the conversion and sanctification experiences already taught by the Holiness movement. The leader of this movement was Benjamin Hardin Irwin from Lincoln, Nebraska, who named his new group the Fire-Baptized Holiness Church. Other "fire" groups formed during this period included the Pillar of Fire Church of Denver, Colorado, led by Alma White, and the Burning Bush of Minneapolis, Minnesota. In Canada R. C. Horner led a "third blessing" movement that paralleled those in the United States.

Not only did such Holiness teachers emphasize conscious religious experiences, they tended to encourage persons to seek for them as "crisis" experiences that could be received in an instant of time through prayer and faith. By 1990 the Holiness movement had begun to think of religious experiences more in terms of crises than in gradual categories. Thus the Fire-Baptized Holiness Church taught instant conversion through the new birth, instant sanctification as a second blessing, instant baptism in the Holy Ghost and fire, instant divine healing through prayer, and the instant premillennial second coming of Christ.

These teachers of the British and American Keswick persuasion tended to speak of the four cardinal doctrines of the movement. In America this way of thinking was formalized in A. B. Simpson's four basic doctrines of the Christian and Missionary Alliance, which stressed salvation, baptism in the Holy Spirit, divine healing, and the second coming of Christ.

Thus, when tongues-speaking occurred in Topeka in 1901, the only significant addition to the foregoing was to insist that tongues-speaking was the biblical evidence of receiving the Holy Spirit baptism. All the other teachings and practices of Pentecostalism were adapted from the Holiness milieu in which it was born, including its style of worship, its hymnody, and its basic theology.

After 1906 Pentecostalism spread rapidly in the United States and around the world. Despite its origins in the Holiness movement, the majority of Holiness leaders rejected Pentecostalism. Some, such as Alma White, made charges of demon possession and mental instability against the Pentecostals. Most of the leaders in the oldest Holiness denominations rejected Pentecostal teachings outright. These included the Church of Nazarene, the Wesleyan Methodist Church, the Church of God (Anderson, Indiana), and The Salvation Army.

Other younger and more radical Holiness groups, however, were rapidly Pentecostalized as leaders went to Azusa Street to investigate the phenomena in evidence there. Among the Azusa Street "pilgrims" were G. B. Cashwell (North Carolina), C. H. Mason (Tennessee), Glen Cook (California), A. G. Argue (Canada), and W. H. Durham (Chicago). Within a year from the opening of the Azusa Street meeting (April 1906), these and many others spread the Pentecostal message around the nation and the world. Sharp controversies and divisions ensued in several Holiness denominations. The first Pentecostal denominations emerged from these struggles from 1906 to 1908.

The wave of Holiness-Pentecostal groups included the Pentecostal Holiness Church, the Church of God in Christ, the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee), the Apostolic Faith (Portland, Oregon), the United Holy Church, and the Pentecostal Free-Will Baptist Church. Most of these churches were located in the southern states and experienced rapid growth after their Pentecostal renewals began. Two of these, the Church of God in Christ and the United Holy Church, were predominantly black.

Pentecostalism also spread rapidly around the world after 1906. The leading pioneer was Thomas Ball Barratt, a Norwegian Methodist pastor who founded flourishing Pentecostal movements in Norway, Sweden, and England. The German pioneer was the Holiness leader Jonathan Paul. Lewi Pethrus, a convert of Barratt's, began a significant Pentecostal movement in Sweden which originated among the Baptists. Strong Pentecostal movements also broke out among Italians in Italy, Argentina, Canada, and Brazil through the ministries of American immigrants Luigi Francescon and Giacomo Lombardi. Pentecostalism was introduced to Russia and other Slavic nations through the efforts of Ivan Voronaeff, a Russian-born American immigrant from New York City who established the first Russian-language Pentecostal church in Manhattan in 1919. In 1920 he began a ministry in Odessa, Russia, which was the origin of the movement in the Slavic nations. Voronaeff founded over 350 congregations in Russia, Poland, and Bulgaria before being arrested by the Soviet police in 1929. He died in prison.

Pentecostalism reached Chile in 1909 under the leadership of an American Methodist missionary, Willis C. Hoover. When the Methodist Church rejected Pentecostal manifestations, a schism occurred that resulted in the organization of the Methodist Pentecostal Church. Extremely rapid growth after 1909 made Pentecostalism the predominant form of Protestantism in Chile. The Pentecostal movement in Brazil began in 1910 under the leadership of two American Swedish immigrants, Daniel Berg and Gunnar Vingren, who began Pentecostal services in a Baptist church in Belem, Para. A schism soon followed, resulting in the first Brazilian Pentecostal congregation, which took the name Assemblies of God. Phenomenal growth also caused Pentecostalism to be the major Protestant force in Brazil.

South Africa received the Pentecostal message in 1908 under the ministry of John G. Lake, whose ministry began in Zion City under Alexander Dowie of Chicago. In four years Lake established the Apostolic Faith Mission church and the Zion Christian church. By the 1990s the Zion church had grown to be the largest Christian denomination in South Africa. The Korean Pentecostal movement had its roots in indigenous revivals among Presbyterians and Methodists in 1906 and 1907. The formal Korean Pentecostal movement was planted by the American Pentecostal missionary Mary Rumsey, who arrived in Korea in 1928. Out of the churches pioneered by Rumsey was born the Korean Assemblies of God in 1985, a church that produced Paul Yonggi Cho. By the end of the century, Cho's "Yoido Full Gospel Church" in Seoul had grown to be the largest Christian congregation in the world with 700,000 members.

It was inevitable that such a vigorous movement would suffer controversy and division in its formative stages. Though the movement has been noted for its many submovements, only two divisions have been considered major. These involved teachings concerning sanctification and the Trinity.

The sanctification controversy grew out of the Holiness theology held by most of the first Pentecostals, including Parham and Seymour. Having taught that sanctification was a "second work of grace" prior to their Pentecostal experiences, they simply added the baptism of the Holy Spirit with glossolalia as a "third blessing." In 1910 William H. Durham of Chicago began teaching his "finished work" theory, which emphasized sanctification as a progressive work following conversion, with baptism in the Holy Spirit as the second blessing.

The Assemblies of God, which was formed in 1914, based its theology on Durham's teachings and soon became the largest Pentecostal denomination in the world. Most of the Pentecostal groups that began after 1914 were based on the model of the Assemblies of God. They include the Pentecostal Church of God, the International Church of the Foursquare Gospel (founded in 1927 by Aimee Semple McPherson), and the Open Bible Standard Church.

A more serious schism grew out of the "oneness" or "Jesus only" controversy, which began in 1911 in Los Angeles. Led by Glen Cook and Frank Ewart, this movement rejected the teaching of the Trinity and taught that Jesus Christ was at the same time Father, Son, and Holy Spirit and that the only biblical mode of water baptism was administered in Jesus' name and then was valid only if accompanied by glossolalia. This movement spread rapidly in the infant Assemblies of God after 1914 and resulted in a schism in 1916, which later produced the Pentecostal Assemblies of the World and the United Pentecostal Church.

Through the years other schisms occurred over lesser doctrinal disputes and personality clashes, producing such movements as the Church of God of Prophecy and the Congregational Holiness Church. The vast majority of Pentecostal sects in America and the world, however, did not result from controversy or schism. In most cases Pentecostal denominations developed out of separate indigenous churches originating in different areas of the world with little or no contact with other organized bodies.

The greatest growth for Pentecostal churches came after World War II. With more mobility and greater prosperity, Pentecostals began to move into the middle class and to lose their image of being disinherited members of the lower classes. The emergence of healing evangelists such as William Branham, Oral Roberts, and Jack Cole in the 1950s brought greater interest and acceptance to the movement. The TV ministry of Roberts also brought Pentecostalism into the homes of the average American. The founding of the Full Gospel Business Men in 1952 by Los Angeles dairyman Demos Shakarian brought the Pentecostal message to a whole new class of middle-class professional and business men, helping further to change the image of the movement.

In the post-World War II period the Pentecostals also began to emerge from their isolation, not only from each other but from other Christian groups as well. In 1943 the Assemblies of God, the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee), the International Church of the Foursquare Gospel, and the Pentecostal Holiness Church became charter members of the National Association of Evangelicals (NAE), thus clearly disassociating themselves from the organized fundamentalist groups which had disfellowshipped the Pentecostals in 1928. They thus became part of the moderate evangelical camp that grew to prominence by the 1970s.

Intrapentecostal ecumenism began to flourish also during the late 1940s both in the United States and elsewhere. In 1947 the first World Pentecostal Conference (WPC) met in Zurich, Switzerland, and has since met triennially. The next year the "Pentecostal Fellowship of North America" (PFNA) was formed in Des Moines, Iowa, as a coalition of mainstream white trinitarian bodies. In 1944 the group abandoned the segregated pattern adopted in Des Moines for a new racially inclusive body known as the "Pentecostal-Charismatic Churches of North America" (PCCNA).

Pentecostalism

Pentecostalism entered a new phase in 1960 with the appearance of "neo-Pentecostalism" in the traditional churches in the United States. The first well-known person to openly experience glossolalia and remain within his church was Dennis Bennett, an Episcopal priest in Van Nuys, California. Although forced to leave his parish in Van Nuys because of controversy over his experience, Bennett was invited to pastor an inner-city Episcopal parish in Seattle, Washington. The church in Seattle experienced rapid growth after the introduction of Pentecostal worship, becoming a center of neo-Pentecostalism in the northwestern United States.

This new wave of Pentecostalism soon spread to other denominations in the United States and also to many other nations. Other well-known neo-Pentecostal leaders were Brick Bradford and James Brown (Presbyterian), John Osteen and Howard Irvin (Baptist), Gerald Derstine and Bishop Nelson Litwiler (Mennonite), Larry Christenson (Lutheran), and Ross Whetstone (United Methodist).

In 1966 Pentecostalism entered the Roman Catholic Church as a result of a weekend retreat at Duquesne University led by theology professors Ralph Keifer and Bill Story. As the experience of glossolalia and other charismatic gifts spread, other Catholic prayer groups were formed at Notre Dame University and the University of Michigan. By 1973 the movement had grown so rapidly that thirty thousand Catholic Pentecostals gathered at Notre Dame for a national conference. The movement had spread to Catholic churches in over a hundred nations by 1980. Other prominent Catholic Pentecostal leaders were Kevin Ranaghan, Steve Clark, and Ralph Martin. The most prominent leader among Catholics, however, was Joseph Leon Cardinal Suenens, who was named by Popes Paul VI and John Paul II as episcopal adviser to the renewal.

In order to distinguish these newer Pentecostals from the older Pentecostals, the charismatic renewal was generally allowed to remain within the mainline churches. Favorable study reports by the Episcopalians (1963), Roman Catholics (1969, 1974), and the Presbyterians (1970), while pointing out possible excesses, generally were tolerant and open to the existence of a Pentecostal spirituality as a renewal movement within the traditional churches.

By the 1980 the classical Pentecostals had grown to be the largest family of Protestants in the world, according to World Christian Encyclopedia edited by David Barratt. The 51 million figure attributed to the traditional Pentecostals did not include the 11 million charismatic Pentecostals in the traditional mainline churches. By 1995 the global number of Pentecostals and charismatics had reached 463 million, making them the second largest family of Christians in the world after the Roman Catholic Church. The denominational Pentecostals, with 215 million members, continue to experience explosive worldwide growth. Thus the Pentecostal and charismatic movements have become the most vigorous and fastest-growing family of Christians in the world, a movement which Harvey Cox of Harvard University predicted would "reshape Christianity in the twenty-first century."

V. SYNAN

See also AZUSA STREET REVIVAL; BAPTISM OF THE SPIRIT; CHARISMATIC MOVEMENT; HOLINESS MOVEMENT, AMERICAN; KESWICK CONVENTION; SPIRITUAL GIFTS; TONGUES, SPEAKING IN.

Bibliography. J. Anderson, Vision of the Disinherited; S. Burgess, G. Magee, and P. Alexander, Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements; H. Cox, Fire from Heaven; D. Dayton, Theological Roots of Pentecostalism; M. P. Hamilton, ed., Charismatic Movement; W. J. Hollenweger, Pentecostals; K. McDonnell, ed., Presence, Power, Praise; K. and D. Ranaghan, Catholic Pentecostals; V. Synan, Holiness-Pentecostal Movement; J. R. Williams, Gift of the Holy Spirit Today.

Perfection, Perfectionism. The quest for religious perfection has been an important goal throughout Judeo-Christian history. Both biblical and theological evidence reflects this continuous concern. Although interpretations have varied with reference to methods and chronology of attainment, most Christian traditions recognize the concept.

The Biblical Emphasis. The OT roots for religious perfection signify wholeness and perfect peace. The most frequently used term for "perfect" is tāmîm, which occurs eighty-five times and is usually translated teleios in the LXX. Of these occurrences fifty refer to sacrificial animals and are usually translated "without blemish" or "without spot." When applied to persons the term describes one who is without moral blemish or defect (Ps. 101:2, 6; Job 1:1, 8; 2:3; 8:20, etc.). This term is also applied to Yahweh's character, and this dual usage may suggest the resemblance between persons and God.

Cognate forms of tāmîm are tōm, tām, and tummâ. These terms have connotations of "integrity," "simple," "uncalculating," "sincere," and "perfect." This spiritual wholeness and uprightness, especially as one is in right relationship to God, reflect a relational/ethical perfection that is patterned after the character of God.

Another Hebrew term for perfect is šālēm, an adjectival form of the root šlm, which means "peace." This term has a covenant background and indicates the loyalty and purity of motive that are characteristic of a moral and intellectual life of integrity before God (1 Kings 8:61; 11:4; 15:3). The root idea connotes fellowship between God and his people and a right relationship with the One who is the model of perfection.

The NT vocabulary reflects the OT interpersonal concepts rather than the Greek ideal of static and dispassionate knowledge. The emphases are on obedience, wholeness, and maturity. The Greek words derived from telos reflect the idea of “design,” “end,” “goal,” “purpose.” These words describe perfection as the achievement of a desired end. Paul uses teleios to describe moral and religious perfection (Col. 1:28; 4:12). He contrasts it to nēpios, “childish,” which connotes moral immaturity and deficiency. The “perfect man,” anēr teleios, is the stable person who reflects “the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ” in contrast to the children who are tossed about by every new wind of doctrine (Eph. 4:13–14). James uses teleios to describe the end result of spiritual discipline. The trying of faith develops patience and character that the disciple may be “mature and complete, not lacking anything” (James 1:3–4).

Responsible, spiritual, intellectual, and moral development which conforms to the desired pattern is perfection. In the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus uses teleios to exhort believers to be perfect as the Heavenly Father is perfect (Matt. 5:48). This use of the future tense indicates a moral obligation, however, and not an absolute perfection identical to that of God. Jesus is emphasizing the need for having right attitudes of love that are acceptable to God, not the accomplishment of perfect conduct.

The concept of corporate perfection seen in a community united in love is expressed by the verb katartizō. The moral integrity and spiritual unity of the community are aspects of wholeness and completeness connoted by this term. Interrelatedness in love is a necessary part of the “perfecting of the saints” (1 Cor. 1:10; Eph. 4:13; Heb. 13:21). Other usages imply putting into order those things which are imperfect (1 Thess. 3:10–13), fitting and adjusting (Heb. 11:3), and mending (Mark 1:19; 2 Cor. 13:11).

Ethical righteousness is expressed by the word amemptos, “blameless” or “without fault or defect.” The piety of Zacharias and Elisabeth is amemptoi (Luke 1:6).

Personal fitness and perfection in the sense of properly using spiritual resources is denoted by artios (2 Tim. 3:17). The believer who is sound and lacks nothing needed for completeness is holoklēros (1 Thess. 5:23; James 1:4).

The biblical emphasis on perfection, then, does not imply absolute perfection but an unblemished character that has moral and spiritual integrity in relationship to God. The goal of spiritual maturity is set forth, and the believer is charged with making sincere and proper use of the spiritual resources available through Christ in order to attain this maturity in fellowship with Christ and the Christian community.

Theological Issues and Historical Heritage.

The command of Jesus in the Sermon on the Mount, “Be perfect, therefore, as your heavenly Father is perfect” (Matt. 5:48), is central to the issue of human perfection. This text has been variously interpreted and even rejected as inauthentic in the attempts to arrive at theological understanding.

Christian Platonism. Clement of Alexandria and the Christian Platonists sought for perfection in the transfiguration of earthly life, a hallowing of the secular. Faith and knowledge lifted some believers to an experience of religious perfection in which the purposes and desires of the soul were harmonized in love. In his Miscellanies, the ideal was the attainment of uninterrupted communion with God. Paradoxically, Clement insisted on God’s likeness to man while insisting on the possibility of the perfected Gnostic’s becoming like God. Thus perfection was obedientiary, not absolute, and was attained through obedience to God in prayer and keeping the commandments. The weakness in Clement’s view follows from his Platonic tendency to view God as apathetic and without predicates. Although God was active for the salvation of men, Clement emptied both Father and Son of emotions. This Hellenization of God is somewhat incongruous with his view of God as the Father persevering in love. His view of perfection, then, emphasizes that the “Christian Gnostic” rises above human emotions by contemplation of God and is “translated absolutely and entirely to another sphere.”

Clement’s illustrious pupil, Origen, proposed a view of perfection that explicitly reflected the presuppositions of Platonic philosophy. He separated faith and knowledge, with faith being the basis of salvation and knowledge being the means to perfection. A prerequisite to perfection is an ascetic rejection of the external world and all human emotions. His approach was basically humanistic, even though he asserted that human effort must be assisted by grace. Also, his Platonic negative evaluation of the human creature required that perfection be essentially a victory over the body, and more specifically over the sex drive. Furthermore, he anticipated the monastic emphasis of perfection through asceticism and a distinction between the ordinary and the spiritually elite Christian. This tendency toward a double standard of morality reflected the influence of Gnosticism on early Christian thought in that ordinary Christians lived by faith while the enlightened elect lived by gnōsis. This dual level of spirituality became more pronounced as the chasm between clergy and laity widened in the medieval period.

Perfection, Perfectionism

Monasticism. One of the most extensive attempts at attaining Christian perfection is found in monasticism. Leaders such as Antony of Egypt and Pachomius went into solitude to practice their disciplines with the aim of achieving spiritual perfection. They were overwhelmed by the sense of their own unworthiness and by the increasing worldliness of the church. The attaining of their goal involved renouncing all encumbrances of the world, taking up their cross, and praying without ceasing. The ideal of perfection became socialized as expressed in the rules of Basil and Benedict. Monastic communities developed which not only sought perfection by resignation from the world and asceticism, but also attempted to transform the world through extensive missionary efforts and the preservation of spiritual, aesthetic, and intellectual life.

Some of the most profound spiritual insights are found in the Fifty Spiritual Homilies of Macarius the Egyptian. Greatly admired by William Law and John Wesley, Macarius stressed the worth of the individual human soul in the image of God, the incarnation as the basis of the life of the soul, moral purity, and love as the highest measure of the Christian life. His stress on union with Christ is commendable, but his goal of perfection still is a retreat from reality into ecstasy, lacks a relevant ideal for common humanity, and is excessively individualistic.

Gregory of Nyssa was one of the greatest Eastern leaders in the struggle for perfection. He saw Christ as the prototype of the Christian life in his On What It Means to Call Oneself a Christian and On Perfection. The responsibility of the Christian is to imitate the virtues of Christ and to reverence those virtues that are impossible to imitate. Gregory saw the truth of the participation in Christ, which results from rebirth "by water and the Spirit." In this interpersonal sharing the Christian perfects the resemblance to Christ which comes through the continual transformation into his image.

Augustine and Pelagius. In the fourth century the reaction against perfectionism was typified by the controversy between Augustine and Pelagius. Although Augustine affirmed an ideal of perfection, the summum bonum, it was a perfection attainable only in eternity. He felt that human perfection was an impossible moral ideal in this life because of the sinfulness of humankind resulting from the fall.

Pelagius attributed the moral laxity of the church to the kind of blasphemy which told God that what he had commanded was impossible. He rejected the concept of original sin and asserted that persons are born with the free capacity to perfect themselves or corrupt themselves as they choose. Sin is simply a bad habit that can be overcome by an act of the will. Since sin is avoidable, however, Pelagius tended to judge severely those who fell into the slightest sin.

The response of Augustine was that neither education nor human effort could lead to perfection and the only moral progress persons could make in this life was solely the result of God's grace. He tended to equate sinfulness with humanness in general and with concupiscence in particular, and saw the path to perfection as one of celibacy and virginity. While rejecting the attainment of perfection in this life, Augustine made great contributions to spirituality with his emphasis on contemplation, although he tended to diminish the humanity of Christ because of his aversion to the physical. He was certainly correct in his rejection of Pelagius's exclusive emphasis on moral effort and in his emphasis on grace, but his tendency to identify sinfulness with the physical world was an unnecessary vestige of Greek philosophy.

Aquinas. Often called the "Angelic Doctor," Thomas Aquinas has greatly influenced Roman Catholic theology. He was convinced that although Adam lost the gift of divine grace which enabled mankind to enjoy God fully, the free grace of God can restore humanity to God's favor and enable the Christian to follow God's precepts in perfect love. Final perfection and the beatific vision of God were reserved for the life to come, but through contemplation a perfect vision of God and perfect knowledge of truth can be enjoyed in this life. His concept of perfection, however, involved a disparagement of the world and an understanding of the desires of flesh as evil. Thus the elimination of bodily desires was a prerequisite to perfection, and in this aspect he equated perfection with renunciation. Furthermore, he saw perfection as carrying with it human merit, and thus he contributed to the idea of the treasury of merits from which the imperfect can draw at the discretion of the church. Finally, he formed a hierarchy of the state of perfection which corresponded to the levels of the religious orders. Although he did not deny the possibility of perfection for all persons, religious vows were certainly the shortcut to meritorious perfection. He thus perpetuated the spiritual dichotomy between clergy and laity.

Francis of Sales. The possibility of perfection for all Christians was emphasized by Francis of Assisi and the Friars Minor, and Francis of Sales presented this doctrine with clarity in his treatise On the Love of God. He rejected the banishment of the devout life from the experience of common people, and opened up the benefits of spiritual contemplation to all Christians.

François Fénelon. Amid the profligacies of the court of Louis XIV, Fénelon taught his followers to live a life of deep spirituality and introspection. He saw perfection as totally a work of God's grace, not meritorious human effort. The perfect life is carefree and Christlike loving fellowship with others. In Christian Perfection he presented single-minded devotion to God as the ideal in attaining perfect love. This perfect life is the imitation of Jesus, and its main obstacle is egocentricity, which must be overcome by an inward act of sanctification by God's Spirit. Thus Fénelon moved the quest for perfection away from its preoccupation with the renunciation of the physical and its monopoly by the elite, and focused on God's work of grace, which is universally available to the seeker.

The Reformers. Both the Lutheran and Calvinist Reformers reflected the Augustinian position that sin remains in humanity until death and therefore spiritual perfection is impossible in this life. Calvin explicitly stated that while the goal toward which the pious should strive was to appear before God without spot or blemish, believers will never reach that goal until the sinful physical body is laid aside. Since he saw the body as the residence of the depravity of concupiscence, perfection and physical life are mutually exclusive.

Luther also retained the connection between sin and the flesh. However, he did emphasize a new center of piety—the humanity and work of Jesus Christ. While the previous seekers after perfection focused on the knowledge and love of God which was grasped through contemplation, Luther focused on the knowledge of God through God's revelation in Christ. Faith in Jesus Christ therefore brings an imputed perfection which truly worships God in faith. This true perfection does not consist in celibacy or mendicancy. Luther rejected the distinction between clerical and lay perfection and stressed that proper ethical behavior was not found in renunciation of life, but in faith and love of one's neighbor.

The Pietists. With the pietists arose a Protestant rejection of the pessimism with which the Lutherans and Calvinists viewed the quest for perfection. Marked by the quest for personal holiness and an emphasis on devotion rather than doctrine, seventeenth-century leaders such as Jakob Spener and A. H. Francke stressed personal holiness marked by love and obedience. Perfection was reflected in works done solely for the glory of God and in the ability to distinguish good from evil.

While tending toward narrowness and provincialism and often deteriorating into a negative scrupulosity, the pietists developed strong community contexts for nurture and motivated extensive missionary endeavors.

The Quakers. Inspired by a desire to return to the attitude of the NT, George Fox taught both personal responsibility for faith and emancipation from sin in his doctrine of the inner light. He declared a doctrine of real holiness rather than imputed righteousness. This perfection was relative in that it dealt with victory over sin rather than absolute moral development. Fox believed that as a result of the new birth into Christ by the Spirit the believer was free from actual sinning, which he defined as transgressing the law of God, and is thus perfect in obedience. This perfection, however, did not remove the possibility of sinning, for the Christian needed constantly to rely on the inner light and must focus on the cross of Christ as the center of faith. Fox tended toward fanaticism with his teaching that a Christian may be restored to the innocence of Adam before the fall and could be more steadfast than Adam and need not fall. William Penn and other Quakers qualified the doctrine to guard it from such overstatement.

The strength of Fox's emphasis is that the center of perfection was in the cross of Christ. The cross was no dead relic but an inward experience refashioning the believer into perfect love. This is a celebration of the power of grace. While his refusal to be preoccupied with sin was a needed corrective to the Puritan pessimism over the profound sinfulness of man, Fox did tend to distrust the intellect and to suspect all external expressions of faith such as the sacraments. His refusal to be satisfied with sin and his concentration upon a perfection of life through grace found direct application in commendable attempts at social justice. This message of renewal and hope for the poor and disenfranchised was certainly motivated by the conviction that the quality of life and faith is not predetermined by a radical sinfulness which is resistant to actual moral transformation by grace.

William Law. The author of Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life and Christian Perfection, William Law was an eighteenth-century Anglican nonjuring cleric who influenced John Wesley and was admired by Samuel Johnson, Edward Gibbon, John Henry Newman, and many others. Positively, he affirmed the necessity of divine grace for performing the good and the importance of taking up the cross of Christ. He called for absolute dedication of one's life to God and complete renunciation of every aspect of the world. He saw Christian perfection functioning in common ways of life. He rejected the need for retirement to the cloister or the practice of a particular form of life. The whole life is rather an offering of sacrifice to God and praying without ceasing. Christlikeness is the ideal of perfection, and this is accomplished by performing one's human duties as Christ would.

The weaknesses of Law's system are in his somewhat unrealistic ideals for human achievement, his failure to see meaning in actual life itself, and his tendency to see grace as a means of supplanting nature rather than transforming it. Furthermore, he tended to deprecate religious fellowship and all institutional religion.

Perfection, Perfectionism

The Wesleys. John Wesley was inspired by the perfectionist themes of the early saints and by the devotional literature of Thomas à Kempis, Jeremy Taylor, and William Law. Seeing self-love, or pride, as the root of evil, Wesley taught that “perfect love” or “Christian perfection” could replace pride through a moral crisis of faith. By grace, the Christian could experience love filling the heart and excluding sin. He did not see perfection as sinlessness, nor did he understand it to be attained by merit. He thus combined some aspects of the Catholic emphasis on perfection with the Protestant emphasis on grace.

In contrast to Augustine’s Platonic view of sin as being inseparably related to concupiscence and the body, Wesley saw it as a perverted relationship to God. In response to God’s offer of transforming grace, the believer in faith was brought into an unbroken fellowship with Christ. This was not only an imputed perfection but an actual or imparted relationship of an evangelical perfection of love and intention. In this life the Christian does not attain absolute Christlikeness but suffers numerous infirmities, human faults, prejudices, and involuntary transgressions. These, however, were not considered sin, for Wesley saw sin as attitudinal and relational. In Plain Account of Christian Perfection he stressed that Christian perfection is not absolute, nor sinless, nor incapable of being lost, is not the perfection of Adam or the angels, and does not preclude growth in grace.

In removing from the idea of perfection any idea of meritorious effort, Wesley resisted any tendency to exclusiveness and elitism. His relational understanding of sin resisted the Hellenistic equation of sin with humanity. A reform of personal and social morality resulted to a large degree from the spiritual renewal which accompanied his work. Thus perfection for Wesley was not based on renunciation, merit, asceticism, or individualism. It was instead a celebration of the sovereignty of grace in transforming the sinful person into the image of Christ’s love.

Wesleyan perfectionist thought was, however, not without liabilities. Although Wesley defined sin as involving relationships and intentions, he did not adequately guard against allowing it to become understood as a substance or entity which was separate from the person and which must be extirpated. Some of his followers did tend to develop this substantialist understanding of sin and a resulting static concept of sanctification. He also tended to narrow sin to include only conscious will and intent. Consequently, some of his interpreters have been led to rationalize serious attitudinal aberrations as expressions of unconscious or unintentional human faults. Finally, Wesley expressed an inward asceticism which tended to derogate the aesthetic, and his emphasis on simplicity was too easily distorted by his followers into a legalistic externalism.

Wesley’s emphasis on perfection has been preserved in some circles of Methodism, and continues to be promoted in the denominations associated with the Christian Holiness Association.

Heterodox Sects. In addition to the Gnostic dualism of the early centuries, perfectionism has expressed itself in varying forms on the fringes of Christianity. The second-century Montanists taught that men could become gods. In the twelfth through the fourteenth centuries the Albigensian heresy contended that the human spirit was capable of freeing itself from the flesh in order to become one with God. The late medieval period also saw the condemnation of the Brethren of the Free Spirit, who believed that man could advance in perfection beyond God, who then became superfluous. The English Ranters saw it as logically impossible for perfected man to sin. Other communal approaches such as the nineteenth-century Oneida community sought for ways of reconciling perfected sinlessness with the impulses of the flesh.

All these heterodox expressions of perfectionism contained forms of antinomianism and egoism. They were condemned by orthodox Christianity with varying degrees of severity. Characterized by utopian views of human ability and by mystical practices, they tended to ignore divine grace and ethical integrity, and deteriorated because of their own inherent weaknesses.

R. L. SHELTON

See also GODLINESS; SANCTIFICATION.

Bibliography. P. Bassett, W. T. Purkiser, W. Greathouse, and R. S. Taylor, Exploring Christian Holiness; L. G. Cox, John Wesley’s Concept of Perfection; W. S. Deal, March of Holiness through the Centuries; F. de Sales, On the Love of God; M. E. Dieter, ed., Five Views on Sanctification; H. R. Dunning, Grace, Faith and Holiness; F. Fénelon, Christian Perfection; R. N. Flew, Idea of Perfection in Christian Theology; R. Garrigou-Lagrange, Christian Perfection and Contemplation; W. M. Greathouse, From the Apostles to Wesley; J. K. Grider, Wesleyan-Holiness Theology; L. Lemme, SHERK 8:456–57; M. Noll, History of Christianity in the United States and Canada; J. A. Passmore, Perfectibility of Man; J. L. Peters, Christian Perfection and American Methodism; W. E. Sangster, Path to Perfection; M. Thornton, English Spirituality; G. A. Turner, Vision Which Transforms; B. B. Warfield, Perfectionism; J. Wesley, Plain Account of Christian Perfection; M. B. Wynkoop, Theology of Love.

Perichoresis. This term and the Latin equivalent, circumencessio, circuminessio, mean mutual indwelling or, better, mutual interpenetration and refer to the understanding of both the Trinity and Christology.

In trinitarian thought “perichoresis” was used in Greek theology by John of Damascus to describe the inner relation between the persons of the Godhead. Karl Barth says of this, "The divine modes of being mutually condition and permeate one another so completely that one is always in the other two" (Church Dogmatics 1:1, 370). Trinitarian perichoresis begins with the unity of natures or a strict consubstantiality and affirms a reciprocal interrelation. Each person has "being in each other without any coalescence" (John of Damascus). Perichoresis is a necessary implication of orthodox trinitarian thought.

For Christology the complementary use of perichoresis was based on the affirmation of the unity of person (hypostasis) and sought to describe the relation of the Lord's two natures as a mutual interpenetration. However, the interpenetration of the incarnate Son is not strictly mutual, since the movement is from the divine to the human. The Cappadocian fathers were apparently the first to use the image of fire (deity) making iron (humanity) glow to explain this concept. In reaction to this form of thinking Antiochene theologians contended that Jesus' humanity was in jeopardy when such interpenetration is allowed.

During the Reformation the interpenetration of the two natures became a burning issue and focused on the nature of Christ's presence in the Lord's Supper. Luther affirmed that the exalted humanity of Christ participated in the omnipresence of his deity in such a way as to communicate his presence at the Lord's Supper. Later Lutheran theology continued to affirm this application of the concept, calling it the genus maiestaticum, the communication of divine majesty to Christ's humanity. This was a realistic form of the communicatio idiomatum.

Even if the term seems strange, the issue of the relation of deity and humanity in Christ continues to arouse much interest. Jürgen Moltmann has recently given considerable thought to this issue in relation to the cross. He contends that because of the perichoresis of the divine in the human it can and must be affirmed that God suffered in the death of Christ. New insights into the cross may be forthcoming from this sort of application of the concept of perichoresis.

S. M. SMITH

See also COMMUNICATION OF ATTRIBUTES, COMMUNICATIO IDIOMATUM; HYPOSTATIC UNION.

Bibliography. K. Adam, Christ of Faith; K. Barth, Church Dogmatics; J. Moltmann, Crucified God; W. Pannenberg, Jesus—God and Man.

Perpetual Virginity of Mary. See MARY, THE BLESSED VIRGIN.

Perseverance. Although the noun "perseverance" occurs in the KJV and RSV only once (Eph.

6:18), the concept is frequent, being translated "continued steadfastly," "devoted," "constant," and the idea of persistence, keeping on, patient endurance occurs very often. Perseverance was an essential virtue in face of persecution. Yet converts were never left to suppose their future depended wholly upon their own endurance. If Jude urges "keep yourselves in the love of God," Peter declares that we "by God's power are guarded through faith for a salvation ready to be revealed in the last time." Final perseverance in a state of grace by no means depended entirely on the virtue of persevering.

Pastoral necessities dictated a dual approach. Converts needed assurance, and it was given: "He who believes has eternal life. . . . He does not come into judgment but has passed from death to life. . . . The will of my Father [is] that every one who sees the Son and believes should have eternal life and I will raise him up at the last day. . . . I give [my sheep] eternal life and they shall never perish, no one shall snatch them out of my hand, no one is able to snatch them out of the Father's hand. . . . There is no condemnation for those that are in Christ Jesus. . . . Those he foreknew he also predestined to be conformed to the image of his son. . . . Nothing shall separate us from the love of God. . . . Christ will sustain you to the end. . . . God is faithful and will not let you be tempted beyond your strength. . . . Holy Spirit the guarantee of our inheritance. . . . He who began a good work in you will bring it to completion. . . . May you be kept sound and blameless. . . . Whoever is born of God overcomes the world. . . . You may know that you have eternal life."

Upon such assurance could be based not only encouragement but a doctrine of the eternal security of every believer—"once a Christian, always a Christian."

But pastoral experience demanded also warning: "Let any one who thinks that he stands take heed lest he fall. . . . Look to yourself, lest you too be tempted. . . . Watch and pray, lest you enter temptation. . . . Many will fall away, most men's love will grow cold. . . . He who endures to the end will be saved." Judas, Ananias, Demas, some who "by rejecting conscience have made shipwreck of their faith," are remembered. The Colossians are promised presentation before God "provided that you continue in the faith, stable and steadfast, not shifting." The church at Ephesus is warned that Christ may remove its lampstand, and Christ will vomit the lukewarm Laodiceans from his mouth. Most fearful were the warnings to Hebrew Christians: "lest they be judged to have failed," "that no one fail by disobedience." "For if we sin deliberately after receiving the knowledge of the truth, there no longer remains a sacrifice for sins but a fearful prospect of judgment. . . . It is impossible to restore again to repentance those once enlightened, who have tasted the heavenly gift, and have become partakers of the Holy Spirit, and have tasted the goodness of the word of God and the powers of the age to come, if they commit apostasy, since they crucify the Son of God on their own account. . . . Bearing thorns . . . worthless . . . near to being cursed . . . burned.”

Perseverance

History of the Doctrine. In the dual stance of the NT there obviously lay opportunity for divergent views as to whether every Christian can be sure he will continue in a state of grace to the end. There was precedent in Judaism for a positive answer. Many believed that no Israelite could enter Gehenna; all had their portion in the world to come, and all the circumcised were assured of eternal life.

On the other hand, in the postapostolic centuries the baptized were urged, “Let none of you be found a deserter,” and the prevailing rigorism denied all comfort to those who fell from the purity conferred in baptism. Hermas and early Tertullian allowed postbaptismal repentance once, Cyprian and others not at all. By the fourth century some delayed baptism until late in life because postbaptismal sin incurred such dire responsibilities. The classification of apostasy with murder and fornication as unpardonable (later, pardonable only after public penance) shows the same deep awareness of the possibility of total defection.

With Augustine a new theme entered the discussion. Convinced of man’s utter helplessness through original sin, Augustine traced every thought and motion Godward to the operation of divine grace within those elected to salvation. Nothing was ascribed to man’s initiative or even to man’s response. Electing, effectual grace includes not only the call to salvation, the impulse of faith to respond, the inspiring of a good will, but also the donum perseverantiae, the gift of enduring to the end. Such being the decree of the unchanging divine will, backed by divine power, it is irresistible; the assurance of persevering in grace is therefore absolute and infallible. The elect, being born of the Spirit, can never finally fall from grace. Eternal security is freely given by God and is not due to human watchfulness, striving, or endurance.

The obvious fact that not all Christians did persevere led, by hard logic, to the denial of earlier views (Origen) that God willed all men should be saved and to the limitation of election, and so of the gift of perseverance, to some men only. Though Augustine held that “infallible perseverance” did not violate human freedom, others (as Tomasius) contended against the veiled fatalism for human responsibility. In consequence, the later Council of Trent stated Augustine’s position more cautiously and obscurely.

Meanwhile, Calvin reaffirmed that Christ died only for the elect and their salvation was guaranteed. God would never allow any to fall away; they are kept in the faith by the almighty power of God. All the regenerate are eternally secure: they have been predestined to eternal glory and are assured of heaven. They do fall into temptation and commit sin, but they do not lose salvation or suffer separation from Christ. The Westminster Confession declared, “They whom God hath accepted in his Beloved, effectually called and sanctified by his Spirit can neither totally nor finally fall away from the state of grace, but shall certainly persevere therein to the end and be eternally saved.”

Such dogmatic assurance provoked the Arminian arguments (1) that election itself was conditional, depending upon God’s foresight of who would respond in faith of their own free will, and (2) that believers, truly saved, can lose salvation by failing to maintain their faith—the regenerate can by grieving the Spirit fall away and perish.

A twentieth-century mediating statement (A. S. Martin) stressed (1) the given religious factors in Christian experience—God’s sovereign will, faithfulness, and love; Christ’s pattern; the Spirit, the fellowship of saints; and the heavenly inheritance; (2) the moral endeavor, steadfastness, diligence, zeal required: “the great predestinarians were the most Christian men of their generation”; “no perseverance without determined persevering”; (3) all endeavor depends upon the given factors; man cannot be himself except in entire dependence on God for all good initiatives—“the life of perseverance is just the Spirit in the soul.” This leaves undefined what happens if the moral endeavor proves insufficient.

One more recent discussion (Steele and Thomas) restates the Calvinist position with vigor, ignoring NT warnings and examples but conceding that perseverance does not apply to all who profess faith, only to those given true faith. Those who fall away were never in grace. This is almost circular: the assurance of perseverance belongs only to those who show their sincerity by persevering.

Another recent discussion (Volf) emphasizes that in Paul the question of perseverance involves the faithfulness of God, the assured completion in stages of the gift of salvation (“he who began a good work in you will bring it to completion”), and the certainty of the ultimate fulfillment of God’s purposes. Yet the church remains a mixed community (Matt. 13:24–30), because church membership is not to be equated with salvation. The perseverance of God’s electing purpose applies also to Israel (Rom. 9–11), who will ultimately believe and be saved.

Value of the Doctrine. Difficult as it is to frame a defensible statement, the Christian values here at stake are precious. Every devout Christian knows that he would not have continued in the faith (as also he would never have begun) but for the unmerited, invasive grace of God, shown to him in innumerable ways. Who has not found wondering comfort, repeatedly, in the words, "He did not begin to love me because of what I was, and he will go on loving me in spite of what I am"? If we fall, we know that is our fault; if we are upheld, we know it is thanks to God's grace. The warnings, exhortations, and tragic examples of the NT do still speak directly to our hearts; had it depended upon us, our waywardness would long ago have snatched us out of God's hands, separated us from God's love. But it has not depended upon anything in us, except our desire to be saved. In this sense God himself, in his freedom, has made perseverance, like salvation, dependent upon human response—so most modern Christians would probably say. But the condition is simply wanting to endure: thereafter, "the perseverance of the saints is nothing else but the patience of God."

R. E. O. WHITE

See also ASSURANCE; BACKSLIDING

Bibliography. G. C. Berkouwer, Faith and Perseverance; L. Boettner, Reformed Doctrine of Predestination; J. Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion; I. H. Marshall, Kept by the Power of God: A Study of Perseverance and Falling Away; A. S. Martin, HDAC 2:186–90; D. L. Moody, Word of Truth; D. N. Steele and C. C. Thomas, Five Points of Calvinism; J. M. G. Volf, Paul and Perseverance.

Person, God as. See GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF.

Personalism. The philosophy of personalism places the concept of personality at the center of all its thinking about the world. It affirms that more can be learned about the universe by attending to personal reality than to merely physical objects. Personality is not explained by other things; other things are explained by it. For most forms of personalism, the Supreme Person, God, is the primary instance of personality. But the human spirit, which is unique, self-conscious, and free, is also basic to personalist thinking. Personalist thinking has roots in ancient Greek thought, the Bible, and certain modern philosophers.

Some use the personalism in a generic sense to describe many different thinkers. But personalism usually refers to the Boston Personalists of Boston University. Boston Personalism developed as a response to impersonalism, mechanism, reductionism, and scientism. It is also distinct from individualism. While existentialism stresses the analysis of persons as individuals, personalism insists that personality is fulfilled only in relation to others.

Borden Parker Bowne (1847–1910), professor of philosophy at Boston, was the progenitor and most influential exponent of this movement.

Bowne's student Edgar S. Brightman (1884–1953), succeeded him, and Brightman's pupil, Peter A. Bertocci (1910–89), carried the tradition to a third generation as Borden Parker Bowne professor of philosophy at Boston. Martin Luther King Jr. studied at Boston University and wrote that he took as his own the philosophy he learned there.

Most forms of personalism adopt theism. In many cases, however, this theism is nontraditional. Bowne fought strongly against fundamentalism and supernaturalism. His teaching effectively liberalized the clergy in the Methodist church. Brightman argued for a temporal, finite God who is limited by nonrational aspects (the Given) within the divine being. God is gradually gaining authority over, but cannot completely control, the nonrational dimension of the divine nature. Brightman held that this Given accounts for evil in the world.

The basic premise of personalism is compatible with orthodox Christianity. The Bible is, after all, a major influence. But personalists hold such a range of positions on various topics that evangelical thinkers must adopt a case-by-case approach in assessing the value of their work.

D. K. CLARK

See also PHILOSOPHY, CHRISTIAN VIEW OF

Bibliography. P. A. Bertocci, Goodness of God; B. P. Bowne, Personalism; E. S. Brightman, Problem of God; V. Ferm, ed., "Personalism," in History of Philosophical Systems; A. C. Knudson, Philosophy of Personalism.

Person of Christ. See CHRISTOLOGY.

Peter, Primacy of. Peter's primacy or leadership among the twelve apostles and in the primitive church is now generally accepted by Protestant and Catholic scholars alike. Differences on this matter arise rather between conservative biblical scholars, who accept the texts essentially as they stand, and more liberal ones who argue that a role Peter developed later was projected, somewhat inaccurately, back into the Gospel accounts. Protestants and Catholics do continue to differ, however, on what the implications of Peter's leadership are for later ages and structures of the church.

Simon, son of Jona or John, was among the first of the apostles called (Matt. 4:18–20; Mark 1:16–18), appears first in all biblical lists of apostles (see esp. Matt. 10:2), became part of an inner group especially close to Jesus, and was probably the first apostle to see the resurrected Jesus (Luke 24:34; 1 Cor. 15:5). Repeatedly he served as an impetuous spokesman for all the apostles, and he also represented their collective desertion. Peter first confessed that Jesus was the Messiah (Matt. 16:16; Mark 8:29; Luke 9:20) or Holy One

Peter, Primacy of

(John 6:69); Jesus surnamed him alone the “rock” upon which he would build his church (Matt. 16:18; Mark 3:16; John 1:42); and the risen Lord charged Peter with the pastoral office (John 21:15–17). In the primitive church, as described in the Acts of the Apostles, Peter clearly emerges as leader, the preacher at Pentecost, the one who receives the vision which opens the way to Cornelius and other Gentiles, and the decisive speaker in this regard at the Council of Jerusalem (Acts 15:7–11). Paul also singled him out (Gal. 1:18). Fragmentary evidence indicates he later did missionary work outside Palestine, beginning in Antioch and ending in Rome. Yet, as Protestants have been quick to point out, James appears actually to have presided in Jerusalem, and after the council there Peter disappears almost completely from the biblical picture.

Christians have interpreted the scriptural image of Peter’s “primacy” very differently over the ages. In reaction to the claims of Roman Catholics, Protestants have traditionally lent it no significance whatsoever. Cullman has argued more carefully that Peter himself was endowed with a special office as the primary eyewitness to our Lord and his resurrection, but that this was unique to him and therefore ceased upon his death. A few more ecumenically minded Protestants have been willing to see in Peter the chief scriptural model for the pastoral office—i.e., the rock upon whose witness the church is built, the one authorized to bind and loose, the spokesman whose own faith is upheld by the Lord’s prayer (Luke 22:32), and the shepherd who feeds the sheep.

Roman Catholics believe that Peter’s was a permanent office instituted by Christ and conferred upon the apostle’s successors in the see of Rome, and that his primacy in the primitive church has fallen now to the bishops (popes) of Rome. Most pointedly, at Vatican Council I in 1870 the First Dogmatic Constitution on the Church of Christ, also known as Pastor aeternus, made it a matter of Catholic faith that Christ conferred primacy of jurisdiction over the whole church directly and without mediation (this against conciliarists) upon Peter; that the Petrine office and its primacy persist through the ages in the bishops of Rome, and that they therefore possess universal, ordinary jurisdiction over all of Christ’s church. Vatican Council II, in its constitution on the church (Lumen gentium), reaffirmed the foregoing but then went on in fact to place great stress upon all bishops acting together collegially.

This Catholic claim to Petrine and Roman primacy rests upon two bases, one historical and the other theological. The historical claim is that Peter died a martyr as the first bishop of Rome and passed to succeeding bishops there his office and primacy. Protestants once vigorously attacked all stories about Peter’s end, but the best evidence, as most scholars now agree, indicates that he in fact died a martyr in the time of Nero and that his cult originated very early in Rome, though Cullmann believes he was probably executed rather than buried at the present St. Peter’s on the Vatican Hill. The Roman Church enjoyed a certain preeminence very early (as evidenced, e.g., in 1 Clement 5; Ignatius, Rom. 1; Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.3), but down to the end of the second century Rome was always considered as founded by Peter and Paul, a tradition which never wholly disappeared. Singular emphasis upon Peter as the founder and first bishop of Rome first emerged in the third century and became prominent in the late fourth century, especially as articulated by the popes who reigned between Damasus (366–84) and Leo (440–61). As papal claims expanded to take in the whole church and met stiff resistance from emperors and patriarchs in Constantinople, popes insisted ever more clearly that they were the living embodiment of Peter and therefore enjoyed his primacy over the whole church. Leo’s formulation of this in letters and sermons remained fundamental throughout the Middle Ages and beyond. Throughout the early Middle Ages the pope’s highest title was vicar (or placeholder) of St. Peter, which gave way in the twelfth century to vicar of Christ. Pope Gregory VII, the first of the powerful high medieval popes, identified almost mystically with Peter, and his excommunication of the emperor took the form of a prayer to St. Peter.

Protestants have always objected that in Scripture especially and in the first century of the church’s history there is no concern with Peter’s rule in Rome or with provision for his supposed successors. In recent years the most fundamental attacks have come, ironically, from Roman Catholics promoting collegiality. They have produced historical evidence to show that the Roman Church retained a presbyterial structure (making Peter and Clement merely spokesmen, not presiding bishops) into the second century, and that the church as a whole had a decentralized regional structure at least into the fourth, whereby councils of bishops ruled on larger issues and the Roman Church enjoyed at best a primacy of honor.

Theologically the Roman Catholic Church bases its position on Matthew 16:18, claiming that Peter is the “rock” upon which the church is founded, thus giving his successors the full power of binding and loosing. The first certain application of this text to the Roman Church was by Pope Stephen I (254–57) in argument with Bishop Cyprian of Carthage over the baptism of heretics. This interpretation prevailed in Rome and has been the mainstay of papal documents and claims to this day. But other interpretations persisted elsewhere. The most common Protestant view happens also to be that found in the earliest extant commentary on this text (by Origen), namely, that the “rock” upon which the church stands is Peter’s confession of faith. Those concentrating upon the “power of binding and loosing” in that text generally saw it conferred upon the entire episcopate of which Peter was but a symbol or spokesman (this in Cyprian, Augustine, and much of the Eastern Orthodox tradition).

Modern exegesis has produced some surprising twists. Some Protestants say the rock clearly refers to Peter and only by extension to his faith, while liberal Protestants and Catholics claim that this is not an authentic saying of Jesus but rather reflects the coming of “early Catholicism” in the primitive church. Moreover, progressive Catholic theologians concede that this saying, whatever its exact meaning and referent, cannot serve as a direct proof text for the Roman papacy and its primatial claims. Hans Küng has rejected entirely any scriptural basis for a Roman claim to primacy, where as R. Brown, more cautiously, argues that the scriptural image of Peter’s leadership and the Roman Church’s early eminence together produce a “trajectory” from which Roman primacy is a defensible conclusion. Conservative Protestants continue to focus upon Peter’s confessional recognition of Jesus as the Messiah as the foundational rock of the church and its disciplinary powers.

J. VAN ENGEN

See also PAPACY; PETER THE APOSTLE.

Bibliography. J. J. Castellet, NCE 11:200–05; R. Brown, K. Donfried, and J. Reumann, eds., Peter in the New Testament; O. Cullmann, Peter; P. Empie and T. Murphy, eds., Papal Primacy and the Universal Church.

Peter Lombard (ca. 1100–1160). Medieval theologian who taught at the Cathedral School in Paris and later became bishop of Paris (1159). A student of both Peter Abelard and Bernard of Clairvaux, he combined in his work a skill for using the scholastic logical method with a firm commitment to the Christian faith. Perhaps because he was not as controversial as Abelard or Bernard, he was able to elaborate on the central issues of dogma without arousing great opposition. His fame rests on the Book of Sentences (1158), in which he used the logical method to arrive at a definition of orthodoxy. This work consists of numerous citations of the church fathers as well as of medieval writers such as Anselm of Laon, Abelard, Hugh of St. Victor, and Gratian. His lasting achievement was the organization of these materials into a coherent, objective statement of Christian belief. The book is divided into four sections treating God, the creation, the Trinity, and the sacraments. Lombard was one of the first to insist on the view that there are seven sacraments, and he distinguished between sacraments and sacramental signs.

Lombard’s work was introduced as the textbook in a theological course by Alexander of Hales (1222), and it gained in popularity to such an extent that for several centuries candidates in theology at European universities were required to comment on it as preparation for the doctoral degree. It continued in use in Roman Catholic institutions until the seventeenth century, when it was replaced by the Summa of Thomas Aquinas.

Despite his moderation and popularity Lombard was criticized by a few of his contemporaries. Some accused him of accepting Abelard’s teaching that Christ was not man but merely had humanity, while others felt that his trinitarian statements were inadequate. These critics were silenced at the Fourth Lateran Council (1215), where efforts to have the Sentences condemned were defeated and the work was acknowledged as orthodox.

R. G. CLOUSE

See also SCHOLASTICISM.

Bibliography. S. J. Curtis, “Peter Lombard, a Pioneer in Educational Methods,” in Miscellanea Lombardiana; E. R. Fairweather, Scholastic Miscellany: Anselm to Ockham; R. McKeon, Selections from Medieval Philosophers; E. F. Rogers, Peter Lombard and the Sacramental System.

Peter Martyr Vermigli (1499–1562). Major Italian reformer whose flight from Italy in 1542 brought a sophisticated scholastic, rabbinic, and patristic learning to aid a variety of Protestant endeavors in northern Europe. A confidant of cardinals and humanists, he assumed the name of Peter of Verona, martyred in 1252.

In 1518 he entered the University of Padua to study Aristotle. He took his doctorate and was ordained priest in 1525. In 1526 he was promoted to public preacher, and from 1526 to 1533 he taught philosophy and Scripture in the houses of the Lateran Congregation. In 1533 he became abbot of Spoleto for three years. McNair argues plausibly (if only from circumstances) that he next assisted in the remarkable reform proposals which Gasparo Contarini and others presented to Pope Paul III in 1537. From 1537 to 1540 Vermigli served as abbot of S. Pietro ad Aram, Naples. During that time he preached to an audience that overlapped with the reform salon of Juan de Valdés, the Spanish reformer, who became a close friend. His 1540 public lectures on 1 Corinthians reached only 3:9–17 when he was suspended from preaching for his denial of purgatory. Powerful friends in Rome quashed the local mandate.

Vermigli was elected prior of S. Frediano at Lucca in 1541, a most influential post. He lectured on the Pauline Epistles and the Psalms. The great event was the September 1541 summit conversations in Lucca between the pope and emperor. Josiah Simler, the contemporary biographer, records that Contarini and Vermigli engaged in daily religious conversations.

Peter Martyr Vermigli

The summer of 1542 led to a crisis of conscience when the Inquisition was established in Italy on July 21. Vermigli fled Lucca in August by way of Pisa to Florence. He paused to copy a manuscript of Chrysostom on the Eucharist, to entrust his library to a patrician friend, and to pen a letter to his Lucca canons that concluded with the words, "I am free from hypocrisy through the grace of Christ." Ochino, valued preacher of the Capuchin Order, joined Vermigli in flight across the Alps on August 25.

After some days in Zurich, Vermigli spent a month in Basel. On October 5 he left for Strasbourg at Bucer's invitation. During his five years there he lectured on the OT and later on Romans, publishing comments on the Apostles' Creed in 1544 that clearly denied Roman teaching on the papacy and Eucharist.

Thomas Cranmer invited Vermigli to England in 1547. In the spring of 1548 he took up residence in Christ Church, Oxford, as Regius Professor. In the midst of 1549 lectures on 1 Corinthians, Vermigli held a major Oxford disputation on the Eucharist. He delivered lectures on Romans, served on the Reform Commission for Ecclesiastical Laws, and contributed a prayer to the 1552 Prayer Book.

After Edward VI died, Vermigli returned to Strasbourg late in 1553. There he lectured on Judges to the Marian exiles and was pressed by the Lutheran John Marbach to conform to doctrinal constraints on baptism and Eucharist. He left in 1556 for Zurich.

While in Zurich, Vermigli was twice invited by Calvin to pastor the Genevan Italian congregation and to lecture for him. In 1559 he published the massive Defense against Gardiner at Cranmer's personal request. He dedicated his 1558 Romans to Queen Elizabeth. At Zurich he lectured on Samuel, which Beza and Bullinger used in manuscript, and on Kings. He published in 1561 a Dialogue on the Two Natures in Christ to answer the Lutheran Brenz.

Vermigli corresponded with Elizabethan bishops such as Jewel, Cox, and Sandys. His Latin writings were excerpted and published in a Latin Loci Communes (1576). This was to be expanded and translated into the Common Places (1583). Judges and Romans likewise were translated in 1564 and 1568. Vermigli left a considerable literary deposit for the Elizabethan Puritans. The Loci went through thirteen Latin editions by 1656, while the commentaries are extant in thirty-one editions from the Corinthians (1551) to Lamentations (1629).

M. W. ANDERSON

Bibliography. M. W. Anderson, Peter Martyr, A Reformer in Exile (1542–1562); J. P. Donnelly, Calvinism and Scholasticism in Vermigli's Doctrine of Man and Grace; R. M. Kingdon, Political Thought of Peter Martyr Vermigli; J. C. McLelland, Visible Words of God: An Exposition of the Sacramental Theology of Peter Martyr Vermigli, A.D. 1500–1562; J. C. McLelland, ed., Peter Martyr Vermigli and Italian Reform; P. M. J. McNair, Peter Martyr in Italy.

Peter the Apostle. Simeon (or Simon) bar-Jonah (Matt. 16:17; John 21:15), though his original name continued in use (Acts 15:14; 2 Pet. 1:1), was known in the apostolic church principally by the name that Jesus conferred on him, "the rock," in either its Aramaic form Kêpā' (1 Cor. 1:12; 15:5; Gal. 2:9) or Graecized as Petros (Gal. 2:7; 1 Pet. 1:1; 2 Pet. 2:1). Matthew associates this with the confession of Caesarea Philippi (Matt. 16:18), but we need not assume that this solemn endowment was the first time the name had been given (cf. Mark 3:16; John 1:42).

He was a fisherman from Bethsaida (John 1:43) but had a home in Capernaum (Mark 1:29). His brother Andrew, who introduced him to Jesus, had been a disciple of John the Baptist (John 1:35–42), and so possibly had he. The seashore call of Jesus (Mark 1:6) was evidently not the first meeting (John 1:41–42).

One of the original twelve, he is depicted by the Synoptic tradition as their leader and natural spokesman (cf. Matt. 15:15; Mark 1:36; 9:5; 10:28; 11:20; Luke 5:5), particularly in crises. He makes the confession at Caesarea Philippi, expresses their revulsion at the idea of the suffering Messiah, and makes the disastrous representative boast (Mark 14:29–31) and denial (15:66–72). Christ chooses him, with James and John, as an inner circle within the twelve (Mark 5:37; 9:2; 14:32).

Peter undoubtedly leads the first Jerusalem church. He is the first apostle to witness the resurrection (1 Cor. 15:5; cf. Mark 16:7). He leads in the gathered community before Pentecost (Acts 1:15), and is the first preacher thereafter (Acts 2:14–41) and the representative preacher of the early chapters of Acts (3:11–26; 4:8–12). He presides in judgment (Acts 5:1–11; 8:20–24). Paul regards him as a "pillar" of the early church (Gal. 2:9).

In a sense, he is also the first instrument of the Gentile mission (Acts 15:7), and his experience is representative of the intellectual revolution involved for Jewish Christians (Acts 10). At the Jerusalem Council he urged the admission of Gentile converts without submission to the Mosaic law (Acts 15:7–11) and had table fellowship in the mainly Gentile church of Antioch (Gal. 2:12) until, to Paul's disgust, he withdrew in deference to Jewish-Christian opinion. Essentially he was an "apostle of the circumcision" (Gal. 2:7–21) but remained, despite obvious difficulties, a warm friend of Gentile Christians, whom he addresses in 1 Peter.

In his lifetime and later, anti-Pauline forces sought to use Peter, without his encouragement. There was a Cephas party at Corinth (1 Cor. 1:12), and in the pseudo-Clementine stories Peter confounds Paul, thinly disguised as Simon Magus.

Possibly party strife in Rome over the Jewish question (cf. Phil. 1:15) brought him thither. But there is no evidence that he was bishop of Rome or stayed long in the city. First Peter was written there (so probably 1 Pet. 5:13), doubtless after Paul's death, for Silvanus and Mark were with him. Probably (cf. Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, III.39) Mark's Gospel reflects Peter's preaching. Peter died in Rome in the Neronian persecution (1 Clement 5–6), probably by crucifixion (cf. John 21:18). Recent excavations reveal an early cultus of Peter, but the original grave is unlikely ever to be found.

Spurious writings in Peter's name, mainly in heretical interests, caused difficulties in the second century. Canonical works reflecting his teaching (including Mark's Gospel and the Petrine speeches in Acts) unitedly reflect a theology dominated by the concept of Christ as the Suffering Servant and the thought of the ensuing glory. Crises in the life of Christ (e.g., the transfiguration, 1 Pet. 5:1; 2 Pet. 1:16–18) have made a deep impression.

A. F. WALLS

See also PETER, PRIMACY OF.

Bibliography. F. F. Bruce, Peter, Stephen, James and John; H. Chadwick, "St. Peter and St. Paul in Rome," JTS n.s. 8:30–54; F. H. Chase, HDB; O. Cullmann, Peter; E. J. Goodspeed, Twelve; T. G. Jalland, Church and the Papacy; E. Kirschbaum, Tombs of St. Peter and St. Paul; J. Lowe, Saint Peter; J. E. Walsh, Bones of St. Peter.

Pharisees. An important Jewish group which flourished in Palestine from the late second century B.C. to the late first century A.D.

Sources. Virtually all our knowledge about the Pharisees is derived from three sets of sources: the works of the Jewish historian Flavius Josephus—Jewish War (ca. A.D. 75), Antiquities of the Jews (ca. A.D. 94), and Life (ca. A.D. 101); the various compilations of the rabbis (ca. A.D. 200 and later); and the NT. Other works—parts of the Apocrypha, the Pseudepigrapha, or the Dead Sea Scrolls—may also contain information concerning the Pharisees. But since they never mention the Pharisees by name, these works can only have secondary or corroborative value.

It should be noted, however, that even the use of the primary sources is problematical. Most of the NT is written from a point of view that is antagonistic to the tenets of Pharisaism. The rabbinic traditions about the Pharisees are also shaped by polemical tendencies and are often anachronistic. The value of Josephus's information (traditionally regarded as the most helpful) is diminished by recent studies which suggest that Josephus became a Pharisee (if ever) only late in life and that his accounts of the pre-A.D. 70 Pharisees reflect more the social and political realities of the late first century than the firsthand experiences of a sect member. They lack depth and internal consistency. In truth none of our sources provide either a complete or a straightforward picture of the Pharisees.

Name. Various etymologies have been proposed for the name "Pharisee." The only one to receive general approval is that which derives the name from the Aramaic passive participle pēriš, pērišayyā', meaning "separated." The consensus is that the Pharisees regarded themselves, or were regarded, as the "separated ones." From what or whom they were separated is not as clear. The Hasmonean rulers, the Gentiles, the common people, and non-Pharisaic Jews in general have all been suggested as possibilities. The last two options are more likely.

Nature and Influence. The fundamental issue in Pharisee studies is the twofold question of the nature of the group and its influence within broader Judaism. Two basic positions frame the debate, though many scholars take mediating positions. The traditional view, in all of its various forms, holds that the Pharisees were the creators and shapers of early Judaism. They were not so much a sect as a dominant party within Judaism. According to the traditional view, although not all Pharisees were legal experts, Pharisaism was the ideology of the vast majority of the scribes and lawyers. Thus, as a group the Pharisees were the guardians and interpreters of the law. Jewish institutions associated with the law, such as the synagogue and the Sanhedrin, were Pharisaic institutions. While disagreeing over whether the Pharisees were primarily politically or religiously oriented, proponents of the traditional view agree that the Pharisees commanded the loyalty of the masses in both spheres. Indeed, most proponents of the traditional view would accept, with minor modifications, Elias Bickerman's dictum: "Judaism of the post-Maccabean period is Pharisaic."

The second point of view is a relatively recent development. Proponents of this position argue that when the inherent limitations and tendencies of our sources are taken into account, the Pharisees come across not as the creators and shapers of Judaism but merely as one of its many expressions. In essence, according to this view, the Pharisees were a rather tightly knit sect organized around the observance of purity and tithing laws; on most other issues the Pharisees reflected the range of views current within Judaism—or at least within that broad wing of Judaism which sought to center life around Torah-observance. Since Josephus and the Gospels carefully distinguish between the Pharisees and the scribes, scholars of this persuasion argue that it is better not to confuse Pharisaism with the ideology or influence of the scribes. Pharisaism must be seen as a movement that drew from all walks of life. There were Pharisees who were political and religious leaders, but their positions of influence were due to other factors besides sectarian affiliation. Proponents of this second view posit that the Judaism of Christ's day was much more dynamic and variegated than the traditional view allows and that the Pharisees were only one of several sects that drew from and in turn influenced developments within the Judaism of the Hellenistic and Roman periods.

Pharisees

History. The origin of the Pharisaic movement is shrouded in mystery. Some scholars who view the Pharisees as the shapers of early Judaism have sought to trace the beginnings of the group back to the time of Ezra and beyond. According to Josephus (Antiquities 13.288–300), the Pharisees first became a significant force in Jewish affairs during the reign of Hyrcanus I (134–104 B.C.). In an earlier work, however, Josephus placed the rise of the Pharisees much later, during the reign of Salome Alexandra (76–67 B.C.; War 1.110–13, compare 1.63). But such reconstructions confuse the Pharisees with antecedents which underlie other Jewish groups as well (e.g., the Essenes). Clearly our evidence is unreliable here. It is likely, however, that the Pharisees were one of several groups to grow out of the revival and resistance movement of the Maccabean period (ca. 166–160 B.C.).

Whatever its origins, the Pharisaic movement seems to have undergone a two-stage development. During the reign of Salome Alexandra the Pharisees as a group were heavily involved in politics and national policy making. Sometime after this, possibly when Herod the Great rose to power (37 B.C.), the Pharisees withdrew from politics. Individual Pharisees remained politically involved, but there was no longer any official Pharisaic political agenda. This seems to have been the situation during the time of Christ.

The Pharisees were divided over the issue of Roman rule. Josephus tells us that a Pharisee named Zaddok was instrumental in forming a "fourth philosophy" that was violently opposed to Roman rule (Antiquities 18.9). Elsewhere, however, Josephus records that at a later time certain well-placed Pharisees sought to forestall the Jews' rush toward revolt against the empire (Life 21, War 2.411). It is impossible to tell which tendency reflected the conviction of the majority of the Pharisees.

After the Jewish revolt of A.D. 70 Jewish scholars from various backgrounds gathered at the city of Jamnia to form a school for the preservation and redefinition of Judaism. Many of these were Pharisees. Thus they played an important role at the beginning of the century-long process which transformed early Judaism into rabbinic Judaism.

Beliefs. The Pharisees were strongly committed to the daily application and observance of the law. This means they accepted the traditional elaborations of the law that made daily application possible. They believed, moreover, in the existence of spirits and angels, the resurrection, and the coming of a Messiah. They also maintained that the human will enjoyed a limited freedom within the sovereign plan of God.

Yet there is little evidence to suggest that these were distinctively Pharisaic beliefs. To the best of our knowledge these beliefs were the common heritage of most Jews. To some scholars this is proof that the Pharisees were the dominant religious force in Judaism; to others it is only another indication that the Pharisees' distinguishing mark must be sought elsewhere, namely in the scrupulous observance of purity and tithing laws.

The Pharisees and Jesus. The NT does not present a simple picture of the relationship between the Pharisees and Jesus. Indeed, the data suggests that their attitude toward Jesus was neither static nor monolithic. On the one hand, Pharisees warned Jesus of a plot against his life (Luke 13:31); in spite of their dietary scruples they invited him for meals (Luke 7:36–50; 14:1); some of them even believed in Jesus (John 3:1; 7:45–53; 9:13–38); later, Pharisees were instrumental in ensuring the survival of Jesus' followers (Acts 5:34; 23:6–9). And it is the professing Pharisee, Paul, who, after meeting the risen Lord, became the principal interpreter of God's redemptive act in Christ.

On the other hand, however, Pharisaic opposition to Jesus is a persistent theme in all four Gospels. This opposition has been explained differently by those who hold differing views on the nature and influence of the Pharisees. Those who see the Pharisees as a class of political leaders posit that Jesus came to be understood as a political liability or threat. Those who understand the Pharisees as a society of legal and religious experts suggest that Jesus became viewed as a dangerous rival, a false teacher with antinomian tendencies. To the extent that there were Pharisaic leaders and scribes, both these factors probably played a part. Yet other scholars point out that according to the Gospels the disputes between Jesus and the Pharisees centered primarily on the validity and application of purity, tithing, and Sabbath laws (e.g., Matt. 12:2, 12–14; 15:1–12; Mark 2:16; Luke 11:39–42). In the light of this evidence it would seem that at least part of the Pharisaic opposition to Jesus was occasioned by the obvious disparity between Jesus' claims about himself and his repeated disregard for observances which the Pharisees believed were necessary marks of piety. In the end, most Pharisees could not reconcile Jesus—his actions and his claims—with their own understanding of piety and godliness.

S. TAYLOR

See also ESSENES; SADDUCEES.

Bibliography. M. Avi-Yonah and Z. Baras, eds., Society and Religion in the Second Temple Period; J. Bowker, Jesus and the Pharisees; L. Finkelstein, Pharisees: The Sociological Background of Their Faith; H. D. Mantel, "Saducees and the Pharisees," in World History of the Jewish People; J. Neusner, From Politics to Piety: The Emergence of Pharisaic Judaism; E. Rivkin, "Defining the Pharisees: The Tannaic Sources," HUCA 40–41:205–49; Hidden Revolution; A. J. Saldarini, Pharisees, Scribes and Sadducees in Palestinian Society: A Sociological Approach; E. Schürer, History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ; G. Stemmerger, Jewish Contemporaries of Jesus: Pharisees, Sadducees, Essenes.

Phenomenology of Religion. Introduction. As a discipline, the phenomenology of religion is often seen as a specialized discipline within the broad parameters of comparative or historical religious studies. The term has come to be widely used in scholarly religious discussion only in the twentieth century. Therefore, as a discipline it is still relatively new and even the term phenomenology of religion is not used with the same meaning by all religious scholars. For some phenomenology of religion refers to an attitude toward or the study of religious phenomena in the broadest sense. For others, it refers to the actual cross-cultural comparative study and classification of religious manifestations. For still others it expresses a commitment to a specialized method of inquiry of religious expressions. Though it is impossible to give a universally agreed upon definition, generally phenomenologists of all types (philosophical, psychological, sociological, philological, and so on) are concerned with believers' awareness of the manifestations of life, how they express that awareness, and how those expressions can be best understood.

History of the Term. Phenomenology as a term was first coined in 1764 by the Swiss-German mathematician and philosopher Johann Heinrich Lambert from two Greek terms whose combined meaning was "the setting forth or articulation of what shows itself." He used the term to refer to the illusory nature of human experience in an attempt to develop a theory of knowledge that distinguished truth from error. Immanuel Kant, a contemporary of Lambert, used the term only twice, but built the philosophical foundations for the ongoing development of it when he distinguished things as they appear to us (which he called phenomena) from things as they really are (which he called noumena). He proposed that a true and genuine knowledge of the transcendent (or noumena) was not possible as a science, but that a true and genuine knowledge of the immanent (or phenomena) as a description of the structures of human experience was possible, and proposed it as an appropriate field of philosophical and scientific inquiry. Georg W. F. Hegel, in his Phenomenology of the Spirit (1807), reacted against Kant's splitting of phenomena and noumena. He proposed that phenomena were actual stages of knowledge progressing in evolutionary fashion from raw consciousness to absolute knowledge. For Hegel, phenomenology was the science by means of which we come to absolute knowledge through studying the way our minds appear to us. The term was picked up by other philosophers but generally used of a specific study of phenomena. By the mid 1800s, it had become synonymous with "fact" and had acquired the meaning of a purely descriptive study of any subject.

In the early 1900s a German group published a series of studies on phenomenology. The most influential thinker among the group was the Austrian-born philosopher Edmund Husserl. He sought to give philosophical foundations to a generally intuitive, nonempirical approach of phenomenological methodology. Husserl and the other like phenomenologists were generally reacting against a scientific methodology which demanded that life experiences be discarded for objective empiricism. They called for a recognition that such experiences, rather than being a hindrance, could be used as a means through which reality could be explored. As a result of Husserl's influence, the term now refers not only to a descriptive methodology but also to the movement of phenomenological philosophy. Philosophers who applied phenomenological methods to diverse disciplines include Martin Heidegger, Jean Paul Sartre, Maurice Merleau-Ponty, Karl Jasper, Marvin Faber, and Paul Ricoeur. Though certainly not uniform in their thinking, they have generally stressed nonempirical intuitive investigation as the appropriate tool for understanding the fundamental realities of existence. Some philosophical phenomenologists (e.g., Max Scheler, Otto Grundler, Joachim Wach, Gerardus van der Leeuw) have devoted themselves to the study of religion. This is yet another sense in which the term "phenomenology of religion" may be used.

Philosophical Phenomenology. There are several significant characteristics of philosophical phenomenology that are important to the phenomenology of religion. The watchword of the discipline, "Ze den Sachen!" ("To the things themselves!" or "To the data!") is at the foundation of phenomenological inquiry in all fields of inquiry. The phrase carries both exhortation and content. The exhortation is to get to work, and the content of our investigation is things as they appear in our immediate experience. Phenomenologists generally recognize that what is being discussed is not raw sense data but experiences of sight, sound, smell, touch, taste, and feeling filtered through the interpretive grids we all use to make sense of the world we perceive. These occur in an almost limitless variety, and our immediate experience and interpretation of them is so complicated. Therefore, there is a stated opposition to reducing explanations of them to any single discipline or field of study or to reliance on universally applicable generalizations. Rather, like Gestalt Psychology, phenomenologists seek to consider the appearance of things as perceptual wholes.

Phenomenology of Religion

Another underlying characteristic, developed by Husserl, is that all consciousness is a consciousness of or about something; it is always directed towards its object. This property of consciousness is called "intentionality." As far as our understanding of the consciousness is concerned, it does not matter whether the "object" of our thought is real or not, and therefore we may bracket or suspend questions of ultimate truth in our study of phenomena. Phenomenologists also refer to this suspension of judgment as epoche (derived from Greek verb epechō, "I hold back") or reduction, but is not to be confused with reductionism as explained above. A final characteristic of phenomenological philosophy is that of the reliance on intuiting the universal essence or "whatness" of things, called the eidetic vision or eidetic reduction (adapting Plato's use of the Greek eidōs as universal essence). Not all of these philosophical characteristics are used by religious phenomenologists, but almost universally they (1) use descriptive approaches, (2) oppose reductionism, (3) bracket truth questions, and (4) seek intuitive insight into the essence of phenomena.

Phenomenology of Religion. The foundations for the use of phenomenology in religious discussion may be traced to Schleiermacher's Speeches on Religion (1799), in which he responded to the rampant rationalism in religious inquiry of his day. He called his contemporaries back to a sense of the role of human awareness in religious reflection. The phenomenology of religion as a discipline, however, was not developed until the late 1880s. It was then that P. D. Chantepie de la Saussaye, sometimes thought of as the founder of the phenomenology of religion, proposed in his Handbook of the History of Religion (1887) that the state of historical study of religious traditions needed to progress toward a phenomenological study of the inner essence of religious experience. Pivotal in the establishment of the phenomenology of religion as an accepted formal discipline was the work of van der Leeuw, especially his Religion in Essence and Manifestation (1938). In addition to van der Leeuw and Wach, well-known scholars in the phenomenology of religion include W. Brede Kristensen, Rudolf Otto, Friedrich Heiler, C. Jouco Bleeker, and Mircea Eliade. Generally these scholars use comparative, historical, and empirical approaches in seeking to understand the essence of religious phenomena, though they are not immune to movement beyond the purely descriptive into the normative when they find and discuss the essences of religious experience.

Distinctives of Phenomenology of Religion. There are several distinctives of the phenomenology of religion. First, it is descriptively oriented. Phenomenologists do not seek evaluative judgments, which are considered the domain of philosophy of religion. Rather, they seek accurate and appropriate descriptions and interpretations of religious phenomena. Such phenomena include rituals, symbols, prayers, ceremonies, theology (written or oral), sacred persons, art, creeds, and other religious exercises, whether corporate or individual, public or private. One particularly vexing problem in evaluative engagements in the scholarly arena is that fruitful discussion is often stifled as antagonists stake out emotional territories which color their attempts at careful reflection. Ideally, the phenomenological approach is a more productive one in which the researcher's goal is to allow the phenomena under investigation in some sense to speak for themselves, and issues of external validity are temporarily suspended. Phenomenologists have as a goal the maintenance of a descriptive outlook in gathering, sifting, comparing, and analyzing the data of their studies. Above all, in the phenomenological approach one attempts to describe as accurately as possible the phenomena under consideration, including not only the events that occur but also the motives behind the events. The problem with explanation as found all too often in the empirical sciences is that in the process of explaining (and later predicting) the actual events themselves may be lost. The phenomenological approach is not oriented toward problem solving, but towards empathetic description. It thus keeps the events themselves as central. Further, the phenomenological method seeks to describe the phenomena from the perspective of the practitioner, known in anthropological circles as emic (or insider) description. As Smart has pointed out (1987), in crossing religious boundaries we are at the same time all too often crossing cultural boundaries, and thus a genuine cross-cultural approach is inherently necessary for an appropriate phenomenological method.

Some phenomenologists maintain that the phenomenological method does not have as a goal to explain the phenomena it describes (see Westphal, 1984). They maintain that explanation, following the behavioral science approach of Hume, Mill, and Hempel, is rooted in being able to discover universal laws which can be used to predict future behavior. It is this sense of explanation that phenomenology does not seek to posit. This does not mean that a phenomenological approach does not aim at understanding and interpretation, for it does. However, it does not seek explanation of law-governed predictive nature—rather, it seeks to discover motives and intentions in the particular environment of the phenomena under consideration. To put it another way, the stated desire of the phenomenologist is not to find an explanation for a problem as much as to achieve an adequate understanding of it.

The phenomenological study of religion is comparative, but only in a limited sense. Because of phenomenology's emphasis on data, the more data incorporated, the more the potential significance of the study. Meaning may best be found in the data by using comparative methods, but the phenomenologist does not seek to list or describe similar practices across diverse religious traditions for the purpose of rating them from best to worst. Having divorced themselves from the evolutionary approach to religious development earlier in the twentieth century, and having bracketed off truth questions, phenomenologists are loath to return to a form of comparison that might imply the superiority or inferiority of one type of experience within a religious tradition as opposed to a similar practice in another religion. Because the comparative approach works best when harnessing significant types and amounts of data, the phenomenological study of religion is also systematic in its approach. Individual phenomena can best be understood not as isolated snapshots but as belonging to a complex system of experiences all of which are related together, and thus an approach to religion as a system characterizes phenomenological methodology.

Following philosophical phenomenology, the phenomenologist of religion avoids reductionism. This is so significant that the criticism of reductionistic tendencies in the study of religion has occupied a significant amount of the phenomenological literature. To the phenomenologist, trying to reduce, and ultimately trivialize, religious phenomena to purely sociological, psychological, anthropological, economic, or environmental terms is a fundamental mistake. Such reductions ignore the complexity of the human experience, impose social values on transcendental issues, and ignore the unique intentionality of the religious participant. Phenomenologists do not seek a bird's-eye view, but, in Jonsson's term, a worm's-eye view.

Phenomenologists suspend questions of truth for the sake of developing insights into the essence of religious experience. The emphasis is on developing a genuine empathetic understanding of the experience in question, at times involving participation in the experiences under consideration to gain first-hand information. The phenomenologist of religion does not follow the metaphor of the detached, scientific observer. A more appropriate metaphor is that of an actor, who requires an intimate, empathetic knowledge of the part being portrayed for a successful production.

The development of insight into the essential structures and meanings of religious experience is the ultimate goal of phenomenology of religion. To arrive at such insights while demonstrating a rigorous methodology remains an unrealized hope for phenomenologists. This is in part because rigor and intuition are extremely difficult to combine in a field as laden with emotional content as religious studies. More importantly, however, once an "essence" is discovered, the question of ontology (or truth) can no longer be ignored. For example, when Eliade suggests that modern man is poorer than archaic generations because we have desacralized our view of the cosmos, he is no longer merely describing. Rather, he has moved into the type of ontological discussion which phenomenologists bracket out (Baird, Category Formation, 1971). At the same time that phenomenologists attempt to bracket out ultimate questions of truth, their methodology posits that the researcher accept the evaluations of the believers being studied. These are not to be accepted in regard to the ultimate question of truth but in regard to the intentionality of the believers themselves. For phenomena to be interpreted in their context, the intentions of those who participate in the phenomena must be accepted. In this sense, the phenomenologist serves as a translator. In this metaphor, the intention is that of dynamic equivalence rather than wooden literalism, and the phenomenologist has the task of faithfully representing the experience of the devotee on the idiom of the phenomenologist's audience.

General Critique. There are several areas in which phenomenology of religion faces difficult questions in its quest to understand the essence of religious experience (for other areas, see Waardenburg, 1978).

In light of the recent deconstructionist critique of how we tend to define ourselves by the way we describe others, phenomenology's claims of pure description have been open to examination. No one is immune from the influences of culture, historical setting, and social situation. Each of these areas lays assumptive claims on our worldview. To be purely descriptive is recognized as impossible in light of human conditions and constraints, let alone sin. Every person, phenomenologist included, has what might be termed hidden agendas driving the choice of data, method of analysis, and presentation of findings. In the literature, phenomenologists regularly cross the boundary from description to evaluation. Indeed, crossing such boundaries is part of what it means to be culturally and historically placed human beings and to have religious identity. Thus, the claim of phenomenology to be a purely descriptive methodology has come under attack.

Phenomenology of Religion

Along similar lines, the phenomenologist's desire to simply accept the intentions of adherents as expressed naively eliminates the question of the deceitfulness of the human heart and our inability to know ourselves. This also is an important consideration in the intuitive approach, as the question of our own motives in the intuitive process are inappropriately bracketed. In other words, the personal psychology of the phenomenologist is not subject to examination, though this will have a considerable bearing on the types of intuitions developed as interpretations of religious phenomena. For us as Christians, the impact of sin on the human psyche dare not be ignored or downplayed, and this includes not only the phenomena being considered but the one who is reflecting on and seeking to describe those phenomena.

Some have charged that phenomenology tends to look at religious events as though they were a set of slides rather than a living video rooted in historical context. The exclusion of phenomena from history or of excluding diachronic and developmental analysis altogether leaves phenomenology open to the challenge of flawed methodology. This lack of ability to properly contextualize the mass of religious phenomena typically considered by phenomenologists results in the presentation of what are assumed (or posited) to be representative events. The question of the representative nature of such events is difficult to resolve even when statistical methodologies are employed, let alone when dealing with a discipline that tends to eschew the exposing of undergirding predictive laws as its goal.

The phenomenological reliance on eidetic vision or intuition also invites criticism. For instance, the very combination of "objectivity" and "intuition" is a contradiction of terms. Further, reliance on intuitive insights does not allow for escape from questions of verification. In this area phenomenology is open to charges of methodological flaws, for substantiating intuition and showing that one particular intuitive insight is more adequate than another is exceedingly difficult at best. This is particularly vexing when several phenomenologists study the same experience and each develops significantly different insights. The observation that the end result inevitably involves personal subjectivism is difficult for phenomenology to escape. More importantly, in light of biblical revelation, Christians who utilize a phenomenological approach must be willing to move beyond intuitive insight to ontological analysis in light of biblical revelation. This is especially significant in light of phenomenology's purported bracketing of truth in its methodology. This bracketing may be invaluable in the initial stages of developing an empathetic understanding of the religious experience of another. However, for the theologian or missiologist it can only be viewed as a valuable starting methodology which has its limitations.

Phenomenology demands an empathetic approach, for to represent another's religious experience in a way that the other would affirm demands empathy. In search of such empathy, there will always be a danger of identification to the extent that religious conversion occurs. Further, some phenomenologists advocate a form of participant observation. For the Christian, however, actual participation in certain types of rituals of another religion is an area full of difficulties. This may limit our ability to empathize but is necessary in light of God's ultimate call on our lives.

Conclusion. The phenomenological approach to the study of religion has opened significant doors which are important in developing an empathetic understanding of the rich complexity of religious phenomena in the world. Missiologists regularly utilize phenomenological methodology in seeking understanding of religious phenomena in the world's contexts. For the theologian or missiologist, certain aspects of phenomenological methodology may be utilized profitably as a starting point for religious understanding. The emphasis on description, with the attendant caveats, is worthy of emulation. The avoidance of reductionism is a goal to strive for, since all too often in examining other religious phenomena we are prone to limit our explanations to one field of study or to overgeneralize our conclusions. The reliance on intuitive insight is initially helpful but must ultimately give way to biblical revelation as the framework of our evaluative paradigm. Similarly, the ability to bracket questions of truth for the sake of understanding the phenomena at hand is helpful as long as it is recognized that we as Christians must ultimately move beyond this bracketing toward evaluation in light of Scripture. In summary, and given the limitations discussed above, the phenomenological approach to religious study may be profitably employed as a helpful tool in understanding the bewildering variety of religious experiences. However, it must not be seen as an end in itself. Because of its emphasis on human insight and bracketing truth, the role of a phenomenological approach will of necessity be limited to that of a foundational step toward a biblical response to the religious phenomena in our world today.

A. S. MOREAU

Bibliography. D. Allen, "Phenomenology of Religion," ER 11:272-83; R. D. Baird, Category Formation and the History of Religions; J. D. Bettis, ed., Phenomenology of Religion: Eight Modern Descriptions of the Essence of Religion; W. H. Capps, Ways of Understanding Religion; M. Heidegger, Being and Time, J. Macquarrie and E. Robinson, trans.; A. Hulkrantz, "Phenomenology of Religion: Aims and Methods," Temenos 6:68–88; J. N. Jonsson, Worlds within Religion; E. J. Jurji, Phenomenology of Religion; E. J. Lott, Vision, Tradition, and Interpretation; E. J. Sharpe, Comparative Religion: A History; N. Smart, Phenomenon of Religion; Religion and the Western Mind; H. Spiegelbert, Phenomenological Movement; G. van der Leeuw, Religion in Essence and Manifestation; J. Waardenburg, Reflections on the Study of Religion; M. Westphal, God, Guilt, and Death: An Existential Phenomenology of Religion.

Philippists. See CRYPTO-CALVINISM.

Philokalia (Gr. philos, lover; kalia, the beautiful or excellent). A collection of Greek spiritual texts written between the fourth and fifteenth centuries. Some of the monastic writers included in the Philokalia are St. Maximos the Confessor, St. Simeon the New Theologian, and St. Gregory Palamas. The uniting theme of the Philokalia is unceasing prayer as advocated by the apostle Paul. The best example of this devotional method is the Jesus Prayer: "Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy on me, a sinner." While traditionally associated with the hesychast movement, a spiritual revival centered on Mt. Athos in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, some of the texts represent an earlier period of spirituality. Advocates of hesychasm maintain that the spiritual continuity is proof of the antiquity of the hesychast devotion that focuses on hesychia (often translated "stillness" or "quiet") so that the Holy Spirit can lead the person into true knowledge. The experience of the uncreated light of God is thought to be the highpoint of hesychasm. Ultimately, the Philokalia is a very practical manual of spiritual direction. While primarily focused on monastic life, it has application for Christians who would seek a deeper experience of God even in ordinary pursuits.

The original compilation was done in the eighteenth century by St. Nikodimos of Mt. Athos (1749–1809) and St. Makarios of Corinth (1731–1805), and was published at Venice in 1782. A Russian monk, Paisii Velichkovski (1722–94), who became acquainted with the Philokalia on a visit to Mt. Athos, translated a selection of the texts into Slavonic. These were published under the title Dobrotolubiye at Moscow in 1793 and reprinted in 1822. The anonymous peasant pilgrim in Way of a Pilgrim carried this translation as he attempted to follow the prescription of unceasing prayer. The influence of the Philokalia is evident in the writings of Fyodor Dostoyevsky. The hesychast spiritual tradition exercised a great influence on Russian culture in the nineteenth century. A Russian translation by Ignatii Brianchaninov (1807–67) was published in 1857.

J. J. STAMOOLIS

See also GREGORY PALAMAS; HESYCHASM; ORTHODOX TRADITION; SIMEON THE NEW THEOLOGIAN.

Bibliography. E. Kadloubovsky and G. E. H. Palmer, eds. and trans., Early Fathers from the Philokalia Translated from the Russian; Writings from the Philokalia on the Prayer of the Heart Translated from the Russian; G. E. H. Palmer, Philip Sherrard, and Kallistos Ware, trans., Philokalia: The Complete Text Translated from the Greek.

Philosophy, Christian View of. Certain Greek thinkers in the seventh and sixth centuries B.C. were the first to call themselves philosophers, literally "lovers of wisdom." Discounting the traditional myths, doctrines, and common sense of the priests and poets of classical Greece, the first philosophers held that the most important questions all human beings need to answer are those concerning social order and the origin, nature, and development of the material world. Their method of approaching these questions included the critical scrutiny of confessedly human theories about the natural order. Alleged revelation from the gods offered by the religious leaders was explicitly repudiated. Not all philosophers since the first ones in ancient Greece have been antisupernaturalists, but they have all been concerned primarily with the most basic questions common to every human being, and they have adopted a method that tries to be critical of every assertion and the assumptions behind it.

Focusing on the most fundamental and general issues facing humankind, philosophers traditionally have attempted to synthesize all knowledge into a coherent, consistent system. No scientist or group of scientists can accomplish this task, for they are all limited in the scope of their investigations to just parts or certain aspects of the experienced world. The dominance of the scientific method in the modern era has brought with it a skepticism by many, including some scholars in philosophy, about going beyond the methods of science in describing reality. Consequently the synthetic and synoptic function of philosophy is considered less than attainable by some philosophers today.

More in vogue presently is the other characteristic associated with the philosophers from the time of the ancient Greeks onward, namely, their attempt to be analytical. In this role the philosopher gives leadership in the careful evaluation of the assertions, concepts, assumptions, methods, and conclusions of anyone who claims to be describing reality or prescribing for human behavior.

The Four Types of Philosophical Problems. Logic. Distinguishing good reasoning from bad cannot be done scientifically, for the ability to make this distinction is presupposed by all thinkers, scientific or otherwise. The philosophical field of logic seeks to ascertain the principles of the thought patterns one ought to follow if reality is to be reflected adequately or if reality is intentionally not being reflected in one's thought or utterances. Thus logic is the normative discipline of correct reasoning as such.

Philosophy, Christian View of

Theory of Knowledge. Although as important as any area in philosophy, the theory of knowledge, also designated epistemology, has seen surprisingly little progress in moving past the issues raised by the first philosophers over two and a half millennia ago. These issues include the definition, criteria, and sources of knowledge. Equally significant is the question of whether there is a foundational structure of directly known principles of evidence upon which reasoning can be built. Also, there is the problem of deciding on the conditions that must exist for a statement to be true.

Metaphysics and Ontology. The term "metaphysics" was first used to refer to what Aristotle claimed to be "a science which investigates being as being and the attributes which belong to this in virtue of its own nature." He distinguished this "science" from all the "so-called special sciences," for none of them dealt "generally with being as being." Although the etymology and traditional use of the term "ontology" makes it a synonym of "metaphysics," its meaning has become narrowed in contemporary philosophy. This constriction began with Immanuel Kant's theoretical separation of reality from the appearance of reality and the limitation of human knowledge to the latter.

Prior to Kant metaphysics was commonly understood as the theoretical grasp of the overall structure of reality. Following Kant's distinction between reality and appearance metaphysics has been seen by many as the dispelling of illusion about what can be known of reality, assuming the human inability to transcend the realm of appearance.

In the analytically oriented philosophy of today's English-speaking world metaphysics amounts to a rigorous examination of the concepts used when referring to the basic categories of being. The term "ontology" is usually preferred, leaving "metaphysics" for the largely discredited speculative account of reality as a whole. By way of contrast, continental European philosophy considers ontology to be the disclosure of the world of appearance which is reality. Many philosophers, however, reject the Kantian distinction between appearance and reality by striving to grasp reality as a coherent system toward which human thought is advancing. For them metaphysics is understood in its traditional sense.

Value Theory. The fourth major department of philosophy includes ethics and aesthetics. The primary focus of the study of aesthetics is upon the question of whether beauty is relative to the observer. The answer has a direct bearing on the practical problem of whether standards should be imposed upon the creation, appreciation, and criticism of art works.

Ethics is mainly concerned with the grounds warranting human actions to be judged right or wrong, and persons and events good or evil. Ethicists who take moral statements to be cognitively meaningful and who find an objective basis for ethical values are divided into two standpoints in their theory as to what makes human behavior morally right or wrong. The teleological approach looks for the moral quality of an action in its tendency to bring about an intrinsically good state of affairs. Instances of such states that have been proposed include the greatest pleasure for the largest number of people, the full development of one's potential as a rational being, and the attainment of eternal peace. The competing standpoint is that of deontological ethics, which maintains that the rightness or wrongness of some human actions is not based on the results of those actions. Keeping a promise, for example, is thought right in any situation, because it is one's duty or is commanded by God. Traditionally Christian ethics has had both teleological and deontological elements.

The Christian Attitude toward Philosophy. The apostle Paul's warning to the Colossian believers is clear: "See to it that no one takes you captive through hollow and deceptive philosophy, which depends on human tradition and the basic principles of this world rather than on Christ" (Col. 2:8). Such a warning was to be expected in light of what passed for philosophy in Paul's time. But he makes a philosophical assertion himself by continuing in the same passage to point out that in Christ "all the fulness of the Deity lives in bodily form" and that Christ is "the head over every power and authority" (2:9-10). Apparently Paul regarded at least some problems of interest to the philosophers of his day worth addressing. For instance, "Christ" and "the elemental spirits of the universe" are taken by Paul to be alternative answers to a philosophical question he considers important.

Secular philosophers began losing the initiative to Christian thinkers within a few centuries after Paul's death. Indeed, during the thousand years prior to the modern era virtually all European philosophers were Christians. They took seriously the need of providing an interpretation of divine revelation in nature, Christ, and Scripture for a culture built on the framework of the ancient Greek philosophers. The basic questions every human must ask had been so clearly articulated by the Greeks that the Christian philosophers sought to formulate equally cogent answers from the standpoint of God's general and special revelation.

Secular philosophy, often anti-Christian, has regained the leadership in the modern period. The foundational issues with which philosophy deals have not changed, but their specific formulations and proposed solutions in the last few centuries have not always been compatible with Christianity. Hence, there is a great need for the insights and truths of divine revelation to be reestablished as being worthy of philosophical consideration.

This goal of contemporary Christian philosophy cannot be attained apart from the assistance of biblical scholarship and theology, however. Since orthodox Christianity is grounded upon, and intended to be consistent with, the events recorded and interpreted in Scripture, the Christian philosopher must come to understand Scripture as it understands itself. Of particular assistance will be theological interpretations of Scripture limited to the problems dealt with by God's inspired prophets and apostles. The Christian in philosophy will build upon this theological framework but will never supplant it.

Because much has been learned from and about both God's and humankind's creative work since the origin of the human race, the Christian thinker must contemplate more than the problems of concern to the biblical writers. Moreover, in order to encompass as much of God's truth as possible from natural revelation within a comprehensive view of the universe created and sustained by the merciful, loving God of Scripture, the Christian must engage in philosophical speculation. This does not entail an outlook inconsistent with Scripture. Specifically, there is no need to repudiate the miraculous, historical events upon which the Christian faith rests. A philosopher's synthetic standpoint is not necessarily secular, much less anti-Christian, even though the first philosophy began this way and has largely reverted to this stance in the modern era. All that a Christian must do to pursue philosophy properly is critically to scrutinize the discoveries, insights, and theories that have increased our knowledge of God's universe, and coherently to weave this knowledge into an adequate whole consistent with Scripture. This will involve a consideration, assessment, and evaluation from the scriptural viewpoint of every area of the human quest for knowledge, for control of the environment, for human governance, and for artistic expression.

The Christian philosopher's overriding purpose is to love God with one's entire being, including the mind. In addition, the Christian philosopher desires to assist the theologian in two important ways. One is to provide leadership in developing techniques of rigorous, critical analysis of both cultural and theological assumptions, concepts, and doctrines and their implications. The other line of assistance is in the formulation of a synthetic and synoptic scheme of thought in order that the systematic theologian, particularly, can show Scripture to be relevant to contemporary life and thought. The simple fact that any systematic theologian must adopt a philosophical system makes it crucial that Christian philosophers make available guidance in the selection and use of one consistent with the teachings of Scripture.

S. R. OBITTS

See also ESTHETICS, CHRISTIAN VIEW OF; ETHICAL SYSTEMS, CHRISTIAN; METAPHYSICS; PHILOSOPHY OF RELIGION.

Bibliography. M. D. Beaty, ed., Christian Theism and the Problem of Philosophy; H. Blamires, Christian Mind; C. Brown, Philosophy and the Christian Faith; R. M. Chisholm et al., Philosophy; W. Corduan, Handmaid to Theology; I. U. Dalferth, Theology and Philosophy; B. L. Hebblethwaite, Problems of Theology; A. Holmes, Philosophy: A Christian Perspective; L. Kalsbeek, Contours of a Christian Philosophy; J. C. Kelly, ed., Philosophers Who Believe; T. V. Morris, ed., God and the Philosophers; R. Nash, Word of God and the Mind of Man; B. J. Walsh and J. R. Middleton, Transforming Vision; H. A. Wolfson, Philosophy of the Church Fathers; N. Wolterstorff, Reason within the Bounds of Religion.

Philosophy of Religion. Philosophy of religion is an academic discipline that uses philosophical methods to analyze and evaluate religious beliefs. Philosophers of religion focus on the meaning of key words, the status of theological claims, or the structure of arguments for religious beliefs. They unravel the definitions of terms like God or miracle. They examine whether statements like "God loves all persons" are meaningful or true given the reality of suffering. They test for rational strength any arguments that believers may develop in support of their convictions or that unbelievers may construct in opposition to religious teachings. Since religion as a general, abstract category makes no claims, these philosophical activities are directed toward the cognitive aspect of specific religions. Philosophy of religion is an academic discipline that applies philosophical analysis and synthesis to the intellectual dimensions of specific forms of religious living.

In general, philosophy seeks several goals. First, philosophical investigation seeks conceptual clarity. Philosophers lay out very precise definitions, look for unstated or implied presuppositions, or unpack the exact nature of relationships between statements. Second, philosophy stresses a critical approach to its subject. For this reason, the mere assertion of religious belief does not satisfy most philosophers. Instead, they will search out the reasons why particular ideas are either worthy or unworthy of belief. Third, some philosophers attempt to construct comprehensive viewpoints. Though some philosophers resist building worldviews or large-scale theories, this venture is still a respected form of philosophy. As a branch of philosophy, philosophy of religion seeks clear, critical, and comprehensive understandings of religious belief.

Philosophy of Religion

Philosophers of religion have traditionally addressed a particular set of questions. One cluster of issues includes the being and existence of God. This incorporates the divine nature, the rationale for affirming certain divine attributes, and the traditional theistic arguments. These arguments involve inferring God's being from the very existence of finite objects (the cosmological argument), from the design evident in creation (the teleological argument), from the human moral intuition (the moral argument), or from the very idea of a perfect being (the ontological argument). A second set of questions includes significant objections to theistic belief. The two most notable are the existence of seemingly unjustified evil and the apparent impossibility of miracles given the natural sciences.

A third issue is religious language. Here the debate concerns whether ordinary, limited human language can capture the reality of God. A fourth set of questions addresses religious and mystical experience. Philosophers first search for unbiased descriptions of such unusual experiences (no easy task in itself), then interpret those experiences and evaluate their significance. A major problem is whether or not the mystics of various religions are having in some sense "the same" experience. Obviously, this touches on another range of problems, namely, the relationships among the world's religions. This area of reflection touches on pluralism, the doctrine that varied and even contrary religious perspectives could all be valid ways to encounter the ultimate reality.

A final area of concern for philosophy of religion is epistemological. It involves exploring principles and procedures for warranting religious beliefs or belief systems. These matters touch on a fundamental question, the relation of faith and reason. In this context, reason describes what humans learn through more usual epistemic abilities, while faith refers to what they know about God through some special means of spiritual communication. (Note that the biblical sense of the word faith is quite different, for it puts more stress on the act by which one person places trust in another person.) Given these concepts, how does distinctively Christian thinking connect with generically human thought? Some, like Tertullian, Søren Kierkegaard, and contemporary neo-orthodox believers, see radical discontinuity between philosophy and Christian doctrine. Others like Origen, Aquinas, and many liberal theologians see a close connection between the two. This is an ongoing debate among Christian philosophers.

More recently, Christian philosophers of religion have begun examining ideas and beliefs that were once the province of theology. Traditionally, philosophers discussed only those theological beliefs that were thought to be discoverable outside special revelation, that is, through reason. These beliefs included God's existence, but excluded subjects like the Trinity. But philosophers now address theological convictions even though they could hardly be warranted by philosophical argument alone. For example, Christians in philosophy of religion have unpacked ideas like justification by faith or analyzed the practice of prayer. Similarly, outside the Christian sphere, a recent essay discussed karma. This trend will likely continue among believers for whom clarity of doctrine is an important value.

Even though philosophers now apply their discipline to theological concepts, philosophy of religion is still distinct from systematic or dogmatic theology. Theology typically approaches these issues with different assumptions. Systematic theologians may simply posit the validity of a particular religion like Christianity or Judaism, but philosophers of religion will not. Thus, when Christians do philosophy of religion, they take a somewhat more neutral stance regarding even their own beliefs. Of course, philosophers today recognize that a completely disinterested neutrality is impossible and probably undesirable. After all, the issues under discussion are of great personal importance. Yet for purposes of understanding, philosophers do seek a relatively more neutral stance that might be called "interested objectivity."

Traditionally, religious people commonly presupposed the essential truth of their worldview. Among Christians, some simply posit, as the platform for theological reflection, their convictions that God exists and has decisively and truthfully spoken to humans in Christ and in the Bible. Those who see great discontinuity between Christian thought and generic human reasoning, including most neo-orthodox and some evangelical Christians, are especially likely to begin their theology in this way. From this viewpoint, the distinction between theology and philosophy of religion is very sharp. Those who take this view will say, for example, that the results of a teleological argument for God's existence are not relevant to theology. They express this sentiment claiming that the God of the philosophers is not the God of the Bible.

Other traditional Christians believe, however, that there are lines of connection between distinctively Christian knowledge and the conclusions derived from human thinking in other areas. Those who approach the Christian worldview in this way are more likely to allow theology to draw on philosophy of religion. Nevertheless, for evangelical Christians who treasure the Bible as the uniquely valid revelation of God, the distinction between theology and philosophy is still important.

For liberals who do not accept the traditional Christian claim that God is decisively revealed in Christ and in the Bible, theology and philosophy of religion are increasingly difficult to distinguish. Since they abandon the assumption of a unique revelation and they may not follow the tradition of limiting philosophy of religion to just certain aspects of Christian conviction, the practice of these philosophers virtually erases the distinction between philosophy of religion and theology.

Another area of study closely associated with philosophy of religion is apologetics. Although apologetics often draws on philosophy of religion, these two are quite distinct in several ways. In one sense, philosophy of religion is narrower than apologetics in that the latter uses data, analyses, and arguments not only from philosophy of religion, but also from many other disciplines including biblical studies, history, and various sciences both hard and soft. This means that apologetics is not a distinct academic discipline, but an area of study that borrows freely from several disciplines in performing its task of giving warrant for the Christian worldview. In another sense, however, apologetics is narrower in that its advocacy stance means it focuses specifically on warranting the Christian worldview, while philosophy of religion is more dedicated to understanding and analyzing any religious idea whatever.

Unlike apologetics, the academic discipline of religious studies assumes a stance of relative neutrality. Varied emphases characterize different scholarly approaches to religion. Some will examine religion sociologically, emphasizing the function of religion in its cultural context. Others will explore religion historically, stressing the influences of religion on the development of a culture and of the culture on the religion. Still others will focus primarily on the literature of a religion, seeking both to understand its teachings and to describe its origins. Philosophy of religion shares with these disciplines the commitment to adopt a relatively neutral point of view. But while these scholarly studies of religion focus on all features of religions, philosophy of religion centers specifically on the doctrinal claims or intellectual content of particular faiths.

Philosophy of religion as a distinct discipline is a relatively recent phenomenon. But philosophers have studied these subjects for many centuries. Indeed, doubts about the pagan gods motivated the earliest philosophical work. Pre-Socratics like Parmenides and Heraclitus both found religious significance in the metaphysical realities they posited. Plato and Aristotle, too, addressed religious ideas, propounding claims about the ultimate reality and about human nature that became enormously influential. The great Christian theologians of the medieval period, Augustine and Aquinas, both borrowed from the pagan philosophical tradition in their works.

Although René Descartes inaugurated the modern era of philosophy with an important change of focus toward epistemology, philosophers continued to debate religious ideas. Unlike the writings of the medievals, however, the works of many modern philosophers, including Benedict Spinoza, David Hume, Immanuel Kant, and Friedrich Nietzsche, have had negative effects on traditional beliefs.

In this century, two major philosophical movements applied their special emphases to religion. Phenomenology, associated with Edmund Husserl among others, proposed a new method that involved suspending preconceptions and critical questions about the truth or falsity of religious doctrine. In this way, phenomenologists sought to lay bare the beliefs of a religion as they are actually experienced by those who believe them. Achieving unbiased description of the beliefs of religious adherents is an important goal. It is part of the purpose of the academic study of religion. Any worthwhile analysis of the truth value of religious beliefs surely requires that the analyst has understood those beliefs fairly.

Many philosophers of religion, especially in the English-speaking world, take the analytic philosophy approach represented by thinkers like the enormously influential Ludwig Wittgenstein. In its narrowest form, analytic philosophy (or linguistic analysis philosophy) limits itself to probing the concepts of religion and examining the logical relations of theological claims. The narrowest versions of analytic philosophy refrain from making judgments about the truth or falsity of religious beliefs.

But having finished the preliminary tasks of honestly describing and clearly analyzing religious beliefs, analytic philosophy may move to the equally important function of judging the epistemic warrant for individual beliefs, sets of claims, or systems of thought. Here the philosopher of religion turns to the crucial task of judging the truth and reasonableness of religious claims. Philosophy of religion is today a thriving area of academic work, one in which several traditional Christians like Richard Swinburne and Alvin Plantinga have gained a prominent place.

D. K. CLARK

See also PHILOSOPHY, CHRISTIAN VIEW OF.

Bibliography. T. Aquinas, Summa Theologica; D. Hume, Dialogues concerning Natural Religion; M. Peterson, W. Hasker, B. Reichenbach, and D. Basinger, Reason and Religious Beliefs: An Introduction to the Philosophy of Religion; A. Plantinga, God and Other Minds; Warrant and Proper Function; L. P. Pojman, Philosophy of Religion: An Anthology; R. Swinburne, Coherence of Theism; Existence of God; Faith and Reason.

Photian Schism

Photian Schism. The name given to a ninth century dispute between Eastern and Western Christianity. It began when Photius, a professor of philosophy, was appointed patriarch of Constantinople by the emperor Michael III in 858, after the previous incumbent had been deposed. The latter's followers questioned the legality of this and found support from Pope Nicholas I, who took the opportunity to claim dominion over the Eastern church. The breach was widened by doctrinal differences. These included matters such as celibacy, fasting, and anointing with oil, but concerned more notably the so-called double procession of the Holy Ghost. Rome held that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father and the Son (filioque). Photius rejected this, and saw in it a reflection of the difference between orthodoxy and heresy.

It seems clear that the schism was exacerbated by a difficulty of communication: neither pope nor patriarch spoke each other's language. The schism extended even to the mission field, where both sides vied for the souls of the Slavs. Bulgaria was a particular bone of contention. A new emperor first deposed, then restored, Photius, and a new pope, John VIII, did not press papal claims that had demonstrably jeopardized the unity of Christendom. But the damage had been done; another emperor in 886 either deposed Photius or compelled him to resign, and the ground was laid for the final split between Eastern and Western Christianity in 1054.

J. D. DOUGLAS

See also FILIOQUE.

Bibliography. F. Dvornik, Photian Schism.

Pietism. A recurring tendency within Christian history to emphasize more the practicalities of Christian life and less the formal structures of theology or church order. Its historians discern four general traits in this tendency: (1) its experiential character—pietists are people of the heart for whom Christian living is the fundamental concern; (2) its biblical focus—pietists are, to paraphrase John Wesley, “people of one book” who take standards and goals from the pages of Scripture; (3) its perfectionistic bent—pietists are serious about holy living and expend every effort to follow God's law, spread the gospel, and provide aid for the needy; (4) its reforming interest—pietists usually oppose what they regard as coldness and sterility in established church forms and practices.

Spener and Francke. The German Lutheran Church at the end of the seventeenth century labored under several difficulties. Its work was tightly confined by the princes of Germany's many sovereign states. Many of its ministers seemed as interested in philosophical wrangling and rhetorical ostentation as in the encouragement of their congregations. And the devastating Thirty Years War (1618–48), fought ostensibly over religion, had created widespread wariness about church life in general. To be sure, the picture was not entirely bleak. From Holland and Puritan England came stimulation for reform. And in German-speaking lands signs of Christian vitality remained, like the writings of Johann Arndt, whose True Christianity (1610) was a strong influence on later leaders of pietism.

But in many places these signs of life were obscured by the formalism and the insincerity of church leaders. This situation was altered by the unstinting work of Philipp Jakob Spener, known often as the father of pietism, who was called in 1666 to be the senior minister in Frankfurt am Main. There he appealed for moral reform in the city. He initiated a far-flung correspondence that eventually won him the title “spiritual counselor of all Germany.” Most importantly, he also promoted a major reform in the practical life of the churches. A sermon in 1669 mentioned the possibility of laymen meeting together, setting aside “glasses, cards, or dice,” and encouraging each other in the Christian faith. The next year Spener himself instituted such a collegia pietatis (“pious assembly”) to meet on Wednesdays and Sundays to pray, discuss the previous week's sermon, and apply passages from Scripture and devotional writings to individual lives.

Spener took a major step toward reviving the church in 1675 when he was asked to prepare a new preface for sermons by Johann Arndt. The result was the famous Pia Desideria (Pious Wishes). In simple terms this brief work examined the sources of spiritual decline in Protestant Germany and offered proposals for reform. The tract was an immediate sensation. In it Spener criticized nobles and princes for exercising unauthorized control of the church, ministers for substituting cold doctrine in place of warm faith, and lay people for disregarding proper Christian behavior. He called positively for a revival of the concerns of Luther and the early Reformation, even as he altered Reformation teaching slightly. For example, Spener regarded salvation more as regeneration (the new birth) than as justification (being put right with God), even though the Reformers had laid greater stress upon the latter.

Spener offered six proposals for reform in Pia Desideria, which became a short summary of pietism: (1) there should be “a more extensive use of the Word of God among us.” The Bible, Spener said, “must be the chief means for reforming something.” (2) Spener called also for a renewal of “the spiritual priesthood,” the priesthood of all believers. Here he cited Luther's example in urging all Christians to be active in the general work of Christian ministry. (3) He appealed for the reality of Christian practice and argued that Christianity is more than a matter of simple knowledge. (4) Spener then urged restraint and charity in religious controversies. He asked his readers to love and pray for unbelievers and the erring, and to adopt a moderate tone in disputes. (5) Next he called for a reform in the education of ministers. Here he stressed the need for training in piety and devotion as well as in academic subjects. (6) Last he implored ministers to preach edifying sermons, understandable by the people, rather than technical discourses which few were interested in or could understand.

Although these proposals constituted an agenda for reform and renewal, they also posed two difficulties that have ever been troublesome for pietism. First, many clergymen and professional theologians opposed them, some out of a concern to preserve their traditional status, but others out of a genuine fear that they would lead to rampant subjectivity and anti-intellectualism. Second, some lay people took Spener's proposals as authorization for departing from the established churches altogether, even though Spener himself rejected the separatistic conclusions drawn from his ideas.

Spener left Frankfurt for Dresden in 1686, and from there he was called to Berlin in 1691. His time in Dresden was marked by controversy, but it was not a loss, for in Dresden he met his successor, August Hermann Francke. In Berlin, Spener helped to found the University of Halle, to which Francke was called in 1692. Under Francke's guidance the University of Halle showed what pietism could mean when put into practice. In rapid succession Francke opened his own home as a school for poor children, founded a world-famous orphanage, established an institute for the training of teachers, and later helped found a publishing house, a medical clinic, and other institutions.

Francke had experienced a dramatic conversion in 1687, the source of his lifelong concern for evangelism and missions. Under his leadership Halle became the center of Protestantism's most ambitious missionary endeavors to that time. The university established a center for Oriental languages and also encouraged efforts at translating the Bible into new languages. Francke's missionary influence was felt directly through missionaries who went from Halle to foreign fields and indirectly through groups like the Moravians and an active Danish mission which drew inspiration from the leaders of pietism.

The Spread of Pietism. Spener and Francke inspired other varieties of German pietism. Count Nikolas von Zinzendorf, head of the renewed Moravian Church, was Spener's godson and Francke's pupil. Zinzendorf organized refugees from Moravia into a kind of collegia pietatis within German Lutheranism, and later shepherded this group in reviving the Bohemian Unity of the Brethren. These Moravians, as they came to be known, carried the pietistic concern for personal spirituality almost literally around the world. This was of momentous significance for the history of English-speaking Christianity when John Wesley was thrown into a company of Moravians during his voyage to Georgia in 1735. What he saw of their behavior then and what he heard of their faith after returning to England led to his own evangelical awakening.

Another group under the general influence of Spener and Francke developed pietistic concern for the Bible within German Lutheranism at Württemberg. Its leading figure, Johann Albrecht Bengel (1687–1752), represented a unique combination of scholarly expertise and devotional commitment to Scripture. Bengel did pioneering study in the text of the NT, exegeted Scripture carefully and piously, and wrote several books on the millennium.

Influences radiating from Halle, Württemberg, and the Moravians moved rapidly into Scandinavia. When soldiers from Sweden and Finland were captured in battle with Russia (1709), pietist commitments migrated to Siberia. Pietism exerted its influence through Wesley in England. The father of American Lutheranism, Henry Melchior Muhlenberg, was sent across the Atlantic by Francke's son in response to requests for spiritual leadership from German immigrants. In addition, pietism also influenced the Mennonites, Moravians, Brethren, and Dutch Reformed in early America. The continuing influence of Spener, Francke, and their circle went on into the nineteenth century. A renewal of interest in Luther and his theology, the active evangelism of the Basel Mission and the Inner Mission Society of Denmark, the revivalist activity of Norwegian Hans Nielsen Hauge (1771–1824), and the establishment of the Swedish Mission Covenant Church (1878) could all trace their roots back to the pietism of an earlier day.

Pietistic Influences. Historians have long studied the relationship between pietism and the Enlightenment, that rationalistic and humanistic movement which flourished during the eighteenth century and which contributed to the eventual secularization of Europe. They have noted that pietism and the Enlightenment both attacked Protestant orthodoxy, that both asserted the rights of individuals, and that both were concerned about practice more than theory. The crucial historical question is whether pietistic anti-traditionalism, individualism, and practicality paved the way for a non-Christian expression of these same traits in the Enlightenment. The fact that pietism remained faithful to Scripture and that its subjectivity was controlled by Christian beliefs suggests that, whatever its relationship to the Enlightenment, it was not the primary source of the latter's skepticism or rationalism.

Pietism

A further historical uncertainty surrounds the tie between pietism and the intellectual movements arising in reaction to the Enlightenment. Striking indeed is the fact that three great post-Enlightenment thinkers—the idealist philosopher Immanuel Kant, the literary genius Johann Wolfgang Goethe, and the romantic theologian Friedrich Schleiermacher—had been exposed to pietism as youths. It is probably best to regard pietism as a movement that paralleled the Enlightenment and later European developments in its quest for personal meaning and its disdain for exhausted traditions. Yet insofar as the heart of pietism was captive to the gospel, it remained a source of distinctly Christian renewal.

Religious movements resembling pietism were active beyond Germany in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. In fact, German pietism was but one chord in a symphony of variations on a common theme—the need to move beyond sterile formulas about God to a more intimate experience with him. The English Puritans of the late 1500s and 1600s exhibited this. The New England Puritan Cotton Mather, who corresponded with Francke, strove to encourage pietistic vitality in the New World. Shortly after Mather's death the American Great Awakening of the 1730s and 1740s exhibited pietistic features. In England, William Law's Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life (1728) advocated a kind of pietistic morality. And Wesley's Methodism, with its emphasis on Scripture, its commitment to evangelism and edification, its practical social benevolence, and its evangelical ecumenicity, was pietistic to the core.

Even beyond Protestantism, pietistic elements can be seen in contemporary Roman Catholicism and Judaism. The Jansenist movement in seventeenth-century France stressed the concern for heart religion that Spener also championed. The work of Baal Shem Tov (1700–60) in founding the Hasidic movement in Judaism also sought to move beyond orthodox ritual to a sense of communion with God.

An overall evaluation of pietism must take into consideration the circumstances of its origin in seventeenth-century Europe. Whether in its narrow German usage or its more generic sense, pietism represented a complex phenomenon. It partook of the mysticism of the late Middle Ages. It shared the commitment to Scripture and the emphasis on lay Christianity of the early Reformation. It opposed the formalism and cold orthodoxy of the theological establishment. And it was a child of its own times with its concern for authentic personal experience. It was, in one sense, the Christian answer to what has been called "the discovery of the individual" by providing a Christian form to the individualism and practical-mindedness of a Europe in transition to modern times.

In more specifically Christian terms pietism represents a significant effort to reform the Protestant heritage. Some of the fears of its earliest opponents have been partially justified. At its worst the pietistic tendency can lead to inordinate subjectivism and emotionalism; it can discourage careful scholarship; it can fragment the church through enthusiastic separatism; it can establish new codes of almost legalistic morality; and it can underrate the value of Christian traditions. On the other hand, pietism was—and continues to be—a source of powerful renewal in the church. At its best it points to the indispensability of Scripture for the Christian life; it encourages lay people in the work of Christian ministry; it stimulates concern for missions; it advances religious freedom and cooperation among believers; and it urges individuals not to rest until finding intimate fellowship with God himself.

M. A. NOLL

See also FRANCKE, AUGUST HERMANN; SPENER, PHILIPP JAKOB.

Bibliography. R. Lovelace, Dynamics of Spiritual Life; F. E. Stoesser, German Pietism during the Eighteenth Century; Rise of Evangelical Pietism; F. E. Stoesser, ed., Continental Pietism and Early American Christianity; W. R. Ward, Protestant Evangelical Awakening.

Pighius, Albert (ca. 1490–1542). Roman Catholic apologist. Born in the Netherlands, he graduated from Louvain and lived first in Paris and then from about 1523 in Rome. He defended papal infallibility, denied that the pope could ever become a heretic, and was often cited by the Council of Trent, which valued his concept of tradition but rejected his views on justification and original sin. He wrote a treatise on free will which sought to make predestination dependent on foreknowledge of merits and jeopardized acceptance of original sin. Calvin took Pighius so seriously that his Upon the Eternal Predestination (1552) was directed against the latter. Peter Martyr Vermigli, too, wrote rejecting the view of Pighius, who had also engaged in controversy with Luther and Bucer. The Roman scholar, who achieved some fame with his argument that tradition was on a level with Scripture as a source of Christian truth, was also involved in the debate around Henry VIII's divorce project and prepared material for dialogue with the Orthodox Church.

J. D. DOUGLAS

Pinnock, Clark H. (b. 1937). Theologian, apologist, teacher, and author. Pinnock was born in Toronto, graduated from the Ancient Near Eastern Studies program at the University of Toronto, and was awarded the British Commonwealth Scholarship to England. At Manchester University he studied New Testament under F. F. Bruce, completing his dissertation in 1963 on the Pauline concept of the Holy Spirit. While teaching at New Orleans Baptist Theological Seminary, Pinnock defended the Bible's authority and inerrancy in Defense of Biblical Infallibility (1967) and the biblical faith against modernity in Set Forth Your Case (1967). In 1968 he called fellow Baptists back to an inerrant Bible in New Reformation: A Challenge to Southern Baptists. From 1969 to 1974 Pinnock taught at Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, completing Biblical Revelation (1971), and from 1974 to 1977 he served on the faculty of Regent College. Rejecting the "deterministic logic" of Calvinism he argued for a Wesleyan-Arminian soteriology in Grace Unlimited (1975). Since 1977, as a professor at McMaster Divinity College, Pinnock has continued to contribute to apologetics: Reason Enough: A Case for the Christian Faith (1980), ecclesiology: Three Keys to Spiritual Renewal (1985), and soteriology: A Wideness in God's Mercy (1992). More recent works include: Openness of God (1994), Unbounded Love (1994), and Flames of Love (1996).

Pinnock is a theologian in process. In his early scholarship the liberal threat to biblical authority shaped much of his argument. Although committed to the Bible as "inerrant in all that it affirms," he has changed his views on what it affirms, emphasizing profitability over inerrancy. Since 1975 he has called evangelicals to embrace Arminianism. Accordingly, God's genuine desire to save all humanity (without exception) and man's freedom to accept or reject God's offer of salvation are fundamental to the gospel. Pinnock suggests that Augustinian-Calvinism implies that God coerces and manipulates his creatures. He suggests "free-will theism" to preserve the dynamism of God and human freedom. God is not in "total control" of what his creatures do, and he does not determine all things but allows genuine freedom. God is omniscient, knowing everything that can be known. However, according to Pinnock, free choices cannot be known because they are not yet settled in history. He also argues that some are saved by faith, though they may "be ignorant of Christ's provision," and he includes a "postmortem" opportunity for the unevangelized. Since the traditional belief in hell (everlasting punishment) implies vindictiveness in God, Pinnock suggests annihilation as the morally appropriate alternative.

J. R. LINCOLN

Bibliography. C. Pinnock, Biblical Revelation: The Foundation of Christian Theology; R. K. Johnston, HET 427–44; Wideness in God's Mercy; R. M. Price, "Clark H. Pinnock: Conservative and Contemporary," EvQ 60:157–83; R. V. Rakestraw, "Clark H. Pinnock," in Baptist Theologians, T. George and D. S. Dockery, eds.

Plantinga, Alvin (b. 1932). Calvinist philosopher, professor, author, and lecturer. After completing his undergraduate studies at Calvin College, Plantinga received his M.A. from the University of Michigan and in 1958 his Ph.D. from Yale University. Plantinga is a past president of the American Philosophical Association, Central Division, and of the Society of Christian Philosophers. He has taught at Yale University, Wayne State University, and Calvin College, and is currently John A. O'Brien Professor of Philosophy and director of the Center for Philosophy of Religion at the University of Notre Dame. Plantinga has contributed as author or editor to thirteen books including God and Other Minds (1967), Nature of Necessity (1974), Warrant: the Current Debate (1993), and Warrant and Proper Function (1993). He has published more than one hundred articles in the areas of philosophy of religion, epistemology, and metaphysics.

Plantinga is recognized as one of the most important philosophers of religion of the twentieth century. In addition to his seminal work in philosophy of religion, Plantinga has authored many original and beautifully crafted studies in metaphysics, epistemology, and the philosophy of the mind. In particular, his contributions in the area of metaphysics concerned with necessity, possibility, essence, and accident are of profound significance. Addressing the rationality of religious belief in the tradition of Reformed epistemology, Plantinga has challenged classical foundationalism and evidentialism. His best-known claims are that religious belief can be rational without propositional evidence or support by argument, and that natural theology is unnecessary for the rationality or justification of religious belief. In Faith and Rationality Plantinga argues that there is no reason to believe that theistic belief requires argument to be rational or warranted. In Warrant and Proper Function he adds that warrant, the property that distinguishes knowledge from mere true belief, is fundamentally proper function, i.e., functioning in accordance with the design plan with which God has created us. In his forthcoming Warranted Christian Belief he argues that specifically Christian belief—creation, fall, incarnation, atonement, eternal life—can be rational, justified, and warranted.

J. R. LINCOLN

See also PHILOSOPHY, CHRISTIAN VIEW OF; PHILOSOPHY OF RELIGION.

Bibliography. A. Plantinga, Does God Have a Nature?; Faith and Rationality; God and Other Minds; God, Freedom and Evil; Nature of Necessity; Warrant and Proper Function; Warrant in Contemporary Epistemology; J. Tomberlin and P. van Inwagen, Alvin Plantinga.

Plato, Platonism. Ancient Greek philosopher, one of the most influential thinkers who ever lived, Plato (ca. 427–347 B.C.) came from an aristocratic background that included a number of politically influential members. He was a resident of Athens and was given an excellent education by his family. This was followed by several years spent as a member of the Socratic Circle, a period that was abruptly ended by the death of Socrates in 399.

Plato, Platonism

Socrates' death had a profound effect on Plato. Following it he traveled widely in such countries as Greece, Egypt, and Sicily. He did not limit his philosophical studies to Socratic thought but was also widely exposed to other options such as Pythagoreanism and Heraclitianism. Upon returning to Athens (the date is not exactly known), he set up his famous school of philosophy called the Academy and taught there until his death.

During his career Plato wrote more than two dozen philosophical works that are still extant; almost all of these are written in dialogue form, often with Socrates as the major personality. Because of this arrangement, there has been some doubt as to the extent to which the expressed views are actually those of the speaker (such as Socrates) or if they are the teachings of Plato himself.

The chronological order of Plato's works cannot be established with exactitude, but scholars are in general agreement concerning the time frame. The earlier dialogues are chiefly concerned with ethics and revolve around such themes as virtue, right conduct, and obedience to the state, even to the point of death. The later dialogues rely less on dialectical arguments and are more concerned with expositions of his philosophy.

For Plato, sense experience is not a valid means of ascertaining reality, since it is often in error and at best can only perceive facts in this changing world. Rather, he emphasizes the proper use of reasoning and mathematics, which he holds to be much more reliable than the pursuit of natural science.

Methodologically, the innate knowledge which man is physically born with is rationally reflected upon and extracted from others by means of the so-called Socratic method. This was illustrated by Socrates' well-known dialogue with the slave boy in Meno (82–87). Since the boy had no way of learning the principles of geometry, his perception of these truths must have been due to the skillful questioning of Socrates, who drew out the innate knowledge already in the mind of the lad. Through such rational means man may discover the other world of forms.

Three of the most important contributions that Plato made to the philosophy of religion are his theory of forms, his cosmology, and his teaching concerning the immortality of the soul.

Forms. For Plato, forms are not physical objects nor are they simply logical or mathematical symbols. Rather, they have objective existence and provide the reality for the physical objects in the sense world, which can only imperfectly imitate these forms. In Timaeus the forms appear as the thoughts of God and have often been interpreted this way in both pre-Christian Platonism and in Christian philosophy since Augustine. The sense world is actually patterned after these forms, which provide the ideal copies for living and nonliving things alike, including even man-made objects (Republic 595–96).

The forms are ordered according to hierarchy, of which the highest form is good. Other high forms are truth and beauty, followed by lower but still important ones such as justice, courage, wisdom, and piety (see Republic 517; Philebus 64–65).

Cosmology. Plato's cosmology includes his concept of the formation of the world, man, and material objects as copies of the eternal forms. Much of this teaching is found in Timaeus, which was for a number of centuries Plato's best-known work and exercised great influence.

In Timaeus the Demiurge ("craftsman"), who appears to be God, fashions preexisting matter by patterning it after the forms. By the inclusion of mind or soul, the creation shares a little part of divine essence.

In the Laws we get an additional glimpse of Plato's natural theology, as he postulates a sort of cosmological argument for God's existence from the presence of motion. In this work Plato rejects the options of atheism and deism (in the later sense of a being who is not interested in his creation). However, in Statesman (esp. 273–74) he seems to entertain just such a deistic view, in that God first takes charge of his creation, but then leaves man to himself.

Immortality of the Soul. Plato's beliefs on this topic are chiefly set forth in Phaedo, but they appear in several of his other works as well. For Plato death is marked by the separation of the body and the soul. Until this time the body is a hindrance, as it opposes and even imprisons the soul (Phaedo 65–68; 91–94). After death the just will be rewarded with a better destiny than the unjust. While the unjust are judged, penalized, and corrected "under the earth," the just are exalted "in a heavenly place" (Phaedrus 248–49). This twofold judgment is illustrated in Plato's famous myth of Er (Republic 614–16).

Yet all souls are immortal and acquire much knowledge of both this and the spiritual world. For instance the soul is "born" many times, up to ten thousand years, with philosophers apparently achieving the desired result in a comparatively shorter period of time; after this the soul "speeds away" to heavenly bliss (Meno 81; Phaedrus 248–49). Therefore, realizing that it leads to the attainment of true wisdom and perfection, the true philosopher should not fear death (Phaedo 65–68).

Influence of Platonic Thought. While Plato's concept of forms, his cosmology, and his views of immortality have probably had the greatest influence in the philosophy of religion, his other teachings have also been influential. His political philosophy, outlined in the Republic, sets forth three classes: philosopher-kings, the military, and workers. His ethical philosophy, stressing the virtue of wisdom, has inspired those who seek intellectual pleasures (Philebus). His aesthetic philosophy, which emphasizes the imitating of ideal beauty rather than temporal, physical realities (Symposium), has been a major influence in the history of art.

Plato's academy was closed by Justinian in A.D. 529. Both before and after this time Platonism in various forms has been one of the most influential philosophies. Its impact on Judaism may be seen in Philo in the first century B.C. It inspired the Neoplatonism of Plotinus in the third century A.D., which emphasized the mystical implications of Plato's thought. Christian thought also came under the influence of Platonism, as scholars of the third century such as Clement of Alexandria and Origen mixed this Greek philosophy with their theology. In particular, Augustine's interpretation of Plato dominated Christian thought for the next thousand years after his death in the fifth century.

The Renaissance was partially characterized by a revival of Platonic thought, led by scholars such as Marsilio Ficino and Giovanni Pico of Florence. Later, the seventeenth-century Cambridge Platonists promoted these ideas. In modern philosophy Platonism has inspired the works of thinkers such as A. E. Taylor and A. N. Whitehead.

Plato has exercised an enormous influence on Western thought and must therefore be dealt with by those of all philosophical persuasions. Through the centuries scholars have sided both with and against him. Some have questioned the objective existence of forms, others his reliance on the reminiscence of a previous existence. His cosmology has been dismissed by many, especially those of a more empirical persuasion. Christian scholars have rightly objected to the overuse of Plato by some who "Christianized" his thought as the proper vehicle for presenting truth, a practice that led to more theological problems than it solved.

G. R. HABERMAS

See also AUGUSTINE OF HIPPO; CAMBRIDGE PLATONISM; NEOPLATONISM.

Bibliography. Collected Dialogues of Plato, E. Hamilton and H. Cairns, eds.; I. M. Crombie, Examination of Plato's Doctrines; D. Gallop, Plato: Phaedo; G. M. A. Grube, Plato's Thought; W. K. C. Guthrie, Later Plato and the Academy; Plato, the Man and His Dialogues: Earlier Period; R. Klibansky, Platonic Tradition during the Middle Ages; T. M. Robinson, Plato's Psychology; D. Ross, Plato's Theory of Ideas; A. E. Taylor, Platonism and Its Influence; W. J. Verdenius, "Plato and Christianity," Ratio 5:15–32; G. Vlastos, Platonic Studies, Plato's Universe, G.

Vlastos, ed., Plato I: Metaphysics and Epistemology; N. White, Plato on Knowledge and Reality.

Pleasure, God's Good. See WILL OF GOD.

Plenary Inspiration. This theory of biblical inspiration emerged in the later Reformation period, when serious theological attention was first given to the doctrine of inspiration and concepts of partial and verbal inspiration were also being advocated. The spirit of the Renaissance, developments in philology and textual criticism, and the initial expression of philosophical views which would find their culmination in the Enlightenment all helped to precipitate theological consideration. While the traditional view of verbal inspiration sought to erect bulwarks against the new learning and partial inspiration made a major accommodation, plenary inspiration may be described as a minor accommodation.

Plenary inspiration emerged first among the Jesuits and was to remain a viable view in certain Roman Catholic circles into the nineteenth century. Among Protestants plenary inspiration was particularly prominent among English-speaking evangelicals.

The main principles of plenary inspiration are (1) God is the author of the Bible, in varied ways; (2) the focus of inspiration is the writers of the Bible—there is author rather than text orientation; and (3) the writers have been inspired in all that they have written, though in varied ways. The inspiration of suggestion deals with matters of content which could be known only by divine revelation and in which the writers were inspired in a fashion similar to that of verbal inspiration. The inspiration of elevation relates to humanly accessible knowledge, from which inferences and conclusions had to be drawn. In this mode of inspiration the mental processes are elevated and sharpened. The inspiration of superintendence operates when copying from extant documents, affording accuracy of transmission.

Certain plenarists, refining the theory still further, might advocate several more categories: (4) The data of the Bible are claimed as the source of the theory, both its teaching about itself and its phenomena. (5) The Bible is all of God and all of man, but in varied ways. (6) Human frailty allows for any lapse, infelicity, or inexactitude. (7) Although the word "inerrancy" is not generally used, the Bible is described as without error, without mistake, and infallible. (8) The authority of the Bible extends particularly to the revealed truth of Christianity, but since all was inspired, no part, however apparently incidental, will ever lead astray if properly interpreted.

Plenary inspiration possessed certain concomitants. It could be moderately flexible on matters of biblical criticism and interpretation. For example, it could allow the evangelical social reformers to break through the biblical sanctions that a literalistic hermeneutic appeared to give to slavery. It was also helpful to the evangelists and missionaries of the first and second Evangelical Awakenings (1735–1825), providing them with a fully inspired Bible and yet directing them to concentrate on the central issues of redemptive revelation.

Plenary Inspiration

The theory of plenary inspiration was held largely by evangelicals in the English-speaking world, with its outstanding initial advocate being Philip Doddridge, the well-known Congregationalist of Northampton, England, who pastored a large congregation as well as training generations of students for the ministry. This view found remarkable acceptance among evangelicals, where it was seldom questioned from the 1730s to the 1820s. As verbal inspiration came on the scene under Robert Haldane and Alexander Carson, the plenaryists were attacked for an inadequate and dangerous view. Many accepted the new view, while many more were turned off by the ideology and proponents of verbal inspiration. As plenary inspiration declined in popularity, many of its former adherents opted for some form of partial inspiration, which was often the first step on the road to what might be denoted as liberal evangelicalism. Throughout subsequent generations plenary inspiration continued to be held in certain quarters, such as some conservative quarters of Methodism.

I. S. RENNIE

See also BIBLE, AUTHORITY OF; BIBLE, CANON OF; BIBLE, INERRANCY AND INFALLIBILITY OF; BIBLE, INSPIRATION OF; VERBAL INSPIRATION.

Bibliography. J. T. Burtchaell, Catholic Theories of Biblical Inspiration since 1810; P. Doddridge, Works; G. T. Ladd, Doctrine of Sacred Scripture; B. Vawter, Biblical Inspiration.

Pleroma. See FULLNESS OF TIME.

Plotinus. See NEOPLATONISM.

Polanus, Amandus (1561–1610). Professor of theology and OT exegesis at the University of Basel and one of the leading Reformed theologians of the period of Protestant orthodoxy.

Polanus wrote widely, producing commentaries and “analyses” of OT books—Malachi (1597), Daniel (1593), Hosea (1601), and Ezekiel (1607)—as well as theological works on Christology (1608) and predestination (1600) among others. His systematic theology, Syntagma Theologiae Christianae (1609), was published in English as Substance of Christian Religion.

Polanus followed Peter Ramus in dividing theology into two parts: faith and good works. This meant, methodologically, that ethics was a full-fledged part of dogmatics proper. Theology had a practical significance as both faith and observance. This led Polanus to assert that the task of interpreting Scripture is the explication of the “true sense” (verus sensus) and the “true use” (verus usus) of Scripture. Both interpretation and application are necessary, with the goal being the glory of God and the edification of the church. Polanus stressed the literal sense as the only true and genuine sense of each passage of Scripture. He went on to establish a criterion for interpretation derived from the nature of Scripture. He argued that since the content of the Word of God concerning salvation gives all glory to God and none to humans, this should be the test for interpretation. An interpretation is true or false depending on its making this clear. Polanus quoted John 7:18 as support for this approach and thus set the task of recognizing that in every text the glory given to God should be a foremost concern. Karl Barth called this fundamental rule of Polanus’s “unsurpassable.”

D. K. MCKIM

See also SCHOLASTICISM, PROTESTANT.

Bibliography. K. Barth, Church Dogmatics; H. Heppe, Reformed Dogmatics; K. L. Sprunger, Learned Doctor William Ames.

Polygamy. Polygamy is the practice of marrying more than one spouse either simultaneously or in consecutive marriages. The three primary types of polygamy are polygyny, which is the practice of a man having more than one wife simultaneously, primarily found in non-Western societies; consecutive polygamy or serial monogamy, which is the practice of divorce and remarriage, practiced primarily in the West; and polyandry, or the rare practice of a wife having more than one husband.

Sociological Issues. A number of unique issues give rise to the practice of polygyny in non-Western societies (Gitari). The number of women is greater than the number of men, especially in urban areas. There is a significant difference in the age of marriage for men and women, the latter being married relatively early in life. There is also the practice of marriage alliances arranged by parents for extended family reasons such as wealth or status. The role of women is traditionally viewed as family based, with the woman’s duty being to bear and raise children. This view also brings a high degree of disgrace upon an unmarried mother, leaving her without status in the community. In some cases, a type of levirate marriage is the norm in order to protect and provide for widows. Due to the role of men within the culture, a first wife may advocate her husband taking additional wives as a means to refuse cohabitation. The opposite may also be true, where a man desires to support his wife through sickness, thus taking a second wife for the purpose of cohabitation. A final issue which stems from the traditional view of a husband's responsibilities is the rejection of divorce as an option, leading to taking a second wife as the best option.

In contrast, the practice of consecutive polygamy is based more on the individual partners within the marriage. Concerns ranging from infidelity and abuse, through a loss of love as defined by the culture are the most common issues. Seldom are the concerns of extended family a factor in divorce and remarriage, which are a significant aspect of both polygyny and polyandry. Rather the cultural view is more egalitarian, with both husbands and wives sharing the responsibilities for determining their roles. The generic rationale given for consecutive polygamy is that of irreconcilable differences, which in itself underscores the emphasis on the rights and actualization of the individual. The issues of consecutive polygamy are more commonly dealt with under the heading of divorce and remarriage rather than as a form of generalized polygamy.

Theological Issues. Central to the theological consideration of polygamy is the question of its legitimacy as a form of marriage compared to that of monogamy. The range of the theological views include four basic positions: polygamy as (1) a legitimate form of marriage, (2) a lesser form of marriage than the Christian ideal, (3) an unacceptable form of marriage for Christians, and (4) a sin which is a type of adultery (Hastings). Those who hold to the first two positions make their argument based on a view that in Genesis 2:22, God had made only one woman and, therefore, the mandate to Adam and Eve (Gen. 2:24) could only be monogamous and not normative because there was only one woman, making polygamy impossible. Further, these positions use the more common occurrence of polygamists in the Old Testament as substantiation for polygamy either as a lesser or legitimate form (Mann). New Testament support is taken as an argument from Jesus' silence on the subject and the lack of any texts expressly prohibiting polygamy (Mpolo). Beyond the biblical arguments in support of polygamy is the rejection of arguments from a natural law theory, made by theologians such as Augustine and Aquinas, and the cultural-progress hypothesis, used by theologians such as Thielicke (Hillman).

In opposition to the acceptance of polygamy are those, notably evangelicals, who view polygamy as contrary to the biblical standard for marriage. The precedent clearly stated in Genesis 1-2 is supported by the consistent biblical record of polygamists being those who violated God's plan for marriage (e.g., Abraham, Jacob, Elkanah, David, and Solomon) and the lack of any scriptural statement in support of polygamy (Nasimiyu-Wasike). Another strong argument for monogamy is found in Jesus' quotation and interpretation of Genesis 2:24 in Matthew 19:1-12 as a basis for his teaching on marriage. Further support for opposing polygamy is seen in a literal interpretation of the biblical comparisons of the marriage union with the relationship between God and the children of Israel, and Christ as the bridegroom and the Church as the bride (Chombo). Finally, a commitment to the interpretive relationship between the Old and New Testaments provides a clear understanding that monogamy as a theme is biblically normative (Foullah).

The discussion of the legitimacy of polygamy results in a number of clear theological divisions. However, when it comes to the implications for church practice, fewer options are evident. The extremes of either complete rejection of polygamists or complete sanction of polygamous marriages are increasingly rare in churches. The norm appears to be the position that monogamy is the ideal form of marriage, but Christ's love and forgiveness applies to polygamists. The implications for polygamists holding leadership roles in the church are still a topic of debate.

C. D. MCCONNELL

See also ADULTERY; DIVORCE; MARRIAGE, MARRIAGE CUSTOMS IN BIBLE TIMES; MARRIAGE, THEOLOGY OF; SEPARATION; SEPARATION, MARITAL.

Bibliography. E. Chombo, "Polygamy," in Our Time Has Come: African Christian Women Address the Issues of Today, J. Mbugua, ed.; L. A. Foullah, "Sociotheological Evaluation of Polygamy," Evangelical Review of Theology 19:74-80; D. Gitari, "The Church and Polygamy," Transformation 1(1):3-10; A. Hastings, Christian Marriage in Africa; E. Hillman, Polygamy Reconsidered; P. S. Mann, "Toward a Biblical Understanding of Polygamy," Missiology 17(1):11-26; M. M. Mpolo, "Polygamy in Pastoral Perspectives," in Families in Transition, M. M. Mpolo and C. De Sweemer, eds.; A. Nasimiyu-Wasike, "Polygamy, A Feminist Critique," in Will to Arise: Women, Tradition, and the Church in Africa, M. A. Oduyoye and M. Kanyoro, eds.

Polytheism. The belief in a multitude of distinct and separate deities. It is formally contrasted with pantheism, the belief in an impersonal God identical with the universe, although the two doctrines can sometimes be found in the same religious tradition. Polytheism is distinguished from theism, also called monotheism, on the basis of polytheism's claim that divinity, while personal and distinguished from the universe, is many rather than one. Except for the great monotheisms of Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, the world's religions are overwhelmingly polytheistic. Polytheism characterizes Hinduism, Mahayana Buddhism, Confucianism, Taoism, and Shintoism in the East, and also contemporary African tribal religions. In the ancient world Egyptians, Babylonians, and Assyrians worshiped a plurality of deities, as did the ancient Greeks, Romans, and

Polytheism

Norse. Belief in several distinct deities serves to provide a focus for popular religious devotion when the official deity or deities of the religion are remote from the common person.

According to Ninian Smart, deities are formed around a number of aspects of life. These include natural forces and objects such as fertility and atmospheric forces; vegetation such as trees, sacred herbs, and vineyards; animal and human forms such as serpents, cattle, and animal-human hybrids; and assorted functions such as love, agriculture, healing, and war.

The birth of Western philosophy in ancient Greece occurred in a culture with a rich popular polytheism. Socrates was sentenced to death for "impiety" and "atheism" in denying the deities worshiped by Athens and for corrupting the youth. Socrates firmly believed in the divine, and in fact believed himself to have a special mission from the gods. His theology was more philosophically and spiritually sophisticated than that of his contemporaries. It became in fact a matter of indifference in his thought whether gods were one or many, since he denied the distinct personality quirks and moral irregularities that served to differentiate them within the Greek pantheon. His successor Plato carried on this tradition, and held that in a well-run state there would have to be substantial revision in the Homeric mythology before allowing it to be used, because it depicted the gods performing evil and petty acts (Republic 376e–383c). Thus the intellectual motive for maintaining a plurality of deities was disappearing from philosophy at an early stage.

Islam erroneously interprets the Christian Trinity as a polytheistic doctrine, and ancient Israel possibly contended with the devotion to other deities in addition to Yahweh. Nonetheless, it is clear that Judaism, Christianity, and Islam represent forms of theism incompatible with polytheism. As the West becomes infiltrated with Eastern religions and their derivative movements, Western Christians will need to directly confront polytheism.

D. B. FLETCHER

See also MONOTHEISM; THEISM.

Bibliography. S. G. F. Brandon, ed., Dictionary of Comparative Religion; A. Daniélou, Hindu Polytheism; L. E. Goodman, Monotheism: A Philosophical Inquiry; J. M. Koller, Oriental Philosophies; W. B. Kristensen, Meaning of Religion; Plato, Apology; Republic; G. E. Swanson, Birth of the Gods: The Origin of Primitive Beliefs.

Poor, Poverty. Biblical Teaching. The poor are mentioned in various forms more than 300 times throughout the Bible. While the references can include someone who is spiritually poor (Matt. 5:3), the vast majority deal with material poverty. Poverty seems an inescapable part of the human condition; though there should not have been any poor among the people of Israel (Deut. 15:4), there would always be poor in the land (Deut. 15:11). Jesus indicated that there would always be poor people for us to help (Matt. 26:11; Mark 14:7; John 12:8).

In biblical terms, there are several causes of poverty. The first is God himself, who gives both poverty and wealth (1 Sam. 2:6–8). He may do so out of judgment, seen in his warning to Israel that he would impoverish them if they turned from his ways in the promised land (Deut. 28:48). While God is ultimately sovereign, we also see the human side of poverty. Proverbs focuses on poverty stemming from the poor person's lifestyle choices, including laziness (Prov. 10:4–5), haste (Prov. 21:5), love of pleasure (Prov. 21:17) and stinginess (Prov. 28:22). However, in the rest of the Old Testament it is more often the oppression of ungodly people (the rich and privileged) that causes or perpetuates poverty (e.g., Job 20:19; Pss. 14:6; 37:14; Prov. 29:7; Ezek. 18:12; Amos 4:1).

In contrast to the oppressors, God is the refuge of the poor (Ps. 14:6; Isa. 25:4). He hears them (Exod. 22:27; Ps. 34:6), provides for them (Pss. 68:10; 82:3; 102:17; 113:7; Isa. 41:17), and secures justice for them (Ps. 140:12). Ultimately they will be judged righteously by the Messiah (Isa. 11:4). Until then, however, they need special protection and justice. As a symbol of God's concern, he made specific provisions for the poor in the law: gleaning rights were established (Lev. 19:10 and 23:22), a cloak given in security by a poor person was to be returned at night so that he could sleep with it (Exod. 22:26–27; Deut. 24:12–13), daily payment of wages for poor workers was required (Deut. 24:14–15), a triennial tithe was collected (Deut. 14:28–29), the poor among Israel were not to be charged interest (Exod. 22:25) and generosity in lending to them was to be blessed by God (Deut. 15:7–11), and the poor were allowed to make less expensive offerings (e.g., Lev. 5:7, 11; 27:8). As God's people we are to follow his example. Those who know God defend the poor (Jer. 22:16) and in so doing are righteous (Prov. 29:7). God blesses those who help the poor (Deut. 24:13, 19), since being kind to them is being kind to God (Prov. 19:17; see also Matt. 25:31–46). Therefore, when we defend their cause (Jer. 22:16) or help them (Prov. 14:31), we walk in his ways.

The poor deserve impartial judgment; they are neither to be favored nor oppressed simply because of their poverty (Exod. 23:3–11; 30:15; Lev. 19:15). We are to ensure that they are not denied justice (Exod. 23:6) and are not exploited (Prov. 22:22). The one who helps them will be watched over by God, but those who oppress the poor are evil; they deserve to die (Ezek. 18:10–13) and will be judged by God (Isa. 3:13–15) since they show contempt not just for their victims but for their Maker (Prov. 14:31). Sodom, for example, was condemned because they did not help the poor (Ezek. 16:49).

Option for the Poor. In contemporary discussion the phrase “option for the poor” or “preferential option for the poor” has been introduced. Roman Catholics struggled with theological concerns of poverty at Vatican II. Latin American Catholics, concerned that Vatican II only scratched the surface, gathered in Medellín, where they reoriented their perspective from seeing the poor as the object of the mercy of the church to seeing them as the subjects of their own history (González, 19). The phrase “preferential option for the poor” appeared in the early 1970s. Since then it has been widely used in various forms of liberation theology.

The foundational idea of opting for the poor as seen in liberation theology requires a radical paradigm shift. The poor are no longer objects of mercy; they are people gifted by God to exemplify his justice. It is argued that they are the people of God simply by virtue of their destitute condition and we look to them to see the world as God sees it. While it is not always denied that the poor are sinners, it is argued that our orientation must be to see them as the sinned against rather than sinners, since they face oppression as a continual way of life and God in his mercy sides with them in light of that oppression.

It is likewise maintained that an “option for the poor” is not optional. It is founded on God’s nature and portrayed in Jesus’ incarnation. It is argued that since Jesus came with the purpose of bringing good news to the poor (Luke 4:18–20), they are blessed with an epistemological advantage in reading the Scripture. Not blinded by the presuppositions of the rich, and as the intended primary audience of the Gospel, they are better able to understand biblical truths than the rich, whose wealth blinds them. Further, opting for the poor demands that we go beyond individual responsibility and examine how the structures of society both create and perpetuate poverty. To do so we cannot confine ourselves to theological analysis; we also need to use contemporary socio-analytical tools (e.g., economics, sociology, political science) to understand and change those structures on behalf of the poor.

Initially there was evangelical resistance to this new emphasis on the poor; in part a backlash against the possibility of a return to a liberalized social gospel. From the early 1970s, however, there has been a shift among evangelicals towards holism in mission and ministry. While this was initially prompted in part by reflections from both non-Western evangelical theologians (e.g., Vinay Samuel, Rene Padilla, and Samuel Escobar) and some of the more radical Western evangelicals (e.g., Ron Sider and Jim Wallis), today it is found throughout evangelical discussion, especially in missiological circles (e.g., Serving with the Poor in Africa, Tetsunao Yamamori, ed.). The net result has been a greater empathy toward the concept of the option for the poor, though without a wholesale buying into the soteriological ideology found in liberation theology. It is now not uncommon to read discussions on our responsibility toward the poor across the spectrum of evangelical discussion. As with the term “contextualization,” while “opting for the poor” originated outside evangelicalism, it has become more widely accepted by evangelicals as a result of our returning to the biblical data for a fresh perspective and wrestling with inherent concepts behind the terminology.

What, then, is God’s view of the poor? As portrayed in the biblical discussion, they are people and part of his creation. While poverty is sometimes their own fault, more generally it is the rich (together with the structures of society) who oppress them and deny them justice and opportunities to alleviate their condition. It is true that the poor are sinners, but it is also true that they have been deeply sinned against. God does “opt” for them in demanding impartiality and justice and in caring for their spiritual and material needs. The same attitude should be found in the church (e.g., James 2:2–6). While their circumstances may enable the poor to see God more realistically than the rich, and they have much to teach the wealthy about dependence on God for daily life, that they are saved simply by virtue of their socio-economic status cannot be sustained in light of the overall biblical evidence. The poor do need to hear the Good News and thus Jesus’ declaration that he had come to proclaim this and to set them free from those things which bind them (Luke 4:18–20). As the church, we also have an obligation not only to evangelize the poor but to seek impartial justice for them as well as to side with them in the face of oppression.

Where we have been the oppressors, we must repent and change our actions and attitudes. Where we have stood by silently observing their oppression, we must take their side in combating the oppression they face. In so doing, however, we must not view them simply as objects of our attention, but recognize their humanity and extend them the dignity found in partnering with them rather than dictating to them according to our own agendas. Above all, wherever we encounter the poor we must declare to them the Good News of Jesus’ death and resurrection and invite them to enter into a living relationship with the One who is ultimately most concerned with their plight.

A. S. MOREAU

See also GOSPEL, SOCIAL IMPLICATIONS OF; LIBERATION THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. R. Clouse, ed., Wealth and Poverty: Four Christian Views of Economics; J. de Santa Ana, Good News to the Poor; D. Dorr, Option for the Poor: A Hundred Years of Catholic Social Teaching; J. L. González, Poverty and Ecclesiology; P. Hiebert and E. H.

Poor, Poverty

Meneses, Incarnational Ministry; D. E. Holwerda, IBSE (rev.) 3:905–8; R. D. Spender, EDBT 617–8; D. S. Walker, Journal of Theology for Southern Africa 79:53–62.

Pope. See PAPACY.

Pope, William Burt (1822–1903). Wesleyan theologian. Born February 19, 1822, at Horton, Nova Scotia, to English missionary parents, and educated in England, he entered the Methodist Theological Institution at Hoxton in 1840. From 1842 he ministered in several cities, including London, Manchester, and Leeds. In 1860 he became editor of London Quarterly Review. He was appointed tutor of systematic theology at Didsbury College, Manchester, in 1867, resigning in 1886. Wesleyan University (1865) and the University of Edinburgh (1877) conferred the D.D.

A delegate to the Methodist Episcopal Church's General Conference in Baltimore, Maryland (1876), he was president of England's Methodist Conference (1877), publishing Sermons, Addresses and Changes (1878) from his year's service. In addition to his own publications, he translated several works from German.

Pope is widely lauded as a towering figure in Methodist theology, though some contemporary Methodist theologians found his doctrine of sin confused (John Miley) or too Calvinistic (Olin Curtis). In a time of widespread changes in Methodism, he recaptured the spirit of Wesley with remarkable fidelity. He restated the essence of Wesley's theology, defending his doctrine of perfection and growing challenges.

His monumental Compendium of Christian Theology (3 vols. 1875–76; 2d ed. 1879) was on the Methodist "Course of Study" from 1880 to 1888 and remained a standard for years. It was the most influential Methodist theology during the later nineteenth century, though Pope considered his nearly 400-page Higher Catechism of Theology (1883) a more mature and finished work.

"He was a transition character, intent on conserving the values of the past even as he opened the door to further departures from tradition." (John L. Peters, Christian Perfection and American Methodism, 158–9).

He suffered greatly from depression in his later years, dying in London on July 5, 1903.

S. R. SPENCER

See also METHODISM; WESLEYAN TRADITION.

Bibliography. R. E. Chiles, Theological Transition in American Methodism, 1790–1935; C. H. Irwin, DNB 3:127; R. W. Moss, Rev. W. B. Pope, D.D.: Theologian and Saint.

Pornography. Sex being of almost universal interest, allusions to it are legitimate and necessary if dramatic or literary descriptions of human life are to be truthful or educative; but an enormous market exists for those who exploit sex for gain. The social and moral questions arising from the representation of erotic behavior in books, films, and pictures are manifold.

Psychologically, the overstimulation of imagination by sexual images renders the whole personality oversexed by disproportionately concentrating thought and desire, often to the point of pornographic addiction; it coarsens feelings and attitudes toward the other sex as tools for sexual indulgence, unrefined by affection, tenderness, or respect; it inverts the sex drive into sterile, self-absorbed, physical pleasure alone—"mental masturbation"; and because overstimulation brings diminishing effects, it leads readily to mental indulgence in ever coarser, sadistic perversions—"hard-core" pornography.

Artistically, literary, visual, or dramatic representation of human behavior very powerfully educates, clarifies, "purges" the emotional life of spectators, by secondhand experience. The human body and human love are lovely. The nude statue, the exploration of sexual situations in book or play, have their place in sex education and in appreciation of the human scene. The problem is one of taste, explicitness, intention, and restraint. Deliberate importation of salacious ideas, to appeal to a wider audience or to compensate for want of literary power, is on another level.

Socially, the problems are protection of the immature and unstable; the danger that the emotions stimulated may erupt in antisocial sexual aggressiveness; the tendency to devalue women (mainly) and marriage; and the effect of sensualist displays and opportunities on the whole tone of society.

Legally, suppression of "obscenely offensive" materials has been difficult to enforce because of variable public taste and the unanswerable statement, "The offensiveness is all in the viewer's mind." Suppression of "what tends to deprave and corrupt" (so excluding artistic merit and medical textbooks) faces the difficulty of producing witnesses who admit to being depraved and corrupted. Partial censorship by "certificates of accessibility" make pornography more attractive, as supposedly "adult." Some states have abandoned legal restraint and report diminished interest and crime (e.g., Denmark).

In recent years the whole subject has gained greatly increased range and seriousness through several concurrent influences—developments in international and "space" communications defying local "censorship"; the availability of "pirated" video programs to the young and the vulnerable; the explosion of sexual activity among schoolchildren, with consequent detailed sex education at an ever earlier age. So, too, uninhibited ited public discussion of sexual dangers (such as AIDS), of safe methods of contraception, of test-tube conception, and similar topics, all make the definition of "pornography" extremely difficult. "Liberating" propaganda concerning male and female homosexuality, and the abandonment of stage, film, press, and publishing censorship, have likewise affected the climate in which the new generation confronts the problems of adolescence. It should be admitted that in the face of this emphasis upon human sexuality and the "right" to sexual freedom, the churches generally (expect perhaps for papal protests) have not found a clear, decisive, and united reply. Nor have they always presented to youth sufficiently attractive role models to rival the popular idols whose disreputable "private" lives are exposed as never before.

Yet the dangers inherent in such a social environment are beginning to be recognized, not only in its physical consequences but in the growth of prostitution, child abuse, rape, broken marriages, and irregular and sometimes promiscuous "unions" which offer only insecure and partial family background to a new generation. For their sake, and for society's, the problem of pornography demands a far clearer sex ethic, uncomplicated by the contradiction between marriage as a sacrament and celibacy as superior, between sex as sacred and freedom as an inherent right to irresponsible self-indulgence.

Christians acknowledge the obligation to preserve purity of mind and heart. Jesus condemned the lustful look as equivalent to adultery, and declared the only defilement was that which comes from within (Matt. 5:28; Mark 7:20). The NT abounds in warnings concerning lust of the flesh, lust of the eyes, concupiscence, uncleanness, "following the inclination to sensuality" (2 Pet. 2:2), and "the desires of the flesh and of the mind" (Eph. 2:3 KJV), on the principle that "as a man thinketh in his heart, so is he," or so he will do (James 1:15).

It is significant that the fullest discussion of "setting the mind on the flesh" (Rom. 8:5-13, almost a definition of pornographic addiction, though Paul includes more), as spiritual death, hostility to God, inability to please him, slavery, is contrasted with the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, whose shrine the Christian's inner life should be.

Not every thought or desire concerning sex is sinful. But Christians who "have crucified the flesh with its desires and lusts" (Gal. 5:24), will not obey it or be slaves to it (Rom. 6:12; Titus 3:3), but keep it to its divinely appointed place, subordinate to spiritual ends. Thus the Christian response to pornography is "Clothe yourselves with the Lord Jesus Christ, and do not think about how to gratify the desires of the sinful nature" and "Whatever is . . . right, . . . pure, . . .

lovely, think about such things" (Rom. 13:14; Phil. 4:8).

R. E. O. WHITE

See also OBSCENITY.

Bibliography. D. Barber, Pornography and Society; A. Burns, To Deprave and Corrupt; N. Gallagher, How to Stop the Porno Plague; R. J. Rushdoony, Politics of Pornography; L. A. Sobel, Pornography, Obscenity and the Law.

Porter. See MINOR ORDERS.

Positive Thinking. Over the last decade or so a host of best-selling books have urged people to take a "positive" attitude to life. Some of these have been written from an explicitly Christian perspective, but the majority have been clearly secular. Titles such as Robert Ringer's Looking Out for No. 1 (1978), David Schwartz's Magic of Self-Direction (1975), and Wayne Dyer's Pulling Your Own Strings (1978) are typical of this genre of literature in its secular guise. The most popular religious writer in the new wave of positive thinkers is Robert Schuller with books such as Move Ahead with Possibility Thinking (1967) and his numerous seminars for church leaders and members.

Still popular today and a classic of its type is Dale Carnegie's How to Win Friends and Influence People (1936). Here the secular brand of positive thinking is seen at its best. Norman Vincent Peale represents the best of the older tradition of religiously motivated positive thinkers. Although he published several books in the 1930s, his first success was Guide to Confident Living (1948), which was followed by his even more successful Power of Positive Thinking (1952). In the writing of these works Peale's mentor was the liberal theologian Harry Emerson Fosdick, whose On Being a Real Person (1943) expresses his mature thought on the subject.

The religious roots of positive thinking can be traced back to the revivalism of Charles G. Finney, whose emphasis on the human element in conversion and the ability of men to create revivals broke with the Calvinist heritage of New England. As the inventor of "high pressure revivalism" Finney psychologized conversion and in his Lectures on Revivals of Religion (1854) gave his readers techniques for success.

The secular roots of positive thinking are found in New England transcendentalism, especially the works of Henry David Thoreau. His now classic Walden or Life in the Woods (1854) develops a vision of faith as a psychological faculty that expresses a profound self-confidence in the ability of men and women to triumph against all odds.

This faith in the will found expression in New Thought and Frank Haddock's best seller, Power of Will, published in 1906. Traces of it are also to be found in Christian Science and a host of other nineteenth-century new religious movements.

Positive Thinking

Today the popularity of books like Napoleon Hill's Think and Grow Rich, first published in 1937, shows the continuity of this tradition. At the same time a host of television evangelists and other preachers offer the public encouragement through books and cassette tapes that assure them of their self-worth and need to believe in themselves.

Several systems of counseling have developed along these lines, such as the Psycho-Cybernetics (1960) of Maxwell Maltz and various techniques of inner healing associated with the charismatic movement.

Psychologically, the need to think in positive ways has been severely criticized by Richard Lazarus in his book Psychological Stress and the Coping Process (1966). Sociologically, a telling critique of the trends found in positive thinking is presented in Christopher Lasch's Culture of Narcissism (1979).

Theologically, positive thinking encourages a form of humanism that has often led to the development of heretical movements along the lines of New Thought, Christian Science, and a variety of vaguely Christian groups today. It overlooks biblical teachings about sin and the sovereignty of God to emphasize the essential goodness of humanity and the ability of people to solve their own problems through faith in their own abilities. In its Christianized form this self-faith is mediated through reference to Christian symbols, which upon closer examination are devoid of their original meaning.

I. HEXHAM

See also NEW AGE MOVEMENT.

Bibliography. D. Meyer, Positive Thinkers; P. C. Vitz, Psychology as Religion.

Positivism. A distinctive position in contemporary philosophy that stresses the analysis of language as the most important function of philosophy. Positivism, because of its use of recent developments in logic and its emphasis on scientific inquiry as the paradigm of human knowledge, is sometimes called logical positivism or logical empiricism. All three labels can be used interchangeably.

Although its greatest influence was among early-twentieth-century English-speaking philosophers, positivism can be traced back to the nineteenth-century French thinker Auguste Comte, who promoted the claim that the most perfect form of knowledge is simple description of sense experience. This conviction was rooted in his evolutionary view of the growth of human knowledge, which was labeled the "law of three stages." On this account the earliest stage was the theological, in which men explained natural phenomena by appeal to spiritual beings—i.e., gods or God (e.g., "God brought the storm"). The next was the metaphysical, in which these beings become depersonalized forces or essences. In the final, mature stage, called the positive, explanation involves only scientific description (e.g., "The storm was caused by the meeting of two weather fronts"). Although contemporary positivists (of whom there are very few) rely very little on Comte's ideas, they retain his rejection of metaphysics and theology.

Science alone, they claim, generates reliable knowledge of nature, and in promoting this claim they are closely related to naturalism. Positivism differs from naturalism, however, in its explicit and militant rejection of metaphysics. The fact that its analysis of science emphasizes logical principles more than psychological ones also distinguishes positivism from naturalism.

In stressing the analysis of language, positivists emphasize the distinction between analytic and synthetic propositions. The truth of analytic propositions depends on their terms—e.g., "All vixens are female foxes." Synthetic propositions, on the other hand, are those which refer to facts and whose truth depends on a relation to them—e.g., "There are books in Oxford." Analytic propositions have no factual content and consist only of tautologies. The determination of their truth and falsehood involves only logical and linguistic analysis. Synthetic propositions as a group contain all propositions having factual meanings and belong entirely to the sciences, there being no factual propositions except scientific ones. A metaphysical statement such as "God exists" is therefore condemned to the positivists' no-man's-land. This statement is not a tautology and it is not scientific, and is therefore not true or false; rather, it is meaningless. Positivists, therefore, are presumably not atheists.

An important, and historically interesting, doctrine developed by positivists is the famous (or infamous) verifiability theory of meaning, which is perhaps the most explicit example of their antimetaphysical bias. Roughly stated, it defines the meaning of an empirical concept by reference to the sensory observations that will confirm or disconfirm it. If a proposition involves such reference, it is obviously meaningful and can be subjected to scientific inquiry. If it does not, and if it cannot be shown to be a logical truth, it is without meaning, is literally nonsense, a pseudostatement—"pseudo" because it may have grammatical form and "look like" a statement, and this is just why we are fooled into thinking that it actually means something. The statement "God exists" would count as such a pseudostatement.

Among other problems positivism has encountered is the issue of the status of the verification principle itself. As a philosophical position its influence on the contemporary scene has waned.

Its primary interest to contemporary thinkers is historical.

J. D. SPICELAND

Bibliography. A. J. Ayer, Language, Truth and Logic; J. Joergensen, Development of Logical Empiricism; E. P. Polten, Critique of the Psycho-Physical Unity Theory; R. von Mises, Positivism.

Possession, Demon. See DEMON, DEMONIZATION.

Postlapsarianism. See SUPRALAPSARIANISM.

Postliberal Theology. Postliberalism identifies a theological method linked with Yale Divinity School which seeks to reverse modern Christianity's accommodation to culture by cultivating the distinctive language of the Christian community. Simply put, theology involves Christian self-description, not corroboration by or correlation with some common religious experience. While significantly influenced by the thought of Karl Barth, Clifford Geertz, the later Ludwig Wittgenstein, and others, the originators of the distinctive "postliberal" agenda and label were Hans Frei and George Lindbeck. Since the mid-1980s postliberalism has blossomed into the most significant theological challenge to liberal revisionism as their students, including Stanley Hauerwas, George Hunsinger, Bruce Marshall, William Placher, Kathryn Tanner, and Ronald Thiemann, have further developed and refined its key ideas.

Frei's Eclipse of Biblical Narrative. In this seminal postliberal text, Frei brilliantly traced the dissolution of the premodern consensus, where the biblical narrative formed the world in which Christians lived and worshipped. With the rise of modernity and its skepticism, theologians have been preoccupied with the text's credibility and consequently attempted to understand the Bible through the possibilities of meaning dictated by their contemporary intellectual worlds. So the liberal focuses on the text's correlation with universal human possibilities that can be expressed non-narratively, whereas many conservatives identify meaning exclusively with the human author's intentionality and the story's historical facticity, fragmenting the unity of the canon. In both instances the primacy of the biblical narrative and its distinct semiotic system is displaced by a foreign and extratextual world of meaning: "The great reversal had taken place: interpretation was a matter of fitting the biblical story into another world with another story rather than incorporating that world into the biblical story." Frei's proposal is that the subject matter of the text cannot be expressed without the narrative; any other interpretive strategy endangers the integrity of the Scripture's grand narrative of God's actions and words focused on its indispensable christological center. In the Identity of Jesus Frei argues that the biblical narrative is essential to Jesus' identity. By contrast the liberal method ignores the particularity and unsubstitutable identity of Jesus Christ the Redeemer as narrated in Scripture so that Jesus becomes little more than a symbol for our religious desires.

Lindbeck's Nature of Doctrine. In this text, which coins and defines the "postliberal" label, Lindbeck argues that religious statements and actions must be understood within their respective cultural-linguistic setting. Consequently Lindbeck rejects the two alternatives dominating since the Enlightenment sought to ground theology on a foundation available to all rational persons, either in the conservative form of an ahistorical propositionalism or a liberal revisionism. In the ahistorical propositionalist view of religion, doctrinal statements function solely as cognitive truth claims about reality, which can be understood and corroborated through universal reason. Lindbeck charges that this propositionalism interprets doctrines too liberally, failing to perceive how they are defined by their cultural-linguistic context. The second option, labeled the experiential-expressive model, views religious language as noninformational symbols expressing an existential orientation common among humans. Lindbeck rejects this as well: Christians worship God in a distinctive manner, as the Trinity, which cannot be homogenized with other religions. There is no such thing as a universal experience; reality is shaped by its respective socio-linguistic worlds.

In contrast to those options, according to Lindbeck religion resembles a culture with its own distinctive language, practices, and meaning system. The language and practices of the church (preaching, exhortation, prayer, worship) as formed and cultivated by Scripture's narrative, constitutes the first-order language. Doctrines are best understood as a second-order enterprise, the rules or grammar of the faith which regulate Christian life. They reflect the cultural-linguistic medium that makes possible the Christian's specific description of reality, experience, and action. So doctrines are not independent propositions or symbols of a universal experience, but integrally linked with the whole Christian pattern of life. Being a Christian means to live out of the community's vision of reality narrated in the Scriptures as focused in Jesus Christ and becoming a skillful practitioner in this way of life.

Postliberal Themes. Four basic themes run through postliberal thought: (1) a socio-communitarian view of human life; (2) a non-foundationalism which allows the particularity of the Christian revelation to form the context for understanding and practice; (3) an intratextual approach to Scripture emphasizing the primacy of its narratives; (4) and absorbing the universe into the biblical world.

Postliberal Theology

A socio-communitarian view of human life. According to postliberals humans are thoroughly social and cultural beings who are shaped by the communities within which they live. Contrary to the propositionalist's universal reason and the experiential-expressivist's universal experience, the language and tradition in which we live shape our experience and understanding of the most basic components of reality. The Newtonian understanding of mechanics is different from the Einsteinian; the Christian notion of the human problem and its resolution conflicts with the Buddhist view. Specific linguistic systems make possible these respective beliefs and actions. The reality of sin as rebellion against God and salvation in Jesus Christ can be apprehended only within the Christian cultural-linguistic system, the church.

Nonfoundationalism. Following the postmodern direction in philosophy and science, postliberals reject the Enlightenment project of identifying a universal standard of rationality that forms the objective foundation for public life. Such a neutral, theory-free point of view has not yet been discovered. The postliberals' repudiation of foundationalism is also theological. First, following Barth's indictment of natural theology, postliberals argue that foundationalism subordinates the particular Christian story to an alien framework that inevitably distorts and obstructs revelation. In the Eclipse of Biblical Narrative, Frei brilliantly illustrated this thesis in the arena of biblical interpretation. Second, foundationalism is rejected as a form of epistemological pelagianism. Given the "modern turn to the subject," contemporary foundationalism makes human subjectivity, not God's action, the first principle for theology. As Thiemann and Tanner argue, in this modern context God's contingent and prevenient grace is reduced to an anthropological given.

Narrative, intratextual interpretation. In place of a purportedly universal foundation, postliberals begin with Scripture. Scripture is read as an overarching story, a realistic narrative, which defines its own conceptual world. Scripture is interpreted as history-like literature, not a mythical account symbolizing a universal human experience. The category of narrative reasserts God's primacy for theology because this story presents the actions that constitute God's identity in Jesus Christ. Because the hermeneutical key to this story is Jesus, the canonical text is read intratextually, that is, as a self-referential, self-interpreting unified whole.

Scripture's narrative is world-creating; it shapes the primary world of believers, the practice of worship, life, and thought. This scriptural vision creates a "followable" world that supplies the categories for the understanding and practice of all life. However, postliberals are not biblical foundationalists; Scripture does not create this world de novo. While the community treasures the text as Scripture, its plain sense is shaped by the community's conventions of belief and practice, which in turn are influenced by the cultural context. While there are standards for identifying Christian doctrine—textual fidelity and christological coherence—Christian beliefs are fallible and reformable so that a variety of theological understandings can and do ensue within the broad Christian community.

Absorbing the universe into the biblical world. The biblical world supplies the conceptual scheme within which believers strive to live and understand reality. Consequently theology's task is to identify distortions in the community and to aid its internalization of these Christian beliefs and practice, thereby enhancing Christian life and identity. While the biblical narrative forms the believers' world, this Christian world is not self-contained or radically isolated. Postliberals believe that the logic of the gospel demands the very opposite thrust: the universe should be absorbed into the biblical world. Believers should aim to construct a comprehensive vision that tries to make Christian sense out of the world, even its adverse elements. The world needs to be redescribed in Christian terms. The contrary apologetic strategy of translating Christianity into extrascriptural categories not only diminishes the peculiarity of the faith but is a futile exercise in keeping up with the shifting culture. Simply put, this postliberal strategy of retaining the particularity and internal logic of the Christian religion reflects faith seeking understanding.

Postliberalism's Promise. While still a new and evolving movement, postliberal insights have helped revitalize contemporary theology. Postliberalism's focus on each religion's intrasystematic world of meaning constitutes a powerful attack on the pluralists' insistence that all religions are doing the same thing, exposing it as an unwarranted a priori assumption. Recognizing our pelagian culture, postliberals such as Thiemann and Tanner have helped to rehabilitate the biblical ideas of God's revelation and sovereignty. The postliberal hermeneutic provides a major alternative to the historical-critical method. In Christology, Marshall and Frei have posed the decisive question to revisionists: If the Gospels disclose a universal truth about human experience, what is special about Jesus Christ? How can such a strategy preserve the particularity and unsubstitutable identity of Jesus Christ the Redeemer as narrated in Scripture? Hauerwas provocatively shows that the Christian life as formed by the story of Jesus Christ in the church offers an alternative vision to our society.

Objections. As a recent theological development, postliberals are still working through defining issues and refining their insights.

Social sciences and theology. Postliberalism's wedding of the social sciences and theology has produced ambiguity and tension. Some postliberals highlight the sociological dimension, others the theological. For instance, some argue that Scripture functions as an authority simply because the community reads it as such. But that hardly explains why the community accepts Scripture as authoritative. Other postliberals focus on the theological dimension, noting that the church perceives the Bible to be God's Word.

Truth. Because the cultural-linguistic model highlights intrasystematic coherence, confusion has arisen regarding the truthfulness of Christian beliefs. Some postliberals have defined truth in terms of believers' faithfulness to the Gospel narrative. But how could the community understand its doctrines as rules and not mere wishes unless it believed them to be true? Lindbeck's proposal does not ignore the question of truth; he views the whole cultural-linguistic system, insofar as it is properly internalized, as functioning as a single gigantic proposition which is true to the extent that it corresponds to the divine reality.

Critics frequently attack postliberalism as relativistic because it admits no universally acknowledged criteria for adjudicating between religions. The postliberal believes that the biblical narrative provides its own criteria of truth, but one not universally acknowledged. But the lack of universally accepted standards hardly makes truth relative any more than a hung jury necessitates the conclusion that the defendant was both guilty and innocent. True beliefs are not limited to those that are universally justified; the issue of justification is different from that of truth.

Fideism. Given the postliberals' assumption that there is no universal framework of rationality that can adjudicate differences between various worlds of meaning, critics have often equated this incommensurability with an isolationist fideism. But this charge is confused. Incommensurability does not entail the incomparability of religious concepts. A totally incomparable religion, like a totally untranslatable language, is a self-contradiction. Incommensurability does not entail total incomparability, but simply clarifies the difficulties when rival religions, cultures, or scientific paradigms are contrasted and evaluated. Comparisons are always piecemeal, relative to a particular interpretive scheme. For that reason postliberals compare and evaluate rival paradigms on an ad hoc basis.

Scripture's Historicity. Many evangelicals have questioned the postliberals' apparent lack of interest in Scripture's historical reference. Frei describes Scripture as history-like, not a history textbook, refusing to equate Scripture's "plain sense" with its historical reference. While some postliberals may abandon an external reference, Frei does not. He affirms the bodily resurrection of Jesus, while adding that the reference and truth of this event cannot be affirmed on any grounds other than faith. His point is that modern historiography decisively accommodates Scripture's referential force to the secular mind.

A Public Theology. Postliberals' focus on Christian self-description and the integrity of the biblical narrative have led some to question whether such a theology has anything to offer the broader public. How can the church contribute to a suffering and unjust world unless its arguments make sense to all humans, not just believers? But postliberals counter that there are no universally acknowledged grounds for truth, so why privilege the contemporary culture? Doesn't subjecting Jesus, the Christian's test for truth, to this higher criterion undermine Christ's normativity and inevitably mute the Christian distinctive? Postliberals do not dismiss the need for a public theology. But they believe that Christians are more likely to have something important to offer society by developing the insights of the biblical narrative and applying these to public issues.

T. R. PHILLIPS

See also FREI, HANS WILHELM; HAUERWAS, STANLEY; LINDBECK, GEORGE; POSTMODERNISM.

Bibliography. H. Frei, Eclipse of Biblical Narrative; Identity of Jesus Christ; Types of Christian Theology; S. Hauerwas, Community of Character: Toward a Constructive Christian Social Ethic; G. Lindbeck, Nature of Doctrine; B. Marshall, Christology in Conflict: The Identity of a Saviour in Rahner and Barth; T. Phillips and D. Okholm, eds., Nature of Confession: Evangelicals and Postliberals in Conversation; W. Plaher, Unapologetic Theology: A Christian Voice in a Pluralistic Conversion; K. Tanner, God and Creation in Christian Theology: Tyranny or Empowerment?; R. Thiemann, Revelation and Theology: The Gospel as Narrated Promise.

Postmillennialism. See MILLENNIUM, VIEWS OF THE; WHITBY, DANIEL.

Postmodernism. Introduction. Jean-Paul Sartre's complaint years ago that the term "existentialism" had been used for so many things that it was no longer meaningful could equally be said of the label "postmodernism" today. Often popularly applied to virtually anything that overturns traditional standards and is thus perceived to promote relativism (moral or otherwise), the standard history of the term dates it back to the 1950s, when literature and architecture that broke modern conventions began to be called postmodern. By the 1980s the term was being applied to such contemporary Continental European philosophers as Jacques Derrida, Michel

Postmodernism

Foucault, Hans-Georg Gadamer, Emmanuel Levinas, and Jean-François Lyotard, as well as the American philosopher Richard Rorty. Curiously overlooked is the fact that the use of the term in theology dates back at least as far as the 1928 book by Methodist bishop Bernard Iddings Bell entitled Postmodernism. Arguing that modern (or “liberal”) theology was at that point already dead, he spells out his version of what comes after theological modernism in a way which remarkably prefigures current attempts at postmodern (or “postliberal”) theology.

Much too varied and amorphous to count as an “ism,” postmodern thought is difficult to define because it resists simple categories. Yet Lyotard’s characterization of postmodernity in Postmodern Condition as an “incredulity toward metanarratives” (i.e., the calling of all metaphysical explanations into question) is too wide a definition. What unites postmodern thinkers—however loosely—is their reaction to modern (which is to say “Enlightenment”) thought, a reaction which often takes the form of a simultaneous continuation of the modern project and the calling of that project into question. Thus it is difficult to draw a clear line between postmodern and modern philosophy, for even “modern” thinkers often have “postmodern” aspects to their thought.

Modernity. Since postmodern thinking is best understood in relation to its modern roots, it is helpful to begin with modernity, which may be defined in terms of three closely connected elements. First, modern thinkers place a great emphasis on the autonomy of the individual, assuming that human beings both are and ought to be free to define themselves. The result is that modernity is often characterized by a general repudiation of tradition and authority. Second, modern thought tends toward a strong confidence in the powers of reason in general and the rationality of the specific individual. Third, reason is usually taken to be pure and objective. One might not always reason in an objective way, but the objective reason is taken as an achievable goal.

As the so-called father of modern philosophy, René Descartes well exemplifies these traits. In his Meditations, he put all that he has learned and even sensory experience into question in order to start over epistemologically. Descartes thought that he could provide a foundation for knowledge (a project since known as “foundationalism”) by way of his own thinking. The fact that he could doubt his existence provided what he took to be convincing proof of his existence (for doubting implies a doubter). Although Descartes claimed to question everything taught him by tradition, he never questioned either the power or purity of his own reasoning. Interestingly enough, he came to doubt the efficacy of his “proof” later in life.

Making the self the ultimate adjudicator of truth is likewise central in what might be termed the “modernistic manifesto”—Immanuel Kant’s essay “What Is Enlightenment?” First, Kant tells us that the motto of the Enlightenment is sapere aude, loosely translated as “have the audacity to think for yourself.” In place of the authority of tradition, one should set up one’s own rationality as the authority. Second, Kant shares with Descartes a confidence in the power of reason. Even though Kant speaks of the “limits” of reason (and even of limiting reason to make room for faith), he still makes reason the supreme test. Thus, in Religion within the Bounds of Reason Alone, Kant reconfigures Christian belief in a rationalistic way that reduces Christianity to little more than its moral claims. Third, since he conceives reason to be objective, Kant assumes that one is able to make rational decisions concerning philosophical and religious belief in an objective and detached manner.

Kant describes his basic philosophical reorientation as a “Copernican Revolution,” but it really has exactly the opposite effect, for Kant puts human rationality, and thus the human subject, at the center of the universe. Instead of seeing the mind as a sponge which soaks up data, Kant says in the Critique of Pure Reason that our minds organize (and so interpret) our experience by way of basic ideas and concepts. In calling his philosophy “transcendental,” Kant implies two things: (1) that the structure of our minds is necessary for there to be any experience at all (thus making human interpretation central to knowledge) and (2) that this structure of knowing is universal for people in all times and places. Of course, if we always interpret the world in a particular way, then we never know it as it really is. Hence Kant makes his famous distinction between the phenomenal world—the world as it appears to us—and the noumenal world—the world as it is in itself (apart from human interpretation). In effect, the emphasis in Kant is moved from truth in itself to truth as we know it.

Although Kant may have unknowingly opened the door to relativism, he maintained that the mind’s structure is universal and unchanging. But, already in Kant’s lifetime, Johann Fichte argued that there can be many different ways of viewing the world and no one way can be declared “correct.” Taking the radically autonomous conception of the subject found in Kant’s Critique of Practical Reason and the robust view of the imagination of the Critique of Judgment, Fichte applies these to the epistemological subject, suggesting that we choose our world-views on the basis of what is useful to us. Thus our interpretation of the world is crucial to making the world what it is and the subject becomes absolutely central. The claim that there are different and changing ways of viewing the world is further radicalized by G. W. F. Hegel, who argues in the Phenomenology of Spirit that history can be viewed as a progression of various worldviews, none of which are absolutely true or false even though each reveals a certain degree of truth (some being more true than others). “Truth” is thus the sum total of perspectives.

Whereas Fichte and Hegel never saw the relativity of worldviews implied by their respective philosophies as problematic, it became a central concern for Wilhelm Dilthey and Edmund Husserl, in different ways. Dilthey was consumed with the problem of “historicism,” the idea that, if different cultures and time periods have different ways of conceptualizing the world, then it would seem not only that cross-cultural understanding is limited but the idea of truth as transcendent and unchanging is jeopardized. Kant’s claim that we only know truth from a human perspective is in effect radicalized by the recognition of the effects of culture and history upon human understanding. Although Dilthey was convinced that historicism could be overcome by finding the right methodology, he never succeeded in doing so.

Husserl explicitly condemned “worldview philosophy” as partly responsible for relativism in Philosophy as Rigorous Science, though he attacked relativism in all its forms by continuing the foundationalist project. Husserl admitted that there are obviously different worldviews, but he was convinced that the way out of this confusion was phenomenology. On the basis of a careful study of the phenomena “just as they are,” we can identify the universal features of consciousness and thus arrive at an ultimate foundation for knowledge. In a move similar to that of Descartes, in Ideas I Husserl makes human reason the basis for objectivity. Yet two factors complicate Husserl’s move. On the one hand, Husserl the careful phenomenologist tended to undermine Husserl the adamant theorist, for his recognition of the complexity and relativity of phenomena ends up at odds with the insistence on clearly delineated absolutes. On the other hand, Husserl became increasingly aware of the cultural and historical aspects of human knowing. Indeed in his later philosophy Husserl argues that the abstract theories of science—which Husserl sees as true precisely in virtue of the detachment from particularity and thus relativity of everyday life—can only be meaningful in the context of everyday life.

Postmodernity. In light of the development of modern thought, it is somewhat understandable that Friedrich Nietzsche—who is arguably the first postmodern—puts the very notion of truth as universal and immutable into question at the beginning of Beyond Good and Evil when he writes: “Supposing truth to be a woman—what?” While Nietzsche can rightly be accused of being sexist, the implications of this statement are profound not only for our ability to know the truth but also for the very definition or essence of truth. Nietzsche thinks that the claims of philosophy to give us truth have been pretentious and unfounded. At best, says Nietzsche, human knowledge of truth can be no more than simply a “perspective,” not “the” truth. Does Nietzsche’s position entail a complete denial of “truth”? One could argue that, if there is only a multiplicity of perspectives or interpretations, then Nietzsche effectively jettisons the notion of truth and ends up being incoherent, claiming something like “the truth is that there is no truth.” While Nietzsche makes such extreme and imprecise claims in his early philosophy, in his later works (e.g., Twilight of the Idols) it seems that his attack is directed more specifically toward truth in a Platonic sense, truth as defined in terms of simple essences removed from history and life. Truth in the later Nietzsche is seen as contextual, historical, and empirical.

However postmodern Nietzsche is in regard to questioning the truth and rationality, he might well be the apotheosis of the modern view of the self. Nietzsche’s exultation of the self can be seen as partly a mixed reaction to the decline of Christianity. On the other hand, by pronouncing the death of God in Gay Science he sees himself as simply stating the fact that Christianity is no longer a vital cultural force. Not only is this pronouncement not triumphant, Nietzsche fears a coming nihilism. While Nietzsche vehemently criticizes Christianity (particularly in Antichrist), it is not always easy to tell how much those criticisms are directed against Christianity itself or a weak version of Christianity (influenced by Kant) which held to its forms without holding to its substance (for a critique of theological liberalism, see Nietzsche’s essay on David Strauss in Untimely Meditations). On the other hand, Nietzsche sees this decline as the opportunity to replace Christianity with something that affirms life by promoting the “will to power” (an idea introduced in Thus Spoke Zarathustra and developed in Will to Power). Christianity squelches our innate desire to have power over everything around us, but proper human flourishing for Nietzsche results when we allow this will to flourish. The “masters” or “overmen” are precisely the people who choose their own values and appropriate whatever they desire, while the “slaves” are those who adopt such values as sympathy and humility. Nietzsche’s view of the overman is essentially the romantic conception of the artistic genius, the lone creator who flaunts all societal conventions and answers to no one.

Some of these same modern aspects of the self are likewise found in the thought of Martin Hei-degger. Although Heidegger intends in Being and Time to reopen the question of the meaning of “being” (which he sees as being almost completely forgotten since Aristotle), he ends up defining being from the perspective of “human” being (which he terms Dasein), thus continuing the modern move of making the human perspective central. In this same modernist vein, Heidegger makes the autonomy of the individual a primary concern. For Heidegger, being “authentic” means having possession of oneself and avoiding the danger of the “they” (das Man) taking over one’s being. Thus there is a strong parallel with Heidegger’s authenticity and Kant’s idea of thinking for oneself, even though this is complicated by Heidegger’s more postmodern conception of a self which is partially constituted by its relation to others (as opposed to the autonomous self of modernity). Many features of Heidegger’s thought are decidedly postmodern. First, whereas Husserl assumed the possibility of a purely objective phenomenology providing absolute certainty, Heidegger emphasized the historical and cultural aspects which permeate understanding and knowledge, leading to his version of “hermeneutical phenomenology.” Second, Heidegger seriously undermines such basic philosophical dualisms as subject and object and realism and idealism. Defining Dasein as “being-in-the-world,” Heidegger claims that human beings are by nature always connected to the world around them and that the two define each other, meaning that neither realism nor idealism adequately describe their relationship.

Postmodernism

In his later texts such as “The Onto-theological Constitution of Metaphysics,” Heidegger makes the distinctly postmodern move of questioning the very project of metaphysics (theorizing concerning “being”), arguing that it has been characterized by what he terms “onto-theology.” Although Heidegger’s own religious beliefs varied throughout his life, his comments on ontotheologizing are instructive. Virtually all Western metaphysicians have placed God at the end of the chain of being, says Heidegger, taking God to be the greatest being upon which the entire foundation rests. While this move might seem admirable, the problem for Heidegger is that it ends up being a way to control God by making Him into an explanation to fit the philosopher’s purposes and thus ends up being the ultimate expression of the will to power. In the “Letter on Humanism,” Heidegger expands his critique of metaphysics to reason in general, claiming that what philosophers have termed “reason” turns out to be a way of controlling the world and elevating human beings. In place of this setting up of the self as autonomous and almighty, Heidegger suggests a heteronomous or de-centered self. In place of philosophizing (the claim to give us the world “as it really is”), Heidegger suggests a kind of poetry which thinks about “being” and “truth” but neither attempts to control them nor makes pretentious claims to know them.

Although Heidegger was concerned with language, in Hans-Georg Gadamer and Jacques Derrida this emphasis becomes central. Whereas Derrida focuses more on the problems of language, Gadamer is optimistic about the prospects of understanding and truth. Explicitly reacting to the modern move which makes the individual into the sole authority, in Truth and Method Gadamer suggests the need for a rehabilitation of the concepts of tradition, authority, and prejudice. Kant’s ideal of thinking for oneself, says Gadamer, is both impossible and undesirable, for we are highly dependent upon the judgments and ideas passed on to us by tradition. Thus the self never stands alone. Further, there may well be authority (such as the Bible) that can and should be recognized as legitimate, rather than being simply rejected in order to set oneself up as the authority. Although we must always be willing to examine the assumptions and prejudices of our culture, Gadamer recognizes that our thinking is always closely connected to our own historical and cultural horizon, meaning that reason and understanding are never “pure.” The fact that understanding is always contextual means that we will never be able to understand ancient texts or the thought of other cultures in precisely the same way as the author and original audience understood them (since our context is not the same), but we can understand in a way which is similar enough (through what Gadamer terms “a fusion of horizons”) to permit genuine understanding. Gadamer does not think that reason’s dependence upon culture and tradition is necessarily to be lamented. Rather than resulting in historicism (as in Dilthey’s case), Gadamer thinks that our particular horizon is always open to other horizons by way of commonality. While truth as we know it is always expressed in terms of a particular horizon, truth is never limited to a particular horizon.

Being particularly influenced by Husserl and the structuralist language theorist Ferdinand Saussure, Derrida’s early texts such as Speech and Phenomena and Of Grammatology focus on the ideality of linguistic meaning and the relation of language to things. By way of his extremely careful method of reading known as “deconstruction” (a term which comes from Husserl), which is designed to illuminate the assumptions and values implied by a text, Derrida questions the ideal of knowing things “just as they are” and shows that the mediation of knowledge by language makes this ideal impossible. Whereas Kant made any claims to knowledge of the noumena impossible, Husserl thought that we can at least have a pure knowledge of the phenomena. Arguing against Husserl, Derrida points out that our knowledge of objects is always mediated by linguistic signs which act as a “supplement” for that which cannot be purely present to consciousness. Thus language presents us not with the thing in its fullness (either as phenomena or noumena) but with only a “trace” of it. Derrida’s deconstruction of binary oppositions (e.g., subject/object, male/female) and his assertion that language refers to nothing outside of itself has caused some to conclude that his theory of language results in utter equivocation. While this charge can clearly be laid against many of his followers (who have often used deconstruction as a tool against all absolutes), Derrida himself seems to hold that meaning is constituted both by the thing (through the trace) and by the context of signifiers, resulting in meaning which, though never purely univocal (since it partially relies on the play of signifiers), is still stable enough to make communication possible. Given this conception of meaning, any knowledge of “truth” for Derrida must inevitably be contextual and historical (and the implication would seem to be that the idea of truth itself as ideal and immutable could no longer be held).

In a surprising move for both his followers and critics, Derrida’s later philosophy turns to questions of morality and faith (though he claims that the early work makes way for these later reflections). In “Force of Law: The Mystical Foundation of Authority,” Derrida claims not only that justice is beyond deconstruction but that “deconstruction is justice,” since deconstruction illuminates the aporia (or ultimate “undecidability”) of all decisions. Every instance of justice, says Derrida, both instantiates and does injustice to the ideal of justice, since all human attempts at justice fail when held up to the ideal of justice. Derrida turns to negative theology and the aporia of God-talk in “How to Avoid Speaking: Denials” by considering the ability of human speech to “capture” God. Using the notion of the trace (which makes something partially but never fully present), Derrida argues that there is a strange logic at work in talk about God. While we want to affirm certain things about God, there is a danger of taking those affirmations too seriously, for all human statements made about God fail to describe him adequately, Derrida continues these themes in Gift of Death, where he argues that true morality (which he takes to be exemplified by Christianity) demands a sacrifice of oneself for the other (thus the idea of dying for the other). Using the account of Abraham and Isaac as a basis, Derrida reconfigures moral responsibility in terms of responsibility to persons rather than rules, arguing that truly moral action can give no ultimate justification of itself and so ends up being a gift to the other.

As a devout Jew, Emmanuel Levinas counters the centrality of the self in modern thought by claiming that morality requires decentering the self and placing the other first. A truly ethical relation to the other (who, says Levinas, appears to me as a “face”) is “non-economic” or non-reciprocal in that one expects nothing in return. In Totality and Infinity (and in Ethics and Infinity, a book of interviews with Levinas), he claims that not only modern thought but the entire Western philosophical tradition has exemplified the human desire to control or “totalize” everything (whether truth, other people, or the ultimate Other, God) by making them mere components of one’s own conceptual system. Yet the other always ultimately escapes our grasp and our attempts to master the other result in injustice. Whereas philosophy has traditionally seen either metaphysics or epistemology as foundational, Levinas thinks that ethics is truly “first philosophy.” Thus “reason” for Levinas is not something possible on our own but arises only in the context of community with the other.

In response to the assumed objectivity of reason by modernism, the thought of Michel Foucault focuses on the cultural, temporal, and institutional particularities of rationality. Arguing that concepts and ways of thinking are intimately connected to our interests and purposes (a thesis reminiscent of Fichte), Foucault is particularly concerned with how knowledge relates to power (e.g., in Power/Knowledge). The problem, for Foucault, is that knowledge is a dangerous tool (as Foucault puts it, “everything is dangerous”) which can be used for both good and bad purposes. For instance, societies establish power by “dividing practices”—such as the separation of the “normal” from the “abnormal”—and thus are able to promote a particular vision of society. Foucault argues that even what we consider to be “objective” criteria develop over time as a result of chance and particular interests. Thus Foucault’s method of philosophizing (described and illustrated in Order of Things and Archaeology of Knowledge) is to provide a history of thought and practices. The question which disturbs Foucault is not that of whether human knowledge can be said to have progressed in any significant sense, but what the effect of that quest for knowledge has been. Although Foucault is (rightly) criticized for assuming that a power play lies behind everything, his philosophy is an important reminder that the quest for knowledge has not always been inspired by pure motives. Whether Foucault was a moral and epistemological relativist (however aberrant his personal life) is open to debate, though his way of philosophizing need not necessarily lead to that result.

In the American context, many of the preceding themes can be found in the thought of Richard Rorty. In Philosophy and the Mirror of Nature, he attacks the idea that human knowledge can “mirror” nature and dismisses foundationalism as a vain hope. Often quoted as defining truth as “what our peers will let us get away with saying,” Rorty speaks of himself as an “ironist,” someone who holds to certain beliefs all the while knowing that they are not true in any sense other than the pragmatic sense of “useful for the moment.” Whereas in his early philosophy Rorty still held to the idea of philosophical argumentation, in his later philosophy (e.g., Contingency, Irony, and Solidarity) he claims that there can be no real “arguments” but simply “redescriptions” of things, poetic metaphors which make positions seem appealing. Although Rorty is usually (and rightly) labeled a relativist, he thinks any such terms as “true rationality” or “relativism” ultimately make no sense in a context where there is no God and nothing is sacrosanct because there is no meaningful alternative (which the term “relative” requires). Rorty’s postmodern view of the self takes over the Nietzschean idea of poetization of the self but without the romantic overtones. The self can never be completely “one-self,” for the self is but a “tissue of contingencies” which are highly dependent upon the influences of one’s historical and cultural context. Yet Rorty thinks that the result of this recognition of contingency is the need of a solidarity which promotes community.

Probably the most prominent Christian postmodern philosopher is Jean-Luc Marion, who provides a fine example of how postmodern insights can be applied to Christian thought. In God without Being he considers what kind of talk about God is appropriate. Given that God can never be fully present to consciousness, Marion argues that our claims to knowledge of God always run the risk of placing a conceptual schema on God which creates him in our own image. Arguing that God is above even “being” (so that God is not defined as the greatest possible being), Marion affirms not the God of the philosophers but the God of faith. While “idols” are our pictures or concepts of God which reflect us rather than God, “icons” point us beyond ourselves to God. For Marion, any concept of God that claims to present us with God in his fullness is idolatrous, for God always escapes our grasp. In contrast to idols, icons give us a “trace” of God, who is the ultimate “saturated phenomenon” in the sense that there is so much there that no concepts could “capture” him. God “exists,” says Marion, but not as we exist: his “being” is love and he is beyond the realm of being (ousia) and predication. In effect, Marion attempts to steer a middle course between “bad” silence (when all talk about God is silenced) and unguarded chatter. A wise silence recognizes the limitations of one’s speech and attempts to say only what one can legitimately say, the question being not so much “what” one says of God but “how.” Writing from a Catholic sacramental perspective, Marion makes the eucharist central: we meet Christ in the breaking of the bread, where Christ is present to us as a gift of which we are not the authors and which we do not possess.

Conclusion. One must beware of any simple acceptance or rejection of either modern or postmodern thinking. On the one hand, the legacy of modern thought has probably been more negative than positive for Christian belief. While the Enlightenment emphasis on critical inspection of one’s beliefs is admirable in a sense, the goal of “thinking for oneself” has often been linked to an agenda. As Gadamer points out, “Enlightenment critique is primarily directed against the religious tradition of Christianity—i.e. the Bible.” Further, not only does the modern conception of the self as autonomous seem incorrect descriptively, it also is incompatible with a Christian view of the person in which individuals find their identity as members of a community. Finally, although Scripture clearly affirms the value of human rationality as part of what it means to be made in God’s image, the modern confidence in human reason is deeply at odds with the biblical emphasis on the limits of human ability.

On the other hand, the postmodern reaction is sometimes equally as questionable and incompatible with Christianity. We have seen that some postmodern thinkers, such as Nietzsche, take the modern conception of the self to its absolute extreme. Moreover, the rejection of the modern pretensions of human reason has sometimes resulted in the claim that there can be no objectivity at all, so that it would seem that any possibility of knowing truth is lost. Yet, while postmodern thought has elements that are not supportive of Christian belief, there are others which are of significant value for Christians. In particular, Marion, Gadamer, Levinas, and Derrida (at least in his later thought) have much to offer. Their emphasis on a decentered self is a helpful corrective to the presumptuous claims of modernity and resonates with Christian teachings concerning the dangers of pride. Even a thinker like Nietzsche, however antagonistic he may be toward Christianity, can be instructive, for his penetrating critique of the failings of Christians is sometimes all too true. Further, the postmodern denial of the pure objectivity of reason is not so far away from the Christian idea that knowing the truth is closely linked to being a virtuous person, since sin can easily cloud our minds. While the questioning of the power and purity of reason by postmodern thinkers is appropriate, one need not go to the extreme of concluding that there is only contingency. There is a great difference between the idea that all human reason is permeated by contingency (or historicity) and the idea that human reason is merely contingent and in no sense universally valid. Christians can heartily endorse the postmodern recognition of the limits of rationality (and the humility of spirit that recognition should entail) without concluding that there either is no truth or that we are incapable of knowing truth.

B. E. BENSON

See also GADAMER, HANS-GEORG; POSTLIBERAL THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. D. Allen, Christian Belief in a Postmodern World: The Full Wealth of Conviction; D. A. Carson, Gagging of God: Christianity Confronts Pluralism; D. Dockery, ed., Challenge of Postmodernism: An Evangelical Engagement; L. Gilkey, Naming the Whirlwind: The Renewal of God-Language; S. Grenz, Primer on Postmodernism; D. R. Griffin, W. Beardslee, and J. Holland, Varieties of Postmodern Theology; D. Harvey, Condition of Postmodernism; R. Lundin, Culture of Interpretation: Christian Faith and the Postmodern World; J.-F. Lyotard, Postmodern Condition: A Report on Knowledge; A. MacIntyre, Whose Justice? Whose Rationality?; J. R. Middleton and B. Walsh, Truth Is Stranger Than It Used to Be: Biblical Faith in a Postmodern Age; T. Oden, After Modernity . . . What?: Agenda for Theology; T. Phillips and D. Okholm, eds., Nature of Confession: Evangelicals and Postliberals in Conversation; J. Sire, Universe Next Door: A Basic World View Catalog, rev. ed.; A. Thiselton, Interpreting God and the Postmodern Self: On Meaning, Manipulation and Promise; G. Veith Jr., Postmodern Times: A Christian Guide to Contemporary Thought and Culture.

Posttribulation Rapture. See RAPTURE OF THE CHURCH.

Poverty, Christians and. See GOSPEL, SOCIAL IMPLICATIONS OF.

Power, Powers. See PRINCIPALITIES AND POWERS.

Pragmatism. The label applied to ideas formulated by three American thinkers, Charles S. Peirce (1839–1914), William James (1842–1910), and John Dewey (1859–1952). Though each developed separate elements in pragmatism, their ideas coalesced, became deeply entrenched in American universities, and affected many fields of inquiry—notably psychology, religion, and education. Early pragmatism was strongest at the University of Chicago but was popularized in the widely read works of James and Dewey. Also, pragmatism’s popularity grew in America because American culture traditionally accepted the pragmatists’ dogmas of utility, democracy, and progress.

Charles Peirce created and applied a utilitarian standard in his philosophy as he analyzed ideas for their practical consequences instead of their conformity to an ideal truth. His approach, which he labeled “pragmaticism,” stressed logical thinking based on observable facts. The result he envisioned was a clear philosophical method rather than a comprehensive worldview, but it was a method closely tied to nineteenth-century positivism; thus, his pragmatism affected more than methodology alone.

William James added to Peirce’s ideas by applying them to conflicts between religion and science. Science, which was positivistic and promoted evolutionary theories, was roundly attacked by many who advocated religious belief based on biblically revealed truths; consequently James proposed a pragmatic solution: opposing philosophies which produced identical results really did not conflict. For example, James believed that if scientific materialism produced belief in deity and traditional religion also produced belief in God, then there was no essential difference between those philosophies.

James advocated his ideas in several widely read books: Will to Believe (1896); Varieties of Religious Experience (1902); Pragmatism (1907); Pluralistic Universe (1909); and Meaning of Truth (1909). In these works James also developed his thought in additional ways. First, he employed “radical empiricism” to describe the nature of beliefs. That is, in his view beliefs rest on currently observed facts; thus, beliefs are hypothetical and relative rather than dogmatic. Second, “humanism” is the route to proper ideas. Ideas are to be based on human experience, not on revelation. Third, truths are relative to experience instead of coming from an absolute source. This latter idea was promoted by Canning Scott Schiller (1864–1937), pragmatism’s chief advocate in England. Schiller also wrote several works that employed pragmatic humanism in the discipline of logic.

The third famous philosophical pragmatist, John Dewey, applied the ideas of Peirce and James to educational philosophy in his many books and as a prominent philosopher in the University of Chicago (1894–1904) and Columbia University (1904–29). Dewey’s philosophy became known as experimentalism. As the other pragmatists, he emphasized the naturalistic, empirical, and evolutionary aspects of human thought which portrayed humans and their thought patterns as part of nature. That is, in Dewey’s view mankind could not escape natural environment; nor could ideals have a transcendent source. For Dewey education was a process of inquiry and human interaction as opposed to a mastery of absolute, fixed truths. Similarly, the traditional use of education to pass on social values was criticized by Dewey; for, with James, Dewey regarded values as hypothetical, not absolute. Given his belief in evolution, Dewey maintained that his educational philosophy promoted true individual growth and would produce true democracy. Also, employing humanism and relativism, Dewey criticized religion as a source of truth. He regarded people as “religious” but rejected values and principles based on any revealed "religion." Some of Dewey's important works are Psychology (1871); School and Society (1900); Ethics (1908); Democracy and Education (1916); Common Faith (1934); Theory of Inquiry (1938); and Knowing and the Known (1949).

Pragmatism

Pragmatism extensively influenced American life and thought. It fit well with science's popularity and with traditional American notions of democracy and evolutionary progress. Though progressive notions expired in Europe after World War I, America, which escaped the mass destruction and maintained a deep faith in education, provided continued fruitful ground for pragmatist philosophy. Also, though pragmatism denied transcendental sources of truth, it accepted a "religious" aspect in all mankind. Such a philosophy, when not thoroughly critiqued, fit well into America's pluralistic religious environment.

R. J. VANDERMOLEN

Bibliography. J. L. Childs, American Pragmatism and Education; F. Copleston, History of Philosophy; S. Hook, Metaphysics of Pragmatism; A. O. Lovejoy, Thirteen Pragmatisms; E. C. Moore, American Pragmatism; C. Morris, Pragmatic Movement in American Philosophy; P. P. Wiener, Evolution and the Founders of Pragmatism.

Prayer. Theology that is biblical and evangelical will always be nurtured by prayer. Moreover, it will give special attention to the life of prayer, since theology is inseparable from spirituality. Theology is concerned not only with the Logos but also with the Spirit who reveals and applies the wisdom of Christ to our hearts. John Calvin referred to prayer as "the soul of faith," and indeed faith without prayer soon becomes lifeless. It is by prayer that we make contact with God. It is likewise through prayer that God communicates with us.

Heiler's Typology. Probably the most significant work on the phenomenology of prayer is Friedrich Heiler's Das Gebet (Prayer), written toward the end of the First World War. Heiler, a convert from Catholicism to Lutheranism and for many years professor of history of religions at the University of Marburg, makes a convincing case that prayer takes quite divergent forms, depending on the kind of religion or spirituality in which it is found. He sees six types of prayer: primitive, ritual, Greek cultural, philosophical, mystical, and prophetic.

In the prayer of primitive people God is envisaged as a higher being (or beings) who hears and answers the requests of humans, though he is not generally understood as all-powerful and all-holy. Primitive prayer is born out of need and fear, and the request is frequently for deliverance from misfortune and danger.

Ritual prayer represents a more advanced stage of civilization, though not necessarily deeper or more meaningful prayer. Here it is the form, not the content, of the prayer which brings about the answer. Prayer is reduced to litanies and repetitions that are often believed to have a magical effect.

In popular Greek religion petition was focused upon moral values rather than simply rudimentary needs. The gods were believed to be benign but not omnipotent. The prayer of the ancient Greeks was a purified form of primitive prayer. It reflected but did not transcend the cultural values of Hellenic civilization.

Philosophical prayer signifies the dissolution of realistic or naïve prayer. Prayer now becomes reflection upon the meaning of life or resignation to the divine order of the universe. At its best, philosophical prayer includes a note of thanksgiving for the blessings of life.

According to Heiler, the two highest types of prayer are the mystical and the prophetic. Mysticism in its Christian context represents a synthesis of Neoplatonic and biblical motifs, but it is also a universal religious phenomenon. Here the aim is union with God, who is generally portrayed in suprapersonal terms. The anthropomorphic god of primitive religion is now transformed into a God that transcends personality, one that is best described as the Absolute, the infinite abyss, or the infinite ground and depth of all being. Mysticism sees prayer as the elevation of the mind to God. Revelation is an interior illumination rather than the intervention of God in history (as in biblical faith). Mystics often speak of a ladder of prayer or stages of prayer, and petition is always considered the lowest stage. The highest form of prayer is contemplation, which often culminates in ecstasy.

For Heiler, prophetic prayer signifies both a reappropriation and a transformation of the insights of primitive religion. Now prayer is based not only on need but also on love. It is neither an incantation nor a meditation but a spontaneous outburst of emotion. Indeed, heartfelt supplication is the essence of true prayer. Prophetic prayer involves importunity—begging and even complaining. In this category of prophetic religion Heiler places not only the biblical prophets and apostles but also the Reformers, especially Luther, and the Puritans. Judaism and Islam at their best also mirror prophetic religion, though mysticism is present in these movements as well.

The spirituality which Heiler did not consider and which is really a contemporary phenomenon can be called secular spirituality. It signifies a this-worldly mysticism where the emphasis is not on detachment from the world but immersion in the world. This was already anticipated in both Hegel and Nietzsche. J. A. T. Robinson describes secular prayer as the penetration through the world to God. The liberation theologian Juan Luis Segundo defines prayer as reflection on and openness to what God is doing in history. Henry Nelson Wieman, the religious naturalist, sees prayer as an attitude toward life which places us in contact with the creative process in nature. Dorothy Sölle speaks of “political prayer,” which is oriented toward praxis rather than either adoration or petition.

Hallmarks of Christian Prayer. In biblical religion prayer is understood as both a gift and a task. God takes the initiative (cf. Ps. 50:3–4; Ezek. 2:1–2), but we must respond. This kind of prayer is personalistic and dialogic. It entails revealing our innermost selves to God but also God’s revelation of his desires to us (cf. Prov. 1:23).

Prayer in the biblical perspective is spontaneous, though it may take structured forms. But the forms themselves must always be held tentatively and placed aside when they become barriers to the conversation of the heart with the living God. True prayer, in the prophetic or biblical sense, bursts through all forms and techniques.

In the Bible petition and intercession are primary, though adoration, thanksgiving, and confession also have a role. Yet the petitionary element is present in all these forms of prayer. Biblical prayer is crying to God out of the depths; it is the pouring out of the soul before God (cf. 1 Sam. 1:15; Pss. 88:1–2; 130:1–2; 142:1–2; Lam. 2:19; Matt. 7:7–8; Phil. 4:6; Heb. 5:7). It often takes the form of importunity, passionate pleading to God, even wrestling with God.

Such an attitude presupposes that God’s ultimate will is unchanging, but the way in which he chooses to realize this will is dependent on the prayers of his children. He wants us as covenant partners, not as automatons or slaves. In this restricted sense prayer may be said to change the will of God. But more fundamentally it is sharing with God our needs and desires so that we might be more fully conformed to his ultimate will and purpose.

Meditation and contemplation have a role in biblical religion, though not, however, as higher stages of prayer (as in mysticism) but as supplements to prayer. The focus of our meditation is not on the essence of God or the infinite depth of all being but on God’s redemptive deeds in biblical history culminating in Jesus Christ. The aim is not greater detachment from the world of turmoil and confusion but a greater attachment to God and to our fellow human beings.

Biblical spirituality makes a place for silence, yet silence is to be used not to get beyond the Word but to prepare ourselves to hear the Word. Against certain types of mysticism, faith-piety (Heiler) does not seek to transcend reason but to place reason in the service of God. There can be a prayer that consists only in groans or sighs or in shouts and cries of jubilation; yet it is not complete or full prayer until it takes the form of meaningful communication with the living God.

The Paradox of Prayer. Prayer in the Christian sense does not deny the mystical dimension, but neither does it accept the idea of a higher stage in prayer where petition is left behind. The progress that it sees in the spiritual life is from the prayer of rote to the prayer of the heart.

Prayer in biblical or evangelical spirituality is rooted in both the experience of Godforsakenness and in the sense of the presence of God. It is inspired by both the felt need for God and gratitude for his work of reconciliation and redemption in Jesus Christ.

Biblical prayer includes the dimension of importunity and of submission. It is both wrestling with God in the darkness and resting in the stillness. There is a time to argue and complain to God, but there is also a time to submit. Biblical faith sees submission to the will of God coming after the attempt to discover his will through heartfelt supplication. Prayer is both a pleading with God that he will hear and act upon our requests and a trusting surrender to God in the confidence that he will act in his own time and way. But the confidence comes only through the struggle.

Christian prayer is both corporate and individual. We find God in solitariness, but we never remain in this state. Instead, we seek to unite our sacrifices of praise and our petitions and intercessions with those of the company of fellow believers. The man or woman of prayer may find God both in solitude and in fellowship. Even in solitude we believe that the petitioner is not alone but is surrounded by a cloud of witnesses (Heb. 12:1), the angels and the saints in the church triumphant.

We are called to present personal and individual needs to God, but at the same time we are urged to intercede for the whole company of the saints (John 17:20–21; Eph. 6:18) and also for the world at large (1 Tim. 2:1–2). Biblical spirituality entails not withdrawal from the turmoils of the world but identification with the world in its shame and affliction. Personal petition would become egocentric if it were not held in balance with intercession, adoration, and thanksgiving.

The goal of prayer is not absorption into the being of God but the transformation of the world for the glory of God. We yearn for the blessed vision of God, but even more we seek to bring our wills and the wills of all people into conformity with the purposes of God. We pray not simply for personal happiness or for protection (as in primitive prayer) but for the advancement and extension of the kingdom of God.

D. G. BLOESCH

Bibliography. K. Barth, Prayer; D. G. Bloesch, Struggle of Prayer; J. Ellul, Prayer and Modern Man; P. T. Forsyth, Soul of Prayer; R. Foster, Prayer: Finding the Heart's True Home; O. Hallesby, Prayer; F. Heiler, Prayer; K. Leech, True Prayer; P. LeFevre, Understandings of Prayer; T. Merton, Contemplative Prayer; L. Payne, Lis- tening Prayer; H. U. von Balthasar, Prayer; F. von Hügel, Life of Prayer.

Prayer

Prayer, The Lord's. See LORD'S PRAYER.

Prayers for the Dead. No passage in the OT or NT enjoins or even implies this practice. Of the single passage in the Apocrypha that appears to allude to it (2 Macc. 12:44), it may be said that the text, translation, and interpretation are all uncertain, and that there is considerable evidence that orthodox Jewry of the intertestamental period rejected prayers for the dead. In canonical Scripture the Christian soul is spoken of as at once "with Christ" (2 Cor. 5:6, 8; Phil. 1:23); the Lord promised the penitent thief Paradise "today" (Luke 23:43). Scripture everywhere regards death as the end of man's probationary period; after death, even prior to the resurrection of the body and the last judgment, the soul is fixed in a permanent state of bliss or misery (see esp. Luke 16:19–31). Hence prayers for the dead are, at best, irrelevant and unnecessary.

The apostolic fathers do not mention prayers for the dead. The custom seems to have arisen in the church at the end of the second century. In the Roman Catholic Church the practice is an integral part of an erroneous system of salvation and is particularly connected with Roman teaching on purgatory, indulgences, and the Mass. The liturgies and confessions of Protestant churches, with the exception of the Anglican tradition, where a mixed situation exists, do not countenance prayers for the dead.

The Book of Common Prayer removed all prayers for the dead in 1552 and in the "Homily on Prayer" (Part III) denounced such prayers as useless. Since the middle of the nineteenth century, however, such prayers have gradually crept back into common practice among the non-evangelical element of the Anglican communion.

O. R. JOHNSTON

See also COMMUNION OF SAINTS; INVOCATION OF SAINTS; PURGATORY; VENERATION OF SAINTS.

Preach, Preaching. In the NT a preacher is a person who has the inner call from the Holy Spirit and the external call from the church and has been duly set apart to proclaim the gospel. The preacher's task is to speak as a personal witness to God's revelation, interpreting it, explaining it, and applying it to the needs of the people. The most common definition of preaching is one composed from two quotes from Phillips Brooks: "Preaching is the communication of truth through personality." Bishop Manning gives a more theological definition when he calls preaching "the manifestation of the Incarnate Word from the written word through the spoken word." Henry Sloane Coffin described preaching as "truth mediated through personality to constrain conscience at once." The homiletician Andrew W. Blackwood Sr. gave two worthy definitions: "Preaching is divine truth voiced by a chosen personality to meet human need," and "Preaching means interpreting life today with light from the Scripture so as to meet the needs of the hearer now, and guide the hearer in doing God's will tomorrow."

Preaching in the Bible. In the OT the words used are qôhelet, "preacher;" bāšar, "to tell good news;" qārā, "to call or proclaim;" qēr'ā, "preaching." The NT uses euangelizō, "to announce good news;" kéryx, "herald;" kéryssō, "to proclaim as a herald;" diangellō, "to proclaim or publish abroad;" katangellō, "to proclaim solemnly." In both testaments the words used to denote preaching have the essential element of proclamation or announcing. The preacher is one who tells forth the message which has been received from God. Thus, in one of the Yale lectures on preaching one lecturer said, "Every living preacher must receive his communication direct from God, and the constant purpose of his life must be to receive it uncorrupted and to deliver it without addition or subtraction." Bonhoeffer refers to this when he says, "He has put His Word in our mouth. He wants it to be spoken through us. If we hinder His word, the blood of the sinning brother will be upon us. If we carry out His word, God will save our brother through us."

The earliest beginnings of preaching are found in the OT. There it is said that "Enoch also, the seventh from Adam, prophesied." Then Noah is called a "preacher of righteousness." The blessings of Isaac and of Jacob are examples of formal, religious address in poetical style. The book of Deuteronomy is a series of sermons repeating, expanding, and enforcing much of the legislation of Moses.

From the time of Samuel to that of Jeremiah was the great prophetic period in Israel's history. Within this time appeared Samuel, Nathan, Gad, Azariah, Elijah, Elisha, Joel, Micah, Micaiah, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and others. These "preachers" came to people and kings with their messages from God. Their messages often began with the phrase, "Thus saith the Lord." They pleaded, warned, rebuked, encouraged; they spoke of judgments; they inspired with glowing promises of the glory to come. The glimpses we have of these prophets reveal the greatness of their characters, the strength of their influence, and the lasting value of their messages.

The last period of Hebrew prophecy extended from Ezekiel and Daniel to Malachi, from the exile to the restoration and later. In this period the character and influence of prophecy did not materially change. It was still the voice of God through chosen persons to his chosen people. It still spoke to the religious life and aspirations of the people, both by preaching to the present and pointing to the future.

During the period between the testaments there was an important development in regard to preaching. This development occurred in connection with the services in the synagogue. An important part of the service became the explanation of the Scriptures, which were read and then interpreted. Traces of this are found in Nehemiah 8 in reference to the preaching of Ezra. The NT records that both Jesus and the disciples made use of the synagogue service to preach the gospel.

John the Baptist was the connecting link between the OT and the NT. He was the last and greatest of the prophets and the first preacher of the new era. John was marked by strength of character coupled with a powerful personality. He announced the immediate coming of the promised reign of God. The promised Messiah was now about to arrive, and John was only a voice preparing the way. He called for a sincere and demonstrated repentance, to be symbolized by the act of baptism. John did not use the synagogues but preached in the open air near the rivers where the baptisms took place. He received the highest possible praise from Jesus, who said of him, "Among those born of women there is no one greater than John" (Luke 7:28).

The foundation of preaching is found also in the example of Jesus, as George Buttrick showed in his Yale lectures on preaching, Jesus Came Preaching. In comparing the preaching of Jesus with that of John one can see both a similarity and a difference. Both spoke of the kingdom of God. But more and more Jesus interpreted the promises as fulfilled in himself. He proclaims himself as the fulfillment of prophecy, as the Son and therefore the revealer of God. He spoke of himself as the Savior and Deliverer of persons: He is the Way to God, the Good Shepherd who gives his life for the sheep, the Redeemer who would give his life a ransom for many. He is his own gospel.

In distinction from John, Jesus calls to faith in the Lord who has now come. He offers himself and his work to the acceptance of his hearers. He is the revelation and embodiment of God's gracious ways with persons, and as such he is to be received and trusted.

Jesus preached in various locations and to various-sized audiences. Sometimes he spoke to small groups and at other times to vast crowds. Sometimes he interpreted the Scriptures in a synagogue service, while on other occasions he preached in the field or by the sea. The preaching of Jesus was marked by authority and by quiet confidence in God, in himself, and in his mission and message. Sometimes he thundered judgment, and other times he issued a tender invitation. In his preaching he blended parable, aphorism, argument, and scriptural exposition.

Two occasions are recorded in the Gospels when Jesus sent out groups of disciples on preaching missions. He gave them their message, together with practical instructions as to how they should carry out their ministry. The book of Acts depicts the disciples waiting at Jerusalem for the promise of the Spirit. Acts and the epistles give traces of the apostolic preaching following Pentecost. This preaching was marked by a power seldom seen during the ages since. Possibly this was due to a greater dependence by the apostles on the work of the Holy Spirit. The burden of the early preaching is Christocentric—the life, death, resurrection, and coming again of Jesus Christ. Christ was the central and dominant theme of the gospel. There was a summons to repentance and faith.

In the preaching of the apostles is found the two permanent elements of Christian preaching, evangelism and instruction. There is a free presentation to all people of the claims and demands of the gospel. There is also orderly public instruction of believers in worship based upon the Scriptures. The preaching of John was transitional, the preaching of Jesus was unique, while the preaching of the apostles and the early church becomes our model.

Preaching in Church History. After the death of the apostles and their fellow workers in the early church there is a decline in preaching, until gradually it rises in power to a high level in the fourth and early fifth centuries. Then preaching falls into a long night of obscurity and weakness; with the preaching of the crusades and the rise of scholasticism it begins to revive. It reached its medieval height in the thirteenth century. Then again there is a general falling off in purity and power. The Reformation comes as another high wave gathering forces slowly to its crest in the early part of the sixteenth century. After the Reformation, with the fracturing of the visible church, preaching is marked by diversity as it spreads from country to country and denomination to denomination. Each country, and each denomination, has its peaks of power in preaching.

Contemporary trends in preaching include liturgical preaching, holistic preaching, preaching based on communications theory, liberation preaching (some homileticians include black and feminist preaching in this category), preaching built around language theory, life-situation preaching, inductive preaching, narrative preaching, and a renewed interest in theological preaching.

John R. W. Stott, in Between Two Worlds, begins and ends by saying, "Preaching is indispensable to Christianity." In this he concurs with E. C. Dargan and many others who have studied the history of Christianity. So long as Christianity remains a religion of the Word of God, preachers will be needed to interpret that Word so that God's people may have God's help for daily life. The Christian church will grow, flourish, and accomplish God's purposes for it only as there are those who respond to God's call to preach that Word which brings faith and life. P. T. Forsyth was correct when he said, "With preaching Christianity stands or falls, because it is the declaration of a gospel." J. S. BAIRD

Preach, Preaching

Bibliography. J. E. Baird, Preparing for Platform and Pulpit; J. D. Baumann, Introduction to Contemporary Preaching; Y. Brilioth, Brief History of Preaching; J. A. Broadus, Lectures on the History of Preaching; On the Preparation and Delivery of Sermons; E. C. Dargan, History of Preaching: From the Apostolic Fathers to the Great Reformers; History of Preaching: From the Close of the Reformation to the End of the Nineteenth Century; H. Davies, Varieties of English Preaching 1900-1960; D. W. C. Ford, Ministry of the Word; D. T. Holland, Preaching Tradition: A Brief History; J. Kerr, Lectures on the History of Preaching; R. H. Mounce, Essential Nature of New Testament Preaching; H. W. Robinson, Biblical Preaching; W. E. Sangster, Craft of the Sermon; F. R. Webber, History of Preaching in Britain and America; R. E. O. White, Guide to Preaching.

Prebendary. See CHURCH OFFICERS.

Predestination. God's predetermination of persons to a specific end. The biblical use (primarily NT) is salvific and christological: it is in Christ (Eph. 1:11) and through Christ (Eph. 1:5) and with the goal of our conformity "to the likeness of his Son, so that he might be the firstborn among many" (Rom. 8:29). Christ himself was "chosen before the creation of the world" (1 Pet. 1:20) and "predestined from eternity" (1 Cor. 2:7). Christ was crucified by the hands of "wicked men" (Acts 2:23) who did "whatever [God's] power and will had decided beforehand should happen" (Acts 4:28). Predestination thus includes human responsibility (if inexplicably so) and includes both the end and the means to an end.

Predestination is an act of God's will (see "definite plan," Acts 2:23 NRSV), according to God's purpose (Eph. 1:11), the "eternal purpose" which God "accomplished in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Eph. 3:11). Predestination to adoption is "in accordance with [God's] pleasure and will" (Eph. 1:5), and he effects all things according to "the purpose of his will" (Eph. 1:11-12).

Predestination is an aspect of God's rule over all that he created and sustains. The OT emphasizes this larger theme: Yahweh is Creator, Sustainer, and Ruler of all history, who can therefore declare the future before it occurs (e.g., Isa. 48:3-5; Dan. 2:20-23; 4:34-35; 7:1-28); other gods are lifeless, impotent, ignorant artifacts (e.g., Isa. 41:21-24; 44:9-20; Jer. 10:1-16).

The "deliberate choice" of God's predestination to glory implies that his non-choice of others is intentional. God's choice of Isaac, Jacob, and descendants, and his non-choice of Ishmael, Esau, and descendants, supports this (Rom. 9:6b-13; see D. Moo, Romans [NIC]). God "passes by," leaving them to deserved judgment (preterition), yet this is voluntary. That God does not effectually save all, and this intentionally (though he "is not willing that any should perish" [2 Pet. 3:9 KJV] and "desires everyone to be saved" [1 Tim. 2:4 NRSV]), is grounds for positing divine reprobation. Tension with God's universal salvific will is not unique to reprobation; this already results with "single predestination" of some people to salvation.

Alternative forms of "double predestination" disagree whether God's freedom implies that humans are predestined while still unfallen (supralapsarianism) or whether the biblical stress on the graciousness and mercifulness of predestination suggests that humans are considered as fallen (infralapsarianism), though much of the larger debate is moot. Though God's distinction of elect from non-elect is not on the basis of their moral character (Rom. 9:11-12), the wicked are damned because they are guilty while others, also guilty, are mercifully spared (see F. H. Klooster, Calvin's Doctrine of Predestination, ch. 3).

Many understand predestination as God's response to prescience of individuals' future act of faith, e.g., "those God foreknew he also predestined" (Rom. 8:29); "chosen according to the foreknowledge of God" (1 Pet. 1:2). More fundamentally, God's initiative is seen as threatening human freedom.

Augustinians note that Christ is "foreknown before the foundation of the world" (1 Pet. 1:20 NASB) and that Acts 2:23 couples "definite plan" (NRSV) with foreknowledge (which is not prior here). Because the Father is not merely prescient of Christ and his work, they teach that God knows the future because his will is its source. Moreover, the Father "foreknowing" his Son echoes the biblical "knowing" which involves loving choice and commitment (Amos 3:2 NRSV). Further, all who are foreknown are also predestined, called, justified, and glorified (Rom. 8:29-30). This involves only some humans (whether this is a smaller or a greater percentage), but God's prescience is not thus limited. Finally, the objects of God's foreknowledge in Romans 8 and 1 Peter 1 are persons, not their faith response to Christ.

S. R. SPENCER

See also ELECT, ELECTION; PRETERITION; REPROBATION.

Bibliography. D. Basinger and R. Basinger, eds., Predestination and Free Will; J. Calvin, Concerning the Eternal Predestination of God; Institutes of the Christian Religion; M. J. Farrelly, Predestination, Grace, and Free

Will; R. Garrigou-Lagrangé, Predestination; P. Jacobs and H. Krieken, "Foreknowledge, Providence, Predestination" in NIDNTT 3:692–97; H. Klooster, Calvin's Doctrine of Predestination; J. B. Mozley, Treatise on the Augustinian Doctrine of Predestination.

Preexistence of Christ. The preincarnate existence of Christ may be "only a simple, contemplative inference backwards from the spiritual glory of the present Christ" (Deissmann, 170); certainly its clearest expression is found in later writing reflecting upon the rudimentary messianic, even adoptionist, assessment of Christ in the primitive Christian community (Acts 2:22–23; 10:38). Yet preexistence is at least implied in words of Jesus himself: "The Son of Man came"; the owner of the vineyard "had still . . . a beloved son: finally he sent him." It is explicit in sayings attributed to Jesus in John's Gospel: "I came down from heaven" (John 6:38); "The glory I had with you before the world was" (John 17:5).

Jewish scholars attributed "ideal" preexistence to things (law, temple) and persons (Adam, Moses) deeply revered, echoed perhaps in Paul's calling Christ "last Adam . . . from heaven." Greek thinking, reflected in Philo, was familiar with preexistence of souls. But it is unnecessary to find here more than a source of usable terms. The idea that the Son of God, eternally preexisting in glory with the Father, moved by love became incarnate was too central to Christian faith to depend upon coincidences of language for its basis.

Paul appeals for generosity because Christ, "though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor." He pleads that converts live as sons because "God sent his Son"; argues for self-effacement from the fact that Christ, being in the form of God, "emptied himself"; contends, against the Gnostics' plērōma filling the gulf between God and creation, that all things were created in, through, and for Christ, who is "before all things." As "Lord from heaven" Christ provides the pattern of our resurrected humanity; as he first descended, so he has ascended—the measure of his triumph and the assurance of ours (2 Cor. 8:9; Gal. 4:4; Eph. 4:8–9; Phil. 2:5–6; Col. 1:15–16). For such practical, pastoral exhortations one does not argue from fringe speculations, but only from familiar, accepted, foundational truths.

John's Gospel and epistles, assuming that Christ came from God and went to God (John 13:3), emphasize his being sent by the Father on divine mission, expressing divine love (John 3:16; 1 John 4:9–10), a revelation of the unseen Father by one belonging "in the bosom of the Father" (John 1:18 κJV)—a divine Word, present when God spoke at creation and now again conveying meaning and power to the world (John 1:1–18). For John as for Paul, mankind's salvation derives not from any human initiative but from the in-breaking of the eternal Son into time. That is the crucial truth here at issue.

The implications of preexistence are a concern of subsequent Christian thought. Does it impair the manhood of Jesus? (christological controversies: answer, No—two real natures coexist in one person). Why the delay in Christ's arrival? (medieval: answer, God patiently prepared). Does preexistence imply continuity of memory between the eternal Son and Jesus? (modern: answer, No—a growing consciousness of his uniqueness). But the fact of preexistence is not questioned, except where Christ's deity and divine mission are wholly denied.

R. E. O. WHITE

See also CHRISTOLOGY; JESUS CHRIST.

Bibliography. D. M. Baillie, God Was in Christ; O. Cullmann, Christology of the New Testament; A. Deissmann, St. Paul: A Study in Social and Religious History; H. R. Mackintosh, Doctrine of the Person of Christ.

Preexistence of the Soul. See SOUL.

Prelacy. The term comes from the medieval Latin praelatus, a high-ranking civil or religious official. It refers to the type of church government in which control is vested in bishops, archbishops, metropolitans, and patriarchs. In Roman Catholicism such dignitaries as abbots, provosts, nuncios, and apostolic prefects are included among the prelates. In the Church of England bishops and archbishops are considered prelates.

Among nonepiscopal denominations prelacy and related words have often been used invidiously of the episcopal system. This was especially true of the Puritans and Baptists in England and of Scottish Presbyterians in the seventeenth century, when the Stuarts were attempting to impose episcopacy upon them.

D. G. DAVIS

Premillennialism. See MILLENNIUM, VIEWS OF THE.

Presbyter. See CHURCH OFFICERS; ELDER.

Presbyterianism. See CHURCH GOVERNMENT.

Presence, Divine. In the Bible the word "face" or "countenance" (Heb. pānîm; Gr. prosōpon or enōpion, "in the face of") is normally used to indicate presence. As applied to God there seem to be three main senses. First, there is the general and inescapable presence of God as described in Psalm 139:7–12. Second, there is the special presence of God among his people or among the nations to save or to judge (cf. Exod. 33:14; Nah. 1:5). This is further expressed by the divine dwelling in the tabernacle and temple (cf. Ps. 48), and especially by the coming of Jesus Christ as Immanuel (Matt. 1:23; John 1:14), his continued presence in and with his disciples by the Holy Spirit (Matt. 28:20; John 14:16–17), and his final coming in glory (1 Thess. 2:19). Third, there is the presence of God in heaven, before which the angels stand (Luke 1:19), in face of which there can be no self-righteous boasting (1 Cor. 1:29), from which the wicked are to be banished with everlasting destruction (2 Thess. 1:9), but before which believers will be presented faultless in virtue of the work of Christ (Jude 24), thus enjoying, as the psalmist dared to hope, the fullness of joy (Ps. 16:11; cf. 73:23–24).

Presence, Divine

It may be noted that the emphasis of the Bible is not on the divine presence as a general immanence, hence the naturalness with which Jonah can be said to try to flee from God's presence (Jonah 1:3) or worshipers to come before God's presence (Ps. 95:2). For sinful man who cannot see God or abide his presence, the important thing is the special realization of his presence in salvation and the final acceptance of the justified believer in his eternal presence. The presence of God among his people in the new heaven and earth is the goal of the divine work as initiated already by the incarnation and enjoyed in the Holy Spirit but to be consummated only at the last day: "Now the dwelling of God is with men, and he will live with them. They will be his people, and God himself will be with them, and be their God" (Rev. 21:3). This ultimate immanence, however, cannot be known and enjoyed by sinners merely in virtue of the divine omnipresence (Rev. 21:8). We are received into God's eternal presence only as we have first received God present to us in Jesus Christ (John 1:12).

G. W. BROMILEY

See also GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF; GOD, DOCTRINE OF.

Preterition. A word derived from the Latin praeter, meaning beyond or past, and praeteritus, meaning that which is passed over. In theology it is used to refer to God's passing over of the nonelect, whom he allows to go their own way and perish for their sins. Webster's Dictionary says that it is a doctrine of Calvinism, but this would not seem to be the case, for Calvin spoke in terms of reprobation. It was, however, used by theologians who followed Calvin in the seventeenth century, such as those who composed the Westminster Confession of Faith. In it the stress is laid upon man's decision and action rather than on God's decree. Paul seems to speak of this in Romans 9:22–23, but as a preliminary to God's hardening and condemnation of the sinner.

W. S. REID

See also ELECT, ELECTION; PREDESTINATION; REPROBATION.

Bibliography. A. A. Hodge, Commentary on the Westminster Confession of Faith.

Pretribulation Rapture. See RAPTURE OF THE CHURCH.

Prevenient Grace. See GRACE.

Priest, Christ as. See OFFICES OF CHRIST.

Priesthood. The term priest is identical in origin with the word presbyter, which literally means "elder"; but in the English language it has become associated for the most part with the religious official whose main function is the offering up of sacrifices, though the English Reformers of the sixteenth century hoped that the retention of the term priest in the Book of Common Prayer would effect the restoration of its proper meaning of "elder." This confusion was occasioned by the strange fact that the English language has not kept in common usage any term corresponding to the Latin sacerdos, which precisely designates one who offers up sacrifices (hence "sacerdotal"). In the English of the OT and NT "priest" denotes a sacerdos and a "priesthood" his sacerdotal ministry. Thus the duty belonging to priesthood is defined in Hebrews 5:1 as follows: "Every high priest is selected from among men and is appointed to represent them in matters related to God, to offer gifts and sacrifices for sins"; and on the basis of this principle it is argued concerning the priesthood of Christ that "so it was necessary for this [priest] also to have something to offer" (Heb. 8:3). The Christian doctrine of priesthood and of the relationship between the priesthood of the OT and that of the NT is most fully expounded in the Epistle to the Hebrews, which has been called "the Epistle of Priesthood."

The Necessity of Priesthood. It is the universal sinfulness of man which makes a sacrificing priesthood a necessity. The sacrifices offered up effect, or symbolize the means of effecting, reconciliation between sinful man and his holy Creator. The function of priesthood, accordingly, is a mediatorial function. The giving of the law through Moses and the institution of the Aaronic or Levitical priesthood belong together. Law and priesthood are simultaneous in origin and inseparable in operation (Heb. 7:11–28). The reason for this is that the Israelites, like the rest of mankind, were sinners and therefore when confronted with the law, which is God's standard of righteousness, lawbreakers. Certainly the God-given law is holy and just and good and spiritual (Rom. 7:12, 14) and as such marks out the way of life: by faithfully keeping its precepts a man shall live (Lev. 18:5; Neh. 9:29; Matt. 19:16–17; Rom. 10:5; Gal. 3:12). But man's radical problem is that he is a sinner. The law shows him up for what he is, a lawbreaker, and “the wages of sin is death” (Rom. 6:23; cf. Ezek. 18:4, 20; Gen. 2:17). Consequently Paul writes, “The very commandment that was intended to bring life actually brought death” (Rom. 7:10)—not that there is anything wrong with the law; the fault is in man who breaks the law (7:13). Hence the necessity for the formulation of the law to be accompanied by the institution of a priesthood to mediate redemptively between God and the sinner who has broken his law, and who needs to be restored from death to life.

OT Priesthood. The priesthood of the old covenant could not effect the reality of reconciliation portended by its sacrificial function. Its character was preparatory; it portrayed the principle of propitiatory sacrifice but not the fulfillment of that principle. Its imperfection, which aroused the longing for and the expectation of the provision of the perfect priesthood, was apparent for the following reasons. (1) In the midst of its activity a new priesthood of a different order, that of Melchizedek, was prophetically spoken of (Ps. 110:4). If the existing priesthood had been perfect, there would have been no point in announcing another order of priesthood (Heb. 7:11–28). (2) During the period when the old or Mosaic covenant was in operation the promise of a new covenant was given, the inauguration of which would mean the placing of God’s law in the hearts of his people and the removal of their sins forever (Jer. 31:31–34). Clearly, “if there had been nothing wrong with that first covenant, no place would have been sought for another” (Heb. 8:7). (3) The very multiplicity of the priests of the old order involved the necessity for a priestly succession because in endless sequence they were carried away by death” (7:23). This pointed to the need for a priest whose priesthood was perfect and everlasting, one who would be “a priest for ever” (Ps. 110:4). (4) Not only were the priests of the old order mortal, they were also sinful and thus themselves in need of redemption and reconciliation. Consequently, before offering sacrifices for the people they were obliged to offer sacrifices for their own sins—an action which plainly attested the imperfection of their priesthood (Heb. 5:3; 7:27). (5) The endless repetition of the sacrifices offered by the priesthood of the old order itself demonstrated the inadequacy of those sacrifices to deal fully and finally with sin. Had the perfect sacrifice for all time and all eternity been offered, they would have ceased to be offered: their repetition was a mark of their incompetence (10:1–2). (6) The very nature of these sacrifices gave further evidence of their inability to achieve what they foreshadowed. The animals offered up were slain in the sinner’s stead, symbolizing the transference of his sin to an innocent victim and his atonement by the substitutionary death of that victim. But an irrational, uncomprehending brute beast can never be a proper substitute for man, who is made in the image of God. That is why “it is impossible for the blood of bulls and goats to take away sins” (10:4).

Christ as Priest. The purpose of the old order of priesthood was to teach the people that atonement for sins requires the provision of an innocent victim in the sinner’s place and the shedding of blood as that victim dies the death due to the sinner. The Levitical order could not accomplish this atonement, but it kept alive the expectation of the coming of the perfect priest and the offering of the perfect sacrifice in fulfillment of the gospel promises contained in the Scriptures of the OT. The new order of priesthood is that of Melchizedek, and it is comprehended in the single person of our Redeemer Jesus Christ (Heb. 7). The perfection of his priesthood is confirmed by the fact that it is forever (Ps. 110:4), that the sacrifice he offered is once for all (Heb. 7:27), and that, his work of atonement completed, he is now enthroned in celestial glory (Heb. 1:3; 10:12; 12:2). The perfection of his priesthood is established by the sinlessness of his earthly life as the incarnate Son, our fellow human being. This means that in contrast to the first Adam, who suffered defeat and dragged down the human race in his fall, Jesus, “the last Adam” (1 Cor. 15:45, 47), took our humanity to himself in order to redeem it and to raise it in himself to the glorious destiny for which it was always intended. It means that in going to the cross he who was without sin took our sins upon himself and suffered the rejection and the death due us sinners, “the righteous for the unrighteous” (Heb. 4:15; 7:26–27; 1 Pet. 2:22–24; 3:18), as the innocent victim provided by God’s grace and mercy (1 Pet. 1:18–19). And it means, further, that he is not only our sacrificing priest but also the sacrifice itself, for it was himself that he offered up for us, and thus in him we have the provision of the perfect substitute, a genuine equivalent, our fellow man (Heb. 2:14–15), who truly takes our place. Accordingly we are assured that by the will of God “we have been made holy through the sacrifice of the body of Jesus Christ once for all,” who “by one sacrifice . . . has made perfect forever those who are being made holy” (Heb. 10:10, 14).

The new order of priesthood fulfilled in the single person of Christ has, of course, completely superseded the old order. With Christ as our one great high priest who lives forever there is now no place or need for any succession of sacrificing priests. Now that he has offered up the one perfect sacrifice of himself there is room for no other sacrifice nor for any repetition of sacrifices. In Christ both priesthood and sacrifice have been brought to fulfillment and to finality.

The Priesthood of Believers. There remains, however, a priesthood which belongs to those who through faith have been united to Christ.

Priesthood

This has commonly been designated “the priesthood of all believers.” Thus Peter describes Christians as “a holy priesthood” whose function is to offer “spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God through Jesus Christ” (1 Pet. 2:5; cf. v. 9). These spiritual sacrifices are not in any sense redemptive sacrifices but are sacrifices of gratitude to God for the one all-sufficient redemptive sacrifice of Christ’s self-offering at Calvary for us sinners. Thus we are exhorted to “offer your bodies,” i.e., ourselves, “as living sacrifices, holy and pleasing to God” (Rom. 12:1); and as we willingly offer ourselves we express our spiritual priesthood in acts of praise and thanksgiving and in the selfless service of our fellow men as we minister to their needs. The exercise of this priesthood is summed up in the words of Hebrews 13:15–16: “Through Jesus, therefore, let us continually offer to God a sacrifice of praise—the fruit of lips that confess his name. And do not forget to do good and to share with others, for with such sacrifices God is pleased.”

In his celebrated essay “Christian Ministry,” J. B. Lightfoot not only insists that “as individuals, all Christians are priests alike,” he also draws attention to the fact that in the ministerial offices enumerated in 1 Corinthians 12:28 and Ephesians 4:11 “there is an entire silence about priestly functions: for the most exalted office in the Church, the highest gift of the Spirit, conveyed no sacerdotal right which was not enjoyed by the humblest member of the Christian community.” His affirmation concerning the kingdom of Christ in the opening paragraph of the essay is no less emphatic: “Above all it has no sacerdotal system. It interposes no sacrificial tribe or class between God and man, by whose intervention alone God is reconciled and man forgiven. Each individual member holds personal communion with the Divine Head. To him immediately he is responsible, and from him directly he obtains pardon and draws strength.” These words of a great churchman and NT scholar admirably present the position of the apostolic church on the subject of priesthood. P. E. HUGHES

See also OFFERINGS AND SACRIFICES IN BIBLE TIMES; OFFICES OF CHRIST; PRIESTS AND LEVITES.

Bibliography. R. Brown, Priest and Bishop: Biblical Reflections; C. C. Eastwood, Priesthood of All Believers; A. Murray, Jesus Christ: Prophet Priest; G. Ogden, New Reformation: Returning the Ministry to the People of God; J. Scholer, Proleptic Priests: Priesthood in the Epistle to the Hebrews.

Priests and Levites. During the OT period the tribe of Levi had particular responsibility for the continuing religious life of Israel. The tribe was divided into two groups, each with distinctive areas of responsibility. (1) The priests, who were the descendants of Aaron, held the principal responsibility for the conduct of worship, initially in the tabernacle and later in the temple. (2) The remainder of the Levites were support staff, being responsible for the maintenance of the temple establishment and certain supplementary religious duties.

The Biblical Period. The priesthood was established by Aaron and his sons in the time of Moses, when Israel’s religion was formally instituted in the covenant of Mount Sinai. Aaron, the first high priest, had principal responsibility for the conduct of Israel’s worship, for the tabernacle, and for all the sacrifices and festivals that pertained to the continuing religious life of the people. Certain responsibilities were delegated to his sons, who functioned as priests. The office of high priest and the priesthood in general were transmitted throughout OT times on a hereditary basis.

The Levites held less prominent positions but were equally essential in the maintenance of Israel’s religious life. They performed a variety of duties, including the service and maintenance of the temple, teaching in the temple, providing music (orchestral and choral) for worship, and various other tasks related to the continuing life of worship in Israel.

The high priest, though initially simply the “greatest priest among his brethren” (the literal sense of Lev. 21:10), came to assume a position of considerable prestige and power in Israel, particularly after the temple was established in Jerusalem and played a central role in the nation’s religious life.

In the NT there are frequent references to priests and Levites; they are referred to as servants of the Jerusalem temple and members of the religious establishment. In most matters their functions were the same as in OT times, but the nature of the high priesthood had changed. Though the office had originally been hereditary and held by the descendants of Aaron (and later of his descendant Zadok), by the midsecond century B.C. the office had become in effect the priest who was, among other responsibilities, president of the Sanhedrin and a small group of chief priests. The latter group included former high priests as well as members of influential priestly families.

With the eventual destruction of Jerusalem’s temple in A.D. 70, the tradition of priests and Levites came to an end in the Jewish religion. Their principal reason for existence had been the religion of the temple. Without the temple their purpose was gone, and their role as religious leaders within the Jewish community passed into the hands of the rabbis, just as the temple was replaced by the centrality of the synagogue.

Theological Significance. The idea of priesthood is to be interpreted in the context of Israel’s religion as a whole. The essence of that religion can be described by the word “relationship,” specifically the relationship existing between God and Israel that was given formal expression in the covenant. The priests and Levites were the servants of that covenant relationship and were given the role of mediators. Though their mediatory role functioned in two directions, in representing God to his people and vice versa, it was the latter role that was most significant. In leading Israel’s worship, assisting in the offering of the people’s sacrifices, maintaining the temple, and similar duties, they dedicated their entire existence to the spiritual leadership of Israel and the representation of Israel before God. The distinctive responsibility of the high priest—that of entering the holy of holies once each year on the day of atonement—brings out clearly the priestly role as a whole. Standing before the mercy seat, the high priest sought God’s forgiveness and mercy for the entire nation (Lev. 16:1–19), for without God’s mercy and forgiveness the covenant relationship with Israel could not continue from year to year.

P. C. CRAIGIE

See also OFFERINGS AND SACRIFICES IN BIBLE TIMES; PRIESTHOOD.

Bibliography. R. Abba, IDB 3:876–89; A. Cody, History of Old Testament Priesthood; J. A. Emerton, “Priests and Levites in Deuteronomy,” VT 12:129–38; G. E. Wright, “Levites in Deuteronomy,” VT 4:325–30.

Princeton Theology, Old. The dominant theology of American Presbyterianism, and one of the most influential theologies in all the United States, from the founding of Princeton Seminary in 1812 until the reorganization of that institution in 1929. The first professor at Princeton Seminary, Archibald Alexander, epitomized a great deal of the Princeton tradition in his own life. He was a person of piety and Christian warmth, but his main emphases in theology were the reliability of Scripture and the ability of human reason to understand Christian truth. His intellectual sources were Calvin, the Westminster Confession and Catechisms, the Swiss theologian François Turretin, and the Scottish philosophy of common sense. And he, like his successors, was sensitive to trends and fashions in American religious life. His best-known work was a defense of the Bible, Evidences of the Authenticity, Inspiration, and Canonical Authority of the Holy Scriptures (1836).

Alexander’s pupil, Charles Hodge, extended the Princeton point of view during his fifty-six years at Princeton Seminary. Hodge’s particular concerns were taught to thousands of students, expressed regularly in the Biblical Repertory and Princeton Review, and were finally written down in his Systematic Theology (1872–73). Although he shared many of Alexander’s concerns—to proclaim the glory of God, the regenerating power of God’s grace in Christ, the helplessness of man apart from God’s effectual call, and the all-sufficiency of Scripture—Hodge had a fuller place in his theology for the work of the Holy Spirit. He was also a more effective polemicist in expounding a traditional Calvinism against innovations in American theology.

Although Hodge lived into the period when modernism was beginning to challenge Christian orthodoxy, his theology was most concerned with the errors of Roman Catholicism and the modifications of Calvinism proposed by New England Congregationalists. Hodge’s successors, on the other hand, were called upon to deal with the issues posed by liberalism. Hodge’s own son, Archibald Alexander Hodge, and Benjamin B. Warfield addressed these critical issues forthrightly, especially where they concerned the Bible. In a famous essay of 1881 A. A. Hodge and Warfield joined to declare that the “original autographs” of Scripture were absolutely without error in everything that they affirmed. Subsequent debate over the nature of Scripture, which continues to the present, has obscured the fact that Warfield in particular made theological contributions on many other fronts. One of the most acute theological minds of his generation, Warfield wrote penetratingly on the person and work of Christ, the contributions of Augustine and Calvin, and the values of the Westminster Confession. He was also a sharp critic of all kinds of Christian perfectionism.

The last of the major Princeton theologians was J. Gresham Machen, student of Warfield and teacher of NT at Princeton Seminary for over twenty years. Machen, like Warfield, was a theologian of wide interests who also became best known as a defender of traditional orthodoxy. His Christianity and Liberalism (1923) was one of the strongest twentieth century statements against modernistic trends in American churches. No less a critic than Walter Lippmann called it a “cool and stringent defense of orthodox Protestantism.” Yet Machen was not successful in preserving his point of view at Princeton. After the Princeton board was reorganized to the disadvantage of the conservatives in 1929, Machen left to help found Westminster Theological Seminary in Philadelphia. With him went a theological tradition stretching back to Archibald Alexander.

The impact of the Princeton theology lives on at Westminster Seminary, at other seminaries of conservative Presbyterian bodies, and in the confessional Presbyterian denominations. Amongst these groups, however, Reformed influences from Europe, especially Holland, have diluted the insistence upon evidentialist apologetics and an inductive approach to truth which were so characteristic of the Princeton theologians. In the meantime their influence has also been widely extended to other groups who have made extensive use of Princeton arguments to defend the inerrancy of the Bible. This Princeton defense of Scripture—in combination with dispensationalism, an emphasis on “higher Christian living,” and a general reaction to modernism—was one of the important elements in the American fundamentalism of an earlier day. M. A. NOLL

Princeton Theology, Old

See also ALEXANDER, ARCHIBALD; HODGE, ARCHIBALD ALEXANDER; HODGE, CHARLES; MACHEN, JOHN GRESHAM; WARFIELD, BENJAMIN BRECKINRIDGE.

Bibliography. Biblical Repertory and Princeton Review: Index Volume from 1825 to 1868; W. A. Hofecker, Piety and the Princeton Theologians; D. N. Livingstone, Darwin's Forgotten Defenders: The Encounter between Evangelical Theology and Evolutionary Thought; M. A. Noll, Charles Hodge: The Way of Life; Princeton Defense of Plenary Verbal Inspiration; M. A. Noll, ed., Princeton Theology, 1812–1921; J. C. Vander Stelt, Philosophy and Scripture: A Study in Old Princeton and Westminster Theology; D. F. Wells, Reformed Theology in America.

Principalities and Powers. The apostle Paul appears to have taken this expression from late Jewish apocalyptic thought, where it was applied to intermediate beings lower than God and higher than man. Apart from passages where the reference is unmistakably to human authorities (Rom. 13:1–5; Titus 3:1), principalities (archai) and authorities (exousiai) or powers (dynameis) refer to cosmic intelligences, occasionally angelic, but usually demonic (Rom. 8:38; 1 Cor. 15:24; Eph. 1:21; 3:10; 6:12; Col. 1:16; 2:10; 2:15). Other similar spirit powers are dominions (kyriotes, Eph. 1:21; Col. 1:16), thrones (thronoi, Col. 1:16), and the rulers (archontes) of this age (1 Cor. 2:6). It is not possible on the basis of NT evidence to rank these spirit powers or to attribute distinctive meanings to each. On the contrary, Paul was impatient with such questions in his letter to the Colossians, where he refuted the heresy of angelolatry.

Six acts in the drama of the principalities and powers may be delineated:

1. Creation. In the creation plan these powers were designed as good spirits. They were created by Christ and subjected to his lordship (Col. 1:16).

2. Fall. For reasons undisclosed in the NT some spirit powers separated from Christ (Jude 6) in a rupture of cosmic proportions (2 Pet. 2:4), necessitating atonement (Col. 1:20).

3. Defeat by Christ. In his ministry Jesus resisted satanic temptation (Luke 4:1–13) and conquered evil spirits (Luke 4:35), delegating this power to his disciples (Mark 3:15). In his death he disarmed the forces of evil (Col. 2:14–15). In his resurrection and exaltation he subjected them to his lordship (Eph. 1:20–22; 4:8; 1 Pet. 3:22). Christians are enthroned with Christ and share this victory and ought to live accordingly (Col. 2:20–3:4).

4. Learning. The spirit powers, who are not omniscient, learn the manifold wisdom of God by witnessing the historic experience of the church (Eph. 3:10).

5. Continuing warfare. Although defeated and under instruction, the spirit powers have not yet surrendered. The vestiges of their power continue to corrupt the disobedient (Eph. 2:2). The Christian's most powerful and deceitful enemies are still demonic (6:12), but God's power is stronger (6:10–11) and no evil power will separate the Christian from the love of God (Rom. 8:38–39).

6. Total defeat. The days of this warfare are numbered and the outcome certain. With the consummation of the kingdom of God the evil powers will be robbed of all malignant efficacy (1 Cor. 15:24).

A new understanding of principalities and powers has been supported with increasing confidence by scholars since World War II. Historian E. G. Rupp applies the expression to economic, social, and political structures. His justification is that the same helplessness felt by “little people” when events move too quickly for them may be described mythically in terms of demonic powers (as in the NT) or sociologically in terms of dehumanizing structures (as today). G. B. Caird applies the term to the powers of the state, legal religion, and nature. H. Berkhof maintains that while borrowing the expression from Jewish apocalyptic, Paul demythologized it: he viewed principalities and powers not as heavenly spirits but as earthly structures. Influenced by Berkhof, J. H. Yoder identifies the powers with abstract religious, intellectual, moral, and political structures that have absolutized themselves and demand unconditional loyalty. On the cross Jesus, who in his life was not the slave of any power, law, custom, community, institution, value, or theory, destroyed the powers' pretensions to sovereignty, thus making authentic living possible.

This new understanding has been questioned by John Stott and P. T. O'Brien. They insist, first, that the principalities and powers must be supernatural beings, since they are confronted by Christ “in the heavenly places” (Eph. 1:20; 3:10; 6:12). Second, the Christian's warfare is specifically said to be “not with flesh and blood but with principalities and powers” (Eph. 6:12). Third, Jesus believed in angels and exorcism, although it was not inevitable that he should; the Sadducees did not (Acts 23:8).

In spite of Yoder's claim that the new scholarly understanding is the product of a cultural empathy greater than any since the apostolic age, this tendency to identify the principalities and powers with human or abstract, impersonal forces is probably the result of cultural presuppositions determining exegesis. It is more likely that traditional cultures (e.g., the Melanesian), where spirit-worship is common, are better placed to understand Paul's meaning.

It is possible, however, that Paul intended his reference to thrones, dominions, principalities, and authorities in Colossians 1:16 to embrace earthly as well as heavenly powers (J. B. Lightfoot). The matter invites further research. But for the present, while allowing that all human systems are wide open to corruption from demonic forces, it is safest to avoid identifying principalities and powers with sociopolitical structures.

F. S. PIGGIN

See also DEMON, DEMONIZATION.

Bibliography. C. E. Arnold, Powers of Darkness: Principalities and Powers in Paul's Letters; H. Berkhof, Christ and the Powers; G. B. Caird, Principalities and Powers: A Study in Pauline Theology; G. Delling, TDNT 1:479-84; A. N. S. Lane, ed., Unseen World; J. B. Lightfoot, Saint Paul's Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon; G. H. C. Macgregor, "Principalities and Powers: The Cosmic Background of St. Paul's Thought," NTS 1:17-28; J. Michel, in Encyclopedia of Biblical Theology 2:712-16; P. T. O'Brien, "Principalities and Powers and Their Relationship to Structures," RTR 40:1-20; E. G. Rupp, Principalities and Powers; H. Schlier, Principalities and Powers in the New Testament; J. R. W. Stott, God's New Society: The Message of Ephesians; J. H. Yoder, Politics of Jesus.

Priscillianism. The movement is named after its originator, Priscillian of Avila, although he probably did not share the views of his successors on the nature of the Trinity. Priscillian himself was a talented layman who began to organize independent Bible study groups in which self-denial and a deeper spiritual life were emphasized, along with the need to know the power of the living Word. Women were encouraged to participate in these meetings and to exercise their gifts in ministry. Many attached themselves to this movement. Even bishops and other clergy gave their support. Priscillian's emphasis on celibacy, however, ran afoul of the church, which confused his teaching with Manichaeism and condemned his doctrines at the Council of Sargossa in 380. He was nevertheless ordained as bishop of Avila amid growing controversy. Ultimately, after unsuccessful appeals to Pope Damascus and Ambrose of Milan, Priscillian laid his case before the Emperor Maximus and was beheaded, along with six of his followers, at Triers in 385. This appears to have been the first Christian execution for heresy and caused him to be venerated as a martyr, especially in Galicia.

It is not always easy to separate the beliefs of Priscillian from those of his later followers. Priscillian himself wrote a series of canons that appear in many texts of the Vulgate Bible. He divided the Pauline epistles (in which he included the Epistle to the Hebrews) into a series of texts on theological points and wrote an introduction to each. These canons survived in a form edited by Peregrinus, who considered them an indispensable aid in the study of Scripture. They contain a strong call to a life of personal piety and asceticism, including vegetarianism, teetotalism, and celibacy. Slavery and sexual differences are abolished in Jesus Christ, and the charismatic gifts of all believers affirmed. The elect were called to combat the devil and his evil powers, and to enter into a knowledge of the deep mysteries of God.

Priscillian and his followers placed considerable emphasis upon apocryphal works, which they did not regard as canonical but rather as helpful to the spiritually minded who could discern truth from error. Thus apocryphal writings are quoted significantly in Priscillianist writings. Generally ascribed to the Priscillianist school are the prologues to the four Gospels as they are found in many Old Latin texts. These are strongly monarchian in theology and do not allow for clear distinction between the persons of the Godhead. In 1889 G. Schepss published a series of eleven treatises which he had discovered at Wurzburg. Although the text named Priscillian as the author, it seems more probable that these treatises were written by one of his supporters. They too contain a strong emphasis on Bible study, an allegorical interpretation of Scripture, asceticism, and the unity of God rather than the Trinity. Christ is frequently referred to as "Christ-God" and is called "unbegettable."

Closely related to the Wurzburg treatises in both content and thought is a ninth-century manuscript of an anonymous treatise, On the Trinity. Father and Son are declared to be names for the same person, with Father representing mind and Son word. There is also a fragment of a letter by Priscillian which is quoted by Orosius, a decidedly hostile witness.

The critics of Priscillianism accused the movement of astrology, sorcery, dualism, Manichaeism, Sabellianism, modalism, and outright lying. The strong following of women led to charges of sexual orgies. Priscillianists were also said to teach that preexistent human souls were attached as a punishment to the body, which was the creation of the devil. Thus the bodily humanity of Christ was denied, and fasting instituted on Christmas Day and Sundays. Priscillianism continued at least until 563, when it was officially condemned by the Council of Braga.

R. C. KROEGER AND C. C. KROEGER

See also MONARCHIANISM.

Bibliography. H. Chadwick, Priscillian of Avila; J. Chapman, Notes on the Early History of the Vulgate Gospels.

Probabiliorism. See CASUISTRY.

Probabilism

Probabilism. In moral theology probabilism is the doctrine that where a solid probable opinion favors liberty for a line of action, it may be followed even though a more probable opinion is against it. Originating in the fourteenth century, the view was first developed in the sixteenth under the Dominican Medina. It was adopted by the Jesuits (especially Suárez) and led to considerable laxity where only slight probability was accepted as sufficient. Reaction came in seventeenth-century France with Pascal and the Dominicans, the latter favoring probabiliorism, i.e., that only a more probable opinion is to be followed. However, probabilism reestablished itself under Liguori, was adopted with some safeguards by the restored Jesuits after 1814, and is still the predominant teaching in the Roman Catholic Church.

G. W. BROMILEY

See also CASUISTRY.

Problem of Evil. See EVIL, PROBLEM OF.

Procession of the Spirit. See FILIOQUE.

Process Theology. Theology based on process philosophy devised by Albert North Whitehead (1861–1947), and published first as Process and Reality in 1929. Whitehead began his career as a mathematician in Cambridge, England. After accepting a chair in philosophy at Harvard, Whitehead embarked on his new metaphysics, incorporating ideas stemming from the vast paradigm shifts in physics, mathematics, and philosophy that had occurred in the previous half century or more. These included the understanding of indeterminacy from quantum mechanics, equivalence of energy and matter from relativity theory, and process from evolutionary biology.

Process metaphysics reflects a non-static, evolving, creative, subjective reality, and the new science, as opposed to the older models based on Greek thought and Newtonian mechanics. These latter incorporated passive, mechanical, hierarchical, and dualistic descriptions of what is. The older model may be linked to the world as a set of billiard balls, interacting as inviolable units; the newer as a river, always moving, the identity of streams and eddies maintained in constant interaction and progression.

Hence the first distinction in process thought is in the mode of connection. All units of being, from the atom or cell up to self-conscious human beings, have a measure of awareness, or “prehension” of all impinging influences. This feeling is generated not just by means of external efficient causality, but more importantly at a subjective inner level. Prehension increases from being almost non-existent in the atom to the unique subjectivity of the human consciousness. The other important characteristic of process thought is that identity is maintained over time not by some dualistic essentialist properties of soul or spirit, but in a series of momentary “actual occasions,” or events—entities are in a continuous process of creation and perishing. An actual occasion begins by prehension—or subjective feeling—of all past influences which become “objects” for a particular occasion. The entity then attempts to unify and harmonize these influences. Most entities and influences have a built-in tendency to conserve or to repeat themselves. But in the moment of “conrescence,” as the actual occasion moves from influence to harmonization, there is a point of separation from the rest of reality—and this is an opportunity for creativity and is the locus of all freedom. Actual occasions come to a harmonious climax in part by selection and blending of the past and partly by the influence of the possible future, also prehended by the entity. Future possibilities are made known to the occasion by God who “lures” but does not force each occasion toward greater complexity and harmony. God is the source of all values, understanding the most advantageous future for all entities. The energy released as the conrescence is achieved propels the occasion into the future, where it in turn becomes an object for further occasions. Thus identity is communal and corporately derived, reflecting the participation of the totality of people and other units in an entity’s past and possible future. Subjective immortality is achieved by each actual occasion as it is prehended by and incorporated into God. The past and the future are the domain of two different poles; all reality from the most basic unit to the highest, God, is dipolar, constituting a physical pole and a mental pole. The physical pole is not strictly speaking something material, but is that aspect of the unit which prehends or feels the past as object or given. The mental pole harmonizes the past in conjunction with an understanding of possibility in the future.

God also has two poles, the primordial and the consequential. God perfectly prehends the whole world and moves to participate in the created world—or divine material pole—via the initial aims or divine lures in each actual occasion. Although the process God is eternal, transcendent, and necessary in the primordial pole, this God is also limited and contingent in the consequential pole. The future is thus open to God as it is to us.

Ironically, Whitehead was originally an atheist but later realized that he needed God to make sense of his system. Beginning in the 1960s increasing numbers of theologians have adopted the otherwise obscure philosophy as a theological framework. Important names in this project include John Cobb, Charles Hartshorne, David Griffin, and Schubert Ogden. They claimed that behind the God of orthodoxy lay an implicit and outmoded metaphysics. And they appreciated the process accommodation, not just to evolutionary ideas but to those of physics as well. Moreover, many theologians thought that the luring, process God better approximated to the ever-relating, agape God of the Bible than did the traditional impassive deity, and process appeared to solve the problem of evil by demolishing a sovereign God. Sin, for example, in the process model, constitutes blocking out the lure of God and accepting destructive elements of the past into the new occasion of the present moment, as the actual occasion attempts to harmonize itself with previously dislocated fragments of being. High and low Christologies have been developed, but they share in common an understanding of Christ as perfectly aligned in his subjective aim with the lure of God. Scripture becomes a particular kind of propositional lure. Process thinking has been very influential in recent decades, especially the work done at the Center for Process Thinking in Claremont, California. Feminists, for example, see in process a theology that counters the perceived one-sided transcendent patriarchal God of orthodoxy and the perceived tyrannies of essentialism. Scientists, like Ian Barbour, applaud the evolutionary and organic explanations of process. Ecologists affirm process philosophy's description of our multiple interconnectedness.

Assessment. Process thinking's most important point of departure from historic Christian faith is partly contingent and limited deity, acting only as lure, and without knowledge of the future. Moreover, process separates God from evil, by denying sovereignty, but fails to explain the causes of radical sin and evil.

The evangelical theologian Royce Gruenler has argued that the process model is flawed because the partially finite God gathers data from all occasions simultaneously—in contravention of the laws of physics. He argues also that a God who is locked out of the individual moments of concreteness of each individual is not the biblical God. Neither is it clear exactly how much freedom the process model allows; what hope does the tiny moment of concreteness have against the lure of God and the totality of the past?

But process can also be applauded for its attempts to find a common basis for science and theology, and in its fruits, which include a sincere attempt to build a world more cognizant of our multiple interconnections and fragilities in areas as diverse as economics, ecology, and world peace. More recently, evangelical Stephen Franklin has rendered an appreciative critique, noting that process affirms—with evangelicals—the “telos drenched” character of all nature, but he is not sure that process theology and evangelicalism will ultimately mix.

Process theology and metaphysics have been appropriated almost entirely by liberal Christians, but we must ask if this connection with liberalism is necessary. There is as yet no evangelical consensus on whether the uniqueness of Christ and an adequate theology of God, redemption, and revelation can be built upon a modified process framework. Interesting also to evangelicals are some connections with older evangelical thinkers like Jonathan Edwards, who had a similar Berkleyan metaphysics of identity, and similar notions of virtue as a kind of harmony and beauty.

N. HOGGARD-CREEGAN

See also PANENTHEISM; PANTHEISM; WHITEHEAD, ALFRED NORTH.

Bibliography. I. Barbour, Religion in an Age of Science; J. Cobb, Christian Natural Theology; J. Cobb and D. Griffin, Process Theology; T. de Chardin, Divine Milieu; D. Griffin, Process Theology; R. Gruenler, Inexhaustible God; C. Hartshorne, Divine Relativity; C. Keller, From a Broken Web; S. Ogden, Point of Christology; M. Suchocki, God-Christ-Church.

Promise. The English word “promise” derives directly from the Latin promissa, meaning exactly what our word means, “a declaration or assurance made to another person with respect to the future stating that one will do or refrain from some specified act, or that one will give or bestow some specified thing, usually in a good sense implying something to the advantage or pleasure of the person concerned” (Oxford English Dictionary). Actually, no word in the Hebrew or Greek Scriptures has this exact meaning. The word generally translated “promise” in the OT is dābar, rendered “speak” over eight hundred times, or “say” more than one hundred times—to talk, to utter, to pronounce. When these pronouncements embrace the idea of something promised, the word is so used, e.g., in the ordinary promises of men to men, and especially the promises of God to the people of Israel (Deut. 1:11; 6:3; 9:28; 15:6; 19:8) or to one particular individual, as to Solomon (1 Kings 5:12).

In the NT the word is epangelia, which in the overwhelming number of instances is simply translated “promise,” as a noun and in its verbal form. The root of this word, angelia, means something announced; angelos, the announcer or the messenger; and euangelia, a message of good tidings. On rare occasions the word is used of some promise of man to man, as in Acts 23:21. Its occurrences in the NT may be gathered into three groups. There are, first, the frequent references to God's promises to Abraham concerning an heir (Rom. 4:13–16, 20; 9:8–9; 15:8; Gal. 3:16–22; 4:23; Heb. 6:13–17; 7:6; 11:9, 11, 17). Abraham believed these promises, and they were repeated to his patriarchal descendants Isaac and Jacob, through whom the promised seed should come. The relationship of Christian believers to the promises in Abraham will be considered later.

Promise

The second major theme of these promises is David's seed, the promised Savior (Acts 13:23). This promise to David of a Savior has been confirmed in Christ (Acts 13:32). It is to this group that we must assign Paul's allusion to "the promise by faith in Jesus Christ" (Gal. 3:22). It is probable that this dual grouping of promises, those to Abraham concerning a seed and those to David concerning a king to reign, are united in Paul's references to this subject as "the promises made to the patriarchs" (Rom. 15:8); in his discussion of Israel's future, he refers to the Israelites as "the children of the promise" (Rom. 9:8–9) and reminds them that they are the ones who possess the promises of God (Rom. 9:4). Closely associated with this is the gift of God promised to us in Christ, that is, the promise of life in Christ (2 Tim. 1:1), or, as elsewhere expressed, "the promised eternal inheritance" (Heb. 9:15), or, as John wrote, "this is what he promised us—even eternal life" (1 John 2:25).

The third group of promises concerns the gift of the Holy Spirit after our Lord's ascension, never referred to as a promise until after the resurrection (Luke 24:49; cf. Acts 1:4; 2:33; Eph. 1:13).

Other subjects related to the promises of God are mentioned only incidentally in the NT: the promise of rest (Heb. 4:1); the fulfillment of the promises of a new heaven and a new earth (2 Pet. 3:13; from Isaiah 65:17 and 66:22); the promise of the resurrection (Acts 26:6); "the first commandment with a promise," regarding obedience of children to their parents (Eph. 6:2, from Exod. 20:12).

There is some similarity between promise and prophecy. So, e.g., the frequently used phrase "the promises to Abraham, and to Israel" for the most part refers to the prophecies given to Abraham and the patriarchs, beginning with Genesis 12:1–3 (see Rom. 9:4, 8; 15:8; Gal. 3:16–22, 29). But there are some notable differences: (1) All promises relate to the desirable, the good, that which blesses and enriches, while some prophecies refer to judgments, destructions, invasions, the appearance of enemies of Christ, such as the little horn, the man of sin, etc. (2) Promises ordinarily have a more general scope than prophecies, often including the entire human race—though we realize that all mankind is involved in some prophecies also—thus, the fifth commandment is called "the first commandment with a promise" (Eph. 6:2) and would seem to refer to all who obey this command. So likewise the promise of life (1 Tim. 4:8; 2 Pet. 1:4). (3) Promises have a more continuous fulfillment, generation by generation, than do most prophecies, as in the often repeated phrase, "the promise of the Father" or "the promise of the Holy Spirit" (Luke 24:49; Acts 1:4; 2:33, 39; Gal. 3:14; Eph. 1:13). While there are prophecies relating to Palestine, it is never called "the land of prophecy," but "the land of promise" (Heb. 11:9), and continues to be that down through the ages even though disobedience forfeits for a time the fulfillment of the promise. (4) Many promises are conditional, dependent upon obedience to the word of God, as the Beatitudes, but most prophecies are unconditional and ultimately will be fulfilled. (5) Generally the concept of promise embraces many utterances of God, as in the phrase "he has given us his very great and precious promises" (2 Pet. 1:4), whereas prophecies are ordinarily directed to more specific events or individuals.

W. M. SMITH

See also HOPE; PROPHECY, PROPHET.

Bibliography. J. Bright, Covenant and Promise; F. F. Bruce, ed., Promise and Fulfillment; E. Hoffmann, NIDNTT 3:68–74; W. G. Kümmel, Promise and Fulfillment; J. Jeremias, Jesus' Promise to the Nations; H. Lockyer, All the Promises of the Bible; J. Schniewind et al., TDNT 2:576–86.

Prophecy, Gift of. See SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

Prophecy, Prophet. The word "prophet" comes from the Greek prophētēs, from pro ("before" or "for") and phēmī ("to speak"). The prophet is thus the one who speaks before in the sense of proclaim, or the one who speaks for, i.e., in the name of (God).

In the OT there are three terms for the prophet: rō'eh, nābī', and hōzeh. The first and last are distinguished by nuances bearing on the habitual or temporary character of the vision. Nābī' (he who witnesses or testifies) best characterizes the prophetic mission.

Prophetic Inspiration. The originality of biblical prophecy derives from the phenomenon of inspiration. As distinct from the sacral figures of pagan antiquity the biblical prophet is not a magician. He does not force God. On the contrary, he is under divine constraint. It is God who invites, summons, and impels him—e.g., Jeremiah 20:7.

By inspiration God speaks to the nābī', who has to transmit exactly what he receives. The mode of inspiration is verbal. The Bible depicts the mechanism of inspiration as the act by which God puts words (verba) in the mouth of the sacred writers. God said to Moses: "I will raise them up a prophet from among their brethren, like unto thee, and will put my words in his mouth" (Deut. 18:18). Similarly to Jeremiah: "I have put my words in your mouth" (Jer. 1:9). The NT confirms the verbal nature of prophetic inspiration (cf. 1 Cor. 15:1–4; Gal. 1:11–12; 1 Thess. 2:13; 4:8).

Yet inspiration does not suppress individuality. It is the miracle of theopneustia (2 Tim. 3:16). To communicate his thoughts to men, God uses men of different culture, character, and status in order that his word might be accessible to all men. Inspiration safeguards individuality (cf. Moses in Exod. 3–4; Jeremiah in Jer. 20:14–18, etc.).

The Prophets. The writing prophets of the OT are well known. They are usually divided into the four major (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel) and the twelve minor (Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi) according to the length of their writings.

In addition there were many other prophets. Moses, who wrote the law of God, was regarded as a nābi' without equal (Deut. 34:10–12). Prophetic voices were also raised in the days of the judges (Judg. 3:9–11; 4:4; 6:8; 1 Sam. 3:1). Samuel came as a second Moses (Ps. 99:6; Jer. 15:1), and his work was continued by Gad and Nathan (2 Sam. 12 and 24; 1 Kings 1). After the separation of the ten tribes Ahijah (1 Kings 11:29; 14:2), Elijah, and Elisha (1 Kings 18–19; 2 Kings 5–9) call for particular mention.

After four centuries of prophetic silence John the Baptist is the last of the prophets of the old covenant and the precursor of Jesus (Mark 1:2–8; cf. Matt. 3:7–12; Luke 3:16–18; John 1:23, 29). In addition to the Baptist, the NT also refers to a prophetic ministry exercised by both men and women. After Pentecost, mention is made of Agabus (Acts 11:28; 21:10), Jude and Silas (Acts 15:32), and the four daughters of Philip (Acts 21:8–9). We might also cite Anna the daughter of Phanuel (Luke 2:36).

The Prophetic Message. The prophecies of the writing prophets of the OT may be divided into three main groups: (1) Prophecies concerning the internal destiny of Israel. These declare the judgment of God on the unbelief and iniquities of the people, but promise restoration after the testing period of the exile. (2) Messianic prophecies. These point to the coming Redeemer of Israel and the world. They attain an astonishing clarity and precision in the case of Micah (5:1–2) and especially Isaiah. The latter gives us a striking summary of the saving life and work of Christ (52:13–53:12). (3) Eschatological prophecies. These refer to the last days when the kingdom of God will be set up on earth.

From a different standpoint we might adopt the following classification. (1) Prophecies already fulfilled. Two examples are the exile, announced by Hosea, Amos, and Micah in the case of northern Israel (deported to Assyria in 722 B.C.) and Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Hosea, Amos, and Micah in the case of Judah (exiled in Babylon in 586 B.C.), and of course the coming of Christ himself. (2) Prophecies in process of fulfillment. A good case in point is the restoration of the modern state of Israel. According to some students of prophecy Jeremiah 31:31 (cf. Isa. 27:12–13; Ezek. 37:21) found miraculous fulfillment on May 15, 1948, and the physical resurrection of the Israelite nation, as yet incomplete, is a new and up-to-date guarantee that other prophecies will come to realization. (3) Prophecies not yet fulfilled. We may refer to four. The first is the total recovery of Palestine by all the tribes of Israel (Isa. 27:12–13; Jer. 31:1–5; Ezek. 37:11–14; etc.). The second is the destruction of Israel's enemies (Isa. 17:1–3; Jer. 30:11; Ezek. 38–39). The third is the collective conversion of Israel (Ezek. 37:6b, 10; Zech. 14:4–5; 12:10). The fourth is the establishment of the kingdom of God on earth. Many prophecies describe the coming of the Messiah, the King of Israel, and the restoration of humanity to righteousness, peace, and happiness under his rule (cf. Isa. 2:4; 11:1–10; 65:19–23), the reconstitution of nature (Rom. 8:19–21), and the reestablishment of converted Israel in the prerogatives of its original vocation (cf. Isa. 49:6; 55:4–5; Joel 2:28–32; Hab. 2:14; Zech. 8:23; Rom. 11:15). Before the kingdom of God is set up, the earth will be the scene of the return and temporary reign of the Messiah (cf. Rev. 20:2b–3, 4b) and Israel will be God's instrument (Zech. 8:13) for the conversion of the nations.

Prophets and Prophecy of the NT Period. The names of early Christian prophets are few (Acts 11:27–28; 15:30–32; 21:10; Martyrdom of Polycarp 12:3; 16:2), yet these prophets were nonetheless powerful persons within the church who spoke the word of the risen Lord with authority: (1) Their presence and activity were widespread (cf. Acts 20:23 with 21:10–11). (2) They worked within the framework of the church, perhaps becoming active only when Christians were at worship (Hermas, Mandate 11:9; Acts 13:1–2). (3) They ranked in importance second only to the apostles (1 Cor. 12:28–31; Eph. 4:11), and with them they were considered the foundation upon which the church was built (Eph. 2:20). (4) They belonged to and worked out from bands or brotherhoods which could be considered exclusive groups of charismatics (Acts 11:27; 13:1; 1 Cor. 12:29; Rev. 19:10; 22:9; cf. Barnabas 16:9). (5) They were people whose minds were saturated with the OT Scriptures. Their prophetic utterances thus were influenced by and couched in the language of the Bible (Acts 7; cf. Rom. 11:27 with Isa. 27:9; 1 Cor. 15:51, 54–55, with Isa. 25:8; Hos. 13:14). (6) Their ministry was distinguished from that of apostle, miracle worker, etc. (1 Cor. 12:28–29), but closely associated with that of teacher (Acts 13:1; Rev. 2:20). Their ministry also included prediction, revelation, identifying specific persons for specific Christian tasks and even equipping them with the spiritual gifts necessary to carry out these tasks (Acts 11:27–28; 13:1–2; 1 Tim. 4:14). (7) They were people whose words and actions were especially prompted by the

Prophecy, Prophet

Spirit (Acts 11:27–28; 21:11; Herman, Mandate 11:8–9; Didache 11:7).

NT prophecy, therefore, was of more than one kind. It included prophetic words given for the improvement, encouragement, consolation, and general benefit of the Christian community (1 Cor. 14:3–4). But it also included another dimension, related directly to a special work of the Spirit upon the prophet by which the Spirit revealed to the prophet a word from the risen and exalted Christ (cf. John 16:12–14; Rev. 1:10 with 4:1–2a). This part of the prophet's ministry was the result of a direct revelation of an aspect of the divine mind hitherto unknown (Eph. 3:5; Rev. 10:7; 22:6). Like OT prophecy, this new prophetic message was an immediate communication of God's (Christ's) word to his people through human lips (cf. Rev. 16:15; 22:7; see also Rev. 2–3).

Since the prophet was such an authoritative figure and was held in such high regard by the people, abuses were bound to set in. Christ himself predicted that such abuses would arise (Matt. 24:11, 24). Eventually it became necessary for the church to establish regulations that would control not only the prophet's dress and teaching (1 Cor. 11:4; 14:29–30), but also how long he could stay in any one place without being judged a false prophet (Hermas, Mandate 11:1–21; Didache 11).

A. LAMORTE AND G. F. HAWTHORNE

See also SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

Bibliography. C. E. Armerding and W. W. Gasque, eds., Guide to Biblical Prophecy; D. E. Aune, Prophecy in Early Christianity and the Ancient Mediterranean World; E. Boring, "How May We Identify Oracles of Christian Prophets in the Synoptic Tradition?" JBL 91:501–21; "Influence of Christian Prophecy," NTS 25:113–23; M. Buber, Prophetic Faith; A. B. Davidson, Old Testament Prophecy; W. D. Davies, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism; J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus and the Spirit; "Prophetic 'I' Sayings and the Jesus of Tradition," NTS 24:175–98; E. E. Ellis, "Luke 11:49–51: An Oracle of a Christian Prophet?" ExpT 74:157; Prophecy and Hermeneutic in Early Christianity; "Role of the Christian Prophet in Acts," in Apostolic History of the Gospel, W. W. Gasque and R. P. Martin, eds.; "'Spiritual' Gifts in the Pauline Community," NTS 20:128–44; E. Fascher, TDNT 6:828–61; W. A. Grudem, Gift of Prophecy; A. Guillaume, Prophecy and Divination among the Hebrews and Other Semites; G. F. Hawthorne, "Christian Prophecy and the Sayings of Jesus," Society of Biblical Literature Seminar Papers 2:105–24; D. Hill, New Testament Prophecy; "On the Evidence for the Creative Role of Christian Prophets," NTS 20:262–74; J. Lindblom, Prophecy in Ancient Israel; J. M. Meyers and E. D. Freed, "Is Paul Also among the Prophets?" Int 20:40–53; J. F. A. Sawyer, Prophecy and the Prophets of the Old Testament; J. Skinner, Prophecy and Religion; W. R. Smith, Prophets of Israel; A. C. Welch, Prophet and Priest in Old Israel; L. J. Wood, Prophets of Israel.

Prophet, Christ as. See OFFICES OF CHRIST.

Propitiation. The turning away of wrath by an offering. In the NT this idea is conveyed by the use of hilaskomai (Heb. 2:17), hilasterion (Rom. 3:25), and hilasmos (1 John 2:2; 4:10). In the OT the principal verb is kipper, usually rendered in the LXX by exilaskomai. Outside the Bible the word group to which the Greek words belong unquestionably has the significance of averting wrath. But in recent times it has been suggested that the biblical usage is different. C. H. Dodd argues strongly that when the word group occurs in the LXX and the NT it denotes expiation (the cancellation of sin), not propitiation (the turning away of the wrath of God). He denies that "the wrath of God" denotes anything more than a process of cause and effect whereby disaster inevitably follows sin.

For a criticism of his arguments see the works by Nicole and Morris in the bibliography. Here it is sufficient to notice that neither Dodd nor others who argue for "expiation" seem to give sufficient attention to the biblical teaching. The idea of the wrath of God is stubbornly rooted in the OT, where it is referred to 585 times. The words of the hilaskomai group do not denote simple forgiveness or cancellation of sin, but that forgiveness or cancellation of sin which includes the turning away of God's wrath (e.g., Lam. 3:42–43). This is not a process of celestial bribery, for the removal of the wrath is in the last resort due to God himself. Of the process of atonement by sacrifice, he says: "I have given it to you" (Lev. 17:11). Note also Psalm 78:38: "Time after time he restrained his anger."

While God's wrath is not mentioned as frequently in the NT as the OT, it is there. Man's sin receives its due reward, not because of some impersonal retribution, but because God's wrath is directed against it (Rom. 1:18, 24, 26, 28). The whole of the argument of the opening part of Romans is that all men, Gentiles and Jews alike, are sinners, and that they come under the wrath and the condemnation of God. When Paul turns to salvation, he thinks of Christ's death as hilasterion (Rom. 3:25), a means of removing the divine wrath. The paradox of the OT is repeated in the NT that God himself provides the means of removing his own wrath. The love of the Father is shown in that he "sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins" (1 John 4:10 NASB). The purpose of Christ's becoming "a merciful and faithful high priest" was "to make propitiation for the sins of the people" (Heb. 2:17 NASB). His propitiation is adequate for all (1 John 2:2).

The consistent Bible view is that the sin of man has incurred the wrath of God. That wrath is averted only by Christ's atoning offering. From this standpoint his saving work is properly called propitiation.

L. L. MORRIS

See also ATONEMENT; WRATH OF GOD.

Bibliography. C. H. Dodd, Bible and the Greeks; H. G. Link et al., NIDNTT 3:145–76; L. Morris, Apostolic Preaching of the Cross; “Meaning of HILASTERION in Rom III.25,” NTS 2:33–43; R. Nicole, WmTJ 17:117–57.

Protestantism. In its broadest sense Protestantism denotes the whole movement within Christianity that originated in the sixteenth-century Reformation and later focused in the main traditions of Reformed church life—Lutheran, Reformed (Calvinist/Presbyterian), and Anglican-Episcopalian (although Anglicanism par excellence claims to be both Catholic and Protestant)—and later still other traditions or denominations, Baptist, Methodist, Pentecostal, and many others, down to modern African Independent churches.

The term derives from the “protestation” submitted by a minority of Lutheran and Reformed authorities at the German Imperial Diet at Speyer in 1529 in dissenting from a clampdown on religious renewal. The “protestation” was at once objection, appeal, and affirmation. It asked urgently, “What is the true and holy Church?” and asserted: “There is no sure preaching or doctrine but that which abides by the Word of God. According to God’s command no other doctrine should be preached. Each text of the holy and divine Scriptures should be elucidated and explained by other texts. This Holy Book is in all things necessary for the Christian; it shines clearly in its own light, and is found to enlighten the darkness. We are determined by God’s grace and aid to abide by God’s Word alone, the holy gospel contained in the biblical books of the Old and New Testaments. This Word alone should be preached, and nothing that is contrary to it. It is the only truth. It is the sure rule of all Christian doctrine and conduct. It can never fail or deceive us.”

Lutherans and other advocates of reform thus became known as Protestants. The English word originally had the force of “resolute confession, solemn declaration,” standing for gospel truth against ecclesiastical corruption. “Essentially Protestantism is an appeal to God in Christ, to Holy Scripture and to the primitive Church, against all degeneration and apostasy.” The narrowing of “Protestant” to mean anti- or non-Roman has led some to prefer “Evangelical” (though in continental Europe this normally designates Lutherans) and “Reformed” (more commonly used of Calvinist Presbyterians).

Fundamental Principles. The fundamental principles of sixteenth-century Protestantism included the following:

Soli Deo Gloria, “Glory to God Alone”: the justification of God’s wisdom and power against papal usurpation and religion of human devising, honoring God’s sovereign transcendence and providential predestination.

Sola Gratia, “By Grace Alone”: redemption as God’s free gift accomplished by Christ’s saving death and resurrection. This was articulated chiefly in Pauline terms as justification by faith alone, as in the Augsburg Confession: “We cannot obtain forgiveness of sin and righteousness before God by our own merits, works or satisfactions, but receive forgiveness of sins and become righteous before God by grace, for Christ’s sake, through faith, when we believe that Christ suffered for us and that for his sake our sin is forgiven and righteousness and eternal life are given to us.” Assurance of salvation is therefore a mark of Protestant faith, grounded in the promise of the gospel and released from all pursuit of merit.

Sola Scriptura, “Scripture Alone”: the freedom of Scripture to rule as God’s word in the church, disentangled from papal and ecclesiastical magisterium (authoritative teaching office) and tradition. Scripture is the sole access to Christian revelation. Although tradition may aid its interpretation, its true (i.e., spiritual) meaning is its natural (i.e., literal) sense, not an allegorical one.

The Church as the Believing People of God: constituted not by hierarchy, succession, or institution, but by God’s election and calling in Christ through the gospel. In the words of the Augsburg Confession, it is “the assembly of all believers among whom the gospel is preached in its purity and the holy sacraments are administered according to the gospel.” The sacraments appointed by Christ are two only—baptism and the Lord’s supper—and may be spoken of as “visible words,” reflecting the primacy of preaching in Protestant conviction.

The Priesthood of All Believers: the privileged freedom of all the baptized to stand before God in Christ “without patented human intermediaries” and their calling to be bearers of judgment and grace as “little Christs” to their neighbors. Pastor and preacher differ from other Christians by function and appointment, not spiritual status. (Later Protestantism has forgotten this perhaps more than any other foundation principle.)

The Sanctity of All Callings or Vocations: the rejection of medieval distinctions between secular and sacred or “religious” (i.e., monastic) with the depreciation of the former, and the recognition of all ways of life as divine vocations. “The works of monk and priest in God’s sight are in no way whatever superior to a farmer laboring in the field, or a woman looking after her home” (Luther). None is intrinsically more Christian than any other—an insight obscured by phrases such as “the holy ministry.”

Protestant Developments. Protestantism has developed a distinctive ethos in each of the several traditions derived from the Reformation and also within the historical, cultural, and geographical variations of each. On some issues, such as the manner (not the reality) of Christ's presence in the supper, Protestants have disagreed from a very early stage, while agreeing in rejecting transubstantiation and the sacrifice of the mass and insisting that living faith alone feeds upon Christ's flesh and blood. On others, such as church order, diversity of practice has not always involved disagreement in principle. In this and other areas Protestantism's scriptural principle has itself been articulated in different ways, both to sanction the retention of traditions (e.g., episcopacy) not repugnant to Scripture (a typically Lutheran and Anglican approach) and to debar from the church's life anything not explicitly warranted in Scripture (a tendency of Reformed Protestantism implemented most consistently by Puritanism and some derivative traditions). Nothing has so much promoted the disunity of Protestantism as the inroads of post-Enlightenment rationalism and its offspring in theological liberalism and modernism, which have gravely eroded Protestantism's Reformation and biblical foundations.

Protestantism

Another pattern of Reformation in the sixteenth century, generally called Anabaptist or Radical despite its diversity, sought to restore the precise shape of apostolic Christianity. Pentecostalism has a similar aim, along with other movements, including some Baptists and (Plymouth) Brethren. Some African Independent churches have pursued a restorationist approach even to the OT. Although Anabaptism gave birth to no major Protestant tradition (but note the Mennonites), its rejection of the Constantinian state-church and all its works (which had been endorsed by all three primary Protestant traditions) became in time the common property of most of Protestantism, especially outside Europe. (E. Troeltsch has stressed the revolutionary significance of later Protestantism's abandonment of its early ideal of an all-embracing church-civilization, a reformed Christendom.) The Anabaptist "protestation," though persecuted by the authoritarian or "magisterial" Protestants—Lutheran, Reformed, and Anglican—is increasingly regarded as a parallel pattern of pristine Protestantism, with perhaps more to contribute to its future than any other pattern.

Despite its divisions the community of Protestantism is still discernible in cross-denominational movements—e.g., missionary expansion, Bible translation, biblical criticism and modern theological study, welfare and relief agencies, and the ecumenical movement itself. Protestants are also held together by common convictions, chief among them the acceptance of the Reformation as an indispensable part of their history. For no Protestants does this exclude a lineage going back to the apostles, but continuity with patristic and medieval Christianity would be variously prized in different Protestant traditions.

Protestantism's scriptural principle finds expression in the axiom ecclesia reformata sed semper reformanda—"a church reformed but always needing reformation." Subjection to the Word of God means that no traditions or institutions, secular or religious, not even Reformation or Protestant ones, can be absolutized. Paul Tillich regarded "the Protestant principle" as "the prophetic judgment against religious pride, ecclesiastical arrogance and secular self-sufficiency and their destructive consequences." This was nobly exemplified in the Barmen Declaration of the Confessing Church in Nazi Germany ("Confessing" here being a good modern synonym of sixteenth-century "Protestant"). Intellectually, "the co-operation of uninhibited inquiry and religious faith, of theology and science, is possible only on Protestant territory where all human traditions and institutions stand open both to man's scrutiny and to God's" (J. H. Nichols). Finally, Protestantism seeks to draw its life from the gospel of God's grace in Christ. True to its heritage it can tolerate no do-it-yourself Christianity, no ground for human self-confidence before God's face. It will ultimately always value the Christ of faith more than the church of history.

Yet the identity of Protestantism is increasingly vulnerable. The old mainstream denominations in the West are in rapid decline, worldwide evangelicalism to some degree inherits the Protestant mantle, and rapprochement with, and conversion to, Catholicism and Orthodoxy are newly appealing. Without a firm doctrinal backbone, Protestantism faces continuing dissipation.

D. F. WRIGHT

See also REFORMATION, PROTESTANT.

Bibliography. C. S. Carter and G. E. A. Weeks, eds., Protestant Dictionary; J. Dillenberger and C. Welch, Protestant Christianity Interpreted through Its Development; G. W. Farell, Protestant Faith; R. N. Flew and R. E. Davies, eds., Catholicity of Protestantism; K. Heim, Nature of Protestantism; E. G. Léonard, History of Protestantism; M. E. Marty, Protestantism; J. H. Nichols, Primer for Protestants (later Meaning of Protestantism); W. Niesel, Reformed Symbolics: A Comparison of Catholicism, Orthodoxy and Protestantism; S. Ozment, Protestants: The Birth of a Revolution; W. Pauck, Heritage of the Reformation; P. Schaff, History of the Creeds of Christendom; P. Tillich, Protestant Era; E. Troeltsch, Protestantism and Progress; J. S. Whale, Protestant Tradition.

Providence of God. "Providence" is one of the words which do not occur in the Bible but which nevertheless truly represent a biblical doctrine. There is no Hebrew equivalent for "providence," and the Greek word translated thus, pronoia, is used only of human foresight (Acts 24:2; Rom. 13:14; for the verb pronoieō, see Rom. 12:17; 2 Cor. 8:21; 1 Tim. 5:8). Rather, the Bible used ad hoc words like "gives food to every creature" (Ps. 136:25), or "he makes springs pour water into the ravines" (Ps. 104:10), expressing in concrete situations God's mighty acts toward his children.

We must resist the temptation to think about providence generally and independently of Christ. It would be possible to draw on certain Psalms and the Sermon on the Mount, for example, to make up a doctrine of God's relationship to his creation that had nothing to do with Jesus Christ. But since it is in Christ that this relationship is established, an attempt to understand it apart from him would be a misinterpretation from the start. In Jesus Christ, God has set up the relationship between himself and his creatures, promising to carry through his purpose in creation to its triumphal conclusion. The primal relationship with Adam, renewed with Noah (Gen. 8:21–22), is no less in Christo than the covenant with Abraham or Moses. The Mediator who is the incarnate Word establishes this relationship, and in him God becomes the God of people and they become his people. (The Mediator must also be regarded as setting up the relationship between God and his creatures other than people.) As their God, he will take up the responsibility for their earthly existence.

The doctrine of providence may be viewed from three different aspects.

1. The creation is the stage on which are enacted God's dealings with humankind. Providence is God's gracious outworking of his purpose in Christ which issues in his dealings with humankind. We are not at this point slipping over into the doctrine of predestination, but are saying that from the beginning God has ordered the course of events toward Jesus Christ and his incarnation. From the biblical point of view world history and personal life stories possess significance only in the light of the incarnation. The squalid little story of lust in Judah's dealings with Tamar (Gen. 38) falls into its place in the genealogy of the Messiah (Matt. 1:3). Caesar Augustus was on the throne in Rome for the sake of the unknown baby in its manger.

2. According to Acts 14:17; 17:22–30; and Romans 1:18–23, God's providence served also the purpose of bearing witness to God among the heathen. God's fatherly care was a sign, pointing toward himself. Romans 1:20 makes it clear that the purpose of this witness of providence was simply to render man inexcusable for not knowing God. At this point also, therefore, providence is included in the doctrine of reconciliation.

3. The God who gives man life also preserves him while he is on the earth. God is not a God of the soul alone, but of the body also. In Matthew 6:25–34 the disciples are reminded (by their Creator himself) of their creaturely relationship to God, and are freed from all anxiety about their earthly future. The other creatures (as exemplified by the birds and the wildflowers) have been set in a definite relationship to God which he faithfully maintains by caring for their needs. Will God bestow less care upon humans, to whom he has given a higher place in the creation (cf. Ps. 8:6–8)? Men therefore "glorify their Creator . . . by a daily unquestioning acceptance of His gifts" (D. Bonhoeffer, Cost of Discipleship, 154). Behind this doctrine lies the almighty and loving freedom of God.

In sum, the doctrine of providence tells us that the world and our lives are not ruled by chance or by fate but by God, who lays bare his purposes of providence in the incarnation of his Son.

T. H. L. PARKER

See also GOD, DOCTRINE OF.

Bibliography. K. Barth, Church Dogmatics; D. Basinger and R. Basinger, eds., Predestination and Free Will: Four Views of Divine Sovereignty and Human Freedom; G. C. Berkouwer, Providence of God; J. Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion; W. T. Davison, "Providence" in HERE 10:415–20; W. Eichrodt, Theology of the Old Testament; B. Farley, Providence of God; J. G. Tasker and H. H. Hutson, "Providence" in HDB 813; P. Helm, Providence of God; H. Heppel, Reformed Dogmatics; W. B. Hunter, God Who Hears; C. S. Meyer and H. T. Mayer, eds., Caring God: Perspectives on Providence; C. H. Pinnock, ed., Grace of God, the Will of Man: A Case for Arminianism.

Prudence. See CARDINAL VIRTUES, SEVEN.

Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite. See DIONYSIUS THE PSEUDO-AREOPAGITE.

Psychology and Christianity. Trying to understand the relation of Christian faith to other fields of scholarship has absorbed the energies of many Christian thinkers over the centuries (see VandeKemp, 1984). Psychology as a distinct academic discipline emerged in a European context little more than a hundred years ago. In that time period, it has grown to a position of incredible influence in the broader Anglo-American milieu. Indeed, this sustained trend has provoked strong responses ranging from considerable ambivalence and outright opposition, to wholesale embrace of the discipline as a science or even worldview and lifestyle (see Jones and Butman, Modern Psychotherapies). There is a growing consensus in the past four decades that a more judicious and balanced approach would be a comprehensive appraisal of important psychological insights from a distinctly Christian perspective (see Browning, Religious Thought and Modern Psychologies, or Jones, Psychology and Christian Faith, or Van Leeuwen, Person in Psychology). Seeking to understand the integration of Christian faith with the discipline of psychology in a constructive rather than destructive manner (see Collins, Can You Trust Psychology?, or Evans, Wisdom and Humanness in Psychol- ogy) has become a consuming passion for countless Christian scholars and mental health practitioners (counselors and psychotherapists) throughout the world (see Benner, Baker Encyclopedia of Psychology).

A Typology of Integration. Unfortunately, the term integration has become something of a buzz word in recent years, especially in Christian higher education within the broad evangelical tradition. Bouma-Prediger (“Task of Integration”) offers a wonderfully helpful summary of various ways in which the concept of integration has been used in the literature. Interdisciplinary integration is the tough-minded search for truth within two or more disciplines (e.g., anthropology, history, literature or philosophy). The integration of psychology and theology is the combination most immediately relevant for our purposes. Intradisciplinary integration is the attempt to relate theory and practice within a given discipline or profession. Practitioner-scholars (e.g., psychologists, psychiatrists, or social workers) who take Christian presuppositions seriously and can consistently and correctly apply knowledge and ethics in the consulting room would be exemplars of this approach (McMinn, “Integration as Mission”). Faith-praxis integration is the attempt to live out one’s faith commitment as authentically as possible in everyday life, in other words, to deeply value orthodoxy as well as orthopraxis (the linking together of Christian beliefs and behaviors). Experiential integration focuses on character formation or the healing of persons rather than the refinement of ideas (integration within the self and between the self and God). Collectively, these four distinct approaches to integration might be best understood as an attempt to combine tough-mindedness with tenderheartedness in theory, research, and practice. As Jones and Butman (Modern Psychotherapies, 20) have argued: “(b)ecause the claims of the gospel are all-inclusive and the gospel should penetrate to the core of all who claim the name Christian, the task of integration is that of being distinctly Christian in an appropriate and responsible fashion in one’s scholarly pursuits.”

Stages of Constructive Integration. There are essentially two stages in attempting to constructively integrate Christianity and psychology. In the critical evaluation stage we seek to dialog with the discipline of psychology (and related fields) so as to find what might be of value that is not easily or obviously compatible with a Christian worldview and lifestyle. Usually this results in a less than coherent or comprehensive set of findings. This stage is followed by theory-building, where we seek to propose new hypotheses and theories for careful examination, ideally ones which bear the clear imprint of Christian presuppositions. To date, most of the integrative work has been in the critical evaluation rather than theory-building stage. As a group, evangelical authors have tended to review the available theory and research rather than contribute substantially to it (see Wolterstorff, Reason within the Bounds of Religion). Further, the pursuit of interdisciplinary or intradisciplinary integration has been the primary focus rather than faith-praxis or experiential integration, although some recent trends in academic and clinical training might suggest a possible paradigm shift in the next decade (see Sorenson, “Janusian Integration”).

Criticisms of the Task of Integration. As a discipline, psychology has tended to be rather neutral or even openly antagonistic towards Christianity. Fortunately, more recent scholarship in the psychology of religion (see Hood et al., Psychology of Religion, Paloutzian, Invitation to the Psychology of Religion, or Wulff, Psychology of Religion) has been considerably more open and receptive to the study of religious beliefs and behaviors as they impact important dimensions of the human experience. Obviously, as one gets closer to the “center of existence” (questions of ultimate meaning and significance), the individual and collective impact of sin and deception must be taken very seriously. For many, psychology has become a secular religion, well beyond the realm of careful science and serious scholarship. Especially in the area of applied and professional psychology (counseling and psychotherapy), the field has certain seductive tendencies that can easily ensnare the naïve, immature, or unwise Christian scholar or practitioner (see Jones and Butman, Modern Psychotherapies, 25–30).

Critics of these integrative efforts tend to argue that proponents have either a rather low view of the sufficiency of Scripture (special revelation) or an extremely high view of reason and science (general revelation). More recently, they have been highly critical of the extreme emphasis on self-reflective consciousness or the personal narrative (story). As Jones and Butman have commented: “The critics of integration do not have to look far to find examples of unsubstantiated clinical speculation, sloppy logic, careless biblical interpretation, theological naiveté . . . , and unbridled self-promotion” (29). We would be wise to take these concerns seriously. Human beings should never be reduced to the descriptive data of psychology, nor should theology be limited to a set of logical propositions about God. The dialog between psychology and Christianity will be most profitable when there is a genuine appreciation and respect for the discipline and the faith, and participants are knowledgeable and informed about matters of mutual interest and concern.

Integration is a very complex task, and some healthy caution is certainly in order. Indeed, all truth is God’s truth, but finding that truth can sometimes be a rather elusive reality (see Hill and Kauffmann, "Psychology and Theology"). Competing standards for verifying truth certainly exist in psychology and increasingly so in contemporary expressions of Christianity. What is especially needed right now is a clear and steady grasp of sound Christian thinking, and a thorough knowledge of the best classic and contemporary understandings of psychological science. Obviously, this will require careful scholarship, a willingness to engage in active listening and dialog in the context of intentional community, and a desire to balance tough-mindedness (conviction) with tender-heartedness and grace (civility).

The Scope of Psychology. As a discipline, psychology includes the study of such varied topics as the biological bases of behavior, sensation and perception, statistics and research design, states of consciousness, learning and motivation, human development across the life span, styles of emotional and interpersonal expressiveness, intelligence and personality assessment, coping and adjustment, mental illness and physical health, organizational and human factors in work settings, and consultation and treatment strategies for promoting change and well-being.

Of these many topics, the study of personality, psychopathology (abnormality), and psychotherapy have been major foci in the contemporary integrative dialog. Many of the themes discussed in the psychological literature clearly parallel concerns raised for centuries in the vast literature on pastoral care and spiritual formation. Apart from these important foci, enduring themes in the discipline include our understanding of stability versus change, the role of nature versus nurture, and the tension between rationality and irrationality. Entire recent issues of the Journal of Psychology and Christianity (see Summer 1996) and the Journal of Psychology and Theology (see Winter 1995 or Spring 1997 or Summer 1997) explored important issues and trends in integration from a wide variety of evangelical perspectives. Other journals from a broader scientific or religious perspective include International Journal for the Psychology of Religion, Journal for the Scientific Study of Religion, Research in the Social Scientific Study of Religion, Journal of Psychology and Judaism, Review of Religious Research, Journal of Religion and Health, and Pastoral Psychology.

Clearly, much thoughtful work on the interface between psychology and Christianity is readily available to the interested reader. The majority of that material has a strong therapeutic emphasis and is vitally concerned about facilitating health and wholeness as well as it is with reducing pain and suffering. More than a dozen evangelical institutions now exist that offer academic and clinical training in professional psychology at the doctoral level (see Sorenson, "Janusian Integration"). Hundreds of Christian counseling centers offer services throughout North America. At their best, providers of services at those settings combine a sincere faith and clinical excellence. Countless others offer services in the wider community in the public or private sectors. Those vitally interested in making the message of the Bible both clear and relevant to contemporary needs in our society would be wise to reflect on the deeper meaning and significance of these sustained efforts.

The Scope of Integration. Integration appears to be more caught than taught (the tremendous importance of modeling truth in word and deed). The growing interest in faith-praxis and experiential integration seems to especially support this assertion. Postmodernism, no doubt, has significantly impacted integrative thinking. Notions of truth-seeking and objective verification have shifted noticeably, making it challenging to achieve consensus on what it means to discern God's truth in the interface between special revelation and natural revelation.

With reference to modeling, there is also growing consensus in the literature that integration must be consistently expressed through the character of the integrator, his or her sheer competence, and commitment to genuine compassion towards others. Integration must be more than an intellectual endeavor (only), and obviously more than impression-management. Both intellectual and interpersonal congruence (integrity) are crucial. "Embodied integration" (Farnsworth, "Devil Sends Errors in Pairs"), then, needs to be both tough-minded and tender-hearted.

Integrative efforts need to reflect an appreciation for verbal, affective (emotional), social-relational and transcendental (contemplative) modes of expression. Through much of this century, the literature in integration has had a strong Reformed theological orientation. In the past two decades, the impact of pietistic, Anabaptist, and Anglo-Catholic thinking and practice has been significant. The recent special issues of the Journal of Psychology and Christianity and the Journal of Psychology and Theology have reflected the more inclusive theological diversity of the broad Reformational heritage, and incredible variety of contemporary Christian worship and expression.

At their best, integrative efforts should be driven by an insatiable desire for our Creator God, to "know as we are known." In a very real sense, good education can be a spiritual journal and perhaps even an act of worship. This dialog increasingly seems to include honest intellectual seekers whose worldviews may be other than Christian (see Van Leeuwen, Person in Psychology). Especially encouraging has been the publication of articles in mainstream psychological journals by Christian scholars that promote a convicted civility in the ongoing dialog. Suffice it to say that a large number of the issues facing both Christian and secular psychologists today have more to do with the daily challenge of promoting shalom (reconciliation) in human relations and organizational settings than they do with any apparent differences in world views or lifestyles (see Farnsworth, "Devil Sends Errors in Pairs").

Possible Future Directions. Hill and Kauffmann assert that integrative efforts to date are far from complete: "(w)e need those who will help us clear up the Babel of confusing words, direct us towards reasonable and reliable standards of truth and model reconciliation in a multicultural world" ("Psychology and Theology," 182). Recent decades have seen a tremendous thawing in the once-tense relationship between psychology and Christianity. The upsurge in interest, as evidenced by the sustained demand for clinical services, striking increase in popular and professional books and articles, and proliferation of counseling programs in Christian colleges and seminaries, suggests we are in the midst of a more constructive era of dialog and interdisciplinary integration.

No doubt, tensions remain between psychology and Christianity in a significant number of religious and secular settings. Some of these tensions might be attributed to fundamental confusion about language, differing notions of truth, seemingly incompatible presuppositions, or perhaps even to the lack of reconciliation. In the interim, Christian psychologists and theologians alike should be willing to speak openly about the obvious deficits and incompatibilities, but equally willing to raise formative and substantive concerns about aspects of our Christian traditions and subcultures (see Fenton, Trouble with Barnacles).

R. E. BUTMAN

Bibliography. D. Benner, Baker Encyclopedia of Psychology; S. Bouma-Prediger, "Task of Integration: A Modest Proposal," JPT 18(1):21-31; D. Browning, Religious Thought and Modern Psychologies; G. Collins, Can You Trust Psychology?; S. Evans, Wisdom and Humanness in Psychology; K. Farnsworth, "Devil Sends Errors in Pairs," Journal of Psychology and Christianity 15(2):123-32; H. Fenton, Trouble with Barnacles; P. Hill and D. Kauffmann, "Psychology and Theology: Towards the Challenges," Journal of Psychology and Christianity, 15(2):175-83; R. Hood et al., Psychology of Religion: An Empirical Approach; S. Jones, Psychology and Christian Faith; S. Jones and R. Butman, Modern Psychotherapies: A Comprehensive Christian Appraisal; R. Sorenson, "Janusian Integration," JPT 25(2):254-59; H. Vande Kemp, Psychology and Theology in Western Thought (1672-1965): A Historical and Annotated Bibliography; M. Van Leeuwen, Person in Psychology; N. Wolterstorff, Reason within the Bounds of Religion; D. Wulff, Psychology of Religion: Classic and Contemporary.

Psychology of Religion. Definition. Social scientists have been studying various aspects of Christian faith and practice for more than a century. In the contemporary Anglo-American milieu, there is often keen interest in the understanding of religious phenomena from the viewpoint of contemporary psychology. Broadly defined as the study of religious beliefs and behaviors from a social science perspective (Hood et al., Psychology of Religion), the field raises many important questions that potentially impact our understanding of how best to make the message of the Bible clear and relevant to the needs of humankind. Such aspects as the origins, motivations, expressions, dynamics, development, and effects of religion are all major foci for classic and contemporary scholarship in the field. Although the broad Judeo-Christian tradition has been the primary focus for research since the late nineteenth century, other world religions have been increasingly studied in the past two decades (see Wulff, Psychology of Religion). As Paloutzian (Invitation to the Psychology of Religion, 2) has noted, even "[a] small glance at the prevalence, scope, and effects of religion reveals how sweeping are its influences and how important it is to learn what psychological research has to say about it."

Focus. Scholars differ widely in how they conceptualize or study religious beliefs and behaviors. Some have chosen to focus primarily on religion at the personal level (e.g., how an individual finds a sense of connectedness or completeness in life). Others prefer to study religion at the social or societal levels of analysis (the collective beliefs and practices of a group). Generally speaking, scholars tend to emphasize religious function (individual or group processes) rather than religious substance (individual beliefs or doctrinal statements). Further, researchers and theoreticians tend to emphasize one or more of the important dimensions of religious commitment in their endeavors: (a) religious belief (ideological); (b) religious practice (ritualistic); (c) religious feeling (experiential); (d) religious knowledge (intellectual); and (e) religious effects (consequential). Suffice it to say that there is no widely agreed-upon definition of religion, nor is there widespread consensus on the best study approach (see Paloutzian, Invitation to the Psychology of Religion or Wulff, Psychology of Religion for helpful discussions).

Interdisciplinary Integration. The interest in the scientific study of religion has been especially keen for Christians in the mental health disciplines (psychiatry, clinical psychology, social work, psychiatric nursing, pastoral counseling). Perhaps they see it as an opportunity to gather up that part of fact or truth lost in narrow, interdisciplinary pursuits, or perhaps as a chance to reconcile areas of mutual overlap and concern between the social sciences and Christian theology. They see this integration as the process of verifying the accuracy of God's truths that are discovered through the disciplines of psychology and theology, relating them, and applying them in one's own life (see Jones and Butman, Modern Psychotherapies). In other words, integration consists first of the critique of and comparison of corresponding psychological and theological facts, and second of commitment to them as truths in one's own faith commitment (see Kauffmann, My Faith's OK—Your Faith's Not). Ideally, this process is a dynamic, evolving, and relational activity.

Researchers and theoreticians in the psychology of religion ask a number of complex but exciting questions: What does psychology as a science and profession have to do with religious faith commitments and vice versa? What methodologies are most appropriate for trying to relate psychological and religious perspectives? How do researchers and theoreticians maintain integrity with their faith and discipline so as to avoid a muddled psychology or a mottled Christianity? In what ways can psychology and religion be related in theory, research, and practice? And finally, how can we best serve persons on their journey towards wholeness and promote their growth and development under the Lordship of Jesus Christ?

Historical Overview. The psychology of religion has had at least three distinct phases in the past century: (1) the "psychology of religion" movement, which flourished from 1880 to 1930; (2) the "pastoral psychology" movement, which began in the 1920s and is still strong; and (3) the "psychology and religion" movement, which can be traced back to the 1950s and is still developing.

The first movement was started by psychologists with a strong commitment to the empirical and scientific study of human behavior. Conversion and religious experience were the most frequently studied topics. Perhaps the most significant work to come out of this movement was William James's Varieties of Religious Experience, still the most widely read book in the field. Initially characterized by a profound respect for religion as a human and social enterprise, the movement declined dramatically as more reductionistic and secular works (e.g., Freud's Future of an Illusion) deeply influenced scholarly thinking and activity. Far too often, religion was reduced to psychological dynamics, or the discipline was used to invalidate any expression of even genuine religious commitment.

The second movement traces its roots to the efforts of Anton Boisen, a minister who suffered from a serious mental disorder (psychosis). After a lengthy hospitalization in a psychiatric facility, he regained his mental health and became the first hospital chaplain at a public mental hospital (see his autobiographical Out of the Depths). Eventually, Boisen established clinical pastoral education, a highly influential movement that has trained thousands of clergy to work with struggling persons throughout North America and beyond. Pastoral psychology has flourished for decades, with numerous journals and professional societies. With an applied rather than scholarly emphasis, pastoral psychology has certainly been one of the most influential movements in the church in the twentieth century. Evangelicals have tended to be somewhat suspicious of clinical pastoral education, but numerous parallel developments can be observed.

The third movement can be traced back to the publication of Gordon Allport's Individual and His Religion (1950). Rather than trying to assess the psychological roots of religion or the psychodynamics of religious persons, this approach is more concerned with exploring areas of mutual concern to both psychologists and theologians (e.g., moral development, maturity, dimensions of religiosity, altruism, prejudice). Generally speaking, there is far greater openness to cooperation and cross-disciplinary fertilization. Hood et al., Psychology of Religion, Paloutzian, Invitation to the Psychology of Religion, and Wulff, Psychology of Religion are three outstanding textbooks that reflect this more respectful and humble dialog. Relevant journals include Journal of Psychology and Christianity, Journal of Psychology and Theology, International Journal of the Psychology of Religion, Journal for the Scientific Study of Religion, Review of Religious Research, Journal of Religion and Health, and Pastoral Psychology. Division 36 in the American Psychological Association (Psychology of Religion) is especially active in promoting scholarly endeavors. Clearly, religion is no longer a taboo subject in professional psychology.

Methodology. In recent decades, psychology has become an enormously sophisticated enterprise methodologically (see Hood et al., Psychology of Religion). Generally speaking, research efforts have stressed empirical research strategies (quantitative), although the very nature of religious experience, some argue, necessitates unique, person-oriented or more qualitative methods (see Wulff, Psychology of Religion). Techniques of data collection have included the use of questionnaires, interviews, analysis of biographical material, the use of introspection, direct observation, psychological testing, experimental manipulation, participant-observer study, and longitudinal or cross-sectional analysis of religious attitudes and behaviors. Especially in our postmodern context, notions of what constitute good research and scholarship vary considerably, and the search for truth and objective verification seems more elusive than ever (see Paloutzian, Invitation to the Psychology of Religion).

Religious Orientation. It should be readily obvious to anyone who is deeply involved and invested in the study of religious beliefs and behaviors that people have different expressive styles in the faith. Perhaps the most enduring distinction in the field is between individuals who appear to live their faith (truly informed and consistent believers), and those who seem to use it (belief and effects of religion in practical life are widely inconsistent). For decades, scientists have been comparing and contrasting intrinsic (committed) and extrinsic (consensual) religious orientations, especially as they relate to morally relevant attitudes and behaviors (see Clouse, Teaching for Moral Growth or Kauffmann, My Faith's OK—Your Faith's Not). More recently, the quest orientation (where questions of ultimate meaning and significance are primary concerns) has been the focus of intense dialog and debate (see Garber, Fabric of Faithfulness).

There is little debate now whether or not religious variables can be good (even powerful) predictors for many important human behaviors, including altruism, cognitive complexity, dogmatism, prejudice and subjective religious experience (see Hood et al., Psychology of Religion). Several complex and highly sophisticated scales are now available that measure important dimensions of religious orientation or styles of faith (see Malony, Psychology of Religion for Ministry). It is now possible to be rather precise in characterizing how individuals internalize (incorporate) their religious commitments. The available research evidence suggests that it is certainly possible to show ways in which such diverse variables as age, education, gender, personality, race, and socioeconomic status can all significantly impact religious beliefs and behaviors without being condescending, patronizing, or reductionistic (see Paloutzian, Invitation to the Psychology of Religion or Kauffmann, My Faith's OK—Your Faith's Not).

Psychodynamics and Religion. The growing consensus in the literature is that religion has the potential for being an important resource for coping with the demands of everyday living—and especially so when an individual faces severe health difficulties and life-threatening situations (see Hood et al., Psychology of Religion). At their best, religious beliefs and behaviors offer being meaning, some measure of control, and a sense of self-esteem (efficacy). Prayer, ritual and social support are potentially useful resources that can offer real hope in the midst of intense suffering and pain (see Kauffmann, My Faith's OK—Your Faith's Not).

Attempts to demonstrate that there is a distinctive type of personality that lends itself to being religious have been largely unsuccessful. Furthermore, no consistent trends have emerged that would suggest that a general state of well-being or abnormality can be significantly correlated with religiosity (Paloutzian, Invitation to the Psychology of Religion, 259). Only recently have significant efforts been made to determine whether or not distinctly Christian beliefs and behaviors significantly influence health and well-being (Wulff, Psychology of Religion). A responsible conclusion in the interim would be that religious persons are generally neither better off nor worse off than other persons.

Religious Development. Certain religious beliefs and behaviors appear to change considerably in the course of the life span. This has been well-documented in the literature for decades (Astley and Francis, Christian Perspectives on Faith Development). For example, the religion of children usually develops from the vague to the concrete to the abstract, often following almost predictable stages of increasing cognitive, emotional, and moral sophistication. In the broad Judeo-Christian tradition, adolescence tends to be a period where important questions about the meaning of religious commitments are raised, strongly suggesting that developmental capacities and significant life events impact the striving for a sense of wholeness and completeness (see Clouse, Teaching for Moral Growth, or Gangel and Wilhoit, Handbook of Spiritual Formation). Throughout adulthood, frequency of Bible reading and private prayer appears to increase through the eighth decade, although church attendance can vary widely.

Many important generational differences have been noted in the literature but possible explanations for those changes have been the focus of intense discussions and lively debates. Especially interesting has been the exploration of faith development and spiritual formation across the life span (see Astley and Francis, Christian Perspectives on Faith Development) in cultures throughout the world. In the course of development, particular religious practices may be performed for quite different reasons at different ages, reflecting complex and intertwined personal and social influences. Central to these endeavors has been the attempt to articulate notions of mature faith, where beliefs and behaviors are weaved together in a manner that truly shapes the formation of Christian character, personal and corporate convictions, and investment in a local congregation committed to worship, service, and fellowship (see Garber, Fabric of Faithfulness). Our efforts to go and make disciples in all settings will be significantly thwarted if we fail to consider the ways in which individual differences and developmental realities potentially impact faith development (see Gangel and Wilhoit, Handbook of Spiritual Formation).

Religious Experience. Probably no topic has received more careful attention in this literature during the last century than the study of religious conversion. Generally speaking, three types of belief acquisitions have been described. The sudden conversion type occurs in a very brief time span (minutes, hours). Emotional factors are assumed to play an important role. Conversion is usually followed by a period of intense religious activity that gradually fades over time. The gradual conversion type occurs in a much longer period of time (days, months, years). Intellectual factors are assumed to be of the utmost importance. Involvement in religious activity is much slower and more deliberate, and never reaches the peak of the sudden type. Finally, the religious socialization type is related to an individual's entire life (he or she cannot recall a time of not believing). It is assumed to be related to learning, modeling, and reinforcement. Involvement in religious activity also tends to be gradual and seldom reaches the levels of either the sudden or gradual conversion types. In actual practice, the distinctions are often blurred, perhaps suggesting considerable overlap in the typology. What is clear, however, is the lingering suspicion in the literature that sudden conversions are highly volatile, and more prone to recidivism and relapse (see Malony, Psychology of Religion for Ministry).

There are some wonderfully helpful models of conversion that have been offered in recent decades (see Benner, Psychology and Religion). It might be best to view conversion as an ongoing process of holistic and integrated transformation, mediated by complex and intertwined affective, intellectual, and interpersonal variables. At a minimum, the existing typology might suggest more flexible and inclusive strategies for evangelism and discipleship that respect the mind, minister to the "heart," and seek to promote peace and justice. Finally, Paloutzian (Invitation to the Psychology of Religion, 163–73) has offered some keen insights on the characteristics of cult leaders, on the process of "snapping" and brainwashing in new converts, and on ways to build immunity and resistance to the most destructive aspects of new religious movements.

Mysticism has also been a subject of careful investigation in the field. These altered states of consciousness have been described by religious individuals for centuries, but only recently have they been carefully investigated under more controlled situations (see Hood et al., Psychology of Religion). Besides mysticism, religious faith healing, glossolalia, contemplative prayer, and most of the spiritual disciplines have been carefully researched. The Journal of Psychology and Theology and Journal of Psychology and Christianity often feature research in these important areas from evangelical perspectives.

Conclusion. Religion is certainly more than mere psychological dynamics. A growing number of Christian scholars believe that the behavioral sciences, properly understood, can provide us with many keen insights into the multi-faceted nature of faith (see Jones and Butman, Modern Psychotherapies). Tensions between psychology and religion still exist, but a more respectful and informed dialog appears to have been taking place for at least four decades.

In dialoguing with one another, psychologists and theologians must be careful not to collapse either discipline into the other. Each discipline has its unique tasks and should respect the boundaries of the other. In a very real sense, everyone is a theologian and a psychologist—but not everyone is a good theologian or psychologist. Many now believe that there is an interesting and intimate relationship between the task of saving and healing souls, and the task of rescuing minds, psyches, and personalities from the grip of despair. This is indeed appropriate, because the church should be concerned with the whole person. The psychology of religion, at its best, is an expression of that attempt to bring into the scientific study of religious beliefs and behaviors that kind of mutual respect and understanding.

R. E. BUTMAN

See also PSYCHOLOGY AND CHRISTIANITY.

Bibliography. J. Astley and L. Francis, Christian Perspectives on Faith Development: A Reader; D. Benner, Psychology and Religion; B. Clouse, Teaching for Moral Growth; K. Gangel and J. Wilhoit, Handbook of Spiritual Formation; S. Garber, Fabric of Faithfulness: Weaving Together Belief and Behavior during the University Years; R. Hood et al., Psychology of Religion: An Empirical Approach; S. Jones and R. Butman, Modern Psychotherapies: A Comprehensive Christian Appraisal; D. Kauffmann, My Faith's O.K.—Your Faith's Not: Reflections on Psychology and Religion; H. Malony, Psychology of Religion for Ministry; R. Paloutzian, Invitation to the Psychology of Religion; D. Wulff, Psychology of Religion: Classic and Contemporary.

Punishment. Throughout the Bible it is insisted that sin is to be punished. In an ultimate sense God will see that this is done, but temporarily the obligation is laid upon those in authority to see that wrongdoers are punished. The lex talionis of Exodus 21:23–25 is not the expression of a vindictive spirit. Rather it assures an even justice (the rich and the poor are to be treated alike) and a penalty proportionate to the crime.

Two important points emerge from OT usage. The verb used in the sense of "punish" is pāqad, which means "visit." For God to come into contact with sin is for him to punish it. Of the nouns used, most are simply the words for sin. Sin necessarily and inevitably involves punishment.

In the NT "punishment" is not as common as "condemnation," which may be significant. To be condemned is sufficient. Punishment is implied. The removal of punishment is brought about by the atoning death of our Lord. It is not said in so many words that Jesus bore punishment, unless bearing our sins (Heb. 9:28; 1 Pet. 2:24) be held to mean this. But that his sufferings were penal seems clearly to be the NT teaching.

L. L. MORRIS

Punishment

See also CRIMINAL LAW AND PUNISHMENT IN BIBLE TIMES; ETERNAL PUNISHMENT.

Bibliography. L. Boettner, Immortality; C. Brown, NIDNTT 3:98–100; H. Buis, Doctrine of Eternal Punishment; H. E. Guilleband, Righteous Judge: A Study of the Biblical Doctrine of Everlasting Punishment; L. Morris, Wages of Sin; J. Schneider, TDNT 3:814–17; R. J. Song, NDT 547–49.

Punishment, Everlasting. See ETERNAL PUNISHMENT.

Purgative Way, The. The purgative way or via purgativa refers to the teaching embodied in the classic Christian mystical tradition, especially John of the Cross and Teresa of Ávila, that before one can receive the vision of God one must first purify oneself from all sin and spiritual hindrances. This purification begins with the removal of all outward sin and sensuality (i.e., contrition, sorrow for sin, confession, and amendment of life, according to Luther) and spirals inward through a series of “dark nights” as layer after layer of deeper sins are discovered and confessed. While the classic form of this teaching is found in the monastic and mystical literature, ideas in Protestant literature such as abandonment (Gelassenheit), self-emptying, and brokenness either express or presuppose such a process as basic to the fullest experience of redeemed life. P. H. DAVIDS

See also DARK NIGHT OF THE SOUL; ILLUMINATIVE WAY, THE; JOHN OF THE CROSS; MYSTICISM; TERESA OF ÁVILA; UNIO MYSTICA; UNITIVE WAY, THE.

Bibliography. John of the Cross, Ascent of Mount Carmel; Dark Night of the Soul; W. Nee, Release of the Spirit; C. Williams, Descent of the Dove.

Purgatory. The teachings of the Roman Catholic and Orthodox churches set forth a place of temporal punishment in the intermediate realm known as purgatory, in which it is held that all those who die at peace with the church but who are not perfect must undergo penal and purifying suffering. Only those believers who have attained a state of Christian perfection are said to go immediately to heaven. All unbaptized adults and those who after baptism have committed mortal sin go immediately to hell. The great mass of partially sanctified Christians dying in fellowship with the church but nevertheless encumbered with some degree of sin go to purgatory, where, for a longer or shorter time, they suffer until all sin is purged away, after which they are translated to heaven.

The sufferings vary greatly in intensity and duration, being proportioned in general to the guilt and impurity or impenitence of the sufferer. They are described as being in some cases comparatively mild, lasting perhaps only a few hours, while in other cases little if anything short of the torments of hell itself and lasting for thousands of years. But in any event they are to terminate with the last judgment. Gifts or services rendered to the church, prayers by the priests, and Masses provided by relatives or friends in behalf of the deceased can shorten, alleviate, or eliminate the sojourn of the soul in purgatory.

Protestantism rejects the doctrine since the evidence on which it is based is found in the Apocrypha (2 Macc. 12:39–45). L. BOETTNER

See also INTERMEDIATE STATE; LIMBO.

Bibliography. B. Bartmann, Purgatory; H. Berkhof, Well-Founded Hope; J. L. Goff, Birth of Purgatory; H. W. Luckock, After Death; A. J. Mason, Purgatory; E. H. Plumptre, Spirits in Prison; C. H. H. Wright, Intermediate State and Prayers for the Dead.

Puritanism. A loosely organized reform movement originating during the English Reformation of the sixteenth century. The name came from efforts to “purify” the Church of England by those who felt that the Reformation had not yet been completed. Eventually the Puritans went on to attempt purification of the self and of society as well.

History. The theological roots of Puritanism may be found in continental Reformed theology, in a native dissenting tradition stretching back to John Wycliffe and the Lollards, but especially in the theological labors of first-generation English Reformers. From William Tyndale (d. 1536) the Puritans took an intense commitment to Scripture and a theology that emphasized the concept of covenant; from John Knox they absorbed a dedication to thorough reform in church and state; and from John Hooper (d. 1555) they received a determined conviction that Scripture should regulate ecclesiastical structure and personal behavior alike.

Puritans achieved a measure of public acceptance in the early years of Queen Elizabeth’s reign. They then suffered a series of reverses that lasted through the reigns of her successors James I and Charles I. In the days of James I some Puritans grew discouraged about their reforming efforts and separated entirely from the Church of England. These Separates included the “Pilgrims,” who after a sojourn in Holland established in 1620 the Plymouth Colony in what is now southeastern Massachusetts.

When Charles I attempted to rule England without Parliament and its many Puritan members, and when he tried systematically to root Puritans out of the English church, a larger, less separatistic body emigrated to Massachusetts Bay (1630), where for the first time Puritans had the opportunity to construct churches and a society reflecting their grasp of the Word of God. In England other Puritans continued the struggle for reform. When war with Scotland forced Charles I to recall Parliament in 1640, civil war was the ultimate result. That conflict ended with the execution of the king (1649), the rise of Oliver Cromwell to the protectorate of England, the production of the Westminster Confession and Catechisms, and the erection of a Puritan Commonwealth. Yet Cromwell, for all his abilities, found it impossible to establish a Puritan state. After his death (1658), the people of England asked the son of Charles I to return, a restoration marking the collapse of organized Puritanism in England. Across the Atlantic a vital Puritanism survived only a little longer. By the time of Cotton Mather (d. 1728), Indian warfare, the loss of the original Massachusetts charter, and a growing secularization had brought an end to Puritanism as a way of life in America.

Convictions. Puritanism generally extended the thought of the English Reformation, with distinctive emphases on four convictions: (1) personal salvation was entirely from God, (2) the Bible provided the indispensable guide to life, (3) the church should reflect the express teaching of Scripture, and (4) society was one unified whole.

The Puritans believed that humankind was utterly dependent upon God for salvation. With their predecessors in England and with Luther and Calvin they believed that reconciliation with God came as a gift of his grace received by faith. They were Augustinians who regarded humans as sinners, unwilling and unable to meet the demands, or to enjoy the fellowship, of a righteous God apart from God's gracious initiative. But Puritans also made distinctive contributions to the general Reformed idea of salvation. They advocated a "plain style" of preaching, as exemplified in the masterful sermons of John Dod (1555–1645) and William Perkins (1558–1602), which was consciously designed to point out simply the broad way of destruction and the strait gate to heaven. They also placed a new emphasis on the process of conversion. In the journals and diaries of leaders like Thomas Shepard (1605–49) they charted the slow, and often painful, process by which God brought them from rebellion to obedience. They also spoke of salvation in terms of "covenant." In the notes to the Geneva Bible, the translation of proto-Puritans completed during the reign of Mary Tudor, emphasis was on a personal covenant of grace, whereby God both promised life to those who exercised faith in Christ and graciously provided that faith, on the basis of Christ's sacrificial death, to the elect. Later Puritans expanded the idea of covenant to take in the organization of churches, seen most clearly in the rise of Congregationalism (or Independency) and the structuring of all society under God, of which the "Holy Commonwealths" of Massachusetts and Connecticut were the major examples.

With the early English Reformers the Puritans believed, second, in the supreme authority of the Bible. The use of Scripture, however, soon came to be a great cause of offense between Puritans and their Anglican opponents and among Puritans themselves. Puritans, Anglicans, and the many in between all believed in the Bible's final authority. But Puritans came to argue that Christians should do only what the Bible commanded. Anglicans contended rather that Christians should not do what the Bible prohibited. The difference was subtle but profound. Among Puritans considerable differences eventually appeared over what Scripture demanded, especially in questions relating to the church. Some (mostly in England) contended for a presbyterian state-church organization, others (in Massachusetts and Connecticut) supported a congregational organization in league with the state, while still others (English Independents and Baptists as well as Roger Williams in New England) believed that the Bible mandated congregational churches separate from the state. In short, Puritans disagreed with Anglicans about the way to interpret the Bible, but they differed among themselves about which biblical interpretations were best. The former disagreement dominated English religious life so long as the king and his episcopalian allies were in control. The latter came to the fore after the success of the Puritan Revolution, and it led to the disintegration of Puritanism in England.

These disagreements should not hide the Puritans' overriding commitment to the authority of Scripture. They made as serious an attempt as has ever been made in the English-speaking world to establish their lives on the basis of biblical instruction. When Puritan efforts to reform the kingdom of England faltered in the last years of Elizabeth's reign, they turned to the one sphere they could still control, their individual families. It was during this period around 1600 that Puritans began to place new emphasis on the Sabbath, to revive family worship, and to encourage personal acts of mercy to the sick and dying. When Puritan prospects brightened in the 1640s, this "spiritualization of the household" emerged into the open.

Puritans believed, third, that the church should be organized from Scripture. Anglicans contended that episcopacy, since it was tried and tested by time and did not violate any command of Scripture, was a godly and appropriate way of organizing the church. Puritans responded that the defenders of episcopacy missed the point, for they neglected to follow the positive teachings of the Bible. Puritans argued that Scripture laid down specific rules for constructing and governing churches. Furthermore, the Bible taught a system or church order that was not based on bishops. Puritans maintained this conviction even when they failed among themselves to agree on what that biblical system was. But even these disagreements were fruitful, for they grounded the modern polity of Presbyterians, Congregationalists, and Baptists as well.

Puritanism

The reason that Puritan beliefs concerning salvation, Scripture, and the church created such upheaval was their fourth basic conviction, that God had sanctioned the solidarity of society. Most Puritans believed that a single, coordinated set of authorities should govern life in society. The result was that Puritans sought nothing less than to make all England Puritan. Only late during the Puritan Commonwealth did ideas of toleration and of what is known today as pluralism arise, but these ideas were combated by most Puritans themselves and firmly set to rest for another generation by the restoration of Charles II.

From a modern vantage point the intolerance entailed by a unified view of society has harmed the Puritans' reputation. From a more disinterested perspective it is possible also to see great advantages. The Puritans succeeded in bursting the bonds of mere religiosity in their efforts to serve God. Puritanism was one of the moving forces in the rise of the English Parliament in the early seventeenth century. For good and for ill, it provided a foundation for the first great political revolution in modern times. It gave immigrants to New England a social vision whose comprehensively Christian character has never been matched in America. And, for such a putatively uncreative movement, it liberated vast energies in literature as well.

Notable Puritans. The Puritans enjoyed a great number of forceful preachers and teachers. The learned Dr. William Ames explained "the doctrine of living to God" in Marrow of Theology, a book used as a text during the first fifty years of Harvard College. The sermons and tracts of William Perkins outlined with sympathy the steps that a repentant sinner should take to find God. John Preston preached the severity of God's law and the wideness of his mercy fearlessly in the courts of James I and Charles I. John Owen, adviser to Cromwell and vice-chancellor of the University of Oxford, wrote theological treatises on the atonement and on the Holy Spirit that still influence Calvinistic thought in the English-speaking world. His contemporary, Richard Baxter, published nearly two hundred works expounding the virtues of theological moderation and the truths of what C. S. Lewis in the twentieth century would call "mere Christianity." In America, Boston's John Cotton labored to present God's glory in conversion, and Hartford's Thomas Hooker glorified God in the labors of the converted. The Westminster Confession and Catechisms which Puritan divines wrote at the request of Parliament (1643–47) remain a guide to Reformed theology, especially in Presbyterian circles, to this day. Together, the works of the Puritans comprise Protestantism's most extensive library of sacred and practical theology.

Important as the contribution of ministers were, the greatest contribution of Puritans to Christian history probably resided with its laymen. The English-speaking world has never seen such a cluster of thoroughly Christian political leaders as the Lord Protector Oliver Cromwell, the governor of Massachusetts John Winthrop, or the governor of Plymouth William Bradford. These leaders erred, perhaps often, but they devoted their lives to public service, self-consciously and whole-heartedly, out of deepest gratitude to the God of their salvation.

We also glimpse the genius of Puritanism when we look beyond its politicians to its writers. It is all too easy to forget that John Milton, who in Paradise Lost dared "assert Eternal Providence/And justify the ways of God to men," had earlier defended the execution of Charles I and served as Cromwell's Latin (or corresponding) secretary. John Bunyan marched with Cromwell's army and preached as a layman during the Commonwealth before he was jailed in Bedford for his Puritan beliefs, where he redeemed the time by writing Pilgrim's Progress. In America, Puritanism produced a woman poet of note in Anne Bradstreet (1616–72). It also gave us the poems of Edward Taylor (1645–1729), a retiring country minister. Taylor's meditations, composed to prepare his own heart for quarterly celebrations of the Lord's Supper, are among the finest poems ever written by an American.

Evaluation. The Puritans resemble other groups in Christian history who, in forsaking all for God, have won back not only God but much of the world as well. They stand with the early Franciscans, the Protestant Reformers, the Jesuits, the Anabaptists, the early Methodists, and the Reformed Dutch of the late nineteenth century who, in their own separate ways, were transfixed by the glories of redemption and who went far in redeeming the world around them. With these groups the Puritans also verified the truth of the gospel words: they sought first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and much more was added to them besides. M. A. NOLL

Bibliography. W. Bradford, Of Plymouth Plantation; F. J. Bremer, Puritan Experiment; A. Carden, Puritan Christianity in America; P. Collinson, Elizabethan Puritan Movement; E. H. Emerson, ed., English Puritanism from John Hooper to John Milton; S. Foster, Long Argument: English Puritanism and the Shaping of New England Culture; W. Haller, Rise of Puritanism; A. Heimert and A. Delbanco, eds., Puritans in America: A Narrative Anthology; C. Hill, Society and Puritanism in Pre-Revolutionary England; P. Miller, New England Mind; E. S. Morgan, Puritan Dilemma: The Story of John

Winthrop; Puritan Family; D. Neal, History of the Puritans; R. S. Paul, Lord Protector: Religion and Politics in the Life of Oliver Cromwell.

Pusey, Edward Bouverie (1800–1882). Leader of the Tractarian movement in the Church of England. After the epitome of an English gentleman's education at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, he became a fellow of Oriel College. He spent two years as one of the first English theological students in Germany after the Napoleonic Wars, and returned home as an accomplished Semitic scholar soon to become Regius Professor of Hebrew. Although he had learned much in Germany, reflection on continental liberal theology led him to commit himself to its opposition.

His initial opposition to liberalism was expressed by his active involvement in the Tractarian movement from its inception in 1833. With Keble and Newman he sought to counter liberalism by a charismatic emphasis which stressed that bishops in apostolic succession—which they claimed Anglican bishops to be—possessed the power and authority of the original apostles. The gift of apostleship was alive and well in the church, and had only to be recognized for the Church of England to become like an army with banners. When Newman and others, sensing the hostility to their program in much of the Church of England, entered the Roman Catholic Church in 1845, Pusey was the acknowledged leader of the remaining Tractarians, who were often called Puseyites.

Pusey's conservatism was further evidenced by his espousal of verbal inspiration, clearly evidenced in his famous commentaries on Daniel and the Minor Prophets. He remained the leader of Tractarianism until his death, and then the most formative influence upon it through his disciple H. P. Liddon, until the more liberal Tractarianism led by Charles Gore came to the center of the stage in Lux Mundi. Pusey bequeathed the movement a model of one who embodied personal piety, biblical conservatism, a theology with a strong emphasis on the atonement, the value of ritual, and belief in the indispensability of the historic episcopate.

I. S. RENNIE

See also KEBLE, JOHN; NEWMAN, JOHN HENRY; OXFORD MOVEMENT.

Bibliography. E. B. Pusey, Spiritual Letters of E. B. Pusey; A. B. Donaldson, Five Great Oxford Leaders: Keble, Newman, Pusey, Liddon, and Church; H. P. Liddon, Life of E. B. Pusey.

Q q

Quadragesima. A Latin term meaning “fortieth.” It is most often used to designate the forty-day lenten period. Lent, as a period of penitence and prayer, was fixed as forty days in commemoration of Jesus’ forty-day fast in the wilderness when he was tempted by the Devil (Matt. 4:1–11). Quadragesima may also be used to designate the first Sunday in Lent, following Quinquagesima, the last Sunday before Lent. W. A. ELWELL

See also CHRISTIAN YEAR; LENT; QUINQUAGESIMA.

Bibliography. G. Dix, Shape of the Liturgy.

Quakers. See FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF.

Quenstedt, Johann Andreas (1617–1688). German Lutheran theologian who represents the outlook known as Protestant scholasticism or “high orthodoxy.” A nephew of the renowned Johann Gerhard, he was born in Quedlinburg and attended the University of Helmstedt before becoming a professor in the arts faculty at the University of Wittenberg. In addition to teaching he studied theology at Wittenberg, receiving the doctorate in 1650. A quiet, kindly person, he was extremely popular, serving as rector of the university for four terms, as provost of All Saints’ Church, and in 1687 as senior professor in the School of Theology.

His outstanding contribution was the massive Theologia didactica-polemica (1685), which has been recognized as the major compendium of Lutheran theology in the age of orthodoxy. This work was the result of over thirty years of teaching and study, and displays a broad mastery of seventy-five years of Lutheran theological reflection and writing. A tightly structured volume, it is divided into four major parts. The first section treats theology, the Bible, God, and everlasting life. Section two discusses man made in the image of God, sin, and free will. Section three explains God’s goodness, predestination, Christology, redemption, conversion, justification, repentance and confession, union with Christ, and the new life. The last section explains the means of salvation, including the Word of God, the sacraments, faith, good works, suffering, prayer, the ministry, civil government, marriage, and the church. Each chapter contains a didactic section that formulates theses in a positive manner to support the position and a polemic section that refutes objections to the doctrine presented.

In an age of theological polemics and rigid orthodoxy Quenstedt was an individual characterized by warm piety, kindness toward others that extended even to those dismissed as heretics, and great ethical concern. R. G. CLOUSE

See also LUTHERAN TRADITION; SCHOLASTICISM, PROTESTANT.

Bibliography. R. G. Clouse, Church in the Age of Orthodoxy and the Enlightenment; B. Hagglund, History of Theology; R. D. Preus, Theology of Post-Reformation Lutheranism.

Quest of the Historical Jesus. See JESUS CHRIST.

Quicumque Vult. See ATHANASIAN CREED.

Quietism. The term has several connotations and is often used in a broad sense to refer to the emphasis on human inactivity and passivity that has accompanied the mystic experience. In a more specific way it refers to a manifestation of Roman Catholic mysticism in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. This movement was inspired by the teachings of Miguel de Molinos, a Spanish priest who lived in Italy and published his views in a book entitled Spiritual Guide. According to Molinos the goal of Christian experience is the perfect rest of the soul in God. Such a condition is possible when a person abandons himself completely to God and the will is totally passive. Mental prayer rather than any external activity is the means to the state of absolute rest with God. Molinos was accused of despising Christian virtue and of moral aberration because he believed that in a state of contemplation the soul is unaffected by either good works or sin. The Jesuits led the attack on his doctrine, claiming that it was an exaggerated and unhealthy form of mysticism. Through their efforts he was arrested and imprisoned.

Despite the opposition quietism spread to France, where it found an outstanding proponent in Madame Guyon, a woman from an influential family. Forced to abandon her desire to follow a religious vocation and instead to marry, she was constantly seeking a deeper spiritual life. Following the death of her husband she came under the influence of Molinos's thought and by 1680 felt herself so close to God that she received visions and revelations. Traveling widely through France she won many converts, calling them "spiritual children." Her teaching, elaborated in Short and Easy Method of Prayer, emphasized passive prayer as the major Christian activity. Eventually, she felt, the soul will lose all interest in its own fate, and even the truth of the gospel would be insignificant before "the torrent of the forces of God." On a popular level her teaching led to a disregard for the spiritual activities and the sacraments of the church. The result was a belief in a vague pantheism which is closer to the South Asian religions than to Christianity. Bossuet, bishop of Meaux, warned her to stop propagating these ideas, and others considered her mentally unbalanced, but she continued to win followers. She exchanged a series of letters with Fénelon, who admired and defended her ideas. In 1687 Pope Innocent XI condemned quietism, and Guyon along with many of her followers suffered imprisonment and persecution.

R. G. CLOUSE

See also GUYON, MADAME; MYSTICISM; SPIRITUALITY.

Bibliography. J. Aumann, Christian Spirituality in the Catholic Tradition; P. Hazard, European Mind; D. Knowles, What Is Mysticism?; R. A. Knox, Enthusiasm; E. Underhill, Mysticism.

Quimby, Phineas Parkhurst. See CHURCH OF CHRIST, SCIENTIST; EDDY, MARY BAKER.

Quinquagesima. A liturgical term used by the Western church derived from the Latin word meaning "fiftieth." It designates the Sunday before Lent, which, according to some early Roman calculations, was fifty days before Easter. It is also known as Shrove Sunday. Because quinquagesima means "fiftieth," it is sometimes, though rarely, used to designate Pentecost, which falls fifty days after Easter.

W. A. ELWELL

See also CHRISTIAN YEAR; LENT; SEPTUAGESIMA.

Bibliography. G. Dix, Shape of the Liturgy.

Qumran. See DEAD SEA SCROLLS; ESSENES.

Rr

Racism. A learned belief in racial superiority, which includes the belief that race determines intellectual, cultural, and moral capacities. The practice of racism includes both racial prejudice and discrimination against others based on their race or ethnicity. Two primary forms of racism, individual and institutional, are generally viewed as products of either psychological or social forces. Racism in any form is a sin that embodies both moral and spiritual dimensions.

Sociological Issues. Racism is a global phenomena dependent upon the dynamics of interpersonal and intergroup contact in any given social context. Like other social phenomena, the progression and regression of racism may be observed as outcomes of human interaction in which there are no neutral forces (Bowser). Because it is a cultural assumption, racism and ethnocentrism are usually justified by the stories and myths of a culture. Racism often takes the form of character assumptions that are in turn generalized to the entire race, such as the common explanation of economic disparity being due to laziness. The use of racial stereotypes is the most insidious means of spreading racist beliefs. As the assessment of a people based on race is accepted, it affects every area of the society, including politics, economics, and education. The result is that racism is institutionalized by the social forces that systematically develop a society. The glaring twentieth-century examples of South African apartheid and German Nazism are but two extremes of the global problem (Gurr).

The changing relations between groups of people, particularly when shifting interests of the dominant group are involved, will have a bearing on the racist stereotypes and prejudices within a culture. The American experience provides a classic example as the force of racism was directed first toward the American Indians and then toward each consecutive migrant group; in case of people of color, the racist attitudes have not significantly subsided (Sinderman with Hagen). On a global scale, racist stereotypes that lead to discriminatory practices may be employed in entire countries or regions of the world. While racism has been an intrinsic part of human history, the white European and European American forms have been directly related to the conditions of the Third World (Isbister). As we enter the twenty-first century, racial and ethnic conflicts threaten the social order of every continent.

An interesting phenomenon that stands in direct opposition is that of antiracism. Though difficult to define, antiracism is the rejection of racist structures and the beliefs upon which they are built. Antiracism varies from rejecting racist attitudes by seeking reconciliation on an individual basis to open rebellion against the racist structures of society. Well-known examples include the evangelicals of Clapham, particularly William Wilberforce, who diligently worked for the abolishment of the slave trade in the British empire during the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries and the work of Martin Luther King Jr. and the civil rights movement of the 1960s in the United States.

Theological Issues. Racism is a sin and, as such, racist beliefs and practices betray the very nature of God and the unity of creation. Opposition to the oppression and injustice of institutional racism is a widespread claim among Christians. The presence of racism within the church and within society, however, is clearly a continuing problem for Christians. The erroneous use of theological justification for racism is a perennial problem, for example, the use of Abraham Kuyper's concept of creation as pluriform to justify apartheid or the use of Noah's curse on Canaan as a means of justifying slavery (Wittenberg). Racism continues to plague the church with little progress evident at the present time (Tapia).

Foundational to the theological argument against racism is our understanding of one God in three persons in which there is no division (Deut. 6:4; Matt. 3:16–17; 28:19). God is the Creator of the world (Gen. 1), and everything in it belongs to him (Ps. 24:1), including people of every race. Through creation, all people are one (Acts 17:26) and are made in the image of God (Gen. 1:26–27). Therefore, claiming racial superiority with the consequent discrimination against a group of people is incompatible with the belief in the unity of creation and the universal dignity present by virtue of the image of God.

The roots of racism may be found in Adam's response to God (Gen. 3:12). Inherent in racism is assigning blame, either for conditions or responsibility, to another in an effort to justify one's self or group. Yet, as with all sin, it is universal and leaves us without excuse or justification (Rom. 3:23). Just as all are one in sin through Adam, all people are one in redemption through Christ (Rom. 5:12, 18). Here and only here is the credible hope to overcome the presence and effects of racism. The racial divide is destroyed by the work of Christ (Eph. 2:14). In Christ we may no longer use race, gender, or social status as a means to claim superiority, because we are all one in him (Gal. 3:28–29). We celebrate our unity as members of God's family (Rom. 8:14–17; Gal. 4:5) saved by grace (Eph. 2:8).

The organic unity from creation and the spiritual unity from redemption are complemented by a rich array of racial and cultural differences. In contrast to racist beliefs, these differences are to be honored as part of God's human mosaic. The intentionality of diversity is seen in the metaphorical use of the body of Christ or the church (Rom. 12:5; 1 Cor. 10:16–17; Eph. 1:23; Col. 1:18, 24). Within the body there are many members, each unique in substance and contribution, yet belonging to the same body (Rom. 12:3–8; 1 Cor. 12:12–27; Eph. 4:1–13). This diversity is by design, to enable and strengthen the whole toward maturity. At the same time, the diversity must not separate or divide, or it becomes an offense to the gospel. There is an inherent tension to be preserved, a celebration of both unity and diversity, which at once acknowledges the unique contribution of people of different races and cultures while maintaining the reality that the differences are brought together by the common faith in Christ.

It is incumbent upon Christians not only to proclaim the message of reconciliation to God (2 Cor. 5:18), but to work toward the reconciliation among people that follows (Matt. 22:37–40; John 13:34–35) and toward social justice from a position of compassionate antiracism.

C. D. McCONNELL

Bibliography. B. P. Bowser, ed., Racism and Anti-Racism in World Perspective; J. Cone, For My People: Black Theology and the Black Church; C. H. Felder, Stony the Road We Trod: African American Biblical Interpretation; T. R. Gurr, Minorities at Risk: A Global View of Ethnopolitical Conflicts; J. Isbister, Promises Not Kept; P. M. Sinderman with M. G. Hagen, Race and Inequality: A Study in American Values; E. K. Twesigye, ed., God, Race, Myth and Power: An Africanist Corrective Research Analysis; S. D. Welch, "Human Beings, White Supremacy, and Racial Justice," in Reconstructing Christian Theology, R. S. Chopp and M. L. Taylor, eds.

Racovian Catechism (1605). Published in Polish in Racov, Poland, the catechism was prepared by the followers of Faustus Socinus and was one of the earliest statements of antitrinitarian belief to surface since the Arian heresy of the fourth century. Poland was a center for antitrinitarian sects because of the religious toleration enjoyed there at this time by all religious groups. No strong secular or religious power existed to prevent the discussion and dissemination of unorthodox ideas. A few earlier antitrinitarian catechisms had been published in Poland, the most significant appearing in 1574.

The 1605 catechism was divided into eight sections and was intended more as a collection of beliefs than a confessional creed. In the catechism Christ was represented as more than a great man, but not as one who was divine until after his resurrection. The catechism stated that Jesus was conceived by the Holy Spirit and born of a virgin, although the interpretation of Jesus' conception and birth was not in accord with traditional Catholic or Protestant theology, because the Holy Spirit was regarded as a quality or aspect of God and not as a person. Salvation was attained by good works, and followers were called to live a moral life. The catechism stated that all divine knowledge came from the Bible; however, adherents believed that it should be explained and interpreted with "right reason." The use of "right reason" meant that no miracle or quality of God should contradict human understanding.

The Racovian Catechism was a forerunner of deism and Unitarianism. Later antitrinitarian movements broke more completely with traditional Christian beliefs than did the Racovian Catechism. For example, the compilers of the catechism were not willing to completely deny Jesus' divinity or special status, as later Unitarians did. Some scholars believe the critical approach to traditional biblical beliefs evident in the catechism also influenced later higher critical approaches to Scripture in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries.

P. KUBRICHT

See also SOCINUS, FAUSTUS.

Bibliography. J. H. S. Kent, "The Socinian Tradition," Theol 78:131–40; T. Rees, Racovian Catechism; G. H. Williams, Polish Brethren.

Radical Theology. See DEATH OF GOD THEOLOGY.

Rahner, Karl (1904–1984). Roman Catholic theologian and one of the leading thinkers behind the Second Vatican Council. He epitomized the attempt to maintain an orthodox theology from the vantage point of contemporary philosophy.

Rahner was born in Freiburg, Germany. He entered the Jesuit order in 1922 and passed through the mandated years of study and practical experience in various locations. He received his ordination in 1932. Two years later he began studying philosophy at Freiburg, where Martin Heidegger was enthralled by the intellectual world. Rahner's dissertation on Thomistic epistemology (later published as Spirit in the World) was rejected in 1936 for its departure from traditional interpretations of Aquinas. That same year Rahner moved to Innsbruck and finished a dissertation in theology (on the origin of the church from the wounds of Christ), which was accepted. From just before until just after World War II, Rahner carried out a pastoral ministry in the face of social, political, and theological turmoil. In 1949 he formally became a member of the theological faculty at Innsbruck. He moved to Munich in 1964 and closed out his university career at Münster from 1967 to 1971, only to return to Munich for an active retirement.

Rahner's early work in philosophy gives a clear view of the principles underlying his theology. He is committed to a form of transcendental Thomism, viz., the thought of Thomas Aquinas combined with insights from Kant, Hegel, Heidegger, and Rahner's most immediate intellectual predecessor, Joseph Maréchal. The essence of this philosophy is that being is discovered in the subjectivity of a human knower.

According to Rahner, every act of knowledge is predicated on an implicit knowledge of being, disclosed in the process of questioning, particularly as the questioner asks for the ground of his own existence. This prethematic being is developed further into the thesis that universal being, and thereby the absolute being of God, stands behind all human knowledge (Rahner's notion of the Vorgriff). Thus, the human person is, by the very nature of his or her intellect, disposed to the knowledge of God.

This possibility of an ever-present potential to relate to God becomes for Rahner the core of his anthropocentric theology. Human beings are not innately divine, but God has implanted in their very nature the potential to receive grace, the "supernatural existential." In fact, Rahner holds that the ability to hear God (potentia obedientialis) is the chief characteristic of a human being. To be human means to carry the seeds of union with God.

This doctrine yields several important results. For one thing, it means that we get in touch with God internally through our humanity, not through an external confrontation. Consequently, one need not be part of the external Christian church in order to be related to God. This expansion of the redemptive perimeter includes adher-ents of other religions and even atheists, whom Rahner calls "anonymous Christians."

Second, Rahner puts a new face on Christology. He sees Jesus Christ as representing the unique fulfillment of the potentia obedientialis within human nature. Thus, Rahner attempts to avoid the problem of reconciling the apparent paradox of two natures in Christ; the human nature is inherently open to reception of the divine. Further, it enables Rahner to place Christ at the pinnacle of human evolution. An evangelical theologian would be justified in complaining that Rahner minimizes the effects of human sin and fallenness and, consequently, of the need for personal redemption.

Rahner's published works number into the thousands. It is not possible to detail all of his contributions to theology. He stands out as one of the most thorough and influential theologians of this century.

W. CORDUAN

Bibliography. K. Rahner, Foundations of Christian Faith; Hearers of the Word; K. Rahner, ed., Mysterium Salutis; K. H. Rahner with K. H. Weger, Our Christian Faith: Answers for the Future; Spirit in the World; Theological Investigations; K. Baker, Synopsis of the Transcendental Philosophy of Emerich Coreth and Karl Rahner; W. Corduan, "Hegel in Rahner: A Study in Philosophical Hermeneutics," HTR 71:285-98; J. Donceel, Philosophy of Karl Rahner; G. A. McCool, Theology of Karl Rahner; L. Roberts, Achievement of Karl Rahner; G. Vass, Understanding Karl Rahner; H. Vorgrimmler, Karl Rahner: His Life, Thought and Works; K. H. Weger, Karl Rahner: An Introduction to His Theology; K. H. Weger, ed., Sacramentum Mundi.

Ramm, Bernard (1916-1992). Baptist scholar and theologian. Ramm was born in Butte, Montana, on August 1, 1916, and attended the University of Washington (B.A.), Eastern Baptist Theological Seminary (B.D.), and the University of Southern California, where he received his M.A. (1947) and Ph.D. (1950). Ramm taught at a series of theological schools from 1944 until his retirement on December 31, 1986, including Bible Institute of Los Angeles (1945-51), California Baptist Theological Seminary (1959-74), Eastern Baptist Theological Seminary (1974-77), and the American Baptist Theological Seminary of the West (1978-86). He also worked with many organizations, including Young Life and World Vision. Ramm passed away on August 11, 1992, in Laguna Hills, California.

Influenced by theologians Abraham Kuyper and Karl Barth, Ramm saw his mission to be the steering of a middle way between fundamentalism and modernism, while speaking to twentieth-century concerns. This became evident as early as Christian View of Science and Scripture (1954), in which Ramm sought to harmonize modern science and the Bible. It caused an enormous stir in fundamentalist circles when Ramm advocated what he called “progressive creationism” (flat creation with development afterwards) and an old earth. He vehemently rejected naturalistic evolution. A trilogy of books, Pattern of Religious Authority (1957), Witness of the Spirit (1959), and Special Revelation and the Word of God (1961), explored the subject of special revelation. Rejecting what he calls the “abbreviated” Protestant principle, “the Bible and only the Bible is the religion of Protestants,” he argued for concurrent objective divine revelation (Scripture) and a subjective internal witness of the Holy Spirit, drawing upon the reformers Luther and Calvin. Evangelicals need not be afraid of historical criticism, because “revelation is present in, with, and under the cultural so that the purely cultural is never made revelational, yet revelation cannot be isolated from its cultural form.”

In analyzing the past and present of evangelicalism in Evangelical Heritage: A Study in Historical Theology (1973) and Handbook of Contemporary Theology (1966), Ramm attempted to distance himself from Barth and neo-orthodoxy, but was quite positive in his assessment of Barth by adopting what he called a “dialectical” approach to the problem. After Fundamentalism: The Future of Evangelical Theology (1983) attempted to set a new agenda for “postfundamental” evangelicalism. The evangelical must now be a contemporary person, living in the present and accepting science, technology, and learning in general. In this book Ramm made use of Barth’s “christological principle” in ways that seem incompatible with some earlier statements he had made. Ramm veered in a more traditional direction in his more recent books, Evangelical Christology (1985) and Offense to Reason: The Theology of Sin (1985).

Ramm was a creative and versatile theologian whose works seem to be probings rather than pronouncements, and that sometimes raise more problems than they solve. He felt himself that he was defending “the historic Christian faith as reflected in the great creeds of the ancient Church, and in the spirit and writings of the reformers,” which is how he defined evangelicalism.

W. A. ELWELL

Bibliography. K. J. Vanhoozer, HET 290–306.

Ramsey, Ian Thomas (1915–1972). British philosopher and theologian, and bishop of Durham in the Church of England from 1966 until his death. Educated at Cambridge and Oxford, he began his professional life as chaplain at Christ College, Cambridge. His lasting ambition, however, was to craft a persuasive apologetic for the Christian religion within the predominant philosophical framework of empiricism. This he attempted to do during his fifteen-year tenure as Nolloth Professor of the Philosophy of the Christian Religion at Oxford, beginning December 1951. His most important publications are Religious Language (1957), Freedom and Immortality (1960), and Christian Discourse (1965).

Ramsey’s philosophical theology was forged in the crucible of encounter with logical positivism, the most virulently antimetaphysical form of empiricism in the history of philosophy. This did not prevent him from attending to the peculiar virtues of the more innocuous empiricism that survived the demise of logical positivism. This empiricism—exemplified in the work of the later Wittgenstein—he considered to be more an approach to philosophical questions than a body of received doctrine. He especially appreciated the determination to clarify the meaning of ordinary assertions and thereby to dissolve various philosophical puzzles, and he routinely applied empiricist techniques of language analysis for the purposes of elucidating religious discourse.

In keeping with the spirit of ordinary language analysis, Ramsey recommended the investigation of patterns of religious discourse and behavior in search of the empirical foundations of such patterns. He held that theological concepts are embedded in characteristic assertions of theological discourse. The challenge for the philosopher is to understand the peculiar logical behavior of these concepts by exploring the behavior that (empirically) anchors the discourse in which the concepts are embedded. The meaning of religious language is determined by its aptness for giving expression to peculiarly religious features of ordinary human behavior. Such behavior is the empirical ground of the meaning of religious language. Identifying this ground is the first step of analysis.

On investigation, the philosopher finds that the behavior that grounds religious discourse is characterized by awareness of a “disclosure situation” in which something transcendent breaks in upon the one who uses religious language. Hence, to locate the meaning of any religious assertion, the philosopher must inquire into the special character of the disclosure situation that gives rise to that form of life that is most aptly captured by the religious assertion in question. In other words, the meaning of the language is found in the explanation that an experience of disclosure bestows upon the emergence of that sort of language as the articulation of a form of life. At this stage, analysis of the meaning of religious language is complete.

Though Ramsey repudiated the “irrationalism” of Kierkegaard and Barth, he left himself open to the charge that his own apologetic for Christianity in no way concerned itself with the question, “Are religious assertions true?” His preoccupation with the meaning of religious discourse prevented some from recognizing the subtle and complex way he sought to justify belief in the reality of entities that lie behind disclosure situations. Though his orthodoxy perhaps cannot be seriously challenged, his theological method invited suspicion among some contemporaries. While such suspicion may have been laid to rest by Ramsey's assertions that the existence of a transcendent God is objective and given in disclosure situations that are then expressed in religious language, it is perhaps safe to say that Ramsey's project of showing this to be the case was never satisfactorily completed.

Ramsey's scholarship well illustrates the admirable aim of developing an apologetic for Christianity that is vigorous and fresh and is responsive to the dominant tendencies of thought current in one's own time. In some respects, however, his detailed position was so intimately tied to the times that it has about it the mustiness of obsolescence.

R. D. GEIVETT

Bibliography. D. L. Edwards, Ian Ramsey, Bishop of Durham: A Memoir; Ian Ramsey in Preliminary Perspective; J. H. Gill, Ian Ramsey: To Speak Respectably of God; J. H. Gill, ed., Christian Empiricism; J. H. Pye, Bibliography of the Published Works [of] Ian Ramsey; T. W. Tilley, Talking of God; W. B. Williamson, Ian T. Ramsey.

Ramus, Peter (1515–1572). A leading French Protestant philosopher of the Reformation period. He was professor of eloquence and philosophy at the Collège de France from 1551 until his death, and held a prestigious position in French Renaissance scholarship. He had close connections with the kings of France. About 1561 he was converted to Protestantism and thereafter was active in the French Reformed Church. Ramus met his death with other Protestants in the St. Bartholomew's Day Massacre in Paris.

Ramus presented himself as an educational reformer dedicated to saving Christianity from the errors of Aristotelianism and scholasticism. His M.A. thesis was a blast against Aristotle: "Everything that was said by Aristotle is fictitious." To replace Aristotle he offered a simplified reorganization of knowledge through logic. Logic is "the art of discoursing well." The logician first invented arguments and then judged or arranged them into intelligent discourse. Protestants gladly accepted Ramism as an alternative to pagan Aristotle or the Roman Catholic scholastic tradition.

Ramus held that all knowledge must be related to God, and having been created by God, the entire spectrum of knowledge (encyclopedia) was divided into the individual liberal arts. Each liberal art had a particular sphere of knowledge delineated by a Ramist doctrine known as technometry (technometria or technologia in Latin). Dialectic is the art of discoursing well, grammar the art of speaking well, and so on. Ramus also applied his ideas to religion in a methodical book, Commentaries on the Christian Religion (Latin, 1576). Religion became "the art of living well" and took its place alongside the other liberal arts.

An important ingredient of Ramist philosophy was method. Ramus favored dividing each idea into two parts (the dichotomy), and then each was subdivided into two parts again and again until an idea had been reduced to its most basic components. Not only were the ideas dichotomized in the text, but Ramus favored the use of dichotomized outline charts that would show the skeleton of the arguments in visual form. Proper teaching with proper method, according to Ramus, led to proper action. He stressed the usefulness of knowledge, and his followers made a point of the practical application of education to life. The Ramist system of method and practicality caught the imagination of sixteenth-century Protestants as did few other philosophical ideas.

Ramist theology is recognizable by the methodical way that the subject is divided and subdivided into dichotomies and illustrated by diagrams. Ramus had his greatest influence among sixteenth- and seventeenth-century English Puritans (e.g., William Ames, William Perkins) and in New England at Harvard University. Puritans considered him the great and famous Protestant martyr of France.

K. L. SPRUNGER

See also SCHOLASTICISM, PROTESTANT.

Bibliography. L. W. Gibbs, ed., William Ames, Technometry; W. S. Howell, Logic and Rhetoric in England 1500–1700; P. Miller, New England Mind; W. J. Ong, Ramus, Method, and the Decay of Dialogue; K. L. Sprunger, Learned Doctor William Ames; C. Walton, "Ramus and Socrates," PAPS 114:119–39.

Ransom. One of the metaphors employed by the early church to speak of the saving work of Christ. It is found on the lips of Jesus in Matthew 20:28/Mark 10:45, "The Son of Man did not come to be served, but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many." Paul also states that Christ gave himself as a "ransom for all" (1 Tim. 2:6). As a metaphor, ransom commonly points to a price paid, a transaction made, to obtain the freedom of others. These ideas are supported also by such expressions as "bought" and "price" (1 Cor. 6:20) and "redeem" (1 Pet. 1:18–21).

The ideas are rooted in the ancient world where slaves and captured soldiers were given their freedom upon the payment of a price. In the OT ransom is linked again with slaves, but also with varied aspects of the cultures as well as the duties of kinsmen (cf. Ruth 4). Most importantly, the idea of ransom (redeem) is also linked with the deliverance of the Israelites out of Egypt (e.g., Deut. 7:8) and the return of the exiles (e.g., Isa. 35:10). In both settings the focus is no longer on the price paid but on the deliverance achieved and the freedom obtained. Now the focus is on the activity of God and his power to set his people free. When the ideas of ransom are linked to the saving activity of God, the idea of price is not present.

When the NT, therefore, speaks of ransom with reference to the work of Christ, the idea is not one of transaction, as though a deal is arranged and a price paid. Rather the focus is on the power (1 Cor. 1:18) of the cross to save. In the famous ransom saying of Mark 10:45, Jesus speaks of his coming death as the means of release for many. The contrast is between his own solitary death and the deliverance of the many. In the NT the terms of ransom and purchase, which in other contexts suggest an economic or financial exchange, speak of the consequences or results (cf. 1 Cor. 7:23). The release is from judgment (Rom. 3:25–26), sin (Eph. 1:7), and death (Rom. 8:2).

There is no need, then, to ask the question posed so often in the past: To whom was the ransom paid? It is not possible to consider payment to Satan as though God were obligated to meet Satan's demands or "asking price." And since the texts speak always of the activity of God in Christ, we cannot speak of God paying himself. While the sacrifice of Christ is rooted in the holiness and justice of God, it is not to be seen against the background of law only but more especially of covenant. In Christ, God takes upon himself the freedom, the release from bondage, of his people. He meets the demands of his own being.

R. W. LYON

See also ATONEMENT, THEORIES OF; REDEEMER, REDEMPTION.

Bibliography. F. Büchsel, TDNT 4:340–56; D. Hill, Greek Words and Hebrew Meanings: Studies in the Semantics of Soteriological Terms; L. Morris, Apostolic Preaching of the Cross.

Rapture of the Church. A phrase used by premillennialists to refer to the church being united with Christ at his second coming (from Lat. rapio, "caught up"). The main scriptural passage upon which the teaching is based is 1 Thessalonians 4:15–17: "According to the Lord's own word, we tell you that we who are still alive, who are left till the coming of the Lord, will certainly not precede those who have fallen asleep. For the Lord himself will come down from heaven, with a loud command, with the voice of the archangel and with the trumpet call of God, and the dead in Christ will rise first. After that, we who are still alive and are left will be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air. And so we will be with the Lord forever."

The major divisions of interpretation of Paul's words center on the relationship of the time of the rapture to the tribulation period that marks the end of the age. Pretribulationists teach that the church will be removed before this seven-year period and the revelation of the Antichrist. A second group, the midtribulationists, contend that the church will be raptured during the tribulation after the Antichrist's rise to power but before the severe judgments that prepare the way for Christ's return to establish his rule on earth. Another approach to the problem is that of the post-tribulationists, who believe that the church will continue to exist in the world throughout the entire tribulation and be removed at the end of the period when Christ returns in power.

Pretribulationism and the Origin of the Rapture Debate. Despite the attempt by dispensationalists to identify all premillennialists with peculiar aspects of their thought such as the pretribulation rapture, it is obvious that throughout most of the history of the church those who taught premillennialism did not have such a detailed interpretation of the endtimes. Until the early nineteenth century those believers who discussed the rapture believed it would occur in conjunction with the return of Christ at the end of the tribulation period. It was the contribution of John Nelson Darby to eschatology that led many Christians to teach that the return of Christ would be in two stages: one for his saints at the rapture and the other with his saints to control the world at the close of the great tribulation. According to this interpretation of Bible prophecy, between these two events the seventieth week predicted by Daniel (9:24–27) would be fulfilled and the Antichrist would come to power. With the church removed from the scene, God would resume his dealings with Israel at that time.

Darby's ideas had a wide influence in Britain and the United States. Many evangelicals became pretribulationists through the preaching of the interdenominational evangelists of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. The Scofield Reference Bible (1909) and the leading Bible institutes and graduate schools of theology such as Dallas Theological Seminary, Talbot Seminary, and Grace Theological Seminary also contributed to the popularity of this view. During the troubled times of the 1960s there was a revival of the pretribulationist view on a popular level through the books of Hal Lindsey and the ministries of preachers and Bible teachers who use the electronic media.

If the influence of Darby is obvious in the work of his successors, it is a more difficult task to determine how he arrived at an understanding of the secret pretribulation rapture. Samuel P. Tregelles, like Darby a member of the Plymouth Brethren movement, charged that the view originated during a charismatic service conducted by Edward Irving in 1832. Other scholars maintain that the new understanding of the rapture was the product of a prophetic vision given to a young Scottish girl, Margaret MacDonald, in 1830. She claimed special insight into the second coming and began to share her views with others. Her ecstatic conduct and apocalyptic teaching led to a charismatic renewal in Scotland. Impressed by the accounts of a new Pentecost, Darby visited the scene of the revival. According to his own testimony, in later years he met Margaret MacDonald but rejected her claims of a new outpouring of the Spirit. Despite his opposition to MacDonald's general approach, some writers believe that he accepted her view of the rapture and worked it into his own system.

Rapture of the Church

Other scholars feel that one must accept Darby's own explanation of how he arrived at his eschatological view. He based it upon an understanding that the church and Israel are distinct entities in Scripture. When the church is withdrawn from the world, then the prophetic events involving Israel can be fulfilled. Antichrist will rise to power by promising peace on earth and will make an agreement to protect the restored state of Israel. The Jews will be betrayed by their new benefactor, however, who will suddenly suspend all traditional religious ceremonies and demand that they worship him. Those who do not cooperate will be persecuted. This final holocaust against God's chosen people will lead them to accept Christ as their Savior. Plagues will ravage the earth during this time of tribulation, and finally the battle of Armageddon will result in the visible, personal, victorious return to earth of Christ and his saints. The Lord will then bind Satan for a thousand years and rule the world with his followers for a millennium. According to pretribulation premillennialists, all the prophecies that were supposed to be fulfilled when Christ came the first time will come to pass at his second coming. The Jewish rejection of Christ in the first century forced the postponement of the kingdom until the second coming. The view that was taken of the church and its place in prophecy is crucial to the acceptance of the pretribulation rapture and the system it supports.

Another argument given in favor of the pretribulation rapture is that the restraining influence of the Holy Spirit must be removed before the Antichrist can be revealed (2 Thess. 2:6-8). Because the Spirit is particularly associated with the church, it follows that the church must be absent from the scene when the Spirit is gone. Among the other factors that seem to support pretribulationism is the imminence of the rapture. If it can occur at any time, then no tribulation signs such as the revelation of the Antichrist, the battle of Armageddon, or the abomination in the temple precede the "blessed event."

The Midtribulation View. One of the leaders in presenting a different view of the rapture was Harold John Ockenga, a leader in the evangelical movement that developed in the United States after World War II. In a brief personal testimony in Christian Life (February 1955), he cited many difficulties associated with pretribulationism. These included the secret aspect of the rapture, the revival to be experienced during the tribulation despite the removal of the Holy Spirit, and the reduction in the importance of the church involved in dispensational eschatology. Other evangelical leaders joined in the criticism of the pretribulation position. The modifications they advocated were slight, involving the limitations of the wrath of God upon the world (Rev. 16-18) to the first three and a half years prior to the battle of Armageddon. Influenced by the repeated mention of three and a half years (forty-two months) in Daniel 7, 9, and 12 and in Revelation 11 and 12, they argued for a shortened tribulation period. To support this argument, they cited Daniel 7:25, which indicated that the church will be under the tyrannical rule of the Antichrist for three and a half years. Daniel 9:27 also indicates that the world ruler of the endtimes will make an agreement with Christians and Jews guaranteeing religious freedom, but then he will carry out the second stage of his plan and suppress religious observances. Various NT passages were also believed to support midtribulationism, including Revelation 12:14, which predicts a flight into the wilderness by the church during the first three and a half years of the tribulation period. Also, midtribulationists believed that their view fit into the Olivet discourse (Matt. 24; Mark 13; and Luke 12) better than the pretribulation interpretation.

Midtribulationists claim that the rapture is to take place after the fulfillment of certain predicted signs and the preliminary phase of the tribulation as described in Matthew 24:10-27. The event will not be secret but will be accompanied by an impressive display including a great shout, a trumpet blast, or a great thunder (1 Thess. 4:16; Rev. 11:15; 14:2). This dramatic sign will attract the attention of unsaved people, and when they realize that the Christians have disappeared, they will come to Christ in such large numbers that a major revival will take place (Rev. 7:9, 14).

The Posttribulation View. Many other interpreters were uncomfortable with the sharp distinction that the pretribulationists drew between the church and Israel. Christ, they believed, would return to rapture his saints and establish his millennial rule at the same time. They cited numerous passages (e.g., Matt. 24:27, 29) that indicate that Christ's second coming must be visible, public, and following the tribulation. Their belief was based upon the fact that much of the advice given to the church in Scripture relative to the last days is meaningless if it does not go through the tribulation. For example, the church is told to flee to the mountains when certain events occur, such as the setting up of the abomination of desolation in the holy place (Matt. 24:15–20).

Many of the arguments suggested by those who advocate the posttribulation view are stated in opposition to the pretribulation position, which has been the most widely held interpretation among twentieth-century American premillennialists. Included in these criticisms are suggestions that the imminent return of Christ does not require a pretribulation rapture. Posttribulationists also point to the difficulty of deciding which passages of Scripture apply to Israel and which are relevant to the church. They also contend that there is a notable lack of explicit teaching about the rapture in the NT.

Advocates of the posttribulation position differ among themselves on the application of the prophetic Scriptures and the details about the return of Christ. John Walvoord has detected four schools of interpretation among their number. The first of these, classic posttribulationism, is represented by the work of J. Barton Payne, who taught that the church has always been in tribulation and therefore the great tribulation has largely been fulfilled. The second main division of posttribulationists are those who hold the semiclassic position found in the work of Alexander Reese. Among the variety of views held by these individuals, the most common is that the entire course of church history is an era of tribulation, but in addition there is to be a future period of great tribulation. A third category of posttribulationist interpretation is called futurist and is ably presented in the books of George E. Ladd. He accepts a future period of three and a half or seven years of tribulation between the present era and the second coming of Christ. He was led to this conclusion by a literal interpretation of Revelation 8–18. A staunch premillennialist, he believes that the pretribulation rapture was an addition to Scripture and as such obscured the truly important event, the actual appearance of Christ to inaugurate his reign. A fourth view is that of Robert H. Gundry, which Walvoord calls the dispensational posttribulationist interpretation. Gundry combines in a novel manner the pretribulationist arguments and an acceptance of the posttribulation rapture.

The Partial Rapture Interpretation. In addition to those who hold to pretribulation, midtribulation, or posttribulation views of the rapture, others contend for a partial rapture theory. This small group of pretribulationists teaches that only those who are faithful in the church will be caught up at the beginning of the tribulation. The rest will be raptured some time during or at the end of the seven-year period. According to these interpreters, those who are most loyal to Christ will be taken first and the more worldly will be raptured later. Although it is condemned by most premillennialists, the respected G. H. Lang advocated this view.

Conclusion. The interpretation of the rapture has led to some differences of opinion among evangelicals. Those who hold to a pretribulation rapture have been accused of having a severely circumscribed attitude toward the church and its mission, culture and education, and current events. While some dispensationalists involuntarily lend currency to this by regarding their position as almost a cardinal doctrine of the faith, most would reject the above criticism as a baseless generalization. They would insist that their stance excludes neither a highly developed social ethic nor a policy of world rejection rightly understood.

R. G. CLOUSE

See also DARBY, JOHN NELSON; DISPENSATION, DISPENSATIONALISM; ESCHATOLOGY; MILLENNIUM, VIEWS OF THE; SCOFIELD, CYRUS INGERSON; SECOND COMING OF CHRIST; TRIBULATION.

Bibliography. O. T. Allis, Prophecy and the Church; R. Anderson, Coming Prince; G. L. Archer et al., eds., Rapture: Pre-, Mid-, or Post-Tribulationist; J. L. Bray, Origin of the Pre-Tribulation Rapture Teaching; E. S. English, Rethinking the Rapture; R. H. Gundry, Church and the Tribulation; R. Jewett, Jesus Against the Rapture; P. S. Karleen, Pre-Wrath Rapture of the Church; G. E. Ladd, Blessed Hope; H. Lockyer, Rapture of Saints; D. MacPherson, Incredible Cover-Up; Rapture Plot; P. Mauro, Seventy Weeks and the Great Tribulation; J. B. Payne, Imminent Appearing of Christ; J. D. Pentecost, Things to Come; A. Reese, Approaching Advent of Christ; M. J. Rosenthal, Pre-Wrath Rapture of the Church; C. C. Ryrie, What You Should Know about the Rapture; J. F. Strombeck, First the Rapture; J. F. Walvoord, Rapture Question; L. J. Wood, Is the Rapture Next?

Rationalism. Philosophical rationalism encompasses several strands of thought, all of which usually share the conviction that reality is actually rational in nature and that making the proper deductions is essential to achieving knowledge. Such deductive logic and the use of mathematical processes provide the chief methodological tools. Thus, rationalism has often been held in contrast to empiricism.

Earlier forms of rationalism are found in Greek philosophy, most notably in Plato, who held that the proper use of reasoning and mathematics was preferable to the methodology of natural science. The latter is not only in error on many occasions, but empiricism can only observe facts in this changing world. By deductive reasoning, Plato believed that one could extract the innate knowledge that is present at birth, derived from the realm of forms.

However, rationalism is more often associated with Enlightenment philosophers such as Descartes, Spinoza, and Leibniz. It is this form of continental rationalism that is the chief concern of this article.

Rationalism

Innate Ideas. Descartes enumerated different types of ideas, such as those that are derived from experience, those that are drawn from reason itself, and those that are innate and thus created in the mind by God. This latter group was a mainstay of rationalistic thought.

Innate ideas are those that are the very attributes of the human mind, inborn by God. As such these “pure” ideas are known a priori by all humans and are thus believed by all. So crucial were they for rationalists that it was usually held that these ideas were the prerequisite for learning additional facts. Descartes believed that, without innate ideas, no other data could be known.

The empiricists attacked the rationalists at this point, arguing that the content of the so-called innate ideas was actually learned through one’s experience, though perhaps largely unreflected upon by the person. Thus, we learn vast amounts of knowledge through our family, education, and society very early in life that cannot be counted as innate.

One rationalistic response to this empirical contention was to point out that there were many concepts widely used in science and mathematics that could not be discovered by experience alone. The rationalists, therefore, concluded that empiricism could not stand alone but required large amounts of truth to be accepted by the proper use of reason.

Epistemology. Rationalists had much to say about knowledge and how one might gain certainty. Although this query was answered somewhat differently, most rationalists eventually got back to the assertion that God was the ultimate guarantor of knowledge.

Perhaps the best example of this conclusion is found in the philosophy of Descartes. Beginning with the reality of doubt, he determined to accept nothing of which he could not be certain. However, at least one reality could be deduced from this doubt: he was doubting and must therefore exist. In the words of his famous dictum, “I think, therefore I am.”

From the realization that he doubted, Descartes concluded that he was a dependent, finite being. He then proceeded to the existence of God via forms of the ontological and cosmological arguments. In Meditations III–IV of his Meditations on First Philosophy, Descartes argued that his idea of God as infinite and independent is a clear and distinct argument for God’s existence.

In fact, Descartes concluded that the human mind was incapable of knowing anything more certainly than God’s existence. A finite being was incapable of explaining the presence of the idea of an infinite God apart from his necessary existence.

Next Descartes concluded that since God was perfect, he could not deceive finite beings. Additionally Descartes’s own faculties for judging the world around him were given him by God and hence would not be misleading. The result was that whatever he could deduce by clear and distinct thinking (such as that found in mathematics) concerning the world and others must therefore be true. Thus, the necessary existence of God both makes knowledge possible and guarantees truth concerning those facts that can be clearly delineated. Beginning with the reality of doubt, Descartes proceeded to his own existence, to God, and to the physical world.

Spinoza also taught that the universe operated according to rational principles, that the proper use of reason revealed these truths, and that God was the ultimate guarantor of knowledge. He rejected Cartesian dualism, however, in favor of monism (referred to by some as pantheism), in that there was only one substance, termed God or nature. Worship was expressed rationally, in accordance with the nature of reality. Of the many attributes of substance, thought and extension were the most crucial.

Spinoza utilized geometrical methodology to deduce epistemological truths that could be held as factual. By limiting much of knowledge to self-evident truths revealed by mathematics, he thereby constructed one of the best examples of rationalistic system building in the history of philosophy.

Leibniz set forth his concept of reality in his major work Monadology. In contrast to the materialistic concept of atoms, monads are unique metaphysical units for force that are unaffected by external criteria. Although each monad develops individually, it is interrelated through a logical “preestablished harmony,” involving a hierarchy of monads arranged by and culminating in God, the Monad of monads.

For Leibniz a number of arguments revealed the existence of God, who was established as the being responsible for the ordering of the monads into a rational universe that was “the best of all possible worlds.” God also was the basis for knowledge, and this accounts for the epistemological relationship between thought and reality. Leibniz thus returned to a concept of a transcendent God much closer to the position held by Descartes and in contrast to Spinoza, although neither he nor Spinoza began with the subjective self, as did Descartes.

Thus, rationalistic epistemology was characterized both by a deductive process of argumentation, with special attention being given to mathematical methodology, and by the anchoring of all knowledge in the nature of God. Spinoza’s system of Euclidean geometry claimed demonstration of God or nature as the one substance of reality. Some scholars of the Cartesian persuasion moved to the position of occasionalism, whereby mental and physical events correspond to each other (as the perceived noise of a tree falling corresponds with the actual occurrence), as they are both ordained by God. Leibniz utilized a rigorous application of calculus to deductively derive the infinite collection of monads that culminate in God.

This rationalistic methodology, and the emphasis on mathematics in particular, was an important influence on the rise of modern science during this period. Galileo held some essentially related ideas, especially in his concept of nature as being mathematically organized and perceived as such through reason.

Biblical Criticism. Of the many areas in which the influence of rationalistic thought was felt, higher criticism of the Scriptures is certainly one that is relevant to the study of contemporary theological trends. Spinoza not only rejected the inerrancy and propositional nature of special revelation in the Scriptures, but he was also a forerunner of both David Hume and some of the English deists who rejected miracles. Spinoza held that miracles, if defined as events that break the laws of nature, do not occur.

A number of trends in English deism reflect the influence of, and similarities to, continental rationalism as well as British empiricism. Besides the acceptance of innate knowledge available to all people and the deducing of propositions from such general knowledge, deists such as Matthew Tindal, Anthony Collins, and Thomas Woolston attempted to dismiss miracles and fulfilled prophecy as evidences for special revelation. In fact, deism as a whole was largely characterized as an attempt to find a natural religion apart from special revelation. Many of these trends had marked effects on contemporary higher criticism.

Evaluation. Although rationalism was quite influential in many ways, it was also strongly criticized by scholars who noticed a number of weak points.

First, Locke, Hume, and the empiricists never tired of attacking the concept of innate ideas. They asserted that young children gave little, if any, indication of any crucial amount of innate knowledge. Rather, the empiricists were quick to point to sense experience as the chief schoolteacher, even in infancy.

Second, empiricists also asserted that reason could not be the only (or even the primary) means of achieving knowledge when so much is gathered by the senses. While it is true that much knowledge may not be reducible to sense experience, this also does not indicate that reason is the chief means of knowing.

Third, it has frequently been pointed out that reason alone leads to too many contradictions, metaphysical and otherwise. For example, Descartes's dualism, Spinoza's monism, and Leibniz's monadology have all been declared as being absolutely knowable, in the name of rationalism. If one or more of these options is incorrect, what about the remainder of the system(s)?

Fourth, rebuttals to rationalistic and deistic higher criticism appeared quickly from the pens of such able scholars as John Locke, Thomas Sherlock, Joseph Butler, and William Paley. Special revelation and miracles were especially defended against attack. Butler's Analogy of Religion in particular was so devastating that many have concluded that it is not only one of the strongest apologetics for the Christian faith, but that it was the chief reason for the demise of deism.

G. R. HABERMAS

See also DEISM; DESCARTES, RENÉ; ENLIGHTENMENT, THE; LEIBNIZ, GOTTFRIED WILHELM; SPINOZA, BENEDICT DE.

Bibliography. C. L. Becker, Heavenly City of the Eighteenth-Century Philosophers; J. Bronowski and B. Mazlish, Western Intellectual Tradition: From Leonardo to Hegel; E. Cassirer, Philosophy of the Enlightenment; F. Copleston, History of Philosophy; R. Descartes, Discourse on Method; P. Gay, Deism: An Anthology; W. T. Jones, History of Western Philosophy; G. Leibniz, Monadology; B. Spinoza, Ethics and Tractatus Theologico-Politicus; B. Williams, Encyclopedia of Philosophy.

Rauschenbusch, Walter (1861–1918). American clergyman and social reformer. “Father of the social gospel,” he was born in Rochester, New York, where his father was a professor in the German Department of Rochester's Baptist Theological Seminary. Rauschenbusch lived in Rochester most of the rest of his life, except for one lengthy period that gave him the experiences that altered the course of Protestantism in the United States. In 1886 he became pastor of New York City's largely immigrant Second German Baptist Church, which was located on the lower East Side in an area aptly called Hell's Kitchen. What Rauschenbusch saw there of the immigrants' sordid living conditions, of labor exploitation by industrial giants, and of governmental indifference to the suffering of the poor led him to rethink his religious categories, to begin a fresh study of the Bible, and to explore the views of social critics like socialist Henry George and urban planner Jacob Riis.

When Rauschenbusch returned to Rochester in 1897 as a professor at the seminary, he did not forget his New York experience. His first book, Christianity and the Social Crisis (1907), was his response to America's social crisis. It was an immediate sensation. The book recalled the great social concerns of OT prophets and the powerful social effects of the NT church. It called for a faith that applied Christian beliefs to practical social ethics.

In subsequent books Rauschenbusch fleshed out the contours of a social gospel. Christianizing the Social Order (1912) contained his most sustained criticism of American capitalism, which, according to Rauschenbusch, blinded its practitioners to human needs in a drive for profit, tyrannized over the weak and defenseless, and fostered values through mass marketing that debased the spirit. In the place of capitalism, he called for a social order characterized by justice, collective ownership of most property, democracy in the organization of industry, and a much more equal distribution of goods. Rauschenbusch frequently called himself a Christian socialist, but he also took pains to disavow Marxist formulas for reconstructing American economic life.

Rauschenbusch's last major work, Theology for the Social Gospel (1917), appeared shortly before his death. It set out systematically a Christian theology to address the needs of modern society. It was somewhat less optimistic than earlier books about the possibilities for human improvement. Yet Rauschenbusch had never underestimated the reality or permanence of evil. The volume also warned of how dangerous mere social movements could be if they lost the backing of Christian theology. Throughout his work Rauschenbusch stressed the theme of the kingdom of God. He admitted that his conception of the kingdom represented an effort to Christianize Darwinistic evolution, but he also maintained that progress for the kingdom could never take place without the presence of Christ and the work of the Holy Spirit.

Rauschenbusch had no room in his theology for the substitutionary atonement, a literal hell, or a literal second coming. He also encouraged a nearly utopian sense of human potential. And he accepted many of the conclusions of biblical higher criticism. Yet he retained a firm commitment to OT ideals of justice, to the power of Christ as the means for changing society, and to the conviction that evil was not a passing fantasy.

Rauschenbusch lived before the fundamentalist-modernist clashes of the 1920s sharpened lines of combat between evangelical and liberal theology. In his day he was known as an "evangelical liberal" who combined elements of orthodoxy with convictions of the modern age. His reputation as the leader of the social gospel has blinded both liberals and evangelicals to how much orthodoxy remained in his social gospel. He was undoubtedly the most influential American Christian thinker in the first third of the twentieth century.

M. A. NOLL

See also LIBERALISM, THEOLOGICAL; SOCIAL GOSPEL.

Bibliography. B. Y. Landis, ed., Rauschenbusch Reader; R. T. Handy, ed., Social Gospel in America, 1870–1920; C. H. Hopkins, Rise of the Social Gospel in American Protestantism, 1865–1915; K. J. Jachen, Rauschenbusch: The Formative Years; P. M. Minus, Walter Rauschenbusch, American Reformer; D. R. Sharpe, Walter Rauschenbusch.

Reader. See MINOR ORDERS.

Realism. The theory of knowledge that maintains that "universals" (general concepts representing the common elements belonging to individuals of the same genus or species) have a separate existence apart from individual objects. It stands in contrast to nominalism, which held that universals had no reality apart from their existence in the thought of an individual. Plato's insistence that there is a realm of universals above the material universe as real as individual objects themselves had a great influence on medieval thought.

Anselm's form of realism led him to the belief that by giving proper attention to universal concepts, one could prove the truths of theology. He accepted revealed truth but was convinced that one should exercise reason in apprehending the truth. For example, he was convinced that by "necessary reasons" he could demonstrate the existence of God. Because God is the greatest of beings, Anselm reasoned in his Proslogion, he must exist in reality as well as in thought, for if he existed in thought only, a greater being could be conceived of. Thus, from consideration of an ideal or universal, Anselm believed that he could derive truth about what actually exists.

Augustine had modified Plato's realism by holding that universals existed before the material universe in God's creative mind. This viewpoint was expanded by twelfth-century ultrarealists, such as Duns Scotus, Odo of Tournai, and William of Champeaux (in his early years), to posit that the logical and real orders are exactly parallel. By proposing that universals came before individuals, the ultrarealists maintained that the reality of individuals came from the universal. Thus, humanity as a universal preceded individuals. In this fashion they explained theological concepts such as transmission of original sin in the human race and the oneness of the Trinity: God comes first; Father, Son, and Holy Spirit share together in God.

Thomas Aquinas in his Summa Theologica amended this ultrarealist position by developing Aristotle's doctrine that universals have a being only in material objects. According to Aquinas, we cannot assert that universals exist wholly apart from individual objects inasmuch as we know of them only through sensory impressions of individual objects. Thus, universals are abstracted from the knowledge rooted in individual things. This "moderate realism" stressed that human reason could not totally grasp God's being. One could profitably use reason, then, to determine universals, and one could use reason in theology whenever it was concerned with the connection between universals and individual objects.

Realism had a great effect on the “natural theology” of medieval scholasticism. It affected both the method of demonstration and the shape of the theological dogmas that resulted. One notes its influence to a lesser extent after the Reformation in both Roman Catholic Neo-Thomist circles and among Protestants who emphasize the “unity” of the human race in the passing on of original sin (e.g., W. G. T. Shedd). D. A. RAUSCH

See also ANSELM OF CANTERBURY; DUNS SCOTUS, JOHN; NEO-THOMISM; NOMINALISM; SCHOLASTICISM; THOMAS AQUINAS.

Bibliography. D. M. Armstrong, Universals and Scientific Realism: Nominalism and Realism; F. Copleston, History of Philosophy; M. deWulf, History of Medieval Philosophy; É. Gilson, History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages; R. Seeberg, Textbook of the History of Doctrines; W. G. T. Shedd, Dogmatic Theology.

Realism, Scottish. See SCOTTISH REALISM.

Realized Eschatology. This concept should be contrasted with futurist or thoroughgoing eschatology, in which the teaching of Jesus about the kingdom of God is viewed as significantly influenced by Jewish apocalyptic. While continental scholarship has focused on the latter, the Anglo-American tradition has often urged that the futurist aspects of the kingdom be reduced to a bare minimum. Some have dismissed this apocalyptic note as an early Christian accretion, but many NT scholars have viewed the apocalyptic language as symbolic of a profound theological reality. Instead, they argue, Jesus viewed his ministry as inaugurating the kingdom—that is, this eschatological reality was realized within Christ’s own ministry.

C. H. Dodd is often identified with realized eschatology because of his epoch-making challenge to the apocalyptic interpreters of Jesus. Dodd’s chief contribution was published in 1935 (Parables of the Kingdom), in which he examined various texts that spoke of the kingdom as already present. This does not mean that Jesus merely pointed to the sovereignty of God in human history and labeled this the kingdom, but rather that Jesus viewed the kingdom as arriving in an unparalleled, decisive way. The eschatological power of God had come into effective operation within his present life and was released through his death. Hence, in Luke 11:20 we learn that Jesus himself is revealing this new power: “If I drive out demons by the finger of God, then the kingdom of God has come to you.” Luke 17:20–37 is similar in that Jesus seems to deny the observable signs of apocalyptic: “because the kingdom of God is within you” (v. 21). Dodd particularly stressed the parables of growth (the weeds among wheat, the mustard seed, the sower; see esp. Matt. 13), which find their meaning in a this-worldly event of decisive importance.

To be sure, this alters the entire scheme of futurist eschatology wherein the kingdom ushers in the end. “The eschaton has moved from the future to the present, from the sphere of expectation into that of realized experience” (Parables of the Kingdom, 50). For Dodd this must become a fixed point in interpretation, because it is these teachings of Jesus that are explicit and unequivocal. “It represents the ministry of Jesus as ‘realized eschatology’; as the impact upon this world of the ‘powers of the world to come’ in a series of events, unprecedented and unrepeatable, now in actual progress” (ibid., 51). Thus, when Jesus says, “Blessed are the eyes that see what you see” (Luke 10:23), he is referring to his messianic acts, which in themselves are ushering in the eschatological kingdom of God. “It is no longer imminent; it is here” (ibid., 49).

It must be said at once that realized eschatology has suffered many criticisms. Scholars have quickly pointed out that Dodd was less than fair in his exegesis of many futurist texts (e.g., Mark 9:1; 13:1–37; 14:25). Still, in a later response to his critics (Coming of Christ, 1951), Dodd accepted the futurist sayings but reinterpreted them as predictions of a transcendent age. Norman Perrin for one has successfully shown how Judaism employed no such transcendent concept of the kingdom and that Dodd again has misrepresented the text by applying a foreign Greek category to Jesus’ Hebrew teaching.

Most interpreters have argued for a synthesis of realized and futurist components in eschatology. Dodd convincingly demonstrated that Jesus’ appearance brought to bear on history an eschatological crisis in the present; however, history still awaits its consummation in the future, when the kingdom will come in apocalyptic power.

G. M. BURGE

See also DODD, CHARLES HAROLD.

Bibliography. W. H. Gloer, ed., Eschatology and the New Testament; L. J. Kreitzer, Jesus and God in Paul’s Eschatology; W. G. Kümmel, Promise and Fulfillment; G. E. Ladd, Crucial Questions about the Kingdom of God; G. Lundström, Kingdom of God in the Teaching of Jesus; P. S. Minear, New Testament Apocalyptic; N. Perrin, Kingdom of God in the Teaching of Jesus; R. Schnackenburg, God’s Rule and Kingdom; A. Schweitzer, Mysticism of Paul the Apostle.

Real Presence. The true, substantial (realis), physical presence of the body and blood of the incarnate Christ in the Eucharist. According to Roman Catholic dogma, this occurs by “transub-stantiation,” the transformation of the substance of bread and wine into the “entire Christ, body, blood, soul, and divinity,” while the “accidents” (outward appearances) remain. For Lutherans, “the true body and blood of Christ are really present . . . under the form of bread and wine” (Augsburg Confession, X). Both traditions understand the Eucharist as symbol and remembrance but deny that this exhausts its meaning.

Real Presence

Spiritual supports include Jesus’ words of institution at the Last Supper, “This is my body”; the covenantal and testamentary nature of the Last Supper, requiring an actual (not merely symbolic or spiritual) victim to be eaten for ratification; and John 6, especially Christ’s command to “eat my flesh” and “drink my blood” (vv. 53–54).

The doctrine triumphed in the eleventh-century dispute between Berengar of Tours and Lanfranc of Bec, reversing the ninth-century dispute between Ratramnus and Paschasius Radbertus, both monks of Corbie. Berengar and Ratramnus affirmed the real presence, denying that this entailed a physical, bodily presence, upon which Radbertus and Lanfranc insisted. The Fourth Lateran Council (1215, Canon 1) defined transubstantiation as the means of real presence, and the Council of Trent (1551, session 13) reaffirmed it. The real presence begins with the consecration, ending only with the corruption of the species (outward appearances of bread and wine.)

Luther emphasized the ubiquity of the incarnate Christ and the “oral eating” of Christ’s body, even by the wicked, but rejected transubstantiation. Philipp Melancthon denied ubiquity but likewise affirmed the real presence.

For Martin Bucer, Heinrich Bullinger (Second Helvetic Confession 21.10), John Calvin, Peter Martyr Vermigli, and most of the Reformed tradition (e.g., Westminster Confession 29.7) as well as the Anglican Thirty-Nine Articles (28), Christ is “spiritually present” in the sacrament by the ministry of the Holy Spirit and is received by faith. They affirm Christ’s “true” and thus real presence, even “substantial” presence (Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion [1559] 4.17.19), distinguishing this from physical presence.

S. R. SPENCER

See also LORD’S SUPPER; LORD’S SUPPER, VIEWS OF.

Bibliography. W. Beinert and F. S. Fiorenza, eds., Handbook of Catholic Theology; J. C. McLelland, Visible Works of God; H. Sasse, This Is My Body.

Reason. The capacity of the human intellect to carry out organized mental activity such as the association of ideas, induction and deduction of inferences, or formulation of value judgments. Biblically, the existence of an efficacious human reason is assumed. In Isaiah 1:18 God calls directly on human reason, and this appeal represents a pattern throughout Scripture. The nature of reason, however, is not explicitly described. Consequently, there has been a wide diversity of opinion within systematic theology on the capabilities of reason, particularly in comparison with the faculty of faith.

History. Over the history of the church few theologians have espoused pure rationalism, viz., the idea that naked reason can without benefit of faith deduce all Christian truth. In the few instances where this approach may have been used (e.g., Socinianism, deism, Hegelianism), technical heresies were almost invariably the direct consequence.

Guarding against potential abuse of reason has led a significant array of Christian thinkers to disparage reason strongly, often specifically by disparaging the systematic expression of reason in a philosophical system. Tertullian asked the celebrated question, “What has Athens to do with Jerusalem?” and avowed belief in the absurd. Martin Luther called reason a “harlot” and insisted that the gospel was contrary to reason. Blaise Pascal maintained that faith can never be based on purely rational criteria. Finally, Søren Kierkegaard opposed the Hegelian system with an appeal to the individual’s need to make a decision not based on logical deductions. But in understanding any of these apparent antirationalists it is necessary to realize that they were not themselves irrational; their writings are coherent and analytical. Rather, what they have in common is the contention that Christian truth is not based on reason.

Many noted writers utilizing a Platonic expression of Christian theology have held to the clear precedence of faith over reason. “I believe that I may understand,” was the slogan attributed to Augustine of Hippo and adopted by Anselm of Canterbury. Under this theory reason is operative only insofar as it has been placed in subjection to prior Christian faith. Paradoxically, however, it appears that once the initial faith commitment has been made, there are few limits to the powers of reason in this tradition. For example, Anselm has given us the ontological argument for God’s existence, which, though cast in the form of a prayer, is essentially a deduction of God’s being purely from concepts of reason. In Cur Deus Homo Anselm goes on to deduce the necessity of the incarnation and the atonement. The contemporary successors to Platonic rationalism in this sense may be found in the thought of such presuppositionalist apologetes as Cornelius Van Til and Gordon Clark.

Thomas Aquinas and his disciples have attempted to maintain a delicately balanced view of reason and faith. They see reason as a viable avenue of Christian knowledge, but it is far from omnipotent. There are a number of truths open to reason—e.g., the existence of God and his goodness. But reason also finds a closed door on many issues; thus, it cannot deduce the Trinity, the incarnation, or the necessity of the atonement. These latter issues are known on the authority of faith. Further, reason does not have exclusive reign over its domain. Any of the items open to it can also be known by faith. In fact, for most people it is undoubtedly true that they know God to exist and to be good by faith alone. Moreover, Aquinas countered Siger of Brabant, another Aristotelian, who held to a double-truth theory: reason, if used properly, cannot arrive at conclusions opposed to faith.

Conclusion. Thus, we see that there have been a great number of opinions on reason in Christian thought. Despite all of this diversity, however, it is possible to draw up some conclusions that should be generally valid within all of evangelical theology.

1. Human reason is adequate to certain tasks and is presently fulfilling them. This truth applies to both Christians and non-Christians. In all spheres of life, whether the reasoning processes are formalized or not, individuals are attaining certain types of knowledge through their reasoning capacities. Minimal examples here might be the balancing of a checkbook or the reading of a road map. More elaborately, science and technology may be cited as representative of efficacious reason.

2. Human reason is finite. There are some tasks that human reason cannot fulfill by virtue of its limitations. Our reason stands in contrast to the divine intellect with its omniscience. The limitation applies not only to the mind of any given individual but to human consciousness seen as a totality as well. Consequently, reason by itself can never disclose all Christian truth. To illustrate with a drastic example, it is doubtful whether human reason can ever come to know the process of communication among the persons of the Trinity.

3. Human reason is affected by our sinfulness. Scripture (Rom. 1:20–23) tells us that sin corrupted human minds. As a consequence, humans have turned to idolatry and immorality.

4. The process of becoming saved involves reason but is not completed by it. The recognition that one is lost and needs to place one's faith in Jesus Christ as the sole source of salvation is a reasonable one. But salvation does not occur until a person then actually exercises his or her will and believes in Christ. Thus, contrary to a Gnostic scheme, redemption can never be due simply to a mental activity.

5. One of the goals of the Christian life is the renewing of the mind (Rom. 12:2). Hence, as a person grows in Christ, his or her reasoning becomes increasingly captive to the Spirit of God.

As a result the effects of sin on reason are removed, and the person's thinking processes are more closely linked to Jesus Christ both in cognition of divine truth and in moral perception.

W. CORDUAN

Bibliography. Anselm, Basic Writings; T. Aquinas, Summa contra Gentiles; G. H. Clark, Religion, Reason and Revelation; W. Corduan, Handmaid to Theology: An Essay in Philosophical Prolegomena; S. Kierkegaard, Concluding Unscientific Postscript; M. Luther, Lectures on Galatians; A. G. Padgett, Reason and the Christian Religion; J. Pelikan, From Luther to Kierkegaard; Tertullian, Apology; C. Van Til, Christian Theory of Knowledge.

Rebaptism. During the second century, the church in Asia Minor, faced with considerable heresy, refused to recognize the validity of heretical baptism. Converts to the orthodox faith from heretical groups were accordingly rebaptized. The church at Rome, however, took the position that the rite was valid when properly performed, i.e., with the correct formula and with the right intention, despite the erroneous views of its administrator. In North Africa, Tertullian, then Cyprian, would not recognize the baptism of heretics. Cyprian carried on a bitter controversy with Stephen, bishop of Rome, on this issue. An anonymous writing, De rebaptismate, set forth the position of the church at Rome. It made a distinction between water baptism and Spirit baptism. When a heretic was admitted to the church by the laying on of hands, the Spirit was conveyed, making further application of water unnecessary. The Roman position was endorsed by the Council of Arles (314) and was championed by Augustine in his controversy with the Donatists. Its advocates could point to the fact that Scripture contained no instance of rebaptism, that the analogous rite of circumcision was not repeatable, and that the questioning of the legitimacy of heretical baptism made the efficacy of the rite depend upon the persons involved in the rite rather than God. The Council of Trent, in its fourth canon on baptism, reaffirmed the Catholic position.

In Reformation times the Anabaptists insisted on baptism for those who had been baptized in infancy, and this has continued to be the position of the Baptist churches. The Roman Catholic Church and the Church of England practice what is known as conditional baptism in cases where there is doubt as to the validity of prior baptism. The formula used in the Church of England begins, "If thou art not already baptized, I baptize thee."

E. F. HARRISON

Bibliography. G. R. Beasley-Murray, Baptism Today and Tomorrow; E. W. Benson, Cyprian; D. Bridge, Water that Divides: The Baptismal Debate; A. Gilmore, ed., Christian Baptism.

Rebirth

Rebirth. See REGENERATION.

Recapitulation. The doctrine of recapitulation (Lat. recapitulatio; Gr. anakephalaiosis; a “summing up”) was derived from Ephesians 1:10. It is especially associated with Irenaeus, although later authors picked up its themes. There are two principal interpretations of the meaning Irenaeus gave to recapitulation: (1) Christ retraced the steps of Adam and humanity, an interpretation that accords with Irenaeus’s presentation of Christ’s career; (2) Christ comprehended or brought to a head in himself the whole of humanity, an interpretation that better accords with the meaning of Ephesians 1:10. Irenaeus elaborated the parallels between Adam and Christ. Adam was made of virgin soil, was tempted by Satan, and brought sin and death into the world through disobedience at the tree. Christ was born of the Virgin Mary, resisted temptation by Satan, and overcame sin by obedience to death on the cross. Irenaeus further suggested that Christ passed through all ages of life—infant, child, youth, and old man—to sanctify all who are born again to God through him. He became what we are to make us what he is. As a result of his life, death, and resurrection, all that was lost in Adam is regained in Christ. The human race was given a new start, and saved humanity is gathered together as one in Christ. Christ also summed up and completed in himself the revelation of God. The doctrine of recapitulation was important in the context of the Gnostic controversy because it secured the reality of the incarnation, the unity of humankind, and the certainty of redemption.

E. FERGUSON

See also IRENAEUS.

Bibliography. J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines; J. Lawson, Biblical Theology of Saint Irenaeus; J. T. Nielsen, Adam and Christ in the Theology of Irenaeus of Lyons; G. Wingren, Man and the Incarnation.

Receptionism. See LORD’S SUPPER, VIEWS OF.

Reconciliation. A doctrine usually ascribed to Paul, although the idea is present wherever estrangement or enmity is overcome and unity restored: brothers, litigants, perhaps man to God (Matt. 5:24); lost sheep to fold, prodigal to father, the lost back to God (Luke 19:10; cf. 1 Pet. 3:18). Indeed, reconciliation is exemplified in Jesus’ attitude toward sinners—the truth in Athanasius’s thought that incarnation is reconciliation.

The root idea (in Greek) is change of attitude or relationship. Paul applies it to wife and husband (1 Cor. 7:11), to Jews and Gentiles reconciled to each other in being reconciled to God (Eph. 2:14), and to the alienated, divisive elements of a fragmented universe brought “under one head” again in Christ (Eph. 1:10; Col. 1:20). His illustrations include those far off made nigh, strangers made fellow citizens or of the household, and dividing walls removed. His testimony to reconciliation’s results dwells especially upon peace with God (Rom. 5:1; Eph. 2:14; Col. 1:20); “access” to God’s presence in place of estrangement (Rom. 5:2; Eph. 2:18; 3:12; see Col. 1:22); joy in God rather than dread of “wrath” (Rom. 5:9, 11); and assurance that “God is for us,” not against us (Rom. 8:31).

The Central Concept of Christianity. Since a right relationship with God is the heart of all religion, reconciliation that makes access, welcome, and fellowship possible for all may be held the central concept in Christianity. But to describe this experience with doctrinal precision raises questions. Humans being made for fellowship with God, what is the difficulty requiring Christ’s intervention? Since reconciliation means that God does not count men’s sins against them and that he made Christ to be sin for us (2 Cor. 5:18–21), part of the answer must be sin, which separates God and humans. This alienation from God and from his people (Eph. 2:12; 4:18) deepens into resentment, enmity (Rom. 5:10), increased by carnality hostile to God (Rom. 8:7), expressed in rebellious wickedness: “you were alienated . . . enemies in your minds because of your evil behavior” (Col. 1:21). This total attitude of humans needs to be removed.

If this were all, then revelation of truth, the example of Christ, the demonstration of divine love, would remove misunderstanding, effecting reconciliation. But Romans 11:28, which contrasts “enemies” with the “loved”, repeated references to divine “judicial” wrath (Rom. 1:18; 5:9; 12:19), and the whole case for divine condemnation (Rom. 1–3) suggest that humans are “the objects of divine hostility” (Denney); that one’s sense of estrangement (“a certain fearful looking-for of judgment”) witnesses to a barrier on God’s side, precluding fellowship—not, certainly, any reluctance in God’s mind, which Jesus must change, but a moral, even judicial, barrier that requires the death of Jesus, not merely his message or example, to remove.

Humanity Reconciled. Who, then, is reconciled? Certainly the human being is changed. “We were reconciled . . . being reconciled . . . we received reconciliation . . . he reconciled us . . . be reconciled” consistently apply reconciliation to humanity. Estrangement gives place to prayer and fellowship, hostility becomes faith, and rebellion becomes obedience. Further, humanity is reconciled to humanity (Eph. 2:14) and also to life itself. We are reconciled to the legitimate requirements of God and his discipling hand in our lives, therein providing contentment. The world, too, is reconciled (2 Cor. 5:19) or to be reconciled (Eph. 1:10; Col. 1:20).

But this change in humanity could be effected without Christ by persuasion, example, or education. Yet in the NT the basis of reconciliation is "the death of his Son," "through the cross," "by the blood of his cross," "by Christ's physical body through death" (Rom. 5:10; Eph. 2:16; Col. 1:20, 22); and its means are "through Christ . . . made . . . to be sin" (2 Cor. 5:18, 21). Some therefore hold that "God is reconciled, in the sense that his will to bless us is realised as it was not before. . . . God would not be to us what he is if Christ had not died" (Denney). Sin affects God, so as to require from him judgment, withdrawal, correction, creating for God too a barrier to fellowship, a problem to be resolved before God and sinful humanity can be at one again. ("At-one-ment" once meant reconciliation; now atonement means reparation, satisfaction, the basis of reconciliation.) Whether or not God could ignore the separation wrought by sin and embrace human beings in fellowship without further ado, he did not: "We were reconciled to God by the death of his Son."

Arguments against any reconciliation of God to humanity stress the absence of that expression from the NT; deny wrath, judgment, atonement; and expound a subjective, moral influence theory of reconciliation.

God the Reconciler. Then who reconciles? In all other religions one propitiates one's gods. Christianity declares "God was reconciling the world to himself in Christ" (2 Cor. 5:19), an accomplished fact people are urged to accept. "We have now received reconciliation" (Rom. 5:11). As Christ is our peace; as we are reconciled by his death, as God put forward Christ in expiatory power (Rom. 3:25), and as the sin that separates is ours, not God's—only God could reconcile.

The resulting paradox, that God reconciles those he recognizes up to the moment of reconciliation as enemies, is no greater than in the command "Love your enemies." For love always treats its enemies as no enemies at all.

An Ethical Revaluation. Partly from the attraction of so-called liberation theology, which seeks the direct social and political interpretation of everything in Christianity, and partly in reaction against the violence of the twentieth century, it has been suggested that reconciliation is not merely the central idea but the sole and controlling category under which everything Christian must be understood. Not only is the incarnation itself a divine act of reconciliation ("the Father sent the Son to draw the world into the true community of the Godhead"), but Christ's whole ministry of healing, enlightenment, and friendship is a continuous offer of reconciliation toward the sick, poor, sinful, outcasts, lepers, insane, underprivileged, Samaritans, Romans, and (by implication) other Gentiles.

So, too, the church was commissioned, not as a cozy fellowship of the likeminded but as an agency of unification, to go out into all the world with Christ's reconciling message. The church's historic exclusiveness and endless divisions are thus direct contradictions of its essential function. When we recall that a shared meal was in Eastern eyes a means to unity, implying a covenant of friendship, we understand the original purpose of the Eucharist, not as a celebration of Christian privilege but as an ever-repeated pledge and renewal of reconciliation to God and one another, enshrining the basic Christian commandment (uttered at the table) of mutual reconciling love. Evangelism, likewise, should never be reduced to calling out of society committed converts to Christianity, but should aim to establish fellowship with any who will accept it, wherever and whoever and whatever they are, that all may then grow together into Christ.

Thus, it is not enough to proclaim a past act of reconciliation as the essence of the gospel unless we go on to declare with Paul, and to practice as the sole function of Christianity in the world, the ministry of reconciliation we have received from God, until the Christian hope of one world, so long fragmented, shall "be put into effect when the times will have reached their fulfillment—to bring all things in heaven and on earth together under one head, even Christ" (Eph. 1:10).

If this should ultimately prove to be an overemphasis on partial truth, to the detriment of other equally valid truths and values, it nevertheless contains insights, and a challenge, that the church must not ignore. R. E. O. WHITE

See also ATONEMENT; MAN, OLD AND NEW; PAUL, THEOLOGY OF; PROPITIATION.

Bibliography. G. C. Berkonwer, Work of Christ; C. Brown and H. Vorlander, NIDNT 3:146–76; O. E. Costas, Liberating News; J. Denney, Christian Doctrine of Reconciliation; H. D. McDonald, New Testament Concept of Atonement; J. S. Stewart, Man in Christ; V. Taylor, Forgiveness and Reconciliation; R. Wallace, Atoning Death of Christ.

Rector. See CHURCH OFFICERS.

Redeemer, Redemption. Though closely allied to salvation, redemption is more specific, for it denotes the means by which salvation is achieved, namely, by the payment of a ransom. As in the case of salvation it may denote temporal, physical deliverance. In the OT the principal words are pādā and gā'al, which are usually rendered by lytrousthai in the LXX, occasionally by rhyesthai. In the NT lytrousthai is the usual verb form, and nouns are lytrōsis and apolytrōsis. Occasionally agorazein is used, or exagorazein, denoting the act of purchase in the market, especially the slave market. For “ransom” lytron and antilytron are used.

Redeemer, Redemption

In the Old Testament. In ancient Israel both property and life could be redeemed by making the appropriate payment. Since the firstborn were spared in the last plague God visited upon Egypt, he had a special claim on these, so that the firstborn thereafter had to be redeemed by a money payment (Exod. 13:13–15). According to the Pentateuchal legislation, if a man lost his inheritance through debt or sold himself into slavery, he and his property could be redeemed if one near of kin came forward to provide the redemption price (Lev. 25:25–27, 47–54; cf. Ruth 4:1–12). The kinsman-redeemer was also the avenger of blood on occasion.

God’s deliverance of his people from Egypt is spoken of as a redemption (Exod. 6:6; 15:13), and he is Israel’s Redeemer (Ps. 78:35). The emphasis here may well be upon the great output of strength needed to accomplish this objective—strength which itself serves as a kind of ransom price. Once again God’s people are found in captivity (Babylon), and again the language of redemption is used in connection with their release (Jer. 31:11; 50:33–34). The probable meaning of Isaiah 43:3 is that the conqueror of Babylon and therefore the liberator of Judah, even Cyrus, is being promised a domain in Africa as a compensation for giving up captive Judah and restoring them to their inheritance in the land of Canaan.

The individual also is sometimes the object of God’s redemption, as in Job 19:25, where the sufferer expresses his confidence in a living Redeemer who will vindicate him eventually, despite all present appearances to the contrary. Proverbs 23:10–11 presents the same general cast of thought.

It is rather surprising that redemption is verbally so little associated with sin in the OT. Psalm 130:8 contains the promise that Jehovah will redeem Israel from all their sins. Isaiah 59:20, which Paul quotes in Romans 11:26, says much the same thing in more general terms (cf. Isa. 44:22). In Psalm 49:7 the impossibility of self-ransom for one’s life is emphasized. It is possible that the scarcity of reference to redemption from sin in the OT is due to the ever-present proclamation of redemption through the sacrificial system, making formal statements along this line somewhat superfluous. Furthermore, redemption from the ills of life, such as the Babylonian captivity, would inevitably carry with it the thought that God redeems from sin, for it was sin that brought on the captivity (Isa. 40:2).

The occurrence of numerous passages in the OT where redemption is stated in terms that do not explicitly include the element of ransom has led some scholars to conclude that redemption came to mean deliverance without any insistence upon a ransom as a condition or basis. The manifestation of the power of God in the deliverance of his people seems at times to be the sole emphasis (Deut. 9:26). But on the other hand, there is no hint in the direction of the exclusion of a ransom. The ransom idea may well be an assumed factor that is kept in the background by the very prominence given to the element of power needed for the deliverance.

In the New Testament. This observation affords the necessary bridge to the NT use of redemption. Certain passages in the Gospels reflect this somewhat vague use of the word as implying divine intervention in behalf of God’s people without specific reference to any ransom to be paid (Luke 2:38; 24:21).

Mark 10:45, though it does not contain the word redeem, is a crucial passage for the subject because it opens to us the mind of Christ concerning his mission. His life of ministry would terminate in an act of self-sacrifice that would serve as a ransom for the many who needed it. The largest development of the doctrine in the NT comes in the writings of Paul. Christ has redeemed from the curse of the law (Gal. 3:13; 4:5; exagorazein in both cases). In the apostle’s most concentrated section on the work of Christ, he couples redemption with justification and propitiation (Rom. 3:24; cf. 1 Cor. 1:30). One prominent feature of Paul’s usage is the double reference to the word—with a present application to the forgiveness of sins based on the ransom price of the shed blood of Christ (Eph. 1:7; cf. 1 Pet. 1:18–19) and a future application to the deliverance of the body from its present debility and liability to corruption (Rom. 8:23). This latter event is associated with the day of redemption (Eph. 4:30), not in the sense that redemption will then be operative for the first time, but that the redemption secured by Christ and applied to the soul’s forgiveness is then extended to include the body as well, so that salvation is brought to its intended consummation.

Redemption, though it includes the concept of deliverance, is a more precise term. Otherwise it would be expected that biblical writers would make more extensive use of words denoting deliverance per se, such as lyein or rhyesthai, to the neglect of words for redeem. Yet such is not the case. It is significant that Paul can content himself with the use of rhyesthai when setting forth the relation of Christ’s saving work for us with respect to hostile angelic powers (Col. 1:13), yet when he passes to a contemplation of the forgiveness of our sins he must change his terminology to that of redemption (Col. 1:14).

No word in the Christian vocabulary deserves to be held more precious than Redeemer, for even more than Savior it reminds the child of God that his salvation has been purchased at a great and personal cost, for the Lord has given himself for our sins in order to deliver us from them. E. F. HARRISON

See also MESSIAH; SALVATION.

Bibliography. R. J. Banks, ed., Reconciliation and Hope; J. Edwards, History of the Work of Redemption; J. F. Gerig, Conflict: From Eden to Eternity; S. Lyonnet and L. Sabourin, Sin, Redemption, and Sacrifice; L. Morris, Apostolic Preaching of the Cross; J. Murray, Redemption—Accomplished and Applied; O. Procksch et al., TDNT 4:328–56; J. Schneider and C. Brown, NIDNT 3:177–223; J. R. W. Stott, Cross of Christ; V. Taylor, Forgiveness and Reconciliation; B. B. Warfield, Plan of Salvation; A. M. Wolters, Creation Regained.

Redemption, General. See ATONEMENT, EXTENT OF.

Redemption, Particular. See ATONEMENT, EXTENT OF.

Redemption History. See HEILSGESCHICHTE.

Reformation, Protestant. A wide-ranging movement of religious renewal in Europe concentrated in the sixteenth century but anticipated by earlier reform initiatives—e.g., by Waldensians in the Alpine regions, Wycliffe and Lollardy in England, and Hussites in Bohemia. Although inseparable from its historical context—political (the emergent nation-states and the tactical interplay of forces and interests in Imperial Germany and in the loose Swiss Confederation), socioeconomic (particularly urban growth, with expanding trade, the transition to a money economy, and new technologies, notably printing, promoting a new assertive middle class, alongside persistent peasant discontents), and intellectual (chiefly the Renaissance, especially in the Christian humanism of northern Europe)—it was fundamentally religious in motivation and objective.

It was not so much a trail blazed by Luther's lonely comet, with other lesser luminaries in its train, as the appearance over two or three decades of a whole constellation of varied color and brightness, Luther no doubt the most sparkling among them, but not all shining solely with his borrowed light. The morning star was Erasmus, for most Reformers were trained humanists, skilled in the ancient languages, grounded in biblical and patristic sources, and enlightened by his pioneer printing of the Greek NT of 1516. Although Luther in Wittenberg's new university in rural Saxony had a catalytic effect felt throughout Europe, reform was astir in numerous centers. Probably independent in origin was Zwingli's more radical reform in Zurich, provoking the thoroughgoing Anabaptist radicalism of the Swiss Brethren. Strasbourg under Bucer's leadership illustrated a mediating pattern of reform, while Geneva, reformed under Berne's tutelage, had by midcentury become an influential missionary center, exporting Calvinism to France, the Netherlands, Scotland, and elsewhere. Much of Germany and Scandinavia followed Luther's or perhaps Melancthon's Lutheranism, while England welcomed a welter of continental currents, at first more Lutheran, later more Reformed, to energize indigenous Lollard undercurrents.

Protestant Objections. The Reformers' target may be generally described as degenerate late medieval Catholicism, over against which they set the faith of the apostles and the early fathers. Some central target areas may be specified.

Papal Abuses. There was proliferating abuse, theological and practical, connected with penance, satisfactions, and the treasury of merit. These practices were the basis of indulgences, to which were directed Luther's Ninety-five Theses with their pivotal affirmation that "the true treasure of the Church is the most holy gospel of the glory and grace of God." Luther's anguished quest had taught him the bankruptcy of an exuberant piety that never lacked exercises for the unquiet conscience—vows, fasts, pilgrimages, masses, relics, recitations, rosaries, works, and so on. The Reformation answer, to which Luther's new understanding of Romans 1 brought him through many struggles, was justification by God's grace in Christ alone received by faith alone. "The righteousness of God is that righteousness whereby, through grace and sheer mercy, he justifies us by faith." Christ's righteousness credited to believers gave them assurance before God, while they never ceased to be sinful and penitent, for "the whole life of the Christian is one of penitence." Jesus said "Be penitent" (Greek), not "Do penance" (Latin Vulgate). Luther's theology of the cross was a protest against the "cheap grace" of a commercialized, fiscal religion.

The False Foundations of Papal Authority. Lorenzo Valla's exposure of the forged Donation of Constantine combined with fresh biblical and historical study to undermine papal pretensions. The rock on which the church was built was Peter's faith, and in the early centuries the Roman bishop enjoyed no more than a primacy of honor. While most Reformers professed a readiness to accept a reformed papacy that served to edify the church, so resistant did the papacy prove to even moderate reform that antichrist seemed a deserved designation.

The Ecclesiastical Captivity of the Word of God. Whether by papal magisterium (authoritative teaching office), church dogma, or the sophistries of schoolmen, canonists, and allegorists, this was a leading target of Luther's "Reformation Treatises" of 1520. In 1519 he had denied the infallibility of general councils. The Reformers liberated the Bible, by vernacular translation (notably Luther's German Bible), expository preaching (recommenced by Zwingli), and straightforward grammatico-historical exegesis (best exemplified in Calvin's commentaries). Disputations, often critical in the pacing of reform, operated like communal Bible studies. Thus were the Scriptures enthroned as judge of all ecclesiastical traditions and the sole source of authentic doctrine, as well as experienced as the living power of God in judgment and grace.

Reformation, Protestant

The Superiority of the "Religious" Life. The Reformers maintained a tireless polemic against monasticism, one of the most prominent features of Latin Christianity. They rejected the distinction between the inferior life of the secular Christian and the higher "religious" world of monk and nun. The Reformation was a strident protest against this distorted set of values. Luther and Calvin both stressed the Christian dignity of ordinary human callings of artisan, housewife, and plowman. Reformers almost insisted on clerical marriage, by their own example elevating the importance of family life. From another angle they objected to clerical intrusion into civil affairs—e.g., the administration of marriage and divorce—and regarded political office as one of the most significant Christian vocations.

Perverved Priesthood and Usurped Mediation. The mediation of Mary (though not necessarily her perpetual virginity) and the intercession of the saints were denied alike by the Reformers. Christ alone was exalted as our advocate before God and God's appointed priest to bear our sins and minister to our frailty. By rejecting all but two—baptism and Lord's Supper—of the seven medieval sacraments, the Reformation liberated the faithful from the power of the priesthood. The church lost its indispensable role as sacramental dispenser of salvation. Transubstantiation was refuted, along with the sacrificial character of the Mass except as the response of thankful hearts and lives. In accordance with NT usage all believers were declared to be by baptism a royal priesthood, free to fulfill a priestly service to others in need of the Word of life.

The Hierarchical Captivity of the Church. In response to allegations of innovation and disruption of the church's long-lived unity, the Reformers claimed to be renovators, restorers of the primitive face of the church. Such a church was not dependent on communion with the papacy or hierarchical succession but was constituted by its election and calling in Christ and recognized by faithfulness to the Word and sacraments of the gospel. Although some Reformers experienced doubts about infant baptism, and Luther, Bucer, and others held together after a closer congregation of the truly committed, in the end all stood by the baptism of infants. A major factor was their fear of dividing the civil community, which by common baptism could be regarded as coterminous with the visible church. Although the distinction between the church visible (seen by human eyes) and invisible (known only to God) was used by the Reformers, it was not their customary way of acknowledging the mixed character of the church.

The Confusion of Divine and Human. Reformation theology was strongly theocentric and clearly reasserted the distinction between Creator and creation. Confusion between the two blighted medieval doctrine in various spheres—Eucharist, church, papacy—and made its influence felt in other areas, such as mysticism and anthropology. With a starkly Augustinian understanding of original sin (qualified somewhat by Zwingli), the Reformers asserted humankind's total spiritual inability apart from the renewal of the Spirit. On unconditional election the Reformation spoke almost as one voice. If Calvin related predestination more closely to providence and directed all his theology to the goal of the glory of God, Luther no less saw God's sovereign Word at work everywhere in his world.

The Legacy of the Reformation. Quite apart from the varying hues and shades of their theologies, which owe much to different intellectual and religious formations as well as to temperament, sociopolitical setting, and conviction, the Reformers were not agreed on all issues. Most notoriously they parted company on the Lord's Supper. For Luther the solid objectivity of Christ's presence was created by his Word ("This is my body") and could not be vulnerable to the recipient's unbelief. (His position is wrongly called "consubstantiation," because this implies that it belongs to the same conceptual order as "transubstantiation.") Others, even the mature Zwingli, stressed faith's spiritual eating of Christ's body and blood, and Calvin further focused on Communion with the heavenly Christ by the Spirit. In reform of worship and church order, Lutherans and Reformed adopted respectively more conservative and more radical approaches. A significant difference lay in attitudes toward the Mosaic law. Whereas for Luther its primary function is to abase sinners and drive them to the gospel, Calvin saw it chiefly as the guide of the Christian life. Again, while for Luther Scripture spoke everywhere of Christ and the gospel, Calvin handled it in a more disciplined and "modern" manner. Overall, "careful Calvin orchestrated Protestant theology most skillfully, but fertile Martin Luther wrote most of the tunes" (J. I. Packer).

Separate attention must be paid to the orthodox Anabaptist radicals whose Reformation was more sweeping than the "new papalism," as they called it, of the magisterial Reformers. Believers' baptism identified and safeguarded the bounds of the church, the gathered community of the covenanted band. Discipline was essential to maintain its purity (a point not lost on influential Reformed circles). The church's calling was to suffering and pilgrimage and to total separation from the world. By its accommodation with the empire of Constantine, the church had fatally "fallen." The restitution of the apostolic pattern in all particulars entailed the renunciation of the sword and of oaths. By advocating toleration, religious liberty, and separation of church and state, such Anabaptists were ahead of their time, and suffered for it. As Christendom dies out in the West, the attraction of the radical Reformation option appears in a clearer light.

At times—e.g., ca. 1540 in Germany—it seemed as though reform-minded Catholics might prevail. Rome thought otherwise, and in theology the Catholic reforms of Trent were in large measure counter-Protestant reaction. If renewal was more evident elsewhere, in the new Jesuit order, the Spanish mystics, and bishops like Francis of Sales, not until the twentieth century and Vatican Council II did the Roman Church take to heart the theological significance of the Reformation.

An ecumenical era deplores the divisions of the sixteenth century, and bilateral dialogues have chalked up significant doctrinal rapprochement between Rome and Reformation traditions. Yet Roman, especially papal, conservatism remains a stumbling block, both to evangelicals who still own the Reformation's protests and to liberals who largely consign them to oblivion.

D. F. WRIGHT

See also ANABAPTISTS; CALVIN, JOHN; COUNTER-REFORMATION; LUTHER, MARTIN; PROTESTANTISM.

Bibliography. A. C. Cochrane, Reformed Confessions of the Sixteenth Century; I. B. Cowan, Scottish Reformation; W. Cunningham, Reformers and the Theology of the Reformation; A. G. Dickens, English Reformation; T. George, Theology of the Reformers; G. F. Hershberger, ed., Recovery of the Anabaptist Vision; H. J. Hillerbrand, Reformation in Its Own Words; H. J. Hillerbrand, ed., Oxford Encyclopedia of the Reformation; P. E. Hughes, Theology of the English Reformers; C. Lindberg, European Reformation; F. H. Littell, Anabaptist View of the Church; A. E. McGrath, Reformation Thought: An Introduction; H. A. Oberman, Forerunners of the Reformation: The Shape of Late Medieval Thought; S. Ozment, Age of Reform, 1250–1550; J. Pelikan, Christian Tradition: Reformation of Church and Dogma; G. H. Williams, Radical Reformation.

Reformed Tradition. The term Reformed is used to distinguish the Calvinistic from the Lutheran and Anabaptist traditions. The Reformed tradition finds its roots in the theology of Ulrich Zwingli, the first reformer in Zurich, and John Calvin of Geneva, who in his biblical commentaries, his pamphlets, but especially in the Institutes of the Christian Religion, developed a Protestant theology. Calvin's teachings have been followed by many different individuals and groups who came out of the Reformation down to the present day, but they have not always followed exactly the same line of thinking or development. Thus, in the Reformed tradition, Calvinists, while basically agreeing and resembling each other in many ways, have certain differences produced by historical and even geographical circumstances. These differences have resulted in a number of what might be called lines or strains in the tradition.

The Reformation and the Reformed Tradition. The first line of development in the Reformed tradition was that which has been common to northwest Europe, Switzerland, France, Holland, Germany, and has also had an influence to the east in Hungary and to the south in the Waldensian church in Italy. The Reformed churches in the first-named areas were very active in producing the early confessions of faith and catechisms still held as doctrinal standards in many of the churches. Calvin drew up the first Reformed catechism in 1537 and rewrote it in 1541. This work was translated into a number of different languages and was widely influential. Even more important was the Heidelberg Confession of 1563, which is still a standard confessional document in most European Reformed churches. The Helvetic Confessions (1536, 1566), the Gallic Confession (1559), and the Belgic Confession (1561) also set forth a Calvinistic doctrinal position.

Across the channel in the British Isles, Calvinism was a dominant influence in the Reformation. While the Church of England was obliged by Queen Elizabeth to retain a quasi-Romanist liturgy and form of government, Calvinism was the underlying theology as expressed in the Thirty-nine Articles (1563), which were a rewritten version of Archbishop Cranmer's earlier Forty-two Articles (1553). Calvin's Institutes of the Christian Religion also provided English theological students with their basic theological instruction into the seventeenth century. The Puritans, consisting of Independents and Presbyterians and more consistently Calvinistic, sought to have all traces of Roman Catholicism eliminated from the Established Church. At the same time, a considerable number of Protestants influenced by Anabaptism, while accepting adult baptism as the only proper method of administering the sacrament, also accepted most Reformed doctrines. Because of their belief in the doctrine of predestination, they were known as "Particular" Baptists, as distinguished from the "Freewill" Baptists who rejected the doctrine. These non-conformist groups were responsible for the drawing up of the Westminster Confession of Faith, catechisms, Form of Church Government, and Directory of Worship, which have become the standards of all English-speaking Presbyterian churches. The Presbyterian church in Scotland, the Church of Scotland, which had originally used the Scots Confession (1560) and the Genevan Catechism, adopted the Westminster standards in 1647, after the English Parliament, dominated by the Independents, had refused to agree to their becoming the standards of the Church of England.

Reformed Tradition

The Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries. In the European and British colonies throughout the world, Reformed and Presbyterian churches from the late seventeenth century on were founded by the colonists who emigrated to Massachusetts, New York, South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, and other places. Although they often received little support from the home churches, at least at first, they nevertheless developed churches of their own, usually following the doctrinal, liturgical, and governmental traditions of the ecclesiastical background from which they had come. Most Presbyterian churches accept the Westminster documents as their subordinate standards, while those in the European Reformed tradition hold to the confessions and catechisms of the bodies from which they came.

The history of the Reformed tradition has been by no means peaceful or noncontroversial. Problems have arisen at times that have required those holding to the Reformed position to reexamine and defend their basic beliefs. One of the best examples and most influential developments was that which began with Dutch theologian James Arminius, who rejected Calvin's doctrines of grace. In 1610 his followers set forth a Remonstrance against those opposing them, bringing the matter to a head. The outcome was a synod held at Dordrecht in the Netherlands in 1618, made up of theologians from a number of countries, who condemned the Arminian teachings, asserting (1) the total depravity of man; (2) unconditional divine election; (3) that Christ's atonement was limited to the elect; (4) that divine grace is irresistible; and (5) the perseverance of the elect until the end. The Arminians were forced out of the Reformed church but established their own bodies and have had a wide influence, forming the basis for Wesleyan Methodism and other non- and anti-Reformed Christian groups. The Canons of the Synod of Dort are one of the Three Forms of Unity, the doctrinal standards of most Dutch Reformed churches, the other two being the Belgic Confession and the Heidelberg Catechism.

In England and Scotland a somewhat different conflict took place. In the Puritans' attempts to bring about a complete reform of the Church of England, they found themselves opposed by Elizabeth and her two successors, James I and Charles I. Influential in Parliament, they were able to oppose the monarchy, but eventually this led to war. The actual cause or starting point of the war was in Scotland, where Charles I sought to force episcopacy upon the Presbyterians. They resisted, and when Charles sought to raise an army in England, the Puritans in Parliament made such demands upon him that he attempted to overwhelm them by force. He was defeated, captured, and executed by the Parliament in 1649. For the next nine years Cromwell ruled the country, but shortly after his death, Charles II, Charles I's son, ascended the throne and sought to continue his father's policies in both England and Scotland. Although the Puritans in England were forced to submit, the Scots, by taking up arms against Charles, carried on a type of guerrilla warfare. The Covenanters, so called because they had covenanted together to defend the "Crown Rights of Jesus Christ," continued their opposition when Charles's brother James, a Roman Catholic, became king, and did not lay down their arms until James was forced off the British throne and was succeeded by William, Prince of Orange, in 1688.

While the Reformed tradition has had its conflicts, it also has had a very positive influence in the world. In the eighteenth century it was one of the principal centers of the evangelical revival. In Scotland the movement had begun by 1700 through the influence of Thomas Boston and the Marrow Men, so called because they had been greatly influenced by the Puritan work Marrow of Modern Divinity. The revival associated with the work of this group eventually merged with the evangelical revival in England through the influence of George Whitefield. At the same time in the American colonies Jonathan Edwards was involved in the Great Awakening, which was again linked to the English movement through Whitefield. In all these cases, Calvinistic theology was the underlying influence.

The Reformed Tradition in Recent Times. The revival of evangelical preaching and power did not stop there, for through Scottish influence it was carried to Europe in 1818, when Robert Haldane visited Switzerland on an evangelistic tour. He greatly influenced such men as César Malan and Merle d'Aubigne, and through them the evangelical revival spread to other parts of Europe. In Holland it had a particularly strong impact, resulting in the labors of Groen van Prinsterer, Herman Bavinck, and Abraham Kuyper. Kuyper was the founder of the Free University of Amsterdam, the leader of the movement that separated from the state church to form the Gereformeerde Kerk, and in 1901, as leader of the Anti-Revolutionary Party, became prime minister. As a result of Kuyper's work, a revival of Calvinism took place not only in ecclesiastical circles but in many other aspects of Dutch life, which have had an influence far beyond Holland.

In the British Isles the same Reformed tradition was bearing similar fruit. One of the most important ecclesiastical events was the exodus of a large part of the Church of Scotland to form the Free Church of Scotland. Although the immediate cause was the opposition to the right of patrons to impose ministers on congregations, fundamentally the cause was the fact that the Church of Scotland had largely given up its Reformed position, and those who wished to maintain it insisted that they must be free to choose their own ministers. When this was denied, they withdrew and formed their own denomination. But it was not just in the ecclesiastical sphere that those of Reformed persuasion took action. The Industrial Revolution in Britain had caused great changes, with widespread exploitation of the workers. To counteract this, men such as Anthony Ashley Cooper, the seventh earl of Shaftesbury in England, the Reverend Thomas Chalmers in Scotland, and others worked to have laws passed to protect factory hands, miners, and those with physical disabilities. Many of these leaders were strong Calvinists, and later in the century many with the same Christian views sat in the British Parliament and were responsible for other laws to ameliorate the condition of the working classes.

This Reformed practice of social and political involvement was carried to America, where those in the Reformed tradition have taken a considerable part in such matters. Many in the Presbyterian and Reformed churches were participants in the movement to abolish slavery, and more recently have been prominent in civil rights and similar movements. In South Africa the Reformed tradition had long been involved in support of racial apartheid policies and their application until recently, but this has now changed as some of the Reformed elements within the country and Reformed churches outside, through agencies such as the Reformed Ecumenical Synod, put pressure on South African churches to change their attitudes. The change in government policy has also forced the issue.

The Reformed tradition has always been strongly in favor of the education of church members. Calvin's insistence upon catechetical training of the young, and his establishment of what is now the University of Geneva, was imitated in Scotland by John Knox in the educational provisions in the First Book of Discipline, in the Netherlands by the establishment of such institutions as the University of Leiden, and in France by the founding of various seminaries. Similarly, in America this educational tradition was responsible for the founding of universities such as Harvard and Yale. In more recent years Calvin College in Grand Rapids, Michigan, Redeemer College in Hamilton, Ontario, and similar institutions indicate that the Reformed tradition in education is still functioning and is fulfilling an important part in developing an educated Christian citizenry.

During the latter part of the nineteenth and throughout the twentieth centuries, there has been a growing stress on the importance of Christian scholarship. Although there had always been Reformed scholars, Abraham Kuyper stimulated a strong interest in this field, which was followed in other countries. Outstanding modern scholars include Herman Dooyeweerd, D. H. Th. Vollenhoven, J. H. Bavinck, and others in the Netherlands, particularly in the Free University of Amsterdam; James Orr in Scotland; J. Gresham Machen and Cornelius Van Til in the United States; Pierre Marcel in France; and many others who have devoted themselves to developing a Reformed approach in many learned fields.

From 1850 another noticeable development has been the endeavors of the various Reformed and Presbyterian churches to cooperate in many ways. In 1875 the World Alliance of Reformed Churches (WARC) holding the Presbyterian system was organized and still continues. As some of the churches in the alliance, however, have drifted away from a truly Reformed theological position, as evidenced by new confessions and practices that do not seem to be Reformed, a number of Reformed denominations, particularly recently formed bodies, have refused to join the WARC. As a result, in the 1960s a new body, the Reformed Ecumenical Synod, was established to ensure that a fully Reformed witness would be maintained. Just prior to this some nonecclesiastical organizations had come into being. In 1953 at Montpellier, France, under the leadership of Pierre Marcel, the International Association for Reformed Faith and Action was founded, and in the United States more recently the National Association of Presbyterian and Reformed Churches was organized. In this way Reformed Christians are increasingly working together to set forth the gospel to the world. The outcome is that the Reformed tradition is exercising an influence not only in the Western world, but even at times more powerfully in such places as South Korea, Indonesia, India, and Africa.

The Reformed tradition has formed an important part of Western culture, influencing many different aspects of thought and life. Gradually, however, much of its contribution has been secularized, the religious roots being discarded and rejected. One cannot help wondering, therefore, if the condition of the Western world today is not the result of this rejection, with self-centeredness taking the place of doing all things "to the glory of God."

W. S. REID

See also CALVIN, JOHN; CALVINISM; DORT, SYNOD OF; EDWARDS, JONATHAN; KUYPER, ABRAHAM; MARROW CONTROVERSY; WHITEFIELD, GEORGE; ZWINGLI, ULRICH.

Reformed Tradition

Bibliography. J. Bratt, ed., Heritage of John Calvin; W. F. Graham, Constructive Revolutionary; H. Hoeksema, Protestant Reformed Churches in America; D. H. Kromminga, Christian Reformed Tradition; W. L. Lingle, Presbyterians, Their History and Beliefs; J. T. McNeill, History and Character of Calvinism; M. E. Osterhaven, Faith of the Church; Spirit of the Reformed Tradition; W. S. Reid, ed., John Calvin: His Influence in the Western World; E. T. Thompson, Presbyterianism in the South; D. F. Wells, ed., Reformed Tradition in America; A. C. Zenos, Presbyterianism in America.

Regeneration. Regeneration, or new birth, is an inner re-creating of fallen human nature by the gracious sovereign action of the Holy Spirit (John 3:5–8). The Bible conceives salvation as the redemptive renewal of humans on the basis of a restored relationship with God in Christ, and presents it as involving “a radical and complete transformation wrought in the soul (Rom. 12:2; Eph. 4:23) by God the Holy Spirit (Eph. 4:24; Titus 3:5), by virtue of which we become ‘new men’ (Eph. 4:24; Col. 3:10), no longer conformed to this world (Rom. 12:2; Eph. 4:22; Col. 3:9), but in knowledge and holiness of the truth created after the image of God (Rom. 12:2; Eph. 4:24; Col. 3:10)” (Warfield, Biblical and Theological Studies, 351). Regeneration is the “birth” by which this work of new creation is begun, as sanctification is the “growth” whereby it continues (1 Pet. 2:2; 2 Pet. 3:18). Regeneration in Christ changes a person’s disposition from the lawless, godless self-seeking (Rom. 3:9–18; 8:7) that dominates, into a disposition of trust and love, marked by repentance for past rebelliousness and unbelief, and ready compliance with God’s law. It enlightens the blinded mind to discern spiritual realities (1 Cor. 2:14–15; 2 Cor. 4:6; Col. 3:10) and liberates and energizes the enslaved will for free obedience to God (Rom. 6:14, 17–22; Phil. 2:13).

The use of the figure of new birth to describe this change emphasizes two facts about it. The first is its decisiveness. The regenerate person has forever ceased to be the person he or she was; the old life is over and a new life has begun; he or she is a new creature in Christ, buried with him out of reach of condemnation and raised with him into a new life of righteousness (see Rom. 6:3–11; 2 Cor. 5:17; Col. 3:9–11). The second fact emphasized is the monergism of regeneration. Infants do not induce, or cooperate in, their own procreation and birth; no more can those who are “dead in transgressions and sins” prompt the quickening operation of God’s Spirit within them (see Eph. 2:1–10). Spiritual vivification is a free, and to humans mysterious, exercise of divine power (John 3:8), not explicable in terms of the combination or cultivation of existing human resources (John 3:6), not caused or induced by any human efforts (John 1:12–13) or merits (Titus 3:3–7), and not, therefore, to be equated with, or attributed to, any of the experiences, decisions, and acts to which it gives rise and by which it may be known to have taken place.

Biblical Presentation. The noun “regeneration” (palingenesia) occurs only twice. In Matthew 19:28 it denotes the eschatological “renewal of all things” under the Messiah for which Israel was waiting (Acts 3:21). This echo of Jewish usage points to the larger scheme of cosmic renewal within which that of individuals finds its place. In Titus 3:5 the word refers to the renewing of the individual. Elsewhere the thought of regeneration is differently expressed.

In OT prophecies regeneration is depicted as the work of God renovating, circumcising, and softening Israelite hearts, writing his laws upon them, and thereby causing their owners to know, love, and obey him as never before (Deut. 30:6; Jer. 31:31–34; 32:39–40; Ezek. 11:19–20; 36:25–27). It is a sovereign work of purification from sin’s defilement (Ezek. 36:25; cf. Ps. 51:10), wrought by the personal energy of God’s creative outbreathing (“spirit,” Ezek. 36:27; 39:29). Jeremiah declares that such renovation on a national scale will introduce and signal God’s new messianic administration of his covenant with his people (Jer. 31:31; 32:40).

In the NT the thought of regeneration is more fully individualized, and in John’s gospel and first epistle the figure of new birth—“from above” (anōthen, John 3:3, 7 Moffatt), “of water and the Spirit” (i.e., through a purificatory operation of God’s Spirit, see Ezek. 36:25–27; John 3:5; cf. 3:8), or simply “of God” (John 1:13, nine times in 1 John)—is integral to the presentation of personal salvation. The verb gennaō (which means both “beget” and “bear”) is used in these passages in the aorist or perfect tense to denote the once-for-all divine work whereby the sinner, who before was only “flesh,” and as such, whether he knew it or not, utterly incompetent in spiritual matters (John 3:3–7), is made “spirit” (John 3:6)—i.e., is enabled and caused to receive and respond to the saving revelation of God in Christ. In the gospel, Christ assures Nicodemus that there are no spiritual activities—no seeing or entering God’s kingdom, because no faith in himself—without regeneration (John 3:1–5); and John declares in the prologue that only the regenerate receive Christ and enter into the privileges of God’s children (John 1:12–13). Conversely, in the epistle John insists that there is no regeneration that does not issue in spiritual activities. The regenerate do righteousness (1 John 2:29) and do not live a life of sin (3:9; 5:18; the present tense indicates habitual law keeping, not absolute sinlessness, cf. 1:8–10); they love Christians (4:7), believe rightly in Christ, and experience faith’s victory over the world (5:4). Any who believe or do otherwise, whatever they claim, are still unregenerate children of the devil (3:6–10). God does not relate to them as father (2:23), and they have no share in the hope of glory to which God's children are heirs (3:1–3).

Paul specifies the christological dimensions of regeneration by presenting it as (1) a lifegiving co-resurrection with Christ (Eph. 2:5; Col. 2:13; cf. 1 Pet. 1:3), and (2) a work of new creation in Christ (2 Cor. 5:17; Gal. 6:15; Eph. 2:10). Peter and James make the further point that we are "born again" (anagennaō: 1 Pet. 1:23), that God "gives us birth" (apokyeō: James 1:18) by means of the gospel. It is under the impact of the gospel word that God opens the heart, so evoking faith (Acts 16:14–15).

Historical Discussion. The fathers did not formulate the concept of regeneration precisely. They equated it, broadly speaking, with baptismal grace, which to them meant primarily (to Pelagius, exclusively) remission of sins. Augustine realized, and vindicated against Pelagianism, the necessity for prevenient grace to make people trust and love God, but he did not precisely equate this grace with regeneration. The Reformers reaffirmed the substance of Augustine's doctrine of prevenient grace, and Reformed theology still maintains it. Calvin used the term regeneration to cover humanity's whole subjective renewal, including conversion and sanctification, but soon all Protestants, Lutherans, and Anabaptists, as well as Reformed, came to see regeneration simply as the start of the Christian life. Many seventeenth-century Reformed theologians equated regeneration with effectual calling, and conversion with regeneration (hence the systematic mistranslation of epistrephō, "turn," as a passive, "be converted," in the KJV); later Reformed theology has defined regeneration more narrowly as the implanting of the "seed" from which faith and repentance spring (1 John 3:9) in the course of effectual calling. Arminianism constructed the doctrine of regeneration synergistically, making one's renewal dependent on prior cooperation with grace; liberalism constructed it naturalistically, identifying regeneration with a moral change or a religious experience, or construing it corporately as social renewal.

The fathers lost the biblical understanding of the sacraments as signs to stir up faith and seals to confirm believers in possession of the blessings signified, and so came to regard baptism as conveying the regeneration it signified (Titus 3:5) ex opere operato to those who did not obstruct its working. Since infants could not do this, all baptized infants were accordingly held to be regenerated. This view has persisted in all the non-Reformed churches of Christendom and among sacramentalists within Protestantism.

J. I. PACKER

See also CALL, CALLING; ELECT, ELECTION; ORDER OF SALVATION; SALVATION.

Bibliography. J. V. Bartlet, "Regeneration," HDB; L. Berkhof, Systematic Theology; F. Büchsel et al., TDNT 1:665–75; K. Burkhardt, Biblical Doctrine of Regeneration; B. Citron, New Birth; J. Denney, HDCG; C. Hodge, Systematic Theology; A. Ringwald et al., NIDNTT 1:176–88; P. Toon, Born Again; B. B. Warfield, Biblical and Theological Studies.

Regeneration, Baptismal. See BAPTISMAL REGENERATION.

Regula Fidei. See RULE OF FAITH.

Reid, Thomas. See SCOTTISH REALISM.

Reincarnation. The belief, sometimes called metempsychosis, that an individual human soul passes through a succession of lives. The idea of reincarnation had its origin in northern India (ca. 1000–800 B.C.). Western views of reincarnation popular today are modifications of the ancient theory of transmigration of souls (sometimes called metempsychosis), which holds that the soul may be incarnated not only in human bodies but also in animals and plants. The Western version of transmigration has been redefined to limit cyclic rebirths taking place in human form only.

The concept of reincarnation first appeared in the early Hindu scriptures (Upanishads). It has always been an integral part of classical Buddhism. Reincarnational thinking characterized some Greek philosophers, including Pythagoras and Plato. Because of the influence of the first-century Greek mystery religions, the Gnostics, and the Roman Stoics, the theory of transmigration, or reincarnation, became firmly established as a Western as well as Eastern doctrine.

Closely associated with the notion of reincarnation cycles is the Eastern concept of karma. The law of karma asserts that the evil deeds of past lives relate to the present life, and that one's present actions have implications for future lives. Essentially karma is the law of cause and effect, of action followed by reaction. In the Orient the belief in karma has resulted in a basically pessimistic view of life. Human existence is often a dreary, endless cycle of pain, suffering, and rebirth. Karmic reincarnation does not resolve the problem of evil. It requires self-salvation leading to ultimate liberation from the wheel of rebirth. The concepts of divine forgiveness and mercy are absent.

The modern Western expression of reincarnation emerged during the Enlightenment of the eighteenth century and was revived by such nineteenth-century occultic movements as Swedenborgianism or theosophy, founded by the influential Madame

Reincarnation

H. P. Blavatsky. This westernized version of reincarnation was later popularized by such psychics as Edgar Cayce, Helen Wambach, and Jeanne Dixon. Even some liberal Christian theologians of our own day have suggested the possibility of reincarnation, such as L. Weatherhead, G. MacGregor, and Q. Howe Jr. Unlike Eastern proponents of reincarnation, Western reincarnationists stress a more optimistic view of life, holding out the hope of more and better lives.

The ultimate objective of all reincarnation is to fuse with “ultimate reality,” to merge with God, to become God. All reincarnation teachings are based on a monistic, mystical-occult worldview that promotes the essential divinity of humanity, denies the notion of a sovereign personal God, and offers the promise of esoteric wisdom.

Biblical Christianity, in contrast to reincarnational teaching, emphasizes grace, atonement, and forgiveness for fallen humanity through the once-for-all death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. The Christian’s disavowal of reincarnation is anchored in the biblical assertion that “man is destined to die once, and after that to face judgment” (Heb. 9:27).

R. ENROTH

See also SWEDENBORG, EMANUEL; THEOSOPHY.

Bibliography. M. Albrecht, Reincarnation: A Christian Appraisal; R. A. Morey, Reincarnation and Christianity; P. J. Swihart, Reincarnation, Edgar Cayce and the Bible.

Relativism. What do postmodern philosophies and postliberal theologies hold in common with the enlightenment thought they seek to replace? Relativism. You know your truth, I know my truth, but neither of us knows the truth. “There’s no such thing as objective truth,” argues P. Kenneson, “and it’s a good thing, too” (Christian Apologetics in the Postmodern World). If Kenneson expects “it’s a good thing, too” to appeal to people from different communities than his own, does he not appeal to an objectively valid concept of the “good”? To insist objectively that there is no such thing as objective truth is self-contradictory.

Postmodern communalism (Kenneson, Grenz) faces problems similar to the teachings of modern confessionalists like H. Richard Niebuhr: Rejecting the objective validity of revealed truths and virtues, Niebuhr lacked a base for communication with communities whose confessions maintained conflicting claims. (See my chapter on “The Niebuhrs’ Relativism, Relationalism, Contextualization, and Revelation” in Challenges to Inerrancy.) As Philip Johnson has observed, “Relativism about truth does not lead to tolerance. Rather, it leads to the conclusion that social conflicts cannot be resolved by reason or even compromise, because there is no common reason that can unite groups that differ on fundamental questions.”

The existence of God is true (Rom. 1:20) and moral norms are obligatory (2:14), not just because Christians believe in a theistic worldview and life view, but because they cohere with realities with which all have to do in all times and contexts. All are accountable for believing in God and avoiding murder, for example. By undercutting the objective validity of God’s general revelation, postmodernist contextualization sabotages respect for human rights. Having destroyed all reverence for universally obligatory moral principles on Monday, postmodern relativists need not imagine that others will respect their human rights on Tuesday. They dislodge the base for educating all children morally, communicating with intellectual honesty in academia, and reasoning for purposes of preevangelism, evangelism, and missions from common ground. (On values of universal revelation see Integrative Theology 1:82–90.) God forbid that in the name of rejecting enlightenment assumptions, moderns or post-moderns should reject the truths of God’s general revelation.

Postmodern thought also joins modern enlightenment denials of an objectively valid informative special revelation in Jesus Christ and inspired Scripture. It is hardly “a good thing” for a postmodernist to deny any objective validity of Jesus’ explicit teaching concerning his own instruction (Integrative Theology 1:110–112). Although the grass of relative human opinion flourishes today, it disappears tomorrow. But the word of God the Father through God the Son and inspired prophetic and apostolic writers endures forever. It is far from “a good thing” to deny the objective historicity of the incarnate Logos. The good news of Christianity, in contrast to Hindu and Greek myths, reports that the Messiah was born, lived, suffered, died, and rose “in the flesh.” To deny that the Logos came in the flesh is to teach against (anti-) Christ. Because the gospel message is objectively true of the actual world, it must necessarily be preached to every person in every context. And because of its objective truth, his Spirit-led followers “do good to all people, especially to those who belong to the family of believers” (Gal. 6:10).

The relativism of both modernism and post-modernism is totalistic. Totalistic relativism is (1) an epistemological theory denying any objective, universally valid human knowledge and affirming that meaning and truth vary from person to person, culture to culture, and time to time; (2) a metaphysical theory denying any changeless realities such as energy, space, time, natural laws, persons, or God and affirming that all conceivable meaning rests on activities, happenings, events, processes, or relationships in which observers are changing participants; and (3) an ethical theory denying any changeless moral principles normative for all people in every situation. From these three fields relativism pervades every area of meaningful human experience and knowledge.

Limited relativism considers totalistic relativism self-contradictory and wrong in its absolute denials of any absolute truth and yet accurate in its assertion that much human knowledge is conditioned and slanted by innumerable variables: subjectively (Kierkegaard), psychologically (Freud), morally (Fletcher), economically (Marx), politically (Reinhold Niebuhr), historically (H. Richard Niebuhr, W. Dilthey), educationally (Dewey), religiously (Cobb, Starcke, Watts), anthropologically (Kraft), and stylistically (Ricoeur). As a result of the kaleidoscopic impact of these and other influential variables, totalistic relativists have denied any invariable, absolute truth about things in themselves.

Increased consciousness of these cultural variables has generally been of significant value to the fields of interpretation and communication. To grasp the meaning of people from other cultures, interpreters now realize how crucial it is to seek sympathetic identification with them in terms of their own presuppositions and historical roots. Such cross-cultural understanding is equally indispensable if one seeks to communicate to those of other cultures in terms of their own categories of thought and verbal expressions. Improved ways of grasping and communicating meaning, however, do not settle issues of objective validity.

Agreement has not been reached in regard to the degree of influence the cultural variables bring to bear upon human knowers. According to determinists, given a specific set of conditions present to a person's brain, nothing else could happen. All knowledge is relative to and determined by these situations (Skinner). For others, although all of human knowledge and behavior is predisposed to habitual responses by given sets of stimuli, this conditioning "falls somewhat short of total determination." All propositional assertions are nevertheless held to be time- and culture-bound (Kraft).

Others view persons not only as physical organisms but also as minds, souls, or spirits, with the powers of self-determination and self-transcendence. Hence, their knowledge is not all time-bound, and they are agents responsible for their own actions (Thomas Reid, J. Oliver Buswell Jr.).

Existentialists affirm that humankind is free from both external determination and internal self-determination by a self with a given, unchangeable nature. To be authentically free an existentialist must, in fact, exercise an arbitrary freedom independent of cultural predispositions and past habitual choices. It seems more likely that some knowledge is predisposed by one's cultural influences and creative knowledge simply occasioned by one's situation. Knowledge can be context related without being context determined.

Totalistic Relativism. Whether the cultural and psychological variables determine, predispose, or occasion certain metaphysical beliefs, totalistic relativists know little about the nature of persons or things as terms or entities in themselves, and much about relationships, functions, and processes. Things and persons are what they do. Distinct, unique persons are reduced to influences, relations, events, or happenings (Arthur F. Bentley). Relational theology also intends to free people from the tyranny of absolutes but may diminish the value of a person as such.

In Eastern monistic relativism persons are not real, but mere maya insofar as they are distinguishable from the One. Differentiations of distinct persons with whom to have relationships are said to be made, not by nature, but by human conceptual assertions distinguishing subjects from predicates. Hence, all propositions are illusory and relative to the viewpoints of those who assert them. In "reality" persons, like dew drops, slip into the shining sea, the part never again to be differentiated from the whole. Since all that can be conceived is relative, no permanent objective remains for which to strive and nihilism results. No self-nature can stand by itself, and no lasting distinction can be made between right and wrong. Moral conflicts are a sickness of the mind that should have cultivated a bland indifference. Decisions are to be made without having the faintest understanding of how one decides (Alan Watts).

Totalistic relativism, relationalism, or contextualization ends in amorality, "Asiatic fatalism," meaninglessness, and nihilism. Furthermore, radical relativism is self-contradictory. Every human assertion is said to be time-bound and culture-bound, but the assertion that "all is relative" is taken to be universal and necessary. Total relativism absolutely denies any absolutes—and it absolutizes relativity.

Limited Relativism. Less reductive and more open approaches to meaningful human existence acknowledge not only differences among cultures but also similarities. Kraft alludes to over seventy-three constants in human societies in a chapter on human commonality, but concludes the chapter with only one criterion for evaluating cultural systems: their efficiency or adequacy in meeting people's personal, social, and spiritual needs. The forms of a culture, including the Christian missionary's culture, are judged solely in terms of their pragmatic usefulness. Usefulness for what? It sounds good to say, "for properly relating human beings to God." But having held that a hundred percent of human conceptual thought is time-bound, Kraft offers no changeless criteria by which to distinguish counterfeit religious experience from authentic conversion to Christ. Apparently dynamically equivalent experiences may be of Satan, who changes himself into an angel of light. The tests of authentic Christian experience, according to Scripture, include conceptually equivalent assertions about the nature of Christ, the eternal Word who became flesh (John 1:1–18; 20:31; 1 John 4:1–3; 2 John 7–9). Relational and functional theologians, succumbing to relativism, undermine the changeless conceptual validity of God’s universal revelation in nature and special revelation in the teaching of the incarnate Christ and inspired prophetic and apostolic spokesmen.

Relativism

What transcultural truths, then, are known through general revelation? (1) People are human. Persons everywhere in all cultures have been, are, and will be human. Dehumanizing and depersonalizing tendencies to the contrary, persons are subjects, not mere objects, and as agents responsibly participate in communities to achieve common, objective goals. (2) People have inalienable human rights and responsibilities. However different physically, economically, educationally, politically, socially, or religiously, people have a right to equal concern and respect. (3) People deserve justice. Whatever the situation, and whenever people are treated unjustly, they cry out against injustice. (4) Unjust people need a just amnesty and forgiving, holy love. (5) People ought to be intellectually honest and faithful to the given data of reality. They ought not bear false witness against others. (6) If human society, mutual trust, and communication is to be meaningful, people ought to be logically noncontradictory in their thought, speech, and writing. Human knowledge and experience are related not only to cultural variables but also to these invariables of morality, fact, and logic.

To argue for but one absolute, love, as did Joseph Fletcher, is to ignore the breadth of the Creator’s intelligence and wisdom. To argue for the absoluteness of factual data alone, as with scientism and positivism in their varied forms, overlooks the faithful words of the Logos regarding morality, sin, and salvation, and his own integrity as one who cannot deny himself or contradict himself. But to argue for logical absolutes alone, as rationalists may, blinds one to the given data of experience, the danger of autism, injustice, and irresponsibility.

The Need for Absolutes. Claims to truth, as distinct from mere uninformed opinion, must be justified on the basis of something more than subjective or community feelings of certitude. As Gordon Kaufman has argued, any claim to truth involves the claim to objective validity. Although hesitating to affirm belief in absolutes, Kaufman admits that objectively valid knowledge transcends actual thinking and feeling in three directions—givenness, universality, and logical interconnectedness. These he calls “functioning absolutes.” Since they function as absolutes along with justice and love, intellectual honesty, and human worth to make life possible and meaningful, why not call them absolutes?

To acknowledge changeless truths in the midst of changing human experiences, as Augustine realized, is to acknowledge their changeless source and referent, ontologically. Paul Tillich also saw that all such absolutes point beyond themselves to an all-inclusive Absolute. Unfortunately, Tillich’s concept of Being itself depersonalized the living and dynamic Logos of Scripture.

The most coherent account of both the variables and the invariables in meaningful human experience, Christians may argue, is the personal, living, moral, just, loving, faithful, and true God revealed not only in the world, history, and human nature, but even more significantly in the Jesus of history and the teachings of Scripture. Although finite, fallen people may not discover objectively valid, normative truths for themselves, as divine image bearers they may be enabled by common or special grace to receive them. Through general revelation from the absolute God, people find out about God’s moral principles for justice in society and, through special revelation, about God’s loving plans and purposes for unjust people. The living God is not determined by the relative processes of time, space, energy, and humanity. People and nature are relative to, dependent upon, and conditioned by God.

It is commonplace for radical religious relativists to affirm that people can experience God even though no conceptual or propositional truth about God is possible. Even the words of Jesus and the Bible, they hold, are time-bound and culture-bound. They can be taken only noncognitively, as pointers. Such religious relativism, however pious, misses the mark because it fails to take adequate account of humankind’s creation in the image of God and renewal in the divine image to know God conceptually (Col. 3:10). Because they are created to know and commune with the Creator and Redeemer who is changeless in essence, attributes, and plans for space and time, humans in a sea of relativism can receive some effable absolutes by divine revelation and illumination.

Denials of propositional revelation may also result from a failure to grasp the relatedness of everything in changing and changeless experience to the Logos of God (John 1:1–3). The divine Logos is eternal and distinct from the universe but not limited to an intellectually other eternity as in Eastern mysticism. The divine Logos is immanent, governing nature and people, but not limited to natural processes as in liberalism. The divine Logos became incarnate as a truly human person but is not limited to noncognitive personal encounters as in neo-orthodoxy. The divine Logos was inscripturated, but is not limited to a mere biblicalism as in some extreme fundamentalism. In sum, the Logos of God is transcendent and immanent, incarnate, and inscripturated as in classical orthodox theology.

A verificational apologetic for the absolutes of the divine Logos, general revelation, incarnate revelation, and inscripturated revelation is not itself another absolute. It is not necessary to be divine or an inerrant spokesman for God to verify God's wisdom, power, and morality in the world, divine sinlessness in Christ, or divine revelation in Scripture. The Israelites did not make themselves autonomous by distinguishing between true and false prophets. To check the credentials of one's surgeon is not to presume oneself more wise and capable in practicing surgery than the specialist. Acquainted with the countless variables every human knower faces, we are not surprised that Christian apologists frankly claim no more than an overwhelming probability beyond reasonable doubt.

Similarly, Christians claim only degrees of probability for their interpretations and applications of divinely revealed propositional truths. To affirm the absoluteness of God's understanding in eternity is not to affirm the absoluteness of any believer's understanding of revelation at any given time in his growth in knowledge and grace. Precisely the opposite result follows. To assert the absoluteness of divine revelation in terms of its intended purpose and the standards of accuracy when written for that end is to deny absoluteness to the pronouncements of governments, public schools, the United Nations, and religious institutions. Divine illumination, as distinct from inspiration, does not result in inerrancy.

Although no interpretation of the Scriptures as given can be regarded as absolute, some interpretations are better informed than others by relevant data, valid hermeneutical principles, and sound criteria of truth. The most reliable checks and balances upon varied interpretive hypotheses are criteria drawn from the invariables found in general revelation. A true interpretation consistently accounts for such relevant data as grammar, literary context, author's purpose, historical and cultural setting, and broader theological context. Furthermore, one must be able to live by that interpretation with integrity while treating people as persons, not things, respecting their rights, treating them justly, and forgiving their injustices.

Untold harm has been done in the name of Christianity by people who have absolutized their relative interpretations of life or of Scripture. Presumptuous prophets who claimed to speak God's word to people, without divine authorization, in the OT administration were subject to the most severe penalties. May God deliver evangeliicals today from prophetic ministries not validly drawn from divine revelation. This case for revealed absolutes must not be taken to justify absolutizing merely human ideas, however good.

Similarly, inestimable damage has been done the cause of Christ and Scripture by those who relativize divinely revealed absolutes, which have objective validity for all people of all cultures. Either Christianity is true for all people, or it is true for no one. We can be assured of our view of the major doctrines of Christianity and the realities to which they refer when our interpretations are based on numerous relevant and extensive passages of Scripture, supported by interpreters throughout the history of the church, and attested to us personally by the internal witness of the Holy Spirit to the teaching of the Word. Then we can confidently relate to the realities designated and preach the great doctrines of the faith with joy.

In a day when radical relativism reigns, disciples of the Lord, who is the same yesterday, today, and forever, stand guard against attacks upon the cognitive faith once for all entrusted to the saints (Jude 3) with gentleness, respect, and a clear conscience (1 Pet. 3:15-16). G. R. LEWIS

See also APOLOGETICS; BIBLE, AUTHORITY OF; CHRISTIANITY AND CULTURE; CONTEXTUALIZATION OF THEOLOGY; KNOWLEDGE; POSTMODERNISM; REVELATION, GENERAL; SITUATION ETHICS; TRUTH.

Bibliography. A. F. Bentley, Relativity in Man and Society; G. W. Bromiley, "Limits of Theological Relativism," CT (May 24, 1968) 6-7; J. B. Cobb Jr., Christ in a Pluralistic Age; R. J. Coleman, Issues in Theological Conflict; B. A. Demarest, General Revelation; J. W. Dixon Jr., Physiology of Faith: A Theory of Theological Relativity; J. H. Gill, On Knowing God; S. Grenz, Theology for the Community of God; C. F. H. Henry, Christian Personal Ethics; P. E. Johnson, Reason in the Balance; G. Kaufman, Relativism, Knowledge and Faith; C. H. Kraft, Christianity in Culture; M. Kransz and J. W. Meiland, eds., Relativism Cognitive and Moral; G. R. Lewis, "Categories in Collision?" in Perspectives on Evangelical Theology; Testing Christianity's Truth-Claims; G. R. Lewis and B. A. Demarest, Integrative Theology; G. R. Lewis and B. A. Demarest, eds., Challenges to Inerrancy: A Theological Response; D. McCallum, ed., Death of Truth; T. R. Phillips and D. L. Okholm, eds., Christian Apologetics in the Postmodern World; F. Schaeffer, How Should We Then Live?; B. F. Skinner, Back to Freedom and Dignity; J. S. Spong, "Evangelism When Certainty Is an Illusion," CCen (January 6-13, 1982) 11-16; W. Starcke, Gospel of Relativity; P. Tillich, My Search for Absolutes; D. Turner, Autonomous Man; G. E. Veith Jr., Postmodern Times.

Relics. Objects preserved as memorials of the earthly lives of saints, Mary, or Jesus, including their bodies and items that contacted them.

In Catholic and Orthodox traditions relics function as both reminders of those who lived and died for the faith and media for communion with venerable persons, because some of the grace that filled their lives is perceived to remain in surviving objects, evidenced by miracles associated with relics. Biblical intimations of the power of relics may be detected in stories about Elisha's bones (2 Kings 13:21) and cloths Paul had touched (Acts 19:12).

Relics

Belief in relics spread widely among Christians by the fourth century, receiving approval from such illustrious fathers as Ambrose, Augustine, and Chrysostom. Initially this belief focused on graves of martyrs, which became choice sites for building churches. Later it led to the transporting of objects from graves, including bones and cloths (brandea), for enshrinement elsewhere. The seventh ecumenical council decreed that no new church be consecrated without relics in its altar. Relics were also placed in portable reliquaries for use in processions and miracles of healing and protection.

The cult of relics expanded enormously in the Middle Ages, leading to a multitude of pilgrimages and inevitable superstitions and commercial abuses. This was especially so in the Catholic West in contrast to the Orthodox East, where the veneration of images took precedence over relics. Thomas Aquinas summarized Catholic rationale, affirming that as the saints were temples of the Holy Spirit on earth, their remains continue as instruments of that Spirit after their glorification. Thus, the saint's body merits special honor, and relics are more venerable than images. Nevertheless, such honor must be only that of veneration and never that adoration of which God alone is worthy; nor is the power of the relic anything other than God's power bestowed upon the saint.

The forerunners of Protestantism, Hus and Wycliffe, inveighed against the cult of relics as idolatry, and the Reformers echoed them. Calvin, noting that the preservation of relics inevitably leads to their worship, insisted on the removal of "this heathenish custom." The Council of Trent confirmed the veneration of relics as established by tradition. Catholic canon law now regulates relics through the Congregation of Rites, requiring that relics be authenticated by episcopal certification and forbidding their sale.

P. D. STEEVES

Bibliography. J. Calvin, "Inventory of Relics" in Tracts and Treatises on the Reformation of the Church; F. Chiovaro, NCE 12:234-40; P. Schaff, ed., Creeds of Christendom; W. Smith, Dictionary of Christian Antiquities; H. Thurston, HERE 11:51-59.

Religion, Phenomenology of. See PHENOMENOLOGY OF RELIGION.

Religion, Religious. "Religious" is in general the adjective of the noun "religion"; but it is also used, without the noun, in a specialized sense to indicate connection with a monastic order. Thus, a monk may be called a "religious."

The large number, and often contradictory character, of the definitions to be found in modern discussions of religion suggest that scholars find it impossible to formulate a generally acceptable definition. The confusing discussion of this problem in J. H. Leuba's God or Man?, chapter 2, hardly suggests the amazing variety of the definitions offered. The etymology of the term does not help, both because it is uncertain and because neither religare nor religere throws much light on the present meaning of religion.

Many of the suggested definitions have been drawn up to serve a particular purpose, e.g., the purpose of psychology, or of sociology, or of some philosophical position such as humanism. Whether they are adequate for such special purposes must be decided by the specialists in that field; but they clearly fail to give a characterization of religion that is useful for more general purposes. This need not cause confusion, provided that their special purpose is noted and that their use is confined to that special purpose. When such a definition is employed as adequate for some other purpose, however, confusion results. Thus, F. H. Bradley writes, "I take it to be a fixed feeling of fear, resignation, admiration, or approval, no matter what may be the object, provided only that this feeling reaches a certain strength, and is qualified by a certain degree of reflection" (Appearance and Reality, 438n.). This may or may not be good for the purpose of psychology, but Bradley makes use of it in a discussion that is not confined to psychology. Such confusion is much too common.

The effort to gain a definition by isolating the common characteristics of the recognized religions runs into the following difficulties. (1) There are borderline cases the inclusion or exclusion of which will determine the resulting definition; e.g., including original Buddhism or Marxism in the cases studied will remove from the definition a mention of a supernatural object. But the decision to include or to exclude must in either case seem arbitrary. (2) The characteristics of the various religions differ so widely that it may be impossible, by this method, to find any common features, or, if any are found, they must be so vague as to be of doubtful value. For example, in Bradley's definition, quoted above, note the indefiniteness of the expressions "a certain strength" and "a certain degree of reflection." However, those for example who call Marxism a religion, in spite of its aggressive repudiation of religion, must feel that a satisfactory definition can be attained in this manner.

Perhaps a satisfactory definition can be attained only by confining attention to one or a few of the “higher” religions, the others being treated as defective and so not normative. This would be to apply to religion the method advocated in philosophy by Bernard Bosanquet, namely that reality can be properly understood only from the standpoint of its highest manifestation. One could not, of course, expect anything like unanimous agreement in the selection on the basis of which such a definition would be reached, but a fairly general agreement might be hoped for if the selection were not too rigid, and the actual selection might be capable of defense. Such a method would yield, as definitive characteristics of religion, the acknowledgment of a higher, unseen power; an attitude of reverent dependence on that power in the conduct of life; and special actions, e.g., rites, prayers, and acts of mercy, as peculiar expressions and means of cultivation of the religious attitude.

A. K. RULE

Bibliography. P. A. Bertocci, Religion as Creative Insecurity; C. J. Ducasse, Philosophical Scrutiny of Religion; H. H. Farmer, Revelation and Religion; W. L. King, Introduction to Religion; M. McGhee, ed., Philosophy, Religion, and the Spiritual Life; E. C. Moore, Nature of Religion; J. Oman, Natural and the Supernatural; A. Toynbee, Historian's Approach to Religion; A. G. Widgey, What Is Religion?

Religion, Sociology of. See SOCIOLOGY OF RELIGION.

Religionless Christianity. See BONHOEFFER, DIETRICH.

Religions. See CHRISTIANITY AND RELIGIONS.

Religionsgeschichte. See COMPARATIVE RELIGION; HISTORY OF RELIGION SCHOOL.

Religious Liberty. See TOLERANCE.

Religious Pluralism. See CHRISTIANITY AND RELIGIONS.

Remarriage. The question of remarriage is a difficult one, touching, as it does, upon matters of biblical exegesis, moral judgment, and pastoral psychology. Does Scripture allow remarriage? In any particular case would remarriage be morally right? In such a case would remarriage be pastorally wise?

The Exegetical Question. The exegetical question is closely related to the view we take on divorce. Remarriage is presupposed in the Deuteronomic legislation (Deut. 24:1–4), although return to a first husband is forbidden in the one case of a woman also divorced by a second husband. But there are differences of view between Christians about the NT material. In the Synoptic Gospels (Matt. 5:31–32; 19:3–9; Mark 10:2–12; Luke 16:18) is Jesus forbidding all remarriage because it is adultery? Does the “exceptive clause” (“except for the case of porneia”) in Matthew 5:32 and 19:9 mean that in this one case a husband is free to separate from his wife, but without right of remarriage? Or is Jesus in these passages both affirming God’s ideal for marriage as a permanent covenant and also recognizing that sometimes divorce is a tragic reality because of sin? If one takes the latter view, it is arguable that the right of remarriage is also presupposed. Some Christian scholars argue that Jesus is using the word translated “divorce” in the sense of “put away by separation,” and that he does not allow remarriage. It would appear, however, that because separation without remarriage was not otherwise known in Jesus’ day (though he could be introducing it), and because the context of Jesus’ teaching is a discussion of Deuteronomy 24 (in which remarriage is assumed) with the Pharisees (who also assumed the right of remarriage), that Jesus would not have been understood as forbidding remarriage without further explanation.

The apostolic fathers seemingly appeared virtually unanimous in forbidding divorce with right of remarriage, although we need to ask whether that tells us more about their exegesis of Scripture or about the ascetic ideals that prevailed in the patristic age. The Church of Rome has always officially rejected remarriage, in line with its ban on divorce. It has, though, established procedures by which some marriages can be annulled—i.e., declared by the church never to have been proper marriages at all. In those cases the partners, after civil divorce, are set free to marry again. The Eastern Orthodox churches, the Nonconformist churches, and some parts of the Anglican Church have allowed right of remarriage after divorce in certain circumstances, although until recently the “official” view of the Church of England has been firmly against remarriage of divorced persons in church.

The Moral Question. But suppose we accept that in some circumstances divorce is permitted as a tragic last resort in circumstances of marital breakdown. Does that always justify remarriage? To divorce with someone else in mind (like Herod) may well be the thought behind Luke’s strong words in Luke 16:18. There are some whose divorces are the result of blatant refusal to keep their marriage vows; some who early in a youthful marriage sadly come to realize that “we made a mistake”; some who, having tried to keep covenant, find that their partner has not. We cannot have a blanket category “divorcee,” as though all situations were morally identical. However, it would seem clear from the NT that—to put it at its highest—remarriage always falls under the cloud of the broken covenant of the first marriage. Further, although a divorced person is no longer married, the “one flesh” has been severed, and in one sense they are free to marry again, we must immediately qualify this sense. The primary moral question is whether or not remarriage cuts into any outstanding covenant obligations of the first marriage that are still capable of fulfillment. If there is any remaining possibility of reconciliation with the first partner, that is decisive. The outstanding obligations of parenthood to any children are also of the highest priority, another moral issue affecting the decision concerning remarriage. Furthermore, the social dimensions to marriage require that we also consider the overall stability of marriage and family patterns in society. We would need to judge that the overall personal good of remarriage in a particular case would justify the threat that a second union would make to the social institution of marriage.

Remarriage

The Pastoral Question. There remains the pastoral question, which may still mean that even if remarriage were judged permissible, it may not be judged wise. Many marriages are broken because of some sort of personal inadequacy in maintaining faithfulness and upholding commitment. A good Christian marriage can provide one of the most fruitful contexts for healing personal immaturities and childhood hurts, but a bad marriage may serve only to deepen wounds and expose hurts undealt with to the consciousness. To add the pain, guilt, and tragedy of divorce to a stock of personal insecurity and need is to make some people very vulnerable indeed, and it is by no means a straightforward question that a second marriage will necessarily be any more successful than the first, unless personal help has been received. A marriage failure should raise for some people the question of personal need and the possibilities of therapy or pastoral ministry on the one hand, and the serious consideration of future celibacy on the other.

That said, however, let it be granted that there are many for whom the experience of a second start has also been an experience of forgiveness from God and a renewed awareness of the need for and resources of his grace. It is part of the church's task to be a healing, supporting, guiding, and enriching environment in which personal needs can be worked through and resources for Christian living made available.

Whether or not remarriage should be blessed in church has been a problem for some people. To do so might seem to be collusion with the serious sin of divorce. To fail to do so might indicate a harder moral line than taken by the Scriptures and a failure to offer a ministry of forgiveness. How best to institutionalize the church's double task in liturgy and church discipline—that of prophet, upholding God's will for the permanence of marriage; that of pastor, proclaiming the gospel of grace and forgiveness—is not an easy task. It might be that any service of blessing for second marriages should include a note, distinct from the normal marriage service, of penitence for past sin—a note in which both couple and congregation should join. This might give liturgical expression to the recognition that a second marriage falls under the shadow of a broken covenant of the first, and also that sin is partly a matter of individual responsibility and partly linked to the social structures that sometimes lay on marriages burdens too great to be borne.

However right remarriage in any particular case may be judged to be, that does not remove from the church one of its primary responsibilities in this area: that of finding ways in which to foster and encourage those personal qualities that make for covenant faithfulness and commitment, even within the pressures of contemporary society, and of finding ways of minimizing in social terms those factors that mitigate against the permanence of marriage.

D. J. ATKINSON

See also DIVORCE; MARRIAGE, THEOLOGY OF; SEPARATION, MARITAL.

Bibliography. D. J. Atkinson, To Have and to Hold; G. W. Bromiley, God and Marriage; S. A. Ellisen, Divorce and Remarriage in the Church; C. Keener, And Marries Another; J. C. Laney, Divorce Myth; D. H. Small, Right to Remarry; A. R. Winnett, Divorce and Remarriage in Anglicanism; Divorce and the Church.

Remission of Sins. See FORGIVENESS.

Remnant. The translation of several words in the OT, only two of which are of consequence: yātar with its noun yeter and šā'ar with its derivatives šē'ār and šē'ērīt. The NT equivalents loipos and leimma with its compounds are infrequent. In the majority of cases the words concerned are used in a literal and self-explanatory way. They refer merely to things or people left over after famine, conquest, division, passage of time, etc. In the books of the prophets, however, the hope promised for those of the nation left over after the fall of Jerusalem crystallized into a promise not only of preservation for the few people remaining, but also a promise for the kernel of the nation that could be kept in all vicissitudes and at length returned to its land and blessed status in messianic times. For this concept the word šē'ērīt is principally used.

The thought perhaps goes back to Deuteronomy 4:27–29, where the promise is given to the ones left after dispersal, that they will be blessed again if they seek the Lord. Isaiah named one of his sons Shear-Jashub, “A remnant will return” (Isa. 7:3; 8:18). In 10:21 this is interpreted to mean the remnant will return to God, referring, perhaps, to revival in the days of Hezekiah. Yet in 11:10–16 there is reference to a “second” return from dispersal in which the Gentiles shall join. The quotation in Romans 15:12 assures us that this refers not to the return from Assyria or Babylon, but a second return at the time of the messianic age.

In Micah 4:7; 5:7–8; 7:18, the remnant of Jacob is practically a name for Israel in the future days. In Jeremiah the remnant is used in reference to the return from Babylonian captivity in 42:2; 50:20; et al., but it is also used to refer to Israel in the messianic age in 23:3; 31:7. Zechariah also uses the term for the Jews who came back from Babylon (Zech. 8:6, 11–12), as well as for the residue of the people (yeter hā’ām) of the messianic age (14:2). The repentant mourning of the Israelite remnant is detailed in Zechariah 12:10–13:1 as taking place in the day of Israel’s salvation. These verses are quoted in the NT in connection with Christ’s second coming (Matt. 24:30; Rev. 1:7).

Much discussed is Amos 9:12, quoted in Acts 15:17. The amillennial view is defended by O. T. Allis (Prophecy and the Church, 145–49). In brief, the argument is that the conquest of the “remnant of Edom” in Amos is spiritualized in Acts to refer to the conversion of the Gentiles in this age. An alternative view, presented in Alf and Meyer’s commentary, is that the LXX, which Acts 15:17 quotes quite closely, had before it a variant Hebrew text. If this be true, the Amos passage prophesied a day when Gentiles and Jews would seek the Lord. Heretofore it has often been assumed that when the LXX differed from the Hebrew, the latter was right. Dead Sea Scroll material gives a new perspective on these matters. At least here, where the LXX is supported by the NT, there is good argument that its text is accurate and that it speaks of the promise of salvation for the remnant.

In Romans 11:5 the remnant of grace appears to be the saved of Israel of Paul’s day. It seems equally clear that this age, when Jews are cast off and Gentiles grafted into the stock of the people of God (Rom. 11:15–22), will be followed by an age when the Jews will be reintroduced to the privileges of grace (Rom. 11:25–31). Verse 26 then gives the eventual promise for the Jewish remnant of the last days.

R. L. HARRIS

Bibliography. J. C. Campbell, “God’s People and the Remnant,” SJT 3:78–85; W. Günther et al., NIDNTT 3:247–54; G. F. Hasel, Remnant; J. Jocz, Theology of Election; B. F. Meyer, “Jesus and the Remnant of Israel,” JBL 84:123–30; G. F. Oehler, Theology of the Old Testament; P. Richardson, Israel and the Apostolic Church.

Remonstrants. Dutch Protestant group composed of followers of the theological views of Arminius. They presented to the States General in 1610 a “Remonstrance” that reflected their divergence from stricter Calvinism. Rejecting both supralapsarianism and sublapsarianism, the document outlined five articles: (1) Election and reprobation are founded on foreseen faith or unbelief. (2) Christ’s death is for all, but only believers enjoy his forgiveness. (3) Fallen man cannot do good or achieve saving faith without the regenerating power of God in Christ through the Holy Spirit. (4) Grace is the beginning, continuation, and end of all good but is not irresistible. (5) Grace can preserve the faithful through every temptation, but Scripture does not clearly say that people may not fall from grace and be lost.

When the matter came before the Synod of Dort in 1618–19, it had become a political as well as theological issue. The Remonstrants, who upheld the principle of free investigation, were ousted from their pulpits. Many of them were expelled from the Netherlands, and their theological position was declared contrary to Scripture. While the rigors of persecution soon died down when the political climate became more favorable, the Remonstrants were not officially tolerated until 1795. The movement has retained its appeal and has had a significant influence on orthodox Dutch Calvinism and on other Christian denominations. The Remonstrance was a modified form of Calvinism that, like the term Arminianism, has been wrongly identified with anti-Calvinist tendencies.

J. D. DOUGLAS

See also ARMINIANISM; ARMINIUS, JAMES; CONTRA-REMONSTRANTS; DORT, SYNOD OF.

Bibliography. C. O. Bangs, Arminius; A. W. Harrison, Arminianism.

Renan, Joseph Ernest (1823–1892). French Semitic philologist and historian of religion. Of humble origins (a Breton fisherman’s family) he received a Catholic education and studied for the priesthood at the seminaries of Issy and St. Sulpice. As he came under the influence of rationalist philosophy and critical German theology, he grew disillusioned with the church and dropped out in 1845 without receiving ordination. He continued studying philosophy and philology, acquiring a doctorate in 1852, and soon he established a scholarly reputation as an Orientalist. In 1860–61 he went on an archaeological expedition to Lebanon and Palestine, where he wrote the celebrated Life of Jesus (1863), the opening volume of History of the Origins of Christianity (7 vols.). Appointed professor of Hebrew at the Collège de France in 1862, he was removed two years later because of the controversy swirling about him but was reinstated in 1870 and became its administrator in 1884. He was a well-known figure on the lecture circuit, author of History of the People of Israel (5 vols., 1887–93), and named to the French Academy.

Renan, Joseph Ernest

His contributions to Semitic philology were significant, but his works on history and exegesis and literary pieces were much more dilettantish.

His fame rested primarily on the Life of Jesus, in which D. F. Strauss's myth theory of the origins of Christianity was superseded with a legend theory. Renan presented Jesus in an attractive, vivid style as a romantic figure, a gentle Galilean who preached a simple morality and dreamed of establishing a utopian fellowship of God's people on earth. But under the influence of John the Baptist, the vain and ambitious Jesus was transformed into a religious revolutionary who assumed the role of Messiah, battled with evil as he worked to set up the kingdom of God, and died struggling against orthodox Judaism. Both this and his later works were marked by skepticism, rationalism, and rejection of the supernatural dimension of life, divinity of Christ, and the existence of a transcendent God. Although in no way a seminal thinker, he was the major representative of French liberalism in this period.

R. V. PIERARD

Bibliography. E. Lachenmann, SHERK 9:483–85; A. M. Malo, NCE 12:375; C. T. McIntire, NIDCC 836; L. F. Mott, Ernest Renan; H. W. Wardman, Ernest Renan: A Critical Biography.

Renewal. This is an integral concept in Christian theology, denoting all those processes of restoration of spiritual strength subsequent to and proceeding from the new birth. It has its roots in the OT (Ps. 103:5; Isa. 40:31; 41:1), although it is not predominant in pre-Christian times. The main NT words are anakainizō and ananeōō. In Romans 12:2 this renewal (anakainōsis) is applied to the mental faculties and indicates the reinvigorating effect of Christian committal on conduct. This is further illustrated by the apostle's teaching regarding the new man (Col. 3:10), which is represented as in constant need of renewal (2 Cor. 4:16). A more specific description is found in Ephesians 4:23, where the phrase "be made new in the attitude of your minds" shows the spiritual character of this renewal. "The spiritual principle of the mind must acquire a new youth, susceptible of spiritual impressions" (J. A. Robinson, St. Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians).

In the subapostolic age the idea of renewal tended to become linked with that of baptism (cf. Barnabas 6:11, and the apocryphal Acts of Thomas, 132). It was not strange that the initiatory rite should mark in Christian thought the commencement of the process of renewal, but there is nothing in the NT teaching to support any notion of baptismal renewal.

Another word, palingenesia, is used of the event of rebirth, which leads to renewal. The two ideas are linked together in Titus 3:5, where they appear to describe different aspects of one operation. The linking of palingenesia in this passage with "washing" suggests the words may have formed part of a baptismal formula, but gives no basis for the later magical estimate of baptism.

D. GUTHRIE

See also BAPTISM; REGENERATION.

Bibliography. M. Dibelius, HZNT (Titus 3:5); D. Guthrie, Pastoral Epistles; W. C. Kaiser, Quest for Renewal.

Renewal, Church. A phenomenon that in earlier centuries was described by such words as revival, awakening, and reform. It has been one of the dominant concerns of the American church during the latter half of the twentieth century.

"Renewal" as used here will encompass the larger movement to reform and revitalize the church, a movement that includes such diverse components as mass evangelism; efforts to promote personal witnessing; revivals (in the sense of outpourings of the Holy Spirit); the faith at work, charismatic (or neo-Pentecostal), and church growth movements; the awakening among youth; efforts for renewal that have emanated from individual congregations; and the larger evangelical renaissance.

There is wide divergence, of course, not only as to what term to use, but as to what constitutes renewal, or whether a given movement should be included. There is wide agreement, on the other hand, on the need for renewal. Some reformers, particularly during the 1960s, have considered the institutional church beyond hope. But the more general agreement is that reform is possible, and, in fact, that the church is the central instrument God uses for the advancement of his kingdom. Indeed, much of the writing on the renewal of the church is marked by a note of optimism, contingent upon the meeting of biblical conditions.

Because efforts for renewal are as old as the story of God's people, reformers today, as in earlier centuries, have looked to that story for guidelines by which to revitalize the church. For modern evangelicals the primary models have been the early church, the Reformation, and the evangelical awakenings of the post-Reformation era. There are significant antecedents in those models for each of the following emphases.

Present-Day Renewal. The centrality of the Bible in present-day renewal is reflected in almost all facets of the movement, including the greatly increased scholarly activity. The primary emphasis of participants in awakenings is on the truth and authority of the Bible. Rather than being largely an object of study, Scripture is seen as the light for life's pathway, as the Word of God to be understood in order to be obeyed. The Bible serves a special function during awakenings as the objective standard by which to correct the tendency for awakened energies to move in unsound directions.

Prayer and the life of devotion, including such elements as praise and intercession, have formed another prominent theme. Prayer is grounded in the larger resurgence of a supernaturalism that not only accepts the possibility but emphasizes the necessity of divine intervention in human life. The hope of authentic renewal itself rests in the possibility of the appropriation of God's resources through prayer and Bible study.

The experiential dimension of Christian faith, centered in a meaningful personal relationship with God and expressed in such NT pictures as the vine and the branches, the bread of life, and the new birth, continues to be a major current in the stream of vital Christianity. That primary relationship in its turn transforms all other relationships, creating personal wholeness as well as community among believers. That kind of living faith stands in marked contrast to the extremes of dead orthodoxy and shallow experientialism of much of the church.

The Holy Spirit stands at the heart both of the possibility of divine resources and of the experiential dimension of renewal. Both the fruit and the gifts of the Spirit have received strong emphasis as part of the larger empowering or outpouring without which there can be no authentic and powerful renewal of the church.

The church growth movement, arising out of missionary concerns and now focused strongly on the American church as well, has centered attention on the quantitative dimension of church life. And while that emphasis has elicited considerable criticism, the movement has retained strength, partly by clarifying or modifying its position in such qualitative areas as social concern.

In contrast to the common pattern in which the laity are largely spectators and recipients, revitalization of the church results in lay participation in worship, counseling, and evangelistic and social ministries. The clergy serve as enablers or player-coaches, rather than as superstars and authoritarian interpreters of Scripture. Lay witness teams have effectively extended renewal to other congregations.

Small groups, little churches within the church with often forgotten antecedents in earlier evangelical revivals, have played a prominent role in restoring community (koinōnia) to the church through such functions as Bible study, prayer, mutual support and accountability, and outreach in evangelism and service.

Evangelism, resurgent in mass form since midcentury, has assumed a significant role in the form of personal witnessing as well, stressing lay participation. Renewal has been marked by spontaneous sharing of the gospel, as well as by highly structured programs of personal evangelism.

Renewal and Social Concern. Social concern and action, practical responsiveness to the entire range of human need, a prominent feature of late twentieth-century church renewal, represents a return to the biblical pattern of historic evangelicalism and a reversal of this century's "great reversal" of that tradition.

A growing concern within the large motif of social Christianity has been to attack evil rooted in the systems or structures of society. The renewed church will attend to social as well as individual moral issues, to causes as well as symptoms of social evils.

Partly to counter the centrifugal pressures inherent in the attention devoted separately to devotion, social action, and other emphases, a holistic Christian message has emerged as an additional theme. The Christian person for the modern world must be one whose life reflects a balance of prayer/devotion, evangelism, social concern/action, and rigorous intellectual endeavor.

Indeed, the general renewal has been stimulated by a renaissance of scholarship—biblical, historical, theological—that has enriched the life and theology of the churches and has been significant in reestablishing evangelicalism as a force in the mainstream of American life. Large-scale awakening seems unlikely to many observers until the gates to the secular mind are opened by a credible and compelling statement of the case for the Christian view of God, humanity, and the world.

N. A. MAGNUSON

See also CHURCH GROWTH MOVEMENT; EVANGELISM; GOSPEL, SOCIAL IMPLICATIONS OF; REVIVAL, SPIRITUAL; REVIVALISM; WITNESS, WITNESSING.

Bibliography. D. Bloesch, Centers of Christian Renewal; Reform of the Church; L. Christenson, Charismatic Renewal among Lutherans; R. Coleman, ed., One Divine Moment; F. B. Edge, Greening of the Church; W. Fisher, From Tradition to Mission; D. R. Hogue, ed., Understanding Church Growth and Decline: 1960–1978; W. Howard, Nine Roads to Renewal; J. Kennedy, Evangelism Explosion; B. Larson and R. Osborne, Emerging Church; R. F. Lovelace, Dynamics of Spiritual Life: An Evangelical Theology of Renewal; D. A. McGavran, Understanding Church Growth; K. Miller, Taste of New Wine; R. H. Nash, ed., Evangelical Renewal in the Mainline Churches; E. O'Connor, Call to Commitment; J. E. Orr, Flaming Tongue: The Impact of Twentieth Century Revivals; B. E. Patterson, ed., Stirring Giant: Renewal Forces at Work in the Modern Church; R. Raines, New Life in the Church; L. O. Richards, Three Churches in Renewal; S. C. Rose, ed., Who's Killing the Church?; H. S. Shoemaker, I Stand by the Door: The Life of Sam Shoemaker; R. Sider, Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger; D. E. Trueblood, Company of the Committed; Incidental Fellowship; New Man for Our Time; J. H. Westerhoff, Inner Growth, Outer Change: An Educational Guide to Church Renewal; G. E. Worrell, ed., Resources for Renewal.

Repentance

Repentance. In the OT the verb “repent” (niham) occurs about thirty-five times. It is usually used to signify a contemplated change in God’s dealings with people for good or ill according to his just judgment (1 Sam. 15:11, 35; Jonah 3:9–10) or, negatively, to certify that God will not swerve from his announced purpose (1 Sam. 15:29; Ps. 110:4; Jer. 4:28). In five places niham refers to human repentance or relenting. The LXX translates niham with metanoēō and metamelomai. Either Greek verb may occur designating either human repentance or divine “relenting” (so the RSV in some places).

The background of the NT idea of repentance lies not primarily in niham (except in Job 42:6; Jer. 8:6; 31:19), however, but rather in šûb, meaning “to turn back, away from, or toward” in the religious sense. The LXX consistently translates šûb with epistrepḥō and apostrepḥō. Repentance follows a turning about that is a gift of God (Ps. 80:3, 7, 19; Jer. 31:18–20). Isaiah 55:6–7 gives the typical OT call to repentance and conversion. Heartfelt sorrow for sin and conversion are sometimes placed in an eschatological setting, being linked to the remission of judgment, the return from captivity, the coming of the great time of salvation, and the coming of Pentecost (Jer. 31:17–20, 31–34; Joel 2:12–32).

In the NT metanoia (noun) occurs twenty-three times and metanoēō (verb) thirty-four times. Metamelomai occurs seldom and is used almost exclusively in the sense of “regretting, having remorse.” Metanoēō (metanoia) is almost always used in a favorable sense.

Repentance is the theme of the preaching of John the Baptist (Matt. 3:1, 8; Mark 1:4). Baptism in water unto repentance is accompanied by confession of sins (Matt. 3:6; cf. 1 John 1:8–9). Jesus continues John’s theme but adds, significantly, “The time has come” (Mark 1:15). His coming is the coming of the kingdom in person and is decisive (Matt. 11:20–24; Luke 13:1–5). All life relationships must be radically altered (Matt. 5:17–7:27; Luke 14:25–35; 18:18–30). Sinners, not the righteous, are called to metanoia (Matt. 9:13; Mark 2:17; Luke 5:32), and heaven rejoices over their repentance (Luke 15). The preaching of repentance and remission of sins must be joined to the proclamation of the cross and the resurrection (Luke 24:44–49). The apostles are true to this commission (Acts 2:38; 3:19; 17:30; 20:21). Unfaithful churches must repent (Rev. 3:5, 16). Apostates crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh and cannot be renewed to repentance (Heb. 6:5–6).

NT writers often distinguish between repentance and conversion (Acts 3:19; 26:20), and between repentance and faith (Mark 1:15; Acts 20:21). “[Epistrepḥō] has a somewhat wider signification than metanoēō . . . [and] always includes the element of faith. Metanoēō and pi- steuein can be alongside of each other; not so epistrepḥō and pisteuein” (Berkhof, Systematic Theology, 482). The distinction between metanoēō and epistrepḥō should not be pressed. Metanoia, at least, is used to signify the whole process of change. God has granted the Gentiles “repentance unto life” (Acts 11:18), and godly sorrow works “repentance that leads to salvation” (2 Cor. 7:10). Generally, however, metanoia can be said to denote that inward change of mind, affections, convictions, and commitment rooted in the fear of God and sorrow for offenses committed against him, which, when accompanied by faith in Jesus Christ, results in an outward turning from sin to God and his service in all of life. It is never regretted (ametamelēton, 2 Cor. 7:10), and it is given by God (Acts 11:18). Metanoēō points to the inward conscious change while epistrepḥō directs attention particularly to the changed determinative center or all of life (Acts 15:19; 1 Thess. 1:9).

Calvin taught that repentance stemmed from serious fear of God and consisted in the mortification of the old man and the quickening of the Spirit. Mortification and renovation are obtained by union with Christ in his death and resurrection (Institutes of the Christian Religion 3.3.5, 9).

Beza (after Lactantius and Erasmus) objected to the translation metanoēō by “poenitentiam agite,” but the attempt to replace this with resipiscencia (“a coming to one’s self”) was infelicitous. Luther occasionally used “Thut Busse!” but his thesis was that Jesus, in giving this command, meant that all of life was to be penance before God.

Roman Catholicism teaches that the sacrament of penance consists materially of contrition, confession, and satisfaction. But the judicial pronouncement of absolution by the church is needed to give these elements real validity.

C. G. KROMMINGA

See also CONVERSION; ORDER OF SALVATION; PENITENCE; SALVATION.

Bibliography. J. Behm et al., TDNT 4:975–1008; L. Berkhof, Systematic Theology; W. D. Chamberlain, Meaning of Repentance; B. H. Dement, ISBE 4:2558–59; R. B. Girdlestone, Synonyms of the Old Testament; J. Jeremias, New Testament Theology; F. Laubach and J. Goetzmann, NIDNTT 1:353–62; G. Spykman, Attrition and Contrition at the Council of Trent; W. Tefler, Forgiveness of Sins; J. J. von Allmen, ed., Vocabulary of the Bible; G. Vos, Teaching of Jesus Concerning the Kingdom of God and the Church.

Reprobation. This term is derived from the Latin reprobatus, past participle of the verb reprobare, “to reprove,” and refers to the fact that God has condemned the nonelect to eternal punishment for their sins. Calvin set forth this doctrine very clearly and precisely in Institutes of the Christian Religion (3.23.1–3.24), and while he regarded it as a dreadful doctrine, he denied that it was to be avoided or rejected, for it is clearly taught in the Scriptures of both the OT and NT. He cites various instances, such as the divine choice of Jacob and rejection of Esau, even before the twins were born (Gen. 25:21–23; Mal. 1:2–3; Rom. 9:10–15), God’s hardening of Pharaoh’s heart against the Israelites (Exod. 4:21; 10:20, 27; Rom. 9:17–18), and the apostle Paul’s statement in Romans 9:18–21 concerning God’s ability to make one vessel for honor and another for dishonor. He also insists that this is not just a matter of God’s “passing over” the nonelect, but an actual hardening so that they are actually strengthened to resist the gospel. Yet while holding this position, he insists that because we cannot comprehend the full counsel of God, we must simply believe and leave the matter in God’s hands, knowing that the Judge of all the earth will do what is right (Gen. 18:25). He also warns that, because of the mystery of God’s sovereign will, this doctrine must be dealt with very carefully lest it discourage Christians and give unbelievers an excuse for rejecting the gospel call.

Moderate Calvinists deny that there is an equal ultimacy to the decrees of election and reprobation and hence, reprobation is fundamentally a “passing over.” God’s election secures the salvation of the elect, whereas the nonelect are left (“passed over”) in their lostness and thus responsible for their own condemnation.

Arminian theologians, of course, reject the entire Calvinist schema, founding God’s decrees of election and reprobation upon God’s foreknowledge of how one will respond to the gospel—those who respond favorably secure election for themselves and those who reject the gospel are reprobated.

W. S. REID

See also ELECT, ELECTION; PREDESTINATION; PRETERITION.

Bibliography. G. C. Berkouwer, Divine Election; H. R. Boer, Doctrine of Reprobation in the Christian Reformed Church; C. Hodge, Systematic Theology; C. Pincock, ed., Grace Unlimited.

Responsibility. The relation a free moral agent has to a decision or act for which the agent is answerable, accountable, or responsible. The counterpart to responsibility is imputability, in which the decision or act is chargeable, attributable, or imputable to the agent. Assumed here in both cases are a law imposing an obligation and a sanction enforcing the obligation. A sanction is a promise of reward and threat of punishment. The lawbreaker deserves the punishment, and the law keeper is entitled to the reward because of merit, or the right of payment. Responsibility and imputability, or culpability, are particularly concerned with the extent to which a decision or act owes its origin to an agent’s will guided by reason. Responsibility for a bad act is called guilt. There is no corresponding designation of responsibility for a good act. This is probably accounted for by the fact that responsibility is more often associated with acts of wrongdoing than right doing.

A related concept is justice, the measure of merit. Justice stems from the idea of equality between two persons having some agreement, understanding, or contract between them. If one party fails to keep the agreement, then he or she upsets the equality, thereby owing a compensation to the other party. The person keeping the agreement has something due him or her. Justice is served when the offending party pays the offended party whatever is deserved or merited, that is, whatever is considered to reestablish the state of equality. From the standpoint of the offended party, the compensation merited is regarded as a reward. From the standpoint of the offending party, the compensation owed is seen as a punishment.

Moving beyond the limits of the simple contract situation into the broader context of moral responsibility in general, we find that punishment has several functions, since more than an individual is usually offended by an act of wrongdoing. That act may be a crime against the group or the state. It may also be a sin against God. Retributive punishment serves the offended person by getting back at the offender and restoring the balance justice demands. Corrective or rehabilitative punishment serves the offender by bringing him or her back to the place of equality with the rest of the group or society. Preventive or deterrent punishment serves the group or society by forestalling future wrongdoing of the type committed. Vindictive punishment serves the law and the lawgiver, both human and divine, by putting down one who has flouted the very ideas of law, equality, and justice. By so doing, that person has offended the holiness and justice of God himself.

Although responsibility is being treated here as a moral phenomenon, we have reflected the biblical approach by looking at it from the standpoint of some of the concerns of legal responsibility. A study of legal responsibility as such would lead into such topics as an offender’s intentions (mens rea), strict liability, and criminal insanity. Instead, we shall focus on a concept that is central to moral responsibility as such, namely, the concept of freedom.

Responsibility and Freedom. No one holds a person responsible for a decision or act when that person’s will is not free. Hard determinists believe that the will is never free, hence, there is no such thing as moral responsibility. For those who hold the will to be free, a practical criterion is that for any act an agent may be considered to have the freedom required for responsibility if he or she can choose to do otherwise. To be able to choose to do otherwise may be taken to mean that more than one alternative is open to the agent, and the alternative actualized is the one chosen by the agent. The focus here is on being able to put into effect a decision once it is made. Soft determinists or compatibilists prefer this interpretation. Not wanting to deny the determination of a person's decisions by such factors as the person's heredity, social background, mental history, character, sinful nature, and, some would add, God's foreknowledge or decrees, a soft determinist still maintains that one or more of these determining factors is compatible with the freedom required for responsibility, as long as the agent is not hindered from carrying out his or her decision.

Responsibility

A third position on the freedom of the will is taken by the libertarian. He or she believes that while the determining factors listed by the determinists play a role, the agent of a responsible decision or act must have the kind of freedom in which his or her being able to choose to do otherwise means that no one, not even the agent, can always successfully predict the decision arrived at. It is a new creation arising out of the decision-making process. Some libertarians prefer to think of a free decision to act as having no cause. This is known as indeterminism. Other libertarians refer to the agent's ranking and selecting his or her motives as the cause. This position is called self-determinism.

Another condition necessary for moral responsibility is knowledge of what is expected of one. A person who is ignorant of a rule or law is either not held responsible or is thought to have a reduced degree of responsibility, as long as he or she did not willfully bring about that ignorance.

Responsibility and Scripture. Certainly in Scripture, but also in general usage, responsibility extends to the family, to larger groupings up to a nation, to groups of nations, and to even the entire human race. But the primary focus of responsibility is a person who can be held accountable, i.e., an agent who has the power or ability to make decisions and act on them intentionally. One acts intentionally when one does something for a reason, that is, because of one's beliefs and desires. This is why God is said to judge "the thoughts and intents of the heart."

Specific biblical teachings relative to responsibility include the following: (1) Every human being is held responsible by God for the sin of the first human being (Rom. 5:12). (2) God's giving of the law through Moses created a much greater sense of responsibility in Israel (Rom. 7:7). (3) The rest of the human race is no less responsible, however, for "when [they] . . . do by nature things required by the law . . . [they] show that the requirements of the law are written on their hearts" (Rom. 2:14–15). (4) Unless the sinner acknowledges responsibility for sin and repents, he or she cannot be forgiven by God through Jesus Christ (Acts 3:19).

S. R. OBITS

See also ETHICS, BIBLICAL; FREEDOM, FREE WILL, AND DETERMINISM.

Bibliography. J. Feinberg, Doing and Deserving; W. K. Frankena, Ethics; J. Glover, Responsibility; H. L. A. Hart, Punishment and Responsibility; H. Morris, ed., Freedom and Responsibility; H. R. Niebuhr, Responsible Self; F. Schoeman, ed., Responsibility, Character and the Emotions; P. van Inwagen, Essay on Free Will; D. Wiggins, Needs, Value, Truth; R. Young, Freedom, Responsibility, and God.

Restoration of Israel. See ISRAEL AND PROPHECY.

Resurrection of Christ. That Jesus Christ died and afterward rose from the dead is both the central doctrine of Christian theology and the major fact in a defense of its teachings. This was true in the earliest church and remains so today.

The Centrality of the Resurrection. It is the witness of the NT that the resurrection of Jesus is the pivotal point of Christian theology and apologetics. Paul reports an early creed in 1 Corinthians 15:3–7, which both includes the resurrection as an integral part of the gospel and reports several eyewitness appearances.

Then Paul relates the importance of this event, for if Jesus did not literally rise from the dead, then the entire Christian faith is fallacious (v. 14) and ineffective (v. 17). Additionally, preaching is valueless (v. 14), Christian testimony is false (v. 15), no sins have been forgiven (v. 17), and believers have perished without any Christian hope (v. 18). The conclusion is that, apart from this event, Christians are the most miserable of all people (v. 19). Paul even states that without the resurrection we should "eat and drink, for tomorrow we die" (v. 32). If Jesus was not raised, believers have no hope of resurrection themselves and may as well turn to hedonistic philosophies of life. He thereby strongly implies that it is this event that separates Christianity from other philosophies.

Paul teaches the centrality of the resurrection in other passages as well. In another ancient creed (Rom. 1:3–4) he recites a brief Christology and asserts that Jesus was shown to be the Son of God, Christ, and Lord by his resurrection (cf. Rom. 14:9). This event also provides salvation (Rom. 10:9–10) and ensures the resurrection of believers (1 Cor. 15:20; 2 Cor. 4:14; 1 Thess. 4:14).

Similarly, Luke's writings relate several instances where the resurrection provided the basis for the Christian proclamation. Jesus taught that his death and resurrection were a central message of the OT (Luke 24:25–27). Peter held that the miracles that Jesus performed, and his resurrection in particular, were the chief indications that God approved of his teachings (Acts 2:22–32). Paul's teaching frequently utilized the resurrection as the basis of the gospel message (cf. Acts 13:29–39; 17:30–31).

Other NT writings share the same hope. Jesus gave his resurrection as the sign vindicating the authority of his teachings (Matt. 12:38–40). This event both ensures the believer's salvation (1 Pet. 1:3) and provides the means by which Jesus serves as the believer's high priest (Heb. 7:23–25).

Even such a brief survey indicates the centrality of the resurrection for the NT writers. Clearly, early believers such as Paul realized that this event provided the central claim of Christianity. With it the Christian message of eternal life is secure, resting on the reality of Jesus' victory over death. Without it the Christian message is reduced to that of one of man's philosophies.

The earliest postapostolic writings held this same message of the centrality of Jesus' resurrection. For example, Clement of Rome asserts that this event both demonstrates the truthfulness of Christ's message (Cor. 42) and is an example of the believer's resurrection (24–26). Ignatius insists on the literal facticity of this occurrence as an event in time (Mag. 11; Trall. 9; Smyr. 1), which is the believer's hope (Trall., Introduction) and an example of our resurrection (Trall. 9). He also emphasizes the belief that it was Jesus' flesh that was raised (Smyr. 3).

This latter issue of whether it was Jesus' flesh that was resurrected, as supported by Ignatius and later by Tertullian, or whether it was a resurrected body not composed of flesh, as championed by the Alexandrian school and Origen in particular, was a major question in early Christian theology. It was the former position, or forms of it, that gradually became the more widely accepted view in the medieval church and even afterward.

For many scholars today who accept the literal resurrection of Jesus, the emphasis has shifted to emphasize Paul's concept of the "spiritual body" (e.g., 1 Cor. 15:35–50), endeavoring to do justice to both elements. Thus, Jesus was raised in a real body that had new, spiritual qualities.

The Resurrection and Contemporary Theology. There is virtual agreement, even among most critical theologians, that the resurrection of Jesus is the central claim of Christianity. Willi Marxsen asserts that it is still the decisive issue in Christian theology today; to have uncertainty concerning this claim is to jeopardize all of Christianity. Günther Bornkamm agrees that without the message of Jesus' resurrection there would be no church, no NT, and no Christian faith even to this day. Jürgen Moltmann clearly states that Christianity either stands or falls with Jesus' resurrection.

Yet a major issue here concerns the question of whether all that is required is the message of the resurrection, or the literal event itself. This is not only a dispute between evangelicals and higher critical theologians, but also among these critical scholars themselves. The pivotal fact, recognized as historical by virtually all scholars, is the original experiences of the disciples. It is nearly always admitted that the disciples had real experiences and that "something happened." Yet, while contemporary scholars rarely utilize the naturalistic alternative theories, various views exist concerning the exact nature of these experiences. At the risk of oversimplification and partial repetition, at least four major critical positions can be outlined with regard to this question.

First, more radical critics hold that the nature of the original eyewitnesses' experiences cannot be ascertained. For example, Rudolf Bultmann and his followers claim that the actual cause of the disciples' transformation is obscured in the NT text. Regardless, it is not really important to inquire into the object of these experiences. Similarly, Marxsen also believes that the constitution of these encounters cannot be known, including whether the disciples actually saw the risen Jesus. Paul van Buren believes that "something happened" that changed the disciples' outlook from discouragement to faith. Although these experiences were more than subjective and were expressed in terms of actual appearances of Jesus, we still cannot judge their nature.

A second group of scholars is distinguished from the first not only by exhibiting some interest in the nature of the disciples' experiences, but often by the acceptance of the literal resurrection itself. Yet while the naturalistic theories are usually rejected, this group still insists that the event can be known only by faith completely apart from any verification.

The theologians in this second group have usually been influenced by Søren Kierkegaard and more recently by Karl Barth, who held that the resurrection may be accepted by faith as a literal event, but that it cannot be ascertained by any historical investigation. Barth emphatically rejected naturalistic theories and asserted that Jesus appeared empirically to his disciples, yet this event occurred in a different sphere of history and thus cannot be verified by history. Similar views were held by neoorthodox theologians such as Emil Brunner and Dietrich Bonhoeffer, and are also popular in more contemporary works. For example, Bornkamm notes the invalidity of naturalistic theories but yet, in a manner reminiscent of Barth, states that this event can be accepted only by faith apart from historical examination.

The third position is characterized by a significant interest in more historical aspects of the resurrection. Not only are naturalistic theories usually rejected, but the empty tomb is often held to be a historical fact. Additionally, these scholars proceed a step further by setting forth a more or less abstract reconstruction of the historical nature of the appearances. However, it is still held that the resurrection itself is an eschatological event and is not demonstrable by historical methodology, although some hold that it will be verifiable in the future.

Resurrection of Christ

Moltmann holds that the disciples were the recipients of appearances of the risen Jesus, which involved spoken messages and commissioned the hearers to service in the world. These events, which are not strictly verifiable, are placed in eschatological history and are subject to future verification. Ulrich Wilckens likewise concludes that history cannot decide exactly what happened. Thus, while naturalistic theories can be refuted and the facticity of the empty tomb upheld, the appearances themselves were private revelations, indications of a future, eschatological existence.

Reginald Fuller notes that the disciples' transformations necessitate a cause. This cause is Jesus' appearances, which are historically defined as visionary experiences of light and auditions of meaning communicated to the earliest eyewitnesses. The messages both proclaimed that Jesus was risen and imparted a mission to his followers. Such phenomena were not subjective visions but actual experiences. They were the source of the Easter faith and message but are removed from historical demonstration. Joachim Jeremias similarly taught that the appearances of Jesus were spiritual visions of shining light by which the disciples experienced Jesus as the risen Lord.

The fourth approach to the resurrection is that the available historical evidence demonstrates the probability that Jesus was literally raised from the dead. Perhaps the best-known recent theologian accepting this conclusion is Wolfhart Pannenberg, who both argues vigorously against naturalistic theories and concludes that the historical facts demonstrate the empty tomb and the literal appearances of Jesus. Yet Pannenberg argues against a corporeal resurrection body in favor of appearances that are described in terms of a spiritual body that was recognized as Jesus, who appeared from heaven, imparted an audition, and, at least in Paul's case, was accompanied by a phenomenon of light.

A. M. Hunter utilizes historical investigation to conclude that Jesus' resurrection can be demonstrated by the facts. J. A. T. Robinson points out that historical studies cannot ascertain the exact details, but they may be sufficient to formulate a probable case for the probability of this event. Raymond Brown, after an extensive study of the textual data, likewise supports the historical verification of Jesus' resurrection. Additionally, Hunter, Robinson, and Brown all favor the concept of the spiritual body.

It is important to note that of these four critical positions only the first is generally characterized by a rejection of or agnostic attitude toward the literal resurrection of Jesus. Just as significant is the observation that the first position not only appears to be losing ground, but varying positions that support the facticity of the resurrection are presently quite popular.

The Resurrection as History. Historical arguments for the resurrection have traditionally been based on two lines of support. First, naturalistic theories have failed to explain away this event, chiefly because each one is disproven by the known historical facts.

Not often known, critics themselves have attacked each theory. For instance, in the nineteenth century David Strauss disarmed the swoon theory while Theodor Keim and others pointed out the weaknesses in the hallucination theory. Form critical studies later revealed the futility of the legend theory popularized by the history of religion school of thought. In the twentieth century such diverse thinkers as Barth, Tillich, Bornkamm, and Pannenberg are examples of higher critical theologians who have rejected these alternative hypotheses.

Second, historical evidences for the resurrection are often cited, such as the eyewitness testimony for Jesus' appearances, the transformed lives of the disciples, the empty tomb, the inability of the Jewish leaders to disprove these claims, and the conversion of skeptics such as Paul and James, the brother of Jesus. When combined with the absence of naturalistic alternative theories, these evidences are quite impressive.

However, contemporary thought has moved even beyond these important issues to other arguments in favor of the resurrection. One crucial center of attention has been 1 Corinthians 15:3-4, where Paul records material he had "received" from others and then "passed on" to his listeners. It is agreed by virtually all contemporary theologians that this material contains an ancient creed that is actually much earlier than the book in which it is recorded.

The early date of this tradition is indicated not only by Paul's rather technical terms for receiving and passing on tradition, but also by the somewhat stylized content, the non-Pauline words, the specific names of Peter and James (cf. Gal. 1:18-19), and the possible Semitic idioms used.

These facts have accounted for the critical agreement as to the early origin of this material. In fact, Fuller, Hunter, and Pannenberg date Paul's receiving of this creed from three to eight years after the crucifixion itself. These data are quite significant in that they further indicate that both Paul and the other eyewitnesses proclaimed the death and resurrection of Jesus (1 Cor. 15:11) immediately after the events themselves. This anchors their report firmly in early eyewitness testimony and not in legendary reports arising later.

Another extremely strong argument for the resurrection is derived from the known facts that are admitted as historical by virtually all critical scholars who deal with this subject. Events such as Jesus' death by crucifixion, the subsequent despair of the disciples, their experiences which they believed to be appearances of the risen Jesus, their corresponding transformations, and the conversion of Paul due to a similar experience are five facts that are critically established and accepted as historical by most scholars.

Of these facts the nature of the disciples' experiences is the most crucial. As historian Michael Grant asserts, historical investigation demonstrates that the earliest eyewitnesses were convinced that they had seen the risen Jesus. Carl Braaten explains that even skeptical historians agree with this conclusion. One major advantage of these critically accepted historical facts is that they deal directly with the issue of these experiences. On a more limited scale these facts are capable both of arguing decisively against each of the naturalistic alternative theories and of providing some strong evidences for the literal appearances of the risen Jesus as reported by the eyewitnesses.

Not only can the historical resurrection be established on this basis, but the additional advantage of these facts is that they are admitted by virtually all scholars as knowable history. Since such a minimum number of facts is adequate to historically establish the literal resurrection as the best explanation for the data, this event therefore should not be rejected even by those critics who disbelieve the reliability of Scripture. Their questions on other issues do not disprove this basic conclusion, which can be established by critical and historical procedures.

Especially when viewed in conjunction with the eyewitness evidence from the early creed, we have a strong twofold apologetic for the historicity of Jesus' resurrection. This contemporary approach also complements the more traditional apologetic summarized earlier, all of which combine to historically demonstrate the fact that Jesus was raised from the dead.

As Paul asserted in 1 Corinthians 15:12–20, the resurrection is the center of the Christian faith and theology. This event signals the approval of Jesus' teachings (Acts 2:22–24) and thus continues to provide a basis for Christian belief today. It guarantees the reality of eternal life for all who trust the gospel (1 Cor. 15:1–4, 20).

G. R. HABERMAS

See also JESUS CHRIST.

Bibliography. K. Barth, Church Dogmatics; D. Bonhoeffer, Christ the Center; G. Bornkamm, Jesus of Nazareth; C. Brown, NIDNTT 3:259–309; R. E. Brown, Virginal Conception and Bodily Resurrection of Jesus; W. L. Craig, Assessing the New Testament Evidence for the Historicity of the Resurrection of Jesus; D. P. Fuller, Easter Faith and History; R. H. Fuller, Formation of the Resurrection Narratives; G. R. Habermas, Did Jesus Rise from the Dead?; Resurrection of Jesus; A. M. Hunter, Bible and Gospel; J. Jeremias, New Testament Theology; W. Kunneth, Theology of the Resurrection; G. E. Ladd, I Believe in the Resurrection of Jesus; W. Marxsen, Resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth; J. Moltmann, Revolution and the Future; J. Orr, Resurrection of Jesus; G. R. Osborn, Resurrection Narratives; W. Pannenberg, Jesus—God and Man; W. J. Sparrow-Simpson, Resurrection and Modern Thought; J. Wenham, Easter Enigma; U. Wilkens, Resurrection.

Resurrection of the Dead. In the Old Testament. Several considerations moved the Old Testament thought away from the early, universal, animistic ideas about postmortem survival that underlay necromancy (1 Sam. 28:8–9), funeral provisions, directions for the dead, and Sheol/Hades, the shadowy underworld of ghosts (Ezek. 32:17–32).

Everyday observation, plus the belief that God made the human body in his own image, led to the conviction that a person was not "soul" imprisoned within a physical frame but embodied spirit, a unity of body and living self. Sheol's disembodiment in forgetfulness, hopelessness, and without knowledge or relationships (2 Sam. 12:23; Job 7:9–10; 10:20–22; Ps. 30:9; Eccles. 9:2, 5, 10) therefore struck horror, as subhuman. Hence Israel's care for the bodies of the dead (Gen. 23; 50:2, 25; Jer. 8:1–2; 14:16).

At first Yahweh's rule did not extend beyond death (Pss. 6:5; 88:10–12; Isa. 38:18), until prophetic insistence on his universal sovereignty claimed Sheol also within his jurisdiction (Ps. 139:7–8). The emphasis of Jeremiah and Ezekiel on individual relationships with God led to more religious conceptions of the afterlife (Pss. 16:8–11; 73:23–26). No shadow existence could sustain divine fellowship, but only restoration to full personality in resurrection (cf. Matt. 22:31–32).

Longing for acquittal from the accusation that great suffering implies great sin made Job contemplate waiting in Sheol until God's wrath be past and he, released, would live again (Job 14:7–15). Despite its difficulties, Job 19:25–27 likewise appears to anticipate immortality in some bodily form. Psalms 49:14–15; 73:17; and Isaiah 53:10–12 similarly relieve the injustice of suffering by the hope of life with God beyond Sheol.

Some think the promises of national vindication and prosperity in the day of the Lord, unless confined to "the final generation," first prompted thoughts of resurrection of intervening generations, although Ezekiel 37:1–14 and Hosea 6:2 and 13:14 use resurrection language as already familiar. Isaiah 24–27 (esp. 25:6–8; 26:19) and Daniel 12:1–4 anticipate the return of men in bodily integrity to share Israel's glory. Isaiah 26:14 denies resurrection to foes; Daniel includes resurrection "to life" (for Jews faithful under persecution), and "to everlasting contempt" (for Jews who joined the persecutors, 12:2). No general resurrection is implied: here, too, justice is the argument.

Resurrection of the Dead

Zoroastrian, Egyptian, Assyrian, and Babylonian allusions may be either sources or parallels to developing Jewish thought.

Intertestamental Apocalyptic Thought. Intertestamental apocalyptic ranged widely. Some writers applied moral distinctions within Sheol, with reward and punishment implying some degree of judgment. Promises to the faithful, especially martyrs, included earthly glory; justice would likewise resurrect oppressors (with their deformities) to be recognized and punished (2 Bar.; cf. Mark 9:42–48).

Hellenized Judaism preferred immortality of the soul, more richly conceived, to resurrection of the body. Palestinian Judaism clung to resurrection. "Garments of glory" (of life) were required for life beyond death (1–2 Enoch), "nakedness" (disembodiment) being abhorred. Some speak of a spiritual body, counterpart to the physical and coexistent with it. First Enoch says the body buried will rise "glorious"; 2 Baruch resembles 1 Corinthians 15:35–53 but holds the transformation comes later; most speak of the risen body as "like angels . . . made of the light and glory of God"; others of its neither needing food nor engaging in marriage.

Those raised to share Messiah's temporary (earthly) or final (supernatural) kingdom will be righteous (Jews). Other writers assume a general resurrection: 2 Esdras, a resurrection of Messiah and all people after the messianic age. In 1 Enoch 22 those already punished remain in Sheol; those not punished move to torturing Gehenna; 1 Enoch 67 has some wicked raised for judgment. Apocalyptists invent various stages of judgment, kingdom, resurrection. Testament of Benjamin 10:6–10 makes patriarchs rise first, then sons of Jacob, then all people. Second Maccabees, perhaps following hints of Isaiah 24–27 and Daniel, suggests martyrs deserve priority.

By the first century most Jews held to general resurrection; rabbis argued Abraham so believed (Heb. 11:19). Pharisees expected resurrection of the just (Acts 23:6–8), so probably did Essenes and Qumran covenanters. Sadducees denied resurrection as not "Mosaic" and possibly as a foreign idea (Mark 12:18; Josephus says they believed the soul died with the body). A few, holding matter evil, denied resurrection altogether.

In the New Testament. New Christian contributions include (1) Jesus' teaching, set against his raising others to resume life, and predictions of his own rising ("third day," not timeless immortality). Jesus utilized picturesque detail familiar to hearers, especially Pharisees—Sheol/Hades (Luke 10:15; 16:19–31), morally subdivided, ministry of angels, welcome by patriarchs, torment (Matt. 8:12; 10:28; Mark 9:43–48), resurrection for fellowship (Matt. 8:11), reward (Luke 14:14). Jesus argues immortality from experience of God and assumes this involves resurrection (Mark 12:18–27). The risen life is new, angelic, and sexless. His emphasis falls on judgment, which appears to be immediate (Luke 16:23; cf. 12:20), or at the Son of Man's coronation (Matt. 25:31–46). Judgment implies general resurrection (Matt. 10:28; 25:41; Mark 12:26); but Luke 14:14; 20:35–38; suggest resurrection limited to those qualified. (2) Jesus' own resurrection is the key event in Christian history and the basis of Peter's gospel (Acts 2:32) and Paul's (Acts 17:18; 23:6; 26:6–8). Apostolic testimony (Acts 3:26; 4:2, 33; Rom. 10:9; 1 Cor. 15:3–11) makes resurrection essential in Christianity. Details of the story (waiting in Sheol, persistent wounds, "flesh and bones" that can be touched yet "in another form" are unrecognized, passes through doors, vanishes) combine current ideas with a new assertion: an empty tomb. The unquestioned fact creates a new basis for resurrection hope (Rom. 8:11; 1 Cor. 6:14; 15:20–28; 2 Cor. 4:14; 1 Thess. 4:14; 1 Peter 1:3, 21) through Christ "whom God has raised" (sixteen allusions). (3) Pauline reflection likewise begins from current Pharisaic views: the departed share the coming glory (1 Thess. 4:15–17), general resurrection and judgment (Acts 17:31; 24:15; Rom. 2:5–11; 2 Cor. 5:10), horror of disembodied nakedness (2 Cor. 5:4). Paul develops three themes:

Complete Redemption. This includes redemption of the body and argues new ground for resurrection hope. Sexually, Christians must remember that the body is the Lord's, "members of Christ," a temple of the Spirit, purchased by Christ (1 Cor. 6:12–20), instrument of righteousness (Rom. 6:12–14), vehicle of worship (Rom. 12:1). Humans being embodied spirits, redemption would remain incomplete without resurrection.

"We Will All Be Changed." Wishing to be done with the "humiliating" flesh, too long the vehicle of sin (Rom. 7:21–25; Phil. 3:20–21), yet not be "naked" (2 Cor. 5:1–5), Paul argued for deliverance of the body from corruption, but not (as the Greeks) for deliverance of the spirit from the body. Arguing with those who, stressing dissolution, preferred immortality to resurrection, Paul insists first on the bodily resurrection of Jesus (1 Cor. 15:1–33) then faces objectors with the variety of bodies in nature (birds, fishes, grain) each adapted to its environment, and asserts that God will provide the risen soul with a new body, glorious, incorruptible, immortal (cf. 1 Thess. 4:16–17). The key words “we will all be changed” imply continuity and difference. As grain disintegrates, that a totally new body may emerge, so human bodies disintegrate that the enduring life may organize new embodiment while retaining identity, as happens (we are told) repeatedly from birth to old age. This effectively meets the objection from dissolution; it has also implications affecting burial and cremation. Paul did not expect such transformation at death, but at the advent (1 Cor. 15:23, 51–54; 1 Thess. 4:14–17), following an intermediate state that is far better but not final glory (Phil. 1:23; cf. Luke 23:43, “today”; Acts 7:60, “sleep”).

The Change Has Begun. “Attaining the resurrection” (Phil. 3:11) involves sowing the spiritual, heavenly body in this life by yielding to the Spirit (Rom. 8:11), constantly dying and quickened (2 Cor. 4:10–12, 14), reaping eternal life (Gal. 6:8). The counterpart, coexisting spiritual body is being created not as the angels but like Christ’s glorious body (Phil. 3:21), as Christians live the risen life now (Rom. 6; Eph. 2:1–10; Col. 3:1–17). Nevertheless, Paul adheres to physical resurrection as the consummation of the process (1 Cor. 15:12–20): the resurrection has not “already taken place” (2 Tim. 2:18).

Johannine reflection moves even nearer than Paul’s toward incorporeal immortality. Eternal life is experienced now (John 3:36); the faithful never see death (8:51); believers have already “crossed over” from death to life (5:24), as have those who love (1 John 3:14). Faced with Martha’s talk about resurrection at the last day, Jesus replies that he himself, and relationship to him, constitute the resurrection and the life (John 11:25; 17:3), just as belief in him avoids judgment and unbelief is judgment (3:18–21). As Christ’s own life (preexistent, earthly, post-mortem) passes through death unquenched, so believers will never die (8:51). Those who disobey the Son do not see life (3:36). As does Paul, John appears to discount physical resurrection, yet 5:25, 28–29 declare a general resurrection, and 6:39–40, 44, 54 a resurrection of believers “at the last day”—hardly an accommodation to earlier views or interpolation, since Lazarus’s restoration to this life and Christ’s physical resurrection mean so much to John. Faith was still exploratory; “what we will be has not yet been made known” (1 John 3:2).

Further Developments. Later thought further illustrates the tension between Hebrew and Greek emphases. Gnostic dualism infiltrated Christian teaching about God, Christ, and morality with the alien Greek principle that matter is inherently evil and must be destroyed, resurrection being impossible. But (except in asceticism) the church rejected dualism. First and Second Clement, Barnabas (“a general resurrection”), and Tertullian (“the soul inherently immortal and death unnatural, yet the same body will be raised”) express the orthodox view. Ignatius follows John: Christ is eternal life, but “flesh and spirit” will be raised through the Eucharist (“medicine of immortality”) and the Spirit. Origen insists that the natural body is dissolved into dust, but will be raised and “advance to a spiritual body”—so striving to reconcile Hebrew and Platonic ideas. Aquinas, too, holds that our fleshy bodies rise and remain fleshy; like Tertullian, he finds spiritual uses for redundant physical organs.

A typical modern statement runs: “The term of immortality is preferable. The argument that religious experience implies personal survival points to the immortality of the soul and its values rather than to resurrection of the body.” This attracts many, who do not always realize the values conserved by the traditional resurrection emphasis: the permanence not only of abstract personality and values but of the individual, with consciousness, relationships, memories, and love, against theories on absorption (“a drop in the eternal ocean of being”), racial survival (“continuing to contribute to ongoing humanity”), or sentimental immortality (“to live in the hearts of those we love is not to die”). Essentially, Christians believe that he who called humans into being and into fellowship with himself can sustain all persons under eternal conditions, in complete and enriched humanity, in such bodily garment as eternal life requires. R. E. O. WHITE

See also ETERNAL LIFE; HEAVEN; IMMORTALITY; RESURRECTION OF CHRIST

Bibliography. J. Baillie, And the Life Everlasting; R. B. Gaffin, Centrality of the Resurrection; M. T. Harris, Raised Immortal; J. H. Leckie, World to Come and Final Destiny; D. S. Russell, Between the Testaments; J. A. Schep, Nature of the Resurrection Body; Tertullian, On the Resurrection of the Flesh.

Retaliation. See VENGEANCE.

Revelation, General. The divine disclosure to all persons at all times and in all places by which humans come to know that God is and what he is like. While not imparting truths necessary for salvation—such as the Trinity, the incarnation, or the atonement—general revelation conveys the conviction that God exists and that he is transcendent, immanent, self-sufficient, eternal, powerful, good, and a hater of evil. The locus of general revelation may be divided into two categories: (1) internal, or the innate sense of deity and the moral conscience, and (2) external, or the indicia of nature and the course of providential history.

Summary of Positions. 1. Some scholars deny any reality to general revelation. Postulating an infinite qualitative distinction between God and persons and destruction of the imago Dei by the fall, Barth refused to acknowledge any revelation outside the Word of God.

Revelation, General

2. Others concede the givenness of general revelation but deny that it registers as actual knowledge. The Dutch Reformed school of Kuyper, Berkouwer, Van Til and followers insists that nature and history point to God only in those who antecedently have been illumined by regenerating grace.

3. On the other extreme, many liberals insist that the light afforded by general revelation is sufficient for salvation. One tradition focuses attention on the illuminatory value of ecstatic religious experience. Thus, Schleiermacher, Otto, Tillich, and Rahner claim that through a noncognitive mystical meeting the human soul savingly engages God, the world Soul. A second liberal tradition claims that the human mind, utilizing the scientific method, is capable of ferreting out truth sufficient for humans to order their lives. Thus, H. P. Van Dusen, H. DeWolf, and others argue that since the world is ordered by God and reflects his will, a scientific analysis of persons and their environment will lead savingly to God.

4. Aquinas and the Thomistic tradition claim that the rational mind, aided by the analogy of being between God and humans and the law of cause and effect, is capable of proving God's existence and the infinity of his perfections. By inductive analysis of space-time phenomena, Aquinas constructed a formidable body of natural theology. Although optimistic about one's natural ability to amass knowledge of God, he stressed that salvation requires higher truths mediated by special revelation.

5. Authorities such as Augustine, Luther, Calvin, Hodge, Warfield, and Henry argue for the objective reality of general revelation and its limited utility for mediating elemental knowledge of God's existence, character, and moral demands. Augustine upheld a Logos-enabled intuition of God that serves as the basis for the acquisition of knowledge by rational inspection of the phenomenal world. Luther stated that "all men have the general knowledge that God is, that he has created heaven and earth, that he is just, that he punishes the wicked, etc." Calvin similarly insisted that "even wicked men are forced, by the mere view of the earth and sky, to rise to the Creator." So also the Belgic Confession (II) and the Westminster Confession of Faith (I, 1).

Biblical Data. In the OT Elihu's speech to Job (esp. Job 36:24–37:24) draws attention to the rain that waters the earth, the thunder and lightning that strikes terror in the heart, the fury of a thunderstorm, and the brilliant shining of the sun following the storm's departure. The text suggests that these natural phenomena attest the power, majesty, goodness, and severity of the creator God and that the evidence is there for all to behold (Job 36:25). Moreover, God's address to Job (esp. Job 38:1–39:30) indicates that natural phenomena (lightning, thunder, rain, snow), the daily rising of the sun, the majestic constellations in the heavens, and the complexity and harmonious interrelationships among the animal kingdom attest the existence and the glory of God.

According to Psalm 19, God reveals himself via the two-volume book of nature (vv. 1–6) and the book of the law (vv. 7–13). In the first volume we read, "The heavens declare the glory of God; the skies proclaim the work of his hands" (v. 1). That which the created order shows forth is the divine "glory" (kabod), i.e., the external manifestation of God's inner being and attributes. The revelation of God's glory through the heavens is declared to be uninterrupted (v. 2), universal (v. 3), and worldwide in scope (v. 4). That Judaism held to a general revelation in nature is clear from Wisdom of Solomon 13:5: "The greatness and beauty of created things give us a corresponding idea of their Creator."

In the prologue to his Gospel, John makes two assertions about the eternal Word. First, "in him was life, and that life was the light of men" (1:4). And second, the Word, "the true light that gives light to every man," "was coming into the world" (1:9). Greeks identified the logos as the divine power that energizes human intellectual and moral life. Wisdom, the parallel Jewish concept, was viewed as the power of God operative in the world that creates, enlightens, and renews (cf. Wisd. Sol. 7:22–9:18). Thus, it seems likely that in John 1:4, 9 the apostle has in mind the universal work of the Logos whereby human minds are divinely illumined so as to perceive God as a first principle, much the same as Calvin's "sense of divinity" or "seed of religion."

Preaching to Gentiles at Lystra, Paul and Barnabas appealed to knowledge they and their hearers held in common as a result of general revelation: namely, that God is the Creator of all things (Acts 14:15) and the providential provider of life's necessities (v. 17). In his dealings with humankind, God "has not left himself without testimony" (amartyron, v. 17). Similarly, in his address to pagans at Athens (Acts 17:22–31), Paul referred, as a point of contact, to truths his audience knew by virtue of God's universal self-disclosure in nature and history. These include: (1) God is the creator and sovereign of the universe (Acts 17:24); (2) he is self-sufficient (v. 25a), (3) the source of life and all good (v. 25b), (4) an intelligent being who formulates plans (v. 26), (5) immanent in the world (v. 27), and (6) the source and ground of human existence (v. 28).

In Romans 2:14–15 Paul teaches that a further modality of general revelation is the implanted moral law, attested to the heart by the conscience. All persons are guilty of transgressing the law, Paul argues: Jews because they have violated the law written on stone, and Gentiles because they have failed to live by the moral law written on their hearts (cf. Rom 1:32). Communicated to every rational person by the power of conscience are the existence of a supreme Lawgiver and his moral requirements.

The clearest teaching that all people of sound mind possess rudimentary knowledge of God as creator occurs in Romans 1:18–21. Paul argues that through universal revelation in nature God is “clearly seen” (v. 20), “understood” (v. 20), and “known” (v. 19; cf. v. 21). Persons gain knowledge of God’s invisible qualities—his eternal power and divine nature (theiotes). The Greek word theiotes, “divinity,” signifies the totality of the perfections that comprise the Godhead. Moreover, the apostle claims that this elemental knowledge of God is acquired by rational reflection on the created order (v. 20). The verb ginosko (to “know”) used in verses 19, 21 connotes to perceive with the senses and grasp with the mind.

Implications. Scripture teaches that when confronted with the truth-content of general revelation, sinners consistently dismiss it from consciousness (Rom. 1:21–32). Thus, instead of worshiping and obeying God, the unregenerate assert their own autonomy and fashion lifeless idols, which they then venerate. God responds by giving the rejecters of light over to the sordid impulses of their sinful nature (Rom. 1:24, 26, 28). Instead of proving salvific, general revelation serves only to condemn and to establish guilt-worthiness before God (Rom. 1:20).

But general revelation serves several salutary ends. (1) It accounts for the presence of truth wherever found in human experience and culture, including valid elements in the non-Christian religions. (2) The universally implanted moral law provides the only authentic basis by which good and evil can be distinguished. The fact that good is enjoined and evil proscribed provides society with a viable moral framework. (3) Since all people possess rudimentary knowledge of God, Christian witnesses are assured when speaking to the unconverted that the notion of God is not meaningless. And (4) general revelation provides the rational basis for God’s saving revelation conveyed through Christ and the Bible. In this sense natural theology (however modest) serves as the vestibule of revealed theology. B. DEMAREST

See also REVELATION, SPECIAL.

Bibliography. H. Bavinck, Philosophy of Revelation; G. C. Berkouwer, General Revelation; E. Brunner, Revelation and Reason; B. A. Demarest, General Revelation: Historical Views and Contemporary Issues; A. Dulles, Models of Revelation.

Revelation, Special. The midtwentieth century’s revival of interest in special divine revelation occurred at a significant time in modern history.

Naturalism had become a virile cultural force in both East and West. In previous centuries the chief rivals of revealed religion were speculative idealism and philosophical theism; leading antagonists in the twentieth century were religious modernism, materialistic communism, logical positivism, atheistic existentialism, variant forms of Anglo-Saxon humanism, and most recently, postmodernism.

The Meaning of Revelation. The term revelation means intrinsically the disclosure of what was previously unknown. In Judeo-Christian theology the term is used primarily of God’s communication to humans of divine truth, that is, his manifestation of himself or of his will. The essentials of the biblical view are that the Logos is the divine agent in all revelation, this revelation being further discriminated as general or universal (i.e., revelation in nature, history, reason, and conscience) and special or particular (i.e., redemptive revelation conveyed by wondrous acts and words). The special revelation in sacred history is crowned by the incarnation of the living Word and the inscription of the spoken word. The gospel of redemption is therefore not merely a series of abstract theses unrelated to specific historical events; it is the dramatic news that God has acted in saving history, climaxed by the incarnate person and work of Christ (Heb. 1:2), for the salvation of lost humankind. Yet the redemptive events of biblical history do not stand uninterpreted. Their authentic meaning is given in the sacred writings—sometimes after, sometimes before the events. The series of sacred acts therefore includes the divine provision of an authoritative canon of writings—the sacred Scriptures—providing a trustworthy source of knowledge of God and of his plan.

Despite the distinction of general and special revelation, God’s revelation is nonetheless a unity, and it must not be artificially sundered. Even prior to the fall, Adam in Eden was instructed by specially revealed statutes (e.g., to be fruitful and multiply, to eat and not to eat of certain fruit). In view of the subsequent corruption, after the fall any one-sided reliance simply on general revelation would be all the more arbitrary. Yet we are not on that account to minimize the fact and importance of general revelation, on which the Bible insists (Ps. 19; Rom. 1–2). But taken alone the so-called theistic proofs have led few to the living God. The assumption of Thomas Aquinas that God can be known by natural reason apart from transcendent divine revelation may be viewed, in fact, as an unwitting preparation for the revolt of early modern philosophy against special revelation and its contrary emphasis solely on general revelation. The many types of speculative theism and idealism arising in the wake of this emphasis were only temporarily able to hold a line against the decline to naturalism.

Revelation, Special

While the Bible indeed affirms God's general revelation, it invariably correlates general revelation with special redemptive revelation. It declares at one and the same time that the Logos is creator and redeemer (John 1). It does not present general revelation on the thesis that the true knowledge of God is possible to fallen humanity through the natural light of reason apart from any divine revelation, but rather introduces general revelation alongside special revelation in order to emphasize human guilt. Thus, the Scripture adduces God's unitary revelation, general and special, to display humanity's true predicament as a finite creature with an eternal destiny, made for spiritual fellowship with God, but now separated from God by sin.

Special revelation is redemptive revelation. It publishes the good tidings that the holy and merciful God promises salvation as a divine gift to humanity which cannot save itself (OT) and that he has now fulfilled that promise in the gift of his Son in whom all people are called to believe (NT). The gospel is news that the incarnate Logos has borne the sins of the doomed, has died in their stead, and has risen for their justification. This is the fixed center of special redemptive revelation.

False Views of Revelation. Christian theology has had to protect the biblical view of special revelation against many perversions. Platonic preoccupation with "eternal ideas" accessible by rational contemplation alone, plus the disregard of history as a meaningful arena of events, tended to militate against essential elements of the biblical view, viz., divine initiative and particularity, and redemptive history as a carrier of absolute revelation. The idealistic notion that God's revelation is given only generally, and that it is a universally accessible idea, is destructive of biblical emphases such as the particularity of special revelation and a historical sequence of special saving events (climaxed by the incarnation, atonement, and resurrection of Christ as the unique center of redemptive revelation). Eighteenth-century rationalism revived the notion of pre-Christian Greek idealism that historical facts are necessarily relative and never absolute, and that revelation consequently is to be divorced from historical actualities and identified with ideas alone. While still professing to speak of Christian revelation, this form of rationalism dissolved the essential connection of special revelation with historical disclosure. Moreover, it freely abandoned to destructive critics crucial aspects of redemptive history. And it surrendered the defense of the uniqueness or once-for-allness of special revelation in deference to the notion that revelation is always and only general.

Wherever Christianity has been confronted by idealistic speculations of this kind, it has had to contend against a determination to dissolve the central significance of the virgin birth, divinity, atoning death, and bodily resurrection of Christ. Since revelation was equated necessarily with a universal manifestation, every historical event was regarded simply as one of many reflections (in lower or higher degree) of this general principle, while an absolute revelation in some particular strand or at some particular point of history was arbitrarily excluded.

Modern evolutionary theory, on the other hand, has attached new importance to the historical process. But this concern for history also has generally been pursued on presuppositions hostile to the biblical view. The tendency to exalt evolution itself into an ultimate principle of explanation works against the recognition of a fixed center or climax of history in the past. While history may be approached with sentimental notions of hidden divinity, and major turning points in the long sweep of events singled out as providential, the sacred redemptive history of the past is leveled to the plateau of other elements in history, and history as a whole is no longer understood in relation to the unique revelation of God in Christ as its center.

In fact, the tendency to view reason itself only as a late emergent in the evolutionary process suppresses the biblical declaration that reality itself has its ultimate explanation in the Logos (John 1:3), and in effect contravenes the doctrine of rational divine revelation. The nature and significance of mind is one of the crucial problems of contemporary philosophy. The modern philosophical revolt against reason, anchored first in skeptical theories about the limitations of human knowledge of the spiritual world and then in evolutionary dogmas, has an obvious bearing upon the Christian contention that God communicates truths about himself and his purposes.

While Christianity, in contending for special revelation, is concerned with spiritual decision between Jesus Christ and false gods, and not merely with an acceptance of certain revealed truths, the Christian movement does not on that account demean the importance of divinely revealed doctrines. Christian experience involves both assensus (assent to revealed doctrines) and fiducia (personal trust in Christ). Moreover, saving trust is impossible without some authentic knowledge of God (Rom. 10:9; 1 Cor. 15:1-4; Heb. 11:6).

Since Schleiermacher's day, Protestant theology has been influenced repeatedly by anti-intellectualistic strands in modern philosophy, especially by such thinkers as Kant, James, and Dewey. Schleiermacher's formulas, that we know God only in relation to us and not as he is in himself, and that God communicates life and not doctrines, have been influential in encouraging an artificial disjunction in many Protestant expositions of special revelation. Although often striving to advance beyond these restrictions, more recent existential and dialectical expositions nonetheless do not consistently rise above the quicksands of a merely relational theology.

Revelation as Rational. Because of its implications for rational revelation, the traditional identification of the Bible as the written Word of God has been especially repugnant to contemporary neo-orthodox theology. It is contended that Jesus Christ alone should be identified as the Word of God, and that to speak of Scripture in this way demeans Christ. The evangelical Protestant, however, distinguishes carefully between the logos theou and the rhēma theou, that is, between the ontological Word incarnate and the epistemological word inscripturate. The motives for the neo-orthodox complaint are, in fact, speculative rather than spiritual. For the witness of Scripture, to which neo-orthodox dogmatists profess to appeal, is specially damaging to their case here. The OT prophets consistently speak of their words as the words of God, using the formula "This is what the LORD says" with untiring regularity. The NT apostles, moreover, speak of divine revelation in the form of definite ideas and words (cf. 1 Thess. 2:13, where Paul commends the Thessalonians: "When you received the word of God, which you heard from us, you accepted it not as the word of men, but as . . . the word of God"; cf. also Rom. 3:2, where Paul characterizes the OT as "the very words of God"). The disciples also spoke of Scripture as divine revelation and, in fact, had the sacred example and authority of Jesus Christ for so doing. Jesus identified his own words with the word of the Father (John 14:24) and spoke of Scripture as the word of God (John 10:35). The Bible nowhere protests against the identification of Scripture with revelation, but rather supports and approves this identification. The neo-orthodox tendency to look upon Scripture as simply witness to revelation, in fact, contravenes the historic Christian view that the Bible itself is a form of revelation specially provided for sinful humanity as an authentic disclosure of the nature and will of God.

From all this it is clear how significant is the Christian assertion that the laws of logic and morality belong to the imago Dei in humankind. Christian theology has always been under biblical compulsion to affirm the identity of the Logos in relation to the Godhead and to find a connection between God as rational and moral and the form and content of the divine image in humanity. That Jesus Christ is himself the truth; that humanity bears the divine image on the basis of creation and that this image, while distorted by sin, is not destroyed; that the Holy Bible is a rational revelation of the nature of God and his will for fallen humanity; that the Holy Spirit uses truth as a means of conviction and conversion—all these facts indicate in some measure the undeniable premium assigned to rationality by the Christian religion. Yet human reason is not viewed as a source of truth; rather, one is to think God's thoughts after him. Revelation is the source of truth, and reason, as illuminated by the Spirit, is the instrument for comprehending it.

Contemporary theology is marked by its reaffirmation of the priority of revelation to reason. In this respect it is distinguished from the liberal Protestant dogmatics of the nineteenth century, which tended to view human reason as a self-sufficient and independent criterion. Some neo-Thomistic studies today restate the philosophy even of Thomas Aquinas so as to set the usual summary of his approach, "I understand in order to believe," in a context of faith. The Thomistic hostility to innate ideas, and the Thomistic support for knowledge of God by the way of negation and the way of analogy are, however, firmly reasserted. Protestant theology, heavily influenced by Karl Barth and Emil Brunner, now characteristically reasserts the priority of revelation over reason. Thus, the epistemological formulas representative of Augustine ("I believe in order to understand") and of Tertullian ("I believe what is absurd," i.e., to the unregenerate man) are much in the climate of current theological dialogue. But the modern tendency to exaggerate the transcendence of God, by way of revolt against the classic liberal overstatement of divine immanence, subserves the Tertullian more than the Augustinian formula. The historic Christian confidence in a revealed world-and-life view takes its rise from a prior confidence in the reality of rational divine revelation. The modern tendency to veer toward a doctrine of revelation whose locus is to be found in an immediate existential response, rather than in an objectively conveyed Scripture, thwarts the theological interest in biblically revealed doctrines and principles from which an explanatory view of the whole of reality and life may be explicated. Thus, it is apparent that a recovery of confidence in the intelligible integration of the whole of life's experiences depends significantly upon a virile sense of the actuality of rational divine revelation.

C. F. H. HENRY

See also BIBLE, AUTHORITY OF; BIBLE, INSPIRATION OF; REVELATION, GENERAL.

Bibliography. J. Baillie, Idea of Revelation in Recent Thought; D. Bloesch, Holy Scripture; C. Brown, "Revelation" NIDNTT, 3:309–40; J. Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion; C. F. H. Henry, "Divine Revelation and the Bible," in Inspiration and Interpretation, ed. J. F. Walvoord; God, Revelation and Authority; C. F. H. Henry, ed., Revelation and the Bible; P. K. Jewett, Emil Brunner's Concept of Revelation; H. Kraemer, Religion and the Christian Faith; H. D. McDonald, Ideas of Revelation; Theories of Revelation; L. Morris, I Believe in Revelation; C. Pinnock, Biblical Revelation—The Foundation of Christian Theology; M. C. Tenney, ed., Bible—The

Revelation, Special

Living Word of Revelation; B. B. Warfield, Revelation and Inspiration.

Revenge. See VENGEANCE.

Revisionist Theology. Revisionist theology is a label introduced by David Tracy to identify the contemporary movement that continues nineteenth-century liberalism as corrected by left-wing neo-orthodoxy. Theology in this paradigm is a distinctly public and correlational enterprise; that is, it attempts to establish Christianity's meaningfulness according to contemporary criteria for intelligibility without neglecting Christianity's particularity. As the name implies, revisionists are convinced that to preserve the tradition Christianity must be reinterpreted so its claims continue as a present possibility. Key revisionists—Langdon Gilkey, Shubert Ogden, David Tracy, Peter Hodgson, Sally McFague, Rosemary Radford Ruether—are the leading theological figures in the North American academy.

Theological Method. Revisionist theology is a broad category that includes diverse theological visions. But despite their differences, they are methodologically united in upholding the following commitments.

Fundamental Theology. Continuing the Enlightenment's vision that claims about reality must be critically examined and warranted by a public rationality, revisionists believe that theology must defend its claims in relation to the contemporary world. Otherwise, God-talk would be dismissed as simply a blind submission to authority, demanding a sacrifice of the intellect. So fundamental theology strives to show that God-talk is credible and meaningful for the common person, and not simply mythological. Fundamental theology simply vindicates religion in general; this prolegomenon for systematic theology shows that the natural and human structures of reality allow claims for the transcendent and the experience of grace.

Revisionists pursue a variety of strategies to defend theology's subject-matter. Some identify what we call God as the source of a universal existential limit-experience (Tracy, Ogden), whereas others begin with oppressed groups and identify the source of emancipatory quests (Hodgson, Ruether) as the ground for the transcendent. This analysis is consequential for the subsequent analysis of religious texts. For instance, if religion is an "existential limit-experience," then revelation deals not with God's cognitive self-revelation and acts in history or other "supernatural flights of fancy" (Tracy). The texts themselves are not revealed; rather, the textual symbols mediate a revelatory limit-experience of confidence in the ultimate graciousness of reality. Moreover, it is claimed this existential experience is a possibility common to all, not simply available to the church. Fundamental theologies focused on praxis have parallel implications.

A Correlational Constructive Theology. In addition to establishing the credibility of God-talk, theology must present a distinctively Christian view for the contemporary world. The revisionist's method for systematics involves mutually critical correlations of two sources, the Christian tradition and the contemporary culture. Appropriating left-wing neo-orthodoxy's critique of liberalism, revisionists affirm that both the Christian tradition and contemporary experience must challenge and even correct the other. For theology to be Christian, it must be faithful to the Christian tradition; to be intelligible, theology must be meaningful for contemporary experience. So theology is a conversation, not a lecture.

However, their fundamental theology already foreshadows the mediation of these two sources. Since revelation is interpreted as a root existential experience mediated by the text, theological hermeneutics is not concerned as much with the text's semiotic system or even its historical situation, but with the way in which this tradition makes available a religious way of being-in-the-world. As a result, Christian symbols are reinterpreted anthropologically. Frequently fundamental theology has even decided what canonical segment or textual symbols are important. For instance, revisionist feminist theologians highlight Scripture's "prophetic" dimension, which expresses God's eschatological hope for justice and condemnation of oppression, even while acknowledging that its prophetic liberating vision "must be deepened and transformed to include what was not included: women" (Ruether).

The contemporary world is also decisive in this correlation. Following the liberal tradition, revisionists believe that the great advances in the contemporary world must be utilized in theology. Currently the critical theories in the social sciences, such as feminist theory and critiques regarding political ideology, represent the cutting edge, alongside the mainstays of historical-criticism, evolution, and the scientific worldview. The revisionist theologian appropriates these critical theories as a hermeneutic of suspicion to uncover illusion (patriarchy, ideology) in the biblical text.

Accepting the cultural relativity of religious language and symbols, revisionists reformulate the key Christian symbols to deepen and expand faith's vision for the contemporary world. As the term constructive theology implies, this project even includes suggesting new symbols (God as friend, mother, etc.) to overcome current idolatries and revitalize the Christian faith.

Theological Interpretation. While differing in their concrete proposals, revisionists share some broad doctrinal perspectives. Like the liberal tradition, they have abandoned the salvation-history scheme and the Scripture principle for a phenomenological-existential reflection on human existence. For instance, the symbols of creation and fall do not define the world's beginning or how Adam and Eve's fall brought humanity under bondage to sin and God's punishment, but rather how each human is originally related to God, and how in coming to exist we break this relation and its tragic consequences. Furthermore, the classic monarchical notion of God with absolute sovereignty, present even in Schleiermacher, is replaced by a God more related to temporal processes and conditioned by humanity. Correlatively, humans are conceived as free subjects who shape the future.

Continuing the liberal tradition, revisionists acknowledge the centrality of Jesus for the Christian tradition but attempt to understand him in terms of contemporary criteria for religious meaningfulness. As their fundamental theology reflects, revisionists are impassioned nonexclusivists in Christology, believing that the experience of grace is a universal human possibility. Consequently, for Tracy the confession of Jesus as Lord means living in the graciousness of ultimate reality as represented in Jesus' life of self-sacrificing righteousness. Or more provocatively, McFague argues that being a Christian does not entail "personally accepting certain dogmas derived from the work of a bygone savior," but "living now in the presence of God's love to bring about universal transformation and fulfillment."

Critique. The most incisive engagement with revisionist theology has come from postliberals, who carry on Karl Barth's anticorrelational kerygmatic tradition. First, postliberals question the revisionist's fundamental theology. Are there public grounds, agreed to by all in society, that demonstrate the credibility of the transcendent? Such a quest sounds suspiciously like foundationalism, an epistemological stance rejected by postmodern culture. Moreover, this quest is socially oppressive. For if one rejects the universality of grace, is that person no longer "rational" and excluded from the conversation? Furthermore, since religions are particular cultural-linguistic systems, fundamental theology is too abstract to convince a believer that this analysis grounds his or her faith.

Second, postliberals question the revisionist's method of correlation. This method subordinates the particular Christian story to the lens of fundamental theology and thus inevitably distorts revelation while accommodating it to the changing tides of culture. Furthermore, the contemporary interpreter assumes a privileged position by using critical theory to excise and undo illusion in the text. Isn't this quest for a distortion-free platform suspiciously foundationalist?

Third, revisionist theology is not faithful to Scripture. As Hans Frei and Bruce Marshall have argued, the revisionist's mediating strategy sacrifices the biblical portrayal of the Redeemer as the unsubstitutable individual, Jesus Christ. In the revisionist's scheme, Jesus becomes the highest exemplification of a human religious possibility, not the unique and indispensable Savior.

Evangelicals continue this critique by noting the radical changes when phenomenological-existential reflection displaces the meaning of the biblical narrative. This scheme loses a personal and holy God who is active in history, this cosmos as God's ex nihilo creation, sin as guilt and rebellion against God, and salvation as the supernatural reality established by Jesus Christ. Furthermore, the revisionist's denial of Scripture's authority means that Jesus Christ is no longer the source of all wisdom and truth (Col. 2:3).

Nevertheless, revisionists continue the erudite and illuminating work of the great post-Enlightenment theologians, such as Paul Tillich and Karl Rahner, and will remain a fixture on the theological scene.

T. R. PHILLIPS

See also GILKEY, LANGDON BROWN; MCFAGUE, SALLIE; RUETHER, ROSEMARY RADFORD; TRACY, DAVID.

Bibliography. P. Hodgson and R. King, eds., Christian Theology: An Introduction to Its Traditions and Tasks; Winds of the Spirit: A Constructive Christian Theology; G. Langdon, Message and Existence: An Introduction to Christian Theology; Naming the Whirlwind: The Renewal of God-Language; S. McFague, Models of God: Theology for an Ecological, Nuclear Age; R. R. Ruether, Sexism and God-Talk: Toward a Feminist Theology; D. Tracy, Analogical Imagination: Christian Theology and the Culture of Pluralism; Blessed Rage for Order: The New Pluralism in Theology.

Revival, Spiritual. The classic understanding is that of a period of unusual and heightened spiritual activity in a section of the church, brought about by a renewing and empowering work of the Holy Spirit, bringing a new sense of the presence of God, especially in his holiness, resulting in a deeper awareness of sin in the lives of believers, followed by new joy as sin is confessed and forgiven. This is then followed by witness to others, both nominal Christians and outsiders, bringing them to a similar experience of confession, repentance, and faith. In the words of Jonathan Edwards (1703–58), the classic theologian of revival, "A revival of religion [is] a blessed outpouring of the Spirit of God, in awakening and converting sinners, and in enlightening, quickening and building up saints in faith, holiness and comfort."

These periods occur from time to time in the history of the church and cannot be predicted or produced. However, when they do occur, it is often noted that believers have already been praying for such a work, and indeed such praying, which is often corporate, intense, and protracted, may be seen as the first result of a new work of the Holy Spirit. As Solomon Stoddard (1643–1729), Edwards’s grandfather, who experienced several periods of revival in his church in Northampton, Massachusetts, where his grandson joined him as copastor in 1726, put it, “When religion is revived saints are quickened; sinners are converted; many that are not converted become more religious. This reviving is sometimes of longer, sometimes of shorter duration. God is very arbitrary in this matter. The People of God are waiting and praying for this mercy. But God will take his own time for this mercy.” In periods of revival, especially when they begin, the intensity of spiritual conviction and of the joy that follows often produces physical and emotional effects, such as weeping, shaking, falling to the ground, laughter, jumping with joy. When these are prominent, they are soon imitated either by those who want to be accepted as genuine subjects of the work, or possibly through satanic activity.

Revival, Spiritual

In the history of the church, revivals have often motivated and energized the church to new initiatives in evangelism, social concern, and missionary work. This classical understanding of revival was significantly altered by the work of Charles Finney (1792–1875), who proposed a new definition of revival and claimed that by the use of certain means, or “new measures,” revival could be produced. According to Finney, “a revival consists in the return of the Church from her backslidings, and in the conversion of sinners. . . . A revival is not a miracle, nor dependent on a miracle, in any sense. It is purely philosophical result of the right use of the constituted means—as much so as any other effect produced by the application of means. In the Bible, the Word of God is compared to grain, and preaching is compared to sowing the seed, and the results to the springing up and growth of the crop. A revival is as naturally a result of the use of the appropriate means as a crop is of the use of its appropriate means.” The means were the controversial “new measures” Finney used in his meetings.

Finney was an itinerant evangelist (not the first by any means), and since his day, especially in the United States, “revivals” have been synonymous with evangelistic campaigns or meetings for spiritual renewal. “Revivalism” is a word that, even in scholarly writings, is used to cover both the classical kinds of revival and the practice and techniques of mass evangelism. In the United States, the word awakening is often used for a revival in the classical sense; the “Great Awakening” is the American equivalent of the “Evangelical Revival” in the United Kingdom. However,

J. Edwin Orr (1912–87), who in the twentieth century was responsible more than any other church historian for putting the study of revivals on a scholarly basis, preferred to use the word revival for the results of the sovereign work of the Holy Spirit on a group of Christians, and awakening for the effects on non-Christians in conviction and conversion.

In the history of the church, revivals have occurred in every era, including the early and medieval periods. They have possibly also taken place in all sections of the church, including the Roman Catholic and Orthodox churches. They have occurred most frequently, however, in the Protestant churches, and here they have been the subject of most study. J. Edwin Orr suggested that at least four major revivals have taken place in Protestantism over the past three hundred years, the first Great Awakening or Evangelical Revival beginning around 1725 and continuing in various places into the 1770s, the Second Great Awakening starting around 1790 and continuing with declines and resurgences until the mid-1840s, the Mid-Century Prayer Revival commencing in 1858 and finishing in the late 1880s, and the Worldwide Revival of 1900 to 1910. He also believed that a number of small-scale revivals in which he participated personally from 1948 onward were the possible beginning of a new worldwide awakening. As we shall see later, more disagreement exists over various movements in the last half century than over the major renewal movements of the past.

Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries. Disagreement also exists over whether the Protestant Reformation of the sixteenth century and the Puritan and pietist movements of the seventeenth century should be classified as revivals. In the case of the Protestant Reformation, although various political and other factors were involved, it does seem that it, together with earlier reform initiatives, was the result of a genuine work of the Holy Spirit bringing a renewal of spiritual life to thousands across Europe. In addition to the whole movement, there were also instances of more specific revival phenomena in a number of places.

Similarly in the next century, Puritanism in Britain and the American colonies, and pietism in Germany and the Netherlands (where it was known as the Second Reformation) were movements of genuine spiritual renewal. German pietism, especially with its mature developments under August Hermann Francke at Halle, was a profoundly spiritual movement that had widespread influence in Europe, North America, and in the beginnings of mission work in India. In Britain, in addition to the widespread effects of the Puritan movement on the spiritual life of the whole nation, there were a number of instances of more dramatic outbreaks of revival with profound conviction of sin, accompanied in some cases by physical phenomena such as falling to the ground. The ministry of Richard Baxter (1615–91) in Kidderminster in central England resulted in nearly the whole town professing faith and conversion.

The Great Awakening of the Eighteenth Century. The first half of the eighteenth century witnessed a number of profound spiritual movements that touched central and western Europe, Great Britain, and North America, in fact, every area where Protestantism had spread. In central Europe a number of local revivals developed, often with influence from Halle (a revival actually occurred among Swedish prisoners of war in Siberia as a result of chaplains and literature being sent from Halle), but not always so, as, for example, the conversion and eventual exodus of thousands of Protestants from Salzburg following a spontaneous spiritual revival in a prominent center of Roman Catholicism. At Herrnhut in Saxony in 1727 a group of refugees from Moravia, the remnants of the Unity of Brethren who had been hounded and persecuted in the Habsburg lands by the Jesuits for a hundred years and who had been given refuge by pietist nobleman Count Nikolaus von Zinzendorf, experienced a spiritual renewal that in a short time resulted in pairs of preachers going out to all parts of Europe to share their experience. Within five years the first of hundreds of missionaries went out to many countries where the gospel had not been preached.

In Britain there were stirrings of revival in Wales as early as 1710, but the 1730s saw a movement that spread rapidly in all four countries: Wales (through Griffith Jones, Daniel Rowland, and Howell Harris), England (through George Whitefield, and John and Charles Wesley, who used the network of Religious Societies established in Anglicanism through German pietist influence, and who established their own network of Methodist societies, which eventually came under the control of John Wesley and propagated his Arminian and perfectionist theology), Scotland, especially at Cambuslang and Kilsyth near Glasgow, and Ireland, in Dublin, Cork, and other places. The movement continued, with periodic resurgences for the next several decades.

The American colonies saw the first stirrings of awakening in 1725 in the ministry of Dutch Reformed pastor Theodore Frelinghuysen in New Jersey. These were followed by an outbreak of revival in thirty towns in the Connecticut River valley in 1734 and 1735 (Jonathan Edwards's church in Northampton was one of the centers) as well as in some places in New Jersey and New York. In 1741 George Whitefield, on his second visit to America, preached in Boston and many other towns and villages in New England, as well as in the Middle Colonies and the South, and the results in each place were dramatic. There was widespread recognition that, not only in Whitefield's ministry but in multitudes of other places and through many other preachers, including Jonathan Edwards, a "great and general awakening" was underway. The general awakening in New England and the Middle Colonies did not continue beyond the 1740s, although sporadic and local revivals did occur. In Virginia, however, an increasing number of revival movements were sparked, in which first Presbyterian, then Baptist, and later Methodist preachers were actively involved. The American Revolutionary War put a brake on the awakening in many places, but not in Virginia, and here the Second Great Awakening, at least in its American phase, began.

The Second Great Awakening. In 1787 Methodists and Baptists in Virginia experienced significant revival impulses, and the same was true in two Presbyterian colleges in the state, Hampton-Sydney and Washington College, from where the revival spread to much of the state, "which marked the final triumph of evangelical Christianity in Virginia" (W. M. Gewehr, Great Awakening in Virginia, 1740–1790).

In Britain, the republication of Jonathan Edwards's Humble Attempt to Promote Explicit Agreement . . . in Extraordinary Prayer for the Revival of Religion in 1789 marked the growth of an interdenominational and international movement of prayer that resulted in widespread awakening and revival, and also the beginnings of the modern Protestant missionary movement together with many societies for social reform, especially in Britain and the United States. The revival was widespread throughout the United States and Canada, in the British Isles, and in continental Europe, especially Norway, Finland, Switzerland, France, the Netherlands, and Germany. In the United States the awakenings in Kentucky and the frontier areas were characterized by extremes of behavior, especially in the camp meetings, where thousands from remote and lonely situations came together for extended preaching services that often lasted for days on end. On the Eastern Seaboard the revivals were largely free of such excesses.

A new resurgence followed the end of the Napoleonic Wars (1803–15) and also took hold in the 1830s. New missionary ventures were undertaken, especially in the South Seas and Southeast Asia. Many new initiatives for social reform were made in the United States and Britain. And an increasing number of itinerant evangelists like Charles Finney preached the gospel.

The Midcentury Prayer Revival (1858–1880s). A new movement of spiritual renewal began in 1858 with a prayer meeting for businessmen in New York, which soon spread like wildfire, producing dozens or even hundreds of similar noontime prayer meetings across the nation. News of what was happening spread first to Northern Ireland, producing similar responses, and from there to the rest of the United Kingdom, Continental Europe, and then to many parts of the Protestant world. New power in preaching followed, and large numbers were added to the churches; in the United States in a two-year period more than a million people joined various churches. The American Civil War failed to stop the awakening. In fact, there were large-scale revivals in both the Union and Confederate armies. An increasing number of itinerant evangelists, such as D. L. Moody, Walter and Phoebe Palmer, and William and Catherine Booth, grew out of the revival. In Europe the English nobleman Lord Radstock traveled extensively; in St. Petersburg there was an awakening among the Russian royal family and other nobility. In general, laypeople were prominent in the midcentury revival, in organizing the prayer meetings, which were a characteristic feature, as well as in itinerant preaching and in the various movements that developed from the revival, such as the YMCA, YWCA, The Salvation Army, Keswick Movement, Sunday School movement, Christian unions in universities, and foreign missions. Students were at the forefront in a number of these organizations.

Revival, Spiritual

A new resurgence in the 1880s led, among other things, to an increasing work among students, as well as even greater activity in overseas missionary work.

The Worldwide Revival of 1900–1910. The first decade of the twentieth century witnessed revivals in many areas throughout the world: in Asia (Japan, Korean, China, India), Africa (Southern Africa, Madagascar, West Africa, Uganda), Australia and the South Seas, Latin America and the Caribbean, as well as in various parts of Britain, Europe, and North America. The Welsh Revival (1904–5) and the beginnings of Pentecostalism in Los Angeles (1906) were only two among many revivals that happened worldwide, some of them produced by news of these events and replicating them in the various phenomena but others completely independent of either and in some cases preceding them in time.

Between the Two World Wars. In the period between the two great world conflicts of this century, many local awakenings occurred, but no worldwide revival. College revivals took place in North America, as well as significant awakenings in Scandinavia and in Central and Eastern Europe right up to the outbreak of World War II. One of the most widespread and long-lasting was the East African Revival, affecting Rwanda, Uganda, Burundi, Kenya, and Tanganyika, which began in Gahini, Rwanda, in 1934.

The Last Fifty Years. Since the end of World War II, there have been local revivals and awakenings in many places: college revivals in the United States, even as recently as 1995, revivals in the Scottish Hebrides, in Ukraine and Siberia, and in Nepal. In the 1960s California experienced an awakening among the Jesus People, and the United States also saw the birth of the charismatic movement. Controversy surrounds the “Toronto Blessing” radiating from the Toronto Airport Vineyard Fellowship, with its unusual physical accompaniments, such as uncontrolled laughing or weeping, and the longstanding revival in Brownsville, Florida, but good has also come from these unusual manifestations of God’s work.

R. E. DAVIES

See also CHARISMATIC MOVEMENT; GREAT AWAKENINGS; RENEWAL; REVIVALISM.

Bibliography. T. Beougher and L. Dorsett, eds., Accounts of a Campus Revival—Wheaton College 1995; E. L. Blumhofer and R. Balmer, Modern Christian Revivals; R. E. Davies, I Will Pour Out My Spirit; D. E. Harrell Jr., All Things Are Possible: The Healing and Charismatic Revivals in Modern America; R. Lovelace, Dynamics of Spiritual Life; J. E. Orr, Eager Feet: Evangelical Awakenings, 1790–1830; Fervent Prayer: The Worldwide Impact of the Great Awakening of 1858; Flaming Tongue: Evangelical Awakenings, 1900; J. I. Packer, Keeping in Step with the Spirit.

Revivalism. A movement within the Christian tradition that emphasizes the appeal of religion to the emotional and affectional nature of individuals as well as to their intellectual and rational nature. It believes that vital Christianity begins with a response of the whole being to the gospel’s call for repentance and spiritual rebirth by faith in Jesus Christ. This experience results in a personal relationship with God.

Some have sought to make revivalism a purely American and even a predominantly frontier phenomenon. Revivalism, however, can be seen as a much broader Christian tradition. Recent studies have discovered a revivalist tradition in the Roman Catholic Church.

The Reformation Roots. Modern revival movements have their historical roots in Puritan-pietistic reactions to the rationalism of the Enlightenment and the formalized creedal expression of Reformation faith that characterized much of seventeenth-century Protestantism. Lutherans such as Johann Arndt, Philipp Spener, and August Francke resisted this depersonalization of religion. They discovered a more experiential element in Reformation faith that emphasized personal commitment and obedience to Christ and a life regenerated by the indwelling Holy Spirit. They also emphasized witness and missions as primary responsibilities of the individual Christian and the church. Subjective religious experience and the importance of the individual became a new force in renewing and expanding the church. These concerns gradually permeated much of Protestantism, especially the developing churches in America.

The Eighteenth-Century Birth. The appeal for a personal, public response to the gospel that came to characterize revivalism sprang up almost simultaneously in both England and America in the eighteenth century. The initial signs of the First Great Awakening in the American colonies occurred in the congregation of the Dutch Reformed pastor Theodore J. Frelinghuysen in northern New Jersey in 1725, a decade before John Wesley and George Whitefield began their field preaching in England. Frelinghuysen had come under the influence of pietism before coming to America. In 1726 William Tennent, the Presbyterian leader of the Great Awakening, started his “log college” to prepare ministers who would preach a personalized Calvinism that called men and women to repentance.

By the time George Whitefield began recurrent revivalistic tours of the American colonies in 1738, Jonathan Edwards, the theologian of the colonial awakening, had already experienced revival in his Northampton, Massachusetts, Congregational church. Edwards accepted the validity of much of the religious emotion that accompanied the conversions among his parishioners and wrote in defense of the proper role of emotion in true religion. The revival continued to move south until it touched all the colonies. In England the recognized leader of the “Evangelical Revival” was John Wesley, founder of Methodism and close friend of Whitefield. Whitefield had encouraged Wesley to take up the field preaching that brought the gospel directly to the masses of working people.

The success of his appeal to the heart as well as the head could not be doubted. Religious interest was renewed, and people flocked to the churches in significant numbers in both America and England. American historians recognize that the sweep of religious fervor from north to south (prior to the Revolution) was one of the few unifying factors among the otherwise disparate American colonies. In England the revival left an indelible religious and social impact for stability in the midst of the revolutionary unrest that pervaded most of Europe at the time.

The Definitive Stage. The pre-Revolutionary revivals demonstrated the general patterns that characterized all subsequent awakenings; however, it was the Second Great Awakening at the beginning of the nineteenth century that defined the theology and method of the tradition. The revival began at Hampden-Sidney and Washington colleges in Virginia in 1787. It continued at Yale under Timothy Dwight and at Andover and Princeton at the end of the eighteenth century. It was popularized in the great camp meetings on the frontier. The Cane Ridge, Kentucky, camp meeting in August 1801 became the most famous of all. The strange emotional phenomena that had shown themselves in the earlier colonial revival reappeared in intensified form. Many of the twenty thousand worshipers present experienced falling, jerking, rolling, and dancing. These demonstrations moderated as the revival continued, but physical phenomena have always existed in some measure in popular revival movements.

Camp Meetings and Revivalism. The Presbyterians who organized these first camp meetings soon abandoned their use. The Methodists and Baptists, however, continued to use them. The ambience of the natural setting in which the camps were held, the release from the ordinary routines of home and church, the freedom to worship together in a less sectarian context, the family reunion, community-center flavor—all contributed to a mystique that made the camp meeting a continuing factor in future revivalism. The frontier camp meetings declined by the time of the Civil War, but the Holiness revival that began to flourish after the Civil War utilized them extensively in both rural and urban settings. Camp meetings became the religious centers that shaped the theology and ethos of the numerous Holiness churches organized at the end of the century. Although many camp meetings evolved from their original revivalistic commitments into Chautauquas, or Christian family resort centers, in Holiness and Pentecostal churches the camp meeting remains an essential expression of their revivalistic worship. Even there, however, the camp meeting has become more of a church family rally or reunion than a time for evangelistic outreach to the unchurched.

Charles Grandison Finney. The outstanding figure in early nineteenth-century revivalism was Charles Grandison Finney. Finney took the revival ethos of the frontier camp meeting to the urban centers of the Northeast. His success there and his widespread influence as a professor and later president of Oberlin College gave him a platform for propagating a theology and defense of the revival methods he espoused. In his Revival Lectures Finney contended that God had clearly revealed the laws of revival in Scripture. Whenever the church obeyed those laws, spiritual renewal resulted. In the minds of many Calvinists this emphasis on human ability greatly modified the traditional concept of the sovereign movement of God in reviving the church. However, the importance Finney attached to the necessity for prayer and the agency of the Holy Spirit in his revival theory and practice helped to mute such concerns.

Finney’s “new methods” raised as much controversy as his attachment to New School Calvinism. Preaching was direct, addressed to the individual, and usually delivered without manuscript or even notes. The public nature of the conversion experience was focused by the introduction of the “anxious bench,” by which the serious seeker placed his intentions on record before the congregation. The critics were especially wary of the public platform given to the laity and especially women as they prayed and testified in the revival services. After the dramatic Fulton Street, or Layman’s Revival, of 1858, however, most of the critics were silenced, and revitalized Calvinism joined with the revitalized Arminianism of burgeoning American Methodism to set the predominant pattern of American Protestantism for the remainder of the century.

Revivalism

Perfectionist Revivalism. A significant new development in revivalism between 1835 and 1875 was the rise of perfectionist revivalism. Finney introduced a perfectionist note into his evangelism after his move to Oberlin College in 1835. He and his colleague Asa Mahan, president of Oberlin, joined perfectionist leaders in Methodism, such as lay leaders Walter and Phoebe Palmer, in a new Holiness revivalism in the churches. The movement used revivalistic methods to call Christians to a second crisis of faith and total commitment subsequent to conversion, commonly called among American Calvinists a “second conversion,” a “rest of faith,” or the “deeper” or “higher life”; to Methodists it was “entire sanctification,” “perfection in love,” or “the second blessing.” Both Calvinist and Methodist wings of the revival ultimately gave prominence to a personal “fullness” or “baptism” of the Holy Spirit in speaking of the experience. The creation of the National Camp Meeting Association for the Promotion of Holiness by John Inskip and other Methodist ministers in 1867 spread the movement beyond Methodism around the world. In England the Holiness revival gave rise to The Salvation Army and the Keswick Movement.

Institutionalization and Decline. Dwight L. Moody dominated the revival movement from 1875 until his death in 1899. Although most of the revivalism of the time was carried on in the local churches and camp meetings of the rapidly growing Baptist and Methodist denominations, Moody’s leadership was the stimulus that encouraged the continued use of revivalistic methods in churches not as strongly committed to them. His mass evangelistic campaigns drew vast audiences in Britain and the United States and set the patterns for a more professional revivalism that demanded extensive organization and substantial budgets. Ira Sankey, his musical director, became the best known of the many gospel musicians who formed an essential part of the revivalistic teams that sprang up everywhere in this period. Moody also sponsored educational institutions that furthered his evangelistic aims: the Northfield Institutions in Massachusetts and Moody Bible Institute in Chicago. These institutions were representative of the large number of organizations and movements that sprang out of the many revival movements that looked to Moody for inspiration and leadership at the end of the nineteenth century. Many of these became important components of the growing fundamentalist movement.

Large audiences continued to attend the revival campaigns of William “Billy” Sunday, R. A. Torrey, Gypsy Smith, and others after the turn of the century. However, the change of national mood resulting from the economic upheavals that followed World War I, the persistent attacks of such social critics as H. L. Mencken, and the turn toward a gospel of social concern among the larger denominations led to a decline in the influence of revivalism in the churches and in American life. Nevertheless, the Pentecostal revival that spread swiftly from its center in Los Angeles after 1906 and the effective use of radio by Charles Fuller and other radio evangelists indicated the continuing strength of the revivalist tradition in the churches.

The Modern Period. The rise of Billy Graham in the 1950s and his subsequent recognition as one of the most influential religious leaders of the post-World War II period signaled the latent residual strength of revivalism in the Christian churches. Graham’s success in working with a broad spectrum of Protestant churches as well as significant segments of Catholicism reiterated the fact that revivalism is not a sporadic phenomenon in the Christian tradition but rather a steady force that breaks into public prominence whenever churches and society tend to ignore its concerns for experiential religion. Billy Graham emphasized again both the method and theology of the tradition. He played down some of the more strident emotional and psychological aspects of the method; he retained, however, the direct, forceful sermon appeal; the biblically oriented message; the call for personal, public response; the use of gospel music; and the format of large mass meetings.

Graham’s ministry represented a general revival of religion, as indicated by the rapid growth of evangelical churches and spread of the charismatic revival in the decades following World War II. The charismatic emphases on the baptism and the gifts of the Spirit—especially glossolalia—have had significant influence upon both Protestant and Catholic churches. The exposure of revivalism with its message and method to the public through television and the dominant role revivalists currently hold in religious broadcasting are additional signs of the contemporary revitalization of the tradition.

The Theology of Revivalism. The intimate historical relationship between the growth of evangelicalism and revivalism indicates many common theological presuppositions. Evangelicalism’s commitment to the reliability and authority of Scripture is the basis for revivalism’s direct preaching and appeal; the former's belief in the universal need for spiritual rebirth is the basis for the latter's direct call for repentance and faith in Christ. The evangelical's acceptance of Christ's final commission to his disciples as a mandate for personal witness and world mission reinforces the urgency that characterizes revival movements.

Revivals of religion and the theological presuppositions and practices that have accompanied them through their history have consistently raised a common pattern of criticism. The strongly emotional nature of the revivalist's appeal, the critics charge, leads to spiritual instability or even to irrational behavior. They also claim that the revivalist's emphasis on crisis experience tends to deprecate the place of growth and process in Christian living. Opponents also charge that the importance revivalism attaches to a warmhearted, spiritual ministry results in a general anti-intellectualism throughout the tradition; they claim as well that the strong appeal to individualized religion leads to a subjectivism that obscures or even denies the social and cultural implications of Christianity. The direct praying and preaching, the tendency to popularize and excite interest by use of promotional psychology, and inclination to judgmentalism and separatism are also common accusations brought against revivalists.

The major response of revival proponents has been to point to the positive results they claim for religious revival and revivalism in church and society since the beginning of the movements in the eighteenth century. The dramatic growth of the churches resulting from special periods of religious revival and the day-to-day revival emphasis in revivalistic churches is part of the historical record. Significant moral, social, and cultural changes have accompanied the major awakenings. The ecumenical spirit of revival efforts has often produced a level of cooperation among churches not achieved in any other way. Expanded Christian benevolence and church extension have always accompanied these periods of spiritual renewal. Religious institutions and organizations to promote Christian causes and social concerns, including most of America's Christian colleges, seminaries, Bible institutes, and many mission bodies, are products of revivalism.

M. E. DIETER

See also EDWARDS, JONATHAN; FINNEY, CHARLES GRANDISON; GREAT AWAKENINGS; PIETISM; WESLEY, JOHN; WHITEFIELD, GEORGE.

Bibliography. E. L. Blumhofer and R. Balmer, eds., Modern Christian Revivals; R. Carwardine, Transatlantic Revivalism; D. W. Dayton, Discovering an Evangelical Heritage; M. E. Dieter, Holiness Revival of the Nineteenth Century; J. P. Dolan, Catholic Revivalism; J. Edwards, Faithful Narrative of the Surprising Work of God; J. F. Findlay, Dwight L. Moody: American Evangelist

1837–1899; C. G. Finney, Lectures on Revivals of Religion; E. S. Gaustad, Great Awakening in New England; C. E. Hambrink-Stowe, Charles G. Finney and the Spirit of American Evangelism; C. A. Johnson, Frontier Camp Meeting; W. G. McLaughlin Jr., Modern Revivalism: Charles Grandison Finney to Billy Graham; T. L. Smith, Revivalism and Social Reform in Mid-Nineteenth Century America; H. S. Stout, Divine Dramatist: George Whitefield and the Rise of Modern Evangelicalism; W. W. Sweet, Revivalism in America.

Reward. If all of its related forms are included, the word reward is found seventy-six times in the New International Version. Four Greek and several Hebrew words are rendered by this one word.

In present-day usage a reward is a gift given in recognition for some service rendered, either good or evil. Its biblical usage, however, is quite varied, including such ideas as a bribe (Prov. 18:16), punishment (Ps. 91:8), and gift (1 Kings 13:7). It includes, therefore, the punishment one experiences in this life for evil deeds (Matt. 6:5) as well as future retribution (Ps. 91:8). Several times the word is used of evil done to a person where good was expected (Gen. 44:4; Ps. 35:12).

Christ often used rewards as an incentive for service. This has been a disturbing thought to some. One need not be troubled by this if one understands the scriptural nature of rewards and dismisses any thought of materialism. Rewards are the result of human effort, to be sure, but as Weiss says, "As the servants of God in the Israelitish theocracy were entitled, by reason of their covenant relationship, to look for the fulfillment of the promise as a reward for their fulfillment of their covenant obligations, so the disciple of Jesus is entitled to look for the completion of salvation as a reward for the fulfillment of the demands which are made upon him in virtue of his being a disciple" (B. Weiss, Biblical Theology of the New Testament 1:144).

For the Christian, rewards have an eschatological significance. Paul teaches that every person shall appear before the judgment seat of Christ for the judgment of his or her works (Rom. 14:12; 2 Cor. 5:10). This must be kept distinct in our thinking from judgment for sin, for this, as far as the believer is concerned, is forever past (Rom. 5:1). Salvation is a gift (Eph. 2:8–9) whereas rewards are earned (1 Cor. 3:14). The two chief passages of Scripture that discuss rewards at length are 1 Corinthians 3:9–15 and 9:16–27. Additional information can be found by studying the various passages where rewards for service are depicted as crowns (1 Cor. 9:25; Phil. 4:1; 1 Thess. 2:19; 2 Tim. 4:8; James 1:12; 1 Pet. 5:4; Rev. 2:10; 3:11).

Various types of service merit rewards, such as enduring temptation (James 1:12), diligently seeking God (Heb. 11:6), dying for Christ (Rev.

Reward

2:10), faithfully performing pastoral duties (1 Pet. 5:4), doing God's will and loving his appearing (2 Tim. 4:8), soul winning (1 Thess. 2:19–20), proving faithful in stewardship (1 Cor. 4:1–5), serving by acts of kindness (Gal. 6:10), and sharing hospitality (Matt. 10:40–42). Rewards can be lost (2 John 8; Rev. 2:10). It is also possible to be busy in the Lord's service and receive no rewards at all (1 Cor. 3:15; 9:27) or to receive little when one should receive much (2 John 8).

H. Z. CLEVELAND

See also CROWN.

Bibliography. P. C. Böttger et al., NIDNTT 3:134–45; L. S. Chafer, Systematic Theology; K. E. Kirk, Vision of God; H. Preisker and E. Würthwein, TDNT 4:695–728; D. Walker in HDAC.

Richardson, Alan (1905–1975). Anglican theologian and biblical scholar. Richardson was ordained in 1928 and later became canon residentiary of Durham in 1943. Before becoming dean of York in 1964, he was professor of Christian Theology for eleven years at the University of Nottingham. He was a central figure in the biblical theology movement in Britain and played a prominent role in the ecumenical movement before and after the formation of the World Council of Churches in 1948. A prolific writer, his range of scholarship extended from the history of ideas and the philosophy of history to biblical studies, contemporary theology, and apologetics. Two of his earliest works, Miracle Stories of the Gospels (1941) and Christian Apologetics (1947), broke with traditional apologetics by arguing that miracles were part of the revelation of Christ and were to be understood as prophetic signs, not as external, objective proofs that guarantee the truth of revelation. Moreover, in these and later works he challenged the positivist assumptions of his day expressed in the form-critical approach by demonstrating that a wholehearted acceptance of modern critical methods was entirely compatible with a “confident allegiance to the un-reduced faith of the Catholic Creeds.” In his effort to unite the Christ of faith with the Jesus of history, Richardson also helped bolster the cause of evangelical theology. His Bampton Lectures for 1962, History Sacred and Profane (1964), perhaps the most important British work on the subject of history and Christian faith at the time, represent his most mature expression of this aspect of his work. Other influential works include Introduction to the Theology of the New Testament (1958) and Theological Word Book of the Bible (1950).

C. MITCHELL

Bibliography. R. J. Blaikie, Secular Christianity and the God Who Acts; J. J. Navone, History and Faith in the Thought of Alan Richardson; R. H. Preston, ed., Theology and Change: Essays in Memory of Alan Richardson.

Riches. See WEALTH, CHRISTIAN VIEW OF.

Ricoeur, Paul (b. 1913). French philosopher whose influence on both sides of the Atlantic has been achieved under the aegis of university appointments at Strasbourg, the Sorbonne, Nanterre, Louvain, Toronto, and Chicago (where he was successor to Paul Tillich), and through numerous publications with broad interdisciplinary appeal. Raised in the Calvinist Huguenot tradition, his university education in France was informed by the prevailing amalgam of existentialism and phenomenology. Within a few months after the French declaration of war on Germany in 1939, he was captured and sent to a German prison camp where he remained until January 1945. There he turned his resourcefulness to the intensive study of Edmund Husserl and Karl Jaspers, a move that would influence the trajectory of his professional career.

Ricoeur is noted for attempting to work out a moderate poststructuralist hermeneutic that acknowledges the indeterminacy of meaning in texts without succumbing to such extremism, for example, as the more negative and radical deconstructionism promulgated by Jacques Derrida. As inaugurated in his seminal work Freud and Philosophy (1965) and developed in subsequent publications (such as the essays collected in Conflict of Interpretations [1969]), this hermeneutic emphasizes the dialectical interplay of two tendencies that condition the understanding of texts: the recovery of meaning and demystification. Demystification results from practicing a “hermeneutics of suspicion,” in which readers attend critically to their own assumptions and background beliefs as these influence their understanding—and especially those that preclude a sympathetic reading of the text.

Corresponding to this dialectic is the reciprocity of relation between “the world projected by the text” and “the life-world of the reader,” at the intersection of which lies the meaning of a literary work. This meaning, in turn, represents a re-description of the world for the reader. The meaning thus distilled is not a capturing of the author's intended meaning or of the understanding of the original audience; still less is it a reflection of objective reality. It is rather a world possibility in terms of which readers may make (always provisional) sense of their own existence. This feature of Ricoeur's brand of poststructuralism illustrates his general tendency to seek to mediate between opposing forces in the realm of ideas and theory, and it accounts for much of the popularity that Ricoeur's work has enjoyed.

Religious texts and ideas have always been a foil for Ricoeur's philosophical reflections. He delivered the Gifford Lectures in 1986. Much reader-response theory in biblical hermeneutics owes its inspiration to Ricoeur's general theory and to his own application of it to biblical texts. (See, e.g., Essays on Biblical Interpretation [1980].) Some see in Ricoeur a model for understanding what they regard as the ineluctably and radically dynamic nature of all theologizing and of all religious traditions, including Christianity.

It is possible to be too sanguine about the prospects of carrying on the great tradition of evangelicalism within the framework of Ricoeur's theory. Ricoeur's willingness to attend carefully to opposing sides of any issue is admirable, but his insistence on the possibility and desirability of reconciling radically opposed perspectives in and across every domain of inquiry harbors a prejudice against the possibility of a realistic apprehension of objective truth.

R. D. GEIVETT

Bibliography. S. H. Clark, Paul Ricoeur; L. Dornisch, Faith and Philosophy in the Writings of Paul Ricoeur; L. E. Hahn, ed., Philosophy of Paul Ricoeur; C. E. Reagan, Paul Ricoeur: His Life and His Work; C. E. Reagan, ed., Studies in the Philosophy of Paul Ricoeur; F. D. Vancina, Paul Ricoeur: A Primary and Secondary Systematic Bibliography; K. Vanhoozer, Biblical Narrative in the Philosophy of Paul Ricoeur: A Study in Hermeneutics and Philosophy.

Righteousness. The Hebrew word regularly translated "righteous" or "just" is šāddīq and originally meant "straight" or "right." The corresponding Greek term is dikaïos, and in Greek society referred to that which is in accordance with law or social norm. The noun forms are šedeq (or sē-dāqā) and dikaïosynē. The verbs šādak and dikaioō mean "to do justice," "to be just," "to vindicate," or "to justify" in the forensic sense of "declare righteous" or "treat as just."

Old Testament Usage. The God of Israel is revealed as a God of righteousness who acts rightly in all his works and judgments (Gen. 18:25; Deut. 32:4; Ps. 11:7; Dan. 9:14). The OT concept of righteousness is closely linked with God's judgeship (Pss. 9:8; 50:6; 143:2). God judges equitably; he does not clear the guilty or forsake the righteous, and the judges of Israel are commanded to act according to his example (Exod. 23:7; Deut. 1:16–17; 10:17–18; Ps. 98:9). Thus, the righteousness of God is revealed in his punishment of the wicked and disobedient (Neh. 9:33; Ps. 7:9–17; Lam. 1:18; Dan. 9:14). But more emphatically God's righteousness is made known in his deliverance of his people from their enemies and oppressors (1 Sam. 12:6–11; Pss. 9:7–9; 51:14; Isa. 46:11–13). God as judge comes to the rescue of the poor and the oppressed, delivering them from injustice and restoring their rights (Pss. 34:16–22; 72:1–4; 82; Isa. 11:4). He even treats them as righteous, in the relative sense that they are in the right as over against their wicked oppressors (Pss. 7:6–11; 143:1–3, 11–12). Consequently, God's righteous judgment is often expressed in terms of his saving acts. Righteousness many times is closely related to God's salvation, mercy, and lovingkindness, especially in the Psalms and Isaiah (Pss. 40:10; 85:9–10; 98:2–3; Isa. 45:8; 46:13; 51:5; Jer. 9:24).

This emphasis on the righteousness of God in the form of salvation should be understood within the context of God's covenant relationship with Israel. God by his grace made a covenant with Abraham and his descendants, and his righteousness is seen in his faithfulness in keeping that covenant (1 Chron. 16:16–17, 35; Isa. 46:9–13; Jer. 33:25–26). The covenant does not make sinful Israel immune from divine judgment, but after chastisement God delivers his people and thus reveals his righteousness (the lesson of the exile). God justifies his covenant people, declaring them righteous, not because they have perfectly kept the law, but because (or on the condition that) their repentant hearts trust in him and seek to keep his covenant (Gen. 15:6; Pss. 32:10–11; 103:17–18; Isa. 50:8; 53:11). This judgment or forensic act of God is therefore both an act of righteousness and a gift of divine mercy.

Modern Bible scholars often overemphasize the benevolent aspect of God's righteousness in the OT and lose sight of the legal and punitive aspects. But God's righteous judgeship is seen in the punishment of the lawbreaker as well as in the deliverance of the justified. It is noteworthy, however, that the positive aspect of God's righteousness is more common in the OT, while the punitive aspect is more closely associated with God's wrath.

The climax of this positive aspect is found in the theme of Messiah, the one who will be a truly righteous king and will fulfill God's covenant purpose for Israel, bringing it and all nations to God's final righteousness (Ps. 72; Isa. 9:7; 11:3–5; 42:6; Jer. 23:5–6; 33:15–16; Zech. 9:9).

New Testament Usage. Much of the NT is taken up with the purpose of showing that Jesus of Nazareth is indeed the promised Messiah, and thus God's purposes of righteousness and salvation are spoken of as centered in him. Understandably, then, we find righteousness closely linked to the NT theme of the kingdom of God (Matt. 5:10; 6:33; 13:43; Rom. 14:17), a kingdom and a righteousness for which John the Baptist prepared the way and which Jesus as the righteous Son and Redeemer brings to fulfillment (Matt. 3:15; 5:17–20; 21:32; Acts 3:14; 25–26).

Jesus spoke of a false righteousness that is found in those who trust in themselves as righteous or justified because of their moral accomplishments (Matt. 23:28; Luke 16:15; 18:9), but he taught that the truly justified are those who acknowledge their sin and trust in God for forgiveness and his righteousness (Matt. 5:6; Mark 2:17; Luke 18:14).

Righteousness

Again the forensic understanding of righteousness is the key, and this is brought out most fully by Paul. Following the teaching of Christ, Paul explains that no one seeking to be righteous by the works of the law can be justified in God's sight, since everyone is a sinner and has fallen short of God's righteous standard (Rom. 3:9–10, 20, 23; Gal. 2:16). Therefore, the righteousness of God comes as a gift we do not merit (Rom. 3:24; 5:15–17), a gracious declaration in which God pronounces righteous the one who puts his or her faith in Jesus Christ (Acts 13:39; Rom. 3:22; 5:1, 18). In this declaration God forgives the sins of the justified on the basis of Christ's atoning death, so that God himself is vindicated as just in his justification of sinners (Rom. 3:25–26; 5:8–9; cf. 1 John 1:9; 2:2).

The NT makes it clear, however, that the one who by faith is declared righteous also by faith seeks to do the deeds of righteousness and to grow in righteousness by God's grace (Rom. 6:12–18; Eph. 4:24; 5:9; Phil. 1:11; Heb. 11; James 2:17–26; 1 Pet. 2:24; 1 John 2:29). By this grace God also will bring the justified into a final righteousness (Gal. 5:5; Heb. 12:23; 2 Pet. 3:13) at the day when God will judge the whole world (Luke 14:14; Acts 17:31; 2 Tim. 4:8).

Therefore, as in the OT so also in the NT, God's righteousness, which expresses itself in wrath and judgment against unrepentant sinners (Rom. 2:5–9; 2 Thess. 1:5–9; Rev. 19:2), triumphs through love in the form of salvation from sin for those who repent and claim God's covenant promise fulfilled in Christ.

Theological Concepts. In systematic theology righteousness or justice is seen, first of all, as an attribute of God's being (one of the moral and communicable attributes), and then derivatively as an attribute of man created in God's image.

God's Righteousness (Justice). Righteousness is that attribute by which God's nature is seen to be the eternally perfect standard of what is right. It is closely related to God's holiness (or moral perfection) on one hand and to God's moral law or will as an expression of his holiness on the other hand. Even though there is no distinction between righteousness and justice in the biblical vocabulary, theologians often use the former to refer to the attribute of God in himself and the latter to refer to the actions of God with respect to his creation. Hence, God's justice is seen in the way he subjects the universe to various laws and endows it with various rights according to the hierarchy of beings he created. This is "legislative justice." In addition there is "distributive justice," in which God maintains the laws and rights by giving everything its due, or responding appropriately to created beings according to their value or place in the universe. His distributive justice with respect to moral creatures is expressed in the punishment of sin or disobedience (retribu-tive justice) and the rewarding of good or obedience (remunerative justice; Rom. 2:5–11).

In systematic theology the harmony of God's justice and love is treated primarily under the doctrine of Christ's atonement. In the cross God satisfies the demands of his own justice against our sin, so that by Christ's redemptive act, God's "holy love" is seen as both the supreme expression of retributive justice and the supreme expression of forgiving grace.

Human Righteousness. Doctrinally, human righteousness can be analyzed in the following fourfold way: (1) Original righteousness. God made man upright or morally good (Gen. 1:31; Eccles. 7:29), but man fell from this righteous state into a state of sin. (2) Christ's righteousness. Since Adam's fall, Christ is the only human being who has perfectly fulfilled God's moral law and maintained a righteous nature (Matt. 5:17; John 8:29, 46; Heb. 4:15; 1 Pet. 2:22). Since Christ is the God-man, his righteousness is of infinite value, affording salvation for all who believe. (3) Imputed righteousness (justification). Justification is that step in salvation in which God declares the believer righteous. Protestant theology has emphasized that this includes the imputation of Christ's righteousness (crediting it to the believer's "account"), whereas Roman Catholic theology emphasizes that God justifies in accord with an infused righteousness merited by Christ and maintained by the believer's good works. (4) Renewed righteousness (sanctification). Having been declared righteous, the believer grows in the likeness of Christ (being renewed in the image of God) and becomes righteous in actual moral character, i.e., he or she becomes sanctified. Most theologians hold that sanctification is progressive and not complete in this earthly life.

D. W. DIEHL

See also GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF; JUSTIFICATION; RIGHTEOUSNESS, ORIGINAL; SANCTIFICATION.

Bibliography. P. J. Achtemeier, IDB 4:80–99; J. A. Baird, Justice of God in the Teaching of Jesus; H. Bavinck, Doctrine of God; C. Brown, NIDNTT 3:352–77; E. Brunner, Christian Doctrine of God; R. Garrigou-Lagrange, God, His Existence and His Nature; A. C. Knudson, Doctrine of God; L. Morris, Apostolic Preaching of the Cross; J. I. Packer, Knowing God; G. Rupp, Righteousness of God; P. Tillich, Love, Power, and Justice.

Righteousness, Civil. See CIVIL RIGHTEOUSNESS.

Righteousness, Original. The term refers to the original moral state or condition of humans prior to Adam's fall into sin. Scripture texts on the concept are Genesis 1:31 and Ecclesiastes 7:29, which speak of man as created "good" and "upright," and Ephesians 4:24 and Colossians 3:10, which speak of the renewal (in Christ) of the image of God in man in “knowledge” and “true righteousness and holiness” (cf. Rom. 8:29; 2 Cor. 3:18).

Roman Catholicism sees original righteousness as a donum supernaturale added to the “natural” image of God. In the fall original righteousness (by which man had supernatural communion with God) was lost, but the natural image (consisting of man’s reason, freedom, and spirituality) remained relatively intact. Luther rejected this twofold distinction and taught that original righteousness was the very essence of man’s original nature or image, not a supernatural addition to it. Thus, for Luther the image as a whole was lost in the fall. Calvin also rejected the Catholic natural-supernatural distinction but had a broader view of the image than did Luther. For Calvin the loss of original righteousness in the fall meant the thorough corruption of the image but not its total loss.

Modern liberalism, influenced by evolutionary philosophy, views the Genesis narratives of man’s origin as myths and finds the doctrine of original righteousness to be rather lacking in meaning. Neo-orthodoxy, too, rejects a literal, primitive state of righteousness in human history but finds the concept of original righteousness still valid and important. It refers to man’s “essential nature,” the God-created law of man’s true being (the law of love), standing in contradiction to man’s sinful, existential nature (Brunner and Niebuhr). Original righteousness is that of which man is dimly aware through his self-transcendence, and from which he inevitably has fallen through wrong use of freedom. It also is that which man comes to understand most clearly through Christ.

D. W. DIEHL

See also FALL OF THE HUMAN RACE; IMAGE OF GOD; RIGHTEOUSNESS.

Bibliography. L. Berkhof, Systematic Theology; D. G. Bloesch, Essentials of Evangelical Theology; E. Brunner, Man in Revolt; C. Hodge, Systematic Theology; R. Niebuhr, Nature and Destiny of Man; P. Schoonenberg, Man and Sin.

Righteousness of God. See GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF.

Rights, Human. See CIVIL RIGHTS.

Ritschl, Albrecht (1822–1889). German Protestant theologian. Son of a bishop, Ritschl was born in Berlin and studied at various universities. At first an adherent of the Tübingen School, his research in patristics led to his rejection of the theory of the radical conflict between Petrine Judaism and Pauline Hellenism. After sixteen years at Bonn, he moved to Göttingen in 1864, where as professor of systematic theology he wrote his most important works, Christian Doctrine of Jus- tification and Reconciliation (1870–74), Instruction in the Christian Religion (1875), Theology and Metaphysics (1881), and History of Pietism (3 vols., 1880–86), and founded the important journal Zeitschrift für die Kirchengeschichte.

Ritschl’s theology is often labeled that of “moral value.” He explored the ethical implications of Christianity and indicated their relevance for the life and witness of the church. He rejected all forms of natural theology, mysticism, and metaphysics, arguing that theology must concentrate on moral and ethical realities. He said religion cannot be understood on the basis of experience, reason, or doctrines that go beyond verifiable history but rather through apprehension by faith. He distinguished between “value” and “fact” judgments. For example, he said the divinity of Christ is a statement of the revelational value of the church’s faith, not something that can be objectively demonstrated.

Central to Ritschl’s system is his notion of justification. He defined Christianity as an ellipse with two foci—Jesus, who reveals the love of God for us and reconciles us, and the church, which is the spiritual and ethical community he founded and whose goal is the transformation of human society into the kingdom of God. Justification is the forgiveness of sins, the divine act of lifting the consciousness of guilt (both sin and punishment), but it is achieved in and through the church, the community for which Jesus died. Sin is a person’s deeds performed in opposition to the action now occurring in the kingdom of God; namely, selfishness, seeking after inferior values, and lack of reverence and trust in God. It restricts a person’s right to be a child of God and prevents him or her from achieving life’s goal of the kingdom. In justification God assigns a person to a certain place in the kingdom where he or she engages in virtuous activity and with God’s help overcomes the contradictions running through human existence. Reconciliation is the state of full harmony in which God stands before the believer as his or her Father and in turn receives childlike trust. The Christian is given spiritual dominion over the world, engages in the work of the kingdom, and lives a life of faith, humility, patience, prayer, and activity in his or her vocation and the development of personal virtue.

By rejecting a juridical view of justification, Ritschl saw Christ’s death not as a propitiation for sins but the result of loyalty to his vocation to bring people into full fellowship with God by sharing in his own consciousness of sonship. He also denied the traditional views of original sin, the incarnation, revelation, resurrection, church, and kingdom of God and created an unbridgeable chasm between the Jesus of history and Christ of faith.

R. V. PIERARD

Ritschl, Albrecht

See also LIBERALISM, THEOLOGICAL.

Bibliography. K. Barth, Protestant Thought from Rousseau to Ritschl; C. Brown, NIDCC 850; E. A. Edgell, Faith and Fact: A Study of Ritschlianism; P. Hefner, Faith and the Vitalities of History; Three Essays; D. W. Lotz, Ritschl and Luther; H. R. Mackintosh, Albrecht Ritschl and His School; J. K. Mozley, Ritschlianism; D. L. Mueller, Introduction to the Theology of Albrecht Ritschl; ODCC 1189; J. Orr, Ritschlianism: Expository and Critical Essays; Ritschlian Theology and the Evangelical Faith; J. Richmond, Ritschl: A Reappraisal; D. Ritschl, NCE 12:522–23; A. T. Swing, Theology of Albrecht Ritschl.

Robinson, Henry Wheeler (1872–1945). English Baptist scholar. After studies in Britain and Germany, he was a pastor for six years, became tutor in Rawdon Baptist College in 1906, and then served as principal of his denomination's Regent Park College from 1920 to 1942. The most eminent Baptist scholar of his generation, he had wide-ranging theological interests. His Christian Doctrine of Man (1911) upheld religious and moral concepts against the rational and aesthetic emphases found in traditional Greek thinking. Christian Experience of the Holy Spirit (1928) was a salutary corrective of the immanentist approach of Schleiermacher and Ritschl. Significantly, however, Robinson did not oppose this view in favor of an evangelical concept of revelation and inspiration. He put great stress on human response and interpretation.

While Robinson often returned to wider theological fields, as in Redemption and Revelation (1942), he is chiefly remembered for contributions to OT scholarship. His first book was a commentary on Deuteronomy and Joshua (1907). Religious Ideas of the Old Testament (1913) was hailed as such a valuable and durable work that it was reissued (with revisions by L. H. Brockington) in 1956. Some hold that Robinson's most important work was in the area of Hebrew psychology and OT theology, as found in his Inspiration and Revelation in the Old Testament (1946). He was the first non-Anglican chairman of the board of Oxford University theological faculty (1937–39). J. D. DOUGLAS Bibliography. E. A. Payne, Henry Wheeler Robinson.

Robinson, John Arthur Thomas (1919–1983). Anglican clergyman and suffragan bishop of Woolwich (south of London), Cambridge don, New Testament scholar, and author. He was well known for espousing controversial causes and positions. He appeared in court to defend against the charge of pornography against the 1960 republication of D. H. Lawrence's novel Lady Chatterley's Lover. His two books, Redating the New Testament (1976) and Priority of John (1985), take a surprisingly "conservative" stand on some matters of biblical criticism. He is best known for his radical views put forth in Honest to God (1962).

In this small but widely influential book, Robinson combined and popularized the views set forth by a number of other thinkers, most notably Tillich, Bultmann, and Bonhoeffer. Rejecting worldviews that espouse either naturalism or supernaturalism, he sought to sketch out a model for Christianity that goes beyond both. Robinson rejected the existence of objective absolutes but also denied being a complete relativist. He declined to view God as either a supernatural being or as a pantheistic extension of nature. He sought a position between such extremes.

Honest to God affirms that modern persons must seek God in the depths of both experience and the universe, for God is pure Love, the very ground of our being. Jesus was "the man for others, in whom love had completely taken over," the one through whom we see and know God. There is no basis for morality except love ("New Morality"); lack of love is the only intrinsic evil. The church too must be included in this recasting as it provides the communal framework for the relational and loving characteristics of "worldly Christianity." J. J. SCOTT JR.

See also BONHOEFFER, DIETRICH; BULTMANN, RUDOLF; TILlich, PAUL.

Bibliography. J. A. T. Robinson, Roots of a Radical; D. L. Edwards, ed., Honest to God Debate; E. James, Life of Bishop John A. T. Robinson: Scholar, Pastor, Prophet.

Roman Catholicism. The term has been in general use since the Reformation to identify the faith and practice of Christians in communion with the pope.

Although it has a reputation for conservatism and reaction, Roman Catholicism is a genuinely evolving religious system, valuing the deepening and development of its understanding of the Christian faith. The Ignatian principles of accommodation and J. H. Newman's theory of development have been two expressions of this process. This development sometimes goes beyond biblical data, but Catholic scholars contend that the church's doctrines—e.g., on the sacraments, the blessed Virgin Mary, and the papacy—are suggested by a "trajectory of images" in the NT; postbiblical developments are said to be consistent with the "thrust" of the NT. At other times this evolution has involved the rediscovery of truths that the church once possessed but which it subsequently lost in the course of its long history. The church has even at times recognized as error what it had earlier decreed authoritatively. Vatican Council II's Declaration on Religious Freedom is seen by reputable Catholic scholars to be in conflict with the condemnations of religious freedom in Gregory XVI's encyclical Mirari vos of 1832. The conflict was recognized by members of the council, but they supported the declaration on the principle of doctrinal development. Protestants hostile to Catholicism should be wary of attacking allegedly unalterable Catholic positions: the Catholic Church has reversed its position on basic issues.

If, then, Roman Catholicism cannot be fixed within a single monolithic theological system, it is nevertheless helpful to distinguish between two traditions within Catholicism. The mainstream tradition has stressed the transcendence of God and the church as a divinely commissioned institution (the "vertical church"). This authoritarian, centralizing tradition has been variously labeled, mainly by its critics, as "medievalism," "Romanism," "Vaticanism," "papalism," "Ultramontanism," "Jesuitism," "Integralism," and "neoscholasticism." A minority reformist tradition has stressed the immanence of God and the church as community (the "horizontal church"). Reform Catholicism has nourished such movements as Gallicanism, Jansenism, liberal Catholicism, and modernism.

The two traditions coalesced at Vatican II, facilitated by John XXIII's dictum, "The substance of the ancient doctrine is one thing . . . and the way in which it is presented is another." An understanding, then, of modern-day Roman Catholicism requires a description of the characteristics of conservative Catholicism that dominated the church especially from the Council of Trent (1545–63) until Vatican II, plus an outline of the changes in emphasis inaugurated at Vatican II.

The Church. The most distinctive characteristic of Roman Catholicism has always been its theology of the church (its ecclesiology). The church's role in mediating salvation has been emphasized more than in other Christian traditions. Supernatural life is mediated to Christians through the sacraments administered by the hierarchy to whom obedience is due. The church is monarchical as well as hierarchical since Christ conferred the primacy on Peter, whose successors are the popes. Pre-Vatican II theology taught that the Roman Catholic Church is the only true church of Christ, since it alone has a permanent hierarchy (which is apostolic) and primacy (which is Petrine) to ensure the permanence of the church as Christ instituted it. All other churches are false churches insofar as they lack one of the four properties possessed by the Roman Catholic Church: unity, holiness, catholicity, and apostolicity.

The most important document of Vatican II, the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, transformed rather than revolutionized the church's ecclesiology. The traditional emphasis on the church as means of salvation was supplanted by an understanding of the church as a mystery or sacrament, "a reality imbued with the hidden presence of God" (Paul VI). The conception of the church as a hierarchical institution was replaced by a view of the church as the whole people of God. To the traditional understanding of the church's mission as involving (1) the proclamation of the gospel and (2) the celebration of the sacraments, the council added (3) witnessing to the gospel and (4) service to all in need. The Tridentine emphasis on the church universal was supplemented by an understanding of the fullness of the church in each local congregation.

In the Decree on Ecumenism the council recognized that both sides were at fault in the rupture of the church at the Reformation, and it sought the restoration of Christian unity rather than a return of non-Catholics to "the true Church." For the church is greater than the Roman Catholic Church: other churches are valid Christian communities since they share the same Scriptures, life of grace, faith, hope, charity, gifts of the Spirit, and baptism.

Further, the traditional identification of the kingdom of God with the church, into which everyone must therefore be brought or salvation will elude them, is replaced by an understanding of the church as the sign and instrument by which God calls and moves the world toward his kingdom.

The Pope. The dogmas of papal primacy and infallibility were promulgated as recently as Vatican I (1869–70), but they have a long history that Roman Catholics trace ultimately to the will of Christ (Matt. 16:18–19; Luke 22:32; John 21:15–17) and the roles exercised by the apostle Peter (fisherman, shepherd, elder, rock, etc.) in the NT church. In succeeding centuries the prestige of the church of Rome increased since it was located at the imperial capital and because of its association with the apostles Peter and Paul. It was increasingly looked to as the arbiter of orthodoxy. Pope Leo I maintained that Peter continues to speak to the whole church through the bishop of Rome, the first known such claim. The rise of the pope's temporal power, which for over a millennium buttressed his claims to supremacy is commonly traced to the middle of the eighth century, when a vacuum in civil leadership was created by the collapse of Western Europe.

In 1234 Gregory IX combined and codified all previous papal decisions into the Five Books of Decretals. By now the church was understood primarily as a visible hierarchical organization with supreme power vested in the pope. Bishops were required to take an oath of obedience to the pope similar to the feudal oath binding a vassal to his lord. The supreme pontiff was no longer only consecrated; he was also crowned with the triple tiara used originally by the deified rulers of Persia. The coronation rite was continued until 1978, when John Paul I refused the crown, a symbolic action repeated by his successor, John

Roman Catholicism

Paul II. The height of papal pretensions was reached in 1302 with Boniface VIII's bull, Unam Sanctum, which decreed that the temporal power was subject to the spiritual, and that submission to the Roman pontiff "is absolutely necessary to salvation."

These papal claims were resisted not only by national rulers but by some scholars, notably William of Ockham and Marsilius of Padua, and by conciliarism, a movement in the church to subject the pope to the judgment and legislation of general councils. Its greatest triumph was the Council of Constance (1414–15) with its law Haec Sancta, decreeing the supremacy of a general council and the collegiality of bishops. Conciliarism was condemned by succeeding popes until Vatican I declared that the pope's authoritative teachings are not subject to the consent of the entire church. The pope was declared to be infallible (immune from error) when he speaks ex cathedra (from the chair) on matters of faith and morals with the intention of binding the whole church.

Vatican II stressed the role of the pope as "perpetual and visible source and foundation of the unity of the bishops and of the multitude of the faithful," a role received sympathetically by some Protestant churches since the council (see, e.g., R. E. Brown et al., Peter in the New Testament, sponsored by the United States Lutheran–Roman Catholic Dialogue). Vatican II also revived the collegiality of bishops, thus modifying the monarchical governance of the church: "Together with its head, the Roman Pontiff, and never without its head, the episcopal order is the subject of supreme and full power over the universal church."

The Sacraments. The sacramental principle is another characteristic tenet of Roman Catholicism. The sacramental system worked out especially in the Middle Ages by the schoolmen and subsequently at the Council of Trent envisaged sacraments primarily as causes of grace that could be received independent of the merit of the recipient. Recent Catholic sacramental theology emphasizes their function as signs of faith. Sacraments are said to cause grace insofar as they are intelligible signs of it, and the fruitfulness, as distinct from the validity, of the sacrament is dependent on the faith and devotion of the recipient. Sacramental rites are now administered in the vernacular, rather than in Latin, to increase the intelligibility of the signs.

Conservative Catholicism connected sacramental theology to Christology, stressing Christ's institution of the sacraments and the power of the sacraments to infuse the grace of Christ, earned on Calvary, to the recipient. The newer emphasis connects the sacraments to ecclesiology. We do not encounter Christ directly, but in the church, which is his body. The church mediates the presence and action of Christ.

The number of sacraments was finally fixed at seven during the medieval period (at the councils of Lyons, 1272; Florence, 1439; and Trent, 1547). In addition Roman Catholicism has innumerable sacramentals—e.g., baptismal water, holy oil, blessed ashes, candles, palms, crucifixes, and statues. Sacramentals are said to cause grace not ex opere operato like the sacraments, but ex opere operantis, through the faith and devotion of those using them.

Three of the sacraments—baptism, confirmation, Eucharist—are concerned with Christian initiation.

Baptism. The sacrament is understood to remit original sin and all personal sin of which the recipient sincerely repents. All must be baptized or they cannot enter the kingdom of heaven. But not all baptism is sacramental baptism by water. There is also "baptism of blood," which is received by dying for Christ (e.g., the "holy innocents," Matt. 2:16–18), and "baptism of desire," which is received by those who, implicitly or explicitly, desire baptism but are prevented from receiving it sacramentally. "Even those who through no fault of their own do not know Christ and his church may be counted as anonymous Christians if their striving to lead a good life is in fact a response to his grace, which is given in sufficient measure to all."

Confirmation. A theology of confirmation was not developed until the Middle Ages. Confirmation was said to be the gift of the Spirit for strengthening (ad robur) while baptismal grace is for forgiveness (ad remissionem). This distinction has no basis in the Scriptures or the fathers but has been retained to the present following ratification by the Council of Trent. Today, however, the rite is sometimes administered at the same time as baptism and by the priest, not the bishop, to emphasize that both are really aspects of the one sacrament of initiation.

Eucharist. Distinctively Catholic doctrines on the Eucharist include the sacrificial nature of the Mass and transubstantiation. Both were defined at Trent and neither was modified at Vatican II. The unbloody sacrifice of the Mass is identified with the bloody sacrifice of the cross, in that both are offered for the sins of the living and the dead. Hence, Christ is the same victim and priest in the Eucharist as he was on the cross. Transubstantiation, the belief that the substance of bread and wine is changed into the body and blood of Christ, was first spoken of at the Fourth Lateran Council (1215).

Two sacraments—penance and anointing the sick—are concerned with healing.

Penance. By the Middle Ages the sacrament of penance had four components that were confirmed by the Council of Trent: satisfaction (the doing of an act of penance), confession, contrition, and absolution by a priest. All grave sins had to be confessed to a priest who acted as judge. Since Vatican II the role of the priest in penance is understood as healer, and the purpose of the sacrament is reconciliation with the church rather than the restoration of friendship with God. Through contrition the sinner's union with God is restored, but he is still required to seek forgiveness in the sacrament of penance because his sin compromises the mission of the church to be a holy people.

Anointing the Sick. During the Middle Ages the rite of anointing the sick, or extreme unction, was reserved increasingly for the dying. Vatican II relabeled the sacrament "anointing of the sick," stating explicitly that it "is not a sacrament reserved for those who are at the point of death." The last sacrament is now known as viaticum, received during Mass if possible.

There are two sacraments of vocation and commitment: marriage and orders.

Marriage. The sacramentality of marriage was affirmed by the councils of Florence and Trent. Marriage is understood to be indissoluble, although dispensations, chiefly in the form of annulment (a declaration that a valid marriage never existed), are permitted. The grounds of nullity so carefully delimited in the 1918 Code of Canon Law have now been broadened to embrace many deficiencies of character.

Orders. Vatican II recognized that all the baptized participate in some way in the priesthood of Christ but confirmed Catholic tradition on the clerical hierarchy by decreeing that there is a distinction between the priesthood conferred by baptism and that conferred by ordination. The ordained priesthood has three orders: bishops, priests, and deacons. The first and third are offices of the NT church. The office of priest emerged when it was no longer practical to continue recognizing the Jewish priesthood (owing to the destruction of the temple and the great influx of Gentiles into the church) and with the development of a sacrificial understanding of the Lord's Supper.

Canon Law. In the eleventh and twelfth centuries a new branch of theological studies, canon law, emerged as an adjunct of papal supremacy. Legal decrees rather than the gospel became the basis for moral judgments. The church was understood primarily as an institution in its juridical aspect. The legal aspects of the sacraments and matrimony were paramount. Until the post-Vatican II period a knowledge of canon law was the chief prerequisite for ecclesiastical advancement.

The Cult of the Blessed Virgin Mary. At the Council of Ephesus (431) Mary was declared to be the Mother of God (Theotokos) and not only the mother of Christ (Christotokos). This gave an impetus to Marian devotion, and by the seventh century four Marian feasts were being observed in Rome: the annunciation, the purification, the assumption, and the nativity of Mary. To these feasts the Eastern churches added the feast of the conception of Mary at the end of the same century. Bernard of Clairvaux influenced Mariology decisively by arguing that while Christ is our mediator he is also our judge, and that therefore we need a mediator with the mediator, so that in popular devotion the merciful Mary was contrasted with the fierce Christ. Marian devotion blossomed between the eleventh and fifteenth centuries. The rosary (three groups of fifty Hail Marys counted on beads) was in popular use by the twelfth century, and the angelus also appeared (the recitation of prayers to Mary, morning, noon, and evening, at the sound of a bell). In 1854, following another revival of Marian spirituality, Pius IX promulgated the dogma of the immaculate conception, that Mary was free from original sin from the moment of her conception. In 1950 Pius XII defined the dogma of bodily assumption of the Virgin Mary, that on her death she was preserved from "the corruption of the tomb" and was "raised body and soul to the glory of heaven, to shine refulgent as Queen at the right hand of her Son."

Since Vatican II Catholic scholars have questioned if denial of these two Marian dogmas means exclusion from the Catholic Church, since that denial must be "culpable, obstinate, and externally manifested." Vatican II also tended to disassociate Mariology from Christology, thus removing an emphasis on her involvement in our redemption and attaching her to ecclesiology, so that Mary is seen rather as the type, model, mother, and preeminent member of the church.

Revelation. The Council of Trent declared tradition to be equally authoritative with Scripture and the definitive interpretation of both to be the preserve of the church. In its Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, Vatican II sought to remove the sharp distinction perceived by Protestants between Scripture and tradition by defining tradition as the successive interpretations of the Scriptures given by the church throughout the ages. That the church somehow stood above both sources of revelation was specifically denied: "This teaching office is not above the word of God, but serves it. . . . It is clear, therefore, that sacred tradition, sacred Scripture, and the teaching authority of the Church . . . are so linked and joined together that one cannot stand without the others."

The failure of post-Vatican II Catholicism to give a clear preeminence to the Bible leaves some Protestants dissatisfied, but there is no doubt that the scholarly and popular study of the Bible by Roman Catholics has increased markedly since 1965. Roman Catholicism is no longer simply reacting and polemical, devoted to defending truth through the condemnation of error. It is now an innovative and irenic movement, more devoted to illustrating the Christian faith than defining it.

Roman Catholicism

F. S. PIGGIN

See also CATHOLICISM, LIBERAL; COUNTER-REFORMATION; EXCOMMUNICATION; FEBRONIANISM; GALLICANISM; INFALLIBILITY; PAPACY; TRENT, COUNCIL OF; ULTRAMONTANISM; VATICAN COUNCIL I; VATICAN COUNCIL II.

Bibliography. W. M. Abbott and J. Gallagher, eds., Documents of Vatican II; G. C. Berkouwer, Conflict with Rome; Second Vatican Council and the New Catholicism; L. Boettner, New Catechism: Catholic Faith for Adults; Roman Catholicism; G. Cary, Meeting of the Waters; G. Daly, Transcendence and Immanence: A Study in Catholic Modernism and Integralism; J. Delumeau, Catholicism between Luther and Voltaire; J. P. Dolan, Catholicism: An Historical Survey; J. D. Holmes, Triumph of the Holy See; P. Hughes, Short History of the Catholic Church; B. Kloppenberg, Ecclesiology of Vatican II; R. Lawler, D. W. Wuerl, and T. C. Lawler, eds., Teaching of Christ: A Catholic Catechism for Adults; R. P. McBrien, Catholicism; K. Rahner, H. Roos, and J. Neuner, eds., Teaching of the Catholic Church; P. Toon, Protestants and Catholics

Roman Creed, Old. See APOSTLES' CREED.

Romanticism. A movement in art, literature, philosophy, and religion in the latter eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, romanticism defies definition. The romantic writers seldom used the term themselves, and controversy has raged among critical and historical scholars of Western culture ever since as to its precise meaning and interpretation. Some, like A. O. Lovejoy, insist there are many "romanticisms" in the sense of artists and writers manifesting its typical features but no clearly definable doctrine or school. Others restrict it to one or more countries, denying that a general movement as such existed. Nevertheless, there are identifiable traits that distinguish romanticism from earlier cultural periods, and most contemporary scholars, while disagreeing on details, recognize its descriptive validity. Certainly it characterizes a "temperament" (Crane Brinton) or personality, if not an epoch in cultural history as such.

The term came from the Old French romanz (to write), which in the Middle Ages meant writing in the vernacular rather than Latin. It gradually came to be applied to works of fiction and then to the untouched natural landscape. By the eighteenth century it referred to that which was sentimental, full of expression, and melancholy. The movement itself arose in the 1790s as a reaction to the classicism and rationalism of the Enlightenment, but elements of this revolt could be seen in earlier "preromantic" writers like Vico, Rousseau, James Thomson, and the Storm and Stress school in Germany (Klopstock, Herder, and the young Goethe and Schiller). Among the major romantic authors are Coleridge, Wordsworth, Byron, Shelley, Keats, Scott, and Blake in Britain; Madame de Staël, Musset, George Sand, and Victor Hugo in France; and Goethe, August and Friedrich von Schlegel, Novalis, Eichendorff, Kleist, Tieck, the Grimm brothers, and E. T. A. Hoffmann in Germany. There were also romantic composers like Chopin, Schubert, and Schumann, painters like Delacroix and Turner, and the philosophers Fichte, Schelling, Hegel, and Schopenhauer. The main theologian was Schleiermacher. The movement had run its course by the end of the 1830s, but some features continued even past midcentury.

The specific elements of romanticism are difficult to delineate because they exist in differing combinations in the various writers and thinkers, depending on their geographical location, place in time, and personal connections. While acknowledging that there are exceptions, romanticism generally can be said to stress emotionalism, sensualism, fantasy, and imagination over rational order and control. Reality is found not by rational thought but through feeling, immediate experience, spiritual illumination, brooding, and listening to the inner voices. There is a subjectivism that emphasizes self-consciousness, the activity of the ego, introversion, and originality. A sense of mystery arises out of an inner longing for that which is unexperienced and unknown. Each personality should be allowed to unfold itself freely, according to its own genius, individual impulses, and idiosyncrasies. Romantics seek beauty, color, and adventure in out-of-the-way places and events and among the common people. The exotic is preferred over the familiar, rural life over that of the city. Prescribed unities and forms are rejected for that which is different, unconventional, novel, and spontaneous. Romantics have a deep interest in the past, especially the Middle Ages, as well as nonclassical (Nordic) mythology, folklore, and primitivism, and they contributed greatly to recovering and publishing long-forgotten medieval historical records and literature. Finally, romantic art seems on the one hand to be sensuous, concrete, and down to earth, yet simultaneously it is much more visionary and even mystical. As Novalis put it, in the romantic view of life, "world becomes dream, dream becomes world."

The impact of romanticism on religious and theological developments is significant. To be sure, its emphasis on human self-consciousness, personal creative powers, the natural goodness of persons, and the pantheistic interfusion of real and ideal, finite and infinite, spirit and matter leads to a glorification of one's powers of self-expression and to pride. Many romantics refused to believe in any power superior to their own genius, and the objects of their devotion—nature, liberty, beauty, love, brotherhood—essentially circle back to the worshiper and function as ways of asserting human self-sufficiency.

Nevertheless, some did embrace Christianity. In 1798 Friedrich von Schlegel underwent what approximated a conversion experience, and religion, God, mysticism, and the otherworld began to fill his writings. He was attracted by the shimmering vision of a reality beyond this world whose gates are not opened by critical analysis, and which one does not understand until one has experienced it. Schlegel saw fantasy or the imagination as the point of contact between within and without, the self and God. The poet is the one who illuminates and awakens humanity to the spark of the divine within. But in order to find one's way into the higher sphere, one must negate the earthly and finite. This requires self-sacrifice, i.e., death, because only from the perspective of the realm beyond does the purpose of the whole become clear. The flame of eternal life is kindled in death.

Novalis (Friedrich von Hardenberg) argued that the poet must be the priest of this religion, since through fantasy, imagination, and dream he is the one who has been made immortal. In the essay Christendom or Europe (1799), Novalis portrayed Christianity as the symbol of a universal world religion, the purest example of religion as a historical phenomenon and the most complete revelation. In the Middle Ages the love of Mary, princely submission to ecclesiastical authority, and sense for the invisible, peace, unity, and inner world reigned supreme. This organic unity disintegrated under the impact of the Reformation, while the Enlightenment squelched imagination and emotion and relegated humankind merely to first place in the order of created things. But now, Novalis said, a new religious surge will sweep Europe, art will be reborn, and imagination and creative will stir the universal capability of the inner man. Religion will awaken Europe, install Christendom with new splendor in its old peace-establishing office, and fulfill the comprehensive divine plan.

Both Schlegel and Novalis deeply influenced the young preacher Friedrich Schleiermacher, who moved freely in Berlin's salons. At Schlegel's urging he wrote On Religion: Addresses to Its Cultured Despisers, a general analysis and defense of religion commending it to the intellectuals of the day who tended to dismiss it as mere superstition. In this and his main theological work, Christian Faith, he charts a middle course between traditional orthodoxy and cold rationalism. It reflects his romantic preference for the vital, inward, and spontaneous over the static, outward, and formal. Schleiermacher regarded the essence of religion as experience in the sense of the believer's absolute "dependence" or "God-consciousness." The failure of dependence is sin, but Christ is the man who was utterly dependent on God in every thought, word, and deed. This meant God existed in him and therefore he was divine. Christian doctrines are expressions of one's religious awareness. The Bible shapes and informs the Christian God-consciousness but at the same time is a product of it. The fundamental religious awareness leads necessarily to the development of communities that are marked outwardly by their origins and history and inwardly by the way they provide expression to the essential God-consciousness. In the Christian faith it has received its highest, clearest, and fullest expression because of Jesus' God-consciousness and his redemptive work in bringing believers into a full awareness of God.

Romanticism also influenced Hegel, but he went in a different direction and subsumed theology under philosophy, giving the highest place to reason. His philosophy of idealism sees all reality as incorporated in the all-encompassing mind or spirit that is God. Mind realizes itself in the world through a dialectical pattern of movement that is a clash of opposites, a favorite theme of the romantics. This involves an interplay of diversities, a movement from partial to fuller understanding, and the connection between the outward and inward, the whole and the part, the universal and the individual. The forms of human culture that make up the world advance to ever higher levels of self-realization, and ultimately absolute mind returns to itself.

From a historical perspective, romanticism affected trends in the church itself. In Britain the romantics tended to view the church with indifference. In Germany a number of figures turned to Christianity. Some became Roman Catholics, including Friedrich Schlegel, Adam Müller, and Karl Haller, while Clemens Brentano and Joseph Görries returned to Catholicism. The dogmatic church offered a secure resting point for those weary of the restless and vain wanderings into the uncertain, and they viewed it in Novalis's sense as the mystical affirmation of Christianity. The French writer Chateaubriand glorified the Catholic faith in Spirit of Christianity (1802) as a great cultural and moral force. Romanticism thus contributed to the Catholic revival of the early nineteenth century. Interestingly, these converts identified with a conservative view of the state.

This view was reflected in the late romantic tendency toward monarchical legitimacy and political passivity that drew so many of them to the conservative camp after the demise of Napoleon. It flowed out of organic theory, which saw the state as rooted in the past, and the state, ruler, people, and church as all parts of one spiritual being or body. Especially in Germany the view was that state and church, throne and altar belong together and that both should be organized in the same manner, the state monarchical and the church episcopal. This, along with conservative Catholicism like that in France, contributed substantially to middle-class alienation from religion.

Romanticism

There was another direction in the political realm, however: the rise of nationalism. In the liberation struggle against Napoleonic rule in Germany, concepts like Volk (people), fatherland, and freedom were elevated virtually to articles of faith. Such romantics as Arndt and Fichte categorically rejected the cosmopolitanism of the eighteenth century and argued instead for a German national state, one grounded in the organic development of the Volk. In the nineteenth century these ideas were linked with a "national Protestantism," but as German society became secularized, they were appropriated by the forces of aggressive nationalism and thus constitute one of the roots of Nazism.

Another point is the manner in which the romantic assumptions of organic development and inner connections within history affected the writing of church history and biblical interpretation. The church itself was seen as a historical phenomenon that should be examined according to the canons of the new scientific history. Growing out of this was both the historical-critical methodology of biblical criticism and the salvation history approach of the Erlangen school.

A final contribution to the emergence of the German Erweckung (revival) movement can be mentioned. Whereas the evangelical revival in Britain drew little or no sustenance from romanticism, in Germany this was an important factor. Some of the revival preachers like Kottwitz and Jänicke had contact with the romantic circles in Berlin and picked up their emphases on spirit, mind, feeling, subjectivity, religion of the heart, and uncertainty of the world and their rejection of Enlightenment rationalism and dead orthodoxy. It was not the only or even the decisive element in the Erweckung but, as in these other religious developments, the influence of that confusing and contradictory cultural movement labeled romanticism was evident. R. V. PIERARD

See also ENLIGHTENMENT, THE; RENAN, JOSEPH ERNEST; SCHLEIERMACHER, FRIEDRICH DANIEL ERNST.

Bibliography. M. H. Abrams, Natural Supernaturalism; I. Babbitt, Rousseau and Romanticism; J. Barzun, Classic, Romantic, and Modern; C. A. Beckwith, SHERK 10:86–89; C. Brinton, "Romanticism," Encyclopedia of Philosophy 7:206–9; A. R. Caponigri, NCE 12:639–41; J. Engel, Creative Imagination: Enlightenment to Romanticism; J. Forstman, Romantic Triangle: Schleiermacher and Early German Romanticism; N. Frye, Romanticism Reconsidered; L. Furst, Romanticism in Perspective; N. Geisler, DCE 595; R. Harbison, Deliberate Regression; H. M. Jones, Revolution and Romanticism; W. T. Jones, Romantic Syndrome; A. O. Lovejoy, Essays in the History of Ideas; S. Prickett, Romanticism and Religion; R. J. Reilly, Romantic Religion; H. H. H. Remak, "West European Romanticism: Definition and Scope," in Comparative Literature: Method and Perspective, N. P. Stallknecht and H. Frenz, eds.; J. G. Robertson, Studies in the Genesis of Romantic Theory in the Eighteenth Century.

Rorty, Richard. See POSTMODERNISM.

Rowland, Daniel. See CALVINISTIC METHODISM.

Ruether, Rosemary Radford (b. 1936). A leading American feminist theologian. Since 1976 she has taught at Garrett-Evangelical Theological Seminary, where she is professor of Applied Theology. A prolific writer and compelling speaker, she has been the chief proponent of feminist theology and women-churches.

In tracing Ruether's career, one hits the high points in the development of feminist theology. Focusing on women in theological history led her to criticize past patriarchal exploitation of women. Because history writing was done by males, women are practically invisible in Christian tradition. Only by purging Christian history of sexism is it possible to recover the "lost memory" of women.

For Ruether the primary source of feminist faith cannot be the church, church tradition, or Scripture, but women's religious experience. More precisely, the ultimate norm lies in "the prophetic-liberating tradition of Scripture," of which Jesus is the historical model. On this basis "many aspects of the Bible are to be frankly set aside and rejected." Revelation is viewed as ongoing in women's experience. Theological method, therefore, involves the reconstruction of Christian faith based on this experience.

Ruether moved beyond the deconstruction of male-dominated theologies to the construction of the first feminist systematic theology, Sexism and God Talk (1983, 1993). It is chiefly the doctrine of God that needs transformation. Seeking to get beyond the traditional oppressive portrayal of God as male, she speaks of using female as well as male metaphors. Adapting Tillich's idea of God as the ground of being, she refers to God as the "primal Matrix" or "God/ess" and thereby emphasizes divine immanence.

Ruether offers the most profound feminist reinterpretation of Christology. She rejects traditional Christology, and (following Tillich's idea of Jesus as the New Being) presents Jesus as the liberator, the representative of the new egalitarian humanity. "Christ," she insists, "is not to be encapsulated 'once for all' in the historical Jesus. The Christian community continues Christ's identity."

Ruether has an ongoing interest in justice issues, particularly in Palestine and Central America, as evidenced by Beyond Occupation: Ameri- can, Jewish, Christian, and Palestinian Voices for Peace (1990). Most recently she has combined themes of recovering women's experience, justice, and the environment in Gaia and God (1994).

Evangelicals ought to share Ruether's concern for oppressed women and seek a greater affirmation of women in church life. They will criticize, among other things, her rejection of sola Scriptura, the place she assigns to women's experience in her theology, the loss of transcendence in her doctrine of God, and her rejection of the incarnational Christology.

R. A. PETERSON

See also FEMINISM, CHRISTIAN; FEMINISM, FEMINIST THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. R. R. Ruether, Liberation Theology: Human Hope Confronts Christian History and American Power; Radical Kingdom; R. R. Ruether, ed., Liberating Bond; New Woman/New Earth: Sexist Ideologies and Human Liberation; Religion and Sexism: Images of Women in Jewish and Christian Traditions; Women-Church: Theology and Practice of Feminist Liturgical Communities; Womenguides: Readings Toward a Feminist Theology; R. R. Ruether, ed. with E. McLaughlin, Women of Spirit: Female Leadership in the Jewish and Christian Traditions; On Being a Christian; R. R. Ruether, ed. with R. S. Keller, Women and Religion in America; W. M. Ramsay, Four Modern Prophets; M. H. Snyder, Christology of Rosemary Radford Ruether: A Critical Introduction.

Rule of Faith (Lat. regula fidei). An expression, first used in the theology of the church in the last quarter of the second century, which meant the sure doctrine of the Christian faith. Synonymous expressions were "canon of truth," "rule of truth," "the canon of the church," and "the ecclesiastical canon." In Irenaeus, who writes against the menace of Gnosticism, the appeal is often made to the tradition of the church, but this is not set over against Scripture. Rather, the "canon of truth" is the official church teaching that is in agreement with Scripture and is a summary of it. Instead of idle speculation, the church, "the pillar and foundation of the truth" (1 Tim. 3:15), imparts living doctrine that is both the "canon of truth" and teaching that is in complete harmony with Scripture from which it is drawn.

In Tertullian church doctrine is seen as stemming from the apostolic tradition that had been given by Christ. It is the "rule of faith," which, agreeing with Scripture, is a clear summary of that which Christians are to believe. It helps in the correct exegesis of Scripture and the discernment of its unity and consistency. Heresy shows a neglect of the rule of faith, and it can be overcome only within the true church where unity and discipline are honored. Whereas many have concluded that Tertullian saw regula fidei as church tradition rather than Scripture, J. N. D. Kelly is right in the claim that Tertullian's true position is subtler than that and similar to that of Irenaeus. Aware of the futility of arguing with heretics on the basis of Scripture alone, whose meaning they could twist, he appealed to the regula, which had been preserved intact in the church since the days of the apostles. This implied no denigration of Scripture, with which the church tradition agreed, but offered a clear, succinct statement about which there could be no debate. This rule of faith was employed in the baptismal formula and otherwise served to indicate what Christians believe.

Whereas a usage similar to that of Irenaeus and Tertullian is found in Hippolytus, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Novatian, and others in the early church, later usage came to include the whole body of official church teaching. This is the understanding of most Roman Catholic theologians today. The Reformers of the sixteenth century proclaimed Scripture alone to be the "only rule of faith and practice," a position into which they were driven when they repudiated beliefs and practices for which they found no warrant in the Bible.

M. E. OSTERHAVEN

Bibliography. J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines; M. E. Williams, NCE 12:706-7; F. M. Young, Making of Creeds; T. Zahn, SHERK 9:445-46.

Rural Dean. See CHURCH ORDERS.

Russell, Charles Taze. See JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES.

Rutherford, Joseph Franklin. See JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES.

Rutherford, Samuel (1600-1661). Born near Nisbet, Scotland, he earned his M.A. in 1621 from Edinburgh University and two years later was appointed professor of Humanity.

He became the pastor of Anwoth in 1627, where he served until deposed in 1636 for publishing Apology for Divine Grace, which espoused supralapsarian Calvinism. This put him in conflict with the Arminianism of church authorities, and he was exiled to Aberdeen.

From Aberdeen Rutherford wrote his famous Letters to former parishioners and friends at Anwoth. He returned to Anwoth in 1638, serving for eighteen months before being appointed professor of divinity at St. Andrews. In 1647 he was appointed principal of St. Mary's at St. Andrews, and later, rector of the university.

In 1643 Rutherford went to London as one of the four Scottish commissioners who served on the Westminster Assembly of Divines. Rutherford is believed to have been a major contributor of the Shorter Catechism. His magnum opus was Lex Rex, a work that argued for limitations of the concept of the Divine Right of Kings, maintaining that limitless sovereignty is the property of God alone. When the monarchy was restored under Charles II in 1660, copies of Lex Rex were ordered burned and Rutherford escaped prosecution for treason only because of his illness-related death in early 1661. Rutherford is best remembered today for his Letters, a classic work of Christian devotion that exalts Christ. Richard Baxter said of the Letters that except for the Bible, the world never had seen such a book.

Rutherford, Samuel

T. K. BEOUGHNER

Bibliography. A. Bonar, Letters of Samuel Rutherford with a Sketch of His Life; F. Cook, Samuel Rutherford and His Friends.

Ss

Sabaoth. See GOD, NAMES OF.

Sabbatarianism. The view which insists that one day of each week be reserved for religious observance as prescribed by the OT sabbath law. It is important to note the distinction between strict or literal sabbatarianism and semisabbatarianism.

Strict or literal sabbatarianism contends that God's directive concerning the OT sabbath law is natural, universal, and moral; consequently the sabbath requires humankind to abstain from all labor except those tasks necessary for the welfare of society. In this view the seventh day, the literal sabbath, is the only day on which the requirements of this law can be met. Historically, we see a trend toward sabbatarianism in the Eastern church during the fourth century and the Irish church of the sixth century when, interestingly, a dual recognition of both sabbath and Sunday was stressed. It was not until the Reformation, however, that we meet the quintessence of sabbatarianism. Luther opposed the doctrine, pointing out (in his "Letter against the Sabbatarians") the legalistic pitfalls inherent in the view. Calvin agreed in principle with Luther's stance. The Transylvanian unitarians adopted strict sabbath observance during the seventeenth century, later moving to a total acceptance of Judaism. The Seventh-day Baptists originated in 1631, bringing sabbatarianism to England and later to Rhode Island and New York. The most notable proponent of strict sabbatarianism at the present time is the Seventh-day Adventist Church; several smaller adventist groups hold the same or similar view. Adventists believe they have been raised for the express purpose of proclaiming that God requires all people to observe the sabbath. Their arguments for the universally binding character of the sabbath law are (1) it is part of the moral law, (2) it was given at the creation, and (3) it was not abrogated in the NT. Some Adventists see in Sunday observance a fulfillment of the prophecy (Rev. 14:9-12) which states that deluded mankind will be forced to accept the mark of the beast (Sunday observance) in order to survive during the days prior to Christ's second advent.

Semisabbatarianism holds a view essentially the same as strict sabbatarianism but transfers its demands from Saturday, the seventh day, to Sunday, the first day of the week. As early as the fourth and fifth centuries theologians in the Eastern church were teaching the practical identity of the Jewish sabbath and the Christian Sunday. Eusebius's interpretation of Psalm 91 (ca. 320) greatly influenced the ultimate transfer of sabbath assertions and prohibitions to the first day of the week. An ancient legend related in the so-called Apocalypse of Peter, and known to Augustine and Prudentius, significantly transfers to Sunday what the original legend said concerning the sabbath: those who suffer the pains of the lost in hell are, for the sake of Christ, permitted to rest from torment on Sunday, the first day of the week!

It was Albertus Magnus who first suggested a structured semisabbatarianism by dividing the sabbath command into (1) the moral command to observe a day of rest after six days of labor and (2) the ceremonial symbol that applied only to the Jews in a literal sense. Thomas Aquinas lifted this formulation to the status of official doctrine, a view later held by a large number of Reformed theologians as well. Semisabbatarianism reached its zenith in English Puritanism, later finding its way to the New World through the early colonists. Sunday restrictions and so-called blue laws in various states are a constant reminder of the influence of this view on the laws of our land. Organizations such as the Lord's Day Observance Society (est. 1831), and the Imperial Alliance for the Defense of Sunday (England) have sought to preserve the principles of semisabbatarianism, but with decreasing success since World War II.

F. R. HARM

See also ADVENTISM; LORD'S DAY; SABBATH.

Bibliography. R. D. Brackenridge, "Sabbath War of 1865-6," in RSCHS 16:1; P. Collinson, "Origins of English Sabbatarianism," in Studies in Church History; R. Cox, Literature of the Sabbath Question; C. H. Little, Disputed Doctrines; M. Luther, Letter to a Good Friend against the Sabbatarians; E. Morgan, Puritan Family; E. Plass, What Luther Says; J. H. Primus, Holy Time; W. Rordorf, Sunday; P. Schaff, Anglo-American Sabbath; W. Solberg, Redeem the Time: The Puritan Sabbath in Early America; K. Strand, ed., Sabbath in Scripture and History; A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology; W. Whitaker, Eighteenth Century Sunday; Sunday in Tudor and Stuart Times.

Sabbatarianism

Sabbath. The seventh day of the week in which God ceased from his work of creation and declared the day blessed and holy (Gen. 2:1–3). Through the episode of the manna (Exod. 16), the sacred nature of the day was stressed to the Israelites. It was to be “a sabbath of the Lord,” a day set apart for God and for rest. The Decalogue forbids work on the sabbath, both for the Israelites and for their servants and guests (Exod. 20:8–11). Deuteronomy 5:12–15 implies that there is a humanitarian motive in the sabbath concept. In God’s sight, no man or animal should be required to work seven days a week and to be enslaved as the Israelites were in Egypt. The sabbath is therefore a direct indication of God’s consecration of Israel, as well as of his creation.

Violating the sabbath was a serious offense, and the person who worked on the sabbath was to be “cut off from his people” (Exod. 31:14). During their wandering in the wilderness, the Israelites brought to trial a man found gathering wood on the sabbath. He was stoned to death according to the commandment of the Lord for profaning the sabbath (Num. 15:32–36). A fire was not to be kindled on the sabbath (Exod. 35:3), and admonitions to reverence the day are linked to reverence toward parents (Lev. 19:3) and reverence toward the Lord’s sanctuary (19:30; 26:2). The sabbath terminated a week of work and was to be a complete rest unto the Lord, a distinguishing mark of God’s choosing the Jewish people.

The sabbath was a joyous holy day, a day of spiritual refreshment and reverent worship. It seems to have been a popular day, an opportunity for man to imitate his Creator, to devote himself to contemplation and to community worship. Those who delighted in the Lord in this fashion were promised that they would “ride on the heights of the land” (Isa. 58:13–14). Even foreigners who kept from profaning the sabbath and held to God’s covenant were promised blessing and deep joy (56:6–8). Jewish tradition held that Isaiah declared the eventual universalization of the sabbath among all nations (note 66:23). Prophets such as Jeremiah and Ezekiel placed such stress on the importance of observing the sabbath that at times the fate of the Jewish people was directly linked in prophecy to attitudes toward the sabbath (note Jer. 17:19–27 and Ezek. 20:12–26).

Josephus explains that during the first Christian century there were public discourses on the sabbath in the Jewish community. Jesus observed the sabbath, not only worshiping but also teaching in the synagogue on that day of the week (Mark 6:2). The incidents regarding his disciples plucking ears of grain or his healing on the sabbath were not a digression from the sabbath law but were rather an indication that Jesus knew the content of the commandment very well. Not only his disciples but also the apostle Paul and the early Jewish Christians observed the sabbath.

Jewish tradition has maintained the aspects of Torah observance, community worship, and joyful family participation to the present day. The mother prepares a special meal and kindles the sabbath candles remembering the holy day. As she wafts the aura of the candles toward her and recites the blessing over the candles, she symbolizes the putting of her daily cares from her and acknowledges the historic sacredness of the hour. Two loaves of bread are placed on the dinner table and covered with a cloth to symbolize the double portion of manna given during the wilderness wandering. Guests are often invited to share in this sabbath joy, and special prayers and hymns are recited, led by the father of the household. The family worships at weekly sabbath services at the synagogue. A farewell service is observed in a spirit of sadness that the blessed day has passed. Jewish tradition has proposed that if every Jew kept the sabbath for two consecutive sabbaths, the Messiah would return.

The Bible also made provision for a sabbath year. During the seventh year the land was to lie fallow so that the land might rest, the needy might feed on the aftergrowth, and the animals might eat the surplus. God promised an abundant harvest the sixth year to carry through the sabbatical period. In addition, debts were to be cancelled during that year (note Exod. 23:10–11; Lev. 25:1–7, 18–22; Deut. 15:1–11). At the close of seven sabbatical cycles a year of jubilee was instituted. Land that had been sold was to be returned to its former owner, and there were other sabbatical year provisions. These provisions underscored the fact that ultimately God owned the land.

D. A. RAUSCH

See also LORD’S DAY; SABBATARIANISM.

Bibliography. N. E. Andreasen, Rest and Redemption; S. Bacchiocchi, Sabbath in the New Testament; N. A. Barack, History of the Sabbath; R. T. Beckwith and W. Stott, Christian Sunday; D. A. Carson, From Sabbath to Lord’s Day; S. Goldman, Guide to the Sabbath; A. J. Heschel, Sabbath; A. E. Millgram, Sabbath: The Day of Delight; G. F. Moore, Judaism in the First Centuries of the Christian Era.

Sabellianism. See MONARCHIANISM.

Sacrament. A religious rite or ceremony instituted or recognized by Jesus Christ. Baptism and the Lord's Supper were given a prominent place in the fellowship of the early church (Acts 2:41–42; 10:47; 20:7, 11), along with the proclamation (kerygma) and teaching (didachē). Both rites were regarded as means appointed by Jesus Christ to bring the members of the church into communion with his death and resurrection, and thus with himself through the Holy Spirit (Matt. 28:19–20; Acts 2:38; Rom. 6:3–5; 1 Cor. 11:23–27; Col. 2:11–12). They were linked together in our Lord's teaching (Mark 10:38–39) and in the mind of the church (1 Cor. 10:1–5) as having such significance. They were the visible enactment of the word proclaimed in the kerygma, and their significance must be understood as such.

The proclamation of the gospel in the NT was no mere recital of the events of the life, death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus, the Son of God. It was the representation of these events to the hearers in the power of the Spirit so that through such proclamation they could become related to these events in a living way through faith. In the proclamation of the gospel the once-for-all event continued to be effective for salvation (1 Cor. 1:21; 2 Cor. 5:18–19). The word of the kerygma gave men fellowship in the mystery of the kingdom of God brought near in Jesus (Mark 4:11), and the preacher in fulfilling his task was the steward of this mystery (1 Cor. 4:1; Eph. 3:8–9; Col. 1:25). The miracles or signs accompanying the proclamation in the early church were the visible aspect of the living power the word derived from its relation to the mystery of the kingdom of God.

It was inevitable, therefore, that baptism and the Lord's Supper, the other visible counterparts of the kerygma, should also come to be regarded as giving fellowship in the same mysterion of the Word made flesh (1 Tim. 3:16), and should be interpreted as themselves partaking in the mystery of the relationship between Christ and his church (Eph. 5:32).

The Greek word mysterion was later often given the Latin translation sacramentum, and the rites themselves came to be spoken of as sacramenta. The word sacramentum meant both "a thing set apart as sacred" and "a military oath of obedience administered by the commander." The use of this word for baptism and the Lord's Supper affected the thought about these rites, and they tended to be regarded as conveying grace in themselves, rather than as relating men through faith to Christ.

A sacrament came later to be defined (following Augustine) as a "visible word" or an "outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace."

The similarity between the form of the sacrament and the hidden gift tended to be stressed. Five lesser sacraments became traditional in the church: confirmation, penance, extreme unction, holy orders, and matrimony. But the church had always a special place for baptism and the Lord's Supper as the chief mysteries, and the Reformers regarded these as the only two that had the authority of our Lord himself, and therefore as the only true sacraments.

Since God in the OT also used visible signs along with the word, these were also regarded as having sacramental significance. Among the OT sacraments the rites of circumcision and the Passover were stressed as being the OT counterparts of baptism (Col. 2:11–12) and the Lord's Supper (1 Cor. 5:7).

R. S. WALLACE

See also BAPTISM, BELIEVERS'; BAPTISM, INFANT; BAPTISM, MODES OF; BAPTISMAL REGENERATION; EX OPERE OPERATO; LORD'S SUPPER.

Bibliography. D. M. Baillie, Theology of the Sacraments; C. K. Barrett, Church Ministry and Sacraments in the New Testament; G. C. Berkouwer, Sacraments; G. Bornkamm, TDNT 4:826–27; R. Bruce, Sermons upon the Sacraments; J. Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion; N. Clark, Approach to the Theology of the Sacraments; J. Martos, Doors to Me Sacred; J. I. Packer, ed., Eucharistic Sacrifice; O. C. Quick, Christian Sacraments; T. F. Torrance, "Eschatology and the Eucharist," in Intercommunion.

Sacrifice. See ATONEMENT; OFFERINGS AND SACRIFICES IN BIBLE TIMES.

Sadducees. An important Jewish group that flourished in Palestine from the late second century B.C. to the late first century A.D.

Sources. The only explicit information about the Sadducees is found in three bodies of ancient literature: the writings of Flavius Josephus—Jewish War (written ca. A.D. 75), Antiquities of the Jews (ca. A.D. 94), and Life (ca. A.D. 101); the NT, particularly the Synoptic Gospels and Acts (ca. A.D. 65–90; e.g., Matt. 3:7; 16:1–12; 22:23–24; Mark 12:18–27; Luke 20:27–38; Acts 5:17; 23:6–10); and the rabbinic compilations (ca. A.D. 200 and later; e.g., Mishnah: Ber. 9:5; Erub. 6:2; Par. 3:3, 7; Nidd. 4:2; Yad. 4:6–8). Two observations about these sources should be made. First, with the possible exception of Josephus's War, all these sources are decidedly hostile toward the Sadducees. Second, many of the rabbinic references, especially those found in the Talmud and later works, may have other groups in view. In recent years some scholars have sought to link the Qumran community with early Sadducees, thus transforming some of the Dead Sea Scrolls into primary sources for Sadducean beliefs and history. This linkage has not been widely accepted, but the debates about it have shed light on the historical development of Jewish halakah (legal tradition). References to the Sadducees may also be scattered throughout other literature of early Judaism (e.g., the Pseudepigrapha), but no consensus has been reached on what these might be. Thus, our knowledge of the Sadducees is perforce fragmentary and one-sided.

Sadducees

Name and Nature. Historically, the question of the derivation and meaning of the name “Sadducees” has been closely tied to the issue of the nature of the group. Ever since Abraham Geiger argued that the Sadducees were the priestly aristocracy, the majority of scholars have held that their name was derived from “Zadok,” the name of the high priest during Solomon’s reign (1 Kings 2:35; cf. Ezek. 44:15; 48:11). Thus the Sadducees are thought to have been the party of the Zadokite priestly elite. There are problems with this construct, however. The “Zadok” etymology does not explain the doubling of the “d.” Moreover, when the Sadducees appeared on the scene, the ruling priests were Hasmoneans, not Zadokites. It is unlikely that the Hasmoneans would have allied themselves with a rival priestly group whose very name called into question the legitimacy of the Hasmonean high priesthood.

More recently, many scholars have argued that the Sadducees were essentially a loose confederation of wealthy and powerful men (this would include members of the priestly aristocracy) who took a secular-pragmatic, rather than a religious-ideological, stance with regard to the nation and its laws. Along with this view, new etymologies for “Sadducees” have been offered. T. W. Manson proposed that behind the name stood the Greek title syndikoi, meaning “fiscal officials.” R. North suggested that the Sadducees saw themselves as administrators of justice and that their name was derived from an otherwise unattested adjective šaddûq (“just”). These and other etymologies solve some problems, but raise new ones. Moreover, given the anti-Sadducean stance of the sources that preserve the name “Sadducees,” we cannot even be sure whether it was an honorific self-designation or a negative label applied by detractors. Indeed, the term may have admitted of both interpretations. Clearly, then, on the name and nature of the Sadducees, certainty eludes us.

History. Equally uncertain are the details of Sadducean history. The meager evidence suggests the following tentative outline. The Sadducees solidified as a group soon after the Maccabean revolt (167–160 B.C.). They were heirs to a persistent tendency within the Jewish aristocracy to see Judaism as a temple-centered religion rather than a law-centered way of life. Because they supported the Hasmonean policy of military and economic expansion, they gradually came to exercise tremendous influence in John Hyrcanus’s court (134–104 B.C.). Their influence predominated until the end of Alexander Jannaeus’s reign (76 B.C.). Under Queen Alexandra (76–67 B.C.) the Sadducees lost their power, and their numbers were greatly reduced. They fared little better under Herod the Great (37–4 B.C.), who deeply mistrusted the native Jewish aristocracy. With the imposition of direct Roman rule (A.D. 6), Sadducean fortunes revived. Between A.D. 6 and 66 the Sadducees not only became a major power within the Sanhedrin, but, for many years, they were able to control the high priesthood as well. The revolt of 66–70 spelled the end of Sadducean influence. Although they had sought to forestall the revolt, the Romans had no use for a failed aristocracy. With the destruction of the temple and the dissolution of the nation, the Sadducees gradually faded from history.

Beliefs. The Sadducees are said to have rejected all Jewish observances not explicitly taught in the pentateuchal law. In their legal debates, the Sadducees consistently pushed for a strict and narrow application of the law. They repudiated the notions of resurrection and rewards and punishments after death. According to Josephus, they even denied the immortality of the soul. The Sadducees tended to disassociate God from human affairs. For this reason, they maintained that human choices and actions were totally free—unrestrained by divine interference. Consistent with this emphasis on human autonomy, the Sadducees denied the existence of angels and preterhuman spirits.

Most scholars have held that these beliefs mark off the Sadducees as conservatives who stubbornly resisted the expansive and ameliorating innovations of the Pharisees and others. It should be noted, on the other hand, that these beliefs could just as easily describe Hellenized aristocrats who wanted to minimize as much as possible the claims of their ancestral religion on their daily lives. In point of fact, these two characterizations are not mutually exclusive.

Sadducees and the New Testament. Unlike the Pharisees, the Sadducees are consistently painted in a bad light by the NT writers. Their opposition to Jesus and the early church is presented as monolithic and constant. Reasons for the hostility are not hard to imagine. To the Sadducees, Jesus and his early followers would have appeared as destabilizing forces in the delicate balance between limited Jewish freedom and totalitarian Roman rule. But just as significantly, the Sadducees could not have had anything but contempt for a movement that proclaimed the present reality of the resurrection and the unconditional necessity of repentance. S. TAYLOR

See also ESSENES; PHARISEES.

Bibliography. J. M. Baumgarten, “Pharisaic-Sadducean Controversies about Purity and the Qumran Texts," JJS 31:157–70; W. W. Buehler, Pre-Herodian Civil War and Social Debate; Josephus, Antiquities of the Jews; Jewish War; Life; T. W. Manson, "Sadducees and Pharisees: The Origin and Significance of the Names," BJRL 22:144–59; H. D. Mantel, "Sadducees and the Pharisees," in World History of the Jewish People 8:99–123; R. North, "The Qumran Sadducees," CBQ 17:164–88.

Saint, Saintliness. In the OT, the rendering of hāsīd ("pious, godly") and of qādōš ("holy"). The basic idea in qādōš is separation unto God, whereas hāsīd stresses godliness grounded on the reception of God's mercy. The NT word is hagios ("holy"). It is regularly used in the LXX to render qādōš.

From Psalms 85:8, where the saints seem to be synonymous with the people of God, one concludes that the emphasis does not fall on character to an appreciable degree (for not all were godly) but on divine choice and the bestowal of God's favor. In other passages the godly portion of the nation is often singled out by the term. But if the ethical connotation were paramount, the expectation would be that the word should occur regularly in the absolute form—the saints. Yet, ever and again, we read of "thy saints" or "the saints of the Most High" or, as in the NT, of saints in Christ Jesus.

Saints acquire their status by divine call (Rom. 1:7). Doubtless there is latent in the use of this term the idea that relationship to God involves conformity to his will and character (Eph. 5:3). In this way the term becomes linked with the thought of faithfulness (Eph. 1:1; Col. 1:2 κϒν).

The next stage of development appears in the book of Revelation, where separation unto the Lord, which characterizes saints, leads to Satan-inspired persecution from the world (Rev. 13:7; 14:12) and even to martyrdom (16:6; 17:6). Here are the seeds for the Roman Catholic concept of saint as a peculiarly holy or self-sacrificing person who is worthy of veneration.

In the NT, however, saint is applied to all believers. It is a synonym for Christian brother (Col. 1:2 κϒν). Except for Philippians 4:21, it is not used in the singular, and even there it reflects the corporate idea—"every saint." The saints are the church (1 Cor. 1:2 κϒν). In Ephesians, where there is strong emphasis on the unity of the church, "all the saints" becomes almost a refrain (1:15; 3:8 [NIV "God's people"], 18; 6:18). The Apostles' Creed enshrines this significance of the word in the statement, "I believe . . . in the communion of saints."

E. F. HARRISON

See also CANONIZATION; GODLINESS.

Bibliography. M. Perham, Communion of the Saints.

Sainthood. See CANONIZATION.

Saints, Invocation of. See INVOCATION OF SAINTS.

Saints, Veneration of. See VENERATION OF SAINTS.

Salvation. The saving of man from the power and effects of sin.

The Biblical Idea. The common Hebrew words for salvation, deriving ultimately from a root word meaning width, spaciousness, freedom from constraint, hence deliverance, obviously lend themselves to broad development in application. Literally, they cover salvation from any danger, distress, enemies, from bondage in Egypt (Exod. 14:13; 15:2), exile in Babylon (Isa. 46:13; 52:10–11), adversaries (Ps. 106:19), defeat (Deut. 20:4), or oppression (Judg. 3:31; etc.). Metaphorically, in salvation from social decay (Hos. 1:7) and from want, the meaning approaches moral and personal welfare ("prosperity"; Job 30:15); in Psalms 28:9, religious blessing in general. "The Lord is . . . my salvation" is the heart of OT testimony, always with an overtone of undeserved mercy. Later Judaism anticipated a messianic deliverance, which might include political, national, or religious elements (Ps. Sol. 10:9; T. Benj. 9:10; cf. Luke 1:69, 71, 77).

Sōtēria therefore gathered a rich connotation from the LXX to carry into the NT. There, too, it means deliverance, preservation, from any danger (Acts 7:25; 27:31; Heb. 11:7). The root words here, however, add the notion of wholeness, soundness, and health, giving "salvation" a medical connotation—salvation from affliction, disease, demon possession, or death (Mark 5:34; James 5:15; etc.). Sometimes this meaning is literal; peace, joy, praise, and faith are so interwoven with healing as to give "saved" a religious significance also. Jesus' self-description as "physician" (Mark 2:17) and the illustrative value of the healing miracles in defining his mission show how readily physical and spiritual healing unite in "salvation" (Luke 4:18–19).

Much of the most frequent use of sōtēria and derivatives is for deliverance, preservation from all spiritual dangers, the bestowal of all religious blessings. Its alternative is destruction (Phil. 1:28), death (2 Cor. 7:10), divine wrath (1 Thess. 5:9); it is available to all (Titus 2:11), shared (Jude 3), eternal (Heb. 5:9). It is ascribed to Christ alone (Luke 19:10; Acts 4:12), "the pioneer of salvation," and especially to his death (Rom. 5:9–10; Heb. 2:10). In that sense salvation was "from the Jews" (John 4:22), though for Gentiles too (Rom. 11:11). It is proclaimed (taught) as a way of thought and life (Acts 13:26; 16:17; Eph. 1:13), to be received from God's favor by faith alone—a confessed confidence and trust (Acts 16:30–31; Eph. 2:8) focused upon the resurrection and lordship of Christ (Rom. 10:9), “calling” upon him (Acts 2:21; Rom. 10:13). Once received, salvation must not be “neglected” but “held fast,” “grown up to,” humbly “worked out” (1 Cor. 15:2; Phil. 2:12; Heb. 2:3; 1 Pet. 2:2). Some are only narrowly saved in the end (1 Cor. 3:15; 1 Pet. 4:18).

Salvation

The Comprehensiveness of Salvation. The comprehensiveness of salvation may be shown in the following way:

1. By what we are saved from. This includes sin and death; guilt and estrangement; ignorance of truth; bondage to habit and vice; fear of demons, of death, of life, of God, of hell; despair of self; alienation from others; pressures of the world; a meaningless life. Paul’s own testimony is almost wholly positive: salvation has brought him peace with God, access to God’s favor and presence, hope of regaining the glory intended for men, endurance in suffering, steadfast character, an optimistic mind, inner motivations of divine love and power of the Spirit, ongoing experience of the risen Christ within his soul, and sustaining joy in God (Rom. 5:1–11). Salvation extends also to society, aiming at realizing the kingdom of God; to nature, ending its bondage to futility (Rom. 8:19–20); and to the universe, attaining final reconciliation of a fragmented cosmos (Eph. 1:10; Col. 1:20).

2. By noting that salvation is past (Rom. 8:24; Eph. 2:5, 8; Titus 3:5–8); present (1 Cor. 1:18; 15:2; 2 Cor. 2:15; 1 Pet. 1:9; 3:21); and future (Rom. 5:9–10; 13:11; 1 Cor. 5:5; Phil. 1:5–6; 2:12; 1 Thess. 5:8; Heb. 1:14; 9:28; 1 Pet. 2:2). That is, salvation includes that which is given, freely and finally, by God’s grace (forgiveness—called in one epistle justification; friendship or reconciliation; atonement, sonship, and new birth); that which is continually imparted (sanctification—growing emancipation from all evil, growing enrichment in all good—the enjoyment of eternal life, experience of the Spirit’s power, liberty, joy, advancing maturity in conformity to Christ); and that still to be attained (redemption of the body, perfect Christlikeness, final glory).

3. By distinguishing salvation’s various aspects: religious (acceptance with God, forgiveness, reconciliation, sonship, reception of the Spirit, immortality); emotional (strong assurance, peace, courage, hopefulness, joy); practical (prayer, guidance, discipline, dedication, service); ethical (new moral dynamic for new moral aims, freedom, victory); personal (new thoughts, convictions, horizons, motives, satisfactions, self-fulfillment); social (new sense of community with Christians, of compassion toward all, overriding impulse to love as Jesus has loved).

Salvation in the New Testament. Distinctive approaches underline the richness of the concept. Jesus presupposed the universal sin and need of men, originating in rebelliousness (Matt. 7:23; 13:41; 24:12, lit. “lawlessness”; 21:28–29), and causing “sickness” of soul (Mark 2:17), which lies deep within personality, defiling from within (Matt. 7:15–16; 12:35; cf. 5:21–22, 27–28; 15:19–20; 23:25), and leaving men in debt to God for unpaid duty (6:12; 18:23–24). He therefore called all to repentance (Mark 1:15; Luke 5:32; 13:3, 5; 15:10)—to a change of outlook and lifestyle that enthrones God (Luke 8:2; 19:9 [John 8:11]; Matt. 9:9; etc.)—urged daily prayer for forgiveness, himself offered forgiveness (Mark 2:5), and commended humble penitence as the only acceptable basis upon which to approach God (Luke 18:9–10).

In Jesus’ openness and friendship toward sinners, the loving welcome of God found perfect expression. Nothing was needed to win back God’s favor. It waited eagerly for man’s return (Luke 15:11–24). The one indispensable preliminary was the change in man from rebelliousness to childlike trust and willingness to obey. That shown, there followed life under God’s rule, described as feasting, marriage, wine, finding treasure, joy, peace, all the freedom and privilege of sonship within the divine family in the Father’s world.

Peter also called to repentance (Acts 2:38), promising forgiveness and the Spirit to whoever called upon the Lord. Salvation was especially from past misdeeds and from conformity to a perverse generation (vv. 23–40); and with a purpose, inheritance, and glory still to be revealed (1 Pet. 1:3–5; etc.).

In John’s thought salvation is from death and judgment. He restates its meaning in terms of life, rich and eternal (thirty-six times in his Gospel, thirteen in 1 John), God’s gift in and with Christ, beginning in total renewal (“new birth”); illumined by truth (“knowledge,” “light”); and experienced as love (John 3:5–16; 5:24; 12:25; 1 John 4:7–11; 5:11).

Paul saw his own failure to attain legal righteousness reflected in all men and due to the overmastering power (“rule”) of sin, which brought with it death. Salvation is therefore, first, acquittal, despite just condemnation, on the ground of Christ’s expiation of sin (Rom. 3:21–22); and, second, deliverance by the invasive power of the Spirit of holiness, the Spirit of the risen Christ. The faith which accepts and assents to Christ’s death on our behalf also unites us to him so closely that with him we die to sin and rise to new life (Rom. 6:1–12). The results are freedom from sin’s power (vv. 7, 18; 8:2); and exultation in the power of the indwelling Spirit and assurance of sonship (ch. 8); and increasing conformity to Christ. By the same process death is overcome, and believers are prepared for life everlasting (6:13, 22–23; 8:11).

Further Development. It is evident, even from this brief outline, that need would arise for endless analysis, comparison, systemization, and re-statement in contemporary terms of all that salvation means to Christian faith. This is the task of soteriology, the doctrine of sōtēria—salvation. How far, for example, did the mystery religions of the first century influence the Christian hope derived from Judaism? They offered salvation, as “all the blessings it is possible to desire,” and above all else, immortality.

Before becoming absorbed in Christology, patristic reflection probed especially the meaning of the ransom Christ has paid for man’s salvation and freedom. Later, the Eastern church traced the effect of Adam’s fall chiefly in man’s mortality, and saw salvation as especially the gift of eternal life through the risen Christ. The Western church traced the effect of Adam’s fall chiefly in the inherited guilt (Ambrose) and corruption (Augustine) of the race, and saw salvation as especially the gift of grace through Christ’s death. Divine grace alone could cancel guilt and deliver from corruption.

Anselm and Abelard explored further the relation of man’s salvation to the cross of Jesus as satisfaction for sin, or the redeeming example of love; Luther, its relation to man’s receiving faith; Calvin, its relation to God’s sovereign will. Roman Catholic thought has emphasized the objective sphere of salvation within a sacramental church; and Protestantism, the subjective experience of salvation within the individual soul. Modern reflection tends to concentrate on the psychological process and ethical results of salvation, emphasizing the need to “save” society.

R. E. O. WHITE

See also SAVIOR.

Bibliography. E. Kevan, Salvation; H. R. Mackintosh, Christian Experience of Forgiveness; L. H. Marshall, Challenge of New Testament Ethics; U. Simon, Theology of Salvation; V. Taylor, Forgiveness and Reconciliation.

Salvation Army, The. An international evangelistic body run on military lines. It originated from the work of William and Catherine Booth in London in 1865 and came to be known as “The Christian Mission.” The Booths had not set out to found a new group but to send converts from their missions into the churches. When converts would not go where they were sent, and often were not wanted when they did go, Booth saw the value of using those saved to save others from the poorer classes. Shunned by the establishment and roughly handled by jeering mobs, which vandalized their property while police and magistrates offered little protection, the home missionaries saw hundreds of their members jailed for preaching in the open air. But they went into places the church never knew existed, seeking the castaways, providing homes, food, employment, and medical care, reconciling families, and exposing vice and appalling social conditions no other agency would handle. In 1882 eminent scholar J. B. Lightfoot acknowledged that The Salvation Army (its new title from 1878) had recalled the church to a lost ideal: “the universal compulsion of the souls of men.”

Gradually a whole network of social and regenerative agencies spread throughout Britain and into the USA (1880), France and Australia (1881), Canada and India (1882), New Zealand and South Africa (1880). Countries were to be evangelized by their own nationals. Very early the Army stopped observing the church sacraments and stressed rather “the experience which these symbols represented.” Every Army funeral was to be regarded as an evangelistic opportunity.

The Army is characterized also by the equal responsibility of women with men, outreach through sales of the weekly War Cry, public testimony indoors and out, concern for holy living, bans on alcohol and tobacco, and its brass bands. The Salvation Army is estimated to have nearly five million members worldwide. J. D. DOUGLAS

See also BOOTH, CATHERINE; BOOTH, WILLIAM.

Bibliography. B. Booth, These Fifty Years; C. B. Booth, Bramwell Booth; C. Carpenter, Some Notable Officers of the Salvation Army; S. Chesham, Born to Battle: The Salvation Army in America; L. Fellows, Gentle War; E. H. McKinley, Marching to Glory; R. Sandall, A. Wiggins, and F. Coutts, History of the Salvation Army; W. A. Wisbey, Soldiers without Swords.

Salvation History. See HEILSGESCHICHTE.

Sanctification. To make holy. The Hebrew (qdš) and Greek (hagias-) roots represented in KJV by “sanctify, holy, hallow,” and varied in RSV by “consecrate, dedicate,” are applied to any person, place, occasion, or object “set apart” from common, secular use as devoted to some divine power. Isaiah 65:5 and 66:17 show heathen, and Genesis 38:21 (“cult prostitute”) immoral, applications of the concept “sacred to deity.” With advancing understanding of the intrinsic purity of Yahweh, a twofold development followed. (1) Persons and things devoted to his use must be ritually clean, not merely set apart by taboo, decree, or tribal caste: hence the lustrations, sacrifices, exclusion of the maimed, and laws of “uncleanness,” prescribed to ensure sanctity in whatever approaches the shine. (2) The “fitness” required becomes increasingly moral. Leviticus 17–26 demands, “You shall be holy to me, for I the Lord am holy and have separated you from the peoples, that you should be mine.” “You are to be holy to me because I, the LORD, am holy” (20:26; 19:2; 1 Pet. 1:15–16); the meaning of “holiness” is then worked out in philanthropy, love for God, clean living, compassion, commercial honesty, and love.

Thus God is holy; “separate” from nature, other gods, and sinners; unapproachable except by mediation and sacrifice (Isa. 6:3–5). Men and women “sanctify” God by obeying his commands (Lev. 22:32; Isa. 8:13; 1 Pet. 3:15). Israel is inherently holy, separated by God from “the peoples” to be his own. Yet Israel must become holy, by obedience, fit for the privilege allotted her.

Sanctification

The Nature of Sanctification. Status conferred. These nuances persist. Jesus prays that God’s name be “hallowed”; God “sanctifies” the Son, the son “sanctifies” himself, “setting apart” to special tasks (John 10:36; 17:19). Christians are set apart for God’s use: “sanctified . . . saints” (1 Cor. 1:2 rsv) indicates status, not character; so “chosen . . . destined . . . sanctified” . . . (1 Pet. 1:1–2 rsv). This is usually the meaning in Hebrews: “We have been sanctified . . . are sanctified” (timelessly), not by moral transformation, but by the sacrifice of Christ “once for all” (10:10, 29; 2:11; 9:13–14; 10:14; 13:12). The author sees men formerly “standing outside the Temple defiled and banned,” now admitted, accepted, their sins expiated, themselves set apart for divine service, all by the sacrifice and intercession of their High Priest—like Israel, already sanctified. So 1 Corinthians 6:11, recalling conversion. Christ is our sanctification (1:30 rsv), and the church is sanctified (Eph. 5:25–26 rsv).

Process Pursued. Yet even in Hebrews the meaning “moral fitness” emerges. Hebrews 12:14 urges us to strive for holiness, or sanctity. This is the most common understanding of sanctification, the growth in holiness that should follow conversion (Eph. 1:4; Phil. 3:12). So Paul prays that the Thessalonians be sanctified wholly—spirit, soul, and body being kept sound and blameless—as something still to be accomplished. The first letter says sanctification is the will of God for them in the special matter of sexual chastity (1 Thess. 4:3–4). Similarly, the Romans are exhorted to “present [their] bodies . . . holy” in their worship (12:1); and in 1 Corinthians 6:13–14 the body of the Christian must be kept from immorality because every Christian is a sacred (“sanctified”) person, belonging to Christ.

Doubtless the moral tone of first-century society necessitated this emphasis. “Let us purify ourselves from everything that contaminates body and spirit, perfecting holiness” (2 Cor. 7:1). One motive urged, beside personal sacredness, is spiritual athletics, with metaphors drawn from the widespread games (1 Cor. 9:24–25; Phil. 3:13–14; etc.), aiming at fitness for service. Another is, to be worthy of God, our calling, the Lord, the gospel, the kingdom (Eph. 4:1; Phil. 1:27; Col. 1:10; 1 Thess. 2:12; 2 Thess. 1:5). Beside these motives, Paul stresses positive consecration of the personality so sanctified, in active service and love, with the total dedication of a slave, sacrifice, and man in love.

The addition of “and spirit” in 2 Corinthians 7:1, the transformed “mind” (Rom. 12:1–2) set on things above and filled with all things holy and of good report (Phil. 4:8–9; cf. 2:5; 1 Cor. 2:16), shows that Paul did not think of holiness only in physical terms.

Everything is to be sanctified (1 Tim. 4:4–5). Holiness represents purity before God, as righteousness represents purity before the law, blameless purity before the world (Phil. 2:14–15; Col. 1:22); sanctification includes all three (1 Thess. 2:10). Here sanctification broadens into the total personal ethic that some (e.g., situationists) claim is absent from Christianity, and becomes a technical name for the process of development into which conversion is the entrance, issuing in conformity to Christ (Rom. 8:29–30; 2 Cor. 3:18; 1 John 3:1–3).

Theology and Sanctification. Justification. An exclusively objective view of the work of Christ tends to regard sanctification as either an addendum to justification or merely evidence of justifying faith. Yet justification and sanctification are not separate in time (1 Cor. 6:11), for God’s justifying act sets the sinner apart for service, and not separable in experience, but only in thought. Paul’s gospel of justification by faith was the moral dynamic of salvation (Rom. 1:16); forgiveness itself has moral force, creating the will to goodness in the forgiven.

To those who wondered whether men counted righteous on the ground of faith might go on sinning with impunity, Paul retorted that the faith expressed in faith-baptism so unites the convert to Christ that he dies with Christ to sin, is buried with Christ to all that belongs to his past life, and rises with Christ to new life in which sin’s reign is broken. That new self is yielded to the service of righteousness and of God in a surrender that issues in sanctification (Rom. 6:1–11, 19–22). Sanctification is not merely the completion (correlate or implicate) of justification; it is justifying faith at work. In the faith counted for righteousness, actual righteousness is born. As though to guard against justification without sanctification, John says, “Little children, let no one deceive you. He who does right is righteous” (1 John 3:7).

The two experiences must not be identified. In justification, God at the beginning of Christian life declares us acquitted. In sanctification, God accomplishes his will in us as Christian life proceeds. Sanctification never replaces justification. Scholars argue whether Luther taught that “making sinners righteous” was the real ground of justification, as faith led on to good works, penance, saintliness-begun. Not so: Luther’s ground remains faith to the end. We are “always being justified, more and more, always by faith.” But the faith that justifies, by its very nature as union with Christ in his dying and risen life, sets in motion the sanctifying energies of grace.

The Spirit. Ninety-one times in the NT the Spirit is called “holy,” and the implied contrast with the ubiquitous evil spirits that work corruption and death must never be overlooked. “Spirit of Jesus,” “Spirit of Christ,” designate quality, not source. As, in thought of the Spirit, emphasis moved from spectacular gifts for service to inward equipment for Christian living, so the place of the Spirit in sanctification became central. Constantly, sanctification is said to be of the Spirit: Romans 15:16; 1 Corinthians 6:11; Ephesians 4:30; 1 Thessalonians 4:7–8; 2 Thessalonians 2:13; 1 Peter 1:2.

Sanctification is not primarily negative in the NT, “keeping oneself unspotted,” not mainly self-discipline. It is chiefly the outflow of an overflowing life within the soul, the “fruit” of the Spirit in all manner of Christian graces (Gal. 5:22–23), summed up as “sanctification” (Rom. 6:22 lit.). Justification—the privileged status of acceptance—is achieved through the cross; sanctification—the ongoing process of conformity to Christ—is achieved by the Spirit, but not as sudden miraculous gift: the NT knows nothing of any shortcut to that ideal.

Sinless Perfection. How far does sanctification go? References to “perfection” (teleiōtēs, Col. 3:14); the call to “perfecting holiness” (2 Cor. 7:1); misunderstanding of “sanctification” in Hebrews; assurances like “our old self was crucified . . . that the sinful body might be destroyed,” “no longer in bondage to sin,” “sin will have no dominion over you,” “set free from sin . . . slaves of righteousness,” “no one who abides in him sins,” “anyone born of God does not sin” and “he cannot sin”—such thoughts have ever kept alive the dream of sinlessness in this life. Some patristic expressions (Justin, Irenaeus, Origen) have a similar ring, though they scarcely go beyond asserting the obligation not to sin. Augustine and Aquinas sought perfection in the vision of God, and certain evangelical leaders, such as Fénelon, Zinzendorf, or Wesley, stressed perfection as fullness of love, faith, or holiness, respectively.

To dilute the scriptural challenge seems disloyal to the absolute Christian standard, which is certainly not abated in the NT. Yet it must be said that the root telei- does not mean “sinless,” “incapable of sinning,” but “fulfilling its appointed end, complete, mature” (even “all-inclusively complete,” Matt. 5:48). Such all-roundness and maturity are clearly part of the Christian’s goal. Paul’s denial that he is already “perfect,” and his exhortations to ongoing sanctification, show that he does not think a final, completed sanctification can be claimed in this life. Though the Christian who has died with Christ is freed from the bondage of sin, and need not, ought not, and at his best does not sin, yet he must continually reaffirm his death with Christ and his yielding to God (Rom. 6:11, 13, 16).

John’s warning that “if we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us,” and his insistence on the continual forgiveness and advocacy of Christ available for all Christians (1 John 1:7–2:2), show that he too does not think the Christian sinless. That is also implied in 3:3–10, where John details some fourteen reasons that the Christian ought not to continue to practice sin, as certain Gnostics claimed that the wise man may.

So long as he is “in this body,” the Christian continues to be tempted, continues sometimes to fall, growing more sensitive to sin as he lives nearer to God. But he will continue to repent, and to seek forgiveness, never acquiescing, never making excuses, never surrendering, but ever desiring to be further changed into Christ’s image, stage by stage, as by the Lord, the Spirit.

Historical Considerations. So rich a theme must have yielded a variety of insights. In the apostolic church, the essence of sanctification was a Christlike purity; in the patristic church, withdrawal from the contaminations of society. This hardened, in the medieval church, into asceticism (a dualistic misapplication of Paul’s athleticism). This involved a double standard: “sanctity” and “saintliness” came to be applied only to the “religious” person (priest, monk), whereas a lower attainment, compromising with the world, was tolerated in the “ordinary,” “secular,” or “lay” Christian. Luther sought to annul this double standard, making sanctification a matter of inward attitude toward all the affairs of the outside world; he made much, in his expositions, of the transformation in the life of the believer by the work of the Spirit.

Calvin’s insistence upon the divine sovereignty, and upon self-discipline, made sanctification a question of ever more complete obedience to the Decalogue as the core of biblical ethics. The Greek Orthodox Church preserved the ascetic view of sanctification as self-denial, nourished by the church and sacraments. The Counter-Reformation, especially in Spain, saw the secret of sanctification as disciplined prayer; while the Puritans sought the divine will, personally revealed as “leadings of the Spirit,” and the power to fulfill it, within the recesses of the devout soul. Jonathan Edwards stressed the necessity of grace in sanctification, “infusing” the habits of virtue.

John Wesley, and Methodism after him, laid great emphasis upon complete sanctification, and often on the necessity that Christians seek perfection. Emil Brunner saw faith as essentially active obedience to the divine command, so identifying faith with works in individual sanctification. For most modern Christians, sanctification—if considered at all—is reduced to “the distinctive life-style of the committed soul,” a true enough description, but a somewhat thin substitute for the glorious experience of the NT.

R. E. O. WHITE

Bibliography. G. C. Berkouwer, Faith and Sanctification; D. Bloesch, Essentials of Evangelical Theology; L. Bouyer, Spirituality of the Middle Ages; Spirituality of the New Testament and the Fathers; L. Bouyer et al., Orthodox Spirituality and Protestant and Anglican Spirituality; R. N. Flew, Idea of Perfection in Christian Theology; P. T. Forsyth, Christian Perfection; K. Grider, Entire Sanctification; S. Neill, Christian Holiness; J. C. Ryle, Holiness; J. S. Stewart, Man in Christ; V. Taylor, Forgiveness and Reconciliation; P. Toon, Justification and Sanctification.

Sardica, Council of (343–344). The council called by the emperors Constans and Constantius, as well as Pope Julius I, to effect a settlement of the Arian controversy. With various rationalizations and reservations, the Arians and semi-Arians had professed an acceptance of the Nicene Creed and thereby attained to positions of ecclesiastical prominence. The Arian party, led by Eusebius of Nicomedia, succeeded in excommunicating and existing Athanasius for a second time in 341. Athanasius fled to the West, where he developed a very sizable following. Thus the Eastern prelates inclined toward an Arian view, the Western toward that of Athanasius.

The site of Sardica (modern Sofia in Bulgaria) was chosen as midway geographically between East and West. The Eastern bishops, however, incensed at the arrival of Athanasius and other deposed bishops, withdrew to Philippopolis, where they condemned Athanasius and produced a statement that carefully avoided a declaration of Christ as being of one substance with the Father. The Western bishops, on the other hand, affirmed Athanasius and issued a manifesto strengthening the Nicene position, especially with respect to Christ as truly God, partaker of the same nature as the Father. Although it was an effective anti-Arian statement, it failed to deal with the dangers of Sabellianism. Athanasius himself considered the “Sardican Creed” an unnecessary adjunct to that of Nicaea.

Twenty canons were issued treating of the duties and privileges of the clergy, the most important being the right of a deposed bishop to appeal to the bishop of Rome. Although Athanasius was restored to his see, the council, with its rival synods, formalized the deepening rift between East and West.

R. C. KROEGER AND C. C. KROEGER

See also ARIUS, ARIANISM; ATHANASIUS; MONARCHIANISM; NICAEA, COUNCIL OF.

Bibliography. H. Chadwick, Early Church; C. J. Hefele, History of the Councils 2:86–92; H. Hess, Canons of the Council of Sardica, A.D. 343.

Sartre, Jean-Paul. See EXISTENTIALISM.

Satan (Heb. śātān, “adversary”). The devil, a high angelic creature who, before the creation of the human race, rebelled against the Creator and became the chief antagonist of God and man. Theologians to a large extent have refused to apply the far-reaching prophecies of Isaiah 14:12–14 and Ezekiel 28:12–15 to Satan under the contention that they are addressed solely to the king of Babylon in the first instance and to the king of Tyre in the second. Others contend that this interpretation is unwarranted for two reasons. First, it fails to take into account the fact that these prophecies far transcend any earthly ruler; and, second, it ignores the close connection Satan has in Scripture with the government of the satanic world system (Dan. 10:13; Eph. 6:12), of which both ancient Babylon and Tyre were an inseparable part. In their full scope these passages paint Satan’s past career as “Lucifer” and as “the Anointed Cherub” in his prefall splendor. They portray as well his apostasy in drawing with him a great multitude of lesser celestial creatures (Rev. 12:4), making him “the Evil One” or “the Tempter.”

These fallen angels (demons) fit into two classes: those that are free and those that are bound. The former roam the heavenlies with their prince-leader Satan (Matt. 12:24) and are so numerous as to make Satan’s power practically ubiquitous. The angels (demons) that are bound are evidently guilty of more heinous wickedness and are incarcerated in Tartarus (2 Pet. 2:4; Jude 6). Many theologians connect these imprisoned demons with fallen angels who cohabited with mortal women (Gen. 6:1–4).

Satan caused the fall of the human race as “the serpent” (Gen. 3). His judgment was predicted in Eden (v. 15), and this was accomplished at the cross (John 12:31–33). As created, his power was second only to God (Ezek. 28:11–16). He is nevertheless only a creature, limited, and permitted to have power by divine omnipotence and omniscience.

The biblical doctrine of Satan is not a copying of Persian dualism as some scholars allege. Although Satan, even after his judgment in the cross (Col. 2:15), continues to reign as a usurper (2 Cor. 4:4) and works in tempting and accusing men (Rev. 12:10), he is to be ousted from the heavenlies (vv. 7–12) as well as the earth (5:1–19:16), and is to be confined to the abyss for a thousand years (20:1–3).

When released from the abyss at the end of the thousand years, he will make one last mad attempt to lead his armies against God (Rev. 20:8–9). This will result in his final doom when he is cast into the lake of fire (v. 10), which has been prepared for him and his wicked angelic accomplices (Matt. 25:41). This will be the one place where evil angels and unsaved men will be kept and quarantined so that the rest of God’s sinless universe will not be corrupted in the eternal state.

Satan's present work is widespread and destructive. God permits his evil activity for the time being. Demons must do Satan's bidding. The unsaved are largely under Satan's authority, and he rules them through the evil world system over which he is head and of which the unregenerate are a part (Isa. 14:12-17; 2 Cor. 4:3-4; Eph. 2:2; Col. 1:13).

As far as the saved are concerned, Satan is in continued conflict with them (Eph. 6:11-18), tempts them, and seeks to corrupt and destroy their testimony and even their physical life (1 Cor. 5:5; 1 John 5:16). Satanic and demonic fury were unleashed against the incarnate Christ. The power of a sinless humanity called forth special satanic temptation of our Lord (Matt. 4:1-11). The full glow of light manifested in the earthly life of him who was "the light of the world" (John 8:12) exposed the darkness of the powers of evil. This is the explanation of the unprecedented outburst of demonism that is described in the Gospel narratives. It was because God anointed Jesus of Nazareth "with the Holy Spirit and power" that he "went around doing good and healing all who were under the power of the devil" (Acts 10:38).

M. F. UNGER

See also ABADDON; BAAL-ZEBUB; DEMON, DEMONIZATION; OCCULT; SATANISM; WITCHCRAFT.

Bibliography. H. Bietenhard et al., NIDNTT 3:468-77; L. S. Chafer, Systematic Theology; M. Green, I Believe in Satan's Downfall; R. S. Kluger, Satan in the Old Testament; E. Langton, Satan: A Portrait; E. Lewis, Creator and the Adversary; D. W. Pentecost, Your Adversary, the Devil; W. Robinson, Devil and God; J. B. Russell, Devil: Perceptions of Evil from Antiquity to Primitive Christianity; Satan: The Early Christian Tradition; J. Sanders, Satan Is No Myth; F. A. Tatford, Prince of Darkness; G. von Rad and W. Foerster, TDNT 2:71-81; J. White, Devil; N. G. Wright, Satan Syndrome.

Satanism. The origin of Christian accusations of diabolical or satanic witchcraft first arose around A.D. 900. Over the next six centuries, criteria for identifying Satanists were formed and finally codified in the Malleus Maleficarum (The Hammer of Witches; 1486). Such criteria included pacts with Satan, perversions of Christian rituals, cannibalism, and commitment to secrecy. Scholars agree that the context of social tensions, a belief structure giving room for Satanism, and a substantiation of those beliefs by the church hierarchy were the primary factors in the rise of these medieval accusations. The resulting witch hunts, which ended by the mid 1700s, were largely confined to the Western church and not seen in Orthodox movements.

After two centuries of relative silence, both witchcraft and Satanism have seen revivals in the West during the twentieth century. Alistair Crowley (1875-1947), who abandoned his conservative

Christian roots and identified himself with the beast in Revelation, provided several of the major principles and practices for the satanic phenomena that developed. In literature, press, the conservative church, and among law enforcement officials interest in Satanism has seen a significant increase since the formal founding of Anton LaVey's Church of Satan on April 30, 1996. Evidence of this is seen in that published English books dealing with Satanism numbered 30 during the 1960s, 80 in the 1970s, 100 in the 1980s, and almost 200 in the first five years of the 1990s.

Four varieties of satanic phenomena may be identified. One is that of teens who often self-style their Satanism as an outlet for attention-seeking and rebellion. Personal idiosyncrasies in stylized shock tactics tend to characterize their involvement. They present a serious problem to parents who do not know what to make of the changes that take place.

The second and most visible variety of satanic phenomena is the organizations publicly promoting a form of neo-Satanism such as LaVey's Church of Satan or Michael Aquino's Temple of Set (which split off from LaVey in 1975). In addition to their books, many now have their own web pages describing their beliefs and activities. Universally denying the biblical doctrine of Satan, but using beliefs in him as metaphors for their loyalties to personal deities or philosophies, such groups promote an egocentric and hedonistic orientation to life within the confines of the law.

A third phenomena are the troubled individuals and groups that engage in violent criminal activities. For example, David Berkowitz and Richard Ramirez both claimed satanic allegiance. Allegations of group activity have been manifold, but few, if any, have actually been found guilty of group satanic crimes.

Many contemporary Christian writers propose a fourth, secretive-networking level of traditional, trans-generational Satanists. Paralleling the medieval accusations, these people are said to meet in covens, breed children for ritual abuse and sacrifice, and infiltrate government at all levels. Critics point out that, to date and in spite of studies carried out in several countries, no sustainable legal evidence of nationwide satanic conspiracies has been found.

A Christian Response. Rumors of satanic conspiracies must be viewed in light of God's ultimate sovereignty. Satan's best efforts have been foreseen by our all-knowing Creator from the foundation of time, and our own investigations must avoid a paranoid outlook that ascribes to Satan omniscience or omnipresence. While it is true that Satan is the prince or ruler of this world (John 12:31; 14:30; Eph. 2:2), it is also true that his ability to rule is constrained within the continuing sovereignty of the King of kings (1 Tim.

Satanism

6:15; Rev. 17:14; 19:16). Christians can be “conspiracy theorists” but only in the sense that we recognize God’s rule over the earth rather than Satan’s network of deception.

There can be little doubt that Satan has a goal of sowing confusion wherever possible. He is equally delighted with articulate, agenda-driven skeptics who ignore evidence and the gullibly naïve who are ready to swallow the latest rumor and spread it on its way in their small-group Bible studies. We are to take unsubstantiated rumors lightly, even when they come from respected Christian leaders. Rumors never threaten God’s control, only our faith in the fact that he really is in charge. Our hope is in seeing such rumors for what they are, looking in them for ways we can manifest God’s kingdom values and thereby take the offensive by overpowering evil with good (Rom. 12:21) by reaching those who claim allegiance to Satan with the good news that Christ offers them.

A. S. MOREAU

See also DEMON, DEMONIZATION; SATAN; WITCHCRAFT.

Bibliography. W. S. Bainbridge, Satan’s Power: A Deviant Psychotherapy Cult; M. Bubeck, Satanic Revival; W. Cavendish, Black Arts; M. Elaide, ed., Encyclopedia of Religion; R. D. Hicks, In Pursuit of Satan; C. S. Lewis, Screwtape Letters; G. A. Mather and L. A. Nichols, Dictionary of Cults, Sects, Religions and the Occult; J. S. Victor, Satanic Panic; N. Wright, Satan Syndrome.

Satisfaction. Compensation, reparation. The word “satisfaction” occurs only twice in the KJV (Num. 35:31–32), as the rendering for the Hebrew kōper, literally meaning “a price paid as compensation.” Theologically the term has played a significant part in the theory of the atonement, especially since the time of Anselm (1033–1109). Prior to his Cur Deus Homo, the view of Christ’s death which prevailed most widely was that it was a ransom paid to the devil in order to deliver the souls of men over whom he had a legal claim. Anselm by contrast stressed the fact that the death of Christ was a satisfaction rendered to God’s justice and honor. Since his time this view has become one of the essential ingredients in the orthodox theory of the atonement for both Roman Catholics and Protestants. In the subsequent Protestant discussion, a distinction has been made between Christ’s active and passive obedience. In the former he satisfied the demands of the law by rendering a perfect obedience, and in the latter he satisfied the curse of the law by submitting himself to the ignominious death of the cross.

With the rise of liberalism in Protestant theology, the term “satisfaction” fell under severe criticism and is still suspect in some circles as not being biblical. The fundamental issue, however, is not whether the term as such occurs in Scripture, but whether or not the idea it represents is biblical, and this will be decided ultimately by one’s view of God. If the love of God be construed in a way that militates against his justice, then there is no divine wrath that needs propitiation and there is no guilt in the objective sense that must be expiated. Consequently there is no need that a satisfaction be rendered to appease the judicial sentiment in God which man by his guilt and sin has offended.

The Bible, however, plainly teaches that the death of Christ was a sacrifice. This interpretation of Christ’s work is imbedded in every important type of NT teaching. To ask, What according to the NT is the nature of Christ’s work? is the same as asking, What is the nature of sacrifice? The NT conception of sacrifice, in turn, cannot possibly be understood apart from the OT conception of sacrifice, and there it is very clear that the sacrifice is not simply a gift to God or a mode of communion and fellowship with God. The only explanation which satisfies the OT data is that the sacrifice is propitiatory in character and appeases the wrath of God by removing the guilt of sin through a substitutionary bearing of the penalty. The one who offered the sacrifice placed his hands on the head of the animal victim and thus transferred the guilt to the animal, whose blood was shed to satisfy the debt to justice which he owed.

Animal sacrifice was only ceremonial or typical, but it is the ceremonial ritual that is transferred in the NT to the work of Christ and is the basis for the theological teaching that the guilt of our sin is removed by the satisfaction which Christ renders to God against whom the sin is committed. Hence Christ is called the Lamb of God. When God is propitiated by his blood, we are redeemed from the curse of the law and reconciled to him. Satisfaction, then, is a theological term that embraces in its connotation all the major categories used in the Scriptures to describe the meaning of Christ’s atoning work, as it relates both to God and to the sinner. The most crucial passage is Romans 3:21–26. P. K. JEWETT

See also ATONEMENT, THEORIES OF; BLOOD, SACRIFICIAL ASPECTS OF; OFFERINGS AND SACRIFICES IN BIBLE TIMES; PROPITIATION.

Bibliography. Anselm, Cur Deus Homo?; C. A. Beckwith, SHERK 10:209–10; L. Morris, Apostolic Preaching of the Cross; J. R. W. Stott, Cross of Christ; B. B. Warfield, Studies in Theology.

Satisfaction Theory, The. See ATONEMENT, THEORIES OF.

Sattler, Michael. See MENNONITES.

Saumer Academy. See AMYRALDIANISM.

Savior. One who saves, delivers.

In the Old Testament. "Savior" represents a participle of yāšā' ("delivers, sets free"), used frequently of God (Isa. 43:11; 45:21). Cf. Joshua, Jeshua (Gr. Iēsous), Hosea, Elisha; all mean "God is salvation." It is also used of God's agents (Judg. 3:9). With the participle gō'ēl ("redeems, vindicates"—Job 19:25; Isa. 41:14), it emphasizes a quality and initiative in Yahweh as fundamental as creatorhood and sovereignty, and unique in ancient religion. Only later is Messiah called Savior (4 Ezra 12:34; T. Gad. 8).

In the New Testament and Septuagint. "Savior" represents sōtēr ("deliverer; preserver"), commonly ascribed to pagan deities (Zeus, Aesculapius), to semideities of the mysteries (Serapis, Isis, Heracles), to honored men, and to deified rulers (Ptolemies, Philip, Augustus). Emphasis upon God as Savior continues in Luke 1:47; Jude 25; and the Pastoral Epistles (six times). The title is applied to Christ as constituting, not merely exhibiting, salvation (Luke 2:11; John 4:42; Acts 5:31; 13:23; Eph. 5:23; Phil. 3:20–21; 1 John 4:14). This predominantly late use and Gentile background suggests contrast with pagan claims as the church moved into Gentile circles.

In the first century, the claim that "salvation is found in no one else, for there is no other name under heaven . . . by which we must be saved" (Acts 4:12) gave serious offense, even though made with full acknowledgment that other "faiths," Judaist or not, were in some measure acceptable to God (Acts 10:1–4, 34–35). Christian exclusiveness continues to give offense, yet "the good pagan" still needs the Christian evangelist (vv. 4–5).

R. E. O. WHITE

See also JESUS CHRIST; MESSIAH; SALVATION.

Savonarola, Girolamo (1452–1498). An Italian Dominican religious reformer. Savonarola was born in Ferrara and reacted against his early training in Renaissance humanism. After preaching in several north Italian cities he came to Florence in 1490 to serve as public speaker at San Marco. He rose to prominence by predicting the coming of divine judgment. The French invasion of 1494 seemed to be a fulfillment of his prophecy, and when the Medici abandoned the city he gained great influence through his preaching. He encouraged the establishment of a republican government and assured the people that a golden age was beginning. During the ensuing four years he tried to cleanse the city of vice and sins, often through the use of censorship and violence. Renaissance culture in all its forms, from secular art to frivolous and bawdy drama, had to be repudiated so that a republic of obedience and virtue could be established. Savonarola led the way at the carnival of 1496 when he sponsored the "burning of vanities," including such instruments of sin as false hair, indecent clothing, and lewd books.

For a time Savonarola's position was unchallenged, but soon his sermons lost their effectiveness. His uncompromising nature made many enemies and brought him into conflict with Pope Alexander VI. Unresponsive to papal warnings, he was excommunicated. The Franciscans used the occasion to arrange an ordeal by fire with his followers, and the incident served to discredit him. The Florentine government charged him with treason, for which he was convicted and executed. Many early Protestants such as Luther and Beza looked on him as a martyr for the gospel.

R. G. CLOUSE

Bibliography. R. Erlanger, Unarmed Prophet: Savonarola in Florence; R. Ridolfi, Life of Girolamo Savonarola; D. Weinstein, Savonarola and Florence: Prophecy and Patriotism in the Renaissance.

Savoy Conference (1661). A series of meetings held at the Savoy in the Strand, London, with the aim of reviewing the contents of the Book of Common Prayer and hearing criticism of it by leading Presbyterian divines. The participants met from April 15 to July 24, 1661, and included twelve bishops, twelve Presbyterian clergy, and assessors from each party. The conference was called by King Charles II, who had recently regained his crown after being exiled during the protectorate of Cromwell. His return meant the resumption by the established church of episcopal polity and liturgical worship. This well suited traditional Anglicans, who had been pushed into the background during the commonwealth and protectorate periods (1642–60).

Presbyterian Puritans (as contrasted with Congregationalists and Separatists) were ready to participate in an established church governed by bishops as long as certain modifications were made in the contents of the Book of Common Prayer, required to be used in every parish. The bishops (supported by the king) were prepared to make only minor concessions, and they further insisted that clergy who had not been episcopally ordained should submit to reordination by this method. As an attempt to keep the Presbyterians in the national church this conference failed, and a large number of them became Nonconformists in 1661–62. However, certain of their requests for change were granted (fifteen in all) and were embodied in the 1662 edition of the Book of Common Prayer. This allowed a minority of Presbyterians to stay within the church.

P. TOON

See also BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER.

Bibliography. E. C. Ratcliff, "Savoy Conference" in From Uniformity to Unity, G. F. Nuttall and O. Chadwick, eds.

Saxon Confession

Saxon Confession (1551). Exposition of the Augsburg Confession written by Philip Melancthon for presentation to the Council of Trent. Originally entitled Repetition of the Augsburg Confession, it appeared in print in 1552 under the title Confession of Doctrine of the Saxon Churches. After the emperor invited the Lutherans to send a delegation to the Council of Trent, which reconvened in May 1551, Elector Maurice of Saxony held a meeting to consider their response. Although Melancthon placed little hope in the council, he thought it unwise to refuse the emperor's invitation. After agreeing to express their doctrinal stance on the basis of the Augsburg Confession and the catechism, Melancthon was commissioned to write an explanation of the Augsburg Confession that the envoys could submit in the name of the Lutheran theologians.

Melancthon wrote the confession at Dessau May 6 to 10, 1551. Despite the fact that it was written after the Lutheran princes had been defeated by the emperor and the Augsburg Interim had been imposed, it does not reveal any retreat from the doctrinal position taken at Augsburg in 1530. In fact, it was considerably less conciliatory than the Augsburg Confession. In addition to stating evangelical doctrine, it specifically detailed the errors of the Roman Catholic Church in twenty-three sections, following the order of the Augsburg Confession. It also emphasized that Reformation theology was in agreement with the position of the ancient church, and it summarized the fundamental principles of that theology under two articles of the Apostle's Creed: "I believe in the forgiveness of sins" and "One Holy Catholic Church." In contrast to the Augsburg Confession, which was signed by the princes, the Saxon Confession was signed only by theologians and the superintendents of the churches in Saxony. Theologians from nine other Lutheran principalities also gave their consent.

Melancthon never appeared at the Council of Trent, because the threat of war caused him to delay his journey in Nuremberg, and the beginning of hostilities between Maurice and the emperor resulted in the suspension of the council in 1552. The confession was submitted, along with Johann Brenz's Württemberg Confession, to a private congregation of the council in 1552. However, nothing was accomplished. It never received a public hearing, and it did not become a part of the traditional Lutheran Confessions contained in the Book of Concord. R. W. HEINZE

See also AUGSBURG CONFESSION; CONFESSIONS OF FAITH; MELANCTHON, PHILIP.

Bibliography. E. H. Bindsel, ed., Corpus Reformation; J. M. Reu, Augsburg Confession; P. Schaff, History of the Creeds of Christendom; R. Stupperich, Melancthon.

Saybrook Platform (1708). An effort by Connecticut Congregationalists to strengthen church government at a time when New England's concern for religion seemed to have reached a new low. A similar but unsuccessful effort to shore up ecclesiastical foundations had taken place in Massachusetts in 1705. The founding of Yale College at New Haven, Connecticut, in 1701 was also a response to what many clergymen regarded as spiritual decline. In the spring of 1708 the Connecticut General Court (or legislature) called for an assembly of ministers and lay leaders to correct "defects of the discipline of the churches." The leaders of the colony were troubled by forces that seemed to be fragmenting Connecticut society and undermining traditions in the churches. In September, four laymen and twelve ministers met at Saybrook in response to the General Court's appeal. They prepared fifteen Articles for the Administration of Church Discipline. This "platform" committed Connecticut Congregationalists to the doctrine of the Savoy Confession, a modification of the Westminster Confession prepared by English Congregationalists in 1658. But it also incorporated some presbyterian features in the Connecticut churches. County "consociations" of ministers and laymen were empowered to judge disputes arising in local churches. County "associations" and a colony-wide "General Association" of ministers were called into existence, but without carefully defined duties. The acceptance of the Saybrook Platform in Connecticut helped to preserve the influence of the churches in the colony, even as it turned traditional congregationalism in a presbyterian direction. M. A. NOLL

See also CREED, CREEDS; CONFESSIONS OF FAITH.

Bibliography. W. Walker, Creeds and Platforms of Congregationalism.

Sayers, Dorothy Leigh (1893–1957). Writer of detective fiction, author of religious plays, translator of Dante, arbiter of English usage, and lay theologian, Sayers was an influential exponent of orthodox Christian faith during the middle third of the twentieth century. She was born into the home of an Anglican minister, displayed an early aptitude for languages, and studied medieval literature at Somerville College, Oxford. While teaching secondary school in England and France and working at an advertising agency, she began her career as author and lecturer. Sayers first came to public notice through her detective novels, featuring Lord Peter Wimsey, which were published from 1923 through 1938. The success of these books gave her the financial stability to turn to her first love—religious verse plays and translations of medieval literature, of which her edition of Dante's Divine Comedy (published 1949, 1955, 1962) was the major effort. A radio play, Man Born to Be King (performed on the BBC, 1941–42, published 1943), was both a successful drama and a creative, respectful presentation of the life of Christ. Earlier her play for the 1937 Canterbury Festival, Zeal of Thy House, had revealed her imaginative skill at historical drama. Her occasional essays and a book-length treatment of God and the creative process, Mind of the Maker (1942), constituted a forceful body of theology as well.

Sayers, a lifelong member of the Church of England, published her learned, yet eminently readable, theological essays to promote a basic understanding of historic orthodoxy. Her theology reflected her historical studies in medieval Christianity, her particular love for Dante, and the influence of contemporaries like the Catholic writer G. K. Chesterton and the Anglican novelist and critic Charles Williams. The essays defended the intellectual fiber of traditional dogma, proposed canons of literary common sense for reading the Bible, offered Christian reflections on the changing roles of women in the modern world, and during the years of World War II reminded British citizens of Christian values that superseded the virtues of patriotism.

In Mind of the Maker Sayers provided extended exposition of a theme that she had treated in several occasional papers. The creative process, she argued, can be regarded profitably as an analogy to the way in which the triune God governs the world. If we think of God as an author of a drama, in which humans are the actors, we can learn much about human freedom, divine sovereignty, and the history of salvation. Sayers was not above using her own experience in writing detective stories to explain how God may govern the destiny of his “characters” even as they take on a life of their own in fulfilling the Divine Author’s sublime and harmonious plot. M. A. NOLL

Bibliography. D. Sayers, Christian Letters to a Post-Christian World; J. Brabazon, Dorothy L. Sayers; D. Coomes, Dorothy L. Sayers: A Careless Rage for Life; A. S. Dale, Maker and Craftsman: The Story of Dorothy L. Sayers; A. S. Dale, ed., Dorothy L. Sayers: The Centenary Celebration; R. B. Harmon, Annotated Guide to the Works of Dorothy L. Sayers; J. Hitchman, Such a Strange Lady: A Biography of Dorothy L. Sayers; R. E. Hone, Dorothy L. Sayers: A Literary Biography; C. M. Kenney, Remarkable Case of Dorothy L. Sayers; B. Reynolds, Dorothy L. Sayers: Her Life and Soul; Pasionate Intellect: Dorothy L. Sayers’ Encounter with Dante; N. M. P. Tischler, Dorothy L. Sayers: A Pilgrim Soul.

Sayings of Jesus. NT scholarship often addresses two major issues with regard to the sayings of Jesus. (1) A serious endeavor has been made to verify the authenticity of the sayings, and frequently this way of phrasing the subject has implied the endeavor’s results: finding the genuine sayings of Jesus. (2) Scholars have sought to discover a unifying center to Jesus’ sayings. That is, what is the essence of Christ’s message? Needless to say, evangelical scholarship has taken a more or less defensive posture regarding the initial question and focused most of its energies on a theological exposition of the meaning of Christ’s words.

Since the severely negative and skeptical results of Rudolf Bultmann and the early form critics have been reappraised (esp. E. Käsemann, J. Robinson), scholars have embarked on a “new quest of the historical Jesus” in which the evidence could be sifted once more—but this time, with greater optimism. Typically, while Bultmann could offer barely thirty pages on the teaching of Jesus in his NT theology, Joachim Jeremias could supply an entire volume. Günther Bornkamm, a student of Bultmann, even produced an entire book entitled Jesus of Nazareth (1956), thus exhibiting the growing confidence of the field.

Modern study has been especially interested in developing a methodology for uncovering the authentic sayings of Jesus. Here the well-known criteria of authenticity have been employed. Chief among them (and the most used) is the criterion of dissimilarity, wherein only those sayings of Jesus dissimilar to Judaism and the early church are considered “authentic.” But this criterion, like the others, is severely limiting. Can Jesus be divorced from his environment? Did not the early church employ his thoughts? As Morna Hooker, a Cambridge scholar, has accurately claimed, we may discover only what is distinct in Jesus’ sayings—not what is characteristic and pivotal.

In this discussion it becomes evident that one’s predisposition toward the sayings is important. Indeed, the most important question is, Who owns the burden of proof? Are Jesus’ sayings inauthentic till proven otherwise? Or must the critic first demonstrate grounds for his reserve? For the evangelical, the Gospel accounts are innocent until proven guilty.

Fortunately greater agreement is found when we examine the content of Jesus’ sayings. Studies will generally tend to begin by studying the form of Jesus’ teaching (parable, paradox, poetry, etc.) and find in this a key that unlocks either a Semitic background or possible Aramaic antecedents. Here the recent work of scholars such as Jeremias has been indispensable.

A consensus may be at hand concerning the central message of Jesus. The “kingdom of God/heaven” is a frequent theme in the Gospels (when we allow for parallels, it appears about eighty times), and the evangelists imply that this message inaugurates Jesus’ ministry (Matt. 4:17; Mark 1:15; Luke 4:43) as well as sums it up (Matt. 9:35; Luke 8:1). Even the Twelve and the Seventy are instructed to proclaim it (Matt. 10:5–7; Luke 10:8–9).

Sayings of Jesus

But when we seek a definition for this “kingdom” concise categories seem elusive. Certainly there is no going back to the nineteenth century denial of eschatology in the word. Jesus is announcing a climactic inbreaking of God’s sovereign rule in history. But is this image entirely dependent on futurist expectations of Jewish apocalyptic (A. Schweitzer), or should we find here a present working of God within a personal “eschatological” crisis for the believer (C. H. Dodd; existentialism)? No doubt both elements must be held at once. To employ the categories of George Ladd, God’s reign has already broken into history in the hearts of men and women who are obedient to Christ. But in addition, God’s realm is still future. The church eagerly awaits a genuine eschaton when Christ will bring his thoroughgoing rule into history. While the church enjoys the promise of this kingdom, it awaits the kingdom’s future fulfillment (so Kümmel).

But the sayings of Jesus go beyond even this description of God at work in history. Jesus reveals that God is at work in him. Jesus’ sayings bear a unique self-revelation. He is the Son who alone knows the Father intimately (Matt. 11:27) and can in turn reveal the Father fully (John 1:18; 14:8–11). In this fashion, the kingdom is entirely dependent on Jesus: He inaugurates the kingdom and exhibits its presence through his powerful works (Luke 11:20; cf. 17:20–21). Therefore the chief message of the sayings of Jesus may be that God is not only powerfully at work in Israel, but that he is at work through his Son, the Messiah.

G. M. BURGE

See also JESUS CHRIST.

Bibliography. C. C. Anderson, Critical Quests of Jesus; H. Anderson, Jesus and Christian Origins; D. E. Aune, Jesus and the Synoptic Gospels: A Bibliographic Study Guide; C. H. Dodd, Founder of Christianity; C. F. H. Henry, ed., Jesus of Nazareth, Savior and Lord; P. Henry, New Directions in New Testament Study; M. Hooker, “On Using the Wrong Tool,” Theol 75:575–81; A. M. Hunter, Work and Words of Jesus; J. Jeremias, New Testament Theology; Proclamation of Jesus; W. G. Kümmel, Promise and Fulfillment; G. E. Ladd, Presence of the Future; T. W. Manson, Sayings of Jesus; Teaching of Jesus; I. H. Marshall, “Jesus in the Gospels,” in Expositor’s Bible Commentary 1:517–41; R. H. Stein, “Criteria of Authenticity,” in Gospel Perspectives, R. T. France and D. Wenham, eds.

Sapegoat. See ATONEMENT, DAY OF.

Schaeffer, Francis (1912–1984). Evangelical apologist, philosopher, and theologian. Born in Germantown, Pennsylvania, on January 30, 1912, Schaeffer graduated from Hampton-Sydney College in 1935 and from Faith Theological Seminary in 1938. Caught in the conflicts of the Presbyterian Church of that time, Schaeffer opted for the newly formed Bible Presbyterian Church and held pastorates in Grove City and Chester, Pennsylvania, moving to St. Louis, Missouri, in 1943, where he founded Children for Christ.

After a tour of Europe in 1947 and inspired by Ole Hallesby and Martyn Lloyd-Jones, Schaeffer and his wife Edith became missionaries in Switzerland. By 1949 a significant work with disaffected college students had begun, and in 1955, when the Swiss government had begun proceedings to expel the Schaeffers from their country, God intervened to allow them to establish what was to become their major work at L’Abri (“the shelter”) in Huemroz in the canton of Vaud. This work continued through the late 1970s, when illness brought Schaeffer to the United States. The Schaeffers settled in Rochester, Minnesota, from where Schaeffer made lecture tours, held seminars and continued writing until his death on May 15, 1984.

Schaeffer was a prolific writer, whose collected works fill five large volumes, but the essence of his thought may be found in a trio of books, Escape from Reason (1968), God Who Is There (1968), and He Is There and He Is Not Silent (1972). A film produced by his son Frank entitled “How Should We Then Live?” followed and made Schaeffer’s ideas accessible to an even larger audience.

In his analysis of the modern world’s intellectual suicide, he finds the roots to be primarily in three seminal thinkers, Thomas Aquinas, G. F. W. Hegel, and Søren Kierkegaard. Their essential error was to abandon reliance upon an inspired Scripture and substitute an autonomous human reason in its place. This separated God from the world and through a series of intellectual developments brought the modern world to no logical basis for reason to exist at all. This ended in Kierkegaard’s “leap of faith,” which for him might have had religious content but for most was secularized and made a non-rational leap into the void. Protestant liberalism went along with this by undercutting the authority of Scripture, overemphasizing its human nature, and denying that it offered objective divine revelation. Thus, for the modern world only the subjective remains, with a resultant relativity of judgment and ethics. Schaeffer was deeply concerned about the practical effect this would have on modern society, especially on the sanctity of life, and as a result became involved in anti-abortion efforts.

The way out of this tragic situation is to relocate objectivity. For Schaeffer this can only be found in the triune God and in his propositional revelation, the Scriptures. Following the lead of his teacher, Cornelius van Til, he asserts that our created nature is so structured that commitment to God and the Scripture will provide the certainty and assurance that we need. But this is not a “pure” leap of faith; rather it arises from what we are, because we are made in God's image regardless of what we might think we are. It is also possible to build a reasonable case for the truth of Christianity because Christianity is a historical religion and open to public scrutiny.

Schaeffer has been criticized by some, T. V. Morris for example, in Francis Schaeffer's Apologetics: A Critique (1976, rev. 1987), as misunderstanding the history of philosophy, oversimplifying the problems of the modern world, and being too much the popularizer. While there is some truth in these charges, Schaeffer remains a powerful voice for historic orthodoxy in the midst of many trumpets of uncertain sound. W. A. ELWELL Bibliography. L. T. Dennis, ed., Francis Schaeffer: Portraits of the Man and His Work; C. Duriez, HET 245–59; T. V. Morris, Francis Schaeffer's Apologetics: A Critique; L. G. Parkhurst Jr., Francis Schaeffer; R. W. Ruesegger, ed., Reflections on Francis Schaeffer; E. Schaeffer, Tapstry.

Schaff, Philip (1819–1893). Theologian, church historian, ecumenist. A Swiss carpenter's son, he was converted under Lutheran pietist auspices and studied at Tübingen, Halle, and Berlin. He absorbed the Hegelian approach to church history and biblical studies, and came under the evangelical influence of Tholuck and Neander and the confessionalism of Hengstenberg. A promising young Berlin theologian who identified with the broader union church ideal, he was called in 1844 to a professorship at the obscure theological seminary of the German Reformed Church in Mercersburg, Pennsylvania.

With his colleague John W. Nevin, Schaff quickly became known as the exponent of the intellectually profound and controversial Mercersburg Theology. This stressed Christ and the incarnation as the starting point for theology, the organic growth of the church, liturgical worship, and ecumenism; and in effect it was the first attempt to reconcile German idealism and American Protestantism. In his inaugural address Principle of Protestantism (1844) he set forth the developmental principle, arguing that the Reformation was a flowering of the best in medieval Catholicism and that Protestantism and Catholicism will eventually merge into a renewed, evangelical faith. In What Is Church History? (1846) he identified with the new "historical school" that united past and present in the development of the church. Schaff strongly criticized the American propensity to subjectivism, sectarianism, and revivalism, and insisted that the most dangerous enemy was not the Roman pope but the "numberless popes" who would enslave Protestantism to human authority. His vision of the church was ecumenical—one spirit, one body, one shepherd, one flock.

An attempt to convict him of heresy failed, but the Mercersburg movement soon passed from the scene. Schaff moved to Andover Seminary in 1863 and then to Union Theological Seminary in New York in 1870, where he finished out his career. His scholarly contributions were legion. Not only was he a major interpreter of the American religious scene (essays on America, 1854; the Civil War, 1865; and religious liberty, 1888), but also he was the country's leading church historian and a prolific writer of biblical and theological works. Noteworthy are his eight-volume History of the Christian Church, the indispensable Creeeds of Christendom (3 vols., 1877), a multivolume edition of the church fathers, the Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge (1884), an American edition of Lange's massive commentary (1864–80), a study of hymnody (1868), and a refutation of the Strauss-Renan view of Christ (1865). Ecumenical involvements included the Sunday school movement, the Evangelical Alliance, and working on the Revised Version of the Bible. In 1888 he helped found the American Society of Church History and was its first president. R. V. PIERARD

See also MERCERSBURG THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. K. Penzel, ed., Philip Schaff: Selected Writings; C. Yrigoyen and G. Bricker, eds., Reformed and Catholic: Selected Historical and Theological Writings of Philip Schaff; J. H. Nichols, Romanticism in American Theology: Nevin and Schaff at Mercersburg; J. H. Nichols, ed., Mercersburg Theology; D. S. Schaff, Life of Philip Schaff; R. Schnucker, NIDCC 881–82; G. H. Schriver, Philip Schaff: Christian, Prophet and Ecumenical Prophet.

Schillebeeckx, Edward (b. 1914). A native of Kortenberg, Belgium, Schillebeeckx entered the Dominican Order in 1934 and was ordained a priest in 1941. The bulk of his mature career was spent as professor of dogmatic and historical theology at the University of Nijmegen (Netherlands), beginning in 1958. He has continued to write extensively since his retirement in 1983.

His voluminous works extend to a wide array of subjects: the sacraments (his doctoral topic), ecclesiology, hermeneutics, politics, theological anthropology, and Christology. His distinctiveness lies in the manner in which he has addressed these topics as a Roman Catholic theologian consciously attempting to articulate the Christian faith in terms coherent within contemporary thought.

His christological publications in particular became a cause célèbre in the late 1970s. Vatican suspicions of his orthodoxy extending back into the 1960s came into the open after publication of Jesus: An Experiment in Christology (1974; ET 1979). Principle doubts involved his use of historical criticism, exegetical conclusions, and apparent theological convictions.

His chief concern has been to explore the relation of the church to the world. Schooled in (and eventually repudiating) the hoary nomenclature and dogma of scholastic Thomism, he became part of a larger body of scholars (cf. H. Küng, K. Rahner) seeking to give post-Enlightenment expression to Roman Catholic faith. Public sympathy (and that of many post-traditional theologians) tended to side with Schillebeeckx, seeing in him a voice for a more modern spirituality in the face of church dogma perceived by many Europeans as needing drastic revision.

Other observers (e.g., K. Runia) conclude that Schillebeeckx has really gone far down the road toward betraying Chalcedon and calling into question the Trinity by his radically "from below" christological starting point. Statements like the following must not be read out of context: "no faith can without loss of credibility try to dodge [critical reason] by appealing to the pseudo-argument that God and religion belong to a plane of our human existence that is above or beyond science" (Jesus, 619). But this illustrates why some ask whether he is not more indebted to secularist critical theory and reason than to confessional verities of the Christian faith, including Scripture, to which Schillebeeckx claims he has been faithful.

R. W. YARBROUGH

Bibliography. E. Schillebeeckx, Christ; I Am a Happy Theologian; Interim Report on the Books Jesus and Christ; Jesus; Language of Faith; T. Schoof, ed., Schillebeeckx Case; J. Bowden, Edward Schillebeeckx; K. Runia, "Continental' Christologies," in Crisis in Christology, W. R. Farmer, ed.

Schism (Gr. schisma, "division"). The word is used eight times in the NT. From this usage the theological meaning of the term can be derived. Immediately one popular misconception can be removed. Schism and heresy are two different terms and cannot be used interchangeably, yet they are often so used. Heresy is not schism, for heresy is, at its base, doctrinal, and is opposed to the Christian faith itself. Schism is opposed to charity and is not doctrinal at heart.

Often the departure of Reformers like Martin Luther and John Calvin has been relegated to the area of schism. This is far from the truth. To the Roman Church this was not schism but heresy. To the Reformers it was also heresy, but heresy entertained by Rome, which drove them from its fold. Hence John Calvin in his Institutes of the Christian Religion argued that the Roman Church was not a true church since it was defective in the true preaching of the gospel and the administration of the sacraments. Therefore he was not leaving the true church. In fact, Calvin argued strongly that whatever the defects of any true church, so long as it continued the marks of a true church, no one should leave its fold.

The Roman Church allowed for the distinction between schism and heresy. A schismatic bishop of that church could continue to ordain priests, and schismatic priests could continue to celebrate the Eucharist. But heretical bishops and priests could not do so legitimately. Rome recognized that schism is a breach of love, a factious spirit, or a factious division, but not doctrinal divergence. Thus it is that the Roman Church has always recognized the Greek Orthodox Church as essentially orthodox, but schismatic. The Roman Church contends that the Greek Church has sinned against love.

Among the various schisms of the Christian church three can be mentioned briefly: the Donatist schism, the Great Schism (the break between East and West in 1054), and the papal schism (some historians also speak of this as the Great Schism). In the case of the Donatists, the problem was one of ecclesiastical discipline in which they opposed internal corruption in the church. This party arose during the Diocletian persecution when some Christians surrendered the Scriptures. Augustine wrote against the Donatists because they persistently separated themselves from the fellowship of the church, insisting on rebaptism of Catholics as a condition of communion with them. Narrow and intolerant, the Donatists were nevertheless recognized as connected with the true church, but were regarded as schismatic or sinning against charity.

The Great Schism relates to the Eastern and Western churches. This occurred by reason of the growing strength of Rome as against that of Constantinople. Several centuries passed before the church was rent. At last in 1054 the separation was completed. Pope Leo IX was angered by an encyclical of the patriarch of Constantinople. When the patriarch refused to submit the papal legates laid down a sentence of anathema.

The third schism (also called the Babylonian Captivity) occurred in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries and was complicated by strange proceedings. The schism took place shortly after the death of Gregory XI in 1378. There was one pope at Avignon and one at Rome. At the Council of Pisa in 1409 both popes were deposed and a third one elected. Instead of two popes the church now had three. At the Council of Constance the legitimate pope, Gregory XII, resigned with the agreement that his pontificate would be regarded as legal. In 1417 Oddo Colonna was elected pope and reigned as Martin V (1417–31).

Biblically it appears clear that the rending of the body of Christ is sin and that there is no excuse for schism, which is related to love and not to doctrine. But when doctrine is involved, it takes on different dimensions and is not so much schism as heresy. Heretics are to be cut off from the church or excommunicated, and this distinction is not one of schism.

In 1 Corinthians 1:10 schism developed from the party spirit or factiousness in which individuals identified themselves as supporters of Paul or Apollos or Cephas. Outwardly the church was one, but internally it was marked by divisiveness. The schismatic tendency noted in 11:18 was based largely on social distinctions rather than doctrinal differences. In chapter 12 Paul makes the point that the divine wisdom which has established harmony between the members of the human body points to a similar purpose in the body of Christ (see v. 25). Diversity of gifts should not invite to envy but to cooperation.

By way of summary it may be said that division based upon primary considerations of essential doctrine is not schism and is not per se wrong. Divisions that are not doctrinal, however, but which yield to other considerations, are reprehensible. They rise from a sin against charity and are contrary to the Spirit of Christ.

H. LINDSELL

See also HERESY; SCHISM, GREAT.

Bibliography. T. A. Lacy, Unity and Schism.

Schism, Great (1054). The first permanent severing of the Christian community. Its beginnings lay in the division of the Roman Empire at the end of the third century. Thereafter, the Greek (Eastern) and Latin (Western) sections of the Roman world were administered separately. Their cultural and economic differences intensified. When the political institutions of the Latin empire collapsed in the fifth century, the Greek empire, centered in Constantinople, continued to flourish.

The sustaining institution during this period was the Christian church. Its theology dominated all forms of thought in both the united East and the disintegrating West. Important issues, even worldly ones, were transposed into theological questions.

Two fundamental differences between the Latin Catholic and Greek Orthodox traditions developed during the early Middle Ages. The first was the Petrine Doctrine—absolute in the West, resisted in the East. The second was a Western addition to the Nicene Creed which provoked the filioque controversy; the Eastern church resisted the doctrine that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father “and the Son.” Other divisive issues such as the celibacy of the priesthood, use of unleavened bread in the Eucharist, episcopal control over the sacrament of confirmation, and priestly beards and monkish tonsures were the source of conflict but not schism.

Of all the institutions that the early Christian empire shared, the political was the first to collapse. In the West during the fifth century imperial authority fell before invading barbarian kings. Increasingly the Roman patriarch, the pope, filled the power vacuum left by retreating politicians. The lines between secular and ecclesiastical authority were hopelessly blurred. On the other hand, in Constantinople, where imperial power was still strong, Christian emperors continued to preside over an integrated Christian society. As heirs of Constantine, Byzantine emperors dominated the administration of church and state in the style still known as caesaropapism.

Theology in the East was speculative, with important decisions submitted to a collegial-conciliar system in which all the patriarchs—the bishops of Constantinople, Antioch, Alexandria, Jerusalem, and Rome—played an important role. It was fully acknowledged that the bishop of Rome had pride of place and certain rights of review over the other four. As early as the pontificate of Leo I (440–61), however, Roman patriarchs demanded more power. Matters were made more difficult by the rise of Islam and the new barbarian attacks in the seventh and eighth centuries. The West became even more isolated, and when contacts between Rome and Constantinople were resumed the gulf between East and West had widened.

The filioque controversy seems to have originated in sixth century Visigothic Spain, where the Arian heresy was endemic. The Arians claimed that the first and second persons of the Trinity were not coeternal and equal. In an effort to enforce traditional theology, Spanish churchmen added a phrase to the Nicene Creed, “ex Patre Filioque,” which amended the old form to state that the Holy Spirit proceeded from the Son as well as from the Father. However, it had been agreed in the fourth century that no change in the wording of the creed, except by conciliar consent, was possible. To the theologically sophisticated East, the filioque phrase seemed to challenge not only the universal creed but also the official doctrine of the Trinity. When the issue was raised during the reign of Charlemagne (768–814), the papacy seemed to agree. Pope Leo III, while approving the spirit of the filioque, warned against any alteration in the wording of the creed.

It was the fusion of the filioque controversy with the rise of papal power that created the great crisis of 1054. The “reform” papacy of the eleventh century established itself on the right of the pope, as apostolic heir of Peter, to absolute power over all Christian people and institutions. Such claims had been rejected by the early church councils. To Eastern patriarchs Christ’s charge to Peter in Matthew 16:18–19 was shared by all the apostles and their spiritual heirs, the bishops. In 1054 Pope Leo IX (1048–54) sent a delegation headed by Cardinal Humbert of Silva

Schism, Great

Candida to discuss the problems between the papacy and Constantinople. Disaster followed. The patriarch of Constantinople, Michael Cerularius, rejected both papal claims and the filioque. The Western legates accused Constantinople of having altered the Nicene Creed. In the end, Cardinal Humbert deposited a Bull of Excommunication against Michael Cerularius on the altar of the Hagia Sophia, and the Great Schism was official.

Thereafter, efforts were made at reunion. As the Muslim Turks advanced on the Byzantine Empire in the high Middle Ages, Eastern Christians were in desperate need of relief from their Western brethren. However, all such hopes ceased when, in 1204, an army of crusading knights from the West sacked Constantinople. Eastern Christians never recovered from this outrage. In recent years efforts to reconcile the Roman Catholic and Greek Orthodox churches have failed. In 1965, Pope Paul VI lifted the ban of excommunication against Michael Cerularius. However, the problem of papal rule has been rendered more difficult by nineteenth century Roman declarations of papal infallibility. The wording of the creed has not been settled.

C. T. MARSHALL

See also FILIOQUE.

Bibliography. F. Dvornik, Byzantium and the Roman Primacy; J. Pelikan, Spirit of Eastern Christendom (600–1700); S. Runciman, Eastern Schism; P. Sherrad, Greek East and the Latin West; T. Ware, Orthodox Church.

Schlatter, Adolf von (1852–1938). German NT scholar and theologian. Born in St. Gallen and educated at Basel and Tübingen, where he apparently was influenced by the conservative biblicist J. T. Beck, Schlatter entered the pastorate in his native Switzerland and then began teaching at Bern in 1880. Professorships followed at Greifswald (1888), Berlin (1893), and finally Tübingen (1898), where he spent his most productive years.

Schlatter was one of the most respected voices of conservative scholarship in early-twentieth-century Germany. He felt that a precise knowledge of the religion of late Judaism and history of the intertestamental period was necessary for a proper understanding of the NT, and his research opened new paths for NT exegesis. Besides several large commentaries and numerous Erläuterungen designed to assist ordinary Bible readers, he authored major historical studies of Israel (1901) and the early church (1926, Church in the New Testament Period). He distinguished himself in systematics with substantial works in dogmatics (1911), ethics (1914), and NT theology (1921–22). He prepared the way for the rejection of idealism by modern theologians by emphasizing the facts of faith in the life of Jesus rather than speculative thought. He also copublished an important theological journal, Beiträge zur Förderung christlicher Theologie.

Although he identified with no ecclesiastical party and was ecumenical in his outlook—in effect a mediator between the two Protestant confessions, Reformation and modern thought, and liberalism and pietism—Schlatter sided with the conservative view of the priority of Matthew's Gospel and stressed the crucial role of God and his acts in history. He was concerned with the social aspects of Christianity, as evidenced by his lifelong friendship with Friedrich von Bodelschwingh of the Bethel Institution. His major writings are now being made available in English, and his commentaries and popular works continue to enjoy a wide audience among pietistic circles in present-day Germany.

R. V. PIERARD

See also HEILSGESCHICHTE.

Bibliography. A. Schlatter, History of the Christ; R. Morgan, Nature of New Testament Theology: The Contribution of William Wrede and Adolf Schlatter; W. Z. Neuer, Adolf Schlatter.

Schleiermacher, Friedrich Daniel Ernst (1768–1834). The most influential theologian of the nineteenth century, often called the father of liberal Protestant theology or theology of religious experience. Born in Breslau in 1768, son of a Reformed military chaplain, he experienced conversion under Moravian influences. As his thinking progressed he found pietism intellectually unsatisfying, although he called himself a “Moravian of a higher order.” In 1787 he entered the University of Halle and enthusiastically read Plato and Kant on ethics and later the works of Spinoza.

Schleiermacher's intellectual development was profoundly influenced after 1796 by his association in Berlin with the flowering romantic movement, which revolted against classical norms in literature and art and the arid rationalism of the Enlightenment. Prodded by Friedrich Schlegel, a leader of the new movement, Schleiermacher wrote On Religion: Speeches to Its Cultured Despisers in 1799 to address his fellow romantics. He claimed that they had renounced religion because rationalists had wrongly reduced its essence either to knowledge acquired through reason and expressed in doctrines, or morality perceived through conscience and demonstrated in moral behavior. In doing so they had ignored feeling or intuition, not only a primary component of romanticism, but the very essence of religion. Schleiermacher therefore redefined religion as a unique element of human experience, not located in the cognitive or moral faculties, which produce only an indirect knowledge of God by inference, but in intuition which yields immediate experience of God.

Such a redefinition of the essence of religion did not reduce it to mere psychological emotion or mystical absorption, but it did make religion radically subjective. His claim that piety arises from the experience of God (the Infinite) through our experience of the world (the finite), not from rational metaphysics or doctrinal reflection, paralleled a dominant romantic theme. People understand the world in which they live more through imagination and intuitive experiences in nature than by studying it through rational analysis or scientific method. Schleiermacher's emphasis on God's immanence, his presence in the world, and the believer's subjective experience of God rather than God's transcendence and objective reality led traditionalists repeatedly to charge him with pantheism. On Religion is significant because it introduced a new conception of religion that inverted traditional methods of theology. Rather than religious experience growing out of doctrinal expressions or ecclesiastical life, religion itself was posited as the unique, primal experience of human existence.

Schleiermacher left Berlin in 1804 to become a professor of theology at the University of Halle, where he demonstrated his breadth of learning by teaching every subject in the curriculum except OT. In 1807 he returned to Berlin, lectured on Greek philosophy, and began preaching in Trinity Church, where he continued until two weeks before he died in 1834. He helped plan the University of Berlin and became professor of theology when the school was founded in 1810.

Just as Kant had subjectivized knowledge by reducing its apprehension to the categories of human understanding, and subsequently reinterpreted Christianity in Religion within the Limits of Reason Alone as a deistic moralism, so Schleiermacher recast theological method and content in Christian Faith (1821) in keeping with his romantic redefinition of religion. In his mature thought he defined religion as "the feeling of absolute dependence" or "God-consciousness." Theological statements do not rest on propositional revelation nor do they describe God in any objective manner. Rather, theological statements relate the Christian feeling of absolute dependence to God. Theology is a historical discipline whose task is to record the religious experience of each new generation.

Schleiermacher's synthesis broke from Reformed, Augustinian, and Pauline theology on original sin by denying a historical fall. Rather than an actual event, the fall in Genesis is a story which illustrates how individual acts of sin result from the sinful nature in all people. He denied both that original sin is an inherited corruption and that Adam was created righteous and by sinning plunged the human race into sin. Human nature has always been a mixture of "original righteousness" (potential God-consciousness) and "original sinfulness" (God-forgetfulness). Righteousness and sin coexist within human nature from the beginning; they do not distinguish between man as originally created and man after the fall. Sin in Genesis 3 is not a willful rebellion against a sovereign Creator but merely a shortcoming in which one subordinates the feeling of absolute dependence to such temporal concerns as pleasure and pain.

Despite their potential for God-consciousness humans are unable to save themselves. Christianity's superiority to other religions is found in its provision of redemption through Jesus Christ. Schleiermacher criticized traditional discussions of the atonement because they stressed belief in ideas about Christ, not the experience of redemption itself. As Redeemer Christ is both the ideal example and source of God-consciousness which overcomes sin. He contended that believers experience regeneration (Jesus' God-consciousness) by participating in the corporate life of the contemporary church, rather than by merely believing in Christ's death and resurrection in history. He pointed out that Jesus' disciples were drawn into Jesus' God-consciousness prior to their belief in the resurrection. He called his view of redemption "mystical" to distinguish it from the Reformed view, which he called "magical," which focuses on Christ's substitutionary work, a transaction between Christ and the Father external to the believer's religious experience. Such a view is too objective and individualistic, and it neglects the role the community of believers plays in mediating redemption. At the same time he also rejected natural views of the atonement such as Kant's that reduced redemption to moral obedience.

Schleiermacher's revision of Christian theology had its most lasting impact on the issue of authority. No external authority, whether it be Scripture, church, or historic creedal statement, takes precedence over the immediate experience of believers. This contributed to a more critical approach to the Bible by questioning its inspiration and authority, and to a rejection of doctrines he believed unrelated to people's religious experience of redemption such as the virgin birth, the Trinity, and the return of Christ—tenets which implied a speculative and thus indirect knowledge rather than immediate God-consciousness.

These ideas gained wide acceptance in the nineteenth century. Schleiermacher's influence was evident not only in the demise of Enlightenment deism in Europe but also in the rise of theological liberalism in America, where disputes between modernist and fundamentalists concerning the authority of Scripture and the deity and resurrection of Christ raged in the 1920s. His ideas were sharply challenged after World War I by the neo-orthodox theologian Karl Barth, who charged that not only were essential doctrines reinterpreted, but Christianity's uniqueness was compromised by making it merely one among many forms of religion.

Schleiermacher, Friedrich Daniel Ernst

Recent scholarship has revised the hostile evaluation of Schleiermacher as exemplified by Barth. Some point out that Schleiermacher's theological approach actually presaged Barth's Christocentrism and rejection of natural theology. Also his emphasis on friendship and intuition anticipated contemporary feminist studies in theology.

W. A. HOFFECKER

See also LIBERALISM, THEOLOGICAL; ROMANTICISM.

Bibliography. F. Schleiermacher, Brief Outline on the Study of Theology; K. Barth, Protestant Thought from Rousseau to Ritschl; Theology of Schleiermacher; R. R. Brandt, Philosophy of Schleiermacher; B. A. Gerrish, Prince of the Church; J. Hick, Evil and the God of Love; H. R. Mackintosh, Types of Modern Theology; R. R. Niebuhr, Schleiermacher on Christ and Religion; M. Redeker, Schleiermacher: Life and Thought; C. Welch, Protestant Thought in the Nineteenth Century; R. R. Williams, Schleiermacher the Theologian.

Schleitheim, Seven Articles of. See MENNONITES.

Schmucker, Samuel Simon (1799–1873). Leader of “American” or “New School” Lutheranism in the United States in the fifty years before the Civil War. As opposed to “European” or “Old” Lutheranism, Schmucker sought an accommodation between American Protestantism and traditional Lutheran distinctives. Schmucker, a graduate of Presbyterian Princeton Seminary, gave his life to serving Lutherans with the aim of benefiting American Christianity generally. He was a founder, professor of theology, and president of Gettysburg Lutheran Seminary and a vital force in the General Synod of Lutheran churches that had been formed in 1820. At the same time, he moved beyond traditional Lutheranism by supporting revivalism, aiding the development of interdenominational agencies like the American Sunday School Union, and speaking out on national issues (like many of his fellow Americans he expressed fears about immigrants and Roman Catholics).

What was most upsetting to traditional Lutherans, however, were Schmucker's proposed modifications to the Augsburg Confession. Schmucker did not believe in a real presence of Christ's body in the Lord's Supper; he rejected private confession; he doubted the Lutheran teaching on baptismal regeneration; and he desired a much stronger emphasis on keeping the sabbath. Schmucker's Lutheran opponents soon came to regard him as a dangerous advocate of “modern American Puritanism.”

Schmucker's views were widely shared by American Lutherans until about the time of the Civil War. Then, however, growing numbers of immigrants from Germany and Scandinavia, who brought to America a renewed interest in the heritage of the Reformation, greatly lessened Schmucker's influence. His own works, like Fraternal Appeal to the American Churches (1838), combined traditional Lutheranism and modern American emphases. The anonymous Definite Synodical Platform of 1855, which proposed a revision of the Augsburg Confession along lines favored by Schmucker, precipitated a clash of interests which eventually led to the triumph of European Lutheranism over Schmucker's American variation.

M. A. NOLL

Bibliography. S. Schmucker, Fraternal Appeal to the American Churches; Schmucker Family and the Lutheran Church in America; A. Anstadt, Life and Times of Rev. S. S. Schmucker; V. Ferm, American Lutheran Theology: A Study of the Issue between American Lutheranism and Old Lutheranism; P. P. Kvenning, Rise and Fall of American Lutheran Pietism; C. E. Nelson, ed., Lutherans in North America; A. R. Wentz, Pioneer in Christian Unity.

Scholasticism. A form of Christian philosophy and theology developed by scholars who came to be called schoolmen. It flourished during the medieval period of European history. The heart of scholasticism insisted upon a system that was clear and definitional in tone. The system attempted to synthesize ideas expressed in classical Roman and Greek writing and in Christian Scripture, the writing of the patristic fathers, and other Christian writings preceding the medieval period. Aristotle's views helped give scholasticism a systematic structure, but Platonism also played a large part in the enterprise.

Some persons consider scholasticism to have been a boring, dry system emphasizing sheer memorization. However, in many respects it was dynamic, truly seeking to settle questions concerning reality. The Disputed Questions of Thomas Aquinas, rather than his Summa, point out the vibrancy of the system. The philosophical aspects of scholasticism were not dictated strictly by a set of theological dogmas but rather worked with both faith and reason in an attempt to understand reality from the viewpoint of a human being.

The method of scholasticism sought to understand the fundamental aspects of theology, philosophy, and law. Apparently contradictory viewpoints were offered in order to show how they possibly could be synthesized through reasonable interpretation. A problem would first be “exposed,” and then it would be “disputed” in order to cause a “discovery” in the mind of the person who was seeking new personal knowledge. Each text investigated had a commentary. The master helped the student to read the text in such a way that he could really understand what it was saying. This experience was to be much more than just memorative. There were yes-and-no positions to various texts, which sought to keep the student from merely memorizing the text. Abelard developed the yes-and-no method with great precision. The two most exciting types of disputations were the quaestio disputata, which was a disputed question, and the quodlibet, which was a very subtle form of disputed question that could be publicly disputed only by a truly great master, whereas the disputed questions could be talked about by lesser minds still growing in knowledge.

Anselm of Canterbury is the first great developer of scholasticism. His Monologion investigates problems surrounding God from a reasonable and yet prayerful viewpoint. He developed the famous principle "faith seeking to know."

Peter Abelard sought to show various ways in which contradictory texts could be synthesized. He became involved in the disputed question concerning whether "universals" were really things or merely names.

Gilbert de la Porree continued to develop various views in a scholastic manner. Hugh of St. Victor sought to give scholasticism more of a mystical flare; he was criticized by many because of his lack of reasonableness. He was deeply indebted to Augustine for his views. Bernard of Clairvaux developed a psychological view in scholasticism that, although wedded to a form of mysticism, sought to be more reasonable than mystical.

Peter Lombard developed a series of "sentences" that were to be taught to seminarians studying for the priesthood in the twelfth century. These scholastic sentences were usually simple and capable of being memorized by the students. It is this form of scholasticism that has caused many persons to discredit it as an uncreative experience.

Albert the Great (Albertus Magnus) was not much of an improvement over Peter Lombard, but he deeply influenced Thomas Aquinas, who was the apogee of scholastic thought. Thomism has many forms, but they are all trying to interpret the system of thought developed by Thomas Aquinas. His great effort was to combine what could be called non-Christian philosophy with both Christian philosophy and theology. Christian Scripture could be combined with elements of ideas discovered by natural thought unaided by the grace of Scripture. Thomas Aquinas was heavily influenced by not only Aristotelianism but also Platonism. He also attempted to combine the thought of Averroes into his system. A number of his contemporaries considered some of his ideas to be heretical. Cardinal Tempier of Paris was especially disturbed by his view concerning the resurrection of the body as it was presented in his Disputed Questions.

Bonaventure was another great schoolman, but his style of presentation is turgid and pales somewhat in relation to the presentations of Aquinas. Bonaventure was quite polemical in his attacks against Aristotelianism, which undermined his attempt to be reasonable.

In the fourteenth century Giles of Rome presented some brilliance within the scholastic tradition, but he was not very consequential in comparison to Aquinas. The great scholastic thinker of the fourteenth century was John Duns Scotus. He had an extremely subtle understanding of the use of words. He was chiefly interested in the problem of epistemology. His school of thought, Scotism, influenced many people in later ages, including Martin Heidegger and Ludwig Wittgenstein. William of Ockham rounds out the glorious age of scholasticism. He was called a nominalist because he wondered if exterior reality to the human mind was given a series of words which remained primarily in the mind. For William of Ockham it was unclear that the human mind could actually know exterior reality.

Scholasticism went into desuetude in the fifteenth century, but it was revived in the sixteenth century. The twentieth century has experienced a renewed attempt to make the Thomistic form of scholasticism credible as a system of thought. This movement within Roman Catholic circles has been partially successful. T. J. GERMAN

See also ABELARD, PETER; ALBERTUS MAGNUS; ANSELM OF CANTERBURY; BONAVENTURE; DUNS SCOTUS, JOHN; PETER LOMBARD; THOMAS AQUINAS; WILLIAM OF OCKHAM.

Bibliography. F. C. Copleston, History of Philosophy; É. Gilson, Christian Philosophy of St. Thomas Aquinas; History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages; Spirit of Medieval Philosophy; Unity of Philosophical Experience; N. Kretzmann, A. Kenny, and J. Pinborg, eds., Cambridge History of Later Medieval Philosophy; P. O. Kristeller, Renaissance Thought: The Classic, Scholastic, and Humanist Strains; A. McGrath, Reformation Thought; R. A. Muller, Post-Reformation Reformed Dogmatics; J. Pieper, Scholasticism.

Scholasticism, Protestant. A method of thinking developed in early Protestantism, which grew stronger in the seventeenth century and became a widely accepted way to create systematic Protestant theologies. Even though the major Protestant Reformers attacked the theology of the medieval schoolmen and demanded total reliance on Scripture, it was impossible either to purge all scholastic methods and attitudes derived from classical authors or to avoid conflicts that required intricate theological reasoning as well as biblical interpretation.

Scholasticism, Protestant

Several factors account for the growth of Protestant scholasticism: formal education, confidence in reason, and religious controversy. Reliance on logical methods derived from Greek and Roman authors was not purged from sixteenth century educational institutions. Aristotle, for example, upon whom the medieval scholastics had relied, continued to be taught by Protestants: Melancthon at Wittenberg, Peter Martyr Vermigli at Oxford, Jerome Zanchi at Strasbourg, Conrad Gesner at Zurich, Theodore Beza at Geneva. Though these teachers did not accept Thomas Aquinas's medieval scholastic theology, which also relied heavily on Aristotle's logic and philosophy, they did teach Aristotle's deductive logic and gave reason an important place in theology.

Though Luther (following William of Ockham) and Calvin (following French humanists) decried scholastic reliance on reason and wanted instead to limit their theology to humanist linguistic analysis of Scripture, the Protestant scholastics, without breaking from the major Reformers, were more amenable to human reason. Reason became a means to develop coherent theology out of the great variety of biblical texts. Further, Renaissance learning, though it stressed textual analysis, also placed confidence in human rationality. The Protestant use of scholastic techniques and attitudes consequently kept them in the mainstream of early modern philosophy, which, though it moved away from deductive logic, maintained confidence in reason. Protestant theologians, especially the Calvinists, could use scholastic methods to inquire beyond biblical texts into the intricacies and implications of Protestant theology, especially when election and the will of God were considered.

Theological controversy also encouraged Protestant scholasticism. When Luther and Zwingli disagreed over the Lord's Supper and when Calvinists entered great controversies over predestination, protagonists often resorted to scholastic logic. The controversies themselves called for thorough, intricate argumentation; for biblical texts on the issues were interpreted in a variety of ways. Also, those who won the controversies embodied victory in tightly reasoned doctrinal statements. Thus, there is strong evidence of Protestant scholasticism in the Canons of Dort, the Westminster Confession, and the Helvetic Confession of 1675.

The influence of Protestant scholasticism was both immediate and long-range. Among Lutherans, the essential doctrine of justification by faith was transformed into a rather complicated theory of conversion by the most famous Lutheran scholastic, Johann Gerhard (1582–1637). Gerhard used Aristotelian and scriptural proof in his Loci Theologici (9 vols.). While this work was important for shaping Lutheran orthodoxy, in the seventeenth century German pietists replaced scholasticism with a greater emphasis on experiential Christianity. Among the Reformed, two scholastic traditions were developed. Peter Ramus modeled his logic on Plato and Cicero in an attempt to avoid too great an emphasis on metaphysics. Though his work was banned in various continental Protestant centers (Wittenberg, Leiden Helmstedt, Geneva), Ramus had a great influence on Puritan thought in England and America. The dominant Reformed scholastics, however, were Beza, Vermigli, Adrianus Heerebout, and, most importantly, Francis Turretin (1623–87). Turretin's Institutio became the standard work for modern Protestant scholastics, as it was used as a textbook to shape the modern Princeton Theology. Reformed scholasticism in this tradition led to what is generally labeled Calvinist orthodoxy.

The theology of this branch of Protestant scholasticism was, as in the case of Gerhard, dependent on scriptural evidences and Aristotelian logic. The Reformed scholastics concentrated for the most part on questions evolving from predestination and thus produced a rather rigid Calvinism. At the same time, the movement was amenable to the use of reason, thus allowing the Reformed to adapt to modern rationalist and Enlightenment philosophy quite easily. Noteworthy in this regard is the rather easy accommodation of philosophy and theology in the Scottish Enlightenment. The impact of Protestant scholasticism's methods and outlook was threefold: it created a systematic, well-defined, and aggressive Protestant theology; it led to a reaction by those who emphasized the emotional character of Christian piety; and it encouraged accommodation to early modern philosophy.

R. J. VANDERMOLEN

See also BEZA, THEODORE; GERHARD, JOHANN; PETER MARTYR VERMIGLI; RAMUS, PETER; TURRETIN, FRANCIS.

Bibliography. B. Armstrong, Calvinism and the Amyraut Heresy; J. W. Beardslee, ed. and trans., Reformed Dogmatics; J. P. Donnelly, "Italian Influences on the Development of Calvinist Scholasticism," SCJ 7:81–101; O. Grundler, "Influence of Thomas Aquinas upon the Theology of G. Zanchi," in Studies in Medieval Culture; B. Hall, "Calvin against the Calvinists," in John Calvin, G. E. Duffield, ed.; P. O. Kristeller, Renaissance Thought: The Classic, Scholastic, and Humanist Strains; J. H. Leith, Introduction to the Reformed Tradition; R. Scharlemann, Aquinas and Gerhard: Theological Controversy and Construction in Medieval and Protestant Scholasticism.

Schoolmen. See SCHOLASTICISM.

Schüssler Fiorenza, Elisabeth (b. 1938). Born and educated in Germany, Schüssler Fiorenza immigrated to the United States in 1970 and began her two-decade teaching career at the University of Notre Dame. She currently holds the Krister Stendahl professorship at Harvard Divinity School, where she specializes in Scripture and interpretation. Though ecumenical in her orientation and influence, she remains a loyal, but critical, daughter of the Roman Catholic church.

A biblical scholar by training, holding degrees from the University of Würzburg (M.Div., 1962, Lic. Theol., 1963) and the University of Münster (Dr. Theol., 1970), Schüssler Fiorenza is easily the most critical and creative feminist theologian on the contemporary scene. Her ground-breaking work, In Memory of Her: A Feminist Reconstruction of Christian Origins (1983), established her international reputation (it has been translated into eight languages) and set the agenda and standard for Christian feminist scholarship in the last decades of the twentieth century and well into the future. She served as president of the Society of Biblical Literature in 1987—a first for a woman—and co-founded the pioneering Journal of Feminist Studies in Religion (1985–). She has edited or co-edited numerous works, including the two-volume Searching the Scriptures: A Feminist Introduction and Commentary (1993).

According to Schüssler Fiorenza's reconstruction, Christianity was originally a radically democratic movement inaugurated by Jesus, the representative of the divine Wisdom (Sophia in Greek), in which women exercised prominent leadership roles in the "discipleship community of equals" that signaled the presence of the kingdom of God (most recently written as G*d to "visibly destabilize" theological thought and speech). She arrives at this conclusion by a combination of traditional historical-critical method and a "hermeneutics of suspicion" by which the "patriarchal-androcentric" texts of the New Testament are sifted to recover the original egalitarianism of the Christian movement (glimpsed in such texts as Matt. 23:9; Mark 10:42–45; Luke 7:35) from the subordination of women and slaves that developed later as a survival strategy in the patriarchal order of Greco-Roman society.

The "hermeneutical center" of Schüssler Fiorenza's feminist biblical interpretation is "the ekklesia of wo/men." The transliteration of ekklesia (earlier simply "church") calls attention to its secular meaning in Greek for "the actual assembly of free citizens gathering for deciding their own spiritual-political affairs," a meaning more suited to "radically democratic praxis" than its actual linguistic use in the Old Testament for the qēhal Yahweh. "Wo/men" (earlier simply "women") is written this way to refer to all women and also oppressed and marginalized men. The goal of feminist theology is to free wo/men from "the multiplicative structures of oppression" (racism, class exploitation, heterosexism, colonialism), particularly as they come to expression in the "kyriarchy" of white, European-American, elite, educated men, and "to practice the inclusive discipleship of equals, making it a present reality among poor, hungry, abused, and alienated wo/men."

Although her work contains numerous valuable exegetical insights, Schüssler Fiorenza explicitly makes "the authority of women's experience struggling for liberation" the criterion for revelation, which is not found in texts but in the life of Jesus and the discipleship of equals. The most serious consequences of this stance become apparent in her interpretation of the cross: "The Sophia-God of Jesus does not need atonement or sacrifices. Jesus' death is not willed by God but is the result of his all-inclusive praxis as Sophia's prophet" (In Memory of Her, 135). In other words, Jesus did not die "for our sins" (1 Cor. 15:3) but because of the sins of the Roman imperium.

D. C. JONES

Bibliography. E. Schüssler Fiorenza, Book of Revelation—Justice and Judgment; Bread Not Stone; But She Said; "Changing the Paradigms," CCen (Sept. 5–12, 1990) 796–800; Discipleship of Equals; "Ethics of Biblical Interpretation," JBL 107:3–17; In Memory of Her; Jesus: Miriam's Child, Sophia's Prophet; Revelation: Vision of a Just World.

Schwabach, Articles of (1529). Lutheran confessional document, prepared by Melancthon and other Wittenberg theologians. In their final form the seventeen constituent articles provided the basis for the first part of the Augsburg Confession (1530). They were directed against Roman Catholics, Zwinglians, and Anabaptists, and set forth the Lutheran understanding of the Eucharist. The tenth article, for example, declared that "in the bread and wine the body and blood of Christ are truly present, according to the word of Christ." With the exception of the section on the Eucharist, the articles were accepted at the Colloquy of Marburg in 1529 and were regarded as a touchstone of Lutheran orthodoxy. The purpose of the confession, which had been commissioned by the elector of Saxony, John the Steadfast, was to provide a unifying document for the various Reformers and their followers. It was accepted by the rulers of Saxony and Brandenburg, and John presented it to Emperor Charles V in 1530, prior to the Diet of Augsburg, as Saxony's official confession of faith.

J. D. DOUGLAS

See also AUGSBURG CONFESSION; CONFESSIONS OF FAITH; MARBURG COLLOQUY.

Schweitzer, Albert (1875–1965). German theologian, medical missionary, and musicologist. Born into a Lutheran pastor's family in Alsace, he studied organ as a child and took degrees in theology and philosophy at the University of Strasbourg. He then served in a clerical post in the city and taught at the university. His early theological work was devoted to the messiahship and suffering of Jesus (Mystery of the Kingdom of God, 1901), and his most noteworthy book, Quest of the Historical Jesus (1906), established his theological reputation. He also distinguished himself as a student of the baroque organ with the study J. S. Bach (1908), an eight-volume critical edition of Bach's organ works, and a book of German and French organ construction (1906).

His experience in charitable work among the homeless and ex-prisoners in Strasbourg stimulated an interest to devote himself to the service of humanity, and after reading about the Congo mission in the Paris Mission Society magazine, he decided to study medicine. After eight years of study and completion of a dissertation refuting the theory that Jesus was paranoid (Psychiatric Study of Jesus), he received an M.D. at Strasbourg in 1913 and left immediately for the mission at Lambaréné in Gabon. With his wife, a nurse, he founded a jungle hospital that eventually became world famous. Expelled from Africa as an enemy alien in 1917, Schweitzer spent the next seven years discussing his medical endeavors and preparing a two-volume work on the philosophy of religion, Philosophy of Civilization (1923).

In the subsequent years he expanded his hospital complex through funds raised in lecture tours and recitals. He also authored books on the mysticism of Paul (1930), Goethe (1932), and Indian thought (1935); and popularized his famous ethical principle of reverence for life in several autobiographical works and in Light within Us (1959) and Teaching of the Reverence for Life (1965). He received the Nobel Peace Prize in 1952 and in later life was a strong opponent of atomic weapons. Many criticized him for exercising a paternalistic control over his hospitals and not maintaining modern standards of sanitation.

Schweitzer believed he had found the real historical Jesus, but he differed from that conceived of by liberal Protestants. Schweitzer said Jesus preached the message of the coming kingdom of God as understood in thoroughgoing contemporary Jewish apocalyptic thinking (dubbed "Consistent Eschatology" by theologians) and mistakenly tried to provoke the intervention of God and bring about the end of history by challenging the powers of his own day. He was crushed by the wheel of history, and the eschatology by which he had lived was destroyed. But his "spirit" lives on, and we are called to share it. Schweitzer's work in Africa was a monument to his understanding of what following the spirit of Jesus means. Although he was uncertain about traditional Christian dogma, he strongly emphasized the ethical side of life and the necessity for discipleship.

R. V. PIERARD

See also CONSISTENT ESCHATOLOGY; JESUS CHRIST.

Bibliography. A. Schweitzer, African Notebook; Memoirs of Childhood and Youth; More from the Primeval Forest; On the Edge of the Primeval Forest; Out of My Life and Thought; J. Brabazon, Albert Schweitzer: A Biography; H. Clark, Ethical Mysticism of Albert Schweitzer; Philosophy of Albert Schweitzer; N. Cousins, Dr. Schweitzer of Lambaréné; J. Feschotte, Albert Schweitzer: An Introduction; J. L. Ice, Schweitzer: Prophet of Radical Theology; C. R. Joy, ed., Albert Schweitzer: An Anthology; Animal World of Albert Schweitzer: Jungle Insights into Reverence for Life; G. N. Marshall, Understanding of Albert Schweitzer; G. McKnight, Verdict on Schweitzer; W. R. V. Picht, Life and Thought of Albert Schweitzer; G. Seaver, Albert Schweitzer: The Man and His Mind; H. Willmer, NIDCC 888.

Schwenckfeld, Kasper von Ossig (1489–1561). Mystic, lay theologian, and Silesian nobleman. Schwenckfeld was a university-educated courtier and early supporter of Lutheran reforms in Silesia, ca. 1520–26. He initially broke with Luther and other Reformers over the nature and meaning of the Lord's Supper, and advocated a suspension of reforms until the major parties could agree. His own spiritualized concept of the Supper focused on an inward partaking of Christ's heavenly flesh and was denounced by Luther. Schwenckfeld hoped to develop a "royal" or middle course between Lutheranism and Catholicism, both of which he felt were overly concerned with outward practices.

Political pressure forced Schwenckfeld to resign his post as religious advisor to Duke Frederick II and to go into voluntary exile in 1529. He spent the next few years in Strasbourg, where he at first enjoyed the support of Reformers Capito and Bucer. However, the Marburg Colloquy (1529), which attempted to settle the controversy between Luther and Zwingli and others concerning the Lord's Supper, dismissed Schwenckfeld's views. While in Strasbourg he also came into contact with various Anabaptist leaders, especially Pilgram Marpeck. Although he chided their emphasis on external baptism, church discipline, and radical eschatology, Schwenckfeld was himself critical of infant baptism, participation in war, and swearing oaths.

At the center of Schwenckfeld's thought was the conviction that all religious life should be an internal spiritual quality. He stressed the necessity of a rebirth and inner experience of faith rather than justification by faith. All outward creeds and forms were unnecessary and should be avoided. The true church is invisible—neither the "mixed multitude" (territorial church) continued by the mainline Reformers, nor the visible, voluntary sect stressed by the Anabaptists.

Schwenckfeld was forced to leave Strasbourg in 1534 and Ulm in 1539. He thereafter wandered from place to place preaching and writing, evading his persecutors and seeking refuge with sympathizers. His doctrines were condemned by a gathering of evangelical Reformers led by Melancthon in 1540 (Smalcald Convention) and the Formula of Concord (1575). He died at Ulm in December 1561.

Although Schwenckfeld's evangelical spiritualism anticipated later developments in pietism and the Society of Friends, he refused to organize his followers. A Schwenckfelder Church developed after 1540 out of spiritualists who treasured his numerous writings. Small groups of "Confessors of the Glory of Christ" developed in Silesia, Swabia, Prussia, and elsewhere. One center at Goldberg in Silesia flourished till about 1720, when its members were denied toleration and forced to seek refuge in Saxony. Some eventually migrated to eastern Pennsylvania in 1735, where a Society of Schwenckfelders was organized in 1782.

D. B. ELLER

See also MYSTICISM.

Bibliography. P. C. Erb, Schwenckfeld in His Reformation Setting; H. W. Kriebel, Schwenckfelders in Pennsylvania; F. W. Loetscher, Schwenckfeld's Participation in the Eucharistic Controversy of the Sixteenth Century; P. L. Maier, Casper Schwenckfeld on the Person and Work of Christ; R. E. McLaughlin, Casper Schwenckfeld, Reluctant Radical; J. S. Rothenberger, Casper Schwenckfeld von Ossig and the Ecumenical Idea; S. G. Schultz, Casper Schwenckfeld von Ossig; A. Sequenny, Christology of Caspar Schwenckfeld; J. H. Sexpel, Schwenckfeld, Knight of Faith.

Science and Health, with a Key to the Scriptures. See CHURCH OF CHRIST, SCIENTIST.

Science and Theology. The history of the interaction between science and theology is a complicated affair, and it is generally recognized today that a warfare metaphor—theology and science are constantly at war, with theology the regular loser—is a simplistic, false picture of the nature of this interaction. Moreover, the warfare model was a Whiggish reinterpretation of the history of science designed to discredit Christianity and promote scientific naturalism. It is true that there have been occasional skirmishes between science and theology. But theology has not always lost those encounters (e.g., theologians at the time of Darwin predicted that the fossil record would not teem with transition forms as Darwin claimed and the theologians were correct), and interaction between the two is too rich and multifaceted to be captured by a single model.

Scientism. For many today, the very idea of integrating science and theology sounds inappropriate because of the low cognitive status assigned to theology. This attitude is an expression of scientism, the view that science is the very paradigm of truth and rationality. There are two forms of scientism: strong scientism and weak scientism. Strong scientism is the view that some proposition or theory is true or rational to believe if and only if it is a scientific proposition or theory, that is, if and only if it is a well-established scientific proposition or theory which, in turn, depends upon its having been successfully formed, tested, and used according to appropriate scientific methodology. There are no truths apart from scientific truths, and even if there were, there would be no reason whatever to believe them.

Advocates of weak scientism allow for the existence of truths apart from science and are even willing to grant that they can have some minimal, positive rationality status without the support of science. But advocates of weak scientism still hold that science is the most valuable, most serious, and most authoritative sector of human learning. Every other intellectual activity is inferior to science. Further, there are virtually no limits to science. There is no field into which scientific research cannot shed light. To the degree that some issue outside science can be given scientific support or can be reduced to science, to that degree the issue becomes rationally acceptable. Thus, we have an intellectual and, perhaps, even a moral obligation to try to use science to solve problems in other fields that up to now have been untouched by scientific methodology. For example, we should try to solve problems about the mind by the methods of neurophysiology and computer science.

If either strong or weak scientism is true, this would have drastic implications for the integration of science and theology. If strong scientism is true, then theology is not a cognitive enterprise at all and there is no such thing as theological knowledge. If weak scientism is true, then the conversation between theology and science will be a monologue with theology listening to science and waiting for science to give it support. For thinking Christians, neither of these alternatives is acceptable. What, then, should we say about scientism?

Note first that strong scientism is self-refuting. A proposition (or sentence) is self-refuting if it refers to and falsifies itself. For example, "There are no English sentences" and "There are no truths" are self-refuting. Strong scientism is not itself a proposition of science, but a second order proposition of philosophy about science to the effect that only scientific propositions are true and/or rational to believe. And strong scientism is itself offered as a true, rationally justified position to believe. Now, propositions that are self-refuting do not just happen to be false but could have been true. Self-refuting propositions are necessarily false, that is, it is not possible for them to be true. What this means is that, among other things, no amount of scientific progress in the future will have the slightest effect on making strong scientism more acceptable.

Science and Theology

There are two more problems that count against strong and weak scientism. First, scientism (in both forms) does not adequately allow for the task of stating and defending the necessary presuppositions for science itself to be practiced. Thus, scientism shows itself to be a foe and not a friend of science. Science cannot be practiced in thin air. Science presupposes a number of substantive philosophical theses each of which has been challenged, and the task of stating and defending these assumptions is one of the tasks of philosophy. The conclusions of science cannot be more certain than the presuppositions it rests on and uses to reach those conclusions.

Strong scientism rules out these presuppositions altogether because neither the presuppositions themselves nor their defense are scientific matters. Weak scientism misconstrues their strength in its view that scientific propositions have greater cognitive authority than those of other fields like philosophy. This would mean that the conclusions of science are more certain than the philosophical presuppositions used to justify and reach those conclusions, and that is absurd.

Here is a list of some of the philosophical presuppositions of science: (1) the existence of an independent, external world; (2) the orderly nature of the external world; (3) the knowability of the external world; (4) the existence of truth; (5) the laws of logic; (6) the reliability of our cognitive and sensory faculties to serve as truth gatherers and as a source of justified beliefs in our intellectual environment; (7) the adequacy of language to describe the world; (8) the existence of values used in science (e.g., "test theories fairly and report test results honestly"); (9) the uniformity of nature and induction; and (10) the existence of numbers.

There is a second problem that counts equally against strong and weak scientism: the existence of true and rationally justified beliefs outside of science. The simple fact is that true, rationally justified beliefs exist in a host of fields outside of science. Strong scientism does not allow for this fact and is therefore to be rejected as an adequate account of our intellectual enterprise.

Moreover, some propositions believed outside science (e.g., "red is a color," "torturing babies for fun is wrong," "I am now thinking about science") are better justified than some believed within science (e.g., "evolution takes place through a series of very small steps"). It is not hard to believe that many of our currently held scientific beliefs will and should be revised or abandoned in one hundred years, but it would be hard to see how the same could be said of the extra-scientific propositions just cited. Weak scientism does not account for this fact. Furthermore, when advocates of weak scientism attempt to reduce all issues to scientific ones, this has a distorting effect on an intellectual issue. Arguably, this is the case in current attempts to make the existence and nature of mind a scientific problem. In sum, scientism in both forms is inadequate and it is important for Christians to integrate science and theology with genuine cognitive respect for both.

Models of Integration of Science and Theology. In addressing the issue of integration, one must keep in mind that the problem of how best to formulate the relationship between science and theology is not a scientific question but a question in theology, philosophy, and the history of science. As we look to these fields for insight, we discover several models of integration, each having something important to offer:

1. The Two Realms View: Science and theology are concerned with two distinct realms of reality (the natural/the supernatural, the spatiotemporal/the eternal) and/or science and theology are subservient to very different objects (e.g., the material universe and God) and can only be defined in relation to them. For example, debates about angels or the extent of the atonement have little to do with organic chemistry. Similarly, it is of little interest to theology whether a methane molecule has three or four hydrogen atoms in it.

2. The Scientistic View: Science generates a metaphysic in terms of which theology is then formulated. For example, some process philosophers believe that the worldview of science depicts reality as a system in constant flux and change and, thus, any theology of God must operate within these constraints set down for theology by science. This model of integration is not acceptable for evangelicals except in the following limited way: With due caution, a scientific discovery (e.g., that the earth does not have four corners) can inform the way a biblical text should be interpreted as long as the hermeneutical option so proffered is at least plausible on purely exegetical grounds alone.

3. The Complementarity View: Science and theology are non-interacting, complementary approaches to the same reality that adopt very different standpoints, ask and answer different kinds of questions, involve different levels of description, employ very different cognitive attitudes (e.g., objectivity and logical neutrality in science, personal involvement and commitment in theology), and/or are constituted by very different language games. These different, authentic perspectives are partial and incomplete and, therefore, must be integrated into a coherent whole. However, each level of description is complete at its own level without having gaps at that level for other perspectives to fill and without having the possibility of direct competition and conflict. Sociological aspects of church growth and certain psychological aspects of conversion may be sociological or psychological descriptions of certain phenomena that are complementary to a theological description of church growth or conversion.

4. The Concordist View: Science and theology are interacting approaches to the same reality that can be in conflict in various ways (e.g., mutually exclusive or logically consistent but nevertheless, not mutually reinforcing) or can be in concord in various ways. For example, certain theological teachings about the existence of the soul raise rational problems for philosophical or scientific claims that deny the existence of the soul. The general theory of evolution raises various difficulties for certain ways of understanding the book of Genesis. Some have argued that the Big Bang theory tends to support the theological proposition that the universe had a beginning.

5. The Presuppositional View: Theology provides a context wherein the presuppositions of science (understood in a realist way, i.e., where science is seen as a rational, progressive intellectual activity that secures truer and truer theories about the external, theory-independent world) are most easily justified. Some have argued that many of the presuppositions of science make sense and are easy to justify given Christian theism, but are odd and without ultimate justification in a naturalistic worldview.

6. The Applicational View: Science can fill out details and help to apply theological principles and vice versa. For example, theology teaches that fathers should not provoke their children to anger and psychology can add important details about what this means by offering information about family systems, the nature and causes of anger, etc. Psychology can devise various tests for assessing whether one is or is not a mature person and theology can offer a normative definition to psychology as to what a mature person is.

Methodological Naturalism vs. Theistic Science. The most reasonable view is to take an eclectic position and employ a different model of science/theology interaction when relevant. However, currently the main debate about science/theology integration has on one side those Christians like Howard J. Van Till and Richard Bube who espouse the complementarity view along with a commitment to methodological naturalism and a rejection of theistic science and the concordist position. According to methodological naturalism, the goal of natural science is to offer explanations that refer only to natural objects and events and not to the personal choices and actions of human or divine agents. Within natural science, answers are sought to questions within nature, within the non-personal and contingent created order. Some version of theistic evolution would be embraced by advocates of this position. Thus, they hold that the con-cordist view represents a mistaken understanding of integration.

On the other side are those like Alvin Plantinga and Phillip Johnson who accept some version of theistic science. In its broadest sense, theistic science is rooted in the idea that Christians ought to consult all they know or have reason to believe in forming and testing hypotheses, in explaining things in science, and in evaluating the plausibility of various scientific hypotheses, and among the things they should consult are propositions of theology. So understood, theistic science expresses a commitment to the idea that (1) God, conceived of as a personal agent of great power and intelligence, has through direct, primary agent causation and through indirect, secondary causation created and designed the world for a purpose and has directly intervened in the course of its development at various times (including prehistory, i.e., history prior to the arrival of human beings) and (2) the commitment expressed in proposition one can appropriately enter into the very fabric of the practice of science and the utilization of scientific methodology. Most advocates of theistic science embrace young earth or progressive creationism.

If the complementary view is not combined with methodological naturalism, it is acceptable as part of an eclectic position because it accurately captures part of the way science and theology relate. It is especially helpful when God acts via secondary causes. For example, chemical descriptions of the synthesis of water from hydrogen and oxygen are complementary to a theological description of God's providential governance of the chemicals during the reaction. But when advocates of the complementary view press their position too far by leaving no room for theistic science and the concordist position, their position is hard to justify. This overuse of the complementary model is rooted in an inadequate view of integration and an improper understanding of the history and philosophy of science.

According to the concordist position, science and theology can be directly interacting approaches to the same phenomenon and, thus, can be in conflict or concord in various ways. Sometimes a scientific belief will be logically contradictory to a theological belief. For example, some versions of the oscillating universe model imply a beginningless universe—and this contradicts biblical teaching that there was a beginning. Sometimes science and theology make statements that are not logically contradictory—they could both be true—but are, nevertheless, hard to square with, and tend to count against, each other. For example, most evolutionists have argued that evolutionary theory counts strongly against views of living organisms (including humans) that treat them as having natures or as having substantial souls. According to naturalismtic evolution, living organisms are wholly the result of material processes operating on strictly physical objects (e.g., the “prebiotic soup”). There is no contradiction in holding to naturalistic evolutionary theory and still viewing organisms as creatures with souls and natures, as Christian theology would seem to imply. But the reality of the soul and the existence of natures is hard to square with naturalistic evolutionary theory.

It is also possible for scientific and theological beliefs to be mutually reinforcing. For example, some have argued that the Big Bang has given support to the theological belief that the universe had a beginning. The same thing has been claimed for the second law of thermodynamics when applied to the universe as a whole. Other examples of scientific findings giving support to theological propositions include the delicate balance of various constants of nature (e.g., gravity) needed for any life to appear in the universe, systematic gaps in the fossil record, the information content in DNA, and the nature of human language. In each case, the theological beliefs were already reasonable without science, but scientific discoveries have given further support to them.

The important thing about the concordist model is that it allows for theological beliefs to enter into the very practice of science. Indeed, one cannot read the history of science without seeing that theology has regularly entered into scientific practice, sometimes inappropriately but other times quite appropriately. Any view of science that rules out this fourth model is a revisionist account of science’s history.

Advocates of the concordist position have clarified at least three ways theological beliefs can enter into science. First, theological propositions can provide background beliefs used to evaluate a scientific hypothesis. The theological beliefs that the universe had a beginning and that adultery is sinful and immature can be used to evaluate hypotheses that claim the universe has an infinite past or adultery can be a sign of psychological maturity.

Second, theological beliefs can guide research and yield predictions that can be tested. For example, theological assertions that the basic kinds of life were directly created, that humans arose in the Mideast, and that Noah’s flood had certain properties can yield testable predictions (e.g., gaps will exist in the fossil record; the earliest human remains will be found in the Mideast; and there will be limits to breeding).

Third, the idea of a direct, creative act of God can be used to explain things that are scientifically discoverable. Science can discover information in DNA, that the universe had a beginning, that human language is unique—and theology can provide explanations for these discoveries.

Among the criticisms of theistic science and the concordist model, two have been preminent.

First, it is argued that theistic science employs a “god-of-the-gaps” strategy in which God is believed to act only when there are gaps in nature. Appeal is made to God to cover human ignorance. However, the gaps in our knowledge are getting smaller, and so this is a poor strategy.

Advocates of the concordist position respond by pointing out that theistic science does not limit God’s activity to gaps. Nature is not autonomous. God is constantly active in sustaining and governing the universe. Nor does theistic science appeal to direct acts of God to cover scientific ignorance. Such appeals are made only when there are good theological or philosophical reasons to expect a discontinuity in nature.

Further, concordists cite a distinction between empirical and historical science in defense of theistic science. Empirical science is a nonhistorical approach to the world that focuses on repeatable, regularly recurring events or patterns in nature (e.g., chemical reactions). By contrast, historical science is historical in nature and focuses on past, nonrepeatable events (e.g., the death of dinosaurs). In the history of science, inappropriate appeals to God’s primary causal action to explain a phenomenon have occurred in empirical science. Such appeals were wrong because in these cases God acts through secondary and not primary causation. The proper conclusion from this is to limit appeals to God’s primary casual activity to historical science, not to eliminate such appeals from science altogether.

Here is a second objection to theistic science: science explains things by using natural laws—an act of God is not a law of nature. Concordists point out that this objection is mistaken as well. We do explain things in empirical science by an appeal to natural law. The formation of water from hydrogen and oxygen, for example, is explained by the laws of chemistry. In historical science, however, we explain the existence of something by postulating a causal entity for it. Cosmologists explain some aspect of the universe not only by using natural laws of motion but also by citing the Big Bang as a single causal event. In archeology, psychology, and forensic science, appeals are made to acts or states of agents as causes for phenomena (e.g., a desire for love caused this obsessive behavior). This is not unscientific, and if Christians have reason to suspect that God directly created, say, human beings, then appealing to his actions fits a respectable pattern of scientific explanation.

In sum, there are several aspects to the integration of science and theology, and theistic science is a legitimate part of such integration. Theology doesn’t need science to be rational. There is nothing wrong in principle, however, with bringing one’s theology into the practice of science.

J. P. MORELAND

See also EVOLUTION.

Bibliography. M. Bauman, ed., Man and Creation; R. H. Bube, Putting It All Together; D. C. Lindberg and R. L. Numbers, eds., God and Nature; J. P. Moreland, Christianity and the Nature of Science; Creation Hypothesis; J. P. Moreland and D. M. Ciochi, eds., Christian Perspectives on Being Human; H. M. Morris, Biblical Basis for Modern Science; A. R. Peacocke, ed., Sciences and Theology in the Twentieth Century; N. R. Pearcey and C. B. Thaxton, Soul of Science; D. Ratzsch, Battle of Beginnings; H. J. Van Till, R. E. Snow, J. H. Stek, and D. A. Young, Portraits of Creation.

Scientia Media. Literally “middle knowledge.” Many theologians have said that God knows the world by knowing himself. He knows what is possible or impossible in the world by knowing what he can or cannot do: this knowledge is called the knowledge of simple intelligence or necessary knowledge (since it follows from the very nature of God’s being). He also knows what actually takes place in the world (whether past, present, or future from our point of view) by knowing his own plan, his decree for the world: this knowledge is called the knowledge of vision or free knowledge (since it follows from God’s free decisions concerning the world process). Such a distinction was made by Thomas Aquinas and his Dominican followers. But in the sixteenth century the theologians of the new Jesuit order, seeking to restate the Roman Catholic theology in opposition to the challenges of Protestantism and Jansenism, found this distinction inadequate to do justice to human freedom. They introduced a third form of divine knowledge, a middle knowledge or scientia media. This knowledge (a) is a knowledge of what would happen under such-and-such conditions, and (b) is based, neither upon God’s nature nor upon his decree, but upon the free decisions of created beings. Thus God knows what will happen if David remains in Keilah, and what will happen if he does not (1 Sam. 23:1–13); and he knows it, not because he controls the course of history, but because he knows what free decisions people will make independently of his controlling decree. This concept found favor with Lutherans (e.g., Quenstedt) and with Arminius and some of his followers. The Reformed agree that God knows what would happen under all conditions, but they reject the notion that this knowledge is ever ultimately based on man’s autonomous decisions. Human decisions, they argue, are themselves the effects of God’s eternal decrees (see Acts 2:23; Rom. 9:10–18; Eph. 1:11; Phil. 2:12–13). J. M. FRAME

See also FOREKNOWLEDGE.

Bibliography. H. Bavinck, Doctrine of God; H. Heppel, Reformed Dogmatics; C. Hodge, Systematic Theology.

Scientific Creationism. Scientific creationism (also called “creation science”) has a broad and a narrow usage. In the broad sense, scientific creationism applies to both progressive and young earth creationism. So understood, scientific creationism expresses a commitment to theistic science and opposes methodological naturalism. Theistic science captures the notion that Christians should utilize everything they know or justifiably believe in developing and testing hypotheses, in explaining things in science, and in evaluating the plausibility of various scientific hypotheses, and among the things they should consult are propositions of theology. More specifically, theistic science expresses a commitment to the idea that (1) God, conceived of as a personal agent of great power and intelligence, has through primary and secondary causation created and designed the world for a purpose and has directly intervened in the course of its development at various times (including prehistory, i.e., history prior to the arrival of human beings) and (2) the commitment expressed in proposition one can appropriately enter into every fabric of the practice of science and the utilization of scientific methodology.

This broad sense of scientific creationism stands opposed to methodological naturalism, according to which the goal of natural science is to offer explanations that refer only to natural objects and events and not to the personal choices and actions of human or divine agents. Within natural science, answers are sought to questions within nature, within the non-personal and contingent created order. Thus, theological concepts are merely complementary to scientific concepts and should play no role within the employment of scientific methodology. Some version of theistic evolution would be embraced by advocates of this position.

The debate between advocates of scientific creationism (broadly conceived) and methodological naturalists is a second order philosophical debate about the nature of science, not a first-order debate of science about scientific data. The main argument for the fact that scientific creationism is a religion and not a science (and, thus, should be kept out of public-school science classes) rests on drawing a line of demarcation between science and non-science (e.g., religion) or pseudo-science (e.g., astrology) and claiming that creation science falls on the wrong side of the divide. A line of demarcation consists in a set of necessary and sufficient conditions that something must possess to count as scientific.

In the now infamous Little Rock creation science trial in December 1981, Judge William R. Overton ruled against creation science by using a demarcationist argument. He listed the supposed essential traits of science (it must be guided by and explain things in terms of natural law, be testable against the empirical world, have tentative conclusions, and be falsifiable). However, demarcationist arguments have been a complete failure because there are examples of science that fail to satisfy the conditions and there are cases of non-science that do satisfy them. Given that creation science has been regarded as genuine science throughout much of the history of science, the burden of proof is on those who would deny scientific status to scientific creationism and that burden has not been met. Moreover, advocates of scientific creationism have offered positive arguments for the scientific status of creation science. Thus, regardless of whether scientific creationism provides good models for the scientific data, there are at present no adequate arguments against the scientific status of creation science itself.

Scientific Creationism

A more narrow and widely used sense of “scientific creationism” limits its usage to young earth creationism as advocated by scholars such as Duane Gish and Henry Morris and by organizations such as the Creation Research Society (which produces Creation Research Society Quarterly) and the Institute for Creation Research in San Diego. Gish, Morris, and others are part of ICR and they produce Acts and Facts, a number of other publications, engage in graduate education, and lecture and debate widely.

At least four main areas of debate exist between young earth and progressive creationists. Two of these are the age of the earth and the adequacy of Noah’s flood to explain much of the earth’s geology, especially the fossiliferous sedimentary rock. Progressive creationists may hold to a local or universal flood, take the days of Genesis to be unspecified periods of time, and believe in an age for the universe and earth in terms of billions of years. Young earth creationists accept the literal use of the Hebrew word for day (yôm) in Genesis 1 and 2, embrace a recent, six-day creation and the appearance of age at the original creation week, and require a universal flood. Third, progressive creationists are divided about the existence of human evolution. Some accept the existence of pre-Adamite humanoid forms and claim that God miraculously added a soul or some other distinguishing feature to form an original pair of Homo sapiens. Others believe the creation of the entire constitution of Adam and Eve was recent and by a primary casual miracle. Young earth creationists agree with this second group of progressive creationists. Finally, progressive creationists take Romans 5:12 to teach that spiritual death came as a result of Adam’s sin, but that physical death already existed, perhaps due to an angelic fall. Young earth creationists believe that physical death resulted from Adam’s fall.

J. P. MORELAND

See also EVOLUTION; GAP THEORY; SCIENCE AND THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. J. P. Moreland, Christianity and the Nature of Science; H. Morris, Creation and the Modern Christian; History of Modern Creationism; Scientific Creationism; H. Ross, Creation and Time; Fingerprint of God; R. Youngblood, ed., Genesis Debate.

Scofield, Cyrus Ingerson (1843–1921). Congregational minister and writer. Scofield was born in Mississippi on August 19, 1843, and was raised in Tennessee. He served with distinction in the Confederate Army and then studied law. President Grant appointed him U.S. Attorney for Kansas. Responding to the witness of Thomas McPheeters, a YMCA worker, he was converted in 1879. In 1882 he accepted a Congregational pastorate in Dallas, Texas. His theological education was directed informally by James H. Brookes, a Presbyterian minister who had read widely in J. N. Darby and other Plymouth Brethren writers. Scofield accepted premillennialism and dispensationalism immediately, and his preaching and teaching were shaped by this commitment. His pastoral ministry, both in Dallas (1882–95) and, at D. L. Moody’s urging, in East Northfield, Maine (1895–1902), was marked by strong public response and spiritual blessing. Scofield was an imposing figure, godly in demeanor, and personable. In an age of spiritual decline and modernism he was a faithful herald of foundational evangelical theology. He despised theological compromise, saying, “I would rather spend Sunday morning in a saloon than sitting in a church under the preaching of a modern Higher Critic.” Before the Sea Cliff Conference of 1906 he wrote, “God help us to meet the seriousness of the days in which we live, with an apostate church, an undernourished body, a lost world, and an impending advent as our environment.” From 1902 to 1907 he returned to the Dallas church, which freed him to write and teach.

As impressive as his pulpit ministry was, Scofield’s greatest impact came through his writings. In 1885 he issued Rightly Dividing the Word of Truth. This set the direction for his teaching and, through numerous editions, the agenda for a major segment of American fundamentalism. Two publications reinforced this basic work. Comprehensive Bible Correspondence Course issued first in 1896 supplied a curricular base for churches and Bible schools. However, Scofield Reference Bible was his most important work. Nine years were devoted to this project prior to publication by Oxford University Press in 1909, and over two million copies have been sold. The seven consulting editors agreed on a plan for the work. The text was to be the KJV, but “passages which . . . miss the meaning will be amended.” Believing the Bible to be a “self-interpreting book," he provided a "new system of reference" to assist the scholar. Definitions on "the great pivotal words of scripture," such as atonement, justification, sanctification, kingdom, and church, were to be given. The outline of each book was to appear in the text, along with dispensational divisions. Fulfilled and unfulfilled prophecies, types, and important themes were to be indicated and discussed in footnotes. Scofield did a revision in 1917, at which time Ussher's dates were added.

In 1967 a committee of nine produced New Scofield Reference Bible. The doctrinal system remains the same but the book introductions have been revised, the language updated, the definition of "dispensation" restated, and the early dating by Ussher dropped.

Scofield's system was dispensational, premillennial, and pretribulational. The dispensations, seven in number, were periods of time, each governed by a particular principle. These are innocence, conscience, human government, promise, law, grace, and kingdom. For Scofield the dispensations are seen in the light of God's program of redemption. Contrasting the dispensation of law with that of grace, Scofield says, "The point of testimony is no longer legal obedience as the condition of salvation, but acceptance or rejection of Christ, with good works as the fruit of salvation." The dispensations, says Scofield, show "the majestic, progressive order of the divine dealings of God with humanity, 'the increasing purpose' which runs through and links together the ages, from the beginning of the life of man to the end in eternity." New Scofield Reference Bible allows the dispensations to overlap and is more flexible in interpretation. A modern redirection is found in the 1993 work Progressive Dispensationalism by two Dallas professors Blaising and Bock.

Scofield's teaching has received wide acceptance and considerable criticism. Liberal attacks like that of J. W. Bowman are vitriolic and often miss the point. The reply by C. E. Mason shows where the lines are drawn. The Reformed response to dispensationalism is summarized in O. T. Allis, Prophecy and the Church (1945).

Scofield's zeal for mission must be noted. While studying with Brookes he ran a mission for railroaders and mechanics. He enthusiastically promoted world missions and founded the Central American Mission. In an age when denominational missions suffered from liberal malaise, Bible school people in large numbers went into all the world taking Scofield's works with them. Today his teachings form the theological core in Bible schools around the world. W. N. KERR

See also DISPENSATION, DISPENSATIONALISM; FUNDAMENTALISM.

Bibliography. C. A. Blaising and D. L. Bock, Progressive Dispensationalism; J. W. Bowman, "Dispensationalism," Int 10:170-87; J. M. Canfield, Incredible Scofield and His Book; A. C. Gaebelein, History of the Scofield Reference Bible; A. Pieters, Biographical Sketch of C. I. Scofield; C. G. Trumbull, Life Story of C. I. Scofield.

Scopes Trial (1925). A legal confrontation over the teaching of evolution in a Tennessee high school and one of the turning points in American religious history. The technical side of the trial was simple in the extreme. The state of Tennessee in March 1925 passed a law forbidding the teaching of evolution in its schools. The next month, John T. Scopes, age twenty-four, a biology teacher at Rhea County High School in Dayton, assigned a text that linked mankind with the evolution of vertebrate mammals. Scopes was indicted, tried in July, convicted by a jury that deliberated a total of nine minutes, and given a one-hundred-dollar fine by Judge John Raulston. The conviction was later overturned by the Tennessee Supreme Court on the technical grounds that the jury, rather than the judge, should have set the amount of the fine. Tennessee's antievolution law continued on the books, though not enforced, until 1967.

The real confrontation at Dayton, however, involved the counsel imported into Tennessee for the event—for the prosecution, three-time presidential candidate William Jennings Bryan, who had emerged as the champion of antievolutionary forces after World War I; for the defense, the famous Clarence Darrow, who had only recently defended the Chicago murderers Leopold and Loeb. Bryan seemed to stand for traditional American values—a simple trust in the Bible, a commitment to "simple facts," and a distrust of new "hypotheses"; Darrow for enlightened science, modern thought, and urbane culture.

The trial itself was intensely theatrical. It lasted twelve days, and most of the time was spent arguing whether expert scientific witnesses should be accepted in court. Its climax came on the afternoon of July 20 when the court, recessed to the out-of-doors, allowed Clarence Darrow to call Bryan as a witness for the defense. The questioning of Bryan by Darrow, as prosecutor Arthur Thomas Stewart objected repeatedly, had nothing to do with the trial proper. It had, however, everything to do with the fate of popular evangelicalism in America.

The interrogation rapidly degenerated into nit-picking, as Darrow subjected Bryan to a thorough grilling about the latter's knowledge of the Bible and science. Bryan concluded that the defense had come to Dayton "to cast ridicule on everybody who believes in the Bible. I am perfectly willing," he went on, "that the world shall know that these gentlemen have no other purpose than ridiculing every Christian who believes in the Bible.” Darrow replied, “We have the purpose of preventing bigots and ignoramuses from controlling the education of the United States and you know it, and that is all.”

Scopes Trial

Darrow sounded the depths of Bryan’s ignorance about the age of the earth, the creation and flood myths of other world religions, the story of Jonah, and the supposedly assured results of modern science. Bryan stuck solidly to his conviction that a simple faith could best understand and interpret Scripture. At the end of the one and a half hour exchange Darrow was swarmed by his supporters. Bryan, ironically, was left mostly to himself, for he had alienated the largely fundamentalistic audience when he admitted that the Bible’s six days of creation were probably not meant to be understood literally.

Those who read the transcript of the trial, and not the distorted play and movie based on it, know that neither Bryan nor Darrow carried the day. Bryan did make something of a fool of himself by trying to speak as an expert on science and biblical interpretation. But Darrow was mean-spirited in his attack. Those who read the major newspapers in New York, Atlanta, Los Angeles, Chicago, and Baltimore received an unfair picture of Bryan and his supporters as downright fools, and of Darrow and his allies as paragons of enlightenment. H. L. Mencken, in dispatches to the New York Times and his own Baltimore Sun, was an extreme example of prejudice. He called the Tennessee residents “babbitts,” “peasants,” “yokels,” “morons,” and “hillbillies” before threats of violence induced him to flee Dayton. When Bryan died in his sleep the Sunday after the trial closed, Mencken expressed the glee of many by chortling, “We killed the son-of-a-bitch.”

The Scopes Trial had a major impact on American religious life. It gave fundamentalists a reputation for cultural backwardness that lingers to the present. It solidified the issue of evolution as a focus for concern among theological conservatives. And, although the reality may have been different, it fixed in the popular mind a sharp distinction between rural, evangelical, traditional America and an urban, educated, and secular counterpart.

M. A. NOLL

See also EVOLUTION; FUNDAMENTALISM; SCIENCE AND THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. P. E. Coletta, William Jennings Bryan: Political Puritan, 1915–1925; R. Ginger, Six Days or Forever?: Tennessee v. John Thomas Scopes; E. J. Larson, Trial and Error: The American Controversy over Creation and Evolution; L. W. Levine, Defender of the Faith: William Jennings Bryan; G. M. Marsden, Fundamentalism and American Culture; F. M. Szasz, Divided Mind of Protestant America, 1880–1930.

Scots Confession (1560). The first confession of faith of the Reformed Church of Scotland. It was drawn up in four days by six Scottish Reformers—Knox, Spottiswood, Willock, Row, Douglas, and Winram, each of whom bore the Christian name of John. Knox undoubtedly played the predominant role in this preparation. The Scottish Parliament adopted the confession in 1560 with little opposition. Queen Mary, who still resided in France, refused to ratify the decision, with the result that it did not become the official confession until 1567, when Parliament reenacted it after her deposition. The Scots Confession remained the official confession of the Scottish Reformed Church until it adopted the Westminster Confession of Faith in 1647.

The theology of the Scots Confession is Calvinistic and in general agreement with other creeds of the Reformed churches. In formulating the confession, Knox and his colleagues took into account the thinking and statements of a number of Reformers, e.g., Calvin’s Institutes of the Christian Religion, John à Lasco’s Compendium, and Valerian Poullains’ Liturgia Sacra. It does not, however, merely restate what the Reformers on the continent had said but has some of its own special characteristics. Though the Scots Confession lacks the systematic thoroughness of the larger Westminster Confession, it is a fresh document that bears witness to the living faith of the Scottish Reformation.

The Scots Confession contains twenty-five articles, of which twelve treat the basic doctrines of the Christian faith: God and Trinity; the creation and fall of humanity and the promises of redemption; the incarnation; the passion, resurrection, and ascension of Christ, and his return to judge the earth; atonement through the death of Christ; and sanctification through the Holy Ghost. Though traces of Calvinist emphases are noticeable in these articles, Reformed distinctives arise elsewhere. Justification by faith is assumed; the doctrine of election is affirmed; Christ’s spiritual presence in the Lord’s Supper is emphasized, while transubstantiation and the view that the elements are bare signs are condemned. The “Kirk” (or “Church”) is defined as “catholic”; it consists of the elect, and outside of it there is no salvation. The marks of the true kirk on earth are the true preaching of the word and the right administration of the sacraments and of discipline. Civil magistrates are stated to be lieutenants of God, whose duty it is to conserve and purge the church when necessary; but supreme authority is ascribed to the word of God.

R. KYLE

See also CONFESSIONS OF FAITH; KNOX, JOHN; WESTMINSTER CONFESSION OF FAITH.

Bibliography. K. Barth, Knowledge of God and the Service of God according to the Teaching of the Reformation; J. H. S. Burleigh, Church History of Scotland; G. D. Henderson, ed., Scots Confession 1560; P. Schaff, Creeds of Christendom.

Scottish Realism. A popular movement in eighteenth- and nineteenth-century Britain, which attempted to overcome the epistemological, metaphysical, and moral skepticism of the Enlightenment philosophy of David Hume (1711–76) with a philosophy of common sense and natural realism. The founder of Scottish Realism was a moderate (as opposed to evangelical) Presbyterian clergyman, Thomas Reid (1710–96), born in Strachan, Kincardineshire, and educated at Marischal College. He became professor at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1751. Reid was disturbed by studying Hume's Treatise of Human Nature (1739), which he thought denied the objective reality of external objects, the principle of causation, and the unity of the mind. In answer, Reid wrote Inquiry into the Human Mind on the Principles of Common Sense in 1764, and the same year was appointed professor in Glasgow. In 1785 he wrote Essays on the Intellectual Powers of Man and in 1788, Essays on the Active Powers of Man.

Reid traced Hume's skepticism to what he considered a common fallacy in the great philosophers Descartes, Locke, and Berkeley: representational idealism, which postulates that "the mind knows not things immediately, but only by the intervention of the ideas it has of them" (Essay on Intellectual Powers, IV, 4, 3). That is, ideas are an intermediary between the mind and things, which prevents direct knowledge of the actual things, so that we do not immediately know the external reality in itself, but only the idea (or representation or impression) that it causes in us.

On the contrary, the human mind, argued Reid, perceives external objects directly through intuitive knowledge. We know reality, not by a "conjunction" of separated sense experiences, but by immediate "judgments of nature," which we make because our mind is constituted by God to know reality directly. These "original and natural judgements" (by which we know real objects) "make up what is called the common sense of mankind; and what is manifestly contrary to any of those first principles is what we call absurd" (Inquiry, VII, 4). These first principles, of course, cannot and need not be proved: they are "self-evident" to the common experience of mankind. Among these principles are the existence of external object, cause and effect, and the obligations of morality. Any philosophy that denies these commonly accepted principles on which all men must base their lives is of necessity defective.

Dugald Stewart (1753–1828), professor at Edinburgh and a distinguished successor of Reid, laid more stress on observation and inductive reasoning, and subscribed to an empiricist approach to psychology. Stewart's successor, Thomas Brown, moved even further in an empiricist direction, and is considered a bridge between Scottish Realism and the empiricism of J. S. Mill. Sir William Hamilton (1791–1856), Edinburgh professor, attempted the impossible task of uniting the epistemologies of Reid and Kant (who tried to meet the skepticism of Hume in an entirely different way, by asserting that unity and structure are imposed upon the phenomena of sensation by forms in the mind). J. S. Mill's Examination of Sir William Hamilton's Philosophy administered an empiricist death blow to Scottish Realism. Empiricism in Britain and idealism in Germany drove realism from the field.

The Scottish philosophy, however, had wide and profound effects. Royer-Collard, Cousin, and Jouffroy gave it wide circulation in early nineteenth century France. Sydney Ahlstrom has shown that it exercised supreme influence over American theological thought in the nineteenth century. While it has long been recognized that the conservative Calvinist theologians of Princeton adopted Scottish Realist epistemology wholesale, Ahlstrom demonstrates a less noted fact: moderate Calvinists of Andover, liberals of Yale, and Unitarians of Harvard were also deeply indebted to the same commonsense realism. Thus it provided the epistemological structure utilized by both "liberals" and "conservatives" in nineteenth-century America. D. F. KELLY

See also EPISTEMOLOGY; HUME, DAVID; PHILOSOPHY, CHRISTIAN VIEW OF; PRINCETON THEOLOGY, OLD.

Bibliography. S. E. Ahlstrom, "Scottish Philosophy and American Theology," CH 24:257–72; S. Grave, Scottish Philosophy of Common Sense; J. McCosh, Scottish Philosophy; R. Metz, Hundred Years of British Philosophy; J. S. Mill, Collected Works; T. Reid, Essays on the Intellectual Powers of Man, A. D. Woozley, ed.; Philosophical Orations, W. R. Humphries, ed.; Works, W. Hamilton, ed.; A. Seth, Scottish Philosophy.

Scripture. The rendering of graphē, a Greek term occurring in the NT in reference to the canonical OT literature. Its plural form denotes the entire collection of such compositions (Matt. 21:42; 1 Cor. 15:3–4), but when used in the singular, graphē can mean either a specified passage (Mark 12:10) or the constituent body of writings (Gal. 3:22). The (Holy) Scriptures were referred to by the term hiera grammata on one occasion (2 Tim. 3:15), while in the Pauline literature the word gramma ("writing") refers consistently to the Hebrew Torah or law. The content of a particular verse, or group of verses, is sometimes described as to gegrammenon (Luke 20:17; 2 Cor. 4:13). The term "book" can describe a single composition (Jer. 25:13; Nah. 1:1; Luke 4:17), while the plural could indicate a collection of prophetic oracles (Dan. 9:2; 2 Tim. 4:13), both forms being used as a general designation of Scripture. The divine author of this material is the Holy Spirit (Acts 28:25), and the writings that are the result of divine revelation and communication to the various biblical authors are said to be inspired (theopneustos, 2 Tim. 3:16). Though grammatically passive, this term is dynamic in nature, meaning literally “God-breathed” in an outward rather than an inward direction. God has “breathed out” Scripture as a function of his creative activity, making the revealed word of God authoritative for human salvation and instruction in divine truth.

Scripture

R. K. HARRISON

See also BIBLE; BIBLE, AUTHORITY OF; BIBLE, CANON OF; BIBLE, INERRANCY AND INFALLIBILITY OF; BIBLE, INSPIRATION OF.

Bibliography. R. Mayer, NIDNTT 3:482–97; J. I. Packer, God Has Spoken; E. J. Young, Thy Word Is Truth.

Scripture, Authority of. See BIBLE, AUTHORITY OF.

Second Adam. See ADAM, THE LAST.

Second Advent of Christ. See SECOND COMING OF CHRIST.

Secondary Separation. See SEPARATION.

Second Chance. Another chance after death to profess Christ. Some theologians (Marcion and Origen in the ancient church, Schleiermacher, Dornier, Godet, and others in more recent times) have argued that some (or all) who die unsaved will have a second chance. The Jehovah’s Witnesses also maintain this view. The chief arguments for it are (1) general considerations about divine love and justice; (2) the position (defended by texts like John 3:18, 36) that conscious, deliberate unbelief in Jesus is the only legitimate ground for condemnation; therefore, those at least who have never heard of Christ or who have not seriously considered him ought to have another chance; (3) texts like Matthew 12:32; 1 Peter 3:19; 4:6 are taken to teach a probation after death.

This view is rejected by all orthodox Protestant churches. The mainstream of Protestant theology urges that death is the end of man’s probation and that the spiritual condition of man after death is fixed, not fluid (Luke 16:19–31; John 8:24; Heb. 9:27). God’s judgment is based upon deeds done in the body, i.e., on earth (Matt. 7:22–23; 10:32–33; 25:34–46; 2 Cor. 5:9–10; Gal. 6:7–8; 2 Thess. 1:8). The idea of a second chance is inconsistent with the urgent call in Scripture to repentance and obedience now (2 Cor. 6:2; Heb. 3:7–19; 12:25–29).

In reply to the arguments in favor of a second probation: (1) God owes man nothing; he has already given to us a fair probation (in Adam); that any of us has opportunity to hear the gospel is an extraordinary divine kindness. (2) John 3:18 and similar passages teach that Jesus is the only way to salvation, but not that disbelief in him is the only ground for condemnation; we are condemned by all of our sin, including our corporate sin in Adam (Rom. 3:23; 5:12–17; 6:23). (3) These texts are far too difficult and isolated to provide an adequate basis for so significant a hypothesis. Further, on any responsible interpretation, they do not teach a second probation. Matthew 12:32 does not say that any sins will be forgiven after death, only that some will not be. First Peter 3:19 has been understood in different ways: (1) Jesus’ preaching the gospel to OT saints; (2) Jesus’ proclaiming judgment to dead unbelievers (common among Lutheran interpreters); (3) Jesus’ proclaiming his triumph to fallen angels (a common interpretation among contemporary scholars, based on parallels with the Book of Enoch); (4) Jesus’ preaching through Noah to those living before the flood (cf. 1 Pet. 1:11; Eph. 2:17—Augustine, Beza, some Reformed). None of these interpretations permits the conclusion that a second chance is given to the dead in general. First Peter 4:6 probably refers to the preaching of the gospel in this world to people subsequently martyred for the name of Christ.

J. M. FRAME

Bibliography. L. Berkhof, Systematic Theology; L. Boettner, Immortality; W. J. Dalton, Christ’s Proclamation to the Spirits; B. Reicke, Disobedient Spirits and Christian Baptism.

Second Coming of Christ. The doctrine that Jesus Christ, who left earth and ascended to the Father, will one day again return to earth.

The Fact of the Second Coming. This belief is based upon several portions of Scripture. Jesus himself in his great discourse on last things (Matt. 24 and 25) spoke of his return, both in parables and in more direct teaching. He promised the disciples that he was going to prepare a place for his followers and would one day come again to receive them to himself, that they might be together forever (John 14:3). The angels at the time of the ascension told the disciples that the Lord would come again in the same manner in which he had gone away (Acts 1:11). The return of Christ was part of the kerygma (3:21). It is mentioned in Paul’s writings, especially the letters to the Thesalonians (1 Thess. 1:10; 2:19; 3:13; 4:15–17; 2 Thess. 1:7). Other references include 1 Corinthians 15:23; Philippians 3:20; Colossians 3:4; 2 Timothy 4:8; Titus 2:13; and Hebrews 9:28.

The second coming is a topic of progressive revelation. While there are allusions in the OT to the second coming, they are not clear and ex-PLICIT, and consequently the Jewish rabbis found the messianic references apparently contradictory. On the one hand, they seemed to depict the coming of the Messiah as triumphant and powerful. On the other hand, this Messiah appeared as the suffering servant (Isa. 53, etc.). What were actually two comings had been collapsed into one through the foreshortening effect of the time perspective. Only in the NT is the revelation clear enough for the two to be distinguished, in large part because of the first had already occurred. Yet even here, the references to the second coming are often found within genres that are not completely clear, making interpretation difficult.

If the fact of the second coming is clearly revealed in Scripture, the time of it certainly is not. Jesus himself confessed that even he, during the period of his earthly incarnation, did not know the time of his return. This was not even known by the angels, but only by the Father in heaven (Matt. 24:36). At no point do the prophecies give any specific dating for the return of Christ, although there are indications of signs to be watched for. In response to an inquiry from his disciples as to whether he would at that time restore the kingdom to Israel, Jesus seemed to indicate in a more general way that this information about times and seasons was not for his disciples to know (Acts 1:6–7). With the end of the twentieth century, there has come a renewed interest in attempting to date the Lord's return. Some, believing that creation took place about 4000 B.C. and that the text "with the Lord one day is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day" (2 Pet. 3:8) applies to this matter, expected the third millennium A.D. to be the biblical millennium, with the Lord's return at the very close of the twentieth century.

The Nature of the Second Coming. The second coming will be personal and bodily. Some maintain that the coming of Christ was fulfilled by the promised coming of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost. On these grounds, when Jesus said, "We will come to him" (John 14:23), he was referring to a presence that would be mediated by the Holy Spirit. Others see Jesus' statement in Matthew 16:28 as being fulfilled at his resurrection. Others generalize the reference somewhat, maintaining that Jesus' statement, "I am with you always, even to the very end of the age" (28:20), gives us the sense in which the coming of Christ is fulfilled. Another reference cited is Revelation 3:20, where Jesus says, "I stand at the door and knock. If anyone hears my voice and opens the door. I will come in and eat with him, and he with me." This would make the second coming of Christ virtually equivalent to conversion. Yet a different twist is given by the Jehovah's Witnesses, who teach that Jesus has already returned, in 1914, but not visibly. Rather, he began to reign on his heavenly throne.

There seems little doubt, however, upon examining the biblical data, that Jesus' return will be personal and bodily, and thus perceivable and unmistakable. This is seen in the circumstances attaching to it in the predictions of the second coming. Jesus seemed to suggest that his coming would be spectacularly visible and unmistakable when he warned against those who would say that he was present "in the desert" or "in the inner rooms." They were not to be believed, for "as lightning that comes from the east is visible even in the west, so will be the coming of the Son of Man" (Matt. 24:26–27). The Son of Man would be seen "coming on the clouds of the sky, with power and great glory" (v. 30). Paul's description of the second coming includes similarly unmistakable circumstances: "For the Lord himself will come down from heaven, with a loud command, with the voice of the archangel and with the trumpet call of God, and the dead in Christ will rise first" (1 Thess. 4:16). Finally, the two men dressed in white (angels?) at the ascension said, "This same Jesus, who has been taken from you into heaven, will come back in the same way you have seen him go into heaven" (Acts 1:11). Since this ascension was bodily, personal, and visible, it seems reasonable to assume that the return will be similar.

Terms for the Second Coming. Several NT terms represent the event.

Parousia. The most frequently used term is parousia, meaning "presence, coming, or arrival." It is used in 1 Thessalonians 4:15 to designate Christ's coming to raise the righteous dead and catch believers up to be with him. This coming will also result in the destruction of the man of lawlessness, the antichrist (2 Thess. 2:8). It will not be a secret event; it will be a glorious outshining. Paul prays for God to strengthen the hearts of believers, so that they may be "blameless and holy in the presence of our God and Father when our Lord Jesus comes with all his holy ones" (1 Thess. 3:13).

Apocalypse. This word means literally "revelation." Paul speaks of waiting for "our Lord Jesus Christ to be revealed" (1 Cor. 1:7). It appears from 2 Thessalonians 1:6–7 and 1 Peter 4:13 that this will be a time of relief from great trial and will produce great rejoicing on the part of believers.

Epiphany. This word means "manifestation." This will be a coming of Christ at the end of the tribulation. It will involve judgment upon the world and slaying of the man of lawlessness. Believers place their hope in this and keep the commandments of Christ, waiting for the rewards to be received at that time (1 Tim. 6:14; 2 Tim. 4:8). It is the completion of their salvation (Titus 2:13–14).

The Purpose of the Second Coming. The purpose of Christ's second coming is the establishment, in the fullest sense, of the kingdom of God.

Second Coming of Christ

The kingdom does not primarily mean a realm, characterized by a geographically bound domain, so much as it means reign. Wherever Christ reigns in the hearts of people, there is a kingdom. It is both present and future. In one very real sense, it came with the coming of Christ the first time. In another sense, however, it is yet future. Although Christ was a king when he came the first time, relatively very few accepted him as that. The time is coming when “every knee should bow, . . . and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father” (Phil. 2:10–11). That will involve joyous celebration by Christians, but also reluctant submission by unbelievers. Even the devil, the beast, and the false prophet will be thrown into the lake of fire (Rev. 20:10). It is significant that in his great message on the last things, in Matthew 24 and 25, Jesus refers to himself as the Son of Man until he comes to 25:34. Having said that the Son of Man will come in his glory, and his angels with him, and will sit on his throne, he then begins to refer to himself in verse 34 as the King. He again uses the expression “the King” in verse 40. He does not again use the term Son of Man of himself until he returns to the discussion of the past and immediate future, in 26:2: “The Passover is two days away—and the Son of Man will be handed over to be crucified.” Thus the setting of the second coming is one in which the kingdom is prominent, for it is the fulfillment of the kingdom.

Preparation for the Second Coming. It is apparent, particularly from Jesus’ teaching about the second coming, that it has great practical import. For Jesus did not simply affirm the event as something about to occur. He also emphasized the appropriate behavior in the light of this fact. Many of Jesus’ parables were associated with this great fact. Three responses are particularly related to this impending event.

Watchfulness is urged. Because no one knows the time of Jesus’ coming, it is essential that one be alert to the possibility at any time (Matt. 24:42). He will come at an hour when he is not expected (v. 44). The wicked servant who assumed that it would be a long time until the master’s return did not conduct himself appropriately (vv. 45–51).

If watching is to protect one against the error of assuming that the second coming will be a long time off, waiting is the precaution against the opposite error, believing that it must necessarily be soon. So the five foolish virgins apparently were not prepared for a long wait (Matt. 25:1–13), and they fell asleep. When the bridegroom finally came, their supply of oil was depleted. While they went out and bought oil, the bridegroom came and entered, and they were left out. Peter tells of scoffers who in the last days, because such a long time has elapsed, will say, “Where is this ‘coming’ he promised? Ever since our fathers died, everything goes on as it has since the beginning of creation” (2 Pet. 3:3–4). Thus, it is necessary not only to be watchful but to sustain that watchfulness in the face of apparently negative indications.

Finally, the follower of the Lord is to be working in view of the certain fact of his return. The parable of the talents (Matt. 25:14–30) makes this especially clear. The master gave five talents to one servant, two to another, one to a third. The first two servants put to work what had been entrusted to them, thus doubling these resources, but the third merely hid away what he had received, preserving but not increasing it. When the master returned after a long time, he spoke words of commendation to the first two servants and gave them even greater responsibility. He rebuked and punished the wicked servant, however, terming him lazy. It is clear that watchful waiting is not to be idleness. Paul’s words to the Thessalonians (2 Thess. 3:6–13) underscore this.

While it is clear that we have not been told, and thus will not know, the time of the Lord’s return in an absolute sense, there are some indicators in Scripture that may enable us to ask about the relative time, that is, when it will occur in relation to two other important future events.

Millennial Views. These deal with the question of the relationship of Christ’s return to the thousand-year period of which John writes in Revelation 20:4–6.

Amillennialism. This view does not expect any earthly reign of Christ between his return and the final judgment. It maintains that the thousand years are symbolic, either of the completeness of Christ’s reign when he returns, or of the condition of believers during the intermediate state between death and resurrection. Amillennialists note that the thousand years are mentioned in only one passage, and that in a highly symbolical book.

Postmillennialism. This is the view that through the successful preaching of the gospel, the reign of God will gradually become complete upon earth, evil will cease, and peace will come. At the end of this period, which is not necessarily exactly a thousand years, Christ will return. The parables such as the mustard seed and the leaven, which depict the kingdom as growing progressively larger, are cited by this view.

Premillennialism. This holds that Christ will return at the beginning of the millennium and will resurrect dead believers; they, together with believers still alive at Christ’s coming, will reign with him on earth. At the end of this period of time there will be a brief flareup of evil, followed by the resurrection of unbelievers, and the final judgment. This view rests heavily upon the contention that the two resurrections in Revelation 20, being described in identical fashion, must both be bodily; and upon OT passages such as the description of the lion and the lamb lying down together, which must occur within this period.

Tribulation Views. These relate the time of the second coming to the great tribulation of Matthew 24.

Pretribulationism. This holds that Christ will come for the saints to remove them from the world (the rapture) before the seven years of tribulation, returning with the saints at the end of the tribulation.

Posttribulationism. This teaches that the church will not be removed from the world, but will go through the tribulation, although preserved within it.

Midtribulationism. The church will go through the first three and a half years (the tribulation) but will be removed before the great tribulation (or wrath of God).

Other Issues. The Second Coming—One Phase or Two? Some theologians, especially dispensationalists, see two phases or stages to the second coming. The first, basically a secret coming, is to remove the church before the tribulation. The second phase, at the end of the tribulation, is Christ's triumphant return to set up his earthly millennial kingdom. They base this upon a distinction among parousia, epiphany, and apocalypse. Others find this distinction artificial and believe there will be simply one return, at the end of the tribulation.

Imminence of Second Coming. Some teach that the second coming could occur at any moment. No additional prophecies remain to be fulfilled. They believe that the injunctions, "Watch, you do not know the time," require this.

Others speak of imminence in a more general way. They note that at the time Jesus spoke the words they could not mean that he could come at any time, since certain events, such as the aging and infirmity of Peter (John 21:18), the fall of Jerusalem, and the destruction of the temple, had to occur first. They argue that if the words could not denote any-moment imminency when spoken, they do not require that meaning now. Thus, the second coming may be very near, but certain events, such as the tribulation (which may not require a full seven calendar years), would have to occur first.

Conclusion. The doctrine of the second coming is sometimes made a topic of quarreling among Christians. It is instead, as Paul indicated, an encouragement to hope and comfort (1 Thess. 4:18).

M. J. ERICKSON

See also JUDGMENT; JUDGMENT OF NATIONS; JUDGMENT SEAT; MARRIAGE FEAST OF THE LAMB; MILLENNIUM, VIEWS OF THE; RAPTURE OF THE CHURCH; RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD; TRIBULATION.

Bibliography. G. C. Berkouwer, Return of Christ; C. A. Blaising and D. L. Bock, Progressive Dispensationalism; R. G. Clouse, ed., Meaning of the Millennium;

A. A. Hoekema, Bible and the Future; G. E. Ladd, Blessed Hope; Crucial Questions about the Kingdom of God; R. Pache, Return of Jesus Christ; D. Pentecost, Things to Come; A. Reese, Coming Advent of Christ; S. Travis, I Believe in the Second Coming of Jesus.

Second Death. See DEATH, SECOND.

Second Great Awakening. See GREAT AWAKENINGS.

Sect, Sectarianism (Lat. secta, "party, school, faction," perhaps deriving from the past participle either of secare, "to cut, to separate," or of sequi, "to follow"). A group whose identity partially consists of belonging to a larger social body, typically a religious body. The sect's identity is further derived from its principal leader or from a distinctive teaching or practice. The term has regularly been applied to groups that break away from existing religious bodies, such as the early Christians who separated from Judaism or the Protestants who separated from Roman Catholicism. The term has also been applied to such groups as maintain their identity without separating from the larger religious body, as, for example, the Pharisees among the Jews or the Puritans in the Church of England. In the broadest sense even an unorganized popular religious movement can be called a sect. Occasionally some condemnation or criticism of the group so named may be implied.

"Sectarianism" in a narrow sense denotes zeal for, or attachment to, a sect. Likewise, it connotes an excessively zealous and doctrinaire narrow-mindedness that would quickly judge and condemn those who disagree. In a broader sense, however, "sectarianism" denotes the historical process by which all the divisions in major world religions have come about. In the history of Christianity, for example, sectarianism is a prevalent theme from the Judaizers and Nicolaitans of the NT to the many new denominations emerging in recent times.

Sociologists of religion have appropriated the term "sect" as a label for a specific type of religious movement. In the typology of religious movements that has developed from the pioneering work of Ernst Troeltsch, the sect is a formally organized religious body that arises in protest against and competition with the pervasive religion of a society. The pervasive religion, whether Jewish, Islamic, or Christian, is classified as a "church" or "denomination." The pervasive religion is highly organized and deeply integrated into the society's social and economic structure, but it makes few demands on members for active participation or personal commitment. The sect, however, demands a high degree of participation and a suitable display of individual loyalty and spiritual commitment. While the church has compromised and accommodated its doctrines and practices to the secular society, the sect rejects all social accommodations or compromises and sets itself against both church and secular society to defend a purer doctrine and practice. Comparative study of the many Christian sects had led scholars to suggest several different categories of sect types such as the conversionist, the adventist, and the Gnostic. The organization and government of most sects are more democratic than that of a church or denomination; likewise, the leadership is frequently less experienced and nonprofessional.

Sect, Sectarianism

The life span of a sect is usually short. Many, but not all, sects gradually lose their sectarian character and acquire the status of a church after a generation or two. Thus, modern Protestant denominations began as sects. Yet not all sects mature into churches. The so-called established sect manages to avoid accommodation and compromise and keeps its spirit of religious protest and opposition to secular society viable indefinitely.

H. K. GALLATIN

See also CULTS; DENOMINATIONALISM.

Bibliography. R. K. MacMaster, NCE 13:30–31; H. R. Niebuhr, Encyclopedia of Social Sciences; Social Sources of Denominationalism; P. Occhiogrosso, Joy of Sects; T. F. O’Dea, International Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences; E. Troeltsch, Social Teachings of the Christian Churches; R. Walis, ed., Sectarianism; W. J. Warner, Dictionary of the Social Sciences; W. J. Whalen, NCE 13:31–34; W. T. Whitley, HERE 11:315–29; B. R. Wilson, Sects and Society: A Sociological Study of the Elim Tabernacle, Christian Science, and Christadelphians; B. Wilson, Social Dimensions of Sectarianism; J. Wilson, Religion in American Society: The Effective Presence; J. M. Yinger, Religion in the Struggle for Power.

Secular Christianity. “God is Dead” (cover of Time, April 8, 1966) heralded the beginning and end of a rather unknown movement in North American theology. It was the radical pole of a broader theological movement in the early 1960s known as secular theology (saeculum in Latin means this age or world).

Secular theology had its immediate roots in Barth’s neo-orthodoxy and Bultmann’s demythologizing. Bonhoeffer urged the church to imitate Christ who brought God into the center of mundane existence apart from religion (the “worldly holiness” of “religionless Christianity”). As the “man for others,” Christ allowed himself to be expelled from sacred places and times into the profane world. So too, costly grace compels his disciples today to minister “before God as if there were no God” in a secular “world come of age.” By the 1960s Tillich’s theology promoted the concept of the non-being of God as traditionally conceived. John A. T. Robinson, bishop of Woolwich, in his bestseller Honest to God (1963) popularized Bultmann, Tillich, and Bonhoeffer. The ethical side of this liberation from tradition was developed in Joseph Fletcher’s Situation Ethics: The New Morality (1966).

Some secular theologians moved from the absence of the experience of God to the experience of the absence of God. For Thomas J. J. Altizer, Emory University’s flamboyant spokesman for the Death of God theology, the cross of Christ marked God’s self-annihilating death (kenosis) as an event in history—the complete Hegelian self-negation of God into creation. Temple University’s Paul van Buren, an Episcopalian who studied under Barth, used the criterion of empirical verifiability to argue that all supernatural God-talk was inherently meaningless and should be reduced to terms of intended human behavior. William Hamilton at Colgate Rochester Divinity School wrote a moving confession of the absence of God in his own life and in the culture around him. Like Gabriel Vahanian of Syracuse University he too resolved to wait for a future self-revelation of God.

Harvey Cox at Harvard complained of the vagueness of the Death of God theology. He interpreted urbanization and secularization more optimistically in Secular City. While rejecting secularism as a reductionistic form of scientism, Cox saw secularization as originating in the Bible. Evangelicals like John W. Montgomery critiqued secular theology for holding positivistic views of knowledge and science, abandoning God’s transcendence, making faith purely subjective, rejecting the supernatural in Christ and Scriptures, ignoring the centrality of the cross, and making an undefined love the essence of morality. Peter Berger called for the reaffirmation of the transcendence of God based on five “signals of transcendence.” Langdon Gilkey’s Naming the Whirlwind: The Renewal of God-Language vindicated God-talk by describing an irreducible dimension of ultimacy within secular existence.

J. D. CASTELEIN

See also BULTMANN, RUDOLF; DEATH OF GOD THEOLOGY; ROBINSON, JOHN ARTHUR THOMAS; TILlich, PAUL.

Bibliography. P. L. Berger, Rumor of Angels; D. Bonhoeffer, Letters and Papers from Prison, E. Bethge, ed.; L. Gilkey, Naming the Whirlwind: The Renewal of God-Language; “Is God Dead?” Time (April 8, 1966) 82–87; E. L. Mascall, Secularization of Christianity; J. W. Montgomery, “Death of the ‘Death of God,’” in Suicide of Christian Theology.

Secular Clergy. Clergy in the Roman Catholic Church not bound by the rules of any particular religious community such as the Society of Jesus or the Benedictines. The secular clergy are more directly supervised by a local bishop, or “ordinary,” than are members of a religious community, who take on occasion monastic vows and are sometimes confined to a particular monastery.

The word “secular” refers to the world as partially distinct from the sacral, which comes from a transcendent God. The secular clergy are viewed as working quite directly in the world, while yet not being of the world.

The secular clergy are called to lead a holy life in the world. They should make a daily meditation and be deeply devoted to the Mass and the Holy Eucharist. They must not only be obedient to their local ordinary, but also have a certain degree of reverence toward him. They should stay in their particular diocese or area unless there arises a special reason for them to be elsewhere. They are held to be an essential link in the chain of being comprising the church of God.

T. J. GERMAN

Bibliography. C. Dawson, America and the Secularization of Modern Culture; M. Ramstein, Manual of Canon Law.

Secularism, Secular Humanism. A way of life and thought that is pursued without reference to God or religion. The Latin root saeculum referred to a generation or an age. “Secular” came to mean “belonging to this age, worldly.” In general terms, secularism involves an affirmation of immanent, this-worldly realities, along with a denial or exclusion of transcendent, other-worldly realities. It is a worldview and lifestyle oriented to the profane rather than the sacred, the natural rather than the supernatural. Secularism is a nonreligious approach to individual and social life.

Historically, “secularization” first referred to the process of transferring property from ecclesiastical jurisdiction to that of the state or other nonecclesiastical authority. In this institutional sense, “secularization” still means the reduction of formal religious authority (e.g., in education). Institutional secularization has been fueled by the breakdown of a unified Christendom since the Reformation, on the one hand, and by the increasing rationalization of society and culture from the Enlightenment to modern technological society, on the other. Some analysts prefer the term “laicization” to describe this institutional secularization of society, that is, the replacement of official religious control by nonecclesiastical authority.

A second sense in which secularization is to be understood has to do with a shift in ways of thinking and living, away from God and toward this world. Renaissance humanism, Enlightenment rationalism, the rising power and influence of science, the breakdown of traditional structures (e.g., the family, the church, the neighborhood), the technicization of society, and the competition offered by nationalism, evolutionism, and Marxism have all contributed to what Max Weber termed the “disenchantment” of the modern world.

While institutional secularization and ideological secularization have proceeded simultaneously over the past few centuries, the relationship between the two is not causally exact or necessary. Thus, even in a medieval, Constantinian setting, formally religious in character, men and women were not immune from having their life, thought, and work shaped by secular, this-worldly considerations. Likewise, in an institutionally secular (laicized) society it is possible for individuals and groups to live, think, and work in ways that are motivated and guided by God and religious considerations.

Secularization, then, is itself a fact of history and a mixed blessing. Secularism, however, as a comprehensive philosophy of life, expresses an unqualified enthusiasm for the process of secularization in all spheres of life. Secularism is fatally flawed by its reductionist view of reality, denying and excluding God and the supernatural in a myopic fixation on the immanent and the natural. In contemporary discussion, secularism and humanism are often seen in tandem as secular humanism—an approach to life and thought, individual and society, that glorifies the creature and rejects the Creator. As such, secularism constitutes a rival to Christianity.

Christian theologians and philosophers have grappled in various ways with the meaning and impact of secularization. Friedrich Schleiermacher was the first theologian to attempt a radical restatement of Christianity in terms of the Renaissance and Enlightenment humanist and rationalist motifs. While his efforts were brilliant and extremely influential in the development of theology, critics charged that rather than salvaging Christianity, Schleiermacher betrayed crucial aspects of the faith in his redefinition of religion in terms of the human feeling of dependence.

No contemporary discussion of Christianity and secularism can escape dealing with the provocative Letters and Papers from Prison penned by Dietrich Bonhoeffer. Primarily because the work is fragmentary and incomplete, Bonhoeffer’s concepts such as “Christian worldliness,” “man-come-of-age,” the world’s arrival at “adulthood,” and the need for a “non-religious interpretation of biblical terminology” have been subject to heated debate about their meaning and implication. Friedrich Gogarten (Reality of Faith, 1959), Paul van Buren (Secular Meaning of the Gospel, 1963), Harvey Cox (Secular City, 1965), Ronald Gregor Smith (Secular Christianity, 1966), and the “death of God” theologians are examples of those who have pursued one possible course by restating Christianity in terms of a secular world. Kenneth Hamilton (Life in One's Stride, 1968) denies that this is the best way to interpret Bonhoeffer and argues that the German theologian never wavered in his basic, orthodox stance.

Secularism, Secular Humanism

While discussions among theologians during the 1950s and 1960s tended to focus on adapting Christian theology to secularization, the 1970s through the 1990s saw a vigorous new resistance to secularism in many quarters. Jacques Ellul (New Demons, 1975) was among several voices arguing that secularism was itself a form of religion and was antagonistic both to Christianity and to a true Christian humanism. Francis A. Schaeffer (How Should We Then Live? 1976) and other fundamentalists and conservative evangelicals attacked secular humanism as the great contemporary enemy of Christian faith.

From the perspective of biblical Christian theology, secularism is guilty of having "exchanged the truth of God for a lie, and worshiped and served the creature rather than the Creator" (Rom. 1:25). Having excluded the transcendent God as the absolute and the object of worship, the secularist inexorably makes the world of man and nature absolute and the object of worship. In biblical terms, the supernatural God has created the world and sustains its existence. This world (the saeculum) has value because God has created it, continues to preserve it, and has acted to redeem it. While God is Lord of history and universe, he is not identifiable with either (pantheism). Men and women exist in freedom and responsibility before God and for the world. Stewardship and partnership define man's relationship to God and the world.

The sacral, theocratic character of ancient Israel is modified with the coming of Christ. With the work of Christ, the city and the nation are secularized (desacralized), and the church as the temple of the Holy Spirit is what is now sacralized. The relationship of the church to the society around it is not defined in terms of a mission to resacralize it by imposing ecclesiastical rule upon it. The relationship is one of loving service and witness, proclamation and healing. In this sense, then, secularization of society is a Christian calling. That is, society must not be divinized or absolutized, but viewed as something historical and relative. Only God is finally sacred and absolute. Reestablishing the sacredness of God will, however, imply the proper, relative valuation of this world.

In no sense, of course, is the distinction between the sacred and the secular an unbridgeable gap. In the same way that God speaks and acts in the saeculum, Christians must speak and act creatively and redemptively. This means that the secular world must not be abandoned to secularism. In all cases, Christian life in the secular world is to be carried out under the lordship of Jesus Christ and in obedience to the will of God rather than the will of the world. And in situations, such as the United States, where the general populace is enfranchised and invited to have a voice in public policy, public education, social services, and so on, Christians may work to ensure that the Word of God is heard and is given room among the many other voices which will constitute the heterogeneous whole. To insist that the Word of God be imposed on all without exception is to fall once again into an unbiblical authoritarianism. To fail to articulate the Word of God in the saeculum, however, is to acquiesce in a secularism which, by excluding the Creator, can lead only to death.

D. W. GILL

See also DEATH OF GOD THEOLOGY; ENLIGHTENMENT, THE; HUMANISM, CHRISTIAN; LIBERALISM, THEOLOGICAL; SITUATION ETHICS.

Bibliography. P. L. Berger, Sacred Canopy; O. Chadwick, Secularization of the European Mind in the Nineteenth Century; H. Cox, Secular City; O. Guinness, Grave-digger File; K. Hamilton, What's New in Religion; D. Lyon, Steeple's Shadow: The Myths and Realities of Secularization; D. Martin, General Theory of Secularization; E. L. Mascall, Secularization of Christianity: An Analysis and Critique; P. van Buren, Secular Meaning of the Gospel.

Security of the Believer. See PERSEVERANCE.

Segundo, Juan Luis (b. 1925). Jesuit priest and liberation theologian. Born in Montevideo, Uruguay, at age 16 he entered the order of the Society of Jesus. He was educated in San Miguel, Argentina, where he developed an interest in the study of existentialism and phenomenology, and in St. Albert, France, where he was influenced by two scholars, Leopold Malevez and Gustav Lambert, and the evolutionary ideas of Pierre Teilhard de Chardin. He received his Doctorat des Lettres in theology from the Sorbonne in 1963.

Among Segundo's contributions to the development of liberation theology in Latin America is his hermeneutical methodology that combines the best research of the social sciences with biblical interpretation, and his insights into the relationship between faith and ideology as they inform Christian belief and practice. He refuses to accept a bifurcated notion of Christianity that defines faith in terms of a divinely inspired religious view of reality separated from ideology defined as a purely human invention. Instead, Segundo conceives of faith as a concept rooted in the immanent world of values and meaning where ideology becomes an efficient means of translating genuine faith.

Segundo does not envision a new ideology for Latin America, but rather, he seeks to establish a new cultural tradition that transforms society and translates meaning to each new generation. It is at this point that he employs the "hermeneutic circle” as a way of relating faith and ideology in order to create a new cultural tradition that is true to the authentic faith of Jesus Christ. Some of his more important works include Liberation of Theology (1976), Theology for Artisans of a New Humanity, 5 vols. (1968, 1972), and Jesus of Nazareth, Yesterday and Today, 5 vols. (1984–88).

It is significant that Segundo repeatedly refuses to accept prestigious university teaching posts but instead directs his theological energies and talents to directing the Peter Faber Theological and Social Center where he is committed to the questions, concerns, and needs of the laity. The direction for much of Segundo’s liberation theology seems to flow out of the dialogue this center facilitates.

M. BURCH

See also LIBERATION THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. A. T. Hennelly, Theologies in Conflict: The Challenge of Juan Luis Segundo; M. Hoy, Faith That Works; B. G. Ohor, Critique of Ideology and Liberating Praxis; G. J. Persha, Juan Luis Segundo: A Study concerning the Relationship between the Particularity of the Church and the Universality of Her Mission; S. Phillips, Age of Scripture in Liberation Theologians: An Examination of Juan Luis Segundo, James H. Cone, and Jurgen Moltmann; A. J. Tambasco, Bible for Ethics: Juan Luis Segundo and First-World Ethics; Contribution of Juan Luis Segundo to the Hermeneutical Question of the Relationship of the Bible to Christian Ethics; J. R. Velker, Critical Analysis of the Segundo-Ratzinger Controversy; J. A. Zembelman, Theological Ethics and Politics in the Thought of Juan Luis Segundo and John Howard Yoder.

Self-Esteem, Self-Love. The estimate that one makes of oneself. Kenneth Wuest’s translation of Romans 12:3 encapsulates the biblical viewpoint of self-esteem: “For I am saying through the grace which is given to everyone who is among you, not to be thinking more highly of one’s self, beyond that which one ought necessarily to be thinking, but to be thinking with a view to a sensible appraisal [of one’s self] according as to each one God divided a measure of faith.” To make a sensible appraisal of one’s worth is to evaluate oneself according to one’s strengths as well as one’s weaknesses, one’s potential for growth as well as one’s vulnerabilities.

Self-love involves an acceptance of oneself, yet is not complacency. It involves a comfortableness with one’s being but is not devoid of impetus for growth. Arrogance is not true self-love; rather it is a reflection of a low self-estimate. A person who is sure of himself need not say, “I am the best.” The insecure declare their greatness. Those with a good self-image simply go on and focus on their task. Trying to prove one’s greatness to others is often an effort to prove it to oneself.

On the other hand, humility is not synonymous with low self-esteem. True humility is an absence of occupation with oneself. It implies a good self-image, good enough to realize one’s finiteness and to be able to be self-forgetful. In contrast, low self-esteem involves groveling, self-denigration, and self-hate. Low self-esteem is really quite contrary to the biblical view of how a Christian should view himself. Psychologist Rollo May states the unattractiveness of a low self-image quite succinctly and strikingly in Man’s Search for Himself. In circles where self-contempt is preached, it is of course never explained why a person should be so ill-mannered and inconsiderate as to force his company on other people if he finds it so dreary and deadening himself. Furthermore the multitude of contradictions is never explained in a doctrine which advises that we should hate the one, self, “I,” and love all others, with the obvious expectation that they will love us, hateful creatures that we are; or that the more we hate ourselves, the more we love the God who made the mistake, in an off moment, of creating this contemptible creature, “I.”

In essence Christianity is not a theology of self-hate, for there is a vast difference between self-hate and the old nature of Romans 6. For the Christian the old nature, that which is fallen and judicially condemned by God, has been put away by the blood of Christ. Thus without compromise the Scriptures can command us to love our neighbor as we love ourselves, implying a degree of legitimate self-love. For in such self-love we are praising the work of God in us, a work that according to Romans has established a new nature that is of God. This is the principle of self-love as declared by the Bible. But too often, as practicing Christians, we resemble more closely the description of Rollo May and “hate the one self ‘I,’ and love all others.”

Even within Protestant circles, it is important to differentiate between church teaching and biblical theology. At times we are very contradictory about such a topic as self-esteem. We tend to emphasize self-denigration and yet trust explicitly the literal inspiration of a Bible that teaches that God made us in his own image for fellowship with him. Then, because the fall of man could have obliterated that fellowship, God used his plan of redemption to ensure his purpose.

The Scriptures are full of examples of men of God who dared to experience and express self-love. In Genesis the story of Joseph and his brothers is illustrative of a man who knew he was right and acted accordingly, in spite of the accusations of his brothers. God’s appraisal of such behavior is indicated by Joseph’s vindication, the accuracy of his God-given visions and their interpretations, his place of earthly authority, and ultimately the recognition by his brothers of their own sin and Joseph’s righteousness.

Job is a good example of a man deeply tested by God in his multiple afflictions. Yet once again the purpose was just that—testing, not punishment, and certainly not self-denigration. Job was never to believe he was no good because of his afflictions. It is true that God sometimes corrects us when we are wrong, for example, in his denial of Moses' desire to enter into the promised land, but more often than not God afflicts so that he may do some extraordinary work. As in the case of Job, he will pick the person he can trust the most. He could trust Job more than most men; and then, at the end, God gave him back more than he ever took away. Job would have been remiss had he interpreted his afflictions as a sign of low self-worth, even though his friends tried to make him believe that.

Self-Esteem, Self-Love

Always in the Scriptures there is balance. Paul speaks of his great sin against the church in his early persecutions of Christians. That recognition was not neurotic low self-esteem. It was an honest estimate of himself at that time. Later, however, that same man, with strong self-acceptance and a deep trust in God, does not falter in his authoritative posture with the NT church. Paul was honest in his self-estimate as it related to his fellow human beings and to God. At no time did he lose a sense of dependence upon God as the source of his worth.

For there are times too, when we must all fall abjectly before the presence of God. That does not indicate neurotic low self-esteem. Actually such a humble posture before God is a realistic view of our position before him; and the greater one's sense of self-worth, the easier it will be to realize one's humble place before God.

Thus throughout the Scriptures it is consistently taught that we are to evaluate ourselves honestly before God and others. God's aim is that we be in his image and have a high sense of self-esteem that is not contrived or phony but real.

E. R. SKOGLUND

See also HUMILITY; LOVE.

Bibliography. J. Dobson, Hide or Seek; V. E. Frankl, Doctor and the Soul; W. Glasser, Reality Therapy: A New Approach to Psychiatry; C. S. Lewis, Weight of Glory; R. May, Man's Search for Himself; E. R. Skoglund, Loving Begins with Me; P. Tournier, Guilt and Grace; W. Trobisch, Love Yourself.

Self-Examination. The scrutiny of one's inner self to determine one's spiritual status, motives, and attitudes is largely a NT teaching. In the OT the searching of innermost thoughts and intents was primarily the responsibility of the Almighty (Exod. 20:20; Deut. 8:2, 16; 13:3; Ps. 26:2; 1 Thess. 2:4). The believer is "to examine himself" (dokimazō) to make sure he is in proper relationship to God and others so that he may partake of the Lord's Supper (1 Cor. 11:28). In the KJV the same verb is translated "to prove" ten times and "to try" four times, as in: "proving what is acceptable unto the Lord" (Eph. 5:10), proving one's work (Gal. 6:4), and proving all things (1 Thess. 5:21).

Likewise the Christian is taught "to judge" (diakrinō) one's self lest he or she be judged (1 Cor. 11:31–32). In thus judging one's self and accepting the correction (chastening) of the Almighty one is not under condemnation. Self-judgment leads to confession and forgiveness.

In borderline practices allowed by some Christians and disallowed by others, the believer is not "to judge" (krinō) a fellow believer; but rather is to examine one's own self lest he or she be a stumbling block (Rom. 14:13). Because one can "believe in vain" (1 Cor. 15:2), and thus not have a faith that is "sincere" (1 Tim. 1:5; 2 Tim. 1:5), one is to "examine" (peirazō) one's self to see whether he or she is in the faith (2 Cor. 13:5). By careful, prayerful self-examination he or she is to determine that the Savior dwells within.

The lukewarm Christian is counseled to judge himself or herself so as to realize this backslidden condition and to prove what values are true and everlasting (Rev. 3:18). The purpose of self-examination is always positive—to know oneself, one's weaknesses and frailties, so as to appropriate the grace of God in Christ. Self-examination is a stimulus to faith and holy living (Heb. 12:1–2; 1 Pet. 2:21–23). It is not morbid introspection for "if our heart condemn us, God is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things" (1 John 3:20).

V. R. EDMAN

Self-Existence of God. See GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF.

Self-Righteousness. The concept of a personally developed ethic as one's standard for salvation. However, once the term "righteousness," in relation to God, is properly understood to imply a faithfulness to his covenantal relationship, "self-righteousness" is revealed to be a dramatic misstatement of biblical principles.

While this concept can be viewed positively as an individual's attempt to establish a moralistic lifestyle, the accompanying attitude usually associated with such an attempt involves one's vain estimate of self-worth before God. This usually leads to a rejection of Christ's saving work as well.

It is only God himself who may lay claim to this term. For, as related to the Hebrew šedeq, God is found to be righteous intrinsically. Thus, all other members of the created order can be so designated only in proper relationship to his judgment, and not by their own.

In Judaism, self-righteousness could be understood as a necessary evaluation of one's "balance," with regard to merit accumulated through good works as opposed to one's inherited sinfulness. A Jew's conformity to the Torah, plus his active development of his yēšer hattōb (good impulse) and restraint of his yēšer hāra' (evil impulse), would be the standards by which he could judge his own righteousness.

However, this is precisely the type of righteousness, coveted by the Pharisees, that Jesus rejects (Matt. 5:20–48; 6:33–7:5; cf. Luke 18:9–14). The shocking news of the gospel is that God declares humankind righteous only in Christ. Thus any attitude of self-righteousness is excluded (Eph. 2:9) and categorically condemned (Matt. 6:1–18). Righteousness is shown to be impossible as a person's own accomplishment but has become a gracious gift to humanity because of Christ's accomplishment. S. E. McCLELLAND Bibliography. F. F. Bruce, Paul: Apostle of the Heart Set Free; W. C. Kaiser, Toward an Old Testament Theology; G. E. Ladd, Theology of the New Testament; G. Schrenk, TDNT 2:192–210.

Semi-Arianism. The doctrine of Christ's sonship as held by fourth century theologians who were reluctant to accept either the strict Nicene definition or the extreme Arian position. After the Council of Nicaea (A.D. 325) a single term came to identify each position. Orthodox theologians, led by Athanasius, used the term homoousios to express the doctrine that Christ, the Logos, was "of one substance" with the eternal Father. The Arian party held that Christ was a created being, in substance unlike the Father. The term for this view was anomoios. Semi-Arians, the third group, avoided either extreme and adopted the term homoiousios, which defined Christ as "of like substance" with the Father, but left vague the extent to which Christ differed from other created beings. Semi-Arians called Christ "divine," but in effect denied that he is truly God, that he is "equal to the Father as touching his Godhead."

Some students of the controversy have argued that the term "Semi-Arianism" is an unfair term, associating the movement too closely with Arianism, and that "Semi-Nicene" might better represent the movement's tendency toward orthodoxy. The term "Anti-Nicene" has been used as often, however, because Semi-Arians did, in fact, deny that Christ was fully one with the Father.

The Semi-Arian position arose at the Council of Nicea, called by Emperor Constantine to deal with the Arian question, which had raised enough controversy to threaten the unity of the church. All but two of the bishops present at the council signed the orthodox statement, though many did so with reservations. Semi-Arians also came to be called "Eusebians" after Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedia and later patriarch of Constantinople. As a young man Eusebius had studied with Arius. Though he signed the creed at the Council of Nicea, he later became a key leader in the reaction against it.

The most prominent leader of the Semi-Arians at the council, however, was Eusebius, bishop of Caesarea, the early church historian. Following the council the Semi-Arian position remained prominent, but a resurgence of the Old Arians, seeking to reinstate the original heresy, led to the disintegration of Semi-Arian support. In August 357 a small but important synod met at Sirmium in Illyricum. The creed that emerged from the synod condemned the term ousia in any form and clearly subordinated the Son to the Father. This creed split the opponents of Nicea so decisively that it turned sentiment in favor of the orthodox view. Many bishops renounced their errors and subscribed to the Nicene Creed. After this point Semi-Arians never existed in significant numbers. Some became Arian and many reaffirmed orthodoxy at the Council of Constantinople in 381. B. L. SHELLEY

See also ARIUS, ARIANISM; ATHANASIUS; HOMOIOUSIOS; NICAEA, COUNCIL OF.

Bibliography. M. Barnes and D. Williams, eds., Arianism after Arius; F. J. Foakes Jackson, HERE 2:374–76; H. M. Gwatkin, Studies of Arianism; E. R. Hardy, ed., Christology of the Later Fathers; J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines; G. L. Prestige, Fathers and Heretics.

Semi-Pelagianism. Doctrines, upheld during the period from 427 to 529, that rejected the extreme views of both Pelagius and Augustine in regard to the priority of divine grace and human will in the initial work of salvation. The label "Semi-Pelagian," however, is a relatively modern expression, which apparently appeared first in the Lutheran Formula of Concord (1577) and became associated with the theology of the Jesuit Luis Molina (1535–1600). The term, nevertheless, was not a happy choice, because the so-called Semi-Pelagians wanted to be anything but half-Pelagians. It would be more correct to call them Semi-Augustinians who, while rejecting the doctrines of Pelagius and respecting Augustine, were not willing to follow the ultimate consequences of his theology.

Church councils condemned Pelagianism in 418 and again in 431, but this rejection did not mean the acceptance of everything in the Augustinian system. Augustine's teaching on grace may be summarized as follows: Humanity shared in Adam's sin and therefore has become a massa damnationis from which no one can be extricated save by a special gift of divine grace that cannot be merited; yet God in his inscrutable wisdom chooses some to be saved and grants graces that will infallibly but freely lead them to salvation. The number of the elect is set and can be neither increased nor decreased. Nevertheless, Vitalis of Carthage and a community of monks at Hadrumete tum, Africa (ca. 427), contested these principles, asserting that they destroyed freedom of the will and all moral responsibility. They, in turn, affirmed that the unaided will performed the initial act of faith. In response Augustine produced Grace and Free Will and Rebuke and Grace, which contain a resume of his arguments against the Semi-Pelagians and stress the necessary preparation of the will by prevenient grace.

Semi-Pelagianism

The issue became heated in the fifth century when some monks in southern Gaul, led by John Cassian, Hilary of Arles, Vincent of Lerins, and Faustus of Riez, joined in the controversy. These men objected to a number of points in the Augustinian doctrine of sin and grace, namely, the assertion of the total bondage of the will, of the priority and irresistibility of grace, and of rigid predestination. They agreed with Augustine as to the seriousness of sin, yet they regarded his doctrine of predestination as new and therefore in conflict with tradition, and dangerous because it makes all human efforts superfluous. In opposition to Augustinianism, Cassian taught that though a sickness is inherited through Adam's sin, human free will has not been entirely obliterated. Divine grace is indispensable for salvation, but it does not necessarily need to precede a free human choice, because, despite the weakness of human volition, the will takes the initiative toward God. In other words, divine grace and human free will must work together in salvation. In opposition to the stark predestinarianism of Augustine, Cassian held to the doctrine of God's universal will to save, and that predestination is simply divine foreknowledge.

After Augustine's death, the controversy became more heated; and Prosper of Aquitaine became his champion, replying to the Gallic monks, including Vincent of Lerins. Vincent incorrectly understood Augustine's doctrines of perseverance and predestination to mean that God's elect cannot sin. Nevertheless, he was not entirely wrong in recognizing the practical dangers inherent in Augustine's teaching on grace, and that this teaching deviated from Catholic tradition.

Prosper appealed to Rome on behalf of his master, and though Celestine I praised Augustine, he gave no specific approval to the bishop's teachings on grace and predestination. Hence, Semi-Pelagian beliefs continued to circulate in Gaul with Faustus of Riez as the outstanding spokesman. He condemned the heresy of Pelagianism, teaching instead that natural powers were not sufficient to attain salvation. The free will, while not extinct, was weak and could not be exercised for salvation without the aid of grace. Faustus, however, rejected the predestinarian conception of a divine monergism and taught that human will, by virtue of the freedom left in it, takes the beginning step toward God.

Salvation, therefore, is accomplished by the cooperation of human and divine factors, and predestination is merely God's foreknowledge of what a person has freely decided. Grace, to Faustus, meant the divine illumination of human will, and not, as it did to Augustine, the regenerative power of grace in the heart.

The debate about Semi-Pelagianism continued well into the sixth century, when Caesarius of Arles convened the Synod of Orange (529). Here Caesarius succeeded in dogmatizing a number of principles against the Semi-Pelagians. In doing so, however, the synod did not accept Augustine's full doctrine of grace, especially not his concept of divine grace that works irresistibly in the predestinated. In 531 Boniface II approved the acts of this council, thus giving it ecumenical authority. Semi-Pelagianism, as a historical movement, subsequently declined, but the pivotal issue of Semi-Pelagianism—the priority of the human will over the grace of God in the initial work of salvation—did not die out.

R. KYLE

See also AUGUSTINE OF HIPPO; PELAGIUS, PELAGIANISM.

Bibliography. N. K. Chadwick, Poetry and Letters in Early Christian Gaul; P. DeLetter, Prosper of Aquitaine: Defense of St. Augustine; F. H. Woods, Canons of the Second Council of Orange.

Senses of Scripture. See INTERPRETATION OF THE BIBLE.

Sensus Deitatis, Sensus Divinitatis. A term used by Calvin to describe humankind's innate knowledge of God. Calvin argues that God as Creator has revealed himself universally both in nature and in the human consciousness. This latter is a constitutional awareness impressed upon the human mind by the Creator and takes two forms: conscience and the sense of deity (also called "the seed of religion"). The sense of deity is not merely a capacity for the knowledge of God, nor is it the product of reflection upon natural revelation. It is an immediate intuition of the existence and majesty of the one true God, which, though obscured by human sinfulness, can never be completely eradicated. The effects of this awareness are seen in the universality of religious phenomena and in the slavish fear of God present even in the most infamous of sinners.

The significance of the sense of deity is that humankind cannot escape God and is therefore held accountable for the revelation given and inexcusable for its rejection. On the other hand, this knowledge will not serve as a foundation for erecting a Christian theology. So universal is the effect of sin that, although God has sown the seed of religion in all humans, there are scarcely any who foster its growth and none in whom it comes unaided to fruition. Blindness, vanity, and obstinacy combine so that at best he or she worships not God but a figment and dream of his or her own heart.

D. G. DUNBAR

See also REVELATION, GENERAL.

Bibliography. G. C. Berkouwer, General Revelation; J. Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion; B. A. Demarest, General Revelation; E. A. Dowey Jr., Knowledge of God in Calvin's Theology.

Sensus Plenior. See INTERPRETATION OF THE BIBLE.

Sentences. An attempt to make the beliefs of the faith partially reasonable within the framework of Fides quaerens intellectum (faith seeking to understand). The notion of sentences originated from the writings of the early Christian fathers, who wished to explain in a disciplined and authoritative manner the various truths that emanate from the Holy Scriptures as the Word of God. The sentences of the medieval period sought to organize more clearly the thoughts of the fathers of the church.

The sentences dealt with both dogma and morals, since these two areas of thought were held to be central in both the understanding and execution of faith. There were various forms of sentences dependent upon the choices made by a particular author in relation to the doctrines of Christianity.

Anselm of Laon wrote a very complicated set of sentences in the twelfth century. Abelard also wrote a very complex and sophisticated set of sentences. His Sic et Non is a classic work giving affirmative and negative views about dogmatic and moral questions of Christianity. Hugh of St. Victor also wrote an interesting series in the twelfth century, but most experts agree that the sentences of Peter Lombard were the most interesting and unusual of the period.

Most sentences examine the creation of the universe, with special emphasis upon humanity and free will in relation to original sin. The incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ is also examined at length, with special reference to his influence upon the sacraments as expressions of his grace. God as triune and one is also investigated at length.

Most medieval students studied the sentences assiduously in order to gain their degrees. Students usually considered Peter Lombard to be the master of the sentences. If a student knew the sentences well he was considered to be in possession of the truth concerning theological matters.

T. J. GERMAN

See also PETER LOMBARD.

Separation. A reference to the lifestyle of the Christian. Having been redeemed and regenerated by the Lord, the Christian's life is to be different from that of the non-Christian. Certain actions, attitudes, and thoughts are to be different from what they formerly were and from the conduct of the world. Holiness, not evil, is to be the characteristic feature of the believer's life. As such, separation is the negative aspect of sanctification.

Biblical Teaching. Numerous teachings of Scripture support the idea of separation. The people of Israel were reminded that they were God's chosen people and that he was a holy God who expected the lives of his people to be similar. They were not to engage in the practices of the ungodly nations around them. Indeed, the most common word for holy is one which means separated, set apart for a particular use, but also set apart from the contaminated things.

In the OT, the people of Israel were to practice separation of life in several ways. They were, for instance, not to engage in the religious practices of the neighboring heathen nations: offering their children as sacrifices, practicing various means of fortune telling, and consulting mediums, witches, and such (Deut. 18:9-14). They were not to intermarry with these nations about them, because of the danger that they would adopt the foreign religious practices. They were also to abstain from eating certain unclean or ceremonially forbidden foods (Lev. 11). Certain objects and persons in certain conditions (e.g., those infected with leprosy) were unclean and were not to be touched (Lev. 12-15).

In the NT there is an even stronger emphasis on the fact that God has called his people to be unique, selected by him as his temple, to be indwelt by him. The emphasis upon this choosing (1 Pet. 2:9), upon the Lord (Col. 1:10), upon the calling (Eph. 4:1), is then applied in terms of abstaining from passions of the flesh (1 Pet. 2:11), putting off the old nature and the practices of the Gentiles (Eph. 4:17-32) and the evil acts appropriate to the old nature (Col. 3:5). Again and again, the argument is advanced that they are now new creatures, they belong to the Lord, and they have the Holy Spirit dwelling within them. Thus, they should conduct themselves according to this new principle.

There is a conflict between this new nature or life in the spirit and the old nature or flesh still dwelling within the person after regeneration. Paul depicts in vivid terms the struggle, in which he does the evil he does not want to do and does not do the good he wishes to do (Rom. 7:21-25). There are whole lists of activities that are not the fruit of the Spirit but rather are the works of the flesh (Gal. 5:19-21). These the believer is to shun. Paul even goes so far as to say that those who do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God.

Some actions cannot be classified right or wrong by so simple a means as consulting a list, however. Here the Spirit-led believer will have to measure them against certain principles: Whether they can be done to the glory of God (1 Cor. 10:31); whether they can be done in the name of Christ, on his behalf and invoking his blessing (Col. 3:17); whether this is what Christ would have been likely to do (1 John 2:6); whether this will contribute positively to the spiritual welfare of others (1 Cor. 10:23–30).

Separation

Sometimes separation has been made a matter of external acts, so that lists of forbidden activities were compiled. While separation includes this, it also goes beyond. Jesus extended the law by pointing to the importance of thoughts and attitudes (Matt. 5:17–30). Many of the sins of the flesh that Paul speaks against are not primarily physical or bodily sins but rather are attitudinal or spiritual sins (e.g., strife, jealousy, anger, selfishness, dissension, party spirit, envy). His appeal to believers not to be conformed to the world speaks of the renewing of their minds (Rom. 12:1–2). It is the love of money, not the possession of it, that is the root of all kinds of evil (1 Tim. 6:10). We are not to love the world or the things in the world (1 John 2:15). Thus, it is possible to live a life that is very separated in action but very worldly or unseparated so far as attitudes are concerned. Indeed, this seems to have been precisely the case with the Pharisees (Matt. 23). It is not enough to ask merely what one does or does not do, but why one does it.

Secondary Separation. What one does and thinks with respect to certain wrong and evil matters may be termed primary separation. There is also the question of whether one should separate oneself from others who are not consistently Christian. This is called secondary separation.

There are a number of scriptural injunctions to practice this type of separation. Paul talks about not being mismatched with unbelievers (2 Cor. 6:14). The believer is to come out from them and be separate and touch nothing unclean (v. 17). The apostle also speaks of taking note of those who create dissensions and difficulties—who, in other words, are engaged in certain works of the flesh—and having nothing to do with them (Rom. 16:17). He instructed the Corinthian church to drive out the immoral wicked person, who is living in sin, from the church (1 Cor. 5:13), delivering him or her to Satan for the destruction of the flesh (v. 5). They were to cut themselves off from these people by practicing church discipline or putting them out of the church. Just how serious a sin calls for such action has been a subject of debate for a long time in the church. Augustine and the Donatists had a major dispute over this matter in the early fifth century. There is always a tension between wanting to preserve the purity of the church and wanting to pursue the restoration of the person to Christ.

It should be noted that in some cases there is what might even be termed tertiary separation: for example, some of those who refuse to cooperate with Billy Graham do so not because his ministry is sinful, or even because they would be thrown into contact with those who do not have sufficiently high standards, but rather because Billy Graham, himself practicing primary separation, is not separated from certain others who do not practice separation in their own lives. Therefore, they believe that they must shun Billy Graham because of those with whom he associates.

Ecclesiastical Separation. What of the situation where the Bible-believing Christian is part of a minority within a church congregation or denomination? Here the believer is unable to have discipline administered, since true and separated Christians are a minority. What then? When should the Christian or a congregation separate from a congregation or wider church fellowship? Here the issue is one of ecclesiastical separation. There are arguments both for and against remaining in the fellowship.

Reasons favoring separation: (1) The Bible states that heresy is not to be tolerated (Gal. 1:8–9; 2 Tim. 3:5; Titus 3:10–11; 1 John 4:1–6; 2 John 7–11; Rev. 2:14). (2) Membership in a group involves some responsibility for its actions. (3) Remaining in an unfaithful fellowship seems to be a tacit endorsement and even recommendation of evil. (4) It is poor stewardship to give one's money to help support Christian ministries that are not unequivocally Christian.

Arguments favoring remaining in the group: (1) By remaining in the fellowship, one has an opportunity to influence, and perhaps reform, the group and possibly win it back. Withdrawing writes off the larger group. (2) Separation often leads to additional splitting, fragmenting the body of Christ even further. (3) The church's witness to the world is stronger where it is united, rather than when scandalizing through inability to function together.

Each believer will have to seek the Holy Spirit's guidance in reaching his own convictions. All seem to agree that if one is prohibited from holding beliefs or engaging in practices that the Lord prescribes, or if the gospel is not being preached and cannot be, separation must take place. Those who recommend remaining within the group, however, focus upon the healing ministry, whereas those who advocate separation stress the surgical approach.

While Christians may differ at some points regarding the nature and proper areas of separation, they are agreed that the motivation stems from their belonging to the Lord. In the OT, places, buildings, articles, and days were holy, being set apart for the exclusive use of the Holy God. And in the NT, God dwells, not in temples made with human hands, but in Christians (1 Cor. 3:16; 6:19). And they will desire their lives to be pure and clean, appropriate to his habitation and use.

M. J. ERICKSON

Separation, Marital. Legal dissolution in whole or in part of a marriage. Some parts of the Christian church have forbidden divorce a vinculo (with right of remarriage), although they have recognized legal separation “from bed and board” (a thoro et mensa) as permitted in some circumstances of marital breakdown. This was apparently the view of most of the early fathers. The Church of Rome does not recognize divorce but does allow legal separation without right of remarriage. In the 1603 canon law of the Church of England, regulation is given only for “divorce” in the sense of separation a thoro et mensa, and “the parties so separated shall live chastely and continently; neither shall they, during each others’ life, contract matrimony with another person.” However, had Cranmer’s revised canons, proposed in 1553 (Reformatio Legum Ecclesiasticarum), ever reached the statute book, they would have allowed divorce a vinculo for a variety of causes. Different parts of the Church of England have tended to one or the other of these views at different times. The Nonconformist churches, however, and the Eastern Orthodox churches do recognize divorce a vinculo.

It is extremely unlikely that legal separation from bed and board without right of remarriage was known to the writers of the OT or the NT. In Deuteronomy 24, the reference is to divorce with (restricted) right of remarriage. The Synoptic divorce material has been variously interpreted. There are those who believe that Jesus is abrogating the Deuteronomic law and is teaching a radically more strict view, namely, all divorce is forbidden, but separation without right of remarriage may be permitted “for marital unfaithfulness” (Matt. 19:9). Others believe that Jesus is speaking about divorce a vinculo. Some also wish to find biblical support for legal separation without remarriage from the teaching of Paul in 1 Corinthians 7:10–11. “To the married I give this command (not I but the Lord): A wife must not separate from her husband. But if she does, she must remain unmarried or else be reconciled to her husband. And a husband must not divorce his wife.” The main point of Paul’s teaching, here, as in Romans 7:1–3, is the divine rule for the permanence of marriage, against which all separation and all divorce must be measured as wrong. The concession in 1 Corinthians 7:10 (“but if she does”) seems to be more a recognition that the divine ideal is not always kept, and that failure needs to be regulated, rather than a sanction for legal separation without divorce a vinculo.

See also DIVORCE; MARRIAGE, THEOLOGY OF; REMARRIAGE.

Separation of Church and State. See CHURCH AND STATE.

Septuagesima (Lat. for “seventieth”). The third Sunday before Lent. Septuagesima, sexagesima, and quinquagesima are the names traditionally assigned in the calendar of the Western Christian church to the three Sundays leading up to Lent. They arise (somewhat inconsistently) from the fact that quinquagesima was literally the fiftieth day before Easter. Obviously it has been convenient, though incorrect, to call the preceding Sundays the sixtieth and seventieth respectively; the names are known from the eighth century. The Book of Common Prayer in 1662 added the subtitle “or the Third Sunday before Lent.”

D. H. WHEATON

See also CHRISTIAN YEAR; LENT; QUADRAGESIMA; QUINQUAGESIMA.

Bibliography. A. A. McArthur, Evolution of the Christian Year.

Seraph, Seraphim. See ANGEL.

Sermon on the Mount. The discourse of Jesus in Matthew 5–7, containing the epitome of his ethical teaching. The shorter but parallel sermon in Luke 6:20–49 is usually known as the Sermon on the Plain, because of a different description of the setting. No other block of Jesus’ teaching has enjoyed such wide influence and intense examination. Its uniqueness derives not only from its impact as a whole, but also from the fact that some of its parts have attained classical status on their own.

The sermon has been called anything from essential Christianity to Jesus’ manifesto, but it is best seen as the height of Jesus’ ethical demands on his disciples occasioned by the nearness of the kingdom. Since Matthew portrays Jesus as seated in rabbinic posture teaching his disciples, the term “sermon” is an unfortunate, though now unavoidable, one.

Contexts of the Sermon. Matthew. (1) Structure. The body of Matthew is organized around five discourses of Jesus, each ending with a transitional formula beginning “When Jesus finished. . . .” The sermon is the first of these discourses, and, coupled with the narrative section which follows in chapters 8–9, forms a characterization of Jesus’ early Galilean ministry. Some of the Beatitudes have corresponding woes in chapter 23, whereas in Luke these appear in the sermon itself.

Sermon on the Mount

(2) Theology. The sermon meshes well with the theology of Matthew in several respects, especially in parallels with the Pentateuch and emphasis on the kingdom. The initial verse calls to mind early statements in Genesis, and as he presents Jesus' preadult life, certain similarities with Moses are quite striking. The sermon is set on a mountain, and Jesus comes to fulfill the law (5:17) and sets himself up as the authoritative interpreter of its true meaning in the antitheses of chapter 5. The kingdom theme combines with that of righteousness in 5:20 and 6:33, but its importance is seen above all in the Beatitudes, which begin and end with a promise of the kingdom, thus indicating that this is their overriding focus.

Synoptic Gospels. Various attempts to place the sermon precisely in Jesus' ministry have proven problematic, but it certainly belongs early. That it bears some relationship to Luke's Sermon on the Plain is evident, especially from the overall agreement in the ordering of parallel material. The greatest difference is the absence in Luke of the Palestinian Jewish or OT background to the sayings and of the whole block of material where Jesus' teaching is set over against some of contemporary Judaism (5:17–6:18). Of the various explanations of the relationship between the two sermons, the most satisfactory one is that they represent two separate teaching occasions reflecting different versions of a discourse Jesus gave on several occasions, but adapted to each situation. This allows for the redactional activity in Matthew but ascribes the basic sermon as it stands to Jesus himself.

New Testament as a Whole. The position of the sermon on the continuum of NT theology may be seen in light of the commonly perceived extremes—James and Paul. There are more close parallels between the sermon and James than with any other NT writing, and both of them belong in the Wisdom tradition. Because of the widespread belief that Paul and Jesus, in the sermon, taught faith-righteousness versus works-righteousness, the two kinds of righteousness are often seen as poles apart theologically.

Theological Assessment. Famous Sections. Three parts of the sermon have wielded considerable influence in their own right on Christian consciousness and liturgy. The Beatitudes have the kingdom as their primary theme, but they also introduce some other emphases. In contrast to their consoling nature in Luke, in Matthew they assume the character of ethical demands, and the focus of the blessings themselves is eschatological. The Matthean version of the Lord's Prayer is poetic with beautiful symmetry and has heavily influenced Christian liturgy. Jesus uses it as an illustration of the need for simplicity in prayer, and some of its words suggest his follow-up principle of reciprocal forgiveness. The Golden Rule (7:12) brings to their apex the sermon's earlier teachings on interpersonal relations. Its interpreters have often stressed Jesus' positive mode of formulating this principle in contrast to the negative way by other great religious teachers. In the context of Jesus' thought as a whole, the Golden Rule is his way of expressing Leviticus 19:18b, which he elsewhere calls the second great commandment (Matt. 22:39), for he sees both as the epitome of the law and the prophets.

Troublesome Passages. Several of Jesus' precepts are presented in such an absolute form that many interpreters have questioned the sermon's applicability to the average Christian. Tolstoy, on the other hand, while failing to recognize Jesus' use of such techniques as hyperbole, found here maxims the serious person must literally observe. Certainly the person who literally destroys an eye or a hand (5:29–30) has not solved his problem, because he still has another left. Hyperbole here serves to underscore the urgency of radical action to remove the source of a temptation. Jesus' forbidding of judging (7:1) has led some to conclude that a Christian cannot be a judge or serve on a jury; however, he is not giving the word a legal meaning but is talking about being judgmental in interpersonal relations. The prohibition against swearing (5:34) has led some to refuse to swear, even in court, but Jesus' words are best seen against the background of the elaborate rabbinic system of loopholes that precluded simple honesty in personal dealings. Jesus himself took an oath (Mark 8:12). Finally, Jesus' principle of nonresistance (Matt. 5:39) has been applied even to military and police force, whereas, again, Jesus relates it to interpersonal relationships.

Influence and Interpretation. Influence. Since the second century no block of Scripture of comparable size has exerted as great an influence as the sermon. In the pre-Nicene period, passages from this discourse were quoted or alluded to more than from any other part of the Bible. To the present day these words still profoundly challenge Christians and non-Christians alike. They caused Tolstoy to change completely his social theory and influenced the development of Gandhi's use of nonviolence as a political force. Even Nietzsche, who objected to the teachings of the sermon, did not ignore them.

History of Interpretation. The arresting nature of the sermon has produced numerous diverging efforts to explain, or even explain away, Jesus' words. Many have resisted efforts to limit the sermon's applicability. One approach sees Jesus teaching an obedience-righteousness that cannot be reconciled with Paul. Anabaptists did not go so far, but insisted that Jesus' words are so absolute that their obedience precludes Christian participation in certain social and political institutions. Bonhoeffer reacted against those who would analyze and interpret but fail to do the sermon. It must be done, but the power to do it comes only from the cross. Luther attempted to avoid what he regarded as the extremes of both the Roman and Anabaptist interpretations and stressed the obligation to keep the sermon's commandments. Liberal Protestantism has seen the sermon as the heart of the gospel and as Jesus' program for reforming society.

Others have attempted to limit the sermon's applicability. The predominant Lutheran view, though not that of Luther himself, is that the sermon presents an impossible ideal which cannot be realized, so its function is to show man his inadequacy so he will be prepared for the gospel. What is sometimes called the existential position sees Jesus as attempting to change attitudes, not actions. The medieval Catholic interpretation called these precepts "evangelical counsels" for the few who would seek perfection, rather than commandments for every Christian. Two approaches limit the full applicability of the sermon to the breaking in of the kingdom, but with different results: Schweitzer saw Jesus primarily as an eschatological figure, so he coined the term "interim ethics" to emphasize that the stringent requirements of the sermon could apply only to the stress-packed times immediately before God introduced his kingdom, an event which never occurred, so the sermon does not apply to our modern situation. Dispensationalists also limit the sermon's focus to the kingdom, so for them Jesus' teachings will fully apply only at its future coming.

Meaning of the Sermon. Jesus concludes the sermon by setting up certain requirements that relate directly to one's being saved or lost. He divides humankind into three classes: those who (1) follow him (7:13–14, 17, 21, 24–25), (2) do not follow him (vv. 13–14, 26–27), and (3) pretend to follow him (vv. 15–20, 21–23). To be saved one must actually follow the teachings of the sermon, but Jesus does not say they must be performed perfectly. The saved are those who accept and actually attempt to direct their lives by the sermon; the lost are those who pretend to follow or who reject these teachings. Is this any different from Paul's man of faith? Was Paul not scandalized by the notion that a person may live the way he wants? The person who rests his faith in Jesus determines to follow him. This is Jesus and Paul. Mere profession of belief, without obedience, will secure Jesus' condemnation, "I never knew you. You evildoers, depart from me" (v. 23). An unfortunate feature of much post-Reformation Christianity has been the interpretation of Jesus in light of Paul rather than the converse. One of the contributions of Bonhoeffer's treatment of this sermon is his insistence on reading Paul in light of Jesus and, hence, his stressing the necessity of doing the sermon. Perfection is not demanded and aid is provided, but still the true disciple is "the one who does the will of the Father" (v. 21).

G. T. BURKE

See also GOLDEN RULE; JESUS CHRIST.

Bibliography. Augustine, Our Lord's Sermon on the Mount; J. M. Boice, Sermon on the Mount; D. Bonhoeffer, Cost of Discipleship; W. D. Davies, Sermon on the Mount; Setting of the Sermon on the Mount; G. Friedlander, Jewish Sources of the Sermon on the Mount; R. M. Grant, "Sermon on the Mount in Early Christianity," Semeia 12:215–31; K. Grayston, IDB 4:279–89; R. Guelich, Sermon on the Mount; J. Jeremias, Sermon on the Mount; W. S. Kissinger, Sermon on the Mount: A History of Interpretation and Bibliography; D. M. Lloyd-Jones, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount; M. Luther, Sermon on the Mount; H. K. McArthur, Understanding the Sermon on the Mount; C. G. Montefiore, Rabbinic Literature and Gospel Teachings; J. R. W. Stott, Message of the Sermon on the Mount; H. Thielicke, Life Can Begin Again; A. N. Wilder, IB 7:155–64; H. Windisch, Meaning of the Sermon on the Mount.

Serpent. See SATAN.

Servant of the Lord. The expression 'ebed yhwah, "servant of Yahweh," designating devoted worshippers such as Abraham (Ps. 105:6), or others who fulfilled God's purposes, like Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. 25:9). But the preeminent "servant of Yahweh" appears as Isaiah comforted Israel, ravaged by Sennacherib, 701 B.C. Twenty times in Isaiah 40–53 the 'ebed yhwah is prophesied, even as vividly present, spoken to, or speaking.

The identity of the servant varies. Sometimes it refers to the whole nation, "Israel, my servant" (Isa. 41:8), though sinfully deaf and blind (42:19). In Isaiah's "servant songs" (42:1–7; 49:1–9; 50:4–9; 52:13–53:12; and probably 61:1–3), however, this national meaning disappears, replaced by a righteous servant who restores Jacob (49:5). Superficial criticism has accordingly questioned the Isaianic authenticity of the songs. But Isaiah recognized a pious remnant (10:20–22), which included his prophetic circle (44:26; 8:16). In the songs, however (except for 49:3), the servant cannot be the collective remnant but only an individual. By his objective description, moreover (42:1), he cannot be Isaiah himself. The future reference (52:13) demonstrates that he cannot be Moses, the dying-god Tammuz(!), the king performing ritualistic service, or some other past leader. Finally, his sinless character (53:9) and the magnitude of his work (42:4) forbid his equation with any merely human leader in the future, such as Jehoiachin or Zerubbabel. The NT (John 12:38, 41; Acts 8:32–35) specifies Jesus Christ as the only embodiment of ideal Israel, the final accomplishment of the remnant (Isa. 49:6).

The mission of the servant is (1) that of a humanly born prophet (49:1–2; cf. Jer. 1:5), empowered by God's Holy Spirit (Isa. 42:1; 61:1; Luke 4:21), with a non-self-assertive ministry (Isa. 42:2–3; Matt. 12:18–21). (2) He suffers vicariously, bearing the cares of others (Isa. 53:4; cf. Christ's healings, Matt. 8:17). (3) Meeting disbelief (Isa. 53:1), he becomes subject to reproach (49:7; 50:6; Matt. 26:67; 27:26). (4) Condemned as a criminal, he gives up his life, punished for the sins of others (Isa. 53:5–8; 1 Pet. 2:22–25), God making his soul a priestly āsām, “guilt offering” (Isa. 53:10). He atoningly “sprinkles many nations” (52:15; Heb. 12:24; 1 Pet. 1:2). (5) The servant thereby accomplishes God's pleasure, is buried honorably with the rich (Isa. 53:9–10; Matt. 27:57), and is resurrected in glory (Isa. 53:10–12). (6) His divine sacrifice justifies many (v. 11) and avails for Gentiles as well (42:6; Luke 2:32). (7) He establishes ultimate justice in the earth itself (Isa. 42:4; Rom. 15:12). (8) The servant thus becomes the incarnation of God's redemptive covenant, or testament (Isa. 42:6; 49:8), effectuating it by his death and constituting in his own resurrected life its inheritance for the saints (cf. Col. 1:27).

Servant of the Lord

The servant songs imply the equation of the Davidic Messiah and the suffering servant (cf. Gen. 3:15: the messianic seed victorious but “bruised in the heel”). Both are divinely chosen and uniquely righteous (Isa. 42:1, 6; 9:7; cf. Ps. 89:3–4). The humiliation of the Messiah at his first coming (Isa. 7:15; Dan. 9:25–26; Zech. 9:9) parallels that of the servant. Isaiah, in contextual proximity, describes both as witnessing to the Gentiles (49:6; 55:4); and the same Holy Spirit of equity who fills the Davidic “branch” (11:1–4) rests upon the servant for an identical eschatological function (42:1). The ultimate exaltation of the servant (49:5, 7; 52:15) requires their equation. Thus Zechariah associates the messianic branch with the priestly removal of iniquity and combines the two terms: “my servant, the branch” (3:8–9; cf. 10:12 with 14:4). Did the prophets understand their own words? Scripture declares, “Isaiah said this because he saw Jesus' glory and spoke about him” (John 12:41), though certain details of Calvary he doubtless described better than he himself knew. John the Baptist identified the Messiah with the sacrificial lamb of God (1:29–30), but the multitudes failed to grasp this equation (12:34). Christ conclusively revealed his identity, both as Messiah (4:25–26) and as suffering servant (Luke 22:37). J. B. PAYNE

See also CHRISTOLOGY; MESSIAH.

Bibliography. O. T. Allis, Unity of Isaiah; O. Cullmann, Christology of the New Testament; M. D. Hooker, Jesus and the Servant; J. Jeremias, New Testament Theology 1:286–99; J. Lindblom, Servant Songs in Deutero-Isaiah; T. W. Manson, Servant-Messiah; S. Mowinckel, He That Cometh; C. R. North, Suffering Servant in Deutero-Isaiah; H. W. Robinson, Cross in the Old Testa- ment; H. H. Rowley, Servant of the Lord and Other Essays; W. Zimmerli and J. Jeremias, TDNT 5:654–717.

Service, Gift of. See SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

Session (Lat. sessio). A sitting. The OT portrays God as seated on the throne of the universe, thereby signifying sovereignty (1 Kings 22:19; Pss. 2:4; 99:1), holiness (Ps. 47:8), and majesty (Isa. 6:1–4). In Psalm 110:1 the Messiah is invited to occupy the position of honor at his right hand (Mark 12:36; Acts 2:34; Heb. 1:13). His throne is to be one of sovereignty and priesthood (Ps. 110:1, 4; Zech. 6:12–13) and of judgment (Mal. 3:3). The Hebrew root throughout is yāšab (to sit).

To this position God exalted Christ at his ascension (Phil. 2:9–11; Eph. 1:20–23, which latter passage alone employs kathizo (to sit), elsewhere intransitive, transitively). First Peter 3:22, by the use of poreutheis (to proceed), implies a deliberate progress by Christ after his death to the position of sovereignty he had foretold (Matt. 26:64; Mark 14:62; Luke 22:69; and see Mark 16:19). Hebrews 1:3; 10:12; and 12:2 describe the session as the sequel to his one complete sacrifice on earth. He sits as high priest after the order of Melchizedek (Heb. 8:1; 10:12), exercising his priesthood of sympathetic assistance to men and intercession for them (Heb. 2:17–18; 4:14–16; 7:17–27) until all is finally subjected to him (Heb. 10:13). His session also points toward his future judgment (Matt. 19:28; 2 Cor. 5:10).

Thrice the ascended Christ is depicted as standing: once to succor (Acts 7:55–56) and twice to receive worship (Rev. 5:6; 14:1).

Early creeds (a Roman formula quoted in Greek by Marcellus and one from Jerusalem found in Cyril) mention the session. D. H. WHEATON

See also ASCENSION OF CHRIST; STATES OF JESUS CHRIST.

Bibliography. W. Milligan, Ascension of Our Lord; H. B. Swete, Ascended Christ; A. J. Tait, Heavenly Session of Our Lord; B. F. Westcott, Epistle to the Hebrews.

Seven Articles of Schleithem. See MENNONITES.

Seven Deadly Sins. See SINS, SEVEN DEADLY.

Seventh-day Adventism. See ADVENTISM.

Seven Virtues. See CARDINAL VIRTUES, SEVEN.

Sexist Language. See INCLUSIVE LANGUAGE.

Sexual Ethics. Moral and ethical discourse relating to issues of sexuality, gender, and family. Christian sexual ethics attempts to integrate the findings of Scripture, tradition, experience, and the leading of the Spirit, but is an area of much contemporary discord. Churches have been openly struggling with sexual issues ranging from ordination of homosexuals and divorce, to sexual abuse among the clergy. These struggles are exacerbated in a pluralistic, fragmented society where the social sciences have come to dominate most discussion of sexuality, and where there is an increasing emphasis upon the constructed nature of gender.

Biblical Evidence. Genesis 1 describes the creation of humankind as male and female from the beginning. We conclude that this difference, without suggestion of subordination, is essential to human creativity and purpose. Genesis also describes the fall of humankind and the beginning of an age lived under curses that include more than a hint of ensuing sexual conflict. Women will have pain in reproduction and will live under the domination of men.

