

EVANGELICAL DICTIONARY of THEOLOGY

Baker Reference Library

Baker Encyclopedia of Christian Apologetics

Norman L. Geisler

Baker Encyclopedia of Psychology and Counseling, 2d ed.

Edited by David G. Benner and Peter C. Hill

Evangelical Dictionary of Christian Education

Edited by Michael J. Anthony

Evangelical Dictionary of Theology, 2d ed.

Edited by Walter A. Elwell

Evangelical Dictionary of World Missions

Edited by A. Scott Moreau

Evangelical Commentary on the Bible

Edited by Walter A. Elwell

Evangelical Dictionary of Biblical Theology

Edited by Walter A. Elwell

Topical Analysis of the Bible

Edited by Walter A. Elwell

EVANGELICAL DICTIONARY of THEOLOGY

SECOND EDITION

Edited by
WALTER A. ELWELL

 Baker Academic
Grand Rapids, Michigan

© 1984, 2001 by Baker Book House Company

Published by Baker Academic a division of Baker Publishing Group
P.O. Box 6287, Grand Rapids, MI 49516-6287
www.bakeracademic.com

Fifth printing, September 2007

Printed in the United States of America

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means—for example, electronic, photocopy, recording—without the prior written permission of the publisher. The only exception is brief quotations in printed reviews.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data Evangelical Dictionary of Theology, 2nd edition / Walter A. Elwell, editor
p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references and index

ISBN 10: 0-8010-2075-1

ISBN 978-0-8010-2075-9

1. Theology—Dictionaries. I. Elwell, Walter A.

BR95.E87 2001

230.2—dc21

2001272311

Unless otherwise indicated, Scripture taken from the HOLY BIBLE, NEW INTERNATIONAL VERSION®. NIV®. Copyright 1973, 1978, 1984 by International Bible Society. Used by permission of Zondervan. All rights reserved.

Preface to the Second Edition

The positive reception accorded the first edition of the EDT was a source of deep satisfaction and thanksgiving to God on the part of the many people who had contributed to it. The goal that Baker Book House had set was to construct a one-volume reference work on theology that was both up to date and academically accurate, yet accessible to the average layperson. The success that the EDT enjoyed was testimony that that goal had largely been reached. However, no work of this sort is entirely free of shortcomings and certain limitations, some of which were unavoidable, but some of which were due to human oversight. Our reviewers were good enough to point some of these out to us and some of them we found on our own—and some we were able to correct during the various printings of the original edition. However, in time we came to realize that a full-blown revision would eventually be called for and work on that began about six years ago. The process of revision has been every bit as demanding as the production of the original volume, and, I might add, every bit as informative and enjoyable. Obviously, it is the authors who deserve the lion's share of the credit for the excellence of the work that was done and I gladly offer them my sincerest thanks. This is not to overlook the immense amount of effort that everyone at Baker put into this revision. Special thanks go to Rebecca Cooper, David Aiken, Brian Brunsting, Barb Malda, Jan Arroyo, Helen Kelly, Laura Weller, Margie Hailstone, Jarl Waggoner, and Matt Donnelly, along with Allan Fisher, Jim Weaver, and Cindy Ingram.

The process of revision took us through the entire volume and consisted of the following things: We added about 215 new articles and deleted about 100 that were deemed no longer relevant for the current day. One major change was the decision to include living theologians, such as James Cone, George Lindbeck, J. I. Packer, Wolfhart Pannenberg, and Rosemary Reuther. The original decision that excluded living theologians seemed to make sense at the time because people's views inevitably change and that would render those articles obsolete the moment the volume was published. We came to realize that in spite of that it would be more helpful if the leading players on the current theological scene were included because they were the ones who were being talked about and studied. We tried to include the major theologians, but, of course, there will always be a difference of opinion as to who should or should not be there. The reader can make the final decision on that subject. We also wanted to include some of the newer theological trends that have risen in prominence since the first edition, such as Canonical Criticism, Empirical Theology, and Postliberal Theology, as well as some of the more controversial topics of interest, such as the Jesus Seminar, Deconstructionism, and spiritual Warfare. Significant articles were updated or sometimes rewritten where it was deemed necessary, such as Church Growth Movement, Evangelicalism, and Dispensationalism. Bibliographies were updated, cross-references were upgraded, and articles were added where needed to balance out some of the older categories, such as Cloud of Unknowing, History of Religion School, and Religious Language. We also added some articles that should have been in the original edition, but for one reason or another weren't, such as Sociology of Religion.

We trust that all these changes will make the revised EDT an even more valuable reference work than the original was in its time and we offer it to you with thanksgiving and gratitude. May God's richest blessings be yours as you make use of this volume and in every other possible way. If this volume informs you intellectually, strengthens you spiritually, challenges you personally, or deepens your walk with the Lord, we will have achieved our purpose.

Walter A. Elwell
Wheaton College
January 2001

Preface to the First Edition

After years of trying to find answers for our deepest questions in everything from biochemistry to computer science, it has dawned upon us once more that these questions are theological and that only theological answers will do. This has created a newer, more friendly climate for the study of religion and a genuine need for serious, yet understandable reference works. Older works, good as they are, addressed the situation of earlier generations and simply do not provide what is needed today. Hence this volume, Evangelical Dictionary of Theology. It is a new work, designed to succeed Baker's Dictionary of Theology, which, since its publication in 1960, has nobly served almost two generations of seminarians and theological students.

The EDT, although considerably larger than its predecessor in the number of both entries and words, is still limited in scope because of its one-volume format. This limitation did have one good effect. It discouraged the inclusion of anything unnecessary. A beginning collection of over 8,000 entries was cut back several times until approximately 1,200 entries remained. Differences of opinion obviously exist as to whether these 1,200 are the most significant. But the reader is humbly requested to consider how difficult it is to decide what should go or stay.

Several special features of the EDT need to be understood in order to use it most effectively. First, each article stresses the theological dimension of its subject. So, for example, items drawn from church history, Bible, or biography attempt to emphasize that entry's theological significance, rather than its significance per se. Second, contributors are sympathetic to the subjects on which they write. They are not, however, uncritically sympathetic, and in many instances they include critical evaluations. Third, the EDT is written in popular language. The editor, contributors, and publisher sincerely hope that the dictionary communicates well. Our goal was this: that the scholar find it correct; the layman, understandable. Fourth, cross references at the end of an article direct one to related material, enabling one to study thoroughly the whole subject. Fifth, the bibliographies are intended to be not exhaustive, but selective. For the most part they are limited to works in English, because that is the only language most of the dictionary's readers can use.

Needless to say, in a work written by approximately two hundred people, differences of opinion appear. No attempt was made to force uniformity upon it all. That differences of opinion exist in this dictionary is only testimony to the fact that such differences exist in the evangelical community at large. Nothing in EDT, though, casts doubt on any fundamental truth of the Christian faith, or on the absolute trustworthiness of the Bible.

Special acknowledgment is due to those who played a special role in the production of this work: Lauris Mays, who did all the secretarial work cheerfully and efficiently; my wife, Louan Elwell, whose patience and organizational skills kept the project on track; Allan Fisher of Baker Book House, whose guidance and understanding were exceptional; Jean Hager, whose final editorial work was invaluable; and finally Wheaton College, which granted a sabbatical in the fall of 1982.

Abbreviations

ABD	Anchor Bible Dictionary , ed. D. N. Freedman	EB	Encyclopaedia Biblica , ed. T. K. Cheyne and J. S. Black
ANF	Ante-Nicene Fathers, ed. A. Roberts and J. Donaldson	EDBT	Evangelical Dictionary of Biblical Theology , ed. W. A. Elwell
APTR	American Presbyterian and Theological Review	EJ	Encyclopaedia Judaica
AQ	American Quarterly	EncyBrit	Encyclopaedia Britannica
ASR	American Sociological Review	ER	Encyclopaedia of Religion , ed. V. Ferm
ASV	American Standard Version	ERV	English Revised Version
ATR	Anglican Theological Review	Eter	Eternity
Aug	Augustinianum	EvQ	Evangelical Quarterly
AUSS	Andrews University Seminary Studies	ExpT	Expository Times
BJRL	Bulletin of the John Rylands University Library	FH	Fides et Historia
BR	Biblical Research	GM	Gospel Magazine
BS	Bibliotheca Sacra	Greg	Gregorianum
BT	Bible Today	HCT	Handbook of Christian Theologians , ed. D. Peerman and M. Marty
BTB	Biblical Theology Bulletin	HDAC	Dictionary of the Apostolic Church , ed. J. Hastings
CBQ	Catholic Biblical Quarterly	HDB	Dictionary of the Bible , ed. J. Hastings
CCen	Christian Century	HDCCG	Dictionary of Christ and the Gospels , ed. J. Hastings
CGT	Cambridge Greek Testament for Schools and Colleges	HDSB	Harvard Divinity [School] Bulletin
CH	Church History	HERE	Encyclopaedia of Religion and Ethics , ed. J. Hastings
CHR	Catholic Historical Review	HET	Handbook of Evangelical Theologians , ed. W. A. Elwell
Chu	Churchman	HMPEC	Historical Magazine of the Protestant Episcopal Church
CJ	Classical Journal	HTR	Harvard Theological Review
Con	Concilium	HUCA	Hebrew Union College Annual
CongQ	Congregational Quarterly	HZNT	Handbuch zum Neuen Testament
CQ	Covenant Quarterly	IB	Interpreter's Bible
CQR	Church Quarterly Review	IBD	Illustrated Bible Dictionary , ed. W. C. Piercy
CSEL	Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum	ICC	International Critical Commentary
CT	Christianity Today	IDB	Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible , ed. G. A. Buttrick
CTJ	Calvin Theological Journal	IDBSup	Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible , supplementary volume, ed. K. Crim
CTM	Concordia Theological Monthly	IEJ	Israel Exploration Journal
CTQ	Concordia Theological Quarterly	Int	Interpretation
CW	Catholic World	IRM	International Review of Mission
CWS	Classics of Western Spirituality	ISBE	International Standard Bible Encyclopaedia , ed. J. Orr (1st edition); ed. G. W. Bromiley (revised edition)
DCE	Baker's Dictionary of Christian Ethics , ed. C. F. H. Henry	ITQ	Irish Theological Quarterly
DJG	Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels , ed. J. B. Green, S. McKnight, and I. H. Marshall	JAAR	Journal of the American Academy of Religion
DNB	Dictionary of National Biography
DOP	Dumbarton Oaks Papers
DPHL	Dictionary of Paul and His Letters , ed. G. F. Hawthorne and R. P. Martin

Abbreviations

JAOS	Journal of the American Oriental Society	PBA	Proceedings of the British Academy
JASA	Journal of the American Scientific Affiliation	PC	Presbyterian Communiqué
JBL	Journal of Biblical Literature	PEQ	Palestine Exploration Quarterly
JCR	Journal of Christian Reconstruction	PG	Patrologia graeca , ed. J. P. Migne
Jeev	Jeevadhara	PP	Pastoral Psychology
JEH	Journal of Ecclesiastical History	Presb	Presbyterion
JETS	Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society	PRR	Presbyterian and Reformed Review
JHI	Journal of the History of Ideas	Pru	Prudentia
JJS	Journal of Jewish Studies	PTR	Princeton Theological Review
JNES	Journal of Near Eastern Studies	RB	Revue biblique
JPH	Journal of Presbyterian History	RE	Review and Expositor
JPT	Journal of Psychology and Theology	RelEd	Religious Education
JQR	Jewish Quarterly Review	RelS	Religious Studies
JR	Journal of Religion	RQum	Revue de Qumran
JSS	Journal of Semitic Studies	RR	Reformed Review
JTS	Journal of Theological Studies	RSCHS	Record of Scottish Church History Society
KJV	King James Version	RSV	Revised Standard Version
LCC	Library of Christian Classics	RTR	Reformed Theological Review
LXX	Septuagint	RTWB	Theological Word Book of the Bible , ed. A. Richardson
MarS	Marian Studies	RUS	Rice University Studies
McCQ	McCormick Quarterly	RV	Revised Version
MP	Modern Philology	SB	Kommentar zum Neuen Testament aus Talmud und Midrasch , ed. H. Strack and P. Billerbeck
MQR	Menmonite Quarterly Review	SCJ	Sixteenth Century Journal
NASB	New American Standard Bible	SHERK	New Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge , ed. S. M. Jackson
NBC	New Bible Commentary , ed. F. Davidson (1st edition); ed. D. Guthrie and J. A. Motyer (3d edition)	SJT	Scottish Journal of Theology
NBD	New Bible Dictionary , ed. J. D. Douglas	SwJT	Southwestern Journal of Theology
NCE	New Catholic Encyclopaedia	TB	Tyndale Bulletin
NDT	New Dictionary of Theology , ed. S. B. Ferguson, D. F. Wright, and J. I. Packer	TDNT	Theological Dictionary of the New Testament , ed. G. Kittel and G. Friedrich
NEB	New English Bible	TDOT	Theological Dictionary of the Old Testament , ed. G. J. Botterweck and H. Ringgren
NEQ	New England Quarterly	TEV	Today's English Version
NICNT	New International Commentary on the New Testament	Them	Themelios
NIDCC	New International Dictionary of the Christian Church , ed. J. D. Douglas	Theol	Theology
NIDNTT	New International Dictionary of New Testament Theology , ed. C. Brown	TJ	Trinity Journal
NIV	New International Version	TS	Theological Studies
NJB	New Jerusalem Bible	TWOT	Theological Wordbook of the Old Testament , ed. R. L. Harris, G. L. Archer Jr., and B. K. Waltke
NovT	Novum Testamentum	TZ	Theologische Zeitschrift
NPNF	Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers, ed. P. Schaff and H. Wace	VC	Vigiliae Christianae
NRSV	New Revised Standard Version	VoxT	Vox Theologica
NT	New Testament	VT	Vetus Testamentum
NTPIV	New Testament and Psalms: Inclusive Language Version	WBE	Wycliffe Bible Encyclopedia , ed. C. F. Pfeiffer, H. F. Vos, and J. Rea
NTS	New Testament Studies	WTJ	Wesleyan Theological Journal
NZSTR	Neue Zeitschrift für systematische Theologie und Religionsphilosophie	WmTJ	Westminster Theological Journal
ODCC	Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church , ed. F. L. Cross	ZAW	Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft
OT	Old Testament	ZNW	Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft
PAPS	Proceedings of the American Philosophical Society	ZPEB	Zondervan Pictorial Encyclopedia of the Bible , ed. M. C. Tenney

Contributors

- Eric Adams (Ph.D. candidate, Cambridge University)
Douglas K. Adie (Ph.D., University of Chicago)
John N. Akers (Ph.D., University of Edinburgh)
Oswald T. Allis (Ph.D., University of Berlin)
C. FitzSimons Allison (D.Phil., Oxford University)
Marvin W. Anderson (Ph.D., University of Aberdeen)
Gleason Leonard Archer Jr. †
David J. Atkinson (Ph.D., University of London)
Stuart Barton Babbage †
John S. Baird (S.T.D., Temple University)
William H. Baker (Th.D., Dallas Theological Seminary)
Steven Barabas †
Hans F. Bayer (Ph.D., University of Aberdeen)
Dewey M. Beegle (Ph.D., Johns Hopkins University)
David G. Benner (Ph.D., York University)
Bruce Ellis Benson (Ph.D., Katholieke Universiteit Leuven)
W. Wilson Benton (Ph.D., University of Edinburgh)
Timothy K. Bougher (Ph.D., Trinity Evangelical Divinity School)
Russell K. Bishop (Ph.D., McGill University)
Craig A. Blaising (Th.D., Dallas Theological Seminary; Ph.D., University of Aberdeen)
Donald G. Bloesch (Ph.D., University of Chicago)
Lorraine Boettner †
Gerald L. Borchert (Ph.D., Princeton Theological Seminary)
W. Paul Bowers (Ph.D., University of Cambridge)
Owen Rupert Brandon (M.Litt., University of Durham)
Geoffrey W. Bromiley (D. Litt., University of Edinburgh)
Wick Broomall †
Colin Brown (Ph.D., D.D., University of Nottingham)
Frederick Fyvie Bruce †
C. Hassell Bullock (Ph.D., Hebrew Union College)
Maxie Burch (Ph.D., Baylor University)
Gary M. Burge (Ph.D., University of Aberdeen)
Gary T. Burke (Ph.D., University of Iowa)
Richard Eugene Butman (Ph.D., Fuller Theological Seminary)
James P. Callahan (Ph.D., Marquette University)
William John Cameron †
D. A. Carson (Ph.D., Cambridge University)
John D. Castelein (Ph.D., University of Chicago)
Thomas Scott Caulley (D.Th., University of Tübingen)
Paul G. Chappell (Ph.D., Drew University)
David K. Clark (Ph.D., Northwestern University)
Howard Z. Cleveland †
Robert G. Clouse (Ph.D., University of Iowa)
Richard John Coates †
George Norman MacLeod Collins †
Frank Colquhoun †
Philip Wesley Comfort (D.Litt., D.Phil., University of South Africa)
Winfried Corduan (Ph.D., Rice University)
Peter C. Craigie †
Richard Colin Craston (B.D., University of London)
Terrelle B. Crum †
Virgil Cruz (Ph.D., Free University)
Robert G. Culbertson (Ph.D., University of Cincinnati)
David Currie †
Frederick W. Danker (Ph.D., University of Manchester)
Peter H. Davids (Ph.D., Victoria University of Manchester)
Ronald E. Davies (Ph.D., Fuller Theological Seminary)
Creath Davis †
Donald Gordon Davis (Ph.D., University of Edinburgh)
Paul de Vries (Ph.D., University of Virginia)
Lester R. DeKoster (Ph.D., University of Michigan)
Bruce A. Demarest (Ph.D., Manchester University)
David W. Diehl (Ph.D., Hartford Seminary Foundation)
Melvin E. Dieter (Ph.D., Temple University)
John Patrick Donnelly †
J. D. Douglas (Ph.D., Hartford Seminary Foundation)
John M. Drickamer (Th.D., Concordia Seminary)
David G. Dunbar (Ph.D., Drew University)

Contributors

- William A. Dyrness (D.Th., University of Strasbourg)
Ralph Earle (Th.D., Gordon Divinity School)
V. Raymond Edman †
David B. Eller (Ph.D., Miami University)
Walter A. Elwell (Ph.D., University of Edinburgh)
Ronald Enroth (Ph.D., University of Kentucky)
Paul A. Ericksen (M.A., Wheaton College)
Millard J. Erickson (Ph.D., Northwestern University)
William R. Estep Jr. (Th.D., Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary)
Charles L. Feinberg (Th.D., Dallas Theological Seminary)
John S. Feinberg (Ph.D., University of Chicago)
Paul D. Feinberg (Th.D., Dallas Theological Seminary)
Duncan S. Ferguson (Ph.D., University of Edinburgh)
Everett Ferguson (Ph.D., Harvard University)
David H. Field (B.A., Cambridge University)
Thomas N. Finger (Ph.D., Claremont School of Theology)
Fred Lewis Fisher (Th.D., Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary)
David B. Fletcher (Ph.D., University of Illinois)
John M. Frame (M. Phil., Yale University)
Stephen T. Franklin (Ph.D., University of Chicago)
Albert H. Freundt Jr. (D.Min., McCormick Theological Seminary)
C. George Fry (Ph.D., Ohio State University; D.Min., United Theological Seminary)
Harlie Kay Gallatin (Ph.D., University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign)
W. Ward Gasque (Ph.D., University of Manchester)
George Arthur Gay (Ph.D., University of Manchester)
Norman L. Geisler (Ph.D., Loyola University)
R. Douglas Geivett (Ph.D., University of Southern California)
Terence J. German (Ph.D., Oxford University)
John H. Gerstner (Ph.D., Harvard University)
David W. Gill (Ph.D., University of Southern California)
Louis Goldberg (Th.D., Grace Theological Seminary)
Fernando Q. Gouvea (M. A., University of São Paulo)
Lars I. Granberg (Ph.D., University of Chicago)
Gene L. Green (Ph.D., University of Aberdeen)
J. Kenneth Grider (Ph.D., Glasgow University)
Howard Griffith (M.Div., Gordon-Conwell Theological Seminary)
Wayne Grudem (Ph.D., University of Cambridge)
Royce Gordon Gruenler (Ph.D., University of Aberdeen)
Bradley J. Gundlach (Ph.D., University of Rochester)
Stanley N. Gundry (S.T.D., Lutheran School of Theology at Chicago)
Donald Guthrie (Ph.D., University of London)
Gary R. Habermas (Ph.D., Michigan State University)
Joseph H. Hall (Th.D., Concordia Seminary)
Frederick R. Harm (Th.D., American Divinity School)
R. Laird Harris (Ph.D., Dropsie College of Hebrew Learning)
Everett F. Harrison †
R. K. Harrison †
Peter W. Hasbrouck (M.A., Wheaton College)
Gerhard F. Hasel †
Gerald F. Hawthorne (Ph.D., University of Chicago)
Robert M. Healey (Ph.D., Yale University)
Rolland N. Hein (Ph.D., Purdue University)
Rudolph W. Heinze (Ph.D., University of Iowa)
Carl F. H. Henry (Ph.D., Boston University)
Ron Henzel (B.A., Trinity International University)
David J. Hesselgrave (Ph.D., University of Minnesota)
Irving Hexham (Ph.D., University of Bristol)
Richard Edwin Higginson †
Andrew E. Hill (Ph.D., University of Michigan)
Harold W. Hoehner (Ph.D., Cambridge University)
W. Andrew Hoffercker (Ph.D., Brown University)
Nicola Hoggard-Creegan (Ph.D., Drew University)
Arlie J. Hoover (Ph.D., University of Texas, Austin)
Norman Victor Hope †
Carl Horn III (J. D., University of South Carolina)
James M. Houston (D.Phil., Oxford University)
Daniel Howard-Snyder (Ph.D., Syracuse University)
David A. Hubbard (Ph.D., St. Andrews University)
Philip Edgcumbe Hughes †
Horace D. Hummel (Ph.D., Johns Hopkins University)
Morris A. Inch (Ph.D., Boston University)
Henry Ippel (Ph.D., University of Michigan)
Paul K. Jewett †
Alan F. Johnson (Th.D., Dallas Theological Seminary)
James E. Johnson (Ph.D., Syracuse University)
John F. Johnson (Th.D., Concordia Seminary)
S. Lewis Johnson Jr. (Th.D., Dallas Theological Seminary)
O. Raymond Johnston (M.A., Oxford University)
Robert K. Johnston (Ph.D., Duke University)
David Clyde Jones (Th.D., Concordia Seminary)
James C. Juhnke (Ph.D., Indiana University)
William G. Justice Jr. (D.Min., Luther Rice Seminary)
Kenneth S. Kantzer (Ph.D., Harvard University)
Douglas F. Kelly (Ph.D., University of Edinburgh)

- Homer A. Kent Jr. (Th.D., Grace Theological Seminary)
- David W. Kerr (Th.D., Harvard University)
- William Nigel Kerr (Th.D., Northern Baptist Theological Seminary)
- Ernest F. Kevan †
- Fred H. Klooster (Ph.D., Free University of Amsterdam)
- Patric J. Knaak (Ph.D. candidate, University of Edinburgh)
- George W. Knight III (Th.D., Free University)
- O. Karl Krienke, Jr. (Ph.D., University of Washington)
- Catherine Clark Kroeger (M.A., University of Minnesota)
- Richard C. Kroeger (D.Min., Gordon-Conwell Theological Seminary)
- Carl G. Kromminga (Th.D., Free University of Amsterdam)
- A. Paul Kubricht (Ph.D., Ohio State University)
- Paul Kubricht (Ph.D., Ohio State University)
- Harold B. Kuhn (Ph.D., Harvard University)
- Richard Kyle (Ph.D., University of New Mexico)
- Martin La Bar (Ph.D., University of Wisconsin, Madison)
- George Eldon Ladd †
- André Lamorte (Th.D., Montpellier University)
- William Sanford LaSor †
- Robert B. Laurin †
- Gordon R. Lewis (Ph.D., Syracuse University)
- James F. Lewis (Ph.D., University of Iowa)
- Walter L. Liefeld (Ph.D., Columbia University)
- Robert P. Lightner (Th.D., Dallas Theological Seminary)
- James R. Lincoln (M.Div., Trinity Evangelical Divinity School)
- Robert D. Linder (Ph.D., University of Iowa)
- Harold Lindsell (Ph.D., New York University)
- David K. Lowery (Ph.D., University of Aberdeen)
- Roger Lundin (Ph.D., University of Connecticut)
- Robert W. Lyon (Ph.D., St. Andrews University)
- Michael H. Macdonald (Ph.D., University of Washington)
- Neal E. Magee (M.Div., Princeton Theological Seminary; M.Ph. Syracuse University)
- Norris A. Magnuson (Ph.D., University of Minnesota)
- George John Charles Marchant †
- W. Harold Mare (Ph.D., University Of Pennsylvania)
- Caroline T. Marshall (Ph.D., University of Virginia)
- Dennis D. Martin (Ph.D., University of Waterloo)
- C. V. Mathew (Th.M., Serampore University)
- Scott E. McClelland (Ph.D., University of Edinburgh)
- Thomas Edward McComiskey †
- C. Douglas McConnell (Ph.D., Fuller Theological Seminary)
- Hugh Dermot McDonald (D.D., University of London)
- C. T. McIntire (Ph.D., University of Pennsylvania)
- Donald K. McKim (Ph.D., University of Pittsburgh)
- John R. McRay (Ph.D., University of Chicago)
- James E. Mennell (Ph.D., University of Iowa)
- Paul A. Mickey (Ph.D., Princeton Theological Seminary)
- Douglas J. Miller (Ph.D., Claremont School of Theology)
- Christopher W. Mitchell (Ph.D., University of St. Andrews)
- Jack Mitchell Jr. (M.A., Wheaton College)
- David O. Moberg (Ph.D., University of Minnesota)
- John M. Monson (Ph.D., Harvard University)
- A. Scott Moreau (D.Miss., Trinity Evangelical Divinity School)
- J. P. Moreland (Ph.D., University of Southern California)
- Leon L. Morris (Ph.D., University of Cambridge)
- J. A. Motyer (B.D., Trinity College, Dublin)
- Steve Motyer (Ph.D., University of London)
- Robert H. Mounce (Ph.D., University of Aberdeen)
- William D. Mounce (Ph.D., University of Aberdeen)
- James C. Moyer (Ph.D., Brandeis University)
- J. Theodore Mueller †
- Roger Nicole (Ph.D., Harvard University)
- Mark A. Noll (Ph.D., Vanderbilt University)
- Stephen F. Noll (Ph.D., University of Manchester)
- Stanley R. Obitts (Ph.D., University of Edinburgh)
- Dennis L. Okholm (Ph.D., Princeton Theological Seminary)
- O. Guy Oliver Jr. (B.D., Louisville Presbyterian Theological Seminary)
- Grant R. Osborne (Ph.D., University of Aberdeen)
- M. Eugene Osterhaven (Th.D., Princeton Theological Seminary)
- James I. Packer (D. Phil., University of Oxford)
- Thomas Henry Louis Parker †
- James A. Patterson (Ph.D., Princeton Theological Seminary)
- J. Barton Payne (Ph.D., Princeton Theological Seminary)
- Tony Payne (D.M.A., Northwestern University)
- Hazel W. Perkin (M. A., McGill University)
- Robert A. Peterson (Ph.D., Drew University)
- Timothy R. Phillips †
- W. Gary Phillips (Th.D., Grace Theological Seminary)
- Richard V. Pierard (Ph.D., University of Iowa)
- F. Stuart Piggin (Ph.D., University of London)
- Robert D. Preus †
- William Cecil Gibbon Proctor †
- Pattle Pun (Ph.D., State University of New York at Buffalo)
- David A. Rausch (Ph.D., Kent State University)

Contributors

- Robert G. Rayburn †
Robert S. Rayburn †
Sebastian Rehnman (Ph.D. candidate, Oxford University)
William Stanford Reid (Ph.D., University of Pennsylvania)
Ian S. Rennie (Ph.D., University of Toronto)
Alexander MacDonald Renwick †
Robert L. Reymond (Ph.D., Bob Jones University)
Kenneth Warren Rick (M.A., Wheaton College)
William C. Ringenberg (Ph.D., Michigan State University)
Bong Rin Ro (Th.D., Concordia Seminary)
Arthur O. Roberts (Ph.D., Boston University)
Robert C. Roberts (Ph.D., Yale University)
William Childs Robinson †
Jerry Root (Ph.D. candidate, British Open University)
Alexander Ross †
Andrew Kerr Rule †
Charles Caldwell Ryrie (Ph.D., University of Edinburgh)
Robert L. Saucy (Th.D., Dallas Theological Seminary)
Robert V. Schnucker (Ph.D., University of Iowa)
David M. Scholer (Th.D., Harvard Divinity School)
Richard L. Schultz (Ph.D., Yale University)
J. Julius Scott Jr. (Ph.D., University of Manchester)
Calvin G. Seerveld (Ph.D., Free University of Amsterdam)
Bruce L. Shelley (Ph.D., University of Iowa)
R. Larry Shelton (Th.D., Fuller Theological Seminary)
Dale Simpson (Ph.D., Georgia State University)
Charles Gregg Singer †
James W. Skillen (Ph.D., Duke University)
Elizabeth R. Skoglund (M. A., Pasadena College)
Stephen M. Smith (Ph.D., Claremont Graduate University)
Wilbur M. Smith (D.D., Dallas Theological Seminary)
Stephen R. Spencer (Ph.D., Michigan State University)
James D. Spiceland (Ph.D., Oxford University)
Keith L. Sprunger (Ph.D., University of Illinois)
James J. Stamoelis (Th.D., University of Stellenbosch)
Paul D. Steeves (Ph.D., University of Kansas)
Robert H. Stein (Ph.D., Princeton Theological Seminary)
Vinson Synan (Ph.D., University of Georgia)
Betty J. Talbert-Wettler (M.A., Talbot School of Theology; Simon Greenleaf University)
Stephen Taylor (M.A., Wheaton College)
Merrill C. Tenney †
Robert L. Thomas (Th.D., Dallas Theological Seminary)
J. G. S. Thomson (Ph.D., University of Edinburgh)
Donald G. Tinder (Ph.D., Yale University)
Denis Harold Tongue (M.A., Cambridge University)
Peter Toon (D.Phil., Oxford University)
Richard L. Troutman (Ph.D., University of Kentucky)
Robert G. Tuttle Jr. (Ph.D., University of Bristol)
Merrill F. Unger †
John Van Engen (Ph.D., University of California, Los Angeles)
Willem A. Van Gemenen (Ph.D., University of Wisconsin, Madison)
Ronald J. VanderMolen (Ph.D., Michigan State University)
Howard F. Vos (Th.D., Dallas Theological Seminary)
David H. Wallace (Ph.D., University of Edinburgh)
Ronald Stewart Wallace (Ph.D., University of Edinburgh)
Andrew Finlay Walls (B.Litt., Cambridge University)
Victor L. Walter (Th.M., Princeton Theological Seminary)
John F. Walvoord (Th.D., Dallas Theological Seminary; D.D., Wheaton College; Litt.D., Liberty Seminary)
Wayne E. Ward †
J. Denny Weaver (Ph.D., Duke University)
Timothy P. Weber (Ph.D., University of Chicago)
Douglas D. Webster (Ph.D., University of Toronto)
William C. Weinrich (D.Th., University of Basel)
J. C. Wenger (Th.D., University of Zurich)
David H. Wheaton (M.A., Oxford University)
Reginald E. O. White (B.D., University of London)
Luder G. Whitlock Jr. (D.Min., Vanderbilt University)
J. Rodman Williams (Ph.D., Columbia University)
Michael D. Williams (Ph.D., University of Toronto)
Marvin R. Wilson (Ph.D., Brandeis University)
Herbert M. Wolf (Ph.D., Brandeis University)
James E. Wood Jr. (Ph.D., Southern Baptist Theological Seminary)
Paul Woolley †
Marten H. Woudstra (Th.D., Westminster Theological Seminary)
David F. Wright (D.D., University of Edinburgh)
Martin J. Wyngaarden †
Robert W. Yarbrough (Ph.D., University of Aberdeen)
Ronald Youngblood (Ph.D., Dropsie College for Hebrew Learning)
Ruth Zerner (Ph.D., University of California)

Aa

Abaddon. The name given to a satanic angel in Revelation 9:11, who appears as king of a horde of hellish locust-monsters sent to plague rebellious humankind. The Greek translation of the name is ho Apollyōn (the Destroying One). In the OT 'ābaddōn occurs several times as an epithet of Sheol or Hades and literally signifies “destruction” (the verb 'ābad means “to become lost, be destroyed”). It occurs, for example, in Psalm 88:11: “Is your love declared in the grave, your faithfulness in [the place of] Destruction ('ābaddōn)?” (similarly Prov. 15:11; 27:20; Job 26:6; 28:22; 31:12).

G. L. ARCHER JR.

See also BAAL-ZEBUB; SATAN.

Abba. Occurs three times in the NT: Mark uses it in Jesus' Gethsemane prayer (14:36), and Paul employs it twice for the cry of the Spirit in the heart of a Christian (Rom. 8:15; Gal. 4:6). In each case it is accompanied by the Greek equivalent, ho patēr (father). Abba is from the Aramaic abba. Dalman (Words of Jesus, 192) thinks it signifies “my father.” It is not in the LXX. Perhaps Jesus said only “Abba” (HDCG 1:2), but Sanday and Headlam think that both the Aramaic and Greek terms were used (Romans [ICC], 203). Paul's usage suggests that it may have become a quasi-liturgical formula.

R. EARLE

See also FATHER, GOD AS; GOD, NAMES OF.

Bibliography. O. Hofius, NIDNTT 1:614–21; J. Jeremias, Central Message of the New Testament; New Testament Theology; Prayers of Jesus; G. Kittel, TDNT 1:5–6; HDCG 1:1–3; A. J. MacLean, HDCG 1:1–3; T. M. Taylor, “‘Abba Father’ and Baptism,” SJT 2:62–71.

Abelard, Peter (1079–1142). Philosopher, theologian, and teacher, Peter Abelard lived in constant turmoil and confrontation with authority. Born in Brittany, he studied with some of the most respected theologians of his day and eventually became the brightest intellectual star of the Cathedral School of Paris. But for his tragic love affair and marriage with the beautiful and talented Héloïse, he undoubtedly would have been the dominant thinker of the century.

Philosophy. During Abelard's time, the ruling doctrine of universals was that of Boethius (d.

ca. 524), who considered them to be realities. This traditional realism was then under attack by nominalists, who looked upon universals simply as words. Abelard worked out a moderate realism that avoided the dangers and salvaged the strong points of both nominalism and extreme realism. He accomplished this by demonstrating the logical consequences of some important distinctions, such as that between the word that stands for the thing, the thing itself, and the concept of the thing in the mind. Thus, universals are not mere sounds or words, as the nominalists held, nor are they things-in-themselves, as extreme realists thought. Rather, they are concepts in the mind that have an objective reality derived from a process of mental abstraction. Abelard's philosophy placed universals in a distinct category of reality, so that God was not a universal nor were particulars the only reality.

Theology. Abelard's view of the atonement is usually called the moral influence theory. He rejected the position set forth by Anselm in the previous generation that the satisfaction made by Jesus was necessary for the forgiveness of sins, arguing instead that God had forgiven sins as an unqualified act of grace before Christ came. In contrast to Anselm, Abelard declared that God is love and had voluntarily assumed the burden of suffering brought on by human sin. This act of God's grace—taken freely and without any demand for compensation for sin—awakens in people gratitude and love for God. In Jesus Christ, the God-man, individuals see what they should be, by contrast are brought to a realization of their sin, and by God's love as seen in Jesus are won to a response that releases new springs of love, resulting in right conduct. In this fashion, the forgiven sinner becomes a truly new creation.

Abelard's important Sic et Non (Yes and No), written around 1120, in which he participated in the main philosophical dispute of the time over the role of faith and reason in theology, suggested several seminal methodological innovations and demonstrated the inadequacy of extracts from the church fathers then used for significant theological work. In Sic et Non he listed 158 theological propositions and cited the authorities affirming and denying each one, thus emphasizing that merely quoting authorities was methodologically insufficient. Instead, students had to apply their own intellectual skills to the question and to the opinions about it. In short, Sic et Non suggested that reason must play as large a role as revelation and tradition in determining truth. This method made Abelard the main representative of a new school of speculative theologians and prepared the way for the work of Thomas Aquinas in the thirteenth century. Thus Abelard was one of the pioneers of medieval scholasticism.

During the latter part of Abelard's life, Bernard of Clairvaux accused him of misleading students and employing unorthodox theological methods. In 1141 several of Abelard's teachings were condemned by the Council of Sens. He appealed to the pope, but died in 1142 near Cluny on his way to Rome.

R. D. LINDER

See also ATONEMENT, THEORIES OF; NOMINALISM; REALISM; SCHOLASTICISM.

Bibliography. P. Abelard, Historia Calamitatum (Story of My Misfortunes), J. T. Muckle, trans.; E. Buytaert, ed., Peter Abelard; E. Gilson, Héloise and Abelard; L. Grane, Peter Abelard; R. Lewis et al., Pierre Abelard; D. E. Luscombe, School of Peter Abelard; J. R. McCullum, Abelard's Christian Theology; A. V. Murray, Abelard and St. Bernard; R. Pernoud, Héloise and Abelard; B. Radice, ed., Letters of Abelard and Héloise; K. M. Starnes, Peter Abelard: His Place in History; H. Waddell, Peter Abelard.

Abolitionism. Movement in America and Western Europe to abolish the slave trade and slavery. The term was often applied to those urging immediate (instead of gradual) emancipation of slaves.

By the end of the seventeenth century slavery was legally recognized in Britain's American colonies. Throughout the eighteenth century, however, there were increasing questions about its morality, coming from both religious leaders and secular thinkers influenced by the Enlightenment's emphasis on personal liberty. Some of the strongest opposition came from Quakers, who by the late eighteenth century had banned slaveholding by members. In Great Britain, William Wilberforce, who was deeply influenced by evangelical Christianity, vigorously led the successful fight in Parliament to abolish the slave trade (1807). In 1808 the importation of slaves became illegal in the United States, and many hoped slavery would eventually die out. Such hopes were doomed, however, by the invention of the power loom and the cotton gin, which enormously increased the demand for slave-cultivated cotton.

As slavery became more firmly entrenched in the American South, its opponents sought a practical way to eliminate it. One proposal was to send freed slaves back to Africa, a scheme that led to the formation of the American Colonization Society (1817) and established the colony of Liberia on the west African coast for freed slaves, but was unable to gather widespread support. The implicit racism of colonization also offended some slavery opponents.

More significant was the emergence of groups favoring immediate abolition. Best known was the American Anti-Slavery Society, formed in Philadelphia (1833) primarily through the efforts of William Lloyd Garrison, fiery editor of the Liberator, and Lewis and Arthur Tappan, two wealthy brothers involved in many evangelical causes. At its height the society had 150,000 members. Many of its leaders had been influenced by the revivals of Charles Finney and saw their antislavery convictions as a logical outcome of their evangelical faith.

Militant abolitionism had a galvanizing effect on the South, which became increasingly withdrawn and intolerant of dissent. The strident tone of some abolitionists also offended many Northerners who favored gradual emancipation. Nevertheless, the lectures and writings of such abolitionists as Harriet Beecher Stowe (Uncle Tom's Cabin), Theodore Weld, and James Birney had enormous influence. Although many Northerners did not identify with the abolitionists, their efforts gradually persuaded many that slavery was an evil that only radical measures could eliminate. Abolitionist goals were finally achieved through the Civil War and the Thirteenth Amendment to the Constitution (1865). Abolitionism was the most important reform movement in the nineteenth century.

J. N. AKERS

Bibliography. J. R. McKivigan, War against Proslavery Religion: Abolitionism and the Northern Churches; J. M. McPherson, Struggle for Equality; L. Ruchames, ed., Abolitionists; G. Sorin, Abolitionism: A New Perspective; D. M. Strong, Organized Liberty: Evangelical Perfectionism, Political Abolitionism and Ecclesiastical Reform in the Burned-Over District; J. L. Thomas, ed., Slavery Attacked; R. G. Walters, American Reformers, 1815-1860.

Abomination of Desolation. In this precise form these words are found in the KJV in Matthew 24:15 and Mark 13:14, but there is an interpretative expression in Luke 21:20. The phrase is undoubtedly taken from Daniel 11:31 and 12:11, where the KJV reads "the abomination that maketh desolate"; it is possible also that Daniel 8:13 and 9:27 contribute to the conception. Most expositors have been of the opinion that the passages in Daniel allude to the idolatrous desecration of the Jerusalem temple by Antiochus Epiphanes. On December 15, 168 B.C., a pagan altar was built on the site of the great altar of burnt sacrifices, and ten days later heathen sacrifice was offered on it. The Alexandrian Jews interpreted Daniel's prophecy in this way (1 Macc. 1:54).

The altar was erected to Zeus Olympios, the Hebrew rendering of which name was ba'al šā-mayim. S. R. Driver points out that this title is often found in Phoenician and Aramaic inscriptions. By a change of the first word and a pun on the second this Aramaic title for "Lord of Heaven" was contemptuously reduced to šiqqūs šômēm (abomination of horror or desecration). Moffatt renders it "appalling horror," but this seems to represent only one side of its significance. The term šiqqūs stands for something that is foul, disgusting, and hateful; šômēm for something that desecrates or destroys what is good. As a whole, the phrase therefore stands for something that utterly desecrates a holy thing or place. It can thus refer to the idolatrous image set up by Antiochus Epiphanes or to any other abhorrent object, person, or event that defiles something holy.

The NT passages are, of course, not exhausted by the historical fulfillment of the intertestamental period, and they must be studied in their own right. The Greek phrase bdelygma tēs erēmōseōs may be rendered "a detestable thing that brings desolation." The emphasis appears to be more on the first word than on the last and draws attention to the objectionableness of the thing denoted. The word bdelygma refers to something that causes nausea and abhorrence (see Luke 16:15 and Rev. 17:4), and in the LXX frequently renders šiqqūs in the sense of an idol or false god, but was not limited to that. Anything that outraged the religious feelings of the Jewish people might be so described.

The attempt to understand our Lord's allusion in the use of this expression seems partly involved in the view taken about the apocalyptic nature of the passage. If it is merely predictive and apocalyptic, then some idolatrous image may possibly be intended; but if our Lord's words are to be construed as prophetic in style, displaying that spiritual insight that belongs to true prophecy, then it may not be necessary to look for such an image but rather for something having a vital bearing on the behavior of the Jewish nation. Interpretative guidance is given in the record preserved by Luke: "When you see Jerusalem being surrounded by armies, you will know that its desolation is near" (21:20). Writing for Gentiles, it would seem that Luke has replaced the obscure and mysterious word bdelygma by a term more intelligible to his readers. This is not, as some have said, to alter the Lord's meaning, but to explain it. On the principle of interpreting Scripture by Scripture, therefore, the "abomination of desolation" must mean the Roman troops. Matthew's reference to the abomination standing "in the holy place" does not require to be understood of the temple, but may equally indicate the holy land. The historical fulfillment of the prophecy occurred first under Cestius (Gallus) in A.D. 66, then under Vespasian (68) and Titus (70). It is possibly a superficial mistake to associate the abomination with the eagles of the Roman standards, for these had already been in the land long enough. It was the encirclement (kykloumenēn) of Jerusalem by besieging forces of the Roman army that constituted the sign. The participle is in the present tense and shows that the Christians were to flee when they saw the city "being compassed" with armies. The presence of the Roman army was thus a bdelygma of the worst kind and one that presaged coming ruin. The word bdelygma was not too strong to describe this invasion, for it was detestable indeed that heathen feet should defile the holy land and that the ungodly should come into the heritage of the Lord. (The masculine participle standing possibly points away from the thought of an altar or image and might suggest "the abominable one.")

Alford rejects the view that the encirclement of Jerusalem with armies is identical with the bdelygma and argues that Matthew and Mark, writing for Jews, give the inner or domestic sign of the coming desolation, this being some desecration of the holy place by factious Jewish parties, and that Luke gives the outward state of things corresponding to this sign. Conceiving of the "abomination of desolation" as one thing and the encircling Roman armies as another, he nevertheless unites them in the event that occurred at the historical moment of which the Lord speaks. The question is an open one, of course, and Alford's view has much to commend it; but it seems preferable to take the simpler view, which explains the abomination in terms of the Roman army. It would appear that Jesus intends to foretell a desecration of the temple and city in a manner not unlike that brought about by Antiochus Epiphanes. The words of Daniel seemed to find a second fulfillment, and Rome has taken the place of Syria.

E. F. KEVAN

See also ANTICHRIST.

Bibliography. G. R. Beasley-Murray, Jesus and the Future, NIDNTT 1:74–75; D. Daube, New Testament and Rabbinic Judaism; C. H. Dodd, More New Testament Studies; S. R. Driver, HDB 1:12–13; W. Foerster, TDNT 1:598–600; D. Ford, Abomination of Desolation in Biblical Eschatology; H. W. Fulford, HDCG 1:6–7; F. E. Hirsch, ISBE 1:16–17; A. T. Robertson, Word Pictures in the New Testament; H. B. Swete, St. Mark.

Abortion

Abortion. An abortion is a chemically induced or surgically achieved premature termination of pregnancy in a manner designed to kill the embryo or fetus. Sometimes miscarriage is referred to as “involuntary” or “spontaneous” abortion. Since abortion is directly related to issues of life and death, numerous resources extend the scope of the ethical discussion of abortion to include topics like capital punishment and euthanasia. This article treats only “voluntary abortion.”

Abortion in the Biblical World. Abortion was one form of infanticide practiced in the biblical world (along with ritual sacrifice and exposure). Abortifacient potions or suppositories formulated from herbal recipes capable of inducing an abortion or expelling the afterbirth were known to Mesopotamia and Egypt as early as the second millennium B.C. While not denying the possibility of various “surgical” techniques employed by the ancients for the destruction of the human fetus, the ingestion or application of these abortifacient concoctions was the most common way to procure an abortion in the ancient world. Abortion-inducing drugs continued to be a part of medical lore of the ancient Near East well into the Persian and Greek periods. The question remains as to what extent these abortifacient drugs were prescribed by ancient medical practitioners and utilized by the public at large. At the present time, extant documentation would suggest that drug-induced abortion in Egypt and Mesopotamia was the exceptional rather than the routine experience in the ancient Near East.

The comparative rarity of voluntary abortion in the ancient Near East may be explained in part by the social and economic value given to children in ancient Mediterranean culture. A digest of ancient Near Eastern legal philosophy addressing miscarriage induced by the trauma of an assault and voluntary abortion also illuminates ancient cultural practices and informs the biblical teaching on the topics. The ancient Near Eastern legal codices that predate 1400 B.C. do not specifically address the topic of abortion (namely the Sumerian Laws, Codex Hammurapi, and the Hittite Laws). Laws within these corpora treating assault leading to miscarriage in a pregnant woman do indicate that the human fetus was not granted the legal status of “person” or “human being” in regard to lex talionis or talion law. In every case, loss of the human fetus due to the trauma of assault was compensated by imposing a fine on the perpetrator of the crime. The predetermined monetary figure awarded the victim was usually prorated with respect to her social standing (and in some instances the gender of the fetus).

Legal philosophy in ancient Mesopotamia apparently underwent a shift in the assessment of the value placed upon the human fetus with the promulgation of the Middle Assyrian Laws (sometime between 1400 and 1200 B.C.). The application of the talion principle to the issues of miscarriage and abortion in these laws accorded the human fetus formal “person” or “human being” status. In addition, self-induced abortion was outlawed and was punishable as a capital offense. Later Persian law seems to affirm a similar legal philosophy, recognizing the human fetus as a person and considering voluntary abortion as willful murder (though apparently not a capital offense). The surprising dearth of material in the Bible treating the topic of abortion may be due in part to the prevailing legal climate of the ancient Near East at the time of the Hebrew conquest of Palestine. It seems probable that the Old Testament assumes the currency of the anti-abortion legal precedent of the period. The omission of abortion in the thorough censure of Canaanite religion and its attendant sexual perversions in the Pentateuch is also significant (cf. Lev. 18:1–4, 26–30; 20:1–24). It would have been very strange for God to have overlooked something like abortion if it had been a part of Syro-Palestinian culture. Given the premium God placed on moral issues that would directly affect the Israelite occupation of Canaan, all evidence points to infanticide by ritual child sacrifice—not abortion—as one of the Canaanite abominations prohibited by Mosaic law (cf. Lev. 20:1–5).

Abortion in the Bible. The laments of Job (3:10–11) and Jeremiah (20:17–18) suggest the practice of abortion was known to the Israelites. Although the practice of abortion was known to the peoples of Old and New Testament times, the Bible offers no direct prohibition of the practice. In fact, neither the Old nor the New Testament mentions abortion. Biblical silence on the issue, however, is not to be construed as consent for the practice. Numerous theological principles extracted from the Bible have been adduced as supporting evidence for the Bible’s indirect condemnation of abortion, including:

- the sovereignty of God and the recognition that issues of life and death are his domain (Job 12:10; 33:4; 34:14; Ps. 104:29; Acts 17:25)
- creation theology, affirming the dignity, the value, and the sanctity of human life created in God’s image (Gen. 1:26–27)
- the forthright biblical injunctions against other forms of infanticide practiced in the ancient world (e.g., Lev. 18:21; 20:2–5; Deut. 12:31)
- the personhood of the embryo or human fetus based upon Old Testament legal precedent (i.e., the principle of lex talionis; cf. Exod. 21:22–25. Note the divergences in the English renditions of the passage at two key points: the trauma of the assault resulting in premature birth [NIV] or “miscarriage" [NRSV]; and the application of talion law to the battered woman only [NJB] or to the battered woman and the prematurely born child(ren) [cf. U. Cassuto, Commentary on the Book of Exodus, 275–77]; for a detailed discussion of this crucial Old Testament text see H. W. House, "Miscarriage or Premature Birth: Additional Thoughts on Exodus 21:22–25," WmTJ 41:108–23.)

- the personhood of the embryo or human fetus based upon the continuity principle (i.e., one's humanness and personal identity begins at conception, Luke 1:41, 44; 2:12, 16 [where the same Greek word brēphos, "child," is used for both the fetus in the womb and a newborn infant]; cf. Ps. 139:11–16; Jer. 1:5; Isa. 49:1, 5; Gal. 1:15)
- the personhood of the embryo or human fetus on the basis of imputed sin as a result of the fall of humanity (cf. Pss. 51:5; 58:3; Rom. 5:12–14)
- the biblical limitations restricting the freedom of choice or the right of self-determination that a (Christian) woman has over her own body (cf. 1 Cor. 6:18–7:5)
- the biblical ethic of love for all and non-violence against all persons (including the human embryo or fetus since the Bible grants personhood to the unborn entity, cf. Lev. 19:18; Matt. 5:38–43; 22:34–40; Rom. 13:8–10; etc.)

The Theological Response to Abortion.

Among the Greeks, Plato and Aristotle approved of voluntary abortion. Hippocrates, however, condemned the practice and forbade it as a medical procedure. The early church opposed abortion and infanticide, both prevalent in Greco-Roman culture. The Didache (2.2; 5.2) and Epistle of Barnabas (19.5; 20.2) denounce the murder of a child by abortion (apparently understanding the human embryo/fetus as a "neighbor" sharing the same status as any other neighbor as defined by biblical teaching, cf. Luke 10:25–37). Later church fathers and Christian apologists voiced a similar moral abhorrence of voluntary abortion, decrying the practice as murder because "ensoulment" takes place at conception (cf. Athenagoras, Presbeia 35 [= PG 6:969]; Tertullian, De anima 27; Jerome, Epistula 22 ad Eustochium 13 [= CSEL 54:160]; Epistula 121 ad Algasiam 4 [= CSEL 56:16]; Ambrose, Exameron 5.18.58 [= CSEL 32:184–85]; Augustine, De nuptiis et concupiscentiis 1.17 [= CSEL 42.230]; and Chrysostom, Homilies in Romanos 24 [= PG 60:626–27]).

The general Christian view of abortion from the Reformation to the present is aptly summarized by H. O. J. Brown: "The overwhelming consensus of the spiritual leaders of Protestantism . . . is clearly anti-abortion. There is very little doubt among biblically oriented Protestants that abortion is an attack on the image of God in the developing child and is a great evil" (Human Life Review, Fall 1976, 131).

Karl Barth's view represents the normative position of Christian theology on the matter of abortion: "The unborn child is from the very first a child. It is still developing and has no independent life. But it is a man and not a thing, nor a mere part of the mother's body. . . . He who destroys germinating life kills a man. . . . The fact that a definite No must be the presupposition of all further discussion cannot be contested, least of all today" (Church Dogmatics, 3/4, 415–24). Other influential European theologians of this century have espoused similar views (e.g., E. Brunner, Divine Imperative, 367–71; D. Bonhoeffer, Ethics, 130–31 [who equated abortion with "murder"]; and H. Thielicke, Ethics of Sex, 227–28).

This is not to suggest that abortion is a moral issue for the Protestant church only. Rabbinic Judaism prohibits voluntary abortion, although the fetus is considered a person only after birth (the Mishnah also permits abortion in those cases that threaten the life of the mother, Oholot 7.6; cf. Niddah 3.5. Likewise, the Roman Catholic Church remains staunchly committed to an anti-abortion position (arguing that upon conception there is an intrauterine "life" and "person" at stake possessing full integrity and human rights). In fact, Roman Catholic theologians and an active laity within the Roman Catholic church continue to play a major role in the ongoing abortion debate (see e.g., J. T. Burtchaell, Rachel Weeping: The Case against Abortion; "Abortion I, II, III, IV," NCE 1:27–31).

Reasoned theological arguments grounded in sound biblical interpretation affirming the personhood of the unborn will remain important as a buttress to an eroding consensus against abortion in the Protestant church. Given the discounting of biblical authority as a result of the increasingly militant pluralism of contemporary (Western) society, evangelicals will need to engage society at large with the pro-life message of the Bible in the wider public forum of the abortion debate.

In the legal arena, this means countering the "freedom of choice" position (or the woman's right of self-determination in a pregnancy) of the pro-abortionist with an equally strident emphasis on the rights of the unborn child (also a person of value and integrity). If abortion remains a legally procurable medical service, then the evangelical voice must challenge the legal system as to the point in time during pregnancy when the right of self-determination for the unborn child matches that of the mother (since medical technology has made life outside the womb viable for an unborn child in the first trimester of development).

Abortion

The public discussion of morality escalates in our society as the paradigm shifts from a “values neutral” posture (the residue of the Enlightenment experiment) to one enforcing “diverse values” (the malignant offspring of cultural pluralism). Naturally the question today (especially in the aftermath of the Roe vs. Wade Supreme Court decision of 1973 legalizing abortion) is one of whose values will be imposed by legislation in a democratic and pluralistic society. Acute Christian thinkers must step forward and articulate the Judeo-Christian worldview at the “round table” of democratic pluralism (prayerfully trusting God’s spirit to illumine the darkened minds of the unregenerate to the truth of the Bible as it addresses issues of life—born, unborn, and reborn).

From a medical point of view, the rapid technological developments in neonatal care demand the reexamination of assumptions related to the beginning of human life, the nature of personhood, and the viability of that life outside the mother’s womb. Even further, those medical circumstances once understood to necessitate an abortion to preserve the health and life of the mother must be reevaluated in view of recent medical advances. Finally, questions of medical ethics must be pressed against an abortion industry intent on offering women little more than an after-the-fact contraceptive service.

Sociological arguments espoused by the pro-abortionist for the “compassionate termination” of the unborn child for reasons related to “quality of life” are specious. They reflect a view of the poor and disadvantaged rooted in provincial modernism and Western ethnocentrism. The Christian church must herald the Judeo-Christian principle of the “sanctity of human life” in bold opposition to abortion—“a powerful expression of the culture of death” according to Pope John Paul II (Crossing the Threshold of Hope, 208). Of equal importance to the evangelical, given the current sociological climate, is the issue of child abuse. The destruction of persons by abortion constitutes an extreme form of child abuse, behavior modern society otherwise finds offensive and intolerable.

The Socio-Political Response to Abortion. Regrettably, modernism (with its emphasis on individual rights and moral relativism) and post-modernism (with its emphasis on ideological tolerance and social diversity) have seriously undermined the traditional Christian anti-abortion stance. Today there is no one monolithic Christian position on abortion. These following observations are intended to outline an evangelical consensus.

First, C. J. H. Wright’s (Eye for an Eye, 187) listing of behavioral categories socially prohibited to ancient Israel proves helpful in establishing those cultural practices abhorrent to God. According to Wright, God censures and rejects the idolatrous, the perverted, that which is destructive of persons, and callousness to the poor. The Christian may rightfully reject abortion on the grounds of at least two of Wright’s four principles. Most obviously, abortion is destructive of persons (not only the life of the unborn child, but also to the psychological and even physical health of the mother at times—as evidenced by numerous studies of various postabortion syndromes among women opting for the procedure). Abortion also is idolatrous in that the practice it originates is profane self-interest. It may be possible to condemn abortion on those other grounds established by Wright as well. Abortion is a perverted behavior because it brutally interrupts a natural life cycle created and blessed by God. And in many cases, it seems the abortion industry clearly favors financially independent women—further encouraging callousness to the poor by placing a “price tag” on the life of the unborn.

Second, it is not enough for the Christian to be proactive on the abortion issue (whether in terms of social service or social action). It is imperative that the Christian display a consistent pro-life stance informed by a biblical definition of life on all public-policy issues (see R. J. Sider, Completely Pro-Life, 13). This Christian pro-life worldview must also be applied to economics and the plight of the poor, sexuality and the family, euthanasia, capital punishment, military doctrine and nuclear arms, social vices, environmental issues, etc. For Sider and others, all pro-life activity is situated in the biblical concept of shalom, “peace” or “fullness of life” (Completely Pro-Life, 15–20). This fullness of life is essentially relational. Biblical shalom is a harmony of right relationships, including one’s relationship with God, one’s relationship to others (on a global scale), and the created order (cf. W. Brueggemann, Shalom: Living toward a Vision).

Abortion is one important public issue demanding Christian social concern because it impinges upon the biblical doctrine of humanity. Other biblical principles must be brought to bear, however, upon the specific activities of Christian social service and social action as applied to any public issue. The spirit of compassion motivating genuine Christian social concern may express itself tangibly in one of two ways: either in the charitable deeds of Christian social service and responsible Christian social action targeting the legal and political mechanisms established by “due process” (cf. D. C. Thomasma, Human Life in the Balance, 221–23); or in acts of civil disobedience in protest of “unjust law” as applied to the plight of the unborn. In view of biblical teaching emphasizing Christ's law of love (Matt. 5:43–48; 22:39) and virtuous Christian citizenship in pagan society (1 Pet. 2:13–17), it seems that only passive and nonviolent forms of civil disobedience are appropriate responses to the abortion holocaust (cf. F. J. Beckwith, Politically Correct Death, 153–65; and Pojman and Beckwith, Abortion Controversy: A Reader, 445–61).

Third, the vigor of our evangelical orthopraxis with respect to the providers of abortion and the clients of the abortion industry should be commensurate with our passion for theological orthodoxy with respect to the sanctity of human life. Along with an ongoing doctrinal response to abortion, the compassionate Christian church will administer the gifts of mercy and help to those women confronted with a crisis pregnancy.

A meaningful social service strategy demonstrates compassionate Christian "charity" in providing a wide range of fully funded abortion alternatives to women (especially the unwed mother) confronted with an unwanted pregnancy, including competent counseling services (also targeting the father if possible), subsidized prenatal and postpartum medical care for mother and child, shepherding homes and shelters for homeless, abused, and unwed mothers who opt to carry their pregnancy to term, provisions for adoption, parenting education, and financial assistance in establishing new families resulting from pro-life decisions (cf. J. K. Hoffmeier, ed., Abortion: A Christian Understanding and Response, 229–60).

Most important, the Christian church must champion a redemptive strategy rooted in the biblical understanding of servanthood (Mark 9:35; 10:43–45), motivated by the love of Christ (2 Cor. 5:14), and fixed upon the ministry of reconciliation (2 Cor. 5:18–21).

Ultimately, abortion is a moral and spiritual issue, not a political one. This means that any type of Christian anti-abortion platform is fundamentally a form of spiritual warfare, not social activism (cf. Eph. 6:11–18). Mother Teresa discerned the destructive power of sin in society with characteristic bluntness and poignancy when questioned about abortion: "If a mother can kill her own child, then what is left of the West to be destroyed?" (Time [Dec. 4, 1989] 13). The truly effective course of action for the Christian church will not be the ballot box, but the kneeling bench. Only as righteous Christians pray, both for the end of legalized abortion and the coming of Christ's kingdom, will "the fruit of the light" displace "the deeds of darkness" spawning death (cf. Matt. 6:10; John 3:19–21; Eph. 5:9; James 5:16).

C. HORN III AND A. E. HILL

See also CAPITAL PUNISHMENT; EUTHANASIA.

Bibliography. C. E. Bajema, Abortion and the Meaning of Personhood; F. J. Beckwith, Politically Correct Death; H. O. J. Brown, Death before Birth; J. J. Davis, Abortion and the Christian; P. B. Fowler, Abortion: Toward an Evangelical Consensus; M. Gorman, Abortion and the Early Church; J. K. Hoffmeier, ed., Abortion: A Christian Understanding and Response; M. Kline, "Lex Talionis and the Human Fetus," JETS 20:193–201; C. E. Koop, Right to Live—The Right to Die; B. N. Nathanson and R. N. Ostling, Aborting America; J. T. Noonan, ed., Morality of Abortion; L. P. Pojman and R. J. Beckwith, Abortion Controversy: A Reader; J. Powell, Abortion: The Silent Holocaust; C. E. Rice, Vanishing Right to Live; S. D. Ricks, "Abortion in Antiquity," ABD 1:3313–35; J. M. Riddle, Contraception and Abortion from the Ancient World to the Renaissance; R. J. Sider, Completely Pro-life; R. C. Sproul, Abortion: A Rational Look at an Emotional Issue; D. C. Thomasma, Human Life in the Balance; R. N. Wennberg, Life in the Balance.

Abraham. Abraham stands in the unique position of being the father of a nation and the father of all believers. God told Abraham to leave his homeland and go to the land of Canaan, where God then entered into a covenant with him (Gen. 12:1–3; 15:12–21). Abraham was the progenitor of the Hebrew nation and of several Arabic peoples. All Jews regard themselves as his descendants, a special people chosen by God (Isa. 51:1–2).

Beyond the physical posterity lies the spiritual dimension, for "all peoples on earth will be blessed through you" (Gen. 12:3; 18:18; 22:18; 26:4; 28:14). This is perhaps the first great missionary text in the Bible. Paul referred to it as the same gospel that he preached (Gal. 3:8). The blessing came through Christ, "the son of David, the son of Abraham" (Matt. 1:1). All who believe in Christ are the children of Abraham, even the Gentiles (Gal. 3:7–14). They too are "Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise" (Gal. 3:29). In fact, faith in Christ is more important than physical descent when it comes to determining who the children of Abraham really are (Matt. 3:9; John 8:33). God's promises to Abraham and the rest of the patriarchs find their fulfillment in Christ (Acts 3:25–26), though in a limited sense any godly king who sat on David's throne fulfilled the Abrahamic covenant (cf. Ps. 72:17). The covenant was unconditional and eternal, but kings and other individuals who disobeyed God would find themselves cut off from the covenant (Gen. 17:13–14; 18:18–19).

The NT mentions Abraham more than any other OT figure except Moses, and it stresses his significance as a man of faith. When called to leave Mesopotamia, Abraham "obeyed and went, even though he did not know where he was going" (Heb. 11:8). Even after reaching Canaan, Abraham still remained a stranger and did not live to see the fulfillment of the promises (Heb. 11:9–10). He did believe that God would give him a son and that his offspring would someday become as numerous as the stars. Of this faith it is written that God “credited it to him as righteousness” (Gen. 15:4–6). Paul cites this passage as his first illustration of justification of faith in Romans 4:1–3. In the same chapter Paul notes that Abraham dared to believe that Sarah would give birth to the promised child, even though she was past the age of childbearing and he was a hundred years old (Rom. 4:18–19). Abraham’s unwavering faith in the promises of God remains a challenge to all people to “believe in him who raised Jesus our Lord from the dead” (Rom. 4:20–24).

Abraham

The greatest test of Abraham’s faith came when God instructed him to sacrifice Isaac on Mount Moriah. In spite of God’s previous promises being intertwined with the life of Isaac, Abraham obeyed and was ready to plunge the knife into his dear son. According to Hebrews 11:17–19, Abraham reasoned that God would bring Isaac back to life, so deep was his confidence in God’s promises. This experience of nearly sacrificing his only son placed Abraham in the position of God the Father, who sent his one and only Son to Mount Calvary, not far from Mount Moriah (2 Chron. 3:1). The Greek word that describes Christ as the “only begotten” or “one and only son,” monogenēs, is applied to Isaac in Hebrews 11:17. A ram was substituted on the altar for Isaac (Gen. 22:13), but God “did not spare his own son” (Rom. 8:32). The pain and agony felt by Abraham at the prospect of sacrificing Isaac in some small way helps us understand the suffering of the Father when he offered up his Son for us all.

Abraham’s fellowship with God is also illustrated through his prayer life. In Genesis 20:7 Abraham is called a prophet who will pray for the healing of a Philistine king and his family. Earlier, in Genesis 18:22–33, Abraham stood before the Lord and interceded in behalf of the city of Sodom. His boldness in prayer encourages the believer to lay petitions before the throne of grace. Because of his close walk with the Lord, Abraham is called the friend of God (2 Chron. 20:7; Isa. 41:8; James 2:23). Both the Hebrew and the Greek words for “friend” include the idea of “the one who loves God.” Abraham loved God more than anything else in the world (Gen. 22:2). His obedience to the Lord is emphasized also in Genesis 26:5. Before the law was written, Abraham kept God’s requirements, commands, and laws.

Abraham was rightly called a prophet because he received divine revelation (Gen. 12:1–3). God spoke to him in a vision (15:1) and appeared to him in a theophany (18:1).
H. M. WOLF

Bibliography. N. Calvert, “Abraham,” DPHL 1–9; R. E. Clements, TDOT 1:52–58; G. W. Hansen, Abraham in Galatians; J. Jeremias, TDNT 1:8–9; W. C.

Kaiser Jr., Toward an Old Testament Theology; R. Longenecker, “Faith of Abraham,” JETS 20:203–12; J. B. Payne, Theology of the Older Testament; J. Van Seters, Abraham in History and Tradition; G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology 1:170–75; J. Walvoord, “Premillennialism and the Abrahamic Covenant,” BS 109:37–46, 293–303.

Abraham’s Bosom. In Luke 16:22–23 Lazarus is carried by the angels into Abraham’s bosom. It is most natural and in keeping with NT thought elsewhere to think of the heavenly banquet to which Lazarus is now admitted. Reclining at table beside Abraham (cf. John 13:23), Lazarus is thus enjoying the privileges of a guest of honor (cf. Matt. 8:11). Rabbinic Judaism used the expression in a different sense, namely, of rest from the toil and neediness of earthly life in intimate fellowship with the father of the race, who is still alive and blessed in death.

Hades and Abraham’s bosom are distinct places, not two compartments of the same place. If Abraham’s bosom was intended to refer to one of the divisions of Hades, then the other division would have been mentioned with equal precision. Hades is mentioned in connection with Dives only; the other place is “afar off.” Hades is associated with being in torment; the latter appears to be the consequence of being in Hades. If Hades were a neutral concept here, then the contrast with the rich man’s former sumptuous state would not have been expressed. M. H. WOODSTRA

See also HADES; INTERMEDIATE STATE.

Bibliography. SB 2:225–27; R. Meyer, TDNT 3:824–26.

Absolution. From the Latin absolvo (set free), the term absolution is used in theology to denote the forgiveness of sins, being specifically used by Roman Catholics of the remission given through or by the church. It is a suitable word in that the truly free person is one against whom no accusation of sin can be made.

In the Bible. The Bible teaches God’s willingness to forgive human sin and his provision whereby justice and mercy are reconciled in the transaction. This study is properly made under the subject of the atonement. Here we simply note the biblical teaching that all sin is sin against God (“against you, you only, have I sinned”; Ps. 51:4) and therefore sin can be forgiven only if it is forgiven by God. In the last analysis, then, absolution is the sole prerogative of God. This is basic in the whole conception of absolution.

But one’s sins sometimes offend fellow humans as well as God; in particular the sins of Christians affect the whole church and their relationship with the church. We find this revealed in our Lord’s teaching concerning forgiveness. He links the disciples' forgiveness of one another with God's forgiveness of them: "Forgive us our debts, as we also have forgiven our debtors." Several of his parables teach the same lesson (e.g., the unforgiving servant). And in our Lord's words (spoken first to Peter and afterward to all the disciples), "Whatever you bind on earth shall be bound in heaven, and whatever you loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven" (Matt. 16:19, 18:18), he clearly gives them their share in the matter of forgiveness of sins. Finally, the words spoken to the disciples in the upper room after the resurrection give unmistakable expression to the church's part in conveying the sense of forgiveness to a penitent soul: "Jesus said, 'Peace be with you! As the Father has sent me, I am sending you.' And with that he breathed on them and said, 'Receive the Holy Spirit. If you forgive anyone his sins, they are forgiven; if you do not forgive them, they are not forgiven.'" (John 20:21-23).

In the Church. There is ample evidence to show that in the early church the practice was for the penitent to make public confession of sin before the congregation, whereupon the sinner was received back by the congregation as a whole with prayer and the imposition of the hands of the bishop. As time went on, a natural alternative to such public confession was for the penitent to confess before a minister of the church (the bishop or a presbyter) in private. In both of these methods a prayer for absolution was used, asking God to forgive the sins so confessed and to restore the penitent "to the bosom of thy holy church" (Apostolic Constitutions).

In the eighth century and later we find a development taking place in the Latin church whereby the presbyter (priest), hearing confessions, assumed more and more the position of a judge, inquiring into every department of the penitent's life and finally giving absolution in a declaratory form as distinct from the earlier precatory form. Thomas Aquinas was the first to formally defend this type of absolution, which is now used in the church of Rome as follows: Ego te absolvo a peccatis tuis in nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti.

The Reformers of the sixteenth century sought to restore the matter to its scriptural teaching and early church usage. The confessional with its declaratory form of absolution was abolished by all the Protestant churches. Differences of procedure sprang up in the different denominations, but the same basic idea may be found in all, namely, to stir the conscience to an inner acknowledgment of sin, so that on confession to God it may be absolved directly by God himself. This stirring of the conscience is mainly effected by preaching and prayer, and if there is any declaration of forgiveness it has the form of a proclamation of the gospel promises. In most cases opportunity is given for a public confession in divine worship, whether representatively by the minister or corporately by the whole congregation.

Protestant thought in general, however, does not overlook the occasional need for the confession of sin that is burdening the conscience of an individual. In Anglicanism, provision is made for this by invitation to come to "a learned minister of God's Word"; in other bodies and often in evangelistic missions, opportunity is given for private consultation with a "counselor" or other Christian friend. In each case the Scriptures are the basis of instruction, and prayer is used to bring peace to the troubled mind and to kindle renewed faith in Christ.

To conclude, absolution is primarily identical with the divine remission. It is used especially of the declaration of forgiveness, that is, the assuring of penitent sinners that they are forgiven. It is received on the confession of sin to God, and its declaration is an integral part of the evangelical ministry of the church. W. C. G. PROCTOR

See also ATONEMENT; CONFESSION; FORGIVENESS; PENITENCE; REPENTANCE.

Bibliography. T. W. Drury, Confession and Absolution; H. C. Lea, History of Auricular Confession and Indulgences in the Latin Church; M. H. Seymour, Confessional; J. R. W. Stott, Confess Your Sins.

Abys. The bottomless pit or abyss (from Heb. tēhôm, "the deep") refers to the underworld as (1) a prison for Satan and certain demons (Luke 8:31; Rev. 20:1, 3; cf. 2 Pet. 2:4; Jude 6); (2) the realm of the dead which the living cannot enter (Rom. 10:7) and the place from which the beast or Antichrist arises (Rev. 11:7; 17:8). That God alternately imprisons and releases the demonic spirits signifies his ultimate power over the satanic evil realm. The concept provides an additional complementary image to hell of the place of terror filled with demons. Hell (Gehenna) is the eschatological fiery destination of all the wicked (man and demons), while the abyss is the present abode of demonic spirits. A. F. JOHNSON

See also HADES; HELL.

Bibliography. H. Bietenhard, NIDNTT 2:205; J. Jeremias, TDNT 1:9.

Accommodation. The theological term that designates that characteristic of biblical writers under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, for purposes of simplification, to adjust their language to the limitations of their readers without compromising the truth in the process. The concern here is to discriminate between the legitimate and the illegitimate application of this principle.

Legitimate uses of accommodation include the following. (1) In the realm of theology proper

Accommodation

God is often described as having physical properties (hands, eyes, etc.); this figure of speech is called an anthropomorphism. (2) In the realm of cosmology the facts of nature (sunsets, etc.) are often pictured in the language of appearance rather than in the language of exact science. This allows the Bible to speak in ordinary language. (3) In the realm of ethics stronger Christians may, in matters indifferent, accommodate themselves to the scruples of weaker Christians (1 Cor. 8; Gal. 2:3–5). (4) In the realm of didactics parabolic language may be employed to accommodate deeper mysteries to the minds of the unenlightened (Matt. 13:10–17).

Illegitimate uses of accommodation include the following. (1) The claim that Christ accommodated himself to the prejudices and erroneous views of the Jews practically nullifies Christ's authority on critical questions. (2) The claim that the early church invested OT prophecies with a meaning they cannot bear virtually empties the OT of real messianic prophecy. (3) The claim that the writers of Scripture adopted ideas from pagan religions and then, after some purging, accommodated these ideas to the religion of Israel or to the theology of the nascent NT church intermingles God's revelation with human error.

W. BROOMALL

See also ANTHROPOMORPHISM.

Bibliography. W. Broomall, Biblical Criticism; R. Hofman, SHERK 1:22–24; G. T. Ladd, Doctrine of Holy Scripture; L. M. Sweet, ISBE 1:24–28; J. R. Willis, HDCG 1:15–24.

Accountability. See RESPONSIBILITY.

Accountability, Age of. See AGE OF ACCOUNTABILITY.

Active Obedience of Christ. See OBEDIENCE OF CHRIST.

Acts of Uniformity. See UNIFORMITY, ACTS OF.

Adam. The Hebrew word transliterated "Adam" is found about 560 times in the OT, in the overwhelming majority of cases meaning "man" or "humankind." This is true of some of the references at the beginning of Genesis (in the creation and Eden stories), and many scholars hold that up to Genesis 4:25 all occurrences of "Adam" should be understood to refer to "man" or "the Man." But there is no doubt that the writer on occasion used the word as the proper name of the first man, and it is with this use that we are concerned. This meaning is found outside Genesis in 1 Chronicles 1:1, possibly Deuteronomy 32:8 (where "the sons of Adam" may be the proper translation), and some important NT passages.

Adam in Old Testament Teaching. We are told that God created humans "in his own image" and that he created them "male and female" (Gen. 1:27), statements made about no other creature. The man was commanded to "be fruitful and increase in number; fill the earth and subdue it" (1:28). He was not to be idle but was given the task of tending the Garden of Eden. He was forbidden to eat "from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil" (2:15–17). The man was given the privilege of naming all the animals (2:20), but no suitable help for him was found among them, so God made woman from a rib taken from the man's body (2:21–23). The serpent beguiled the woman into breaking God's command not to eat of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, and she then persuaded her husband to do likewise. They were punished by being expelled from the garden, and in addition the woman was to have pain in childbirth and be subject to her husband, while Adam would find the ground cursed so that it would bring forth thorns and thistles and he would have to toil hard all his days (Gen. 3). But curse is not all; there is the promise of a Deliverer who will crush the serpent (3:15). We are told of the birth of two sons, of Cain's murder of Abel (4:1–16), and of the birth of Seth (4:25).

The meaning of these passages is disputed. Some OT scholars regard them as primitive myth, giving early humans the answers to such questions as "Why do snakes lack legs?" or "Why do humans die?" Others see them as mythological but nonetheless expressing truths of permanent validity concerned with human origins and constitution, or, as others hold, with "a fall upward." This latter view sees humans as originally no more than one of the animals. At this stage they could no more sin than any other animal could. It was accordingly a significant step forward when humans became aware of something they were doing as wrong. But it is highly doubtful whether the writer had in mind any such ideas. Adam and Eve are clearly thought of as the first parents of the human race, and the writer is telling us of God's purpose that those into whom he had breathed "the breath of life" should live in fellowship with him. But Adam and Eve fell from their original blissful state as a result of their first sin. And that sin has continuing consequences for the whole human race. In later times the magnitude of the fall has sometimes been emphasized by affirming that Adam was originally endowed with wonderful supernatural gifts, lost when he sinned (in Sir. 49:16 Adam is honored "above every living being in the creation"; cf. the medieval stress on Adam's supernatural graces). But this is speculation.

The creation narratives tell us that humans are related to the rest of creation (i.e., made "of dust from the ground"; Gen. 2:7; for beasts and birds, cf. 2:19) and also to God ("in the image of God"; Gen. 1:27; cf. 2:7). Human dominion over the lower creation (Gen. 1:26, 28) is symbolized by the naming of the other creatures. The fall passage speaks of the seriousness of sin and of its permanent effects. This is not a topic to which there is frequent reference in the OT, but it underlies everything. It is a fundamental presupposition that humans are sinners, and this marks off the literature of the Hebrews from other literatures of antiquity. The solidarity of Adam with his descendants is in the background throughout the OT writings, as is the thought that there is a connection between sin and death. Whatever problems this poses for modern expositors, there can be no doubt that the OT takes a serious view of sin and that sin is seen as part of human nature.

Adam in Intertestamental and New Testament Thought. The intertestamental period exhibits some striking expressions of solidarity with Adam, such as Ezra's impassioned exclamation: "O Adam, what have you done? For though it was you who sinned, the fall was not yours alone, but ours also who are your descendants" (2 Esdr. 7:48 [118]; cf. 3:21; 4:30; Wis. 2:23–24; the blame is assigned to Eve in Sir. 25:24). Adam was seen not as a lone sinner, but as one who influenced all humankind.

In the NT Adam is mentioned in Luke's genealogy (Luke 3:38) and in a similar reference in Jude, where Enoch is "the seventh from Adam" (Jude 14). These passages simply mention Adam to locate him in his genealogical place (Matt. 19:4–6 and Mark 10:6–8 imply reference to Adam but do not mention his name). Three important passages have theological import: 1 Timothy 2:13–14; Romans 5:12–21; and 1 Corinthians 15:22, 45.

In 1 Timothy 2:13–14 the subordinate place of woman is argued from (1) Adam's being created first and (2) Eve's being deceived, though Adam was not. This passage presumes that the Genesis stories tell us something of permanent significance about all men and women.

Romans 5 stresses the connection of humankind at large with Adam. It was through that one man that sin came into the world, and the consequence of his sin was death. This happened long before the law was given, so death cannot be put down to law-breaking. And even though people did not sin in the same way as Adam, they were caught in the consequences of sin: "death reigned from the time of Adam to the time of Moses" (Rom. 5:12–14). This brings Paul to the thought that Adam was a "type" of Christ, and he goes on to a sustained comparison of Adam's and Christ's actions. The main resemblance is that both acted representatively so that what each did has incalculable consequences for those he heads. But the differences are more significant. Adam's sin brought death and condemnation to all; it made people sinners. When law came in, that only increased the trespass. It showed up sin for what it was. The end result is disaster. By contrast, Christ brought life and acquittal; such words as "free gift," "grace," and "justification" emphasize the significance of Christ's death. The end result is blessing. Paul concludes by contrasting the reign of sin in death with the reign of grace "through righteousness to eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord."

In Paul's magnificent treatment of the resurrection we read: "As in Adam all die, so in Christ all will be made alive" (1 Cor. 15:22). The thought is not unlike that in Romans 5. Adam was the head of the race and brought death to everyone in it; Christ is the head of the new humanity and brought life to all within it. Some argue that the two uses of "all" must refer to the same totality, the entire human race. There is no question that this is the meaning in respect to Adam. The argument runs that similarly Christ raises all from the grave, though some are raised only for condemnation. However, "made alive" seems to mean more than "raised to face judgment." It is probably best to understand "made alive" to refer to life eternal, so that "all" will mean "all who are in Christ." All these will be made alive, just as all who are in Adam die.

A little later Paul writes, "The first man Adam became a living being"; the last Adam, a life-giving spirit" (1 Cor. 15:45). Adam became "a living being" when God breathed life into him (Gen. 2:7). Physical life was all the life Adam had and all he could bequeath to his posterity. But "the last Adam" gave life in the fullest sense, eternal life. Again there is the thought that Christ cancels out Adam's evil. But the emphasis is not negative. It is on the life Christ gives.

The scriptural use of Adam, then, stresses the solidarity of the human race in sin. It reminds us that the human race had a beginning and that all its history from the very first is marked by sin. But "the last Adam" altered all that when he replaced sin with righteousness and death with life.

L. L. MORRIS

See also ADAM, THE LAST; EVOLUTION; FALL OF THE HUMAN RACE; IMAGE OF GOD; SIN.

Bibliography. C. K. Barrett, From First Adam to Last; K. Barth, Christ and Adam; B. S. Childs, IDB 1:42–44; W. D. Davies, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism; J. Jeremias, TDNT 1:141–43; A. Richardson, Introduction to the Theology of the New Testament; H. Seebass, NIDNTT 1:84–88; A. J. M. Weddeburn, IDB 1:14–16.

Adam, The Last. In 1 Corinthians 15:45 Paul refers to Jesus Christ as "the last Adam" (ho eschatos Adam) in contrast to "the first man Adam" (ho prōtos anthrōpos Adam). This antithetic parallelism shows the continuity of humanity, but the second person, who represents the new humanity, so far excels the first that he is described as an active “life-giving spirit” (pneuma zōo-poioun), where the original Adam (Gen. 2:7) became only “a natural living being” (psychēn zōsan). The contrast is heightened by Paul’s pointed antithetic style in 1 Corinthians 15:46–49, setting Adam against Christ:

Adam, The Last

	First Adam	Second Adam
46	natural (psychikon)	spiritual (pneumatikon)
47	the first man (ho prōtos anthrōpos) from the earth, of dust (ek gēs, choikos)	the second man (ho deuterios anthrōpos) from heaven (ex ouranou)
48	as was the man of dust, so are those who are of dust (hoios ho choikos, toioutoi kai choikoi)	as is the man of heaven, so are those who are of heaven (hoios ho epouranios, toioutoi kai hoi epouranioi)
49	as we have borne the image of the man of dust (kathōs ephoresamen tēn eikona tou choikou)	we shall also bear the image of the man of heaven (phoresomen kai tēn eikona tou epouraniou)

The same contrast was made earlier in 1 Corinthians 15:21–22 and linked with death and resurrection:

	First Adam	Second Adam
21	since by a man came death (epeidē gar di' anthrōpou thanatos)	so also by a man has come the resurrection of the dead (kai di' anthrōpou anastasis nekrōn)
22	for as in Adam all die (hōsper gar en tō Adam pantes apothnēskousin)	so also in Christ shall all be made alive (houtōs kai en tō Christō pantes zōopoieīthēsontai)

The contrast is expressed again in Romans 5:14–19, where Paul describes the first Adam as follows: disobedience → trespass → judgment → condemnation → death → many/all. But Jesus Christ as the second Adam is described in the following antithetic terms: obedience → grace → free gift → justification → acquittal → righteousness → life → many/all. The powerful effect of Christ as the second Adam is summed up in one of Paul’s favorite expressions, “how much more” (pollō mallon; 5:9, 10, 15, 17), which makes explicit the christological implications of the “how much more” in Jesus’ own proclamation (Matt. 6:30; 7:11). These ideas may also be found in John 5:21–29; Romans 1:3–5; 6:5–11; 2 Corinthians 5:1–4, 17; Philippians 2:5–11. R. G. GRUENLER

See also ADAM; INCARNATION.

Bibliography. C. K. Barrett, From First Adam to Last; O. Cullmann, Christology of the New Testament; W. D.

Davies, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism; I. J. Kreitzer, “Adam and Christ,” DPhL 9–15; R. Scroggs, Last Adam.

Adiaphora, Adiaphorists. Adiaphora (Gk. “indifferent things”; German Mitteldinge, “middle matters”) refers to matters not regarded as essential to faith that might therefore be allowed in the church. In particular the Lutheran confessions of the sixteenth century speak of adiaphora as “church rites that are neither commanded nor forbidden in the Word of God.”

Historically the Adiaphorists were Protestants who, with Philip Melancthon, held certain Roman Catholic practices (e.g., confirmation by bishops, rules for fasting) to be tolerable for the sake of church unity. This issue became the focal point for a bitter controversy prompted by the Augsburg Interim forced on the Lutherans in 1548 by Emperor Charles V and accepted by Melancthon and others in the Leipzig Interim. The Gnesio-Lutherans, led by Nicholas von Arnsdorf and Matthias Flacius, objected to the presuppositions and judgments concerning adiaphora that led the Saxon theologians (the “Philippists”) to forge the Leipzig Interim. The “Gnesios” set down the basic principle that in a case where confession of faith is demanded and ceremonies or adiaphora are commanded as necessary, where offense may be given, adiaphora do not remain adiaphora but become matters of moral precept. Those who supported the interims argued that it was better to compromise appearances in terms of rites and customs than to risk the abolition of Lutheranism in Saxony. Although the controversy over the interims became unnecessary after the Religious Peace of Augsburg in 1555, the dispute continued, and nearly two hundred tracts appeared discussing one stance or the other.

In 1577 the Formula of Concord brought an end to the question for Lutherans by setting forth three fundamental points concerning the nature of genuine adiaphora. First, genuine adiaphora were defined as ceremonies neither commanded nor forbidden in God’s Word and not as such, or in and of themselves, divine worship or any part of it (Matt. 15:9). This evangelical principle is integral to the very cornerstone of Reformation theology; it cuts off at the source all false claims of human tradition and authority in the church. The second major point about genuine adiaphora is that the church does have the perfect right and authority to alter them so long as this is done without offense, in an orderly manner, so as to redound to the church’s edification (Acts 16:1–5; 21:20–26; Rom. 14). The third assertion goes to the heart of the entire matter: at a time of confession, when the enemies of God’s Word seek to suppress the pure proclamation of the gospel, one must confess fully, in word and deed, and not yield, even in adiaphora. Here it is not a question of accommodating oneself to the weak, but of resisting idolatry, false doctrine, and spiritual tyranny (Gal. 2, 5; Col. 2). In sum, the Formula of Concord's position included adiaphora within the domain of Christian liberty, which may be defined as consisting of the freedom of believers from the curse (Gal. 3:13) and coercion (Rom. 6:14) of the law and from human ordinances. This liberty is the direct result of justification (Rom. 10:4; 1 Tim. 1:9).

Outside the Lutheran tradition more rigid forms of Protestantism developed, such as the English Puritans, who tended to hold that everything not explicitly allowed in the Bible was forbidden. Others, such as the Anglican communion, were less stringent and regarded many traditional practices, though without scriptural warrant, as adiaphora. Adiaphoristic debates continued to develop periodically. In 1681 a controversy arose between Lutherans regarding participation in amusements.

J. F. JOHNSON

See also AMSDORF, NICHOLAS VON; CONCORD, FORMULA OF; FLACIUS, MATTHIAS; MELANCHTHON, PHILIP.

Bibliography. R. Preus and W. Rosin, eds., Contemporary Look at the Formula of Concord; B. J. Verkamp, Indifferent Mean: Adiaphorism in the English Reformation to 1554.

Administration, Gift of. See SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

Adonai. See GOD, NAMES OF.

Adoption. A relatively infrequent term in the Scriptures, adoption is of theological importance, for it relates to how Israel and the Christian may be "children" and "heirs" of God although they are not uniquely or by nature so, as in the case of Christ.

In the Old Testament. The term adoption does not appear in the OT. There were no provisions for adoption in Israelite law, and the examples that do occur come from outside the Israelite culture (Eliezer, Gen. 15:1–4; Moses, Exod. 2:10; Genubath, 1 Kings 11:20; Esther, Esth. 2:7, 15). For Israelites, polygamy and levirate marriage were the more common solutions to infertility. Yet adoption was not unknown in their literature (cf. Prov. 17:2; 19:10; 29:21, which may all refer to adoption of slaves), and it may have been the means by which children fathered by a master and a slave mother inherited property (Gen. 16:1–4; 21:1–10; 30:1–13). Outside of Israel, adoption was common enough to be regulated in the law codes of Babylon (e.g., the Code of Hammurabi §§185–86), Nuzi, and Ugarit. Not infrequently these refer to the adoption of a slave as an heir.

For Israel as a whole, there was a consciousness of having been chosen by God as his child (Isa. 1:2; Jer. 3:19; Hos. 11:1). Since Israel had no myth of descent from the gods as the surrounding cultures did, adoption was the obvious category into which this act, as well as the deliverance from slavery in Egypt, would fit, as Paul indicates in Romans 9:4. Likewise the kings succeeding David were God's "sons" (2 Sam. 7:14; 1 Chron. 28:6; Ps. 89:26–27). Psalm 2:7, for example, uses "You are my son," which is probably the adoption formula used in the enthronement ceremony of each successive Davidic ruler. Together these ideas laid the basis for later NT usage of adoption imagery.

In the New Testament. In the NT the term adoption (huiiothesia) is strictly a Pauline idea, occurring only in Romans 8:15, 23; 9:4; Galatians 4:5–7; and Ephesians 1:5. While John and Peter prefer the picture of regeneration to portray the Christian adoption, Paul has characteristically chosen a legal image (as in justification), perhaps due to his contact with the Roman world.

In Greek and Roman society, adoption was, at least among the upper classes, a relatively common practice. Unlike the oriental cultures in which slaves were sometimes adopted, these people normally limited adoption to free citizens. But, at least in Roman law, the citizen so adopted became a virtual slave and came under the paternal authority of the adoptive father. Adoption conferred rights, but it came with a list of duties as well.

Paul combines several of these pictures in his thought. Galatians 4 begins with a picture of the law enslaving the heirs until a given date (e.g., majority or the death of the father), but soon shifts (v. 4) to the adoption image in which one who was truly a slave (not a minor as in vv. 1–3) becomes a child and thus an heir through redemption. The former slave, empowered by the Spirit, now uses the address of a child: "Abba! Father!"

The reason for adoption is given in Ephesians 1:5: God's love. It was not due to one's nature or merit that the Christian was adopted (and thus receives the Spirit and the inheritance; Eph. 1:14–15), but to God's will acting through Christ. Adoption is a free grant to undeserving people solely from God's grace.

As in Galatians and Ephesians, adoption is connected to the Spirit in Romans as well. It is those who are "led by the Spirit" who are children, who have received the "spirit of adoption," not that of slavery (Rom. 8:14–15). Again the Spirit produces the cry "Abba!" and indicates by his presence the reality of the coming inheritance.

Adoption, however, is not entirely a past event. The legal declaration may have been made and the Spirit may have been given as a down payment, but the consummation of the adoption awaits the future, for adoption includes "the redemption of our bodies" (8:23). Thus adoption is something hoped for as well as something already possessed.

Adoption

Adoption, then, is deliverance from the past (similar to regeneration and justification), a status and way of life in the present (walking by the Spirit, sanctification), and a hope for the future (salvation, resurrection). It describes the process of becoming a child of God (cf. John 1:12; 1 John 3:1-2) and receiving an inheritance from God (cf. Col. 3:24).

P. H. DAVIDS

See also INHERITANCE.

Bibliography. J. I. Cook, "Concept of Adoption in the Theology of Paul," in Saved by Hope, J. I. Cook, ed.; F. Lyall, "Roman Law in the Writings of Paul—Adoption," JBL 88:458-66; Slaves, Citizens, Sons: Legal Metaphors in the Epistles; L. H. Marshall, Challenge of New Testament Ethics; W. H. Rossell, "New Testament Adoption—Graeco-Roman or Semitic?" JBL 71:233-34; J. M. Scott, Adoption as Sons of God; D. J. Theron, "'Adoption' in the Pauline Corpus," EvQ 28:6-14; J. Van Seters, "The Problem of Childlessness in Near Eastern Law and the Patriarchs of Israel," JBL 87:401-8; R. A. Webb, Reformed Doctrine of Adoption; P. Wülfing von Martitz and E. Schweizer, TDNT 8:397-99.

Adoptionism. Put most simply, adoptionism (or adoptianism) is the theory that Jesus was in nature a man who became God by adoption.

The earliest extant work that expresses this position is the Shepherd of Hermas, thought to be written by the brother of the bishop of Rome about A.D. 150. It taught that the Redeemer was a virtuous man chosen by God, and with him the Spirit of God was united. He did the work to which God had called him; in fact, he did more than was commanded. Therefore he was by divine decree adopted as a son and exalted to great power and lordship. Adherents of this Christology, who were declared heretics in the third century, asserted that it had at one time been the dominant view in Rome and that it had been handed down by the apostles.

Adoptionism was perpetuated in the second- and third-century church by the dynamistic monarchians, who taught that Christ was a mere man on whom the power of God came and who was then adopted or constituted the Son of God. A leader in that general movement was Theodorus, who came to Rome from Byzantium about 190. He taught that Jesus was a man who was born of a virgin through the operation of the Holy Spirit. After the piety of his life had been tested, the Holy Spirit descended on him at the baptism. By this means he became Christ and received the power for his special ministry. But he was still not fully God; that was achieved through resurrection. Theodotus was excommunicated by the Roman Church, and the effort of his followers to found a separate church early in the third century had little success.

Adoptionism was an attempt to explain the divine and human natures in Christ and their relation to each other. And as the great christological debates raged during the fourth and fifth centuries, there were always a few who could be accused of taking this position. It did not flare again extensively, however, until the latter part of the eighth century, when it produced a commotion in the Spanish and Frankish churches.

Elipandus, bishop of Toledo from ca. 780, in his writings on the Trinity expressed the view that Christ was an adopted son; Felix, bishop of Urgel in the Pyrenees, taught a similar position soon thereafter. Numerous local ecclesiastics opposed them; and their teachings were condemned by three synods under Charlemagne, who had assumed the position of ruler of the church in his realm and was therefore concerned with its unity. Pope Adrian I also became involved, and the recantation of both men was obtained. They had a numerous following, however, and extensive efforts were required to bring these people back into the fold. The effects of the controversy lasted for decades in Toledo. Possible remnants of the old Arian heresy contributed to the popularity of adoptionism at this time.

A sound refutation of adoptionism was never made, and leanings in that direction appeared in some scholastic writings during the late Middle Ages.

H. F. VOS

Bibliography. A. Harnack, History of Dogma; A. Hauck, SHERK 1:48-50.

Adultery. In the OT, adultery (n'p) denotes the voluntary cohabitation of a married woman with a man other than her lawful spouse, or a man with a married woman or an engaged girl. At times the NT designates this sin also by porneia (fornication; 1 Cor. 5:1), though this properly designates the offense of voluntary cohabitation between unmarried persons. Where the two kinds of wrongdoing are to be distinguished, Scripture designates them by different terms: pornoi (fornicators) and moichoï (adulterers; 1 Cor. 6:9).

Adultery is forbidden in the Scriptures especially in the interest of the sanctity of the home and family (Exod. 20:14; Deut. 5:18). More specifically the sin is described in Leviticus 18:20: "You shall not lie carnally with your neighbor's wife to defile yourself with her." The wrong is regarded as so great that its penalty was death (Lev. 20:10). While the law of Moses did not specify how this penalty was to be executed, it is explained in the NT as stoning: "Moses commanded us to stone such women" (John 8:5). In Deuteronomy 22:22 the mode of punishing an adulteress is not prescribed, though in Ezekiel 16:40 and 23:43-47 stoning is mentioned as the proper punishment. So also in Deuteronomy 22:23–24 an adulterous young woman betrothed to a man was to be stoned together with her guilty partner. Various indications in Jewish tradition suggest that at times the punishment was inflicted by strangulation.

Since the death penalty could be inflicted only upon a person proven to be adulterous, the woman suspected by her husband of having committed adultery had to undergo an ordeal to establish her innocence or be made manifest as a sinner by a divine judgment (Num. 5:11–31).

Though adultery was condemned in the divine law as a heinous crime (Job 31:9–11), it could not be rooted out, and both men and women were often found guilty of this grave offense (Job 24:15; 31:9; Prov. 2:16–19; 7:5–22). Even David became guilty of adultery and, as a result of this sin, murder (2 Sam. 11:2–5), of which, however, he earnestly repented (Ps. 51). Adultery filled the land, especially through the influence of profane prophets and priests (Jer. 23:10–14; 29:23).

While the Scriptures' penal laws consider only the actual transgression of the commandment of chastity, its moral law condemns also adulterous practices committed with the eye and the heart (Job 31:1, 9). Emphasis on this kind of transgression was urged by Christ in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5:28), where he pronounced the person guilty of adultery who merely looked upon a woman to commit adultery with her. Equally severe was our Lord's rebuke of offensive hypocrites who condemned adultery while they themselves were guilty of unchastity (John 8:7). However, while he reproved the wicked accusers, he did not condone the sin of the adulteress when he dismissed her with the command to go and sin no more (8:11). His words must be regarded rather as his solemn absolution of a penitent sinner.

When our Lord testified against the lax divorce practices of the Jews who followed the loose interpretation of Deuteronomy 24:1–3 advocated by Hillel, he excepted adultery as the only cause justifying divorce (Matt. 5:32; 19:9), supporting in this the stricter school of Shammai, which likewise limited divorce to adultery. As a prevailing vice of perverted humankind, adultery will always be a continuing offense. For this reason the NT so earnestly warns against it (1 Cor. 6:9; Heb. 13:4; James 4:4).

Even though Christ permits the putting away of the wife because of fornication (Matt. 5:32; 19:9), Paul does not contradict him in his directions on marriage in 1 Corinthians 7:10–13. Rather, he commands the faithful Christian spouse to be at peace in case the unbelieving husband or wife should break the marriage union by malicious desertion. In vv. 10–11 he forbids Christians to break the marriage union, and that as a word of the Lord, the reference being clearly to Matthew 5:32 and 19:9, with Christ's express statement "except it be for fornication" clearly understood. In vv. 12–13 Paul address the situation of Christians joined in marriages to unbelievers (which Christ had not considered when addressing Jews): if the unbelieving spouse desires to break the marriage bond by deserting the Christian, the latter is not bound, but is free to remarry.

J. T. MUELLER

See also DIVORCE; FORNICATION; MARRIAGE, THEOLOGY OF.

Bibliography. K. Grayson, "Adultery," Theological Wordbook of the Bible, 16–17; F. Hauck, TDNT 4:729–735; H. Reisser et al., NIDNTT 1:497–501, 2:582–584, 3:535–543; E. Schillebeeckx, Marriage in the History of the Church; H. Thielicke, Ethics of Sex.

Advent. The season of the ecclesiastical year when the church prepares to celebrate the birth or coming (adventus) of Jesus Christ (Christmas) and engages in self-examination in expectation of his second coming in glory to judge the living and the dead. The collects and Scripture readings embrace these two themes. It begins in the West on the Sunday nearest to St. Andrew's Day (Nov. 30) and always includes four Sundays. However, in the East the period is longer, beginning earlier in November. During the Middle Ages and earlier the period was marked by discipline and fasting (based on "watch and pray"), but in modern times this emphasis has not been prominent.

P. TOON

See also CHRISTIAN YEAR.

Bibliography. A. A. Arthur, Evolution of the Christian Year; J. Burrio, Child is Born: Meditations for Advent and Christmas; D. Griggs and P. Griggs, Teaching and Celebrating Advent; T. J. Talley, Origins of the Liturgical Year.

Adventism. The belief that Christ's personal second coming is imminent and will inaugurate his millennial kingdom and the end of the age. Chiliasm, apocalypticism, and millennialism are cognate theological terms. Adventism in this general sense has been espoused by many diverse groups throughout Christian history (e.g., Montanists, Anabaptists, Fifth Monarchists, Plymouth Brethren and other premillennialists, and Jehovah's Witnesses).

Adventism is most commonly used, however, to denote the movement that sprang up in the 1830s from the teachings of William Miller, a Baptist minister in New York. Miller confidently prophesied the imminent return of Christ and set 1843–44 as the time for the event. The Millerite movement spread rapidly among northeastern churches. When the expected return did not occur as Miller had originally predicted, a reinterpretation of the Scripture set October 22, 1844 as the correct date. The faithful met in their local gathering places on the appointed day, worshipping and waiting. The “Great Disappointment” that followed the failure of the prophecy led many Millerites to forsake the movement and slip back into the churches from which they had never formally dissociated themselves. Miller himself acknowledged his error and dissociated himself from the movement and all further attempts to redeem it.

Adventism

A new series of signs, visions, and prophecies, however, fed the lagging spirits of those who refused to give up their adventist hopes. As early as the day after the Great Disappointment, Hiram Edison, an adventist leader, had a vision that confirmed the prophetic significance of the October 22, 1844 date, but indicated that it marked a heavenly rather than an earthly event. On that day Christ had moved into the holy of holies of the heavenly sanctuary to begin a new phase of his ministry of redemption. That ministry was ultimately defined in the adventist doctrine of investigative judgment; Christ entered the sanctuary to review the deeds of professing Christians to determine whose names should be included in the Book of Life. Other revelations subsequent to the Great Disappointment came to Ellen G. Harmon, a young disciple of Miller in Portland, Maine. She was quickly accepted as a prophetess and her teachings accepted as authoritative. The revived movement also adopted sabbatarianism and the belief that the acceptance of the seventh-day sabbath was the mark of the true church. Seventh-day observance and Christ’s ministry of investigative judgment, confirmed by the prophetic revelation of Ellen (Harmon) White, completed the foundations of contemporary adventism. Most adventist groups also adhere to belief in soul sleep and annihilation of the wicked. Their strong emphasis on OT teaching also led to a strong traditional concern for diet and health.

Two major adventist bodies represent the movement today: the Advent Christian Church and the numerically predominant Seventh-day Adventists. They vary somewhat in their adherence to the adventist doctrines outlined above. Seventh-day Adventists have been traditionally identified as a cult among Christian churches—a classification that results from the contention by Christian theologians that the authority granted to White’s prophecies compromises the finality of scriptural revelation. They further charge that the doctrine of investigative judgment compromises the biblical doctrine of justification by faith alone and leads to an assurance of salvation based on perfect obedience rather than faith. In recent years, however, Seventh-day Adventist theologians tend to regard White’s prophecies as subject to judgment by the canonical Scriptures and have put forth a more evangelical understanding of justification by faith. As a result some evangelical leaders, although by no means all, have begun to include the Seventh-day Adventists within the pale of orthodoxy. This division of opinion as to the theological stance of the movement is echoed within the group itself by the intense theological debate of these issues in recent years.

The Seventh-day Adventist Church has experienced rapid growth in the post–World War II period. This church, however, still tends to keep to itself among Christian denominations. It has consistently kept the education of its children under its own auspices. The Adventists have been especially well known for their health-care ministries. Their traditional dietary concerns, including the proscription of coffee and tea and the advocacy of vegetarianism, predated by many decades other contemporary movements in these areas.

The emphasis on the events surrounding the return of Christ in the premillennial/fundamentalist movement and the contemporary stress upon the imminent second coming of Christ in evangelical churches in general show the continuing significance of general adventism in the Christian tradition.

M. E. DIETER

See also ANNIHILATIONISM; MILLENNIUM, VIEWS OF THE; SABBATARIANISM; SOUL SLEEP; WHITE, ELLEN GOULD.

Bibliography. P. G. Damsteegt, Foundations of the Seventh-day Adventist Message and Mission; M. F. Douty, Another Look at Seventh Day Adventism; L. E. Froom, Prophetic Faith of Our Fathers; G. R. Knight, Millennial Fever and the End of the World; G. Land, ed., Adventism in America; F. D. Nichol, Midnight Cry; R. L. Numbers and J. M. Butler, eds., Disappointed: Millerism and Millenarianism in the Nineteenth Century; G. Paxton, Shaking of Adventism, Seventh Day Adventists Answer Questions on Doctrine.

Advent of Christ. See VIRGIN BIRTH OF JESUS CHRIST; SECOND COMING OF CHRIST.

Advocate. See HOLY SPIRIT.

Aeon. See AGE, AGES.

Affliction. See PAIN.

Affusion. See BAPTISM, MODES OF.

African Theology. The term “African Theology” commonly refers to the lively conversation within the African Christian community that, beginning early in the 1960s and increasing unabated to the present, seeks to address the intellectual and theological issues which concern that community. This conversation has attracted interest and significance owing not least to the rapid growth of the Christian community in Africa, which is now the majority faith in large portions of the conti-ment and is apparently set to become a principal center of world Christianity.

The diversity of the Christian community in Africa and of its theological practitioners, has produced numerous divergent approaches to African Theology. This in turn makes the description and assessment that much more challenging. Thus Africa's influential university departments of religion have usually approached the theme in terms of establishing correlations between Christianity and Africa's traditional religions. Missiologists have worked more broadly on a correlation of Christianity with African culture as a whole, speaking in terms of an ethno-theology. Roman Catholic contributions have frequently introduced a philosophical note, seeking correlation with the implicit world views of traditional Africa. Ecumenists have pursued not a correlation of Christianity with Africa's past so much as an activation of the Christian community in shaping Africa's future, towards greater liberation and humanization. Church leaders and theological educators as often as not have assumed that African Theology denotes little more than providing traditional Christian theology with an African face, furnishing Christian truth with contextually sensitive illustrations and applications.

While all of these approaches doubtless have a measure of relevance, and together serve to enrich and enliven the common dialogue, perhaps none offers an adequate frame in which to assess the whole. The ongoing phenomenon of African Theology in the present day is probably best interpreted not in terms of one or more of these approaches but in terms of the patterns of modern African intellectual life. It is from within such a frame of reference that the history, dynamics, scope, and future direction of African Theology can perhaps best be recognized and assessed.

History. The distinguishable roots of the modern-day movement reach back more than a century to Henry Venn and others, who, attempting to establish appropriate objectives for the nineteenth-century European missionary movement, called for an indigenization of the Christian faith in mission lands. However poorly this was actualized in missionary endeavors in Africa, it nevertheless set in motion those values and prospects that rendered the core questions of African Theology inevitable. Thus the proto-Africanist Edward Blyden of Liberia utilized the very phrase "African theology" in 1897 in expressing his vision for Africa's future; the mission statesman Edwin Smith in 1936 produced a theological handbook with intentions entirely congruent with what is now designated as African Theology; and the Catholic father Placide Tempels set off a discussion of the implications of Africa's traditional religious "ontology" for Christian faith, with publication of his classic La Philosophie Bantoue in 1945.

The values of Venn, appropriated within nineteenth-century West African consciousness, have been recognized as an essential strand in the emergence at the beginning of the twentieth century of the political and cultural movement called Pan-Africanism, in which the expectations of Africa's educated elite increasingly merged with those of Africa's diaspora, in pursuit of the liberation of the continent from colonial rule and the emancipation of the African spirit from the domination of the colonial mindset. By mid-century, as the prospects for imminent independence seized the imagination of the continent, the movement was functioning vigorously on two fronts, the political and the cultural. The latter found expression especially in two consequential congresses, in Paris in 1956 and in Rome in 1959, through which it undertook to identify the scope of its intellectual agenda for Africa. Reflections published by a group of African Catholic priests attending the first congress attracted keen interest among their peers, and the second congress then incorporated into its program a subsection for African theologians. Stimulated by such events, a public debate was organized the following year at the influential Faculté de Théologie Catholique in Kinshasa, expressly on the validity of developing an "African Theology." The spirited debate, between the dean of the Faculté Alfred Vanneste and a leading student Tharcisse Tshibangu, was published that same year, 1960.

Meanwhile Protestant missionary thinking in the early decades of the twentieth century, still influenced by the vision of an indigenous African church, began to reflect more deliberately on the relevance of African culture. The positive valuation of African culture at the first Africa-wide conference of missions, held in Le Zoute, Belgium, led in due course to a greater emphasis on training African clergy. This resulted in turn in an evaluative survey of Protestant theological education in Africa, and the missionary scholar Bengt Sundkler was tasked to summarize its findings. When his pioneering study, Christian Ministry in Africa, appeared in 1960, it moved the reader beyond the issues of clergy formation and included an entire chapter entitled "Christian Theology in Africa."

When one traces back through the interactive links in the earliest phase of the African Theology movement, it becomes apparent that the conversation emerged as an articulate entity largely from these two precipitative events in 1960, the one from within Catholic Francophone Africa and derivative of the principal mid-century events of Africa's intellectual life, and the other from within Protestant Anglophone Africa and functioning at the cutting edge of the century-old quest for an effective indigenization of African Christianity.

African Theology

In the years immediately following the Kinshasa debate and Sundkler's seminal publication, the streams of reflection generated by these two events quickly coalesced. Especially through papers read at consultations and through articles published in journals, but also through several foundational monographs, the movement began to grope towards identity and definition. Among representative contributors in the earliest years were Harry Sawyerr of Sierra Leone, who in an article in 1963 first addressed the issues raised by Sundkler; Vincent Mulago of Congo/Zaire, the first African lecturer appointed to the Kinshasa faculty, who published his Un Visage Africain du Christianisme in 1965; and Bolaji Idowu of Nigeria, whose Towards an Indigenous Church also appeared in 1965. In 1966 a pioneering conference for African theologians held at Ibadan, Nigeria, resulted in the publication of one of the formative books of the movement, Biblical Revelation and African Beliefs (1969). Among the participants were Sawyerr, Mulago, and Idowu; and also the Kenyan scholar John Mbiti. Mbiti soon achieved a special status in the early movement with publication in successive years of African Religions and Philosophy (1969), Concepts of God in Africa (1970), and New Testament Eschatology in an African Background (1971). In subsequent years Mbiti continued to maintain a singularly distinguished, articulate, and prolific output.

In the 1970s the discussion rapidly expanded into multiple venues and divergent emphases, and by the 1980s a succession of monographs had begun to appear. Among the more prominent contributors from this period have been: Byang Kato, C. Nyamiti, J. Pobee, K. Dickson, T. Tiénou, J. M. Ela, J. Ukpong, Eboussi Boulaga, M. Oduoye, and J. Mugambi. In addition, the essential literature of African Theology now includes annotated bibliographies, collections of conference papers, readers in principal sources, and surveys of the literature.

As the diffuse outpourings continued, the conversation in the 1990s seemed if anything to gain in sophistication and depth, a fact perhaps most readily represented by two publications. In 1992 the Ghanaian scholar Kwame Bediako published his magisterial Theology and Identity, in which he compared the role of culture within second-century Christian thinking and within modern African Christian thinking, especially in the latter's quest for theological self-understanding. And in 1993 the British scholar Gordon Molyneux published his remarkable study African Christian Theology, which traced out in fascinating detail and critically assessed three very different manifestations of Christian "theologizing" in Africa. With such publications the African Theology movement has clearly reached a vigorous matu-riety. The highly varied conversations are now best tracked through ongoing bibliographic surveys such as those found in the Revue Africaine de Théologie (Congo/Zaire) and the International Review of Mission (Switzerland), and through the abstracts and reviews offered in journals such as Missionalia (South Africa) and BookNotes for Africa (Zambia).

Dynamics. While African Theology has significant links with earlier missionary thinking on "indigenization," in its essential characteristics and dynamics the movement is best construed as a phenomenon of modern African intellectual life. Studies of modern Africa concur that the central motifs of its intellectual life have revolved for more than a century around the one formative experience common to almost all parts of the continent, namely Africa's traumatic encounter with the West and its multifaceted response/reaction to that encounter. The imposition of colonial rule over most of the continent by the end of the nineteenth century meant for Africa a deprivation not only of political control but also of fundamental self-understanding. The old regime of political leadership and intelligentsia in traditional Africa was swept aside. The new intelligentsia emerging during the colonial period attained that status largely through superior achievement in Western education. It was principally this class, Africa's new educated elite, who then effectively organized the overthrow of western colonial domination and assumed the political and intellectual direction of the continent.

The modern Africa that resulted was therefore shaped to the needs and intentions of Africa's new educated elite, and Africa's intellectual life in the post-independence period has been representative of the preoccupations, commitments, anxieties, and values of this new class. Having superseded the old order of traditional Africa, and in open and successful conflict with a domineering West, they effectively evolved the new order of modern Africa. At the material level the new order sought above all African "development," a rapid modernization conceived largely along Western lines, in order to withstand and supersede Western economic and political dominance on the continent. At the ideological level the new order sought by every means to assert an African identity over against the West, while affirming its own identification with Africa's traditional heritage, in order to contest and overcome Western intellectual hegemony in Africa.

And thus the issue of African authenticity and self-reliance, the issue of African identity and selfhood, in combination with a comprehensive critique of the West and its role in Africa, has functioned as the principal dynamic of Africa's intellectual life in almost all fields of learning and expression in the latter part of the twentieth century. This has been true not only for literature and sociology, political science and anthropology, philosophy and history, but for theology as well. The characteristic preoccupations of African Theology, the implicit agenda, the necessary themes, even the rooted conflicts and discontinuities, have almost exactly matched the dynamics of the larger intellectual life of Africa.

This can be usefully recognized not least in the debate of a past generation between Négritude and African Marxism. Founded by Leopold Senghor and others in the 1930s, Négritude was a literary, cultural, and philosophical movement especially influential in the Francophone world, which attempted to address the “dilemma of the spirit” of Africa’s Westernized intelligentsia, their sense of inner alienation, dislocation, and loss of identity, by means of a sustained evocation and affirmation of African traditional values and culture. The two Pan-African congresses on African culture in the 1950s were direct derivatives of this movement. The most trenchant critiques of Négritude came from African Marxists (such as Franz Fanon in his Wretched of the Earth), who charged that the vision of Négritude would lead Africa up a dead-end alley. To accent traditional culture might satisfy the hunger of the modern African’s soul, but it could not bring effective change within the oppressive realities of colonial Africa. Only an ideology for the political liberation and radical social restructuring of the continent could serve the needs of Africa’s future.

This particular conflict in African intellectual life helps illuminate the development of African Theology. If a critical identity question functions at the heart of modern African intellectual life, then African Christianity has found itself faced with a doubly critical identity question. African political nationalism refused to differentiate between the coming of colonialism and the coming of Christianity to the continent; it became axiomatic to treat the two as one. Modern African consciousness therefore readily perceived African Christianity as an alien Western importation. Thus educated African Christians at the commencement of the independence era found themselves encumbered with a problematic identity. What could it possibly mean to be an African Christian? In what sense at all could “African Christianity” be construed as legitimately African?

Thus the agenda of the educated African Christian came to embrace not only Africa’s political and intellectual release from Western dominance, but also African Christianity’s release from Western missionary dominance. And if an affirmation of Africa’s traditional heritage had become a central function of African intellectual life, then a fresh appraisal of Africa’s religious heritage was also essential. Only by these means could the pressing demands of African Christian identity begin to be addressed, an authentically African Christianity be justified, and an acceptably authentic African Theology be achieved. Thus evolved, at first hesitantly but increasingly with assertive confidence, the twin foci of the earliest movement, namely (1) the attempt at a more responsible theological apprehension of African traditional culture—and especially of Africa’s indigenous religions, combined with (2) a sustained critique of the Western impact on Africa—and not least of the Western missionary role in Africa.

By the early 1970s a separate theological movement had made its appearance on the continent. The “Black Theology” movement of South Africa (distinct from the North American movement of the same name), sought theological resources for investing South African blacks with a sense of human dignity in the face of apartheid, and for empowering them to achieve social justice and liberation. Among the most prominent early spokesmen were Manas Buthelezi, Allan Boesak, and Desmond Tutu. Almost immediately the relationship between Black Theology and African Theology became a point of vigorous debate. To read the variant viewpoints is to read a theological replay of parts of the earlier debate between Négritude and Marxism. In effect Black Theology contended that African Theology, immersed in its devotion to Africa’s cultural past, had no effective word for Africa’s future. African Theology responded that Black Theology seemed to lack any effective word for Africa’s heart. Because the South African movement accorded much more readily with theological trends in the larger ecumenical movement after Uppsala (1968), and in particular with Liberation Theology in Latin America and Black Theology in North America, the venues of ecumenical action in the 1970s became a principal locus of efforts to “manage” the debate and to co-opt African Theology into a larger global agenda, principally achieved by asserting the complementarity of Black and African theologies.

While these assimilative efforts met with spirited resistance from some, including Mbiti, African theologians in general did not find it difficult to embrace the language of liberation theology if specifically referencing the ongoing Western economic and political exploitation of Africa. Whereas by the 1990s “Black Theology” scarcely remained a functioning movement, by then African Theology had largely accommodated a third fundamental focus, derived from its encounter with Black Theology but adjusted to its own inner dynamic, namely a political theology in support of the liberation of Africa from ongoing Western oppression. Generally speaking, the further south the theological discussion is in Africa the more this dimension is evident, and the further west the discussion occurs in Africa the less it is evident.

African Theology

Scope. The multiplicity of perspectives, agendas, and venues now represented in African Theology makes any thematic description problematic. Indeed most typologies of the movement thus far proposed tend to prove inadequate when tested against a sufficiently broad range of relevant contributions. Nevertheless certain dominant or recurrent themes do appear, and help clarify something of the inner demands and momentum of the movement.

Led by the university departments of religion, African Theology has generated considerable attention to African traditional religion, resulting in significant advances in that field. Not least a mindless Western denigration of African religion has been reversed, and the possibilities of a more responsible theological assessment implanted. Indeed some prominent theologians, including Mbiti and Bediako, have proposed that the acceptance of traditional religion as an effective praeparatio evangelica for African Christianity, and of African Christianity as an appropriate fulfillment of traditional religion, should be considered central to the enterprise of African Theology.

One potential shortcoming of such an approach noted almost from the beginning, especially by evangelical Africans, has been the persisting inclination both to disregard appropriate theological questions relating to syncretism, and to neglect the theological task of nurturing an identity for African Christianity that is not only African but also in some way distinguishably Christian. Similarly, although the normative character of scriptural revelation for any Christian theology has on occasion been affirmed by various African theologians, any sustained application of such a standard has been only rarely pursued within the literature. A second potential shortcoming of this approach has been highlighted by secular scholarship, which has increasingly charged African theologians with fundamentally misrepresenting African religion, by a habit of screening and “baptizing” the data in order to project a traditional religion that is compatible with Christianity. These two lines of critical challenge, placing in question central tendencies within the movement, will merit more responsible consideration if African Theology is to prove itself intellectually sustainable for the future.

African theologians serving in church leadership roles have been in the forefront, along with missiologists, of those tending to focus on African culture as a whole, not just on African religion, reflecting theologically on the necessary “contextualization” of Christianity within African culture. Catholic reflection has vigorously debated whether adaptation or incarnation is the more appropriate theological methodology, while one strand of Catholic reflection has also probed usefully into the underlying world-views or “implicit philosophies” of traditional Africa. Protestant reflection has often led the way in looking for points of contact between standard themes of Christian theology (such as revelation, sin, Christology, or eschatology) and those values, institutions, concepts, and symbols which underlie African culture. Church leadership participating in the theological discussion has tended to frame its reflection much more directly in terms of the pastoral and catechetical needs of the believing Christian community in Africa, especially as it is affected by traditional culture, for example with respect to rites of passage, polygamy, liturgical custom, divination, traditional healing, or the role of ancestors. The range and caliber of contributions called forth by African Theology as it has explored the interface between Christianity and African culture has been exceptionally fruitful.

Reflecting a rooted need to disentangle African Christianity from its immediate antecedents in order to achieve a separate indigenous identity, and echoing the standard perceptions of African nationalist ideology, African Theology has almost from the beginning also felt impelled to deploy a set critique of the missionary movement in Africa and its destructive impact on traditional values and culture. The charges have not been without cause; so much in the Western missionary effort in Africa has been demonstrably wrong and deserves to be exposed. At the same time it must be granted that a balanced judgment has not always been achieved, so that it has often fallen to the professional historians rather than the theologians to provide a more reliably nuanced appraisal of this complexly diverse movement (e.g., in the work of Adrian Hastings or of Lamin Sanneh). Nevertheless, African Theology has here been working from assumptions that are very widely shared within African consciousness, and if it has tended to echo rather than interrogate such assumptions, it is nevertheless reliably reflecting powerfully felt concerns that cannot be summarily sidestepped by academic findings. From a similar impulse the earlier concern for indigenization became transmuted into an insistent call for the independence of African churches from their sponsoring mission agencies, and even for a “moratorium” on continuing missionary presence. The requirements of autonomy have also directed much useful attention to that large body of African church groups founded solely by African initiative, the African Independent Churches, among whom African Theology has been eager to discover beliefs and practices representing a more authentically African sensitivity.

From the mid-1970s onward African Theology increasingly included a political theology of liberation as part of its agenda. Unlike Black Theology in South Africa, for the most part this has not attended to forces of oppression within Africa, but has rather addressed the Western political and economic exploitation of Africa. While African church leadership, especially in eastern and southern Africa and not least within Roman Catholic circles, has often found it necessary to speak against the injustice and repression practiced by various African governments since independence, little of this has been reflected in the theological discussion.

Evangelical participation within the African Theology movement began with Byang Kato of Nigeria, the first African to head the Association of Evangelicals in Africa. In his Theological Pitfalls in Africa (1975) Kato offered a critique of the incipient syncretism and universalism that he detected in the African Theology movement at that time. Kato called vigorously for a contextual theology attuned to the cultural realities of Africa, but he also affirmed the normative role of Scripture for authentic Christian theology in every context. He taught that traditional African belief contains authentic truth about God and prepares the African heart for the gospel, but he staunchly denied a salvific function for Africa's traditional religion. Regrettably, Kato's untimely death in 1975 prevented him from ever developing a positive theological expression in keeping with his call for an African Christianity that would be "both truly African and truly biblical."

Tokunboh Adeyemo of Nigeria subsequently contributed an important study on Salvation in African Tradition (1979, 1997); Richard Gehman's Doing African Christian Theology (1987) offers stimulating reflection on the task; and the textbook Biblical Christianity in African Perspective (1992, 1995) by Wilbur O'Donovan is now in wide use. Tite Tiénou of Burkina Faso would be a principal example of an African evangelical who has been regularly participating within the larger theological discussion, with a still growing corpus of articles and papers. His doctoral dissertation (1984), assessing methodologies in African Theology, argued plausibly that any appropriately contextual theology for Africa must find its defining matrix in the local African Christian community; and his Theological Task of the Church in Africa (1982, 1990) is a popular text in many African evangelical theological schools. Most other evangelical reflection on African Theology is to be found in journal articles, with the Africa Journal of Evangelical Theology (Kenya) serving as the principal forum.

African evangelicalism has managed to deploy a range of effective continental initiatives in theological education; but, with notable exceptions, the intention of Kato to foster a constructive critical evangelical participation within the larger discussion of African Theology has not been sustained. Only in the theological colleges does one discover a continuing interactive familiarity. Yet the average educated African evangelical would probably resonate with many of the themes and preoccupations of African Theology, even if he would expect to modify the answers given on these issues. On the whole it would seem that theological expression within African evangelicalism has yet to achieve an effective interaction with the intellectual and theological needs within its own community, and especially among its educated classes.

Future. The achievements of African intellectual endeavor in the decades since independence have been extraordinary. In multiple fields of inquiry and expression Africa has thrown off alien dominance and asserted its own energetic perspectives. Yet as a new century commences, the continent is increasingly gripped by a sense of disillusionment, of failed dreams and lost opportunities. As the African novelist Chinua Achebe has eloquently put it: "We have lost the 20th century; are we bent on seeing that our children also lose the 21st?" The urgent question now emerging among Africa's educated elite is whether the ideological underpinnings of Africa's post-independence era are sufficient for securing Africa's future. The collapse of a bipolar world order and the almost simultaneous collapse of South Africa's apartheid regime have marked a shift in basic circumstances for the continent, with a corresponding alteration in intellectual requirements. And the notion has begun to take form that whereas authenticity and self-reliance were essential in securing Africa's political and cultural independence in the twentieth century, these emphases are now proving themselves insufficient for preventing the marginalization of Africa within the emerging world order of the twenty-first century.

This intellectual transition accents one of the principal challenges facing African Theology. The constructive contributions of the movement in its first four decades have been immense. But as the credibility of Africa's post-independence ideology begins to erode, how will this movement fare which until now has so effectively tracked with the intellectual trends of its context? Can it surmount the limitations that have been inherent in that affinity, and restructure for the requirements of a new era? Africa did indeed need to reclaim its past and affirm its cultural heritage; but the Marxist critique was also not without point. Africa has also urgently needed the aid of critical reflection in coping with a modernity already pervasive within contemporary Africa, and in negotiating its future within the increasing interdependency of the world community. For these needs African Theology for the most part has had little to say. The affirmation and defense of the "otherness" of Africa has been essential, but it will likely prove insufficient for addressing either Africa's present crises or its future expectations.

African Theology

And if African Theology is to have a sustainable future, it will also need to give greater heed to responsible criticism of its more characteristic limitations. Such criticism may be resolved into two substantive judgments: (1) that African Theology has tended to misconstrue its foundational question; and (2) that African Theology has then generally attended to answering only half of the question it has framed.

In the nature of the case the defining matrix out of which a valid African Christian theology is to be constructed, and against which its achievements should be measured, is neither Africa's modern intellectual quest, nor Africa's cultural context, nor Africa's traditional religions, important as each of these may be. As Tiénou and others have proposed, the nature of the enterprise requires that the defining matrix should be the present Christian community of Africa, with the full range of its needs and expectations, its requirements and preoccupations. This allows for all the issues raised by the agenda of African Theology to date, but it suggests others as well, some of considerable consequence, including Africa's present and its future. To the extent that African Theology has formulated its fundamental task in terms of correlations with African culture, or with Africa's religious heritage, or with the preoccupations of the educated African, it has functioned from an inadequate axis. Its parameters should be construed to encompass the theological reflection required by the life of the contemporary African Christian community, as that community seeks to fulfill its calling under God within its context.

Within such a construal of the task, the issue of Christianity's correlation with its African context has been rightly taken as cardinal. But this ought to have been simultaneously recognized as only half of the foundational theological question of African Christian existence. As African evangelicals and others have argued, the equally essential issue for theological reflection is the correlation of African Christianity with its Christian heritage. For this purpose it is not enough to ask, as African Theology has rightly and insistently done, how may African Christianity become more authentically African? It must also insistently be asked how African Christianity may become ever more authentically Christian. Without the maintenance of such a double-frame for defining appropriate theological reflection, both the realities of human nature and the history of Christianity suggest that theological reflection can arrive all too readily at an over-realized contextualization, where the essential identity, purpose, and value of African Christianity for Africa has been lost.

Does then the remarkable movement of African Theology begun in the 1960s have a future? Yes. And also possibly no. The Christian community in Africa is so vibrant and prolific that an ongoing life, including theological reflection, is inevitable. Will that ongoing reflection be a continuation of the movement begun in the 1960s? Perhaps. But perhaps only if the movement now finds within itself a capacity to transcend the role it formulated for itself and the limitations that have characterized it during Africa's post-independence period. The lived realities of Africa's vigorous Christian community in the decades ahead will implicitly require this, and if the present movement does not adjust to meet these requirements, a new movement of African Christian reflection may supersede it, with inner dynamics more authentically tuned to contemporary African Christian realities and expectations.

W. P. BOWERS

Bibliography. K. Appiah-Kubi and S. Torres, eds., African Theology en Route; K. Bediako, Theology and Identity: The Impact of Culture upon Christian Thought in the Second Century and Modern Africa; P. Bowers, "Evangelical Theology in Africa: Byang Kato's Legacy" TJ 1:84-87; Them 5.3:33-34; K. Dickson and P. Ellingworth, eds., Biblical Revelation and African Beliefs; F. Eboussi Boulaga, Christianity without Fetishes: An African Critique and Recapture of Christianity; J. M. Ela, My Faith as an African; B. Kato, Biblical Christianity in Africa; J. Mbiti, Bible and Theology in African Christianity; K. G. Molyneux, African Christian Theology: The Quest for Selfhood; B. Moore, "Black Theology Revisited," Bulletin for Contextual Theology in Southern Africa 1:7-19; J. Mugambi, African Christian Theology: An Introduction; C. Nyamiti, Way to Christian Theology for Africa; M. Oduyoye, Hearing and Knowing: Theological Reflections on Christianity in Africa; J. Parratt, Reader in African Christian Theology; Reinventing Christianity: African Theology Today; J. Pobee, Towards an African Theology; H. Sawyerr, "The Basis of a Theology for Africa" IRM 52:266-78; M. Shaw, Kingdom of God in Africa; B. Sundkler, "Towards Christian Theology in Africa," Christian Ministry in Africa, 99-125; T. Tiénou, "Indigenous African Theologies: The Uphill Road," International Bulletin of Missionary Research 14.2:73-77; J. Ukpong, African Theologies Now: A Profile; J. Young, African Theology: A Critical Analysis and Annotated Bibliography.

Agape. See LOVE; LOVE FEAST.

Age, Ages. Old Testament Usage. The Hebrew word 'ôlām means a long indefinite period of time, whether past or future, whose limits are determined only by the context or the nature of the thing spoken of.

Undefined Past Time. Amos 9:11 foresees the restoration of the tabernacle of David as in "days of antiquity" (author's trans.). Events in history are referred to in Isaiah 63:9; Micah 7:14; Malachi 3:4. Jeremiah 5:15 speaks of "a nation of antiquity," Isaiah 58:12 of "ruins of antiquity," and Jeremiah 18:15 of "roads of antiquity." The expression from antiquity can refer to events in the indefinite past (Josh. 24:2; Jer. 2:20; Jer. 28:8).

It can also include the whole sweep of human history (Isa. 64:4; Joel 2:2).

The word is used of God's acts and relationships to Israel in the undefined past (Ps. 25:6; Isa. 63:16). It can also refer to the totality of God's dealings with humanity (Isa. 63:19); and it can also designate merely an indefinite time (Isa. 42:14). In Proverbs 8:23 it reaches to a point in time before the creation of the earth. The hills are called "everlasting" (Gen. 49:26), a reference to their antiquity and not to the eternity of matter.

These references show that the temporal determination of the word must be derived from its context. Therefore when it refers to God's existence, as in Psalm 93:2, "You are from everlasting," no point of beginning can be conceived, and the word takes on the idea of an eternity in the past (cf. the phrase God of antiquity in Gen. 21:33; Isa. 40:28; Jer. 10:10). When the idiom is applied to the messianic ruler in Micah 5:2, linguistically it can mean either his antiquity or his eternity. Context alone must decide.

Indefinite Future Time. The word 'ôlām means an indefinite reach of future time—for example, as long as humans will live (Deut. 15:17; 1 Kings 1:31; Ps. 61:7). The "eternity" of the earth (Pss. 104:5; 148:6) is only relative, for the earth is to be shaken in the final act of judgment and redemption (Hag. 2:6). An indeterminate future is seen in Isaiah 32:14; 1 Samuel 13:13; Ezekiel 25:15. Enduring without end are God's salvation (Isa. 51:6–8), his dwelling in Jerusalem (1 Chron. 23:25), his covenants (Gen 17:7; Isa. 55:3), the Mosaic institution (Exod. 27:21; 30:21; Lev. 3:17; 7:34; 10:9; Num. 10:8), the passover observance (Exod. 12:24), Solomon's temple (1 Kings 9:3; 2 Kings 21:7), the Holy City (Ps. 125:1), and Messiah's rule (Ps. 45:6; Isa. 9:7). That some of these institutions have passed away illustrates again that the precise meaning of the phrase is to be derived from its context.

When the phrase is applied to the existence of God, the full idea of eternity emerges (Deut. 32:40; Isa. 40:28; Dan. 12:7).

The plural ages is sometimes used to intensify the idea of an unending future: "everlasting salvation" (salvation of ages; Isa. 45:17), "everlasting righteousness" (Dan. 9:24), "everlasting rock" (Isa. 26:4), and "an everlasting kingdom" (a kingdom of all ages; Ps. 145:13).

Past and Future. The indefinite past and future, "from antiquity and unto futurity," are brought together, referring to the existence of God (Pss. 90:2; 106:48), God's love (Ps. 103:17), praise to God (Neh. 9:5), and the promise of the land of Israel (Jer. 7:7; 25:5).

New Testament Usage. Aiōn as Indefinite Time. The word aiōn, like 'ôlām, is used to mean an indeterminate period of time. The age of the prophets is "from the age," that is, from long ago (Luke 1:70; Acts 3:21). God's revelation to Israel was "from the age" (Acts 15:18), a phrase that in John 9:32 means from all past time. Jude 25 has a variant form, "before all the age," meaning before all time.

The expression unto the age occurs twenty-seven times in the NT. The precise meaning must be determined from the context. In Matthew 21:19; Mark 3:29; John 13:8; and 1 Corinthians 8:13 it means "never." In other contexts the idea of a future eternity is apparent (John 6:51, 58; 10:28; 11:26; 12:34; 14:16; 2 Cor. 9:9; Heb. 5:6; 6:20; 7:17, 21; 1 Pet. 1:25; 1 John 2:17; 2 John 2; Jude 13).

The plural ages is used to strengthen the idea of endlessness. (1) In the past: "before the ages" (1 Cor. 2:7) or "from the ages" (Eph. 3:9; Col. 1:26). In Ephesians 3:11 we have the "purpose of the ages," that is, God's eternal purpose. (2) In the future: "unto the ages" (Luke 1:33; Rom. 1:25; 9:5; 11:36; 2 Cor. 11:31; Heb. 13:8). Jude 25 reads "unto all the ages." The parallelism of ages and generations in Colossians 1:26 suggests that the plural form conveys the idea of a succession of many ages or generations, and this leads to the further thought that the ages are long but not unlimited periods of time.

The eternity of the future is further strengthened by doubling the form in both the singular ("unto the age of the age"; Heb. 1:8) and the plural ("unto the ages of the ages," an expression occurring twenty-one times, all in Paul or Revelation with the exception of Heb. 13:21; 1 Pet. 4:11; 5:11). A number of variant expressions are "unto all the generations of the age of the ages" (Eph. 3:21) and "unto the day of the age" (2 Pet. 3:18). The lordship of God over all time is seen in the expression "king of the ages" (1 Tim. 1:17; Rev. 15:3).

Aiōn as a Segment of Time. Theologically the most important usage of aiōn in the NT designates two distinct time periods: this age and the age to come. This structure provides the background for the eschatological character of the work of redemption. This idiom views redemptive history not as a series of unending ages but as two distinct and contrasting periods of time.

Several verses reflect this two-age structure without emphasizing it. Blasphemy against the Holy Spirit will never be forgiven in this age or in the age to come (Matt. 12:32). Christ is exalted above all authority both in this age and in the age to come (Eph. 1:21). Discipleship of Jesus, even though it brings its rewards, often involves the loss of possessions and family in this time, but it will mean eternal life in the age to come (Mark 10:29–30; Luke 18:28–30). This saying involves a slight variation in form: "time" (kairos) is substituted for "age" in the first member. This same idiom, "this time," is found in Romans 3:26; 8:18; 11:5; 2 Corinthians 8:14.

This age will come to its end with the parousia of Christ (Matt. 24:3). At the consummation of this age the Son of Man will send his angels to separate the wicked from the righteous (Matt. 13:39–42). The age to come will be the age of immortality in contrast to this age. “Those who are considered worthy of taking part in that age” will be “children of the resurrection” and will be like the angels in one aspect: they will no longer be subject to death (Luke 20:34–35).

The age to come is the age of eternal life (Mark 10:30), when the righteous will “shine like the sun in the kingdom of their Father” (Matt. 13:43). Mark 10:24, 30 equates the age to come with both eternal life and the kingdom of God; and in Matthew 25:34, 46 the righteous inherit the kingdom of God and enter into eternal life when the Son of Man comes in his glory (Matt. 25:31) at the end of this age (25:41).

The character of this age stands in sharp contrast to the coming age. It is evil (Gal. 1:4) because Satan is “the god of this age,” holding people in darkness (2 Cor. 4:4). This age stands in opposition to the kingdom of God, for, when the word of the kingdom is sown, “the care of the age” (literal trans.) tends to choke it so that it does not become fruitful (Matt. 13:22). Love for this age caused Demas to forsake Paul (2 Tim. 4:10). Paul describes those who live according to “the age of this world” in Ephesians 2:1–2 as dead in sins, children of disobedience following a satanic leading, pursuing the passions of the flesh and therefore under God’s wrath. The phrase the age of this world closely associates the temporal and the spatial realms. Indeed, the expression this world is a parallel expression (John 8:23; 9:39; 11:9; 1 Cor. 5:10; 7:31). The debater of this age and the wisdom of this world are both folly to God (1 Cor. 1:20; 2:6), for God can be known only by revelation, not by wisdom (1 Cor. 2:6). The rulers of this age who in ignorance crucified the Lord of glory are doomed to pass away (1 Cor. 2:6, 8). Some interpreters find in this verse a reference to the demonic hosts of “the God of this age,” but this is not proved.

In brief, this age is the period of Satan’s activity, of human rebellion, of sin and death; the age to come, introduced by the parousia of Christ, will be the age of eternal life and righteousness, when Satan is destroyed and evil swept from the earth.

This dualistic structure is shared by the NT with contemporary Judaism (4 Esdr. 6:7–9; 7:20–31); but both are derived from elements implicit in the OT, which sees the world, the scene of human existence, as in need of a miraculous transformation by the direct act of God before God’s people can enjoy the fullness of the redemptive blessings (Isa. 65:17–25).

At one important point, however, the NT stands apart from its Jewish environment: in Christ the blessings of the age to come have entered into this evil age. Jesus, who will come in glory as the Son of Man to inaugurate the age to come, has already appeared on earth in humility to bring to people in the midst of this evil age the life of the age to come. We already taste the powers of the coming age (Heb. 6:5). Through the death of Christ we are now delivered from this present evil age (Gal. 1:4). We are no longer to be conformed to this age but are to be transformed by an inner power (Rom. 12:2). It is possible that in 1 Corinthians 10:11 “upon whom the ends of the ages are come” (literal trans.) may refer to this overlapping of the two ages and mean that, while Christians live bodily in this age of sin and death, they live spiritually in the age of righteousness and life. This phrase, however, like “the consummation of the ages” in Hebrews 9:26, may mean that, in Christ, God’s purpose in the ages of redemptive history has been fulfilled. In any case, the NT does teach an overlapping of the ages. Therefore, eternal life, which belongs to the age to come (Matt. 25:46; Mark 10:30; John 12:25; Rom. 2:7), is a present possession (John 3:36; 6:47). Justification, which really means acquittal from guilt in the final judgment (Matt. 12:36–37; Rom. 8:33–34), is already accomplished (Rom. 3:24; 5:1). Salvation that belongs to the future (Rom. 13:11; 1 Pet. 1:5, 9) is also present (2 Cor. 6:2; Eph. 2:8). The kingdom of God that belongs to the age to come (Matt. 25:34; 1 Cor. 15:50) has invaded this age, bringing to humans its blessings in advance (Matt. 12:28; Luke 17:20; Rom. 14:17; Col. 1:13). In brief, the redemptive realities are eschatological; they are the blessings that belong to the age to come, but in Christ they have been given to believers who still live in this age. Christians live in two ages; they enjoy the powers of the age to come while living in the end of this age.

Aiōn as a Spatial Concept. Sometimes aiōn refers not so much to a period of time as to what fills the period. The creation of the ages in Hebrews 1:2 refers to all that fills the ages—the world. In Hebrews 11:3 “the ages” is further described by the phrase that which is seen—the visible world that fills the ages of time.

Since aiōn can bear spatial connotations, it can be used interchangeably with kosmos (world): compare “the coming world” (Heb. 2:5) and “the coming age” (Heb. 6:5), and “the wisdom of this world” (1 Cor. 1:20; 3:19) and the “wisdom of this age” (1 Cor. 2:6). Possibly the “care(s) of the age,” in Mark 4:19 and Matthew 13:22, is synonymous with the care for the things of the world in 1 Corinthians 7:33; and the assertion that God is the king of the ages (1 Tim. 1:17) means not only that he is Lord of time but of all that fills time.

Aiōn as a Person. In Hellenistic religion aiōn was used of semidivine beings standing between God and the world. Some scholars have found this meaning in the NT. Ephesians 2:2 is said to be the aiōn who rules over this world; while Colossians 1:26 and Ephesians 3:9 and 2:7 are said to refer to heavenly spirits from whom God concealed his redemptive purpose and over whom Christ is to triumph. This interpretation is highly improbable.

The biblical concept of "the ages" stands in contrast to the Greek idea of the time-eternity relationship, in which eternity is qualitatively other than time. Biblically, eternity is unending time. The future life has its setting in a new redeemed earth (Rom. 8:21; 2 Pet. 3:13) with resurrection bodies in the age to come. It is not deliverance from the realm of time and space but from sin and corruption. Revelation 10:6 does not mean that time is to end. G. E. LADD

See also ETERNITY; KINGDOM OF CHRIST, GOD, HEAVEN; SECOND COMING OF CHRIST; THIS AGE, THE AGE TO COME; TIME.

Bibliography. J. Barr, Biblical Words for Time; E. D. Burton, Epistle to the Galatians (ICC); O. Cullmann, Christ and Time; S. J. De Vries, Yesterday, Today and Tomorrow; J. Guhrt et al., NIDNTT 3:826–833; G. E. Ladd, "Eschatology and the Unity of New Testament Theology," ExpT 68:268–73; H. Sasse, TDNT 1:197–209; G. Vos, Pauline Eschatology.

Age, This. See THIS AGE, THE AGE TO COME.

Age of Accountability. A theme stemming from the dual biblical emphasis on the righteous judgment of God on all humankind and the personal responsibility of each individual to be ready for this divine encounter. Hence theologians often stress the necessity of personal decision in which the individual either accepts Christ and is redeemed (an initial freedom from condemnation) or continually decides for Christ in ethical living (a perseverance of Christlike character). In either case, the chief question centers on the extent of God's grace in view of human shortcoming and the time at which one is fully responsible. Therefore at the outset accountability is tied to one's ability to be responsible. The locus classicus for this theme is Romans 14:12: "Each of us will give an account of himself to God." Here, to halt divisions stemming from Christians judging one another, Paul reminds the church that an account will be demanded on all this human activity (cf. Rom. 1:20; 2:20; 2 Cor. 5:10).

The age of accountability is generally viewed as the chronological stage in life when a person is responsible for his or her conduct before God. This is not, however, a fixed age, but is relative depending on the growth of moral consciousness in the individual. Indicators for this development are often found in the ability to discern right and wrong: when the general premises of good and bad can be given specific application (Burroughs). More precisely, the individual should be able to reason from the universal ethical principle and reach a specific conclusion. Social or parental conditioning may often teach behavior that is only imitative, and stress must therefore always be laid on free moral choice. In biblical thought authentic freedom brings with it the knowledge of good and evil, and, essentially, the knowledge of God and the possibility of rejecting him. In any event, the divine demand for accountability lies behind the repeated biblical call for decision. G. M. BURGE

See also INFANT SALVATION.

Bibliography. A. Burroughs, NCE 12:118; D. Fyffe, Dictionary of Religion and Ethics 10:739–41; J. Stalker, ISBE 1:28–29.

Age of Mankind. See EVOLUTION; MANKIND, DOCTRINE OF.

Aging, Christian View of. Biblical Values. References to elderly persons and aging appear throughout the Bible. In Genesis, long life is viewed as normal and desirable; the aged are respected, but long life is not automatically equated with goodness, wisdom, or competence. The shortening of the lifespan to 120 years (Gen. 6:3) is charged to human evil, not to creation or human nature.

The Ten Commandments include respect for parents (Exod. 20:12; Deut. 5:16), and the Mosaic law commanded similar respect to all the elderly (Lev. 19:32). Some Christians interpret this and related passages (e.g., Eph. 6:1–3; 1 Tim. 5:3–16) to mean that the full responsibility for covering all the needs of the aged resides with their own children. Many, however, have no children or none with the capacity to care for their needs. About 6% of the elderly have never married, and one-tenth of those who did have not borne children. Even among those who have, the children may have died, become incapacitated, or be living under financial and physical disabilities of their own old age.

Everyone is aging and should recognize the brevity of life, spending the allotted years wisely as good stewards (Ps. 90). We should remember our Creator in the days of our youth before the "days of trouble" (Eccles. 12), but even the old can be born again (John 3:4). People who are properly related to God will still be fruitful in old age (Ps. 92:12–15). They will serve others to the very end of life on earth, reaping blessings for themselves and others as a result. Spiritual growth continues long after other losses and declines begin.

The royal law to love our neighbor as we love ourselves (James 2:8) summarizes the ethical teachings of Scripture pertinent to all ages, but this is not a one-way relationship. "It is more blessed to give than to receive" (Acts 20:35), so we must encourage the elderly to share in the joy that comes from giving to others by helping them discover opportunities for service. Biblical ethics imply that Christians should work with the aging, not merely provide services for or to them. Doing for others whatever we would want them to do for us (Matt. 7:12) similarly requires respect for their individual uniquenesses, autonomy, interdependencies, and abilities. No single approach to all elderly people is valid; providing alternatives enables each older person to choose what best fits personal desires and needs.

Ministries with and for the Aging. The range of potential and actual services to the aging by churches is extremely broad. Besides ministries that serve all ages, church-sponsored housing and nursing-care facilities help to meet needs at various levels of care, an expanding range of home-care services is also desirable. Most gerontologists recommend that people be helped to remain in their own homes as long as possible, both to promote their sense of well-being and to reduce overall economic costs. Volunteer services and exchanges of labor can help to meet this need. A daily telephone reassurance call and regular assistance with housework, laundry, bathing, home maintenance, and transportation to necessary out-of-the-home services can extend the years during which many are capable of residing at home.

Senior-citizen programs help to meet many physical, material, educational, social, psychological, and spiritual needs when they are wisely planned and directed. They also give older persons the opportunity to serve others. Day-care services can provide for the daytime needs of dependent older persons while household members are at work or school. Churches can supplement public social-service programs and in the process provide older persons with the opportunity to help others, thus helping themselves.

Careful examination of the circumstances of the aging in one's community will often reveal basic problems in social institutions. Whether these pertain to inequities and injustices in Social Security rules and regulations; the limitations of Medicare; administration of service programs, nursing homes, or federal policies, they ought to be addressed by Christians who, like Jesus, care about the whole person. Jesus' concern was for people individually and collectively, thus for both personal needs and structural problems of society (Matt. 9:36).

An expanding body of published literature and numerous agencies provide educational services, advice, and other assistance to church-related programs with and for the aging. Most large denominations provide materials. Local social-service agencies can be helpful. Several theological schools provide resources to help churches and pastors.

The elderly should be remembered in all church ministries, including evangelism. They are an important asset. Their presence is a living witness to God's faithfulness. Their prayers provide important support to the pastor and other leaders. The active service of the "young old" can significantly enlarge the scope of church ministries. As their spiritual needs are met, they in turn minister to the needs of others. D. O. MOBERG

Bibliography. H. B. Brotman, Every Ninth American; W. M. Clements, ed., Ministry with the Aging; D. F. Clingan, Aging Persons in the Community of Faith; T. C. Cook Jr. and D. L. McGinty, eds., Spiritual and Ethical Values and National Policy on Aging; C. B. Freeman, Senior Adult Years; R. M. Gray and D. O. Moberg, Church and the Older Person; S. Hiltner, ed., Toward a Theology of Aging; C. LeFevre and P. LeFevre, eds., Aging and the Human Spirit; J. M. Mason, Fourth Generation; R. W. McClellan, Claiming a Frontier: Ministry and Older People; D. O. Moberg, Spiritual Well-Being: Background and Issues; T. R. Smith, In Favor of Growing Older; F. Stagg, Bible Speaks on Aging; J. A. Thorson and T. C. Cook Jr., eds., Spiritual Well-Being of the Elderly; C. W. Tilberg, ed., Fullness of Life.

Agnosticism. A term generally used for the view that we do not know either in practice or in principle whether there is a God. Although etymologically the term is applicable to any kind of skepticism, T. H. Huxley coined the term in 1869 to signify religious skepticism. He first used the word at a meeting of what later became the Metaphysical Society, although there are conflicting accounts of how he came to use the term. He said that he used the word as antithetical to the Gnostics of early church history. Agnosticism is to be contrasted with atheism and pantheism, as well as theism and Christianity. The theist asserts God's existence, the atheist denies it, while the agnostic professes ignorance about it, the existence of God being an insoluble problem for him. R. H. Hutton remembered the origin of the term as related to the reference that Paul made to the inscription on the altar to the unknown God (Acts 17:23).

Agnosticism is now used in a number of senses: (1) as the suspension of judgment on all ultimate issues, including God, free will, immortality; (2) to describe a secular attitude toward life, such as the belief that God is irrelevant to the life of modern humans; (3) to express an emotionally charged anti-Christian and anticlerical attitude; or (4) as a term roughly synonymous with atheism.

While Huxley has been credited with giving the term its present popularity, there were many historical antecedents. Socrates in Plato's Republic is praised by the Delphi oracle as the wisest man in the world because he was aware of what he did know and what he did not know. By far the most important and immediate precursors of modern agnosticism were David Hume and Immanuel Kant. In Enquiry concerning Human Understanding, Hume examines the notion of a “cause” and argues that one cannot know the cause of anything a priori. The idea of a cause arises primarily from the constant conjunction of two objects or things. Moreover, Hume rejects the possibility of belief in miracles. Such a belief is based upon testimony. The testimony for a miracle is always counterbalanced by the universal testimony to the regularity of the natural law. In Dialogues concerning Natural Religion, Hume thoroughly criticizes the argument from design. Two of his most important points are that the order observable in the universe may be the result of a principle inherent in matter itself rather than external to it and imposed upon it, and that the argument can never establish the moral attributes of God because of the widespread presence of evil in the world.

Concerned with the limits of human knowledge, Kant argues that we cannot have any knowledge of things that are not possible objects of experience. Since God is not a possible object of our experience, we have no knowledge of him based upon pure reason. There may be practical reasons for believing in God, but classical theistic proofs were in principle doomed to failure.

Thus, by the end of the nineteenth century there were a number of factors that contributed to the intellectual respectability of agnosticism. The limits of human knowledge had been widely set at the limits of sense experience. Further, it was generally accepted that natural theology had failed, leading to a critical attitude toward standards of evidence and argument in religious matters. Religious beliefs could not meet the rigorous standards applied to scientific beliefs. Moreover, the physical sciences seemed to be at odds with biblical history and cosmology. Finally, questions were being raised about the divine government of the world. John Stuart Mill, for instance, argued that the world was poorly made and arbitrarily managed. The goodness of God was questioned since he was the creator of hell.

In the present intellectual climate agnosticism has taken a somewhat different form in the English-speaking world. Many logical positivists and analytic philosophers argue that the problem with theism is not one of evidence or argument, but of meaning and logical coherence. If religious discourse is understood as quasi-scientific statements about the nature of reality and a transcendent being, insoluble problems arise. “God exists” and “God loves me” should be understood as meaningless about reality. That is, there is nothing in sense experience that will count for or against their truth.

Many who reject theism and Christianity prefer to characterize themselves as agnostics rather than atheists. The perceived advantages are twofold. First, agnosticism avoids the social stigma associated with atheism. Second, agnosticism at least appears to avoid the burden of proof. To assert or deny anything requires a reason. The profession of ignorance, however, needs no reasons.

While there may be a certain intellectual respectability to embracing agnosticism, William James points out there is great practical danger. He notes that there are some questions that are live, momentous, and forced. One must believe or disbelieve, even if the evidence is ambiguous, or risk great loss. For James, the question of God’s existence is such a question. For Christians, however, the evidence for God’s existence and the truth of Christianity is decisively decided in God’s self-revelation in the Bible and the incarnation of Jesus Christ.

P. D. FEINBERG

See also GOD, ARGUMENTS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF; PASCAL’S WAGER.

Bibliography. R. A. Armstrong, Agnosticism and Theism in the Nineteenth Century; J. Collins, God in Modern Philosophy; R. Flint, Agnosticism; T. H. Huxley, “Agnosticism” and “Agnosticism and Christianity,” in Collected Essays; J. Pieper, Belief and Faith; H. G. Wood, Belief and Unbelief Since 1850.

Agricola, Johann (ca. 1494–1566). Theologian, pastor, and teacher, Johann Agricola (family name Schneider or Schnitter) was born in Eisleben more than a decade after Martin Luther. Agricola went to Wittenberg in 1515 to study with Luther and remained there for ten years. He was with Luther when he posted his Ninety-five Theses in 1517 and when he burned the papal bull of excommunication in 1520. He served as Luther’s secretary at the Leipzig debate in 1519. Agricola was sent by Luther to help reform Frankfurt in 1525, but later that year he returned to Eisleben, where he became pastor and schoolmaster. In 1536 Luther invited him back to Wittenberg to teach theology. He signed the Smalcald Articles in 1537 and helped formulate the Augsburg Interim in 1548.

During his second Wittenberg period, Agricola became the eye of the storm over what was to become the first major theological dispute in the Lutheran movement—the so-called antinomian controversy. This bitter dispute can be partly attributed to Agricola’s prickly personality, which, at various times over the years, put him at odds with Philip Melancthon, Johannes Bugenhagen, and Justus Jonas. Moreover, his general carelessness, presumptuousness, and stubbornness in dealing with the theological issues compounded the problem. But the main cause of the conflict was a difference between Agricola and Luther over the proper relationship between the law and the gospel.

Agricola, Johann

The antinomian controversy lasted intermittently from 1537 to 1540 when, just ahead of a heresy trial, Agricola hastily left Wittenberg to become court preacher for the elector Joachim II of Brandenburg. Agricola argued that people were sufficiently motivated by hearing of Christ's sacrifice for their sins and that the preaching of the law was unnecessary and perhaps even harmful. Luther responded that although the severity of Christ's sacrifice indeed demonstrated the enormity of human sin, the law still needed to be preached forcefully and people still had to be convicted of their sin by the law.

After Agricola and Luther had written several works defending their own views and attacking those of the other, and after at least three different recantations by Agricola, a permanent settlement of the dispute still could not be effected. Even though, in retrospect, Agricola's position does not appear to have been as extreme as Luther believed, and even though Agricola finally returned to what most judged to be complete orthodoxy, Luther to his dying day never forgave him. Agricola died convinced that Luther had merely misunderstood him.

R. D. LINDER

See also ANTINOMIANISM; LUTHER, MARTIN.

Bibliography. H. T. Kampuri, Dialogue between Neighbors: The Theological Conversations between the Evangelical-Lutheran Church of Finland and the Russian Orthodox Church; P. Toon, "Agricola, Johann Schneider," Who's Who in Christian History, 7-8.

À Kempis, Thomas. See THOMAS À KEMPIS.

Albertus Magnus (1193-1280). Dominican scholar, theologian, and churchman. A Swabian of noble birth, he became a monk (1223) and taught in convents in Germany from 1228 to 1240. He attended the University of Paris and taught there from 1245 to 1248. His most famous student was Thomas Aquinas. In 1248 he returned to Cologne to establish a new course of studies for his order. Later he served as head of the German province of the Dominicans and became bishop of Regensburg (1260-62). After retiring from administrative duties he spent his time as a teacher, writer, and controversialist.

The dominant intellectual of his age, Albert lived at a time when the scientific works of Aristotle, along with the comments on them by Islamic scholars, were being translated and studied in the universities of Europe. He was the first to master this material, sharing his understanding in many of the twenty-one massive volumes that he wrote, including a commentary on the Sentences of Peter Lombard and commentaries on the Major and Minor Prophets, Job, and the Gospels. The most significant of his works were his explanation of Aristotle's scientific writings and his attempt to harmonize theology and philosophy in the Summa Theologiae. His scientific studies dealt with physics, psychology, geography, mineralogy, botany, zoology, and life processes in general. Differing from many medieval writers, he did not comment on each line of Aristotle but rather paraphrased the text and added digressions based on his own observations. Albert's other major interest, a synthesis between Aristotle's philosophy and Christianity, was not as successful as was the work of Aquinas, but he did begin the defense of the integrity of both the realm of revelation and the realm of reason. He believed that secular knowledge must be acquired so that one may relate it to faith and that Christians can never learn too much about philosophy or science. He clearly taught, however, that knowledge in the ultimate sense cannot contradict divine revelation.

Albert lived during the "Golden Age of Scholasticism," and despite an enormously busy and varied life he mastered the knowledge available at his time to a greater extent than any of his contemporaries. In a sense he was a unique man, observing nature as well as reading books and constantly trying to fit the details into a coherent scheme. His scientific interest led to accusations that he was a miracle worker in touch with supernatural power. His impressive learning resulted in posterity rewarding him with the title of "the great," a term generally reserved for military conquerors.

R. G. CLOUSE

See also SCHOLASTICISM.

Bibliography. S. M. Albert, Albert the Great; É. Gilson, History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages; F. J. Kovach and R. W. Shahan, Albert the Great; T. M. Schwertner, St. Albert the Great; J. A. Weisheipl, ed., Albertus Magnus and the Sciences.

Albigenses. See CATHARI.

Alcohol, Drinking of. A number of chemical compounds are classified under the rubric of alcohol, but only one can be utilized as a beverage ingredient—ethyl alcohol (ethanol). This is both an energy source (one gram yields seven calories when metabolized) and a drug that affects the central nervous system and depresses sensory functions. On a personal level, the desired effects of alcoholic drinks are a sense of euphoria; easing of tension, stress, and worry; general elevation of spirits; and on the social level, the relaxation of barriers among people and promoting good fellowship within a group. But when alcohol is imbibed excessively, intoxication or "drunkenness" results. This involves impairment of speech and motor control, outbursts of aggressive behavior, and finally unconsciousness. Alcoholism goes beyond mere drunkenness and is a condition in which an individual's uncontrollable dependence upon alcohol interferes significantly with physical and mental health, interpersonal relations, and social and economic functions. Specialists in the treatment of alcoholism agree that if the addiction pattern is not reversed, it leads to serious medical complications, even insanity or death, but they are divided as to whether its underlying causes are primarily physical in nature (a disease or genetic factors that render one incapable of drinking in moderation) or moral and psychological (sin or personality disorders).

Alcoholic Drinks. Since the dawn of history people have produced alcoholic beverages by utilizing a process of yeast enzyme fermentation that converts plant sugars into ethyl alcohol. Mead (fermented honey) was used in ancient India and Greece, beer (brewed from barley or other cereals) was produced in Egypt and the Greco-Roman world, and pulque (a beer from the maguey plant) was common in pre-Columbian America. However, by far the best-known alcoholic beverage in antiquity was wine. Viniculture was practiced throughout the Mediterranean world and the more temperate areas of Europe and Asia, and European emigrants have taken it to other parts of the world in modern times. The process involves crushing grapes to obtain juice, fermentation of the juice, and storing the wine properly so as to allow for its maturation while preventing spoilage. The earliest recorded instance of wine usage is found in the Bible (Noah's inebriation, Gen. 9:21), and both Testaments contain an abundance of references to wine-making procedures.

Fermented beverages, whether made from grapes, cereals, or a wide range of other plants, have a fairly low ethanol content, at most 14%, but even before the Christian era the Chinese developed a means of distilling rice wine, which significantly increased the alcohol proportion. Around A.D. 800 this was replicated by an Arab chemist and called al-kuhul, from which comes our word alcohol. The process was utilized by medieval European priests and physicians to produce brandies and liqueurs from a fruit base for medicinal purposes and as dessert wines. Brandies were gradually supplanted in importance by more potent distilled drinks such as whiskey, gin, and rum, which were made from a grain or sugar base and possessed an ethanol content ranging upward to 50% or 60%. At one time these were commonly referred to as "spirits," but the term is out of vogue today.

Public Concern about Alcohol. Drinking has been a matter of public concern for thousands of years. Through the centuries, beginning with the Code of Hammurabi (ca. 1800 B.C.), rules have limited the number of drinking establishments, regulated tavern operations, restricted the availability of drink to certain classes of people, and curbed the quantities and types of beverages that could be sold. Neither Judaism nor Christianity requires abstinence, unlike Buddhism and Islam, but Christians in particular have from time to time confronted the evils of excessive drinking. Some medieval religious orders required abstinence, and the sixteenth century saw the appearance of the first temperance societies to combat drunkenness. The amount of alcoholism resulting from the wide distribution of distilled drinks and their ready availability to the lower classes in the later eighteenth and the nineteenth centuries led to the formation of numerous temperance organizations in North America, Britain, and Europe. While most of them called only for moderation or nonuse of distilled drinks, the movement for total abstinence by Christians quickly gathered steam. Temperance forces in the United States utilized the techniques of modern pressure politics to secure the enactment of national legislation prohibiting the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages, but this highly controversial measure was repealed in 1933 after fourteen years of bitter controversy. Since then the level of alcohol abuse has risen dramatically in most Western and Communist-bloc nations and has reached crisis proportions in some places. Fortunately, considerable attention is now being placed on the scientific study of alcoholism and alcohol education.

Strong Drink in the Bible. The only alcoholic beverage identified by name in the Bible is wine (in the OT yayin and tîrôš; in the LXX and NT oinos). Another Hebrew word, šĕkār, is translated "strong drink" in the KJV and "beer" in the NIV. No evidence whatsoever exists to support the notion that the wine mentioned in the Bible was unfermented grape juice. When juice is referred to, it is not called wine (Gen. 40:11). Nor can "new wine" (tîrôš or gleukos) mean unfermented juice, because the process of chemical change begins almost immediately after pressing. The new wine mentioned in Acts 2:13 must have been fermented, because nearly eight months had passed since the last grape harvest. The term correctly signifies the wine made from the first drippings, which had a higher sugar content before fermentation and therefore was stronger. In the Bible wine is wine, not grape juice.

Wine was used symbolically in the OT as a token of God's blessing and was acceptable to him when offered on the altar (Exod. 29:40). Metaphorically, it represented something good that he had prepared for those who received it (Prov. 9:5; Isa. 55:1). Jesus performed his first miracle at Cana by changing water to wine (John 2:1-11), illustrated a point by referring to the current practice of putting new wine in new wineskins (Mark 2:22), was caricatured by his enemies as a tippler (Matt. 11:19; Luke 7:34), and at the Last Supper instituted the Communion service, which included drinking a cup of wine in remembrance of his shed blood (Matt. 26:27–29; Mark 14:23–25; Luke 22:20; 1 Cor. 11:25–26). Wine gladdened the heart (Ps. 104:15), refreshed those caught in what seemed to be hopeless situations (Prov. 31:6), and possessed medicinal value (1 Tim. 5:23).

Alcohol, Drinking of

At the same time, its use was fraught with peril. It befuddled the mind (Isa. 28:7), prevented rulers from acting wisely in their roles as lawmakers and judges (Prov. 31:4–5), caused sorrow and quarreling (23:29–35), and led to outright humiliation, as the drunken behavior of Noah and Lot illustrates (Gen. 9:21; 19:30–38). It was called a mocker that led one astray (Prov. 20:1) and destroyed understanding (Hos. 4:11). The whore of Babylon made the inhabitants of the earth drunk with the wine of her adulteries (Rev. 17:2).

Drunkenness and Temperance. The Scriptures are unequivocal in condemning the immoderate use of strong drink. Followers of Christ are commanded not to get drunk on wine but to be filled with the Holy Spirit (Eph. 5:18), and they should not even associate with those who call themselves Christians but are drunkards (1 Cor. 5:11). Drunkenness is an act originating from one's fleshly or sinful nature (Gal. 5:21), is labeled a deed of darkness (Rom. 13:12–13), and is a deterrent to inheriting the kingdom of God (1 Cor. 6:10). People who are appointed to leadership positions in the church must not imbibe excessively (1 Tim. 3:3, 8; Titus 1:7; 2:3). The biblical abhorrence of drunkenness can best be seen in the vivid description of the destructive impact alcoholism has on a person (Prov. 23:29–35).

The biblical norm is temperance, a term that means self-control and moderation in all of one's behavior, not total abstinence from alcoholic beverage (Gal. 5:23; Titus 2:2; 2 Pet. 1:6). There are several examples of abstinence in the Bible, but these are special cases and not normative. Priests were not to drink before they entered the tabernacle to minister (Lev. 10:9). The Nazirite vow prohibited drinking, but this included all contact with grapes as well, and it was to be for a specific period of time (Num. 6:3–5). The Rechabite clan adopted abstinence as part of their program of rejecting a settled agricultural existence in order to follow a nomadic life like that of the people of Israel in the wilderness and thereby prophetically demonstrate faithful living with God (Jer. 35). Daniel and his friends rejected not only the wine offered by Nebuchadnezzar but also the fine food, and they prospered because of the total effect of a more austere but nutritious diet (Dan. 1:8–16). The abstinence of John the Baptist reflected his prenatal selection to become a prophet and the ascetic lifestyle that accompanied this calling (Luke 1:15).

Paul teaches that strong Christians ought not to have problems with food and drink, but at the same time they should be considerate of the tender conscience of the "weak" Christian. If one's indulgence might cause this person to stumble spiritually, it is better to abstain. Biblical temperance requires considered restraint in one's drinking practices and abstinence, if necessary, to shore up the faith of weaker Christian (Rom. 14; 1 Cor. 8). To be sure, Christian liberty permits one to abstain or to partake in moderation, but total abstainers are not justified in holding up their practice as the more biblical, virtuous, or spiritual of the two. Drunkenness, however, is inimical to a healthy Christian life and clearly must be proscribed by the church to its members. R. V. PIERARD

Bibliography. S. Bacchiocchi, Wine in the Bible; J. S. Blocker Jr., Alcohol, Reform, and Society; B. S. Easton, ISBE 5:3086–88; D. M. Edwards, ISBE 2:879–81; J. A. Ewing and B. A. Rouse, Drinking: Alcohol in American Society; J. F. Ross, IDB 4:448, 849–52; R. S. Shore and J. M. Luce, To Your Health: The Pleasures, Problems, and Politics of Alcohol; J. F. Sutherland, HERE 5:94–100.

Alcuin (ca. 735–804). Outstanding Christian scholar and educator during the reign of Charlemagne. Born in England, Alcuin received his education at the noted Cathedral School in York, of which he later became head. While on a trip to Rome in 781 he met Charlemagne; the following year he accepted the Frankish monarch's invitation to become head of a school attached to the imperial court. Charlemagne, as part of his policy of encouraging a renaissance of culture in his realm, was committed to elevating the educational standards of his kingdom, especially among the clergy. He gathered a number of scholars around him to assist in this program, of whom Alcuin was the most outstanding. Alcuin became a trusted adviser to Charlemagne, and under his direction many schools were founded. In 796 Alcuin became abbot of the Monastery of St. Martin of Tours, which under his leadership became an important center of medieval scholarship. He continued to act as adviser to Charlemagne in promoting learning until his death. He had little interest in the politics of Charlemagne's reign and generally confined his advice to non-political matters.

Although Alcuin was said to be gentle in spirit, he played a significant role in several theological controversies. He vigorously defended the traditional Christology of the church against the adoptionism of the Spanish theologians Elipandus of Toledo and Felix of Urgel, and he was the main influence at the Synod of Aachen, where Felix recanted his heretical views. A prolific writer, Alcuin wrote a number of biblical commentaries, theological treatises, hymns, poems, and several biographies of important ecclesiastical figures. Of special significance was his leadership of a group of scholars who revised the text of the Latin Vulgate Bible, making use of the most reliable manuscripts available. He was also responsible for the development of the Carolingian minuscule script, the forerunner of Roman typefaces. Some of his liturgical innovations have had a lasting impact on Roman Catholic worship.

Although Alcuin remained in Charlemagne's favor until his death, he opposed the latter's use of force in converting conquered peoples to Christianity and insisted that adult candidates for baptism should be thoroughly instructed in the Christian faith.

J. N. AKERS

Bibliography. E. S. Duckett, Alcuin, Friend of Charlemagne, His World and His Work.

Alexander, Archibald (1772–1851). First professor at Princeton Theological Seminary and progenitor of the “Princeton Theology,” which held sway at the institution for over a century. Alexander came to the seminary in 1812 after service as an itinerant evangelist in his native Virginia, as president of Hampden-Sidney College (1796–1807), and as pastor of Philadelphia's Pine Street Presbyterian Church (1807–12). His successors in Princeton's chair of theology—Charles Hodge, Archibald Alexander Hodge, and B. B. Warfield—expanded, clarified, and deepened the major themes of his thought but did not go measurably beyond them. The Bible—as interpreted by the Reformed theology of the Westminster standards, the orthodox Protestant theologians of seventeenth-century Europe, and the principles of Scottish commonsense philosophy—was the indispensable standard for teaching and practice. Human reason was a powerful tool for demonstrating the validity of Scripture and exegesis its meaning. Religious experience under the direction of the Holy Spirit was crucial to spiritual life but should never be allowed to drift into “enthusiasm.” Alexander was not as substantial an exegete as Charles Hodge nor as skillful in polemics against New England and other forms of Arminianism; he was not as effective a popularizer as A. A. Hodge; and he was not as careful a reasoner as Warfield. Yet perhaps because of the scope of his earlier experience, he possessed more personal warmth and often displayed more insight into the human condition than his erudite successors.

M. A. NOLL

See also PRINCETON THEOLOGY, OLD.

Bibliography. A. Alexander, Evidences of the Authenticity, Inspiration, and Canonical Authority of the Holy Scriptures; Thoughts on Religious Experience; J. W. Alexander, Life of Archibald Alexander; W. A. Hoffecker, Piety and the Princeton Theologians: Archibald Alexander, Charles Hodge, and Benjamin Warfield; J. A. MacKay, “Archibald Alexander (1772–1851): Founding Father,” in Sons of the Prophets, H. T. Kerr, ed.; M. Noll, ed., Princeton Theology, 1812–1921.

Alexander of Hales (ca. 1170–1245). Born at Hales Owen, in Shropshire, England, Alexander studied at the University of Paris, where he became a master of theology in 1221 and began to teach that same year. In 1236 he joined the Franciscan Order of Friars, which had been founded in 1209, but he did not give up his teaching position until 1241. His importance in the history of theology is threefold. First, he began the association of the Franciscan Order with the universities and academic theology, hitherto neglected by the order. Second, early in his teaching career he replaced the custom of lecturing on the Bible with lectures on the Sentences of Peter Lombard, which became the standard textbook on the subject and on which he wrote a commentary. Third, though rooted in the Augustinian tradition, he recognized something of the importance for the theological study of the recently discovered Aristotelian philosophy, and he attempted to come to terms with it in his theological expositions. Though his work in this area was fragmentary, he paved the way for the assimilation of Aristotelianism into Christian theology by, for example, Thomas Aquinas. The Summa Theologica traditionally associated with Alexander's name has been shown to be only partly of his authorship, since it incorporates material from others, such as his pupil Bonaventure.

N. V. HOPE

Bibliography. É. Gilson, History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages; M. C. Wass, Infinite God and the Summa Fratris Alexandri.

Alexandrian Theology. It is probable that Christianity came to Alexandria in apostolic times, though the tradition that it was first brought by John Mark cannot be verified. The indications are that Christianity was well established in middle Egypt by A.D. 150 and that Alexandria was its port of entry and supporting base.

Clement of Alexandria became head of the Catechetical School about 190. A philosopher throughout his life, Clement saw Greek philosophy as a preparation for Christ, even as a witness to divine truth. Plato was a cherished guide. Sin is grounded in human free will. Enlightenment by the Logos brings humans to knowledge, which results in right decisions. These draw people toward God until they are assimilated to God (Stromata 4.23). Christians live by love, free from passion, their lives being a constant prayer. Clement set forth this pattern in minute detail in the Paedagogos. He took an optimistic view of the future of all people, but knowledge would be rewarded in the world to come. An allegorical exegesis of Scripture supported these views.

Around 202 Clement was succeeded in the Catechetical School by the much abler Origen. A biblical student and exegete of great ability, Origen produced the Hexapla text of the OT and wrote commentaries, scholia, or homilies on all the biblical books based on three senses of Scripture: the literal, moral, and allegorical. The Bible was inspired, useful, true in every letter, but the literal interpretation was not necessarily the correct one. Although indebted like Clement to the Greeks, Origen was not as admiringly dependent upon them. His conception was of a great spiritual universe, presided over by a beneficent, wise, and personal being. Alexandrian Christology made its beginnings with Origen. Through an eternal generation of the Son (i.e., the Logos), God communicates himself from all eternity. There is a moral, volitional unity between the Father and the Son, but an essential unity is questionable. The world of sense provides the theater of redemption for fallen creatures, who range from angels through humans to demons. By the incarnation the Logos becomes the mediator of redemption. He took to himself a human soul in a union that was a henōsis. It is, therefore, proper to say that the Son of God was born an infant, that he died (De principiis 2.6.2–3). By teaching, by example, by offering himself a propitiatory victim to God, by paying the devil a ransom, Christ saves humans, who gradually free themselves from the earthy by meditation, abstinence, and a vision of God. A purging fire may be needed in the process. Although this world is neither the first nor the last of a series, there will ultimately come the restoration of all things. Flesh and matter will disappear, only spirit will remain, and God will be all in all. How long human freedom will retain the power of producing another catastrophe is not clear, but ultimately all will be confirmed in goodness by the power of God's love.

Alexandrian Theology

After Origen's departure from Alexandria his disciples diverged. One group tended to deny the eternal generation of the Logos. Bishop Dionysius of Alexandria (247–65) sympathized with this party and declared the Logos to be a creation of the Father, but the future in Alexandria belonged to the opposite wing, which emphasized the divine attributes of the Logos. The Sabellian party was strong in Cyrenaica and Libya, and this influence affected Alexandria. When the presbyter Arius began, perhaps about 317, to proclaim that the Logos was a creation in time, differing from the Father in being, he attracted disciples, but Bishop Alexander opposed Arius. When Emperor Constantine found it impossible to restore harmony by exhortation and influence, he called for a general meeting of bishops. The resulting Council of Nicaea in 325 was attended by an Alexandrian delegation that included the deacon Athanasius. For the remaining years of his life Athanasius was to champion the Nicene conclusion that the Son was homoousios (same in substance, consubstantial) with the Father. The adoption of this term in spite of its checkered Gnostic and Sabellian background was a work of providential genius.

In 328 Athanasius succeeded Alexander as bishop of Alexandria. In spite of some dictatorial tendencies, he possessed a superb combination of successful administrator and great theological insight. From this time on, Alexandria vigorously emphasized the identity in being of the Father and the Son. In his On the Incarnation of the Logos, Athanasius presented the indispensability of the union of true God and true human for the Christian doctrine of salvation through the life and death of Christ. The Savior must be wholly God and wholly human. Through many false charges and five periods of exile, Athanasius maintained his insistence upon one God, Father and Son of the same substance, and the church as the institute of salvation, not subject to the interference of the civil state. Athanasius also set forth the view that the Spirit is homoousios likewise with the Father and the Son, thus preparing the way for the formula mia ousia, tres hypostases (one essence, three hypostases).

That Christ need not be wholly divine and wholly human was a view that Apollinaris of Laodicea did not succeed in fastening upon Alexandria in spite of his efforts in that direction. His view that the pneuma (spirit) of the Logos replaced the human spirit was rejected. His emphasis upon the unity of the personality of Christ, however, became increasingly an Alexandrian emphasis and was strongly stressed by Cyril, who became bishop in 412. The Logos took a full human nature upon himself, but the result was henōsis physikē (natural unity), and Cyril loved the formula mia physis (one nature), even though originally ek duo (from two). The incarnation was to the end of salvation. God became human that we might become God, an assertion that Cyril supported by allegorical exposition of the Scripture of both Testaments, especially the Pentateuch. The phenomenal allegory of the facts is designed to yield the noumenal meaning. His most famous writing is his series of twelve anathemas against Nestorius, attacking what appeared to him to be denials of the unity and full deity of Christ and of the crucifixion and resurrection of the Word. In 433 Cyril accepted, with the Antioch leaders, a profession of faith that declared that a unity of the two natures of Christ had come into existence (henōsis gegonē), and as a description of the Virgin Mary he used the term for which Cyril had so vigorously contended against Nestorius, theotokos.

Dioscurus continued the Cyrillian emphasis on unity in the person of Christ but pushed it to an extreme. At the Council of Chalcedon (451) the Alexandrian radicals suffered defeat with the adoption in the Chalcedonian Definition of the phrase en dyo physeis (in two natures). The final Alexandrian tendencies produced schism after Chalcedon. The great bulk of Egyptian Christendom rejected Chalcedon and became monophysite. Only a temporary enthusiasm in Alexandria, monothelitism ended with the arrival of Islamic rule.

The Alexandrian school with its Platonic emphasis was the popular school of its time. In its more moderate form it set the christological pattern for many centuries. The love of allegorical interpretation was characteristic. The intervention of the divine in the temporal was stressed, and the union of the natures of Christ with overriding emphasis on the divine component was dangerously accented.

P. WOOLLEY

See also ATHANASIUS; CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA; CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA; LOGOS; MONARCHIANISM; MONOPHYSITISM; MONOTHELITISM; ORIGEN.

Bibliography. C. Bigg, Christian Platonists of Alexandria; R. P. C. Hanson, Allegory and Event; E. R. Hardy, ed., Christology of the Later Fathers (LCC 3); E. R. Hardy Jr., Christian Egypt; E. Molland, Conception of the Gospel in the Alexandrian Theology; E. F. Osborn, Philosophy of Clement of Alexandria; J. E. L. Oulton and H. Chadwick, eds., Alexandrian Christianity; A. Robertson, Select Writings and Letters of Athanasius (NPNF 2d series, vol. 4); R. V. Sellers, Two Ancient Christologies; C. T. Waldrop, Karl Barth's Christology: Its Basic Alexandrian Character.

Allegorical Sense of Scripture. See INTERPRETATION OF THE BIBLE.

Allegory. An oral or literary device that attempts to express immaterial truths in pictorial forms. Allegory usually occurs as an extended metaphor in narrative form; examples can be found in both the OT (e.g., Ps. 80: Israel as a vine from Egypt) and NT (John 10:11–16: Jesus as the Good Shepherd). The device employs a point-for-point comparison between the intangibles under discussion and specified representations, which are recognizable to the intended audience. For this reason knowledge of the text's cultural milieu is indispensable to a proper interpretation of the device. In Scripture the use of allegory is either specifically indicated (Gal. 4:21–31) or is identified clearly through the context (Prov. 5:15–20).

The literary use of allegory should be distinguished from the method of interpretation known as "allegorizing." This method is characterized by a search for a deeper meaning in the literal statements of a text that is not readily apparent in the text itself. The method often indicates more of the thought patterns of the interpreter than those of the original author.

Historically, allegorizing originated in Greece (sixth century B.C.), and entered Christian use through such notables as Origen, Jerome, and Augustine. Their use of the method developed into an accepted fourfold interpretive approach to Scripture: (1) literal, (2) allegorical, (3) moral (typological), and (4) anagogical. This approach lasted throughout the Middle Ages, only to be questioned by Aquinas, deemphasized by Nicholas of Lyra, and totally rejected by the Reformers. Emanuel Swedenborg's writings in the eighteenth century provide a more contemporary example of this method.

S. E. MCCLELLAND

See also INTERPRETATION OF THE BIBLE; TYPE, TYPOLOGY.

Bibliography. D. C. Allen, Mysteriously Meant: The Rediscovery of Pagan Symbolism and Allegorical Interpretation in the Renaissance; C. S. Lewis, Allegory of Love; J. MacQueen, Allegory: The Critical Idiom; A. B. Mickelsen, Interpreting the Bible; H. A. Wolfson, Philo; J. Wood, Interpretation of the Bible.

Alleine, Joseph (1634–1668). Puritan preacher and writer, representative of the many who came up through the state church system in England and later defected from it. His experience also points up that generally during early modern times in Western Christendom state churches were maintained, and dissenters from them were not dealt with kindly.

Alleine was born in Devizes, Wiltshire, and was born again in 1645 when his eldest brother, Edward, a minister, died at the age of twenty-seven. He begged his father to be educated to succeed his brother in the ministry, and in 1649 entered Lincoln College, Oxford. Two years later he gained a scholarship at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and graduated in 1653. At the university he came under the influence of John Owen and other outstanding Puritans. Resisting numerous opportunities to serve in state offices, in 1654 he accepted the invitation to be assistant to George Newton, the outstanding minister of St. Mary Magdalene in Taunton. In 1662 both he and Newton, along with two thousand others, were ejected from the established church under the Clarendon Code, which sought to remove from the ministry and government all who did not subscribe to the liturgy and doctrines of the Church of England. Alleine and John Wesley, grandfather of John and Charles, carried on an itinerant evangelistic ministry, for which he was fined and cast into prison (May 26, 1663) and treated with great indignity. After a year in jail he was released and more zealously propagated the gospel. When he was imprisoned again for sixty days in 1665, his confinement aggravated a developing disorder and he died on November 16, 1668.

Alleine is said to rank with Richard Baxter as the most affectionately cherished of all Puritans. He is best known for his Alarm to the Unconverted, which sold twenty thousand copies on its appearance in 1672; three years later it sold fifty thousand when it was republished as Sure Guide to Heaven. Often reprinted, it influenced George

Alleine, Joseph

Whitefield and Charles Spurgeon. Also a thoughtful scientific experimentalist and observer, Alleine wrote Theologia Philosophica (now lost) and other works. H. F. VOS

Bibliography. N. Simons, Life and Death of That Excellent Minister of Christ, Mr. Joseph Alleine; C. Stanford, Joseph Alleine.

Alleluia, Alleluiah. See HALLELUJAH.

Allen, Richard (1760–1831). Richard Allen, black clergyman and founding bishop of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, was born into slavery in Philadelphia on February 14, 1760. When Richard was young, he and his family were sold to Mr. Stokeley, whose plantation was near Dover, Delaware.

Richard was converted in 1777 through the preaching of a Methodist circuit rider, Freeborn Garrettson. Richard's brother was also converted and their changed lives eventually led to the conversion of their master. Mr. Stokeley was impressed by Allen and allowed him to purchase his freedom.

At age twenty-two he was licensed to preach. He worked at different jobs to help support himself while preaching throughout the Middle Atlantic states. He traveled with different Methodist preachers including Francis Asbury, Richard Watcoat, and Thomas Coke. Allen was present at the historic Christmas Conference in Baltimore in 1784 when the Methodist Church was officially organized on American soil.

He returned to Philadelphia for a short preaching engagement in February 1786 and ended up staying permanently. Allen joined St. George's Methodist Episcopal Church, where he taught classes for adults and conducted prayer meetings. His ministry attracted numerous blacks to the church and resulted in increased racial tension and formal segregation of seating and communion.

This racial discrimination caused Allen and the other blacks to leave the church in protest. Soon thereafter, Allen and Jones founded the Free African Society, America's first organization established by blacks for blacks. On July 29, 1794, Bethel, the first Methodist church for blacks, was dedicated by Bishop Francis Asbury. In 1799 Allen was ordained a Methodist minister and became the pastor.

Allen was always grateful to the Methodist Church for its "plain and simple gospel which even the unlearned can understand." He denounced slavery in his "An Address to Those Who Keep Slaves and Approve the Practice," arguing that slavery is "hateful" in the sight of God.

On April 9, 1816, Allen invited leaders of several black churches to Philadelphia for a meeting. They organized the African Methodist Episcopal Church and elected Allen the Church's founding bishop. When he died on March 26, 1831, the denomination had increased in size more than sevenfold. T. K. BEOUGHER

Bibliography. R. Allen, Life, Experience and Gospel Labors of the Rt. Rev. Richard Allen; C. V. R. George, Segregated Sabbaths: Richard Allen and the Emergence of Independent Black Churches, 1760–1840.

Alloiosis. See ZWINGLI, ULRICH.

All Saints Day. From early times the church commemorated its great leaders and heroes, especially those who had suffered martyrdom, by observing the dates of their death. This gave rise to the sanctoral section of the liturgical calendar, and it was customary for those churches whose members had included great Christians or martyrs to gather for a Communion service at the martyr's tomb, which was sometimes used as a Communion table. At a later stage, churches were built over these sites, and thus began the practice of dedicating churches in honor of specific saints.

Because there were other Christians whose faith and service (and even martyrdom) went unrecorded, and because some centers of the church gained more martyrs than could be commemorated in the days of the year, the practice of a general commemoration on All Saints Day developed. Originally celebrated on May 13, this festival was transferred in 835 to November 1, and medieval ideas of purgatory led to the following day being observed as All Souls Day, when the souls in purgatory were remembered.

At the Reformation the latter festival was dropped. Reformed churches use All Saints Day to thank God for the faithful departed.

D. H. WHEATON

See also CHRISTIAN YEAR; HALLOWEEN.

Bibliography. ODCC 36; M. Perham, Communion of Saints; J. D. Witvliet, Complete Library of Christian Worship 5:476–78.

Almighty. See GOD, NAMES OF.

Alms, Almsgiving. Acts of personal charity have always played a major role among the people of God. They are not simply an obligation but stem from the mercy God himself has already exhibited. Thus the term for alms, eleēmosynē (thirteen times in the NT), comes from the word group for mercy (eleos). Alms are benevolent acts of mercy that compassionately meet the needs of the poor.

In the OT one is struck with the common standard of living in the Israelite towns, especially before the monarchy. Generosity to the poor was strongly commended (Deut. 15:7–11; Ps. 112:9). But to ensure a comprehensive system of welfare, the OT established various institutions to provide for the needy: the law stipulated that arable lands, vineyards, and orchards were to be left fallow every seventh year “for the poor” (Exod. 23:10–11); every third year a tithe of the land’s produce was to go to the poor (Deut. 14:28–29); the poor could eat their fill as they passed through a neighbor’s vineyard or field (Deut. 23:24–25); and at harvest the gleanings, borders, and corners of fields were to be left for the poor (Lev. 19:9–10).

The prophetic disdain for the acquisition of riches should be seen as a result of the growing aristocracy in the later years of the monarchy and the widespread poverty resulting from foreign conquests (especially the exile). Amos typically derides those who “trample the needy” (8:4–8), and Isaiah scorns the denial of justice to the poor, especially by landowners and judges (5:8–10; 10:1–3). In Isaiah 58 Judah’s sins in neglecting its alms are carefully listed.

In the intertestamental period Judaism focused so much attention on almsgiving that charity took on a salvific and atoning value. “Righteousness” (Heb. šedeq) came to mean almsgiving, as the LXX translation attests (cf. the textual variant in Matt. 6:1: dikaioσynē vs. eleēmosynē) and as the Apocrypha affirms: “Water extinguishes a blazing fire; so almsgiving atones for sin” (Sir. 3:30). Rabbinic teaching stressed three principles: (1) Generous almsgiving was incumbent on all, even the poor. A popular story told of two sheep who wanted to swim across a river. One sheep gave its wool and crossed without harm. The other kept its wool and drowned. Almsgiving was the virtue of the righteous. (2) But generosity was to have limits. The rabbis were well aware that imprudent giving could produce poverty for the giver. Thus the Mishnah stipulated a limit of 20 percent from anyone’s earnings. (3) Acts of charity should protect the honor of the recipient. This checked the attitude of the giver and even provided for a “secret chamber” in the temple where the poor of good family could find aid without notice.

In Jesus’ day an impressive system of welfare tended the poor. In addition to the OT legislation, synagogues filled “poor chests” each sabbath, a daily “poor bowl” circulated with food, and a weekly “poor basket” brought food and clothing to the needy. Jesus affirmed this activity completely (Matt. 6:1–4; John 13:29) and commended liberality in almsgiving (Matt. 5:42; Luke 6:38). The stories of Zacchaeus (Luke 19:1–10) and the rich young ruler (Matt. 19:16–22) no doubt illustrate Jesus’ attitude to those who had severely abused the Jewish system. But at the same time Jesus cautioned against almsgiving for the sake of recognition (Matt. 6:2–3) and taught that alms of any sort could never be substituted for authentic spiritual piety (Matt. 5:23–24; Luke 11:41; 12:33).

It seems clear that the generous almsgiving of Judaism provided the impetus for the communal lifestyle of the early Christian church. Possessions were sold and the proceeds distributed (Acts 2:42–47; 4:32–33). Ananias and Sapphira were no doubt examples of false participation (5:1–11), and Acts 6 describes an administrative adjustment to the distribution of aid. Again, charity was one hallmark of righteousness, as seen in Tabitha (9:36) and Cornelius (10:2). Paul participated actively in almsgiving with his aid to Jerusalem (11:27–30) and the collection during his third missionary journey.

For Paul, an important theological connection existed between the mercy shown by God (Eph. 2:4–9; Titus 3:5) and the mercy surrounding almsgiving: believers should pass on the mercy they have received (Rom. 12:1; 2 Cor. 4:1). In contrast, being without mercy (aneleēmonas) in Romans 1:29–32 represents the full negation of God. James similarly exhorts the believer to be “full of mercy and good fruit” (3:17; cf. Heb. 13:16) because to reject this is to invite the merciless judgment of God on oneself (James 2:13).

As a rule the early church continued to grow in the postapostolic era as a body sharing its wealth, serving the poor, and remaining suspicious of riches. Didache 1:6 remarks, “To every one that asks of you, give, and ask not back; for the Father desires that gifts be given to all from his own bounties.” In Didache 15:4 almsgiving is listed with prayer as Christian responsibility. Second Clement 16:4 makes the remarkable assertion, “Almsgiving therefore is a good thing, even as repentance from sin. Fasting is better than prayer, but almsgiving than both . . . for almsgiving lifts off the burden of sin.” As the church entered the mainstream of society, it wrestled with the questions of private property and the spiritual value of charity (see Clement of Alexandria, Rich Man’s Salvation, and Cyprian of Carthage, On Good Works and Almsgiving) and quickly affirmed both. However, wealth remained suspect, and those who were prosperous were obliged to take the lead in social reform. In all events, almsgiving retained the theological center found in Paul: the Christian must imitate God, who himself has taken the initiative in expressing unlimited charity and mercy. G. M. BURGE

Bibliography. R. Bultmann, TDNT 2:477–87; G. H. Davies, IDB 1:87–88; R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel; H. H. Esser, NIDNTT 2:594–98; M. Hengel, Property and Riches in the Early Church; J. Jeremias, Jerusalem in the Time of Jesus; D. M. Lloyd-Jones, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount; R. Schnackenburg, Moral Teaching of the New Testament.

Alpha and Omega. The rendering of the Greek expression to alpha kai to o, found in three places in the NT (Rev. 1:8; 21:6; 22:13). It is also found in the Textus Receptus of Revelation 1:11, but modern scholarship largely regards this occurrence as not genuine.

Alpha and Omega

In this phrase there is probably a reference to the Jewish employment of the first and last letters of the Hebrew alphabet to indicate the totality of a thing. "The symbol $\aleph\omega$ was regarded as including the intermediate letters, and stood for totality; and thus it fitly represented the Shekinah" (H. B. Swete, Apocalypse of St. John, 10). It is a natural transition to the thought of eternity when the expression is related to time.

The expression is essentially the same as Isaiah's words, "I am the first and I am the last; apart from me there is no God" (44:6). Thus it is a claim that the one to whom it refers is the Eternal One.

The expression in Revelation 1:8, as is clear from the explanatory phrases that modify the subject, refers to the eternity and omnipotence of the Lord God. In 21:6 it is further defined by the words "the beginning and the end," and in 22:13 by the words "the first and the last." The thought conveyed in the second and third occurrences is the same.

In patristic and later literature the expression referred to the Son. It seems clear, however, that the first two occurrences refer to the Father (1:8; 21:6), while the third properly refers to the Son. On its last occurrence (22:13) Swete remarks, "The phrase is applicable in many senses, but perhaps it is used here with special reference to our Lord's place in human history. As creation owed its beginning to the Word of God, so in His incarnate glory He will bring it to its consummation by the great Award" (307). S. L. JOHNSON JR.

See also GOD, DOCTRINE OF; GOD, NAMES OF.

Altar. Hebrew mizbēah (place of slaughter or sacrifice); Greek bōmos (elevated place; only in Acts 17:23; frequently used in the LXX to translate mizbēah) and thysiastrōn (place of sacrifice).

In the Old Testament. Materials and Forms. The OT shows two basic types of altars. The first had no prescribed shape and could be constructed of earth or stones. This type of altar generally had a nonpriestly or lay use. The second type had a prescribed form and was made of either wood and bronze or wood and gold. The two altars associated with the tabernacle and its priestly service (and that of its temple successors) followed definite patterns and were constructed by skilled craft workers.

Uses and Functions. Altars could be put to legitimate or illegitimate uses. In the latter category were those of Israel's heathen neighbors (Exod. 34:13–16; Deut. 7:5–6; Judg. 6:25–32). Israel's worship was to be entirely separate from that of heathens and faithful to the one true God who had revealed himself to them and the patriarchs. Unfortunately, Israel was all too prone to ignore these prohibitions and become involved with heathen gods, sacrifices, and altars (Num. 25:1–5; Judg. 6:25, 30; 1 Kings 12:32; 16:32; 22:43; 2 Kings 16:4, 10–16; Hos. 8:11; 11:2; Amos 3:14). Elijah complained that Israel had torn down God's altars and killed his prophets (1 Kings 19:10), and later Jehu and Josiah both destroyed the altars of Baal (2 Kings 10:18–28; 2 Chron. 34:1–7).

But altars just as clearly had a legitimate function. In fact, the Sinaitic regulations concerning altars were intended to preserve their legitimate functions distinct from the illegitimate ones. When we think of the lawful uses of altars we think first of the symbolism of ascending prayers, as with the altar of incense (Exod. 39:38; 40:5; cf. Rev. 8:3–5), or of substitutionary atonement, as with the offering of the ram in the place of Isaac on Mount Moriah (Gen. 22:1–3). But altars and their sacrifices could have other significances. The first reference to an altar in Scripture is to the one built by Noah (Gen. 8:20); the context seems to suggest that Noah's sacrifices on the altar were an expression of thanksgiving for deliverance from the flood.

Abraham built altars at Shechem, Bethel-Ai, and Hebron (Gen. 12:7–8; 13:18); they were associated with his worship of God and claiming the land God had promised to him and his descendants (cf. Gen. 26:23–25). Moses built an altar as a memorial (Exod. 17:14–16); and when Israel affirmed the covenant with God, Moses built an altar at the foot of Mount Sinai and sacrificed on it, apparently in affirmation of the covenant (Exod. 24:4–8).

Nonpriestly and Priestly Altars. That altars could be built and used by individuals other than the tabernacle priests is self-evident from the above discussion. There was no priesthood prior to Sinai, yet altars were built and used in the worship of God by the patriarchs. God told Moses to instruct the people of Israel concerning the proper construction and use of such "lay altars" (Exod. 20:24–26). That they continued to be built is clear from Joshua 8:30–35; Judges 6:24; 21:4; 1 Samuel 14:35; and 2 Samuel 24:25.

But at Mount Sinai God also revealed to Moses the specifications for two altars associated with the tabernacle and the priestly ministry. The bronze altar or altar of burnt offerings was 7.5 feet square, 4.5 feet tall, made of acacia wood covered with bronze, and had horns on the four top corners. It was constructed in a manner so that it could be carried. When set up it stood between the entrance to the courtyard and the door of the tabernacle. The animal and grain offerings were made here (Exod. 27:1–8; 31:2–5, 9; 38:1–7; 40:6, 29). Sacrifices offered here (Lev. 1–7) signified that atonement for sin was necessary before one could enter the presence of God.

The second altar was the gold altar or altar of incense. It was 18 inches square, 3 feet high, made of acacia wood covered with gold, and had four horns on the top corners. It too was constructed so it could be carried. It was probably situated just before the curtain separating the Holy Place from the Holy of Holies (Exod. 40:26; but cf. Heb. 9:4). On the gold altar the high priest offered incense morning and evening, and once a year the high priest applied atoning blood to its horns (Exod. 30:1–10; 40:5, 26–27). The smoke of incense arising and filling the tabernacle signified offered prayer (cf. Rev. 8:3).

It is not known what happened to either altars of the tabernacle. But Solomon provided the temple with counterparts of the two tabernacle altars. The new bronze altar was larger (30 feet square and 15 feet high; 2 Chron. 4:1), but little is known of the new gold altar except that it was made of cedar overlaid with gold (1 Kings 6:20–22). The returned exiles presumably restored both altars in the second temple (Ezra 3:3; cf. 1 Macc. 1:21, 54; 4:44–49). Later, counterparts of the two altars were found in Herod's temple (Matt. 5:23–24; 23:18–20; Luke 1:11).

Ezekiel, the exilic prophet, had a vision of a rebuilt temple (Ezek. 40–44). An altar of burnt offering is described in some detail, its dimensions differing from earlier altars (43:13–17); but there is no mention of an altar of incense, unless that is the intended reference of 41:22. Some interpreters feel the vision was intended to focus the attention of the exiles on God's renewed dealings with Israel in a rebuilt Jerusalem and temple. Others see a fulfillment of Ezekiel's vision in a still future millennial temple and sacrificial ritual. Opponents of this view argue that a resumption of animal sacrifices is unthinkable in view of the fulfillment of the typological significance by Christ's work on the cross (cf. esp. the Epistle to the Hebrews). But proponents of the view argue that such sacrifices would have commemorative significance and in principle be no different from the present observance of the Lord's Supper. It is a difficult question and is intertwined with many other considerations involving ecclesiology and eschatology.

In the New Testament. Most NT references to altars are to the altars in Herod's temple (see above). But there are also references to the altar of incense in the heavenly temple (Rev. 6:9; 8:3–5; 9:13; 14:18; 16:7). It is significant that in the heavenly temple there is apparently no altar of burnt offering, for atonement is complete. But the prayers of the saints like the sweet incense of the gold altar will always rise to God and be a pleasure to him.

Some theological traditions (in particular Eastern Orthodoxy, Roman Catholicism, High Church Anglicanism, and highly liturgical Protestant churches) consider the reference to "altar" in Hebrews 13:10 to be a reference to the Communion table. This interpretation hardly fits the context of Hebrews in that in this case one material thing would be substituted for another, which would undermine the previous argument of the letter. Hebrews 13:10 is better understood as a reference to the cross as the altar on which Christ was offered. Since these same theological traditions regard the Communion table as an altar, it is natural that they consider the "table of the Lord" (1 Cor. 10:21) to be synonymous with the Christian altar.

In Church History. Beginning with the early second century, the understanding of what happened in the Lord's Supper became ever more literalistic. At first the bread and wine were considered in some figurative sense to be an offering of the body and blood of Christ. This view gradually evolved over a period of centuries in a more literal direction, so that the offering of bread and wine was eventually considered to be quite literally the sacrificial offering of the body and blood of Christ by priests. It came to be called, even at a very early date, the "sacrifice of the altar," and this trend finally culminated in the Roman Catholic doctrines of transubstantiation and the sacrifice of the Mass. Concomitant with these developments was the evolution of the Communion table from a simple house table on which the bread and wine were served to an altar on which Christ was in some sense offered. The more literally the elements were thought to be Christ, the more literally the table was considered to be an altar. Christian altars have always taken the tabular form, although there was a development from wood to metal and stone materials.

This perception of the Communion table as an altar came to prevail in both Eastern Orthodoxy and Roman Catholicism. However, even Protestant traditions that stress the "real presence" of Christ in the elements are likely to speak of the Communion table as an altar. As such, it is the focal point of worship in the Communion service and in congregational prayers, praise, thanksgiving, and the offering of gifts. Traditions that understand the elements in more symbolic and/or spiritual terms (i.e., a spiritual presence) are more likely to speak simply of "the Lord's table."

Churches within the revivalist Protestant tradition have still another use of the term "altar." In those groups that stress the importance of public confession of Christ or public dedication of one's life to Christ, there is an "altar call" at the conclusion of most public services. At this time people are invited to come forward and sacrificially offer themselves to God (at the altar). In such cases the so-called altar is a rail, a bench, or simply the front row of seats. In fact, in some cases the altar may be only a manner of speaking, not identified with a particular object. In the revival-ist tradition the altar is no longer the place where Christ is offered. It does not refer to the Communion table at all. It refers to the place where individuals offer themselves to God. S. N. GUNDRY

Altar

See also LORD'S SUPPER; LORD'S SUPPER, VIEWS OF; OFFERINGS AND SACRIFICES IN BIBLE TIMES.

Bibliography. J. Bodensieck, ed., Encyclopedia of the Lutheran Church; R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel: Its Life and Institutions; E. H. Klotsche, History of Christian Doctrine; B. Lohse, Short History of Christian Doctrine; A. Mazar, Archaeology of the Land of the Bible; S. M. Paul and W. G. Dever, Biblical Archaeology; C. E. Pocknee, Christian Altar; K.-D. Schunk TDOT 2:139-45; H. Wolf, TWOT 1:233-35.

Althaus, Paul (1888–1966). German Lutheran theologian. Born in Obershagen, near Hannover, he was the son of Paul Althaus Sr., also a well-known theologian. Chief influences on his thought were his father, Carl Strange, and Adolf Schlatter. He taught at the universities of Göttingen (1914–20), Rostock (1920–25), and Erlangen (1925–66). In 1926 he succeeded Karl Holl as president of the Luthergesellschaft (Luther Society), where he remained as a major figure for the rest of his active life. He was cofounder of the Zeitschrift für systematische Theologie (Journal of Systematic Theology).

Althaus focused his attention on eschatology (Die letzten Dinge [The Last Things], 1922), Christian political theory (Religiös Sozialismus [Religious Socialism], 1921), Luther's doctrine of justification by faith (Paulus und Luther über den Menschen [Paul and Luther Concerning Mankind], 1938; Die Theologie Martin Luthers [The Theology of Martin Luther], 1962), the relationship between fact and faith in the church's proclamation of Jesus (Die sogenannte Kerygma und der historische Jesus [The So-Called Kerygma and the Historical Jesus], 1958), and, above all, Christian ethics (Grundriss der Ethik [The Foundation of Ethics], 1931; Die Ethik Martin Luthers [The Ethics of Martin Luther], 1965). He was critical of both Karl Barth (for his rejection of natural theology) and Rudolf Bultmann (for his denial of the essential link between faith and history in the kerygma). His image as a church leader was severely compromised by his involvement in the German National Party, which entered into a coalition with the National Socialist Party (Nazi) and helped to bring Hitler to power. Also, some of his writings between 1931 and 1938 seemed to be supportive of the policies of the Nazi government. Althaus was a careful student of the NT and was concerned to communicate the results of careful theological exegesis to the educated layperson, hence his involvement in the celebrated commentary series Das Neue Testament Deutsch (The New Testament in German) and his popularity as a preacher (cf. his influence on Helmut Thielicke).

In the words of Walter von Loewenich, he embodied the old axiom: "A theology is only as valuable as one is able to preach it." His five volumes of published sermons remain as a rich legacy to the church. W. W. GASQUE

Bibliography. R. P. Ericksen, Theologians under Hitler; H. Grass, NZSTR 8:213–41; W. Lohff, "Paul Althaus," in Theologians of Our Time, L. Reinisch, ed.

Altizer, Thomas J. J. See DEATH OF GOD THEOLOGY.

Ambrose (ca. 340–397). One of the Doctors of the church and a leading foe of Arianism. Ambrose was born in Trier into a Roman noble and senatorial family that had become Christian. His father, the pretorian prefect of Gaul, died during Ambrose's youth, and the family returned to Rome, where Ambrose and his brother Satyrus received a classical education to prepare them for government service. It was in Rome that Marcelina, Ambrose's sister, received the consecration of a virgin at the hands of Pope Liberius and his mother entered the dedicated life of Christian widowhood. Such were his family influences that five of his extant works deal with Christian virginity and widowhood.

In 370 Ambrose was made governor of Aemilia-Liguria with headquarters at Milan, which at this time had replaced Rome as the West's imperial city. He became respected and popular because of his integrity, so when he attempted to calm the Arian and Catholic controversy at the election conclave for a new bishop of Milan in 374, he was acclaimed bishop by the crowd. Upon the approval of the emperor he received baptism, various orders, and the office of bishop all in one week. He was consecrated bishop of Milan on December 7, 374. He chose to receive his office from the hands of a Catholic bishop and worked against the Arian party until his death. Backed by two able Roman popes, Damasus (366–84) and Siricius (384–99), Ambrose lived to see Arianism largely defeated in the Western church. To that end he called and presided over numerous synods, the most notable of which was the Synod of Aquilia (381), which deposed the Arian leaders Palladius and Secundianus.

Ambrose was part of the golden age of church fathers that included strong prelates such as Athanasius, Hilary, and Augustine. His own stormy but strong episcopacy weathered the opposition of the Arian imperial court (though he was banished briefly in 392), the invasion of the Gauls, and the beginning of the struggle between church and state. In withstanding the Arian dowager Empress Justina's 386 effort to seize a basilica in Milan, Ambrose introduced the singing of hymns and chants to the Catholic crowds he kept in the contested building. In 390 he set a critical precedent by forcing the Catholic Emperor Theodosius to do public penance for his slaughter of seven thousand persons at the Thessalonican circus, insisting that the emperor was within the church and not over it. He is perhaps best remembered for his influence on Augustine, who after his conversion was instructed and baptized by Ambrose.

Because of his classical education, Ambrose was as fluent in Greek as he was in Latin. He read and used the thinkers of the Christian East, especially Origen and Basil of Caesarea. He introduced the thinking of Greek Christianity into the Latin Church and thus played a crucial role in the unity of the church even as the empire foundered. Thirty-five of his treatises are extant. They are written in a homiletical commentary style. De officiis ministrorum, a book on Christian ethics for clergy, is one of the earliest such works in the church. Ninety-one of his episcopal letters survive, as well as a few of his hymns. "O Splendor of God's Glory," "Now Hail We Our Redeemer," "Savior of the Nations Come," "O Trinity, Most Blessed Light" are still sung in contemporary churches.

V. L. WALTER

See also ARIUS, ARIANISM.

Bibliography. F. H. Dudden, Life and Times of St. Ambrose; A. Paredi, St. Ambrose: His Life and Times; H. von Campenhausen, Fathers of the Latin Church.

Amen. A Hebrew adjective originally meaning "reliable, sure, true"; as an adjectival verb it means "it is reliable or true." The related verb 'aman means "to support, sustain"; in the niphal stem "to prove oneself steady, reliable, loyal"; in the hiphil "to regard someone as reliable, trustworthy, or truthful," and hence "to believe." By itself 'amēn was used as a formula meaning "Surely!" or "In very truth!" at the end of a doxology. For example, after "Blessed be Yahweh forever" it signifies "Yes indeed!" or "May it be so in very truth!" (cf. Pss. 41:13; 72:19; 89:52; 106:48; also 1 Chron. 16:36 and Neh. 8:6, where the audience assents to and adopts their leader's praise of God). It could also be used with a decree or expression of royal purpose, where the obedient listener indicates hearty assent and cooperation (1 Kings 1:36; Jer. 11:5). Those who pray or asseverate or join in the prayer or asseveration of another by the use of "Amen" put themselves into the statement with all earnestness of faith and intensity of desire. Isaiah 65:16 speaks of Yahweh as the God of Amen, meaning that he speaks the truth and carries out his word; the same is implied by the Lord Christ when he calls himself "the Amen" in Revelation 3:14.

It is significant that Jesus introduces matters of importance with a solemn amēn, legō hymin (truly, I say unto you), thus affirming the truthfulness of what he is about to say. This is peculiar to Jesus in the NT and probably reflects his divine self-consciousness. He does not need to wait until after he has spoken to ratify what is said; all that he says has the mark of certain truth. G. L. ARCHER JR.

Bibliography. H. Bietenhard, NIDNTT 1:97–99; G. Dalman, Words of Jesus; H. W. Hogg, "Amen," JQR 9:1–11; H. Schlier, TDNT 1:335–38.

Americanism. The "Americanist" controversy of the late nineteenth century represents one of the rare occasions when an event in the United States exerted a direct theological influence in Europe. It began with the suspicions of recent Catholic immigrants that American bishops were accommodating Catholic principle to American Protestant practice. It came to a head when Father Walter Elliot's biography of Isaac Hecker, founder of the American Paulist order, was translated into French in 1897. Hecker (1819–88) had grown up a Methodist before becoming a Catholic in 1844, after which time he labored both to aid Catholic immigrants and to convert other Protestants to Rome. As part of the latter effort he contended that the Catholic Church was completely compatible with the forms of American democracy. He also tended to stress the authority of the Holy Spirit in the individual believer at the expense of traditional Roman insistence upon the church's power.

The archbishop of St. Paul, John Ireland (1838–1918), had provided a warm introduction to the American edition of Elliot's biography. Ireland was joined by American bishops John Keane and James Gibbons as leaders of the effort to make the Catholic Church more responsive to American culture. European conservatives were suspicious of that effort generally, but their concern turned to active opposition when a young French progressive, Abbé Felix Klein, praised Hecker in the introduction to the European edition, as the priest of the future.

Pope Leo XIII appointed a committee of cardinals to study the affair. After they reported, he issued on January 22, 1899 a papal letter, Testem Benevolentiae, to remedy the situation. The letter said that if American Catholics really taught certain doctrines—for example, that the Church should "show some indulgence to modern popular theories"—they should cease and desist. Leo spoke kindly of nonreligious institutions in America, but he insisted that Catholic doctrine not be compromised in its New World setting. The church must not shade its teachings to win converts, the church must remain the supreme spiritual authority, and the church's vows must not be indicted as an affront to religious liberty.

The "progressive" prelates in America quickly submitted, while denying that they held the condemned doctrines. The Roman Catholic Church emerged unshaken from the controversy in an era when its major attention was devoted to silencing the more obviously menacing threat of “modernism.” Yet issues raised about the accommodation of universal Catholic teaching to changing times and places would appear again in the wake of the Second Vatican Council sixty years later.

Americanism

M. A. NOLL

Bibliography. “Americanism,” The Catholic Encyclopedia; R. D. Cross, Emergence of Liberal Catholicism in America; G. P. Fogarty, Vatican and the American Hierarchy from 1870–1965; Vatican and the Americanist Crisis; D. P. Killen, “Americanism Revisited: John Spalding and Testem Benevolentiae,” HTR 66:413–54; T. T. McAvoy, Americanist Heresy in Roman Catholicism, 1895–1900; T. E. Wangler, “Birth of Americanism: Westward the Apocalyptic Candlestick,” HTR 65:415–36.

Ames, William (1576–1633). Prominent Puritan preacher and theologian of England and the Netherlands. Educated at Christ’s College, Cambridge (B.A. 1598, M.A. 1601), he stayed on to become a fellow and teacher at Christ’s. He was converted as a student by the Puritan preaching of William Perkins, and throughout his life he associated himself with the more extreme Puritans. In 1610 Ames was expelled from Cambridge because of his Puritanism, and thereafter his career was destroyed in England. Ames took refuge in the Netherlands, joining the large English-Scottish refugee community. During his immigrant years he served first as a military chaplain and then as professor of theology at the University of Franeker (1622–33), where he earned a doctor of theology degree. He was a strong Calvinist and opposed the Arminians, a reputation that drew him to the Synod of Dort (1618–19) as an adviser to the Synod president. He died at Rotterdam.

He was often known as “the Learned Doctor Ames” because of his great intellectual stature among Puritans. As a Puritan intellectual he combined Calvinist doctrine, Ramist philosophy (from Peter Ramus), and Puritan practical divinity. His best-known books are Marrow of Sacred Divinity (1627) and Cases of Conscience (1630), both of which were published in Latin and English and went through many seventeenth-century editions. Marrow of Sacred Divinity has been reprinted as recently as 1968. He wrote many books against Dutch Arminianism and against the episcopal system in England.

Ames stressed that theology must combine orthodox doctrine (which he defined as Calvinistic) and moral practice. Theology divides into a Ramist dichotomy: faith and observance. In church practices he experimented with new ideas. He believed in independent, voluntary congregations, but not separatism. He was one of the founders of the Congregationalist movement among Puritans. Just before his death, in 1632 he had accepted a call to become copastor with Hugh Peter of one of the earliest Congregationalist churches: the English church of Rotterdam.

Ames enjoyed a great reputation among Non-conformist English Puritans and among the Puritans of New England. Cotton Mather of Boston called him “that profound, that sublime, that subtil, that irrefragable,—yea that angelical doctor.”

K. L. SPRUNGER

Bibliography. J. E. Eusden, ed., Marrow of Theology; L. W. Gibbs, ed., William Ames: Technometry; D. Horton, William Ames by Matthew Nethenus, Hugo Visscher, and Karl Reuter; P. Miller, New England Mind: The Seventeenth Century; K. L. Sprunger, Learned Doctor William Ames.

Amillennialism. See MILLENNIUM, VIEWS OF THE.

Amish. See MENNONITES.

Amsdorf, Nicholas von (1483–1565). One of the four or five greatest Lutheran Reformers—although he was not a strong creative personality in the usual sense of the word. Amsdorf was born in Saxony and studied theology and earned his master’s degree at the University of Wittenberg in 1504. When Luther arrived at Wittenberg, the two became close friends. He accompanied Luther to the Leipzig debate in 1519, was at Worms with him in 1521, and assisted him with his translation of the OT.

The Elector John Frederick appointed Amsdorf first bishop to the Lutheran diocese of Naumburg-Zeitz. After Luther’s death he was expelled from Naumburg (1547). He returned to Magdeburg, where much of his previous reforming activity had been carried on, and led the opposition to the compromising tendencies of Melancthon and the Philippist party.

From 1552 until his death Amsdorf lived in Eisenach, without formal office but acknowledged as “Secret Bishop of the Lutheran Church.” He was involved in several theological controversies eventually addressed in the Formula of Concord (1577), including the Majoristic controversy in which he rebutted the thesis of Georg Major (“good works are necessary to salvation”) with the proposition that “good works are detrimental to salvation.” No doubt he wanted to capture one of Luther’s emphases, but he failed to clarify his statement by adding that “good works” if trusted in are injurious to salvation. As a result Amsdorf’s position was severely rebuked by other Lutheran theologians.

J. F. JOHNSON

See also ADIAPHORA, ADIAPHORISTS; MAJORISTIC CONTROVERSY.

Bibliography. R. P. Evans, “Amsdorf, Nicholas von,” WWCH, 22–23; R. Kolb, Nicholas von Amsdorf; W. G. Tillmanns, World and Men around Luther.

Amyraldianism. System of Reformed theology propounded by the French theologian Moise Amyraut and associates at the Saumur Academy in the seventeenth century. Its distinctive teachings vis-à-vis other systems (e.g., orthodox Calvinism, Arminianism, Lutheranism) focused on the doctrines of grace, predestination, and the intent of the atonement.

Fundamentally Amyraut took issue with contemporary Calvinists who shaped their system of theology around the decree of predestination. The entire body of divinity in much of seventeenth-century Reformed theology was subsumed under the doctrines of sovereign election and reprobation. Amyraut insisted that the chief doctrine of Christian theology is not predestination but the faith that justifies. Commitment to justification by faith as the overarching theme denoted a theology as truly reformatory. Moreover, Amyraut rightly argued that Calvin discussed predestination not under the doctrine of God but following the mediation of salvation blessing by the Holy Spirit. For Amyraut, predestination is an inscrutable mystery that offers an explanation of why some accept Christ and others reject him.

Amyraut also developed a system of covenant theology alternative to the twofold covenant of works/covenant of grace schema propounded by much of Reformed orthodoxy. The Saumur school postulated a threefold covenant, viewed as three successive steps in God's saving program unfolded in history: (1) the covenant of nature established between God and Adam involved obedience to the divine law disclosed in the natural order; (2) the covenant of law between God and Israel focused on adherence to the written law of Moses; and (3) the covenant of grace established between God and all humankind requires faith in the finished work of Christ. In Amyraldianism the covenant of grace was further divided into two parts: a conditional covenant of universal grace and an unconditional covenant of particular grace. For actualization the former required fulfillment of the condition of faith. The latter, grounded in God's good pleasure, does not call for the condition of faith; rather it creates faith in the elect.

Amyraut's covenant theology—particularly his division of the covenant of grace into a universal conditional covenant and a particular unconditional covenant—provided the basis for the unique feature of Amyraldianism, namely, the doctrine of hypothetical universal predestination. According to Amyraut there exists a twofold will of God in predestination—a universal and conditional will and a particular and unconditional will. Concerning the first, Amyraut taught that God wills the salvation of all people on the condition that they believe. This universal, conditional will of God is revealed dimly in nature but clearly in the gospel of Christ. Implicit in this first will is the claim that if a person does not believe, God has not, in fact, willed his or her salvation. Without the accomplishment of the condition (i.e., faith) the salvation procured by Christ is of no avail. Amyraut based his doctrine of hypothetical universal predestination on biblical texts such as Ezekiel 18:23; John 3:16; and 2 Peter 3:9.

Amyraut contended that although humans possess the natural faculties (i.e., intellect and will) by which to respond to God's universal offer of grace, they in fact suffer from moral inability due to the corrupting effects of sin upon the mind. Thus, unless renewed by the Holy Spirit, the sinner is unable to come to faith. Precisely at this point God's particular, unconditional will, which is hidden in the councils of the Godhead, comes to bear. Since sinners are not capable of coming to Christ on their own, God in grace wills to create faith and to save some, while in justice he wills to reprobate others. Amyraut underscored that God's particular, unconditional will to save is hidden and inscrutable. Finite humans cannot know it. Hence the creature must not engage in vain speculation about God's secret purposes of election and reprobation. In practice the Christian preacher must not ask the question whether a given individual is elect or reprobate. Rather one must preach Christ as the Savior of the world and call for faith in his sufficient work. Only the universal, conditional will of God is the legitimate object of religious contemplation. Amyraldianism thus involves a purely ideal universalism together with a real particularism.

The issue of the intent or extent of Christ's atonement is implicit in the foregoing discussion. Amyraldianism postulated a universalist design in the atonement and a particular application of its benefits. The salvation wrought by Christ was intended for all persons equally. Christ legitimately died for all. Nevertheless only the elect actually come into the enjoyment of salvation blessings. Amyraldianism thus upheld the formula: "Jesus Christ died for all sufficiently, but only for the elect efficiently."

Amyraut believed that his teachings on the twofold will of God and twofold intent of the atonement were derived from Calvin himself. He viewed his theology as a corrective to much of seventeenth-century Calvinism, which denied the universal, conditional will of God in its preoccupation with the unconditional decree. And he disputed with Arminianism, which failed to see that a person's salvation was effectively grounded in the absolute purpose of God conceived on the basis of his own sovereign pleasure. And finally Amyraldianism provided a rapprochement with Lutheranism and its interest in justification by faith and the universality of Christ's atoning work. Some later Reformed theologians such as

Amyraldianism

Charles Hodge, W. G. T. Shedd, and B. B. Warfield insisted that Amyraldianism was an inconsistent synthesis of Arminianism and Calvinism. Others, however, such as H. Heppel, R. Baxter, S. Hopkins, A. H. Strong, and L. S. Chafer maintained that it represents a return to the true spirit of Holy Scripture. B. DEMAREST

See also AMYRAUT, MOISE; ATONEMENT, EXTENT OF.

Bibliography. B. G. Armstrong, Calvinism and the Amyraut Heresy; R. B. Kuyper, For Whom Did Christ Die?; R. Nicole, Moyse Amyraut: A Bibliography; Encyclopedia of Christianity 1:184-93; B. B. Warfield, Plan of Salvation.

Amyraut, Moise (1596-1664). French Protestant theologian, born in Bourgueil and died in Saumur. Amyraut earned a degree in law at the University of Poitiers (1616), but influenced by the Protestant minister at Saumur and by Calvin's Institutes of the Christian Religion he pursued instead a career in theology. He studied under distinguished Scottish theologian John Cameron at the Academy at Saumur and was later ordained to the Protestant ministry. After briefly serving the Reformed church in St. Aignan, Amyraut was called in 1626 to minister at Saumur. The young clergyman quickly rose to prominence in the Reformed Church of France, and in 1631 he was chosen to present to King Louis XIII a list of infractions against the Edict of Nantes (1598), which was intended to protect the rights of the Protestant minority.

In 1633 Amyraut was installed as professor of theology at Saumur. Under the leadership of Amyraut and his colleagues L. Cappel and J. de la Place, the Saumur Academy became the leading theological school of French Protestantism. A prolific writer, Amyraut published some thirty books in addition to a number of sermons and essays, chief among them Treatise Concerning Religions (1631), Short Treatise on Predestination (1634), and the six-volume Christian Ethics (1652-60).

A master of the literature of Calvin, Amyraut held to the main tenets of Calvinistic theology. Nevertheless he sought to revise what he judged to be the unacceptable teachings of seventeenth-century scholastic Calvinism on grace and predestination and to forge a return to Calvin himself. In addition, he sought to create at the theological level a bridge with Lutherans, who were offended by the pronouncements of the Synod of Dort (1618-19) regarding the intent of the atonement. In pursuit of these ends Amyraut propounded a view of hypothetical universal predestination whereby God was said to will the salvation of all people on the condition that they believe. Thus ideally Christ's atonement was sufficient for all, but because of universal human depravity, in practice it was efficient only for the elect.

Staunch opposition arose in Switzerland, the Netherlands, and France to Amyraut's teachings on universal grace. Amyraut was tried for heresy at three national synods (1637, 1644, and 1659) but was acquitted in each case. The Formula Helvetic Consensus (1675) was prepared by the Swiss Reformed Church largely to counter the Saumurian theology of Amyraut and his colleagues. Notwithstanding such protests, Amyraut's interpretation of Calvin exercised considerable influence upon later Reformed theology. B. DEMAREST

See also AMYRALDIANISM.

Bibliography. T. M. Lindsay, HERE 1:404-6; E. F. K. Müller, SHERK 1:160-61.

Anabaptism. Anabaptists. The Anabaptist movement had a varied cast of characters. From it has evolved the Free Church tradition.

From Luther to twentieth-century scholar Karl Holl, the opinion prevailed that Anabaptism began with revolutionaries and spiritualizers such as the Zwickau Prophets and Thomas Müntzer and reached its logical culmination with the violent Münsterites. In the 1940s Harold S. Bender inaugurated a new era in American Anabaptist studies. Using primary sources and following up directions indicated earlier by C. A. Cornelius and other Europeans, Bender distinguished between Anabaptists and revolutionaries. He placed Anabaptist origins in the circle of Conrad Grebel, which left Zwingli's reformation when Zwingli compromised its biblical basis. From Zurich the movement was spread by missionaries from Switzerland to Austria and Moravia, South Germany, and the Low Countries. Bender described the movement as the logical culmination of the reform begun but left unfinished by Luther and Zwingli. Its principal characteristics were discipleship, biblicism, and pacifism. Beginning in the late 1960s scholars challenged and, to a considerable measure, reoriented Bender's findings. Rather than a homogeneous movement, they described a pluralistic Anabaptism with several points of origin and a multiplicity of reforming impulses. In particular, not all Anabaptists were pacifists.

Swiss Anabaptism. Anabaptism in Switzerland developed from Zwingli's early supporters. These future radicals included the Grebel circle, which gathered in the home of Andreas Castelberger for Bible study, and priests from the outlying towns of Zurich. For different reasons the urban and rural radicals became disillusioned with Zwingli's reform. Seeing the Bible as an alternative authority to Rome, the Grebel circle desired Zwingli to proceed rapidly to purify the city's religious establishment of such corruptions as the Mass.

When Zwingli allowed the city council to determine the speed of reformation, it seemed to the radicals the substitution of one oppressive authority for another. The radical movement developed social as well as religious dimensions when its members joined forces with rural priests such as Simon Stumpf at Höngg and Wilhelm Reublin at Wittikon, who sought to establish self-governing Volkskirchen in the rural communities, independent of Zurich's central authority, both religious and civil. The rebaptisms which occurred first on January 21, 1525, and from which come the name Anabaptism, originally expressed an anticlerical opposition to civil and religious authority outside of the local parish rather than a Free Church theological concept.

Ultimately the attempts to become a mass movement failed, and there emerged the idea of the church of the separated, persecuted, and defenseless minority. The Schleithem Articles of 1527, edited by Michael Sattler, consolidated this Swiss Anabaptism. Its goal was not the purification of existing Christianity, as it was for the early Zurich radicals, but rather the separation of congregations of believers from the world. Thus at Schleithem first emerged the idea of a "free church." These Swiss Brethren came to be known for their legalistic approach to the Bible, apolitical pacifism, a salvation manifesting itself in the creation of separated congregations, and baptism which symbolized that salvation and made the baptized a member of the congregation.

South German Anabaptism. In spite of the mutual practice of adult baptism, Anabaptism in South Germany was a quite different movement from the Swiss Brethren. South German Anabaptism stems from the reformulation of ideas from Thomas Müntzer by Hans Hut and Hans Denck (ca. 1500–1527). Reflecting a medieval, mystical outlook, Müntzer envisioned the inner transformation of persons through the Spirit and an accompanying external transformation of the entire society, with the newly transformed individuals acting in revolutionary fashion to usher in the kingdom of God. This revolution, along with Müntzer, died in the May 1525 massacre of peasants at Frankenhausen.

Hans Denck's concept of inner transformation was pacifist in expression, focusing more on the renewal of individuals than of society. This inner, transforming Christ served Denck as an alternative authority both to the Roman hierarchy and to the learned exegesis of the Reformers. Positing the inner Christ as ultimate authority made Denck less than absolute in his approach to adult baptism and the written word, both positions which brought upon him the criticism of the Swiss Brethren.

Hans Hut understood the inner transformation to be accomplished through the experience of both inner and outer struggle and suffering. Hut modified Müntzer's revolutionary outlook, commanding the transformed believers to keep the revolutionary sword sheathed until God called for it. Unlike the Swiss Brethren, Hut's practice of rebaptism was not to form separated congregations, but rather to mark the elect for the end-time judgment. Hut's movement gradually died out following his death in a jail fire.

A Hut legacy continued through several metamorphoses. One form developed in Moravia, out of the conflict in the congregation at Nikolsburg between the pacifist Stäbler (staff bearers), influenced by Hut and Swiss Brethren refugees, and the Schwertler (sword bearers), the majority party under the influence of Balthasar Hubmaier, who had established a state-church form of Anabaptism in the city. Forced to leave Nikolsburg in 1529, the Stäbler pooled their few possessions as a survival necessity. This community of goods, which became the movement's trademark, soon received a theological justification, making it a social expression of the inner mystical transformation of believers envisioned by Hut. Following the dispute-filled early years Jacob Hutter's strong leadership from 1533 to 1536 consolidated this Anabaptist form. His name still identifies the Hutterites in the twentieth century.

Another form of the Hut legacy developed in South Germany around Pilgram Marpeck. Although he left his native Tyrol after adopting Anabaptism, and while he was forced further to move several times because of his Anabaptist views, Marpeck's skills as a civil engineer enabled him to live in relative security. Marpeck's view was not widely held and therefore is not normative for Anabaptism; but he did develop a mediating position on the Bible, critical both of the legalist Swiss and of spiritualist views. Rather than the radical social separation of the Swiss Brethren, Marpeck held to a separation of church and state that did not withhold all cooperation by believers.

Low Countries Anabaptism. The third major Anabaptist movement was planted in the Low Countries by Melchior Hofmann (ca. 1495–1543). An erstwhile Lutheran preacher in Sweden and Schleswig-Holstein, always zealously interested in eschatological speculation, Hofmann found in the Strasbourg Anabaptists influenced by Hans Denck the ideas which precipitated his break with Luther and enabled him to develop his own form of Anabaptism. Hofmann believed in the near inbreaking of God's kingdom into the world, with divine vengeance upon the wicked. The righteous would participate in this judgment, not as agents of vengeance but as witnesses to the coming peace. Hofmann's baptism served to gather the elect into an end-time congregation to build this new Jerusalem. He died after ten years imprisonment in Strasbourg.

Anabaptism

Two lines carried on in transformed fashion the Hofmann legacy. One, the revolutionary Melchiorites, founded the short-lived kingdom of Münster, 1534–35. Under Jan Matthys, baptized as a disciple of Hofmann, and then under Jan van Leiden, who seized power at the death of Matthys, the revolutionary Melchiorites in the city of Münster gave a political and social expression to Hofmann's end-time kingdom. They transformed his idea of divine vengeance so that in Münster the members of the kingdom carried out vengeance upon anyone who opposed them. Following the fall of the city, revolutionary Melchiorism died out, although it was carried on for a time by personages such as Jan van Batenburg.

The pacifist line from Hofmann runs through Menno Simons, who left the priesthood in 1536 and whose name twentieth century Mennonites carry. After the fall of Münster, Menno rallied the peaceful Melchiorites as well as the surviving Münsterites disillusioned with violence. Menno replaced Hofmann's near end time with the idea of a time of peace that had already begun with Jesus. Using the aberrant "celestial flesh" Christology of Hofmann which he adopted, Menno developed concepts of the transformation of the individual and of the assembly of a spotless church.

Although beginning from different presuppositions, Menno's positions on transformed individuals and a pure, separated church resembled closely the outlook of the Schleithem Articles. The heirs of the various Anabaptist groups came to recognize their common emphases on the Bible, adult baptism, pacifism, and sense of separation from the state church and worldly society. They had contacts and discussions and divisions. While they never united into one homogeneous body, some sense of unity developed, as represented by the Concept of Cologne signed in 1591 by fifteen preachers, the first confession of faith accepted simultaneously by Dutch and High and Low German Mennonites.

Another Proposal. In a 1995 book, Arnold Snyder has sought to go beyond the pluralism of multiple origins. He argues that in spite of the multiple origins, Anabaptism was one movement characterized by a theological core of the classic creeds shared with all of Christendom; a set of issues shared with magisterial Protestantism, such as anti-sacramentalism and salvation by grace through faith; and a new ecclesiology, which produced the specific Anabaptist traits such as adult baptism. More testing will reveal whether this supposedly unified Anabaptism is a historical datum or a modern construct imposed on the sixteenth century.

Spiritualists. Introduction. In addition to Anabaptists, other radical groups also rejected the magisterial reformation. Common to most of them was disappointment with moral and social aspects of territorial Protestantism and the rejection of some of its doctrines and institutions. While various interlocking historical and doctrinal variations limit the validity of typological ideological classifications, such groups in addition to Anabaptists have included spiritualists and evangelical rationalists.

Radicals characterized as spiritualizers downplayed significantly or rejected altogether external forms of church and ceremonies, opting instead for inner communion through the Holy Spirit. Thus, for example, Silesian nobleman Kasper Schwenckfeld held that there has been no correct baptism for a thousand years, and in 1526 he recommended suspension of the observance of the Lords' Supper—the Stillstand observed by his followers until 1877—until the question of its proper form could be settled. Sebastian Franck (1499–1542) rejected altogether the idea of an external church. He saw external ceremonies as mere props to support an infant church and which in any case had been taken over by the antichrist immediately after the death of the apostles. Franck held the true church to be invisible, its individuals nurtured by the Spirit but to remain scattered until Christ gathered his own at his second coming. Marpeck combated this individualistic, invisible church as the principal threat to South German Anabaptism.

Evangelical Rationalists. Other radicals, giving significant weight to reason alongside the Scriptures, came to reject aspects of traditional theology, principally in christological and trinitarian matters. Michael Servetus, burned in Calvin's Geneva for his views, is a noteworthy example of antitrinitarianism. Antitrinitarianism attained institutional form in the pacifistic Polish Brethren later known as Socinians, and in the Unitarian churches in Lithuania and Transylvania. As practitioners of adult baptism, these are also properly called Anabaptists. A remnant of the latter survives into the twentieth century. Other modern Unitarians inherit the intellectual if not the historical legacy of antitrinitarianism.

J. D. WEAVER

See also GREBEL, CONRAD; HUBMAIER, BALTHASAR; MELCHIORITES; MENNONITES; MENNO SIMONS; RACOVIAN CATECHISM; SOCINUS, FAUSTUS; ZWICKAU PROPHETS.

Bibliography. R. S. Armour, Anabaptist Baptism; R. H. Bainton, "Left Wing of the Reformation," in Studies in the Reformation; Travail of Religious Liberty; M. G. Baylor, ed., Revelation and Revolution: Basic Writings of Thomas Müntzer; H. S. Bender, Anabaptist Vision; Conrad Grebel; T. Bergsten, Balthasar Hubmaier; S. B. Boyd, Pilgram Marpeck: His Life and Social Theology; C. J. Dyck, Introduction to Mennonite History; C. J. Dyck, ed., Legacy of Faith; C. J. Dyck, W. E. Keeney, A. J. Beachy, eds., Writings of Dirk Philips; E. J. Furcha, ed., Selected Writings of Hans Denck; H. J. Goertz, ed., Pro- files of Radical Reformers; L. Harder, ed., Grebeliana; H. J. Hillerbrand, ed., Bibliography of Anabaptism; Fellowship of Discontent; W. Klaasen, ed., Anabaptism in Outline; W. Klaasen and W. Klassen, eds., Writings of Pilgram Marpeck; M. Lienhard, ed., Origins and Characteristics of Anabaptism; Mennonite Encyclopedia; J. S. Oyer, Lutheran Reformers against Anabaptists; W. O. Packull, Hutterite Beginnings; Mysticism and the Early South German-Austrian Anabaptist Movement; H. W. Pipkin and J. H. Yoder, trans. and ed., Balthaser Hubmaier; C. A. Snyder, Anabaptist History and Thought; Life and Thought of Michael Sattler; J. M. Stayer, Anabaptists and the Sword; German Peasants' War and Anabaptist Community of Goods; "Swiss Brethren," CH 47:174-95; J. M. Stayer and W. O. Packull, eds., Anabaptists and Thomas M nzer; J. M. Stayer, W. O. Packull, and K. Deppermann, "From Monogenesis to Polygenesis," MQR 49:83-121; D. C. Steinmetz, Reformers in the Wings; G. Waite, ed., Anabaptist Writings of David Joris, 1535-43; J. D. Weaver, Becoming Anabaptist; J. C. Wenger, ed., Complete Writings of Menno Simons; G. H. Williams, Radical Reformation; G. H. Williams and A. Mergal, eds., Spiritual and Anabaptist Writers; J. H. Yoder, ed., Legacy of Michael Sattler.

Anagogical Sense of Scripture. See INTERPRETATION OF THE BIBLE.

Anakephaliosis. See IRENAEUS.

Analogia Fidei. See ANALOGY OF FAITH.

Analogy. Analogy means similarity, and with respect to religious language it stands in contrast to two other views: the univocal and the equivocal. Univocal language expresses entirely the same meaning, while an equivocal word has entirely different meaning (e.g., "bark" may mean the coating of a tree or the noise of a dog). Analogous language, by contrast, expresses a meaning that is similar, but neither identical nor totally different.

Historically the mystics stressed equivocal religious language. With their stress on the via negativa (way of negation), they claimed that one could not make positive affirmations about God that were actually true. Such views were held by Plotinus, Pseudo-Dionysius, and Meister Eckhart. John Duns Scotus argued for univocal God-talk, insisting that anything else leads to skepticism. Between these two extremes are other theologians who insist on analogous religious language. Thomas Aquinas, for example, argued that since God is infinite, it follows that none of our finite concepts can apply to him univocally. He insisted also that since God created the world, then he cannot be totally different from it, for the creature must bear some similarity to the Creator.

Analogies are usually divided into two kinds: metaphysical and metaphorical. The former apply to God literally and the latter do not. For instance, in the sentence God is good the term good applies to God literally, but in the sentence God is a rock the term rock applies to God only metaphorically. Likewise, when the Scriptures refer to God's arms, ears, and eyes, these are only metaphorical analogies usually called anthropomorphisms.

Some theologians distinguish between metaphorical and metaphysical analogies on the basis of what is called an intrinsic or extrinsic causal relation. An intrinsic causal relation is one where the cause produces an effect like itself, as when hot water is the cause of making an egg hot. In this kind of intrinsic causal relation both the cause and the effect have the property in question (e.g., heat in the above illustration). An extrinsic causal relation is one where the effect has a property that was caused by the cause but that the cause does not itself possess. For instance, hot water causes an egg to become hard, but the water is not itself hard. Thus in extrinsic causal relations the analogy is metaphorical. God can make a rock even though he is not literally a rock. In this sense "rock" is applied to God only metaphorically because there is only an extrinsic causal relation.

If we are to avoid total skepticism in our knowledge of God, then at least some causal relations must be intrinsic. Thus since God created humankind in his image, one can look at humans and know God by way of analogy. This is the point Paul made when he wrote, "Since we are God's offspring, we should not think that the divine being is like gold or silver or stone" (Acts 17:29). Likewise, the psalmist argued for an analogy between humans and God when he wrote, "Does he who implanted the ear not hear? Does he who formed the eye not see?" (Ps. 94:9).

Objections to intrinsic analogy between creatures and God are often built on the fallacy of confusing an instrumental cause with an efficient cause. They say a pen is not like the letter it writes. However, a pencil is only an instrumental cause of the letter. The author is the efficient cause, and the letter does bear a resemblance (analogy) to the mind of the author. Some objections to analogy confuse accidental characteristics with essential characteristics. For instance, it is not essential that a musician give birth to a musician. But it is essential that humans give birth to humans. Therefore, when seeking to describe the way God really is, it is necessary for the theologian to use essential characteristics that flow from the efficient cause (God) to the effect (creation) and not to expect a resemblance to either the instrumental or accidental features involved in the analogy. After all, analogy means only similar, not identical. There are also ways in which God is unlike creatures. As the psalmist said, "There is none to compare with you" (40:5). And Isaiah added, "To whom then will you liken God? Or what likeness will you compare with him?" (40:18).

N. L. GEISLER

Analogy

Bibliography. T. Aquinas, Summa contra Gentiles; Summa Theologica; A. Farrer, Reflective Faith; F. Ferré, Encyclopedia of Philosophy; N. L. Geisler, Philosophy of Religion; E. Mascall, Existence and Analogy; B. Mondin, Principle of Analogy in Protestant and Catholic Theology; H. Palmer, Analogy.

Analogy of Faith. In Romans 12:6, Paul teaches that he who has the gift of prophecy should prophesy “in proportion to his faith.” The apostle enjoins the believer to exercise the gift of prophecy to the extent that individual faith will allow. The “proportion” or “analogy of faith” (analogia tēs pisteōs) thus is similar to the “measure of faith” (metron pisteōs) mentioned by Paul in Romans 12:3.

Later usages of the analogy of faith (analogia fidei) represent a development of the original Pauline meaning. Indeed, throughout history the term has assumed a wide range of meanings. As a general hermeneutical principle, analogy of faith connotes that an obscure text or passage may be illumined by other texts of Scripture whose meaning is clear. Since God is the author of Holy Scripture, what is taught in one Scripture cannot contradict what is taught in another Scripture on the same subject. In fact, the meaning of a given text is often established only after a careful consideration of other passages that speak to the issue. For example, Paul’s negative attitude toward the law in Romans 10:4 and Galatians 3:13 is clarified by consideration of his positive endorsement of the law (e.g., Rom. 7:12, 14, 16). When the full sweep of Pauline teaching is examined, it will be seen that the apostle repudiates law-keeping as a means of salvation, although as an expression of the moral will of God the law’s precepts serve as a universal standard of conduct. The analogy-of-faith principle, operating under the modest assumption that Scripture interprets Scripture, helps guard against a one-sided interpretation of the scriptural text.

As an extension of this principle, Augustine insisted that the interpretation of Scripture should not violate the rule of faith summarized in the Apostles’ Creed. If Scripture is alleged to mean something contrary to the universally accepted body of Christian truth, the validity of one’s exegesis is suspect. In a similar vein, Luther argued that the primary interpreter of Scripture must be Scripture. When appealing to the analogy of faith in this latter sense, Christian authorities sought to guard against the practice of interpreting Scripture on the basis of any sources outside of Scripture.

Roman Catholicism exceeds the modest use of the analogy-of-faith principle thus outlined by insisting that the Bible must be interpreted in accordance with the body of tradition. Origen, Irenaeus, Tertullian, and Jerome argued that difficult passages of Scripture are illumined by the rule of faith taught by the church. Indeed, the teachings commended may not have been in the mind of the biblical writer; but once approved by the church they are to be accepted as valid and binding. On this showing, Scripture emerges as only one of the basic sources of belief. Reformation Protestantism with its principle of sola Scriptura rejected the claim that the meaning of Scripture is dependent upon normative interpretations imposed by the church.

As an exegetical principle the analogy of faith has been abused by the imposition of meanings that were not intended by the biblical writer. Some thus argue that even if a particular interpretation cannot be drawn from a given text, it may be imposed upon the passage, provided the interpretation is found elsewhere in Scripture and provided it does not do violence to the literal meaning of the text. However, the attribution of such spiritual or allegorical significations to a text involves the danger that no end of meanings could be affixed to Scripture on the basis of the interpreter’s subjective inclinations, which would nullify the specific intention and normative meaning of the Spirit-guided prophetic or apostolic writer. Rather, the interpreter should strive via the practice of sound grammatico-historical exegesis to unfold the meaning that was in the mind of the inspired biblical writer. The exegete will also bear in mind that interpretation must not contravene what is taught elsewhere in Scripture and that in unfolding the meaning of a text other inspired Scriptures may help clarify the specific intention of the biblical writer.

B. DEMAREST

Bibliography. D. P. Fuller, “Biblical Theology and the Analogy of Faith,” in Unity and Diversity in New Testament Theology, R. A. Guelich, ed.; W. C. Kaiser Jr., Toward an Old Testament Theology; J. L. Murphy, NCE 1:468–69; M. Terry, Biblical Hermeneutics.

Anathema. See CURSE.

Ancient of Days. See GOD, NAMES OF.

Anderson, Robert (1841–1918). Influential Presbyterian layman who made an impact for the gospel through the legal profession, preaching, and writing. Born in Dublin, he was educated at Trinity College there and entered the legal profession in Ireland in 1863. In 1868 he became adviser to the British Home Office in London in matters relating to political crime and showed considerable ability in dealing with plots of Irish and American-Irish conspirators. Leaving public service in 1877, he was called back by the government in 1880; and from 1888 to 1901 he headed the Criminal Investigation Department of Scotland Yard.

He began preaching soon after his conversion at nineteen and ministered to people in all walks of life in churches and missions. He spoke at numerous Mildmay Conferences and was associated with the Lawyers' Prayer Union, Prophecy Investigation Society, the Evangelical Alliance, the Bible League, and other organizations.

Sir Robert wrote extensively but centered his efforts on the fields of apologetics and Bible prophecy. He had a deep respect for the fundamental truths of the Bible and boldly attacked the higher criticism of his day. His approach to the interpretation of Scripture was dispensational, and he was a leading popularizer of that position. In that connection, he taught a distinction between the Pauline gospel for the church and the gospel of the kingdom as a message for the Jews. Among his better-known works are Coming Prince, Daniel in the Critic's Den, Bible and Modern Criticism, Silence of God, and Gospel and Its Ministry.

H. F. Vos

See also DISPENSATION, DISPENSATIONALISM.

Bibliography. J. D. Douglas, "Anderson, Sir Robert," WWCH 23.

Andover Controversy. Theological dispute from 1886 to 1892 involving the faculty of Andover Theological Seminary, significant as an example of transition from New England Calvinism to liberal theology. The seminary was founded in 1808 in Andover, Massachusetts, in reaction to Unitarian influence at Harvard. There was a determined effort by the founders to preserve orthodoxy at Andover by requiring the faculty to subscribe publicly to a Calvinistic creedal formula once every five years.

After the retirement of Professor E. A. Park in 1881, Andover became a champion of liberal theology. In 1884 the Andover Review, a theological journal, was published by the faculty for the purpose of rethinking and restating Christian theology in contemporary terms. It contained a series of editorials written by members of the faculty exploring central Christian doctrines under the title "Progressive Orthodoxy." The controversy centered on a question regarding the destiny of those who died without saving faith. Was the gospel absolutely necessary for salvation? The answer indicated that God will judge each person only after that person has had the opportunity to accept or reject the gospel. If God does not make himself known in Christ to that person in this life, then he will do so in a future state (a doctrine referred to as future probation). Newman Smyth, brother of Egbert C. Smyth (president of the seminary), introduced this idea in America, and it became a major factor in the decision of the Board of Visitors not to appoint him to the chair of theology. The controversy over this and related matters raged for several years, and the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions refused to send as missionaries any Andover graduates who consented to this view.

In 1886 E. C. Smyth and several of his colleagues were investigated, and in June 1887 the Board of Visitors dismissed Smyth. That decision was appealed to the Massachusetts Supreme Court, and in 1891, on technical grounds, the decision of the Board of Visitors was reversed. In 1892, after a new trial before the Board of Visitors, the matter was dropped.

The Andover Controversy went far beyond consideration of the doctrine of future probation. Ultimately it involved a careful rethinking of the nature of God, humankind, and the world in the light of the current evolutionary worldview. Fueled by a sense of inadequacy to deal with social problems through traditional means, the Andover faculty attempted to point Christian theology to a new hope for human progress. Doctrine was modified by reason and experience. Incorporating the concepts of evolution and progress into Christian theology resulted in a radical reinterpretation of the doctrine of salvation. The Andover faculty shifted the emphasis from atonement to incarnation to salvation by the development of moral character.

L. G. WHITLOCK JR.

Bibliography. C. A. Briggs, Whither?; F. H. Foster, Modern Movement in American Theology; W. R. Hutchison, ed., American Protestant Thought: The Liberal Era; J. LeConte, Evolution: Its Nature, Its Evidences, and Its Relation to Religious Thought; H. K. Rowe, History of Andover Theological Seminary; E. C. Smyth, Andover Heresy; W. T. Tucker, My Generation: An Autobiographical Interpretation; D. D. Williams, Andover Liberals: A Study in American Theology; G. F. Wright, "Some Analogies between Calvinism and Darwinism," BS 37:49-74.

Andreae, James (1528–1590). Professor of theology at the University of Tübingen, leader of the Lutheran movement in Württemberg, and one of the major contributors to what became known as the Formula of Concord (1577).

Born in Waiblingen (the dukedom of Württemberg), Andreae enrolled in the preparatory school in Stuttgart. At the age of thirteen he matriculated at the University of Tübingen, and after four years of study in the liberal arts he advanced to the study of theology in 1545. However, Württemberg needed evangelical pastors, and consequently Andreae assumed the duties of deacon at the Hospital Church in Stuttgart just one year after he had begun studying theology. After the defeat of the evangelical forces at Mühlberg in April 1547, the forces of Emperor Charles V moved to impose his interim religious settlement on evangelicals throughout the Holy Roman Empire. Andreae alone remained at his post when the Spanish occupation forces of the emperor began to implement the Augsburg Interim in Württemberg in November 1548. He was transferred to Tübingen soon thereafter in order to avoid arrest. In Tübingen he served as a catechist for two congregations and undertook doctoral studies at the university.

Andreae, James

During his university studies Andreae began his rise to prominence as an ecclesiastical adviser. In 1553 he assumed the duties of superintendent of the Lutheran churches in Göttingen. From this base Andreae was sent on a series of missions to help reconcile disputes that arose among Lutheran theologians in the wake of the Smalcaldic War. In 1557 Andreae published his first book, Short and Simple Statement Concerning the Lord's Supper, in which he attempted to formulate a doctrine of the Lord's Supper consistent with Lutheran theology without offending the Calvinists.

Andreae's main contribution to Lutheran unity in the post-Reformation period was made through his Six Christian Sermons of 1573. These sermons treated the subjects over which the disputes had developed among the Lutherans, and they were suggested by Andreae as a basis for union between the Gnesio-Lutherans and the Philippists, the two main contending parties. In the winter of 1573–74 the sermons were recast into a more academic format entitled the Swabian Concord. This document, in turn, was revised by several Lutheran theologians in 1575–76, culminating in the Torgau Book and the Belgic Book, which together became the Formula of Concord. To be sure, the theological concerns and expressions of others altered and supplemented Andreae's view in the formula's final version. In and through the Christian Sermons, however, Andreae not only helped create the text of the Formula of Concord but also fostered the climate in which such a formula could be written and accepted by the Lutherans. Without Andreae the princes had made little headway in forging Lutheran unity during the twenty years of trying to end the disputes of the theologians. Andreae was able to initiate the movement toward concord in part by emphasizing pastoral concern for clergy and laity who were being offended by controversy, and in part by taking his stance as a confessor of the central teachings of the Bible as he understood them from reading Luther. Both these factors placed him in the mainstream of Lutheranism by the time of his death.

J. F. JOHNSON

See also CONCORD, FORMULA OF.

Bibliography. T. Jungkuntz, Formulators of the Formula of Concord; R. Kolb, Andreae and the Formula of Concord.

Angel. The Greek word angelos, from which “angel” derives, is in itself a colorless word, like its main Hebrew equivalent. It may denote either a human or a heavenly messenger. Yet in the NT, except in Luke 7:24; 9:52; and perhaps Revelation 1:20, it is used only for heavenly beings. Rightly, therefore, the Vulgate introduced a distinction between angelus and nuntius, which modern renderings and usage have maintained.

The term chosen by Scripture to denote angels gives us the clue to the function by which they are primarily to be known and understood. They are God's messengers or ambassadors. They belong to his heavenly court and service. Their mission in heaven is to praise him (Rev. 4:5). They devote themselves to doing his will (Ps. 103:20), and in this activity they behold his face (Matt. 18:10). Since heaven can interact directly with earth, they also have a mission on earth. They accompany God in his work of creation (Job 38:7), though they themselves are also creatures (Ps. 148:2, 5). They also assist in God's providential ordering of affairs (Dan. 12:1). Above all they are active in the divine work of reconciliation (from Gen. 19:1–2 onward). In fulfillment of their mission they declare God's word (e.g., Luke 1:26–27) and do his work (e.g., Matt. 28:2). There seems to be some ordering in their ranks: some are referred to as archangels, while others are simply angels (1 Thess. 4:16; Jude 9).

The function of angels may be seen clearly from their part in the saving mission of Jesus Christ. They are naturally present when this begins with the nativity (Matt. 1; Luke 1–3) and when it ends with the resurrection (Matt. 28:2) and ascension (Acts 1:10–11). They also assist the church in its early ministry (e.g., 5:19; 10:3). They will play an important part in the events of the end time (Rev. 7:1–3; etc.). Finally, they will come with Christ when he returns in glory (Matt. 24:31) to separate the righteous and the wicked (13:41, 49). They do not do the real work of reconciliation, which is Christ's prerogative, but they accompany and declare this work, praising the God of grace and glory and summoning people to participate in their worship (Luke 2:13–14). Interestingly, there seem to be only two angelic appearances between Christ's birth and resurrection: at the beginning of his way to the cross in the temptation (Mark 1:12) and then before the crucifixion itself in Gethsemane (Luke 22:43). This is perhaps because Jesus had to tread his way of atoning self-giving alone, and in his humiliation he is made a little lower than the angels (Heb. 2:9), though exalted far above them by nature (Heb. 1). Yet angels did not withdraw from the scene, for they rejoice at sinners repenting (Luke 15:10) and will hear the Son of Man confess those who confess him (12:8–9).

The Bible offers only a few hints about the nature of angels. Belonging to the heavenly sphere, they cannot be properly conceived of in earthly terms. They are mostly described in relation to God, as his angels (e.g., Ps. 104:4). The two angelic names Michael and Gabriel emphasize this relationship with the -el ending. It is as God's angels, perhaps, that they are called “elect” (1 Tim. 5:21). Hebrews 1:14 describes them as “ministering spirits" in a conflation of the two parts of Psalm 104:4. Elsewhere, in Job and Psalms, they figure as the "mighty ones" (Ps. 29:1) or the "holy ones" (Job 5:1) who are set apart for God's service; both of these terms occur in Psalm 89:67, though "sons of God" is here another rendering of "heavenly ones" in verse 6 (cf. Ps. 29:1). The "gods" of Psalm 82:1, in whose midst God holds judgment, are often thought to be angels too. Since Christians can also be called God's children, we need not infer from this usage, as do some apologists, that the angels are lesser deities. Indeed, the Bible clearly warns us not to worship them (Col. 2:18; Rev. 19:10).

Among the heavenly beings, mention is made of the seraphs or seraphim (Isa. 6:2) and, more frequently, the cherubim. Cherubim guarded Eden after the expulsion of Adam and Eve (Gen. 3:24). They form God's chariot at his descent (Ps. 18:10). Figures of cherubim adorned the ark (Exod. 25:17–22) and Solomon's temple (1 Kings 6:23–35), so that Yahweh is said to be enthroned above the cherubim (1 Sam. 4:4; Ps. 80:1). Ezekiel offers an elaborate visionary description (Ezek. 1:10; 9:3; 10:15–22) in which their form is human (1:5), but symbolical traits stress their glory and spiritual excellence. Common paradise traditions may underlie Assyro-Babylonian parallels.

Of the named angels, Michael is called "the great prince" (Dan. 12:1), and the other angels seem to be led by him (Rev. 12:7), though God himself, of course, is the Lord of hosts and Prince of the host (Dan. 8:11). The man who appeared to Joshua in Joshua 5:13–15, usually taken to be an angel, says that he has come as commander of the army of the Lord. Gabriel, the other angel named in canonical Scripture, is the angel of the annunciation (Luke 1:26). Distinctions seem to be indicated in Revelation 4–5's references to the beasts and the elders, but the exact significance of these terms is disputed. The apocryphal writings provide three more angelic names: Raphael, Uriel, and Jeremiel. Tobit 12:15 calls Raphael one of the holy angels who present the prayers of the saints (cf. the seven who stand before God in Rev. 8:2 and the possible link between these seven and the "chief princes" of Dan. 10:13).

From the various statements about the nature of angels and Paul's use of the terms principalities, powers, thrones, dominions, and forces, early and medieval theology evolved a complex speculative account of the angelic world. Pseudo-Dionysius found separate entities in these terms, and he grouped them with the seraphim, cherubim, archangels, and angels in a threefold hierarchy of nine choirs. Aquinas, the Angelic Doctor, adopted a similar scheme in his full and acute discussion, but was more interested in the nature of angels as individual, spatial, spiritual substances engaged primarily in the work of enlightenment and capable of rational demonstration (Summa contra Gentiles 91; Summa Theologica 50–64).

As Calvin saw, the error in so much angelology was to deal with angels apart from the biblical witness. Even regarding their function, there was a tendency to rationalize or to focus interest on the idea of the guardian angel (cf. Matt. 18:10 and perhaps Acts 12:15). An inevitable reaction came in the age of the Enlightenment and liberal Protestantism, when angels were either dismissed as fantastic, submitted to reinterpretation, or explained away as the relics of an original polytheism.

Some legitimate deductions may certainly be made from the biblical data. Though they come in human form, angels are essentially noncorporeal. Present at creation, they are still creatures (Ps. 148:2, 5). They form an ordered unity, yet their plurality entails the existence of individuals within the totality, with a possible gradation in function. Compared with humans, they have the advantage of being in God's immediate presence and serving as his direct messengers. They also guard the proprieties, if that is the meaning of 1 Corinthians 11:10, and seem to play some role in or over the nations (Dan. 10). But when humans respond to God's saving work in Christ, they are raised above angels, enjoy their ministry (Heb. 1:14), and will finally judge them (1 Cor. 6:3), for even angels are not faultless in God's eyes (Job 4:18; 15:15).

Has there been a fall of angels? Jude 6 suggests this, and Irenaeus (Against Heresies 4.37.1) and many fathers took this view. Certainly the Bible speaks of the dragon and his angels (Rev. 12:7) and also of powers of evil (Eph. 6:12), so that while we cannot be too dogmatic on the subject, we have to assume that there is a real kingdom of evil in grotesque caricature of the angelic kingdom. These angels and their leader were defeated at the cross (Col. 2:15) and will finally be condemned (Matt. 25:41).

G. W. BROMILEY

See also ANGEL OF THE LORD.

Bibliography. K. Barth, Church Dogmatics; G. B. Caird, Principalities and Powers; W. Carr, Angels and Principalities; H. Cremer et al., SHERK 1:174–78; J. Daniélou, Angels and Their Mission; A. B. Davidson, HDB 1:93–97; W. Grudem, Systematic Theology; W. Grundmann et al., TDNT 1:74–87; E. Langton, Angel Teaching of the New Testament; Ministries of the Angelic Powers According to the Old Testament and Later Jewish Literature; H. C. Thiessen, Introductory Lectures in Systematic Theology, 189–212; A. Whyte, Nature of Angels; J. M. Wilson, ISBE 1:124–27.

Angel of the Lord. In the OT and NT the angel of the Lord (mal'āk yhw̄h) is represented as acting on behalf of the nation of Israel as well as of individuals. The lack of precise data in the OT with regard to the identification of this figure and his relationship to Yahweh has given rise to a number of conclusions. Eichrodt understands the presence of this figure in the OT literature as an attempt to express the concept of theophany in a less direct manner because of the early realization that it is impossible to see God. Von Rad suggests that the figure may have been inserted into some of the older traditions in place of an original Canaanite numen. However, this presupposes an already concrete idea of the concept and does not explain its origin or the nature of the concept in early Israelite religion.

Angel of the Lord

Many understand the angel of the Lord as a true theophany. From the time of Justin on, the figure has been regarded as the preincarnate Logos. It is beyond question that the angel of the Lord must be identified in some way with God (Gen. 16:13; Judg. 6:14; 13:21–22), yet he is distinguished from God in that God refers to the angel (Exod. 23:23; 32:34) and speaks to him (2 Sam. 24:16; 1 Chron. 21:27) and the angel speaks to Yahweh (Zech. 1:12). The evidence for the view that the angel of the Lord is a preincarnate appearance of Christ is basically analogical and falls short of being conclusive. The NT does not clearly make that identification. It is best to see the angel as a self-manifestation of Yahweh in a form that would communicate his immanence and direct concern to those to whom he ministered.

T. E. MCCOMISKEY

See also ANGEL; THEOPHANY.

Bibliography. A. Bowling, TWOT 1:464–65; H. Bietenhard et al., NIDNTT 1:101–5; W. Eichrodt, Theology of the Old Testament; P. Heinisch, Theology of the Old Testament; J. B. Payne, Theology of the Older Testament; G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology.

Anglican Communion. A worldwide fellowship of churches in communion with the archbishop of Canterbury (England) and whose bishops are invited each decade to the Lambeth Conference held in London since 1867 (except during wartime). Anglicans hold that theirs is the church of NT times and the early church, reformed in the sixteenth century and waiting for the reunion of all Christians.

Bishops are the chief officers of Anglican churches, with archbishops or presiding bishops functioning as “first among equals” with national or provincial responsibilities and administrative authority. Only bishops may ordain clergy and consecrate other bishops. Some dioceses have assistant bishops called coadjutor or suffragan bishops. The latter do not automatically succeed the diocesan bishop, whereas the coadjutor does.

The basic unit in the church is the parish with its congregation and rector. A mission may be a congregation dependent upon a parish (or diocese). The diocese is that group of parishes and missions under a bishop whose representatives meet each year for a diocesan convention (or council). Each parish and mission is represented by laity as well as clergy, and laity are represented on all the significant governing committees. Bishops are elected at these conventions or councils in most Anglican churches, but some bishops are still appointed, as in the case of the Church of England and many mission dioceses.

The Book of Common Prayer, in one of its many derived forms, is used by all Anglican churches. It is regarded as the distinctive embodiment of Anglican doctrine, following the principle of lex orandi, lex credendi (the rule of prayer is the rule of belief). The section of the Prayer Book called the Ordinal, by which clergy are ordained following their vows, is especially crucial for doctrinal standards. The Holy Scripture is declared to be the Word of God and to contain all that is necessary to salvation. The Nicene and Apostles’ creeds are accepted as confessing the faith of Scripture and classical Christianity.

The Thirty-nine Articles, dating from the Elizabethan settlement in the sixteenth century, are not required for explicit assent in most of the communion, but they are generally bound with the Prayer Book and regarded as an important historical statement and document. These articles explicitly reject the doctrine of transubstantiation and affirm the doctrines of justification by faith, the Trinity, and the person of Christ as “very God and very Man.”

Worship in Anglican churches varies widely but is characterized by an attempt to follow the liturgical year; that is, to read the prescribed lessons designed to emphasize that portion of revelation from advent and the nativity (Christmas) through the manifestation of Christ to the Gentiles (Epiphany), Lent, Easter, and Pentecost. Worship is decisively biblical in that readings from both Testaments are required at all normal services. The Prayer Book is saturated with Scripture in the phrases of the prayers, the versicles and responses, the canticles, and the Psalter (Book of Psalms).

The Lord’s Supper, or Holy Eucharist, is generally regarded as the central service and gradually over the last century has come to be held with increasing frequency. The norm for public worship is to stand to sing, sit to listen, and kneel to pray. Recent revisions to the Prayer Book has resulted in the most substantial changes since the sixteenth-century work of Thomas Cranmer. The chief characteristics of the new books are flexibility, with options ranging from forms virtually identical to the traditional books to other that are exceedingly informal, replacing “thou” with “you” in addressing God, and giving modern synonyms for more obscure terms. In addition, the new revisions attempt to include more lay and congregational participation than was possible in the sixteenth century, when a literate congregation could not be assumed. The revisions have, however, met with considerable resistance on the part of many who feel the language to be inferior to Cranmer's and that some of the changes have unfortunate doctrinal implications.

The overall practical effect of this growing diversity among the Prayer Books will likely lead to more emphasis on Anglican identity being drawn from the pan-Anglican communion with the archbishop of Canterbury than on the use of a common Prayer Book as has been the case in the past.

The basic intention of Anglican worship is expressed in the Prayer Book: "To render thanks for the great benefits that we have received at his hands, to set forth his most worthy praise, to hear his most holy word, and to ask those things which are requisite and necessary, as well as for the body as the soul." This is sought to be done with all the majesty, solemnity, and esthetic quality possible, while at the same time making the mystery and awe as accessible and relevant as can be done to any and all conditions.

The wide diversity within Anglicanism is reflected by the astonishing growth and evangelical character of the church in East Africa, the highly sacramental and Anglo-Catholic tradition of the Province of South Africa, the liberal spirit and discomfort with classical expressions of orthodoxy on the part of the authors of Myth of God Incarnate, and the conservative evangelicals who retain an unyielding loyalty to Scripture and the Thirty-nine Articles.

Reverberations of post-Christian cultures are posing serious threats to the unity among and between Anglican churches. The more liberal wings of the Communion, especially in industrial countries, appear to some to be accommodating the faith to the spirit of the times, especially in regard to questions of sexuality, abortion, divorce, and dependence on historical-critical methods to establish the authority of Scripture. At the same time there is an opposite trend that seems to appreciate the more radical claims of Christian faith and more confidently "contend for the faith that was once for all entrusted to the saints" (Jude 1:3).

C. F. ALLISON

See also ANGLICO-CATHOLICISM; BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER; HIGH CHURCH MOVEMENT; LATITUDINARIANISM; LOW CHURCH; THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES.

Bibliography. P. E. Hughes, Anglican Reformers; D. MacCulloch, Thomas Cranmer; A. E. McGrath, Renewal of Anglicanism; S. Neill, Anglicanism; S. W. Sykes, Integrity of Anglicanism; S. Sykes and J. Booty, eds., Study of Anglicanism; W. Temple et al., Doctrine in the Church of England.

Anglo-Catholicism. The modern name for the tradition within Anglicanism that was previously termed "High Church." The name dates only from 1838, during the Tractarian or Oxford Movement. Edward Pusey, John Keble, and John Henry Newman were the leaders of this transition from the older High Church position with its emphasis on the established Erastian church-state relationship to an emphasis upon the distinctive claims of the church's authority in apostolic succession of bishops.

Earlier High Church proponents tended to dismiss the claims of Free Church bodies on the ground that they were not a part of the Church of England, duly constituted by law. The Anglo-Catholics sensed a real threat to the church rather than a help in this relationship with an increasingly secular state. Instead they insisted that the church's authenticity lay in the essential nature of the episcopacy (Tract no. 1, 1833). Ordination by bishops was thus seen to be of the essence of the church without which a church is not a church.

At the same time, less appreciation was given to the principles of the Anglican Reformation, and the movement became suspect in the eyes of many because of the large number of conversions to Rome out of Anglo-Catholicism, especially that of John Henry Newman. Two major works indicate the best in scholarship and theological emphasis of this tradition: Lux Mundi (1889) and Essays Catholic and Critical (1926).

In modern times four strands of Anglo-Catholicism can be discerned: (1) the Cambridge Camden Society and its successors, which lay great and somewhat romantic emphasis upon English history and pre-Reformation English rites and vestments; (2) liberal Anglo-Catholicism, which is less authoritarian and more friendly to liberal theology; (3) evangelical Anglo-Catholics, who attempt to blend biblical and Reformation teachings on grace and gospel with the classical dogmas and distinctive polity; and (4) pro-Roman Anglo-Catholicism, the main aim of which is the reunion of Anglicanism and Roman Catholicism, not merely in a general ecumenical way but by the sacrifice of the doctrine of the Anglican Reformation when it conflicts with the Council of Trent.

Anglo-Catholicism has emphasized the doctrine of the incarnation, sacramental theology, and ecclesiastical polity. It has appealed more to clergy than to laity.

C. F. ALLISON

See also ANGLICAN COMMUNION; HIGH CHURCH MOVEMENT; KEBLE, JOHN; NEWMAN, JOHN HENRY; OXFORD MOVEMENT; PUSEY, EDWARD BOUVERIE.

Bibliography. O. Chadwick, Victorian Church; O. Chadwick, ed., Oxford Movement; G. E. DeMille, Catholic Movement in the American Episcopal Church; C. Gore, ed., Lux Mundi; P. N. Hillyer, "Anglo-Catholic Theology," NDT 23-24; W. L. Knox, Catholic Movement in the Church of England; M. Ramsey, From Gore to

Anglo-Catholicism

Temple: An Era of Anglican Theology; G. Rowell, Vision Glorious; G. Rowell, ed., Tradition Renewed: The Oxford Movement Conference Papers; G. Selwyn, ed., Essays Catholic and Critical; D. Stone, Faith of an English Catholic.

Annihilationism. From Latin nihil (nothing), annihilationism expresses the position of those who hold that some, if not all, human souls will cease to exist after death. As observed by Warfield, this point of view may take three main forms: (1) all human beings inevitably cease to exist altogether at death (materialist); (2) while human beings are naturally mortal, God imparts to the redeemed the gift of immortality and allows the rest of humanity to sink into nothingness (conditional immortality); (3) humankind, being created immortal, fulfills its destiny in salvation, while reprobates fall into nonexistence either through a direct act of God or through the corrosive effect of evil (annihilationism proper). The distinction between conditionalism and annihilationism indicated above is frequently not observed, and these two terms are commonly used as practical synonyms. A fourth form of advocacy of the ultimate extinction of evil is the view that God will finally redeem all rational beings (universalism). Over against all the above positions, historic orthodoxy has always maintained both that human souls will eternally endure and that their destiny is irrevocably sealed at death.

The question whether humankind is naturally immortal pertains to the subject of immortality. The present article will state and briefly appraise the main evidence advanced in support of the cessation of the wicked.

God alone, it is urged, has immortality (1 Tim. 1:17; 6:16). This argument, if it proves anything, proves too much. In fact, God who alone has immortality in himself may and does communicate it to some of his creatures.

Immortality, it is urged, is represented as a special gift connected with redemption in Jesus Christ (Rom. 2:7; 1 Cor. 15:53–54; 2 Tim. 1:10). The same may be said of life or eternal life (John 10:28; Rom. 6:22–23; Gal. 6:8). Granted that in all such passages life and immortality are represented as the privileged possession of the redeemed, nonetheless in these connections these terms do not represent merely continued existence, but rather connote existence in joyful fulfillment of humankind's high destiny in true fellowship with God (John 17:3).

Cessation of existence, it is urged, is implied in various scriptural terms applied to the destiny of the wicked, such as death (Rom. 6:23; James 5:20; Rev. 20:14), destruction (Matt. 7:13; 10:28; 2 Thess. 1:9), and perishing (John 3:16). But these expressions do not so much imply annihilation as complete deprivation of some element essential to normal existence. Physical death does not mean that body or soul vanishes, but rather that an abnormal separation severs their natural relationship until God's appointed time. Spiritual death, or the "second death" (Rev. 20:14; 21:8), does not mean that the soul or personality lapses into nonbeing, but rather that it is ultimately and finally deprived of that presence of God and fellowship with him, which is the chief end of humankind and the essential condition of worthwhile existence. To be bereft of it is to perish, to be reduced to utter insignificance, to sink into abysmal futility. An automobile is said to be wrecked, ruined, destroyed, not only when its constituent parts have been melted or scattered away, but also when they have been so damaged and distorted that the car has become completely unserviceable.

It is inconsistent with God's love, it is urged, to allow any of his creatures to endure forever in torment. Furthermore, the continuance of evil would spell some area of permanent defeat for divine sovereignty, a dark corner perpetually marring the glory of his universe. These considerations are not without weight, and a complete answer may not be possible in the present state of our knowledge. They are not adjudged by traditional orthodoxy as sufficient to overthrow the substantial weight of scriptural evidence to the effect that the wicked will be consigned to endless conscious sorrow. This is apparent from the expressions "unquenchable fire" (Isa. 66:24; Matt. 3:12; Luke 3:17), "fire is not quenched" (Mark 9:48), "their worm will not die" (Isa. 66:24; Mark 9:48), "God's wrath remains on him" (John 3:36), as well as from the use of everlasting or forever with reference to chains, contempt, destruction, fire or burning, punishment, torment (Isa. 33:14; Jer. 17:4; Dan. 12:2; Matt. 18:8; 25:41, 46; 2 Thess. 1:9; Jude 6–7; Rev. 14:11; 19:3; 20:10). It is worthy of note that, in the biblical record, those who speak most about future punishment in its irrevocable finality are Jesus and the apostle John, the very ones who also represented most glowingly the supreme glory of God's love and the unshakable certainty of his ultimate triumph.

R. NICOLE

See also ADVENTISM; CONDITIONAL IMMORTALITY; INTERMEDIATE STATE.

Bibliography. E. Fudge, Fire that Consumes; B. B. Warfield, SHERK 1:183–86; In support of annihilationism, see H. Constable, Duration and Nature of Future Punishment; C. H. Hewitt, Classbook in Eschatology; E. Lewis, Life and Immortality; F. L. Piper, Conditionalism. In opposition to annihilationism, see H. Buis, Doctrine of Eternal Punishment; R. Garrigou-Lagrange, Life Everlasting; H. A. Hoekema, Bible and the Future; W. G. T. Shedd, Doctrine of Endless Punishment; Dogmatic Theology.

Anoint, Anointing. In the ancient Near East, anointing persons or objects with plain or perfumed oil was widespread for medicinal, preservative, and cosmetic purposes. Olive oil in particular was often applied after bathing (Ruth 3:3; Ps. 104:15; Ezek. 16:9) and on wounds (Isa. 1:6; Mark 6:13; Luke 10:34; James 5:14), corpses (Mark 16:1; Luke 23:56), released captives (2 Chron. 28:15), and even shields (2 Sam. 1:21; Isa. 21:5). Specially prepared oils were also used to anoint the head (Ps. 23:5; Matt. 26:7; Luke 7:46) and feet (Luke 7:38, 46; John 12:3) of guests or venerated persons. They were sometimes simply used as perfumes (2 Sam. 14:2; Dan. 10:3). A sign of joy in these instances (Isa. 61:3; Matt. 6:17), it was something from which mourners were always to abstain.

In the Old Testament. Anointing for such routine purposes, common to the entire ancient Near East, acquired distinctly religious significance in the OT. Anointing with oil set persons and objects apart as dedicated to divine service. According to legislation, elaborately prepared oils were used to dedicate the tabernacle, its furniture, and vessels (Exod. 30:22–33; 40:19–11), together with those from the high-priestly class of Levi who were to serve in it (Exod. 28:41; 29:7, 21; 30:30–33). There are also scattered references to the anointing of prophets (1 Kings 19:16; 1 Chron. 16:22; Isa. 61:1). The greatest number of references by far is to the anointing of kings, which dates back to the beginnings of the monarchy (1 Sam. 10:1; 16:13; 1 Kings 1:39). As the “anointed of the Lord,” such kings were assured of succession and elevated to an inviolable status (1 Sam. 24:7; 26:9, 11, 16).

The ancient Hebrews also looked forward to the coming of a Davidic king who would be specially anointed by God to bring in his kingdom. To this figure was given a name borrowed from the Hebrew word for anointing: the Messiah. Old Testament prophetic descriptions of the Messiah vary widely in emphasis and content. Often depicted as a great and just king (Pss. 2; 45; 72; 110; Zech. 9:9–10), he invariably enjoys a unique relationship with God the Father and is fully endowed with extraordinary spiritual and charismatic gifts (Isa. 7:14; 9:1–6; 11:1–5; Mic. 5:1–5). This figure was never lost sight of in the intertestamental period but did not play so prominent a role as in some of the later prophets.

In the New Testament. The entire NT testifies that Jesus of Nazareth was the Messiah. The equivalent Greek term for the “anointed one” (Christos) is applied to Jesus in every book except 3 John, and among the Greco-Roman communities, where its original meaning was probably not understood, it quickly lost the definite article and became a part of Jesus’ name. The Gospel of Mark turns entirely upon the revelation that Jesus is the Messiah (Mark 8:29), whereas Matthew establishes it at the outset in his links to the line of David (Matt. 1:16). The apostles preached this same message throughout the Acts (2:36; 4:27), and Paul spread it among the Gentiles. Jesus filled the office of Messiah with his own person, sometimes applying OT prophecies to himself, and so other titles or descriptions (Son of Man, Son of God, Savior) rapidly overwhelmed the original Hebrew concept of the “anointed one,” which simply was substantivized into a name, as in the first verse of Mark: “The gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God.” Ever since Bultmann, a large modernist school has attempted to deny that Jesus himself was conscious of being the “anointed one” or Messiah. But this rests upon an arbitrary reading of the Gospels that conservative critics have learned in recent years how better to refute.

In Church History. Such numerous references to anointing in Scripture could not fail to have an impact upon Christians in the course of the church’s history. Beginning in the eighth and ninth centuries, kings and bishops were anointed with chrism (holy oil) upon their elevation to office. They were considered the vicars or placeholders of Christ, set apart, like the OT kings and high priests, for divine service. Anointing was extended to the thumbs and hands of Catholic bishops (with which they are to bless the people) and is still a part of the ritual today. Into the nineteenth century, kings were anointed with catechumen’s oil (a lesser oil to distinguish them from the sacerdotal office). Beginning in the seventh and eighth centuries, the hands of priests were anointed at their ordination in order to dedicate to the Lord what was, in Catholic teaching, to consecrate and hold the Body of Christ. Beyond these instances of ritual anointing there are two others that came to assume sacramental status in the Roman Catholic Church.

From at least the year 200 onward, the church practiced a postbaptismal anointing (see 2 Cor. 1:21; 1 John 2:20–27) and laying on of hands (see Acts 8:14–17; 19:1–6) in order to confer the gift of the Holy Spirit. In the early church and still in large measure in Eastern churches, this ritual was not clearly distinguished from baptism itself, and the rite took its name from the anointing or, more accurately, from the chrism it employed. In the course of the Middle Ages, the Western or Catholic Church separated this rite from baptism and elevated it to the sacrament of confirmation, through which, its theologians taught, an increased or fortifying grace of the Spirit was conferred upon children or young adults.

The command to anoint the sick (James 5:14, together with a suggestive reference in Mark 6:13) led to a practice that in the Catholic Church eventually came to be known as extreme unction (since Vatican II once again called the anointing of the sick). From early Christian times until about 800, there are scattered references in both the Eastern and Western churches to the anoint-

Anoint, Anointing

ing of the sick with oil blessed by a priest or bishop, but such anointing was repeatable and could be performed by laypeople as well as clergy. Between 900 and 1300, Western practice linked it to penance done in mortal illness and the viaticum, the final reception of Communion, and thus it came to be regarded as the final forgiveness of sins, the healing of the soul that prepared it for heaven and the beatific vision. Medieval theologians often set it in parallel with cleansing infants of original sin at baptism (according to Catholic theology). Protestant Reformers uniformly rejected both the practice and its associated theology. In recent years, however, scattered Protestant groups have reconsidered the practice, which is now understood only with respect to prayer for physical healing. Just in the last decade, the Catholic Church has also reconsidered the medieval practice and theology that had been reaffirmed at the Council of Trent. Pope Paul VI issued a constitution (Sacram unctionem infirmorum, 1972) that placed much greater emphasis upon prayer for healing, wholly ignored the old name of extreme unction, and de-emphasized the notion of it as the final sacrament. J. VAN ENGEN

See also EXTREME UNCTION.

Bibliography. D. S. Allister, Sickness and Healing in the Church; W. Grundmann et al., TDNT 9:493–580; F. W. Puller, Anointing of the Sick in Scripture and Tradition.

Anselm of Canterbury (1033–1109). One of the greatest of all medieval theologians, even though his influence was largely limited in his own day to a small circle of fellow monks. Born in northern Italy and educated at the best new schools of grammar and dialectic in northern France, he became a monk at age twenty-seven in an abbey (Le Bec in Normandy) renowned for its zealous religious life and its excellent abbot-teacher, Lanfranc. Anselm served in turn as prior (1063–78) and abbot (1078–93) at Le Bec before reluctantly agreeing to succeed Lanfranc as archbishop of Canterbury (1093–1109). His twelve theological treatises, nineteen prayers, and three meditations, together with many of his letters (375 in all), rank as literary masterpieces. But all of them, even the most technical and logically demanding, presuppose a monastic setting given over wholly to the contemplative life. Indeed his first written works were prayers and meditations that transformed the formal liturgical prayer of the early Middle Ages into a more intimate and intense expression of personal devotion to Christ, Mary, and the saints. His letters likewise became models for the sophisticated expression of warm personal and religious friendships. His theological works, on the other hand, were marked not so much by personal warmth as intuitive intellectual insight, clarity of exposition, and rigorous argument.

In the best tradition of Benedictine monasticism, Anselm held that learning should serve the ends of the religious life. He always proceeded as one who already possessed faith and sought understanding, a tag (“faith seeking understanding”) that he borrowed from an old Latin rendering of Isaiah 7:9. But where other medieval monks made Scripture the end of their learning and the basis of their meditations, Anselm, fully trained in the rediscovered disciplines of grammar and dialectic, consciously set aside Scripture—much to Lanfranc’s dismay—in order to speculate freely on the essential truths of the Christian faith. In his view the human mind, created in the image of God, should seek to uncover the “necessary reasons” for things implicit in the divine being and implanted in all his works. With Augustine’s arguments on the Trinity ever hovering in the background, he reflected on the nature of the Highest Being, the attributes logically ascribable to him, his self-understanding and speech (the Word), and his relations to himself and others in love (the Spirit). Anselm initially called this first work (1076–77) an “example to meditating on the rationale of the faith,” then shortened it to Monologion [Soliloquy] on the Rationale of the Faith (see Rom. 12:6). Next he sought in a style at once speculative and prayerful to capture the very essence and necessity of God’s being in a single definition, the Being “than which no greater can be thought.” The very heart of his Proslogion [Colloquy], first entitled Faith Seeking Understanding, fascinated philosophers from the Middle Ages to the present, even though several great thinkers (Thomas Aquinas, Kant) rejected the so-called ontological argument, which was in many ways less an argument than a way of perceiving and defining the nature of reality.

With the same combination of grammatical definition and logical exposition, Anselm went on to treat matters pertaining to grammar, truth, the devil’s fall, the relationship of the virgin birth to original sin, the double procession of the Holy Spirit (at papal request), and the comportment of foreknowledge, predestination, and free will. Thus this philosophical theologian (in modern terms) ranged freely over issues later divided between general and special revelation, or natural and revealed theology. This applies particularly to his consideration of Why God Became Man, the most influential of all his theological works. Setting aside all knowledge of Jesus Christ, Anselm attempted to produce necessary reasons for the coming of a God-man and his atoning sacrifice. The injury dealt to God’s honor by humankind’s fall into sin required the human race itself to render satisfaction to an upright God; yet only God himself could adequately make amends. Hence the God-man whose innocent sacrifice potentially made satisfaction for all. Anselm may have aimed his argument partly at Jews, for their criticism of an incarnate God had become vocal in his day. But its greatest impact was upon Christians. His “satisfaction” theory of the atonement effectively refuted early medieval notions of the devil’s “rights” over fallen humankind and also displaced earlier Eastern emphases upon Christ as victor. Indeed this “satisfaction” theory shaped nearly all Catholic and Protestant thought on redemptive theology down to modern times. J. VAN ENGEN

Bibliography. Anselm, Opera Omnia, F. S. Schmitt, ed., J. Hopkins, tr.; G. R. Evans, Anselm and a New Generation; Anselm and Talking about God; J. Hopkins, Companion to the Study of St. Anselm; R. W. Southern, St. Anselm and His Biographer; R. W. Southern, ed., Eadmer: The Life of St. Anselm; R. W. Southern and F. S. Schmitt, eds., Memorials of St. Anselm; B. Ward, tr., Prayers and Meditations of St. Anselm.

Anthropology. See MANKIND, DOCTRINE OF.

Anthropomorphism. A term not found in the Bible—derived from Greek anthrōpos (man) and morphē (form)—a figure of speech that describes God as having human form (Exod. 15:3; Num. 12:8), with feet (Gen. 3:8; Exod. 24:10), hands (Exod. 24:11; Josh. 4:24), mouth (Num. 12:8; Isa. 40:5), and heart (Hos. 11:8), but in a wider sense the term also includes human attributes and emotions (Gen. 2:2; 6:6; Exod. 20:5; Hos. 11:8).

This tendency toward anthropomorphism, common to all religions, found such full expression in Greek polytheism that the common person thought of the gods as mortals. Xenophanes (ca. 570–480 B.C.) reacted strongly, accusing humankind of making the gods in its own image. Later developments in Greek thought considered humans as mortal gods (an early form of humanism) or viewed God in the metaphysical sense of pure, Absolute Being. The transcendentalism of the latter influenced the Hellenistic Jews of Egypt so that the translators of the Greek OT, the LXX, made during the third and second centuries B.C., felt compelled to alter some of the anthropomorphisms. For example, where the Hebrew reads “they saw the God of Israel” (Exod. 24:10), the LXX has “they saw the place where the God of Israel stood”; and for “I will speak with him mouth to mouth” (Num. 12:8), the LXX translates “I will speak to him mouth to mouth apparently.”

However, the OT, if read with empathy and understanding, reveals a spiritual development that is a corrective for either a crude, literalistic anthropomorphism or the equally false abhorrence of any anthropomorphic expressions. The “image of God” created in the human race (Gen. 1:27) was in the realm of personality, of spirit, not of form. Because the Israelites “saw no form” (Deut. 4:12) at Sinai, they were prohibited images in any form: male or female, beast, bird, creeping thing, or fish (Deut. 4:15–19). Jesus’ NT declaration that “God is spirit, and his worshipers must worship in spirit and in truth” (John 4:24) is anticipated by Job 9:32; Psalm 50:21; and Hosea 11:9.

The anthropomorphism of the Israelites was an attempt to express the nonrational aspects of religious experience (the mysterium tremendum [aweful majesty] discussed by Rudolf Otto) in terms of the rational, and the early expressions of it were not as “crude” as so-called enlightened people might think. The human characteristics of Israel’s God were always exalted, while the gods of Near Eastern neighbors shared the vices of their worshipers. Whereas the representation of God in Israel never went beyond anthropomorphism, the gods of the other religions assumed forms of animals, trees, stars, or even a mixture of elements. Anthropomorphic concepts were “absolutely necessary if the God of Israel was to remain a God of the individual Israelite as well as of the people as a whole. . . . For the average worshipper . . . it is very essential that his god be a divinity who can sympathize with his human feelings and emotions, a being whom he can love and fear alternately, and to whom he can transfer the holiest emotions connected with memories of father and mother and friend” (W. F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity, 2d ed., 202).

It is precisely in the area of the personal that theism, as expressed in Christianity, must ever think in anthropomorphic terms. To regard God solely as Absolute Being or the Great Unknown is to refer to him or it, but to think of God as literally personal, one with whom we can fellowship, is to say Thou. Some object to this view, calling it anthropomorphic, but they are at a loss to explain how the creatures of an impersonal force became personal human beings conscious of their personality.

“To say that God is completely different from us is as absurd as to say that he is completely like us” (D. E. Trueblood, Philosophy of Religion, 270). There is a mediating position where one finds the answer in the incarnation of Jesus the Christ, who said, “Anyone who has seen me has seen the Father” (John 14:9). At the same time we must realize the impossibility of absolute, complete comprehension of God, for “my thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways, declares the Lord” (Isa. 55:8). D. M. BEEGLE

Bibliography. W. Eichrodt, Theology of the Old Testament; G. D. Hicks, Philosophical Bases of Theism; R. Otto, Idea of the Holy; H. H. Rowley, Faith of Israel; H. B. Swete, Introduction to the Old Testament in Greek.

Anthroposophy. A religious and philosophical system based on the theosophical ideas of Rudolf

Anthroposophy

Steiner (1861–1925). Born in Hungary and raised a Roman Catholic, Steiner studied science at the University of Vienna, became an accomplished Goethe scholar, and acquired an intense interest in the occult. In 1902, while serving as editor of a literary magazine, he became general secretary of the German Theosophical Society but soon grew disillusioned with its overstress on Eastern religious thought. In 1913 Steiner broke with theosophy and founded the Anthroposophical Society, which joined certain Christian elements to its basically theosophical outlook. In 1922 Steiner and Friedrich Rittlemeyer, a former Protestant pastor, organized the movement into “Christian Fellowships” (Christengemeinschaften), where priests and priestesses performed mystical rites patterned after the Catholic Mass.

Like theosophy from which it came, anthroposophy includes elements from Hinduism, Neoplatonism, Gnosticism, and Sufism. It affirms the existence of spiritual as well as material worlds and teaches that salvation consists of escaping the confines of the material world by obtaining esoteric spiritual knowledge about the true nature of things. Unlike theosophy (wisdom of God), which holds that such knowledge comes from avatars (incarnations) and arhats (master teachers), anthroposophy (wisdom of man) teaches that people possess the truth within themselves. By cultivating one’s occult powers through certain mental, physical, and spiritual exercises, anyone can become a Hellseher, a master of clear vision, and thereby gain extraordinary spiritual insight. According to Steiner’s doctrine of the “seven lotus flowers,” each person has seven bodies (physical, astral, etheric, the most intimate “I,” etc.) that open out, like the lotus blossom, to new levels of truth. Once these spiritual organs are developed through meditation (yoga), one has access to “cosmic memory” through which one can understand all things.

Whereas theosophy views Christ as only one of many avatars, anthroposophy teaches that Christ is the only avatar, an exalted solar being (Sonnenwesen) who entered human history as the full revelation of the spiritual world. Contact with Christ brings deeper penetration into his own knowledge of reality. Thus for anthroposophists, celebration of the Eucharist has ultimate significance. Called the “Act of the Consecration of Man,” the sacrament mystically joins the celebrant with the spirit and body of Christ, making him truly “man” and capable of realizing his own occult powers.

Anthroposophy was condemned by the Roman Catholic Church in 1919. Followers today are most numerous in Germany, Britain, and the United States and are generally drawn from “intellectuals” in search of more “effervescent” religious experience outside established religious channels.

T. P. WEBER

Bibliography. G. A. Kaufmann, Fruits of Anthroposophy; F. Rittlemeyer, Reincarnation; A. P. Shephard, Scientist of the Invisible; R. Steiner, Story of My Life.

Antichrist. Although the term antichrist occurs only in the Johannine letters, the conception of an arch-opponent of God and his Messiah is found in both Testaments and the intertestamental writings. Opposition is reflected in the anti-prefix, which here probably means “against,” not “instead of,” although both ideas may be present: posing as Christ, Antichrist opposes Christ.

Old Testament Background. Because Christ is not fully revealed, the OT offers no complete portrait of Antichrist, but furnishes materials for the picture in descriptions of personal or national opposition to God.

Belial. Certain individuals, infamous for wickedness, are called “sons [or men] of Belial” (bē-lyā’al, probably meaning “without worth, useless”). Idolatry (Deut. 13:13), sodomy and rape (Judg. 19:22; 20:13), drunkenness (1 Sam. 1:16), disregard of God (1 Sam. 2:12), disrespect for authority (1 Sam. 10:27; 2 Chron. 13:7), lack of hospitality (1 Sam. 25:17, 25), perjury (1 Kings 21:10, 13), and evil speech (Prov. 6:12; 16:27) are among the sins of these “empty men” (2 Chron. 13:7), whom the good shun (Ps. 101:3).

Foreign Enemies. Opposition to God’s kingdom signifies opposition to him. The nations’ vain plot against the Lord’s anointed king in Psalm 2 may be a foreshadowing of the antichrist idea. Similarly, the taunt songs against the rulers of Babylon (Isa. 14) and Tyre (Ezek. 28) vividly describe the calamitous fall of monarchs who usurp divine prerogatives. Gog’s defeat (Ezek. 39:1–20; Rev. 20:7–10) seems to climax the fruitless struggle of nations to frustrate God’s purposes by harassing his people.

The Little Horn. Rebellion is symbolized in Daniel’s little horn, especially the eschatological chapter 7, which seems to depict the defeat of God’s final enemy, while chapter 8 describes Antiochus IV Epiphanes (175–163 B.C.), the foreign ruler most hated by the Jews because of his personal wickedness and ruthless persecution of their religion.

The portrait of this “king of the north” (Dan. 11), the personification of evil, has helped significantly to shape the NT figure of Antichrist: (1) he abolished the continual burnt offering and erected the abomination of desolation in the temple (Dan. 11:31; Matt. 24:15; Mark 13:14; Rev. 13:14–15); (2) he exalted himself to the position of deity (Dan. 11:36–39; 2 Thess. 2:3–4); and (3) his helpless death points to Christ’s slaying of “the lawless one” (Dan. 11:45; 2 Thess. 2:8; Rev. 19:20). Whatever the antecedents of Daniel’s beasts (Bouset, Antichrist Legend, holds that the battle of Antichrist and God stems from the Babylonian legend of Marduk’s struggle with Tia-mat), they are clearly nations opposing God and his people. The beast from the sea in Revelation 13:1 recalls Daniel 7:3, 7 and strengthens the link between Daniel's prophecy and the NT account of Antichrist.

Intertestamental Elaboration. Two emphases appear in the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha: (1) Rome replaces Syria as the national enemy, and Pompey supplants Antiochus IV as the epitome of opposition to God; and (2) Belial (Beliar) is personified as a satanic spirit.

The "lawless one" (2 Thess. 2:8) has been connected with Beliar, which rabbinic tradition interpreted as "without yoke" (bēli'ōl), that is, refusing the law's yoke. This connection seems strengthened by the LXX translation of belial by paranomos (lawbreaker; e.g., Deut. 13:13). However, though Paul's description may partially reflect the Beliar tradition, he distinguishes Beliar from the lawless one: Beliar is a synonym of Satan (2 Cor. 6:15), while Satan and the lawless one are differentiated (2 Thess. 2:9).

New Testament Development. Gospels. References to Christ's opponent are neither numerous nor specific. The disciples are warned that false Christs will attempt to deceive even the elect (Matt. 24:24; Mark 13:22). Similarly, Christ speaks of one who comes in his own name, whom the Jews receive (John 5:43). This may be a veiled reference to Antichrist or to any false Messiahs who present themselves to Judaism. Even the mention of the abomination of desolation (Matt. 24:15; Mark 13:14), recalling vividly Daniel's prophecy, is made with remarkable restraint. A single evil personality may be in view, but his portrait is not even sketched.

Second Thessalonians. Paul gives a clearer picture of Christ's archenemy, whose outstanding characteristic is contempt of law. Two names—"man of lawlessness" (preferable to "man of sin") and "the lawless one" (2 Thess. 2:3, 8–9)—stress this anarchistic attitude, recalling Daniel 7:25, where the little horn tries to change the times and law. Furthermore, Antichrist makes exclusive claim to deity (2 Thess. 2:4) in terms reminiscent of Daniel 7:25; 11:36. Paul does not picture a pseudo-Messiah posing as God's messenger, but a pseudo-God viciously opposing all other religion. His model may have been the blasphemous emperor Gaius (A.D. 37–41).

He deceives many by wonders (2 Thess. 2:9–10). Christ worked miracles by God's power, and the Jews attributed them to Satan (Matt. 12:24–32); Antichrist will work miracles by satanic power, and many will worship him as God.

One of Antichrist's names—"son of perdition" (2 Thess. 2:3 KJV; cf. John 17:12)—reveals his destiny: Christ will slay him by his breath and the brightness of his appearing (2 Thess. 2:8; Rev. 19:15, 20; cf. Isa. 11:4).

Antichrist is the personal culmination of a principle of rebellion already working secretly—"the mystery of lawlessness" (2 Thess. 2:7 NASB). When God's restraining hand that preserves law and order is withdrawn, this spirit of satanic lawlessness will become incarnate in "the lawless one."

Johannine Letters. Though John recognized the expectation of a single Antichrist, he turns his attention to the many antichrists who have come and deny that Jesus is the Christ, thus denying the true nature of both Father and Son (1 John 2:18, 22; 4:3). Contemporary docetists discredited Christ's humanity (2 John 7), claiming that he seemed to have human form. To John they were the embodiment of the antichrist spirit. Their view taught that humankind was divine apart from God in Christ, and it left God and the world ununited.

John's account complements rather than contradicts Paul's. Following Daniel, Paul depicts a single archenemy, who claims the right to personal worship. John stresses the spiritual elements in these claims and the spiritual lie that made Antichrist seemingly strong.

Revelation. The Apocalyptic's beast (Rev. 13), dependent in spirit and detail on Daniel, combines the characteristics of all four OT beasts. Further, the NT beast has an authority belonging only to the little horn of Daniel's beast. John seemingly implies that the savage impiety of Antiochus will be embodied in a kingdom; for the beast, although he has some personal characteristics, is more than a person: his seven heads are seven kings (Rev. 17:10–12). The beast himself is an eighth king, springing from one of the seven. This complicated picture suggests that the beast symbolizes worldly power, the anti-God spirit of a nationalistic ambition (in Daniel's prophecy personified in Antiochus and in John's day in Rome) that will become incarnate in one great demagogue—Antichrist.

To Paul's account, John adds at least one important element—the false prophet, a second beast who works under the authority of Antichrist, as Antichrist gains his authority from the dragon, Satan (Rev. 13:2, 11–12). After directing Antichrist's political and religious enterprises, the false prophet shares his fate at Christ's advent (Rev. 19:20).

Christian Interpretation. The fathers generally believed in a personal Antichrist. His identity hinged on whether the "mystery of lawlessness" was interpreted politically or religiously. Politically, the most likely candidate was Nero, who, legend held, would reappear in resurrected form (redivivus) to continue his terrible reign. This interpretation, propounded by Chrysostom and others, has gained prominence in this century through preteristic interpreters of Revelation like R. H. Charles and C. A. Scott. Irenaeus and others who held that Antichrist would emerge from a religious context traced him to Dan on the basis of Genesis 49:17; Deuteronomy 33:22; Jeremiah 8:16 (cf. the omission of Dan in Rev. 7:5–8).

Antichrist

The Reformers equated Antichrist with the papacy, as had some medieval theologians: Gregory I (who taught that whoever assumed the title universal priest was Antichrist's forerunner), Joachim of Floris, and Wycliffe. Luther, Calvin, the KJV translators, and the authors of the Westminster Confession concurred in this identification. Roman Catholic scholars retaliated, branding Rome's opponents Antichrist.

In the ideal or symbolic view, Antichrist is an ageless personification of evil, not identifiable with any one nation, institution, or individual. This idea gains support from the Johannine letters and has value in emphasizing the constancy of the warfare between Satan's manifold forces and Christ's.

Futurists (e.g., Zahn, Seiss, Scofield) hold that idealists fail to stress sufficiently the culmination of this hostility in a personal adversary. They believe that Antichrist will usher in a period of great tribulation at history's close, in connection with a mighty empire like a revived Rome, and will dominate politics, religion, and commerce until Christ's advent.

D. A. HUBBARD

See also ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION; MYSTERY OF INIQUITY; SECOND COMING OF CHRIST; TRIBULATION.

Bibliography. S. J. Andrews, Christianity and Antichristianity; G. C. Berkouwer, Return of Christ; W. Bousset, Antichrist Legend; G. G. Findlay, Thessalonians (CGT); D. Ford, Abomination of Desolation in Biblical Eschatology; R. Gundry, First the Antichrist; A. A. Hoekema, Bible and the Future; G. Milligan, Epistles to the Thessalonians; A. L. Moore, Parousia in the New Testament; H. Ridderbos, Paul; H. H. Rowley, Relevance of Apocalyptic; G. Vos, Pauline Eschatology.

Anticlericalism. The term anticlerical probably first appeared in the early 1850s in Catholic France. It indicated opposition to Ultramontane revival with its reassertion of the sacral power of priests and of the primacy of the pope in the church. A staggering battle in Italy and Europe over the temporal power of the pope focused anticlerical attitudes in the 1850s and 1860s, especially in Italy, Belgium, Spain, and France. To this day, anticlericalism as an attitude and as a movement has been a considerable political factor in every Roman Catholic area, notably in Europe, Latin America, and Quebec. Anticlericalism has condemned priestly participation in national governments, municipalities, elections, education, and land-and-capital ownership.

Opposition to clerical authority, as well as fear and ridicule of priests, are age-old within Catholic Christendom. In Catholic tradition, both before and after the Reformation, clergy have claimed to be the sole authority in church government and doctrine, as well as the only exercisers of sacramental power. They have put themselves forward as the leaders in faith and morals, and often as the guides of the laity in politics, economics, and intellectual and social life. In response is a long tradition of popular satire in songs and tales against any clerical failings—irregular sexual behavior, religious hypocrisy, social pomp, intellectual stupidity, and arrogance. Moreover, excessive use of clerical power or usurpation of political and economic power has again and again evoked vigorous resistance. Anticlericalism has assumed that priests are constitutionally unable to keep their own standards and are by nature inclined to dominate the whole of life.

The anticlerical factor in the Protestant movement of the 1500s contributed to the break with Rome and has continued to be a crucial element in anti-Catholicism to this day. In the 1700s the French philosophes were merciless against priests, and one Catholic state after another expelled the Jesuits. The French revolutionary governments tried to control priests by making them state employees. In 1820, 1830, 1848, and 1870, revolutionaries in Catholic Europe explicitly regarded priestly power as an enemy. The Papal States, as a "government of priests," epitomized to anticlericals all that was evil. The liberal republics in Latin America were anticlerical. After 1870, in France, Spain, Italy, Quebec, and much of Latin America, politics polarized as the church and most clergy sided with the right against liberals, republicans, and socialists who built anticlericalism into their programs. Anticlericalism has usually contributed to secularization in Catholic cultures: since clergy have been the main agents of Christian presence in public life, opposition to priests in politics has entailed opposition to Christianity in modern society. Following Vatican II, opposition to clerical domination within the church itself has contributed to a lay revival, but not yet to a termination of exclusively priestly authority in the church.

Anticlericalism has not been absent among Protestants. Many a Baptist pastor, Reformed dominie, or Lutheran minister has evoked anticlerical responses. Charismatics, Brethren, and Quakers have found they can do without clergy entirely.

C. T. MCINTIRE

Bibliography. O. Chadwick, "Rise of Anticlericalism," in Secularization of the European Mind in the Nineteenth Century; J. M. Sanchez, Anticlericalism: A Brief History.

Antinomianism. From Greek anti (against) and nomos (law), referring to the doctrine that it is not necessary for Christians to preach or obey the moral law of the OT. Several different justifications have been given for this view down through the centuries: (1a) once persons are justified by faith in Christ, they no longer have any obligation toward the moral law because Jesus freed them from it; (1b) since Christ has raised believers above the positive precepts of the law, they need be obedient only to the immediate guidance of the Holy Spirit, who will keep them from sin; (2) since the law came from the Demiurge (as in Gnosticism) and not from the true, loving Father, it was a Christian's duty to disobey it; (3) since sin is inevitable anyway, there is no need to resist it (by extension, it can be argued that since God, in his eternal decree, willed sin, it would be presumptuous to resist it); and (4) the law is unnecessary and indeed contrary to the gospel of Jesus Christ.

It was the first of these views that the apostle Paul had to address in various letters to first-century Christian churches. For example, some in the Corinth church taught that once people were justified by faith, they could engage in immorality since there was no longer any obligation to obey the moral law (1 Cor. 5–6). Paul also had to correct others who obviously had drawn wrong conclusions from his teachings on justification and grace (e.g., Rom. 3:8, 31). Paul himself agonized over his own inability to meet the law's demands, but he also exalted it as holy, righteous, and good (Rom. 7:12). Elsewhere he taught that the law was the schoolmaster who brings sinners to a knowledge of their sin and therefore to Christ (Gal. 3:24). He concluded that the proper relationship was that stipulated works of the law flowed from the experience of saving grace rather than vice versa (Rom. 6–8).

Perhaps the most extreme form of antinomianism in early Christianity found expression in the Adamite sect in North Africa. The Adamites flourished in the second and third centuries, called their church "Paradise," condemned marriage because Adam had not observed it, and worshiped in the nude.

Many Gnostics in the first centuries of the Christian era held the second variation of antinomianism—that the Demiurge, not the true God, gave the moral law; therefore it should not be kept. Some forms of antinomian Gnosticism survived well into the Middle Ages. Moreover, various medieval heretical groups preached Corinthian-style freedom from the law, some going so far as to claim that even prostitution was not sinful for the spiritual person.

The two most famous antinomian controversies in Christian history occurred in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries and involved Martin Luther and Anne Hutchinson, respectively. In fact, it was Luther who actually coined the word antinomianism in his theological struggle with his former student, Johann Agricola. In the early days of the Reformation, Luther had taught that after NT times the moral law had only the negative value of preparing sinners for grace by making them aware of their sin. Agricola denied even this function of the law, believing that repentance should be induced only through the preaching of the gospel of salvation by grace through faith in Christ.

This first major theological controversy in Protestant history lasted intermittently from 1537 to 1540. During this time Luther began to stress the role of the law in Christian life and to preach that it was needed to discipline Christians. He also wrote an important theological treatise to refute antinomianism once and for all: Against the Antinomians (1539). The whole matter was finally settled for Lutheranism by the Formula of Concord in 1577, which recognized a threefold use of the law: to reveal sin, to establish general decency in society at large, and to provide a rule of life for those who have been regenerated through faith in Christ.

There were several outbreaks of antinomianism in the Puritan movement in seventeenth-century England. However, the major controversy over this teaching among Puritans came in New England in the 1630s in connection with an outspoken woman named Anne Marbury Hutchinson, who emigrated to Massachusetts Bay Colony in 1634. At the time, the New England Puritans were attempting to clarify the place of "preparation for conversion" in covenant (or federal) theology. They had come to the conclusion that salvation lay in fulfilling the conditions of God's covenant with humankind, including preparation for justification and a conscious effort toward sanctification. To some, including Hutchinson, this seemed like an overemphasis on the observance of the law, and she condemned it as a "covenant of works." Instead, she stressed the "covenant of grace," which she said was apart from the works of the law. She began to hold informal meetings in her home to expound her views and to denounce those of the preachers in Massachusetts. In the context of great stress (it was only a few years before the civil war erupted in England, and the colony lived in tense frontier circumstances), the New England clergy probably misunderstood her main concerns and overreacted to what they perceived to be a threat to the unity and internal security of the Puritan community. At a synod of Congregational churches in 1637 Hutchinson was condemned as an antinomian, enthusiast, and heretic and banished from the colony. In 1638 she moved to Rhode Island.

In the twentieth century, some view existentialist ethics, situation ethics, and moral relativism as forms of antinomianism because these either reject or diminish the normative force of moral law. Certainly most orthodox Christians today agree that the law served the twin purposes of establishing the existence of human sin and of providing moral guidelines for Christian living. In general, the various antinomian controversies in history have clarified the legitimate distinctions between law and gospel and between justification and sanctification.

Antinomianism

The Christian community as a whole has rejected antinomianism for several reasons. It is damaging to the unity of the Bible, which demands that one part of divine revelation not contradict another. Even more important, antinomians misunderstand the nature of justification by faith, which, though granted apart from the works of the law, is not sanctification. In general, orthodoxy teaches that the moral principles of the law are still valid, not as objective strivings but as fruits of the Holy Spirit at work in the life of the believer. This disposes of the objection that since the law is too demanding to be kept, it can be completely thrust aside as irrelevant to the individual living under grace.

R. D. LINDER

See also AGRICOLA, JOHANN; JUSTIFICATION; SANCTIFICATION.

Bibliography. E. Battis, Saints and Sectaries: Anne Hutchinson and the Antinomian Controversy in the Massachusetts Bay Colony; R. Bertram, "Radical Dialectic between Faith and Works in Luther's Lectures on Galatians (1535)," in Luther for an Ecumenical Age, ed. C. S. Meyer; F. F. Bruce, New Testament History; M. U. Edwards Jr., Luther and the False Brethren; D. D. Hall, ed., Antinomian Controversy, 1636-1638: A Documentary History; I. Murray, "Antinomianism: New England's First Controversy," Banner of Truth, 179-80:7-75.

Antiochene Theology. The book of Acts indicates that the term Christian was first used at Antioch and that a church was there at the time of the early ministry of the apostle Paul (11:26). Since it was from Antioch that Paul began his three missionary journeys, it was the nearest thing he had to a home base. The decisions of the apostolic Council at Jerusalem were published there (Acts 15:30-31).

The first monarchical bishop to gain prominence was Ignatius of Antioch, who held the post in the early second century (died ca. 110). In his seven epistles he shows himself eager to defend the full deity and full humanity of Christ. He particularly warns against docetism, and here appears an emphasis that increasingly characterizes the school of Antioch. God came into flesh and was born of the Virgin Mary. Christ died to deliver people from ignorance and the devil. He rose again from the dead for us. The believer is not only in Christ, he is also christophoros ("Christ-bearing"). The Last Supper is the flesh and blood of Christ, though there is no suggestion of a substantial change. Christian love is a cardinal emphasis in Ignatius.

Theophilus of Antioch, in the latter part of the second century, developed the Logos doctrine, referring to the logos prophorikos—that is, first as an idea in God's mind then projected forth as a creative force to make a real world. The word trias (threefold) is applied to the Godhead first by Theophilus.

Three-quarters of a century later, Paul of Samosata occupied the episcopal throne in Antioch. The emphasis on the human nature of Christ that was to characterize the later Antioch makes a clear appearance. With a monarchian stress, Paul of Samosata found the Logos, a divine force, part of the mind of the Father, dwelling in Jesus from his birth, but apart from the virgin. He manifested himself as energeia (power). Jesus was not to be worshiped though his endowment with the Logos was quantitatively unusual. His unity with God is one of purpose, will, love. While it is possible for Paul of Samosata to speak of one prosōpon ("face") of God and the Logos and to use the term homoousios ("same being") of Christ and the Father, yet the Logos and the Son were not by any means identical. Paul was excommunicated and, after the Roman recapture of Antioch, well-nigh completely lost his influence. Paul's opponents did not approve the term homoousios, later to become a touchstone of orthodoxy.

Shortly after Paul's fall from power, the schoolmaster Lucian came to prominence in Antioch. Lucian conceived of Christ on a higher plane than did Paul. Whether he considered him as equal with the Father in his deity is questionable. His work on the text of the Greek Bible was extensive, and he favored the historical and critical interpretation of the Scriptures.

In the decades following the Council of Nicaea, Antioch exhibited wide differences of opinion on the Arian question, but in this atmosphere John Chrysostom grew to maturity with his extraordinary ability as a preacher. Emphasizing the moral values of Christianity, he continued the stress on historical exegesis. One of Chrysostom's teachers, the presbyter Diodorus, became in due course bishop of Tarsus and was recognized as a "normal" theologian by the Council of Constantinople in 381. But he did not find an adequate expression for the relationship between the divine and human natures of Christ. There seemed almost to be a dual personality in his conception. Another presbyter, Theodore, later bishop of Mopsuestia (ca. 350-ca. 428), developed historical criticism much further. He failed to find the doctrine of the Trinity in the OT, and he minimized the messianic intimations in the Psalms. But he put heavy stress upon the importance of textual and historical study as a basis for exegesis. Theodore emphasized the difference between God and humankind. The Logos humbled himself and became a human. The prosōpon of the man is complete and so is that of the Godhead. His disciple, church historian Theodoret (ca. 393–ca. 458), carried on his work. Theodoret's exegesis is in the best historical tradition, his apologetic writing clear and well organized. He stressed the infinite difference between God and humankind. His christological views were unquestionably influenced by his friend Nestorius, the most prominent representative of the Antiochene school. Impetuous, self-confident, full of energy, Nestorius was not a scholar. He emphasized the humanity of Jesus, but it is reasonably clear that he did not intend to express a heretical view. The union of Godhead and manhood in Christ is voluntary, but it can be said that there is one prosōpon of Jesus Christ. Nestorius campaigned against the term theotokos as applied to the virgin Mary, yet he agreed that, if properly understood, the term was unobjectionable. It was the violence of his emphases, with their stress on the separateness of the human and the divine in Christ, that was dangerous.

Justinian's Edict of the Three Chapters in 543 was unfair to the School of Antioch in its condemnations of the writings of Theodore of Mop-suestia and Theodoret. The Council of Constantinople of 553, called the Fifth Ecumenical Council, condemned writings of the Antioch school, but on the basis of falsified and mutilated quotations.

The separation from the imperial church of the bishops who led the Nestorian schism and the capture of Antioch in 637 by the rising power of Islam checked the further distinctive development of the School of Antioch. Its Aristotelian emphasis on rationality, ethical quality, and human free agency was not popular. Yet it is to be valued for its stress on the genuine continuance in the Second Person of the properties of each nature and for its insistence upon the importance of grammatico-historical exegesis.

P. WOOLLEY

See also CHRYSOSTOM, JOHN; HOMOIOUSIOS; LOGOS; MONARCHIANISM; NESTORIUS, NESTORIANISM; PAUL OF SAMOSATA.

Bibliography. J. F. Bethune-Baker, Nestorius and His Teaching; J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines; F. Loofs, Nestorius and His Place in the History of Christian Doctrine; C. C. Richardson, Christianity of Ignatius of Antioch; R. V. Sellers, Two Ancient Christologies; A. R. Vine, Approach to Christology; D. S. Wallace-Hadrill, Christian Antioch: A Study of Eastern Christian Thought.

Antipedobaptism. See BAPTISM, BELIEVERS'.

Anti-Semitism. A term introduced in 1879 by Wilhelm Marr, a German political agitator. At that time, it designated anti-Jewish campaigns in Europe. Soon, however, it came to be applied to the hostility and hatred directed toward Jews since before the Christian era.

Long and painful best describes the history of anti-Semitism. Among Jews, the tragic facts about anti-Semitism are well known, for it occupies a major portion of Jewish history. Today, after more than two millennia, this seemingly ubiquitous evil continues to exist. Hence, sensitivity to the wiles of the would-be anti-Semite is never far from the collective conscience of world Jewry. In Christian circles, however, the story of anti-Semitism—often sordid and self-indicting—remains generally untold. This is the case, it would seem, because the history of the church is about as long as the history of anti-Semitism—if not in the overt acts of Christians, certainly in their guilty silence.

In the ancient world, the first major example of anti-Semitism occurred during the reign of Antiochus IV Epiphanes (175–163 B.C.). This Seleucid ruler's attempt to Hellenize Jews of his day met with stiff opposition. Jews were monotheists and thus, for the most part, aloof from their Gentile neighbors, who viewed sabbath rest as congenital idleness and adherence to dietary laws as gross superstition. Antiochus's attack on Jewish religion resulted in the desecration of the temple. A pig was sacrificed on the altar and its blood sprinkled upon Jewish scrolls. Jews were regarded by the Syrian rulers as nomadic wanderers, a homeless people worthy of destruction. Jews found the idolatry of the Greek world abhorrent and later, under the Romans, rejected emperor worship. Thus, Jews were viewed as the great dissenters of the Mediterranean world. To pagans they became personae non gratae, victims of discrimination and contempt.

The destruction of the temple in A.D. 70 marked a widespread dispersion of the Jews. In the second century the Roman emperor Hadrian (117–38) issued edicts forbidding the practice of Judaism. About this time the great Rabbi Akiba was tortured to death by the Romans by having his flesh stripped from his body with iron combs.

In 321 Constantine made Christianity the official religion of the Roman state. Jews were forbidden to make converts, serve in the military, or hold any high office. Several centuries later, under Justinian, Jews were barred from celebrating Passover until after Easter.

The roots of theological anti-Semitism derive from certain teachings that arose from the early Christian centuries. The Jewish revolt of A.D. 66–70 resulted in the death, exile, or slavery of thousands of Jews. Such hardship was thought by the rapidly expanding Gentile church to be chastisement, proof of divine rejection. Gradually the church saw itself as superseding Judaism, a dead and legalistic faith. Triumphant, the church now stood over the synagogue as the new Israel of God, heir to the covenant promises. But Jews, as a people, still chafed under the Roman yoke. They failed to understand messianic redemption in terms of a suffering servant; they refused to believe that God had forever cast away his chosen.

Anti-Semitism

The writings of several church fathers reflect the theological invective directed toward Jews. John Chrysostom, the "golden-mouthed," is a noted example. He taught that "the synagogue is a brothel and a theater, . . . a den for unclean animals. . . . Never has a Jew prayed to God. . . . They are all possessed by the devil."

In the Middle Ages, Jews were largely excluded from Christian culture. They sought to avoid social, economic, and ecclesiastical pressures by living behind ghetto walls. They were, however, permitted to practice usury, which led Christians to accuse them of being a pariah people. Jews were required to wear a distinctive hat or patch sewn on their clothing. They were accused of having a peculiar smell, in contrast to the "odor of sanctity." Jews were also maligned as "Christ-killers," desecrators of the host, murderers of Christian infants, spreaders of the black plague, poisoners of wells, and sucklers of sows. The First Crusade (1096) resulted in numerous mass suicides as Jews sought to avoid forced baptism. Toward the close of the Middle Ages, many Jews became homeless wanderers. They were expelled from England in 1290, from France in 1306, and from cities in Spain, Germany, and Austria in the following years.

The Spanish Inquisition and expulsion of 1492 resulted in thousands of torturings, burnings at the stake, and forced conversions. In Germany, one generation later, Luther issued a series of vitriolic pamphlets attacking Jews. Of Jews he wrote, "Let us drive them out of the country for all time."

Toward the start of the modern ages a bloody revolt against the Cossacks occurred in Poland (1648–58). Caught in the middle, about half a million Jews were killed. In other European countries at the time, Jews continued to be persecuted or, at best, viewed with suspicion or contempt.

In the latter part of the nineteenth century the largest Jewish population in the world (six million) was in czarist Russia. There Jews experienced a series of vicious pogroms that left thousands dead. Others, joining Jews from different European lands, fled to America. In this country they hoped to find the place earlier described by George Washington as offering "to bigotry no sanction, to persecution no assistance." Between 1880 and 1910 more than two million Jews immigrated to America through New York City. During this time the celebrated Dreyfus Affair in France (1894) drew the problem of anti-Semitism to world attention.

Rooted in the soil of Germany, the Holocaust of the twentieth century stands as an unparalleled event. Nazi propaganda stated that the human race must be "purified" by ridding it of Jews. The "final solution" to the Jewish "problem" was camps, gas chambers, and crematoria. Between 1933, when Hitler came to power, and the end of World War II, some six million Jewish lives were destroyed. Today in Jerusalem the Yad Vashem (the name is taken from Isa. 56:5) stands as a memorial to Holocaust victims and as an institution for research and documentation.

At present, anti-Semitism persists wherever Jews are found. Jews of Russia and France have been especially oppressed. In European countries and the United States, recent anti-Semitic incidents include synagogue smearings and bombings, desecration of gravestones, vicious graffiti, Nazi pamphlets, and grotesque Jewish stereotypes in the press. At other times the so-called polite variety of anti-Semitism is found, namely, discrimination and antipathy displayed toward Jews in social, educational, and economic realms. The Anti-Defamation League and other Jewish agencies continue to make slow but steady progress in seeking to promote understanding among peoples of different races and religions.

M. R. WILSON

See also ZIONISM.

Bibliography. B. Blumenkranz, EJ 3:79–160; A. T. Davies, ed., Anti-Semitism and the Foundations of Christianity; E. H. Flannery, Anguish of the Jews; R. E. Gade, Historical Survey of Anti-Semitism; C. Klein, Anti-Judaism in Christian Theology; R. Ruether, Faith and Fratricide; S. Sandmel, Anti-Semitism in the New Testament.

Antitrinitarianism. See UNITARIANISM.

Antitype. See TYPE, TYPOLOGY.

Antony of Egypt (ca. 251–356). Antony of Egypt was born of wealthy parents who died early, leaving him to care for his only sister. At the age of about twenty he heeded the scriptural call to sell his possessions and follow Christ (Matt. 19:21) and withdrew from the world to become an ascetic. He is often cited as the founder of eremitic monasticism. (Erēmos, the etymological root of "hermit," refers to the desert to which Jesus withdrew. Anchorite is another term used in reference to the monasticism practiced by Antony and derives from anachōrēsis, meaning "withdraw.") But Antony was not the first; others had already gone just outside their villages to practice askēsis (i.e., the rigorous discipline of monastics in the early centuries of the church). Antony did capture the attention of his contemporaries and became the archetype and inspiration of Egyptian monasticism, defining monastic spirituality for his and succeeding generations. This reputation owed much to the Life of Antony composed by Athanasius shortly after Antony's death. Athanasius tells us that Antony moved farther away to tombs, later went to the desert to live in a fort at Pispis, then finally retreated not far from the Red Sea, seeking solitude from visitors who came on pilgrimages or to live near him as hermits. He taught virginity, poverty, and obedience. His spiritual battles in the desert are described as warfare with demons, much after the fashion of Christ. These tempt the monk through thoughts (logismoi, such as lust) and distract him from the love of God; self-scrutiny, fasting, prayer, and Scripture reading are necessary if one is to conquer the demons. Athanasius probably placed anti-Arian sentiments in Antony's mouth to counter the support Arians sought from Egyptian monastics and, perhaps, to interpret Antony's asceticism in the context of the soteriological sufficiency of Christ that undergirded the orthodox understanding of the Trinity. D. L. OKHOLM

Bibliography. Athanasius: The Life of Antony and the Letter to Marcellinus, R. C. Cragg, trans.; D. Knowles, Christian Monasticism; D. O. Murchu, "St. Antony of Egypt: The Man and the Myth," Cistercian Studies 20.2:88–97.

Anxiety. Anxiety is a universal experience. In contrast to fear, which is the apprehension of a real and present danger, anxiety anticipates possible dangers in the future and helplessly dwells on how to reduce them. Even as many dangers and diseases are eliminated, our world grows increasingly worrisome, prompting many modern thinkers to call the last half of the twentieth century the "age of anxiety."

Modern psychology and medicine provide evidence that worry and anxiety have disastrous effects ranging from ulcers to chronic feelings of unhappiness. Psychological theories are constructed and therapeutic rituals formulated to stop the tide of anxiety. Psychological terror reigns in our world. We are our own torturers.

The profound words of Matthew 6:25–32 record Jesus' view of anxiety, his reasoning, and his prescription. The Lord states clearly that worry is a complete waste of energy and should not be indulged in because God provides for our needs. He then appeals to reason about the consequences of worry: "Can your worry add a single cubit to your life?" Care and fretting have never manipulated the future and will never do so. Jesus states that the ungodly will fret over having their needs met, but that believers have security in the Father.

The position of the Lord regarding anxiety appears straightforward: (1) God the Father loves us and is in complete control, (2) God will meet our needs, and (3) worry is useless and without effect. Jesus compares fretting over basic needs to the ways of the ungodly, and he contrasts this with the spiritually mature life of faith.

The apostle Paul echoes this position in Philipians 4:6: "Do not be anxious about anything, but in everything, by prayer and petition, with thanksgiving, present your requests to God." The reasoning for the Christian is that God is the person in complete control of life's events. But how does one translate reasoning down to the emotional and behavioral level?

The Scriptures give us the key: we are distressed against worry through the power of the Holy Spirit. During a time when the natural response is to be anxious, the Holy Spirit will sustain the believer. A practical example is Luke 12:11–12, where Jesus told the disciples not to be afraid when the authorities brought them in because "the Holy Spirit will teach you at that time what you should say." In 2 Timothy 1:7 we are told that "God did not give us a spirit of timidity, but a spirit of power, of love and of self-discipline." Reducing worry is a process rooted in a relationship with the Spirit and not simply a matter of human willpower. The believer's confidence grows with the understanding that one's cares can be rolled onto God "because he cares for you" (1 Pet. 5:7). For the Christian, relationship—not a technique—is the key to overcoming worry.

Jesus tells us in Matthew 6:33 what we should put in place of worry. Indeed, he gives us a contingency that tells us the only way to guarantee that one's needs will be met. If we "seek first his kingdom and his righteousness, [then] all these things will be given to you as well [i.e., our needs will be met]." It is only when we seek godliness in our lives that we are assured of this provision. Talking about meeting needs apart from a central relationship with the Creator is contradictory.

As Martha fussed over preparations for dinner, Jesus said to her, "Martha, Martha, you are worried and upset about many things, but only one thing is needed" (Luke 10:41–42). Helping the Marthas of this world reduce worry involves a daily relationship with God combined with methods of deflecting attention away from irrational ideas and onto realistic beliefs. Overcoming anxiety is more than an injunction to stop. Learning to worry less is undergirded by a developing, daily walk with God. As the writer of Hebrews exclaims, "The Lord is my helper; I will not be afraid. What can man do to me?" (13:6).

D. SIMPSON

Bibliography. G. R. Collins, Overcoming Anxiety; F. B. Minirth and P. D. Meier, Happiness Is a Choice; B. Narramore and B. Counts, Freedom from Guilt; C. Osborn, Release from Fear and Anxiety; P. Tournier, Guilt and Grace.

Apocalyptic. The word apocalypse (unveiling) is derived from Revelation 1:1, where it refers to the ascended Jesus' revelation to John of the consummation of the age. The word has been applied by modern scholars to a group of Jewish books that contain similar literary and eschatological characteristics, not all of which are really apocalypses. An apocalypse is a book containing real or alleged revelations of heavenly secrets or of the events that will attend the end of the world and the inauguration of the kingdom of God.

Apocalyptic

Historical Background. Many apocalypses were produced by unknown Jewish authors between 200 B.C. and A.D. 100 in imitation of the Book of Daniel. (Daniel is often described as the first such apocalypse, but numerous traits linking Daniel closely to the prophetic writings lead to the conclusion that Daniel stands between the prophetic and apocalyptic types. There are also other reasons for dating Daniel earlier than Maccabean times.) The apocalypses arose out of a historical milieu involving a historical-theological problem consisting of three elements.

Emergence of a "Righteous Remnant." In the prophetic period Israel continually lapsed into idolatry, forsaking the law of God. After the restoration there emerged circles of Jews who were loyal to the law. When Antiochus Epiphanes, in 168 B.C., attempted a forcible assimilation of the Jews to Greek culture and religion, these righteous, called Chasidim or Hasideans, refused to submit, choosing death rather than disobedience to the law. This spirit was preserved in their successors, the Pharisees. Another group, the Qumran community, withdrew from the mainstream of Jewish life to seek a monastic retreat in the desert, giving themselves in complete devotion to the study and observance of the law.

Problem of Evil. The prophets promised that a repentant, restored Israel would inherit the kingdom. New Israel was restored to the land and was faithful to the law. According to the Jewish definition of righteousness, the conditions laid down by the prophets were satisfied; but the kingdom did not come. Instead came unprecedented suffering. Antiochus Epiphanes attempted to destroy the Jewish faith, inflicting tortures and martyrdoms upon the faithful. The religious liberty won by the Maccabean rebellion did not bring the kingdom of God. Instead of God's rule came the rule of the secular, worldly Hasmoneans and, after 63 B.C., Rome's native puppets and procurators. A righteous Israel that merited the kingdom met only suffering and political bondage.

Cessation of Prophecy. Throughout these times of unparalleled evil, God did not speak to explain this historical enigma. The voice of prophecy was stilled. No prophet appeared to announce "Thus says the Lord" and to interpret to the afflicted people of God the riddle of the suffering of the righteous.

The apocalypses arose out of this milieu to provide an explanation of the sufferings of the righteous and the delay of the kingdom of God.

Literary Characteristics. Apocalyptic as a genre of literature succeeded the prophetic. At some points apocalyptic is a development of elements in prophecy; at other points it departs from the prophetic character. No sharp line can be drawn between the two types, and characterizations of apocalyptic differ considerably.

Revelations. The prophets often received their message by revelation, but their main concern was "the word of the Lord." Often the word of God came to the prophets as an overwhelming inner conviction apart from visions or dreams. In the apocalypses, the word of the Lord gave way to revelations and visions. God does not speak by his Spirit to his servants. The seer must learn the solution to the problems of evil and the coming of the kingdom through dreams, visions, or heavenly journeys with angelic guides.

Imitative Literary Character. The prophets, out of experiences in which God disclosed his will, announced the divine will to the people. Scholars who reject any supernatural element admit real psychological experiences by the prophets. Fourth Ezra possibly reflects real subjective experiences, but the revelations of the apocalypists are usually only a literary form. The visions are literary fictions imitating those of the prophetic writings. Generally, therefore, prophecy was spoken first, while apocalypses were written first.

Pseudonymity. The prophets spoke in the name of the Lord directly to the people. In the Maccabean period, however, the voice of prophecy was stilled, and the apocalypists attributed their revelations to OT saints as a means of validating their message to their own generation. In this matter Daniel stands alone, for he is unknown apart from his appearance in the apocalypse ascribed to him.

Symbolism. The prophets often used symbols to convey the divine message. In the apocalypses, symbolism becomes the main stock in trade, particularly as a technique for outlining the course of history without employing historical names. This technique appears first in Daniel and was imitated with bizarre proliferation in later apocalypses.

Rewritten History. The prophets took their stand in their own historical situation and proclaimed the word of God to their generation against the background of the future kingdom of God. The apocalypists sometimes took their stand at a point in the distant past and rewrote history as though it were prophecy down to their own day, at which time the coming of the kingdom is expected. In some instances apocalypses can be dated by the latest events reflected in the alleged prophecy.

Religious Characteristics. The word apocalyptic is used also to describe the eschatology found in the apocalypses.

Dualism. Apocalyptic eschatology sees a contrast between the character of the present time of suffering and the future time of salvation that is so radical that it is finally described in terms of two ages: this age and the age to come. This age is characterized by evil; the age to come will see the kingdom of God. The transition from this age to the coming age can be accomplished only by a supernatural inbreaking of God. This dualism is not metaphysical or cosmic but historical and temporal. While this terminology of the two ages appears in the NT, it is found in the apocalyptic literature in fully developed form only in 4 Ezra and the Apocalypse of Baruch.

Many critics attribute this development to the influence of Persian dualism, but it can also be explained as a historical development of ideas already implicit in the OT prophets. The prophetic expectation of the future kingdom includes a redeemed earth (Isa. 11:6–9; 32:15–18; 65:17; 66:22). This transformation will be accomplished only by a divine visitation, when God will shake the present order in judgment (Isa. 13:13; 34:4; 51:6; Hag. 2:7) and will cause a new order to emerge from the old.

Apocalyptic dualism is a development of this basic prophetic view of the world and redemption. The new order is usually described with Isaianic features of a new earth (Enoch 45:4–5; 51:1–5).

Some OT passages describe the new order in terms similar to the present order, while others (Isa. 65–66) see a complete transformation involving new heavens and a new earth. Some apocalypses put together these two expectations and anticipate a temporal kingdom in this age followed by an eternal kingdom in the new order (4 Ezra 7:28–29). The age to come in Baruch is pictured as a new earth (32:6). The language of 4 Ezra is difficult to interpret (7:36, 113).

Historical Perspective. The prophets took their stand within a specific historical situation and addressed their message to their environment. On the horizon was God's kingdom, and the future stands in a constant tension with the present. Isaiah 13 describes the historical judgment of Babylon against the background of the eschatological visitation as though they were one and the same day. Historical judgments are seen as realized eschatology.

The apocalyptists have lost this tension between history and eschatology. They do not view the present against the background of the future, but their viewpoint encompasses the entire sweep of history for the purpose of interpreting history theologically. The apocalypses are theological treatises rather than truly historical documents.

Pessimism. It is not correct ultimately to call the apocalyptists pessimists, for they never lost their confidence that God would finally triumph and bring his kingdom. They were, however, pessimistic as to the present age. The problem of the suffering of the righteous led to the conclusion that God had withdrawn his aid from his people in the present age and that salvation could be expected only in the age to come (Enoch 89:56–75). Fourth Ezra sees the present age as hopelessly evil and the solution lying altogether in the future (4:26–32; 7:50; 8:1–3). The righteous can only patiently suffer while waiting a future salvation.

Determinism. This evil age has been predetermined and must run its course. The kingdom does not come even though the righteous deserve it, because fixed periods must intervene before the consummation. The kingdom must await its appointed time. God himself is pictured as awaiting the passing of the times that he has decreed rather than bringing aid to the righteous (4 Ezra 4:36–37). This idea often led to the dividing of the course of time into determined periods of weeks or years.

Ethical Passivity. The apocalyptists lack moral or evangelical urgency. Their problem rests in the righteous remnant's being overwhelmed by undeserved evil. The prophets continually warned Israel of the penalty of faithlessness; the apocalyptists comfort the faithful who need no correction. Therefore very little ethical exhortation is to be found in most of the apocalyptic writings. Such books as the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs and Enoch 92–105, which have considerable ethical exhortation, are least apocalyptic in character.

New Testament Apocalypse. The Revelation of John shares numerous traits with Jewish apocalypses, but at other important points stands apart from them. Although the similarities are usually stressed, the differences are equally important.

First, the author designates his book as a prophecy (1:3; 22:7, 10, 18–19). The apocalyptic writings lost a prophetic self-consciousness; indeed they were written to fill the void caused by the absence of prophecy. Primitive Christianity witnessed a revival of the prophetic movement when God once more spoke directly through human agents. The Apocalypse, together with other NT books, is the product of the revival of the prophetic spirit. The visions given John were the means of conveying the word of God (1:2).

Second, John is not pseudonymous. The author signs his name: "John, to the seven churches in the province of Asia" (1:4). He appeals to no ancient saint for authority but writes out of the authority residing in him from the Spirit of God.

Third, John differs from the apocalyptic treatment of the future. The latter retraces history under the guise of prophecy. John takes his stand in his own environment, addresses his own contemporaries, and looks prophetically into the future to depict the eschatological consummation.

Apocalyptic

Fourth, John embodies the prophetic tension between history and eschatology. The beast is Rome and at the same time an eschatological antichrist that cannot be fully equated with historical Rome. While the churches of Asia were facing persecution, there is no known persecution in the first century A.D. that fits what is portrayed in the Apocalypse. The shadow of historical Rome is so outlined against the darker shadow of the eschatological Antichrist that it is difficult if not impossible to distinguish the two. History is eschatologically interpreted; evil at the hands of Rome is realized eschatology.

Fifth, John shares the optimism of the gospel rather than the pessimism of apocalyptic thought. While John prophesies that the satanic evil of the age will descend in concentrated fury upon God's people in the end time, he does not see an age abandoned to evil. On the contrary, history has become the scene of the divine redemption. Only the slain Lamb is able to open the book and bring history to its eschatological denouement. The redemption that will be apocalyptically consummated is rooted in the event of Golgotha. Furthermore, it is probable that the first seal (6:2) represents the victorious mission of a conquering gospel in a world that is also the scene of war, famine, death, and martyrdom. God has not abandoned the age nor forsaken his people. The saints conquer the beast even in martyrdom and praise him who is the King of the ages (15:2–3).

Finally, the Apocalypse possesses prophetic moral urgency. It does indeed promise a future salvation, but not one that can be taken for granted. The seven letters strike a repeated note of warning and a demand for repentance (2:5, 16, 21–22; 3:3, 19). The outpourings of the divine wrath are not merely punitive but embody a merciful purpose whose intent is to bring all people to repentance before it is too late (9:20; 16:9, 11). The Revelation draws to its close with an evangelical invitation (22:17). Thus the book as a whole has a great moral purpose: judgment will fall upon a lax sleeping church, and the door is held open for the wicked to turn to God.

In summary, there is prophetic and non-prophetic apocalyptic; the NT Apocalypse stands in the first type.

Since the writing of the Apocalypse, some Christians in every age have looked expectantly for the imminent fulfillment of its prophecies. In the second century, charismatic Montanists predicted that the heavenly Jerusalem would soon descend on Pepuza in Asia Minor. Although this view was not widely embraced, the challenges of persecution and heresy kindled apocalyptic speculation among early church fathers like Irenaeus and Hippolytus. In reaction, other patristic writers like Origen and Augustine employed allegorical interpretation of Scripture to forge a distinctly nonapocalyptic eschatology.

While Augustinian amillennialism profoundly influenced medieval Roman Catholicism, it did not completely squelch more apocalyptic visions of prophetic fulfillment. The mystics, artists, and wandering preachers of the Middle Ages often stirred eschatological imaginations at the popular level. In addition, apocalyptic rhetoric contributed to both the Crusades and an upsurge of anti-Semitism. Joachim of Flora and the Spiritual Franciscans anticipated the arrival of the Age of the Spirit in the thirteenth century. Their attacks on ecclesiastical corruption paved the way for later medieval depictions of the papacy as Antichrist, imagery which was evident in the writings of John Wycliffe and John Hus.

During the intense theological debates of the Reformation, Protestant Reformers like Martin Luther and John Calvin enlivened traditional amillennialism with apocalyptic images that targeted papal Rome as the Beast of Revelation. Catholic polemicists usually returned the favor by pinning the Antichrist label on individual Reformers. An even more pronounced apocalypticism was expressed by radical Anabaptists like Thomas Müntzer, Jan Matthys, and John of Leyden, all of whom merged beliefs about the nearness of the end times with revolutionary social agendas.

Seventeenth-century Puritanism echoed the Reformers' apocalyptic notions concerning the papacy. The Westminster Confession of Faith (1646) specifically referred to the pope as "that Antichrist, that man of sin and son of perdition." Extremist movements like the Fifth Monarchy Men found the forces of sinister evil closer to home as they identified King Charles I and then Oliver Cromwell as the "little horn" of Daniel. Radical millenarians in England frequently justified the use of violence to help usher in the eschaton.

Apocalypticism in modern Europe has been somewhat muted by the Enlightenment and growing secularization. Nonetheless, disruptive social, political, and military developments sometimes engendered new waves of apocalyptic speculation. On different occasions, major figures on the European scene such as Peter the Great, Napoleon, and Adolph Hitler emerged as Antichrist candidates. Further, the French and Russian revolutions provoked apocalyptic scenarios that tied contemporary historical events directly to biblical prophecy.

Apocalyptic themes that derived from a European context at times powerfully shaped eschatological thought in America. In the colonial period, Protestant divines like Cotton Mather and Jonathan Edwards kept alive the Reformed tradition of the papal Antichrist, even though the Roman Church posed no immediate threat to the "errand in the wilderness." In the Revolutionary War era, papal Rome was largely ignored as apocalyptic sermons identified Great Britain as the Beast of Revelation 12 and 13. It became characteristic for wartime rhetoric in America to be infused with strong apocalyptic overtones.

During the nineteenth century, American apocalypticism reflected a variety of prophetic interpretations. New England Congregationalist clergy reacted in horror to the excesses of the French Revolution and warned of an "Illuminati conspiracy" that threatened the United States. Lyman Beecher and Samuel Morse rejuvenated apocalyptic alarms about the papal Beast, which fed the impulses of anti-Catholicism and nativism. Apocalyptic cult movements such as the Shakers, the Mormons, and the Watchtower Society invoked new eschatological models, even as they incited fears among evangelical Protestants about satanic deceptions.

Since the nineteenth century, a remarkable resurgence of premillennialism has dominated eschatological speculation in America. This trend has been reinforced by twentieth-century events in both Europe and the Middle East. Until 1989, dispensationalist interpretations of Ezekiel 38 and 39 anticipated an impending invasion of Israel by the Soviet Union. Other prophecy buffs focused on potential Antichrists like Henry Kissinger, Mikhail Gorbachev, and Saddam Hussein. In addition, Hal Lindsey, Mary Stewart Relfe, and Constance Cumbey have respectively portrayed the European Common Market, universal price codes, and the New Age movement as signs that the Second Coming of Christ is near.

G. E. LADD AND J. A. PATTERSON

See also ESCHATOLOGY.

Bibliography. J. Bloch, On the Apocalyptic in Judaism; P. Boyer, When Time Shall Be No More: Prophecy Belief in Modern American Culture; F. C. Burkitt, Jewish and Christian Apocalypses; R. H. Charles, Book of Enoch; EB 1:213–50; HDB 1:741–49; B. E. Daley, Hope of the Early Church: A Handbook of Patristic Eschatology; R. K. Emmerson, Antichrist in the Middle Ages: A Study of Medieval Apocalypticism, Art, and Literature; S. B. Frost, Old Testament Apocalyptic; R. Fuller, Naming the Antichrist: The History of an American Obsession; P. D. Hanson, Dawn of Apocalyptic; J. R. Harris, Odes and Psalms of Solomon; B. McGinn, Antichrist: Two Thousand Years of the Human Fascination with Evil; Apocalyptic Spirituality; P. S. Minear, New Testament Apocalyptic; F. C. Porter, Message of the Apocalyptic Writers; C. Rowland, Open Heaven; H. H. Rowley, Relevance of Apocalyptic, Jewish Apocalyptic and the Dead Sea Scrolls; D. S. Russell, Method and Message of Jewish Apocalyptic; M. E. Stone, "Apocalyptic Literature," in Jewish Writings of the Second Temple Period, 383–441; T. P. Weber, Living in the Shadow of the Second Coming: American Premillennialism, 1875–1982.

Apocrypha, New Testament. A substantial collection of works that were published under the names of apostolic writers during the second and subsequent centuries. For the most part they were deliberate fabrications and never had any serious claim to canonicity. In this connection the word apocrypha is used to mean untrue or spurious.

Evidently the NT Apocrypha arose primarily for two reasons: (1) to satisfy the curiosity engendered by the failure of the canonical Gospels to describe Christ's early life or numerous aspects of his personage and to supply details concerning the apostles omitted from the Acts; and (2) to gain an acceptance for heretical tendencies by embedding them in works attributed to Christ and the apostles. The Gnostics especially sought to advance their cause in this way.

Writers of NT apocryphal works attempted to produce literary forms parallel to those of NT books. Hence their efforts may be classified as gospels, acts, epistles, and apocalypses.

The popularity of the NT Apocrypha is evidenced by the number of these works still in existence in whole or in part and the wide distribution of their use. To be sure, leaders in the church saw to it that the Apocrypha never received official sanction; but in more ignorant communities they were sometimes used without suspicion in the church service, and their contents continued to make a widespread impact on the popular piety. This is demonstrated by a study of the reliefs on sarcophagi of Western Europe during the Middle Ages, as well as of the mosaics and stained-glass windows of churches and cathedrals, the art of illuminated manuscripts, and themes of the mystery plays. All these drew some inspiration from the NT Apocrypha.

If one is to understand many aspects of medieval life, it is necessary to study the Apocrypha. Moreover, one will gain important insights into the nature of Christianity during the postapostolic period. Heretical tendencies, popular beliefs, and superstitions are writ large in these works. One can discern the slippage of the teachings of grace and a corresponding rise of legalism, a growing veneration of Mary, and an increase of sacramentalism. Furthermore, a study of these apocryphal works demonstrates the superiority of the NT books in both content and form, and heightens respect for the canon and the validity of the canonical process.

Some fifty apocryphal gospels are extant, a few having been preserved in entirety, others in fragments, and only the names are known of yet others. In general, the author concealed his own name and ascribed his work to an apostle or disciple. Those available in their entirety are the Protevangelium of James (brother of the Lord), Gospel of Pseudo-Matthew, Gospel of the Nativity of Mary, History of Joseph the Carpenter,

Apocrypha, New Testament

Gospel of Thomas, Gospel of the Infancy, Gospel of Nicodemus, Gospel of Philip, and Gospel of the Egyptian.

Numerous Acts of the Apostles were also composed. Among the better known is the collection called the Leucian Acts because they were collected by Leucius. Five in number, these fragmentary works include the Acts of Paul, John, Andrew, Peter, and Thomas.

Apocryphal epistles are not so numerous because it was harder to fabricate them to have any appearance of authenticity. Among the better known are the Epistle of the Apostles, which dealt with heretical tendencies; the Epistle to the Laodiceans (cf. Col. 4:16), excerpts from Paul's letters (especially Philippians); 3 Corinthians; and the Correspondence of Paul and Seneca.

Apocalypses were modeled somewhat on the Book of Revelation. The most famous are the Apocalypse of Peter (second century) and the Apocalypse of Paul (fourth century). Among other things, both have visions of heaven and hell with scenes of blessedness and lurid descriptions of punishment.

One of the most significant finds of NT apocryphal works occurred in 1946 at Nag Hammadi, about thirty miles north of Luxor, Egypt. This find included thirty-seven complete and five fragmentary works, generally with a Gnostic bias. All in Coptic, they were translated from Greek originals.

H. F. Vos

See also APOCRYPHA, OLD TESTAMENT; BIBLE, CANON OF; GNOSTICISM; NAG HAMMADI.

Bibliography. J. K. Elliott, ed., Apocryphal New Testament; E. J. Goodspeed, Strange New Gospels; C. M. Hedrick and R. Hodgson, eds., Nag Hammadi; A. Helmbold, Nag Hammadi Gnostic Texts and the Bible; E. Hennecke and W. Schneemelcher, eds., New Testament Apocrypha; M. R. James, Apocryphal New Testament; J. M. Robinson, Nag Hammadi Library; D. M. Scholer, Nag Hammadi Bibliography 1948–1969; R. M. Wilson, ed., New Testament Apocrypha.

Apocrypha, Old Testament. The word apocrypha is from the Greek ta apokrypha (the hidden things), although there is no strict sense in which these books are hidden. Some thirteen books comprise the OT Apocrypha: 1–2 Esdras, Tobit, Judith, Rest of Esther, Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus (also titled the Wisdom of Jesus the Son of Sirach), Baruch, Letter of Jeremiah, Additions to Daniel, Prayer of Manasses, and 1–2 Maccabees. Both the status of these books and the use of the term apocrypha have been in confusion since the early days of the church. In a restricted sense, the word denotes the above-named books in contradistinction to the Pseudepigrapha, or false writings; but in the broader sense the word refers to any extracanonical scripture. Sometimes the term takes on a disparaging meaning, especially when used of the NT "apocryphal" gospels, which are regarded as spurious or heterodoxical. A further difficulty attending the restricted use of the term is that some of the Apocrypha are pseudonymous, whereas some of the Pseudepigrapha are not. R. H. Charles broke the accepted order by including 3 Maccabees in the Apocrypha and transferring 2 Esdras to the Pseudepigrapha. The ancient rabbinic practice was to regard all such writings as "outside books," and this designation was continued by Cyril to Jerusalem, who used Apocrypha in the sense of Scriptures outside the canon. In modern times C. C. Torrey revived this signification so that all such books, including the Pseudepigrapha, are called Apocrypha. Therefore to use the term Pseudepigrapha is a concession to an unhappy usage.

How did the Apocrypha secure a place in some of English Bibles? The Jews uniformly denied canonical status to these books, and so they were not found in the Hebrew Bible; but the manuscripts of the LXX include them as an addendum to the canonical OT. In the second century A.D., the first Latin Bibles were translated from the Greek Bible and so included the Apocrypha. Jerome's Vulgate distinguished the libri ecclesiastici and the libri canonici, with the result that the Apocrypha were accorded secondary status. At the Council of Carthage (397), however, which Augustine attended, it was decided to accept the Apocrypha, excepting 1–2 Esdras and the Prayer of Manasses, as having unqualified canonical status, and anyone who disputed this ecclesiastical decision was anathematized. The Reformers repudiated the Apocrypha as unworthy and contradictory to the doctrines of the uncontroverted canon; Luther however, admitted that they were "profitable and good to read." The Coverdale Bible, Geneva Bible, and the KJV included the Apocrypha but set them apart from the canonical books of the OT. After much debate, the British and Foreign Bible Society decided in 1827 to exclude the Apocrypha from its Bibles; soon afterward the American branch concurred, and this action set the pattern for English Bibles thereafter. Among Protestant communions, only the Anglican Church makes much use of the Apocrypha today.

Many literary genres appear in the Apocrypha: popular narrative, religious history and philosophy, morality stories, poetic and didactic lyrics, wisdom literature, and apocalyptic. Most of these books were written in Palestine between 300 B.C. and A.D. 100 in Hebrew, Aramaic, or occasionally Greek. They generally reflected the Jewish religious viewpoint of late OT times with certain additions that were emphasized. Almsgiving became an expression of good works meritorious to salvation (see Tob. 12:9). The Apocrypha, and to a great extent the Pseudepigrapha, evince an amplified doctrine of the Messiah beyond what the OT reveals. Two types of messianic expectation predominate: the heavenly Son of Man, taken from Daniel and embellished by Enoch, and the earthly Davidic king described in the Psalms of Solomon. The resurrection of the body, so seldom mentioned in the OT, is ubiquitous in the Apocrypha and shows an advance over the OT idea of Sheol. The hope for immortality was greatly influenced by Greek thought. Throughout the Apocrypha is a highly developed angelology that is a natural consequence of the impact of dualism upon Jewish religious thought after the exile. The NT does not cite the Apocrypha, although there are frequent parallels of thought and language (e.g., Eph. 6:13–17 and Wis. Sol. 5:17–20; and Heb. 11 and Sir. 44). To admit these parallels, however, is not necessarily to admit dependence by NT authors upon the Apocrypha, and even if a clear case of dependence can be made, it does not follow that the NT author regarded these books as authoritative.

D. H. WALLACE

See also APOCRYPHA, NEW TESTAMENT; BIBLE, CANON OF.

Bibliography. R. H. Charles, Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament; J. H. Charlesworth, ed., Old Testament Pseudepigrapha; E. J. Goodspeed, Story of the Apocrypha; H. M. Hughes, Ethics of Jewish Apocryphal Literature; B. M. Metzger, Introduction to the Apocrypha; W. O. E. Oesterley, Books of the Apocrypha; R. H. Pfeiffer, History of New Testament Times, with an Introduction to the Apocrypha; C. C. Torrey, Apocryphal Literature; H. Wace, ed., Apocrypha.

Apokatastasis. The noun apokatastasis is found in the NT only in Acts 3:21: “[Jesus] must remain in heaven until the time comes for God to restore everything, as he promised long ago through his holy prophets.” The verb apokathistēmi (to restore, establish) occurs eight times. In the LXX it translates the Hebrew šûb (to bring back, restore), used of Israel’s return from exile (Jer. 16:15; 24:6) and its eschatological restoration (Ezek. 16:55).

Stoic thought, from the perspective of a cyclical view of history, envisaged a restoration of the universe to its original status of perfection. From a different point of view, Peter asserted that at Christ’s parousia would occur the restoration of all that was proclaimed by the OT prophets: conversion of the Jews, gathering of the elect, the righteous reign of the Messiah on earth, and creation of a new heaven and a new earth (Acts 3:21). The end-time restoration that Christ would effect is affirmed by the verb in Acts 1:6 and by wider teaching in Romans 8:18–25; 1 Corinthians 15:24–28; and 2 Peter 3:13.

The claim that the apokatastasis includes the salvation of all humankind (some would add the devil and fallen angels) was advanced by Origen, Gregory of Nyssa, John Scotus Erigena, F. Schleiermacher, F. D. Maurice, and others. Jerome, Augustine, and most evangelicals, while insisting on an eschatological restoration by Christ, deny the corollary assertion of the ultimate salvation of all humans.

B. DEMAREST

See also NEW HEAVENS AND NEW EARTH; UNIVERSALISM.

Bibliography. C. A. Beckwith, SHERK 1:210–12; H. G. Link, NIDNTT 3:146–48.

Apollinarianism. A heresy of the fourth century bearing the name of its originator, Apollinaris (or Apollinarius) the Younger. Apollinaris was born sometime between 300 and 315 and died shortly before 392. He apparently lived out his entire lifetime in Laodicea, southwest of Antioch. He was a man of such unusual ability and gracious saintliness that even his staunchest opponents paid tribute to his sterling character. As a young man he became reader in the church of Laodicea under Bishop Theodotus and around 332 was briefly excommunicated for attending a pagan function. In 346 he was excommunicated a second time by the Arian Bishop George. The Nicene congregation of Laodicea selected him bishop sometime around 361.

Evidence would suggest that Apollinaris put more time into teaching and writing in nearby Antioch than in ecclesiastical administration. As a revered teacher he was the friend of Athanasius, consultant by correspondence to Basil the Great, and numbered Jerome among his pupils in 373 or 374.

Apollinarianism seemed to have emerged gradually as an independent strand of Christianity as its opponents succeeded in getting it condemned. A synod at Alexandria in 362 condemned the teaching but not the teacher. Basil the Great moved Pope Damasus I to censure it around 376, and in 377 both Apollinaris and Apollinarianism were condemned by a Roman synod. The general Council of Constantinople in 381 anathematized Apollinaris and his doctrine. Emperor Theodosius I then issued a series of decrees against Apollinarianism in 383, 384, and 388. But the elderly heretic apparently continued serenely writing and teaching in Antioch and Laodicea, pursuing his scholar’s passion for truth with a saint’s serene confidence in his own rightness.

Apollinarianism had become a definite schism by 373, for when the Emperor Valens deported certain Egyptian bishops to Diocaesarea, Apollinaris approached them with greetings and an invitation to enter into communion. They in turn rejected his overtures. By 375 Vitalis, a disciple of Apollinaris, had founded a congregation in Antioch. Vitalis was consecrated bishop by Apollinaris, who also engineered his friend Timothy’s election to the bishopric of Berytus. Apollinarians held at least one synod in 378, and there is evidence that there may have been a second Apollinarian synod. After Apollinaris's death his followers split into two parties, the Vitalians and the Polemeans or Sinusiati. By 420 the Vitalians had been reunited with the Greek Church. Somewhat later the Sinusiati merged into the monophysite schism.

Apollinarianism

Apollinarianism was the harbinger of the great christological battles that pitted Antioch against Alexandria, with Rome as referee, and finally issued in Christendom's permanent monophysite schism after the Council of Chalcedon in 451.

Diodore of Tarsus, leader of the Antiochene school from ca. 378 to his death ca. 392, typified the Christology of that literalist school of Bible interpretation. To defend the immutability and eternity of the Logos he spoke of Christ as Son of God and Son of Mary by nature and grace respectively. Their union was a moral one. If this was not christological dualism, it was perilously close.

In contrast, the Alexandrian school approached Christology in a word-flesh manner. The Word or Logos assumed human flesh at the incarnation, and Alexandrians were apt to deny or ignore Christ's possession of a human soul or mind.

It was undoubtedly as a representative of Alexandrian thinking countering the trend in Antioch that Apollinaris began to teach and write Christology and to move toward his own extreme. The central deviation of Apollinarianism from later Chalcedonian orthodoxy began in a Platonic trichotomy. A human being was seen to be body, sensitive soul, and rational soul. Apollinaris felt that if one failed to diminish the human nature of Jesus in some way, a dualism had to result. Furthermore, if one taught that Christ was a complete man, then Jesus had a human rational soul in which free will resided; and wherever there was free will, there was sin. Therefore it followed that the Logos assumed only a body and its closely connected sensitive soul. The Logos or Word himself took the place of the rational soul (or spirit or nous) in the personhood of Jesus. Thus one can speak of "the one sole nature incarnate of the Word of God." This doctrine was developed by Apollinaris in his Demonstration of the Divine Incarnation, written in 376 in response to the initial papal condemnation.

Apollinaris was a prolific writer, but following his anathematization in 381 his works were assiduously sought out and burned. Apollinarianism thus leaves little literature except what is cited in the works of its critics. The general principle on which Apollinarianism was condemned was the Eastern perception that what "is not assumed is not healed." If the Logos did not assume the rational soul of the human Jesus, then the death of Christ could not heal or redeem the rational souls of humankind. And as the church wrestled with this perception, it rejected Apollinarianism and moved toward the Chalcedonian Definition, which rebuked and corrected both Antioch and Alexandria in their extremes: "This self-same one is perfect both in deity and also in humanness; this self-same one is also actually God and actually man, with a rational soul and a body." V. L. WALTER

See also CHALCEDON, COUNCIL OF.

Bibliography. B. Altaner, Patrology; J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines; P. A. Norris, Manhood and Christ; J. Pelikan, Christian Tradition; G. L. Prestige, Fathers and Heretics; C. E. Raven, Apollinarianism.

Apollyon. See ABADDON.

Apologetics. Definition. Apologetics attempts to render the Christian faith persuasive to the contemporary individual. For unbelievers, it is belief forming; it helps to defuse attacks upon Christianity, and to establish Christianity as credible by giving intellectual support to the explanatory value of a biblical world view. For believers, it is belief sustaining; it nurtures Christian faith by calling believers to love their Lord with their minds (Matt. 22:37).

Apologetics and Related Disciplines. Broadly, while apologetics is a branch of theology, it is primarily a horizontal discipline that focuses on the subjective question of how one knows, how one is convinced. Metapologetics focuses on the epistemological foundations for doing apologetics, particularly in relation to the unbeliever (natural theology, faith and reason, common ground). Theodicy attempts to answer the evidential objection to an all-good, all-powerful God who seems to permit gratuitous evil. Evidence is the factual component of apologetics, appealing to (a) the moral effects of Christianity, (b) the coherence and unity of the Testaments, (c) the fulfilled prophecies of Scripture, (d) the miracles of the Bible in general (Acts 2:22), (e) the miracle of the resurrection of Jesus in particular (1 Cor. 15:6), (f) the inexplicable motive and ethical dissonance created if the faith of the NT church were built upon a conscious lie, (g) the survival of the Christian church during persecution (when promising only spiritual benefits—and further persecution—rather than sensual enjoyments).

Biblical Antecedents. The two functions of forming and sustaining belief may be seen in Scripture.

In the OT, from "the beginning" there is no cosmic dualism between spirit and matter—God alone is the Creator, which also rules out pantheism, animism, henotheism, and polytheism. He confers significance to humanity and the rest of creation (Gen. 1, 2; see also Pss. 33, 104, 136). God is sovereign over history, and over the problem of evil (Gen. 50:20; Job 1–2, 38–41). Throughout the OT, there is a moral apologetic: those who break God’s covenants will be judged, those who keep God’s covenants will be blessed, and God’s plan will be ultimately vindicated in history.

In New Testament narrative scripture, the Gospels explain why the Jews did not embrace Jesus as their Messiah, and how Jesus’ death was a part of God’s redemptive plan from eternity past. The NT miracles had apologetic intent (Mark 2:10–12; John 5:36; 10:37–38; Acts 2:22). The book of Acts reflects (a) the prophetic apologetic that God’s redemption through Jesus the Messiah fulfills God’s redemptive plan in the Old Testament (Acts 2, 4, 7, 8:32–38, 9:22, “proving”), (b) the political apologetic that Christianity (with Judaism) has the right to be called religio licita, and (c) the apostolic apologetic that Peter (the anointed apostle to the Jews) and Paul (the anointed apostle to the Gentiles) proclaim the same Gospel. The early church apologists were missionaries who understood the need to adapt to the intended audience (Acts 17:22–31).

The rest of the New Testament was also written, in part, for apologetic reasons: to expound on the coherence of God’s plan of salvation (Romans), to demonstrate the superiority of Christianity over Judaism (Hebrews), to counter heresy (Galatians, Colossians, 1 John) and false teachers (2 Peter, 2 John, Jude), to motivate toward a moral life that proclaims redemption and forgiveness (1, 2 Corinthians, Ephesians, Philipians, James), and to deal with the existential problem of evil (1, 2 Thessalonians, 1 Peter). Further Scripture explicitly invites believers to engage in the apologetic task (2 Cor. 10:4–5; Col. 2:8; 1 Pet. 3:15, Jude 3). In the New Testament, responses to specific attacks are offered: see ἀπολογέομαι in Luke 12:11; 21:14; Acts 19:33; 24:10; 25:8; 26:1, 2, 24; Romans 2:15; 2 Corinthians 12:19; ἀπολογία in Acts 22:1; 25:16; 1 Corinthians 9:3; 2 Corinthians 7:11; Philipians 1:7, 16; 2 Timothy 4:16; and 1 Peter 3:15–16.

Historical Perspective. Challenges to Christian faith were plentiful. After the biblical period, the prominent early apologists addressing specific issues were Tertullian (ca. 160–220), Justin Martyr (ca. 100–165), and Origen (ca. 185–254). Later, Augustine (354–430) sought to develop a comprehensive Christian worldview. During the medieval period, Aquinas (1224–74) employed Aristotelian philosophy to argue the superiority of Christianity over other religions.

The “methodical doubt” of Rene Descartes (1596–1650) became the paradigm of a skepticism that challenged Christianity for centuries: one is obligated to disbelieve any truth-claim unless there is compelling evidence for that claim. Then came the challenges of the Enlightenment: David Hume (1711–76) attacked the concept of the miraculous in Christianity, and the epistemology of Immanuel Kant (1724–1804) subverted the very idea of knowledge of God. In the nineteenth century anti-supernaturalism was invigorated by new attacks from David F. Strauss (1808–74) and Joseph E. Renan (1803–98) on both the historical reliability of Scripture and the historical person of Jesus of Nazareth; these attacks continue today in various forms. In reaction, some Christian thinkers arguably compounded the difficulty of the apologetic task by adopting a “subjectivist” approach to validation of truth claims (Søren Kierkegaard, Karl Barth, Emil Brunner), which avoided some problems but which surrendered both reason and the historical truth of Scripture.

Contemporary philosophical attacks come from two major sources: modernity pursues an ongoing search for certitude while insisting upon the autonomy of the human mind, and post-modernity insists that “meaning” is an imposition by the knowing subject and is not inherent or objective; one must abandon the search for any comprehensive worldview among competing epistemologies.

Therefore, the challenges to twenty-first century apologists are philosophical (the possibility of meaning, the presuppositions of modernism and postmodernism, etc.), evidential (the reliability of Scripture, the historical Jesus), and existential (the problem of evil, and the question of why one should believe anything).

Apologetics Methodology. Presuppositions play a crucial role in apologetics. If the non-Christian begins with the presupposition of naturalism (the transcendent is unreal, and the universe is a closed system), or with the presupposition of transcendentalism (all is one, and there is no personal God), then Christianity would be considered a priori “false.”

However, Christian apologists disagree over how the fallenness of humanity affects the role of the mind in regeneration (the “noetic” effects of sin). This disagreement is reflected in different apologetic methodologies which attempt to penetrate the presuppositions of the non-Christian.

The two main approaches may be called autopistic and axiopistic. (The dilemma in the choice of apologetics terminology is between convention and accuracy. For example, the familiar “presuppositional vs. evidential” classification ignores the facts that presuppositionalists use evidences, and that evidentialists acknowledge their presuppositions. Further, while all evidentialists are axiopists, not all axiopists are evidentialists. Some, such as Aquinas, are rationalists.)

Autopistic Apologetics. In this approach, apologetics is the presentation of the Christian worldview as the only coherent, true expression of reality, and the exposure of the epistemic and moral dissonance in non-Christian worldviews. Christian faith is self-authenticating, or worthy of belief in itself (autos + pistos); it is sui generis. God is self-referential, and only He has the authority to validate Himself (Heb. 6:13–18; thus, for example, internal tests of canonicity, such as prophetic and apostolic authentication, are put forth as primary over decrees of any church council). In other words, the belief-forming function of apologetics differs little from evangelism. Reason is not a neutral tool applied impartially by unbelievers; rather, humanity is fallen in mind and disposition (Gen. 3:1; Rom. 1:18–32; 8:7; 1 Cor. 2:14; 2 Cor. 4:4). Therefore, what would constitute “proof” to the believer and to the unbeliever may be very different. After regeneration comes understanding (“I believe, therefore I understand”). Cornelius Van Til contends that unbelievers have knowledge of truth not because they operate on common ground with the believer; rather, they operate on borrowed theistic ground. Only special revelation provides the epistemological and ontological framework for correctly interpreting conscience, creation, and evidence. External criteria (theistic proofs, historical evidences) may aid ministerially (not magisterially) by affirming that revelation.

Apologetics

Problems of autopistic apologetics include (a) how does one decide between competing self-validating truth claims? Apparently autopists are at an epistemic standoff; here reasons and evidences have little or no polemical value. (b) Scripture seems to appeal to empirical evidence as perspicuous to the unbeliever (John 10:37–38).

Axiopistic Apologetics. In this approach, God has structured reality in such a way that all His creatures can know truth. The truth-claims of Christianity are judged credible using the same standards by which all truth-claims are judged credible (e.g., scientific hypotheses, historical facts), and those standards are external to Scripture. Thus, Christian faith is rendered worthy of belief (axios + pistos) by external criteria, such as reason (rationalism) and evidences (empiricism), etc. Reason (λόγος) is the light which enlightens every person (John 1:9). Indeed, one should not believe anything unless there is sufficient evidence or reason for it (“I understand, therefore I believe”). The validation of propositions is both probabilistic and cumulative. Here, apologetics is the presentation of perspicuous evidences to the unregenerate mind, which is capable of responding positively to this message.

Problems with axiopistic apologetics include: (a) the mind of unregenerate humanity is not presented in Scripture as being neutral but as being unable to receive or perceive spiritual truth (Rom. 1:18–32; 5:6, 8, 10 [“enemies”]; 8:7; 1 Cor. 1:18–2:14; Eph. 2:1), (b) experientially, there seems to be less moral common ground than there once was. Human beings wildly differ over questions of meaning (modernity, postmodernity) and ethics: e.g., who lives (human genome studies) and who dies (abortion, euthanasia).

Other Approaches. Subjectivist Apologetics. Only through experiencing God’s grace are Christian truth-claims validated. Reason is an ineffective tool for attracting people to Christ; thus focus is placed on the experiential (sometimes at the expense of the objective truth of biblical events), which is self-validating (so Kierkegaard, Barth). One weakness of this approach is that arguments from experience may be persuasive but are not logically compelling. First, contradictory viewpoints (from Muslims to Mormons) can have religious experiences; second, by definition one should abandon any argument from experience and depend instead upon direct experience.

Relational Apologetics. The changed lives of believers and God’s love shown to others (both believers and unbelievers) validate the truth of Christianity on the nerve-endings of life. Corporately, Christians are to demonstrate love for one another as a public testimony (John 15:8–14, 1 John 3). Individually, one is to show love and compassion to those who hurt, even to one’s enemies (Matt. 5:44; Acts 7:60), and to live such a life that one may speak with moral authority. One challenge to this approach is that one would expect a qualitative difference between the ethics of Christians and non-Christians, which is not always as evident as it should be.

Cultural Apologetics. Cultural apologetics examines modern culture to ask why Christian faith is a priori unthinkable to many, and then challenges these cultural assumptions on different fronts in order to gain rational leverage. For example, Francis Schaeffer examined themes in art, literature, drama, and music to show man’s search for absolutes, purpose, and destiny, and to expose the bankruptcy of non-Christian answers. This approach recognizes creativity and the love of beauty (aesthetics) inherent within man as being in God’s image, but faces the challenge that its analysis rests on Christian presuppositions and may therefore be rejected.

Prudential Apologetics. Prudential apologetics invites the unbeliever to ask what happens if they are wrong in their worldview. That is, given the alternatives, would it be more prudent to believe or not to believe? (e.g., Pascal’s “wager”). Its weakness is that it depends upon the neutral mind of man to rightly evaluate the eternal risks and commit himself to a change of worldview based upon a blatantly probabilistic construct.

Concluding Observations.

1. Most apologists agree on the perspicuity of evidences as objective indicators of the truth of Christianity, independent of the perceiver. Advocates of differing approaches in apologetics disagree on the persuadability of the unregenerate mind yet acknowledge that only the Holy Spirit enables the unbeliever to overcome the noetic effects of sin and judge the evidences rightly (John 6:44, Rom. 8:7).

2. The effectiveness of a given approach may be person-relative; thus the apologist must be sensitive to the Holy Spirit and to the individual. For example, someone who already accepts that the universe reflects design would be positively disposed to the cosmological argument for a Creator. Someone who has gone through a painful divorce may be intensely aware that their non-Christian belief system is inadequate to provide a basis for love, honor, and faithfulness, and consequently may be more open to listen to the Gospel than they were previously.

3. Not all the apologetics approaches described above are necessarily mutually exclusive; some may be used effectively in concert with each other. One does not know what the Holy Spirit may use to work through the mind (evidences and arguments) and through lived experiences (crises, relationships) to draw the unbeliever to Jesus Christ. Therefore, while apologetics may debate with one another the relative merits of various approaches, and while one may conceptually distinguish between common grace, the imago Dei, and the perspicuity of general and special revelation, each method seems to have its appropriate place in forming (and in sustaining) belief.

W. G. PHILLIPS

Bibliography. D. Clark, Dialogical Apologetics; K. J. Clark, Return to Reason; W. L. Craig, Apologetics: An Introduction; J. Frame, Apologetics to the Glory of God; N. Geisler, Christian Apologetics; R. D. Geivett and B. Sweetman, eds., Contemporary Perspectives on Religious Epistemology; C. S. Lewis, Mere Christianity; J. P. Moreland, Scaling the Secular City; R. Nash, Faith and Reason; A. Plantinga, God, Freedom and Evil; A. Plantinga and N. Wolterstorff, eds., Faith and Rationality; B. Ramm, Protestant Christian Evidences; F. Schaeffer, God Who Is There; R. C. Sproul, John Gerstner, Arthur Lindsley, Classical Apologetics; C. Van Til, Defense of the Faith.

Apophatic Theology. See VIA NEGATIVA.

Apostasy. Deliberate repudiation and abandonment of the faith that one has professed (Heb. 3:12). Apostasy differs in degree from heresy. The heretic denies some aspect of the Christian faith but retains the Christian name. Again, the transfer of membership from one denomination to another of the same faith is not apostasy. It is also possible for a person to deny the faith, as Peter did, then reaffirm it at a later time.

Isaiah 1:2–4 and Jeremiah 2:1–9 offer illustrations typical of the numerous defections during the history of Israel. People jettisoned their faith for various forms of idolatry and immorality. Several examples are mentioned in the LXX also: Ahaz in 2 Chronicles 29:19 and Manasseh in 33:19.

Perhaps the most notorious NT example is Judas Iscariot. Others include Demas (2 Tim. 4:10) and Hymenaeus and Alexander (1 Tim. 1:20). Paul the apostle was accused of teaching Jews to abandon their Mosaic religion (Acts 21:21). John encountered this problem (1 John 2:18–19). The apostles warned about the rise of apostasy in the church, culminating in the appearance of the man of sin (2 Thess. 2:3; 1 Tim. 4:1–3). The NT offers frequent warnings against the danger of apostasy and several references to the consequences of falling away from the faith (Heb. 6:5–8; 10:26).

Ten periods of persecution intensified the problem for the early church. A public confession of guilt and repentance was required before the offenders could be pardoned. Emperor Julian (361–63), who renounced the Christian faith and then made a vigorous effort to reestablish paganism in the Roman Empire, became known as “the Apostate.”

L. G. WHITLOCK JR.

See also PERSEVERANCE.

Bibliography. D. A. Carson, Divine Sovereignty and Human Responsibility; S. Fisk, Divine Sovereignty and Human Freedom; I. H. Marshall, Kept by the Power of God.

Apostle, Apostleship. The biblical use of “apostle” is almost entirely confined to the NT, where it occurs seventy-nine times: ten in the Gospels, twenty-eight in Acts, thirty-eight in the epistles, and three in the Apocalypse. Our English word is a transliteration of the Greek apostolos, derived from apostellein (to send). Whereas several words for send are used in the NT, expressing such ideas as dispatch, release, or dismiss, apostellein emphasizes the elements of commission—the authority of and responsibility to the sender. Thus, apostles are sent on a definite mission in which they act with full authority on behalf of the sender and are accountable to the sender.

The noun occurs only once in the LXX. When the wife of Jeroboam came to Ahijah seeking information about the health of her son, the prophet answered, “I am sent to you with bad news” (1 Kings 14:6). Here apostolos renders Hebrew šālūah, which became a somewhat technical term in Judaism for someone who led the synagogue congregation in worship, a representative of the Sanhedrin sent on official business, a priest, or a few outstanding OT personalities who acted strikingly on God’s behalf. But in no case did the šālūah operate beyond the confines of the Jewish community. So there is no anticipation in the šālūah of the missionary emphasis associated with the NT apostolos.

Christ as Apostle. In Hebrews 3:1 Jesus is called “the apostle . . . whom we confess,” in conscious contrast to Moses, whom Judaism described with the term sālūah. Jesus spoke more directly from God than Moses was able to do. He repeatedly made the claim of being sent by the Father. When he declared that he was sending his chosen disciples into the world even as the Father had sent him, our Lord was bestowing on apostleship its highest dignity (John 17:18).

Apostle, Apostleship

The Twelve as Apostles. The apostles are most often called disciples in the Gospels, for their primary function during Christ's ministry was to be with him and learn of him. But they are also called apostles, because Jesus imparted to them his authority to preach and cast out demons (Mark 3:14–15; 6:30). Just because this activity was limited while Jesus was with them, the term apostle is rarely used. After Pentecost this situation changed.

The number twelve recalls the twelve tribes of Israel, but the basis of leadership is no longer tribal, but personal and spiritual. Evidently the college of apostles was regarded as fixed in number, for Jesus spoke of twelve thrones in the coming age (Matt. 19:28; cf. Rev. 21:14). Judas was replaced by Matthias (Acts 1), but after that no effort was made to select men to succeed those taken by death (12:2).

Apostles received first mention in the lists of spiritual gifts (1 Cor. 12:28; Eph. 4:11). Since these gifts are bestowed by the risen Christ through the Spirit, it is probable that at the beginning of the apostolic age these men, who had been appointed by Jesus and trained by him, were now regarded as possessing a second investiture to mark the new and permanent phase of their work for which the earlier phase had been a preparation. They became the foundation of the preparation. They became the foundation of the church—in a sense secondary only to that of Christ himself (Eph. 2:20).

The duties of the apostles were preaching, teaching, and administration. Their preaching rested on their association with Christ and the instruction received from him, and it included their witness to his resurrection (Acts 1:22). Their converts passed immediately under their instruction (2:42), which presumably consisted largely of their recollection of the teaching of Jesus, augmented by revelations of the Spirit (Eph. 3:5). In the area of administration their functions were varied. Broadly speaking, they were responsible for the life and welfare of the Christian community. Undoubtedly they took the lead in worship when the death of Christ was memorialized in the Lord's Supper. They administered the common fund to which believers contributed for the help of needy Christians (Acts 4:37), until this task became burdensome and was shifted to men specially chosen for this responsibility (6:1–6). Discipline was in their hands (5:1–11). As the church grew and spread abroad, the apostles devoted more and more attention to the oversight of these scattered groups of believers (8:14; 9:32). At times the gift of the Holy Spirit was mediated through them (8:15–17). The supernatural powers that they had exercised when the Lord was among them, such as the exorcism of demons and the healing of the sick, continued to be tokens of their divine authority (5:12; 2 Cor. 12:12). They took the lead in resolving vexing problems that faced the church, associating the elders with themselves as an expression of democratic procedure (Acts 15:6; cf. 6:3).

Paul as Apostle. The distinctive features of Paul's apostleship were direct appointment by Christ (Gal. 1:1) and the allocation of the Gentile world to him as his sphere of labor (Rom. 1:5; Gal. 1:16; 2:8). His apostleship was recognized by the Jerusalem authorities in accordance with his own claim to rank with the original apostles. However, he never asserted membership in the Twelve (1 Cor. 15:11), but rather stood on an independent basis. He was able to bear witness to the resurrection because his call came from the risen Christ (Acts 26:16–18; 1 Cor. 9:1). Paul looked on his apostleship as a demonstration of divine grace and as a call to sacrificial labor rather than an occasion for glorying in the office (1 Cor. 15:10).

Other Apostles. The most natural explanation of Galatians 1:19 is that Paul is declaring James, the Lord's brother, to be an apostle, agreeable to the recognition James received in the Jerusalem church. In line with this, in 1 Corinthians 15:5–8, where James is mentioned, all the other individuals are apostles. Barnabas (along with Paul) is called an apostle (Acts 14:4, 14), but probably in a restricted sense only, as one sent forth by the Antioch church, to which he was obligated to report when his mission was completed (14:27). He was not regarded as an apostle at Jerusalem (Acts 9:27), though later on he was given the right hand of fellowship (Gal. 2:9). Andronicus and Junias are said to be of note among the apostles (Rom. 16:7). Silvanus and Timothy seem to be included as apostles in Paul's statement in 1 Thessalonians 2:6. The references in 1 Corinthians 9:5 and 15:7 do not necessarily go beyond the Twelve. Paul also mentioned a "gift" of apostleship (Eph. 4:11).

It is reasonably clear that in addition to the Twelve, Paul and James had the leading recognition as apostles. Others also might be so indicated under special circumstances. But warrant is lacking for making "apostle" the equivalent of "missionary." In the practice of the modern church, prominent pioneer missionaries are often called apostles, but this is only an accommodation of language. In the apostolic age one who held this rank was more than a preacher (2 Tim. 1:11). All disciples were supposed to be preachers, but not all were apostles (1 Cor. 12:29). Curiously, at one point in the church's life all were busy preaching except the apostles (Acts 8:4). Paul would not have needed to defend his apostleship with such vehemence if he were only defending his right to proclaim the gospel. Alongside the distinctive and more technical use of the word is the occasional employment of it in the sense of messenger (2 Cor. 8:23; Phil. 2:25).

E. F. HARRISON

See also APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION; CHURCH, AUTHORITY IN THE.

Bibliography. C. K. Barrett, Signs of an Apostle; A. Fridrichsen, Apostle and His Message; F. J. A. Hort, Christian Ecclesia; J. A. Kirk, "Apostleship Since Rengstorf," NTS 21:249–64; K. E. Kirk, ed., Apostolic Ministry; K. Lake, Beginnings of Christianity 5:37–59; J. B. Lightfoot, St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians; T. W. Manson, Church's Ministry; D. Müller and C. Brown, NIDNTT 1:126–137; K. H. Rengstorf, TDNT 1:398–447; W. Schmithals, Office of Apostle in the Early Church; E. Schweizer, Church Order in the New Testament.

Apostles' Creed. For hundreds of years Christians believed that the twelve apostles were the authors of the widely known creed that bears their name. According to an ancient theory, the twelve composed the creed with each apostle adding a clause to form the whole. Today practically all scholars understand this theory of apostolic composition to be legendary. Nevertheless, many continue to think of the creed as apostolic in nature because its basic teachings are agreeable to the theological formulations of the apostolic age.

The full form in which the creed now appears stems from about A.D. 700:

I believe in GOD THE FATHER almighty; Maker of heaven and earth. And in JESUS CHRIST his only begotten Son our Lord; who was conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary; suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, dead, and buried; he descended into hell; the third day he rose from the dead; he ascended into heaven; and sitteth at the right hand of God the Father Almighty; from thence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead.

I believe in the HOLY GHOST; the holy catholic Church; the communion of saints; the forgiveness of sins; the resurrection of the body; and the life everlasting.

Segments of it, however, are found in Christian writings dating as early as the second century. The most important predecessor of the Apostles' Creed was the Old Roman Creed, which was probably developed during the second half of the second century. The additions to the Apostles' Creed are clearly seen when its present form is compared to the Old Roman version:

I believe in God the Father Almighty. And in Jesus Christ his only Son our Lord, who was born of the Holy Spirit and the Virgin Mary; crucified under Pontius Pilate and buried; the third day he rose from the dead; he ascended into heaven, and sits at the right hand of the Father, from thence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead. And in the Holy Spirit; the holy Church; the forgiveness of sins; the resurrection of the flesh.

Still earlier fragments of creeds declare simply: "I believe in God the Father Almighty, and in Jesus Christ his only Son, our Lord. And in the Holy Spirit, the holy Church, the resurrection of the flesh."

The Apostles' Creed functioned in many ways in the life of the church. For one thing, it was associated with entrance into the fellowship as a confession of faith for those to be baptized. In addition, catechetical instruction was often based on the major tenets of the creed. In time, a third use developed when the creed became a "rule of faith" to give continuity to Christian teachings from place to place and to clearly separate the true faith from heretical deviations. Indeed, it may well have been that the main factor involved in adding clauses to the Old Roman Creed to develop the Apostles' Creed was its usefulness in these varied ways in the life of the church. By the sixth or seventh century the creed had come to be accepted as a part of the official liturgy of the Western church. Likewise, it was used by devout individuals along with the Lord's Prayer as a part of their morning and evening devotions. The churches of the Reformation gladly gave their allegiance to the creed, added it to their doctrinal collections, and used it in their worship.

The trinitarian nature of the Apostles' Creed is immediately evident. Belief in "God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth" is affirmed first. But the heart of the creed is the confession concerning "Jesus Christ, his only Son, our Lord," with special attention given to the events surrounding his conception, birth, suffering, crucifixion, resurrection, ascension, exaltation, and coming judgment. The third section declares belief in the Holy Spirit. To this trinitarian confession are added clauses related to the holy catholic church, communion of saints, forgiveness of sins, resurrection of the body, and life everlasting.

The polemical nature of the Apostles' Creed is likewise evident. By emphasizing the unity of God's fatherhood and sovereignty, the creed disputed Marcion's rejection of the same. The affirmation of the reality of Christ's humanity and historicity denied the contention of Marcionite and docetic heretics that he was not a fully human person who could be born, suffer, and die. His conception by the Holy Spirit and birth of the Virgin Mary as well as his exaltation after resurrection affirmed Jesus' deity over against those who denied it. Other clauses may well have been added to deal with particular crises faced by the church. For example, the confession regarding forgiveness of sins may have related to the problem of postbaptismal sins in the third century. Likewise, affirming the holy catholic church may have dealt with the Donatist schism.

Apostles' Creed

The Apostles' Creed continues to be used today much as it was in the past: as a baptismal confession, a teaching outline, a guard and guide against heresy, a summarization of the faith, and an affirmation in worship. It has maintained in modern times its distinction as the most widely accepted and used creed among Christians.

O. G. OLIVER JR.

See also CREED, CREEDS.

Bibliography. W. Barclay, Apostles' Creed for Everyone; S. Barr, From the Apostles' Faith to the Apostles' Creed; P. Guhrmann, Great Creeds of the Church; J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Creeds; W. Pannenberg, Apostles' Creed in the Light of Today's Questions; J. Smart, Creed in Christian Teaching; H. B. Swete, Apostles' Creed; H. Thielicke, I Believe: The Christian's Creed; B. F. Westcott, Historic Faith.

Apostleship, Gift of. See SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

Apostolic Fathers. The Apostolic Fathers refers to the authors of a group of writings dating from the second Christian century. It is assumed the writers were personally acquainted with the apostles. It is best to think of these documents in two divisions, "primary" and "secondary." There is little question about the authorship and association with the apostles of the former, but there is less knowledge and agreement about the circumstances from which the secondary Apostolic Fathers come.

The traditional Apostolic Fathers are Clement of Rome (ca. 95), Ignatius, bishop of Antioch (d. ca. 110), and Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna (d. 156), each of whom wrote one or more epistles. The works of Papias of Hierapolis (ca. 130) remain in only fragments, brief quotations by other writers. Appended to the Epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians is "The Martyrdom of Polycarp," a letter from the Church of Smyrna to that of Philomelium (in greater Phrygia). The secondary list includes (1) Didache ("The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles"), an early church manual from ca. A.D. 100; (2) the Epistle of [Pseudo-] Barnabas, probably from Alexandria in the middle of the second century; (3) the Shepherd of Hermas, probably from Rome at the end of the second century; (4) the anonymous Epistle to Diognetus, (5) the so-called Second Epistle of Clement, a homily by an unknown writer, and (6) fragments by a Jewish Christian, Hegesippus (ca. 150), quoted several times by the church historian Eusebius.

A person named Clement is mentioned in the NT in Philippians 4:3. The name also appears as the third bishop of Rome (Eusebius, Ecclesiasti- cal History 2.21; 3.34; 5.6). First Clement is a letter from Rome to Corinth seeking resolution of strife caused as some young men sought to depose older leaders (3:3; 44:6).

The epistles of Ignatius of Antioch to the Ephesians, Magnesians, Philadelphians, Trallians, and the Smyrneans were addressed to the church in Asia Minor he contacted as he was being taken to Rome for martyrdom. He encourages them in the Lord and admonishes obedience to their bishops. Ignatius's letter to Polycarp is full of admiration; the one to Rome begs the Christians there not to interfere with his being thrown to lions, a fate he eagerly anticipates.

Polycarp's epistle is of a general, pastoral nature. The account of his martyrdom is an important portrayal of Polycarp's faith, the intensity of opposition, and the attitudes and life of one segment of the early church.

Didache, probably from rural Syria, is a book of order for the church. It addresses matters of daily life, worship, and church organization, and ends with an apocalyptic section focusing on the return of Christ. The Epistle of Barnabas (most certainly not Paul's travel companion) warns Christians against Jewish errors and practices and ends with a moral catechism similar to the one with which Didache begins. In the Epistle to Diognetus the anonymous writer offers advice and admonition to Christians living in the predominantly Gentile world of the day. Chapters 5 and 6 are a classic description of Christians who are in the world and at the same time not of it. The Shepherd of Hermas contains three major sections, "Visions," "Mandates" or "Commandments," and "Similitudes" or "Parables." Often using figurative language, it combines directives for the present with the offer of hope in the future.

The fact that at least 1 Clement, Barnabas, Hermas, and Didache were considered as candidates for the NT canon indicates something of the importance of the Apostolic Fathers in the early church. They remain important for both biblical scholars and historians for a number of reasons.

The close kinship of their language with that of the NT makes them valuable resources for students of NT Greek. Their quotations from the OT show its importance in early Christendom, provide evidence for textual studies of the early Greek translation of the OT, and give examples of how the OT was used by early Christians.

As the Apostolic Fathers address the pastoral concerns, modern students gain insights into the lives of early Christians. They show struggles with living in a hostile, pagan world. These documents are important also in the study of early Christian history, doctrine, and liturgy. All portray Jesus Christ as the Son of God, the Savior and Lord of the Church. At least Didache, Barnabas, and Diognetus show the continuing influence, and sometimes threat, of the Jewish background of Christianity. The Martyrdom of Polycarp depicts an early phase in the development of veneration of martyrs.

Their contribution to an understanding of early church government is particularly interesting. Ignatius's insistence on the authority and superiority of the bishop may belie the fact that some in the early church disagreed with him. Indeed, 1 Clement uses the words for "bishop" (or "overseer") and "elder" interchangeably (chap. 44). Clement's letter is also significant as it depicts an early step in the growth of Roman supremacy.

J. J. SCOTT JR.

Bibliography. K. Lake, Apostolic Fathers (Loeb Classical Library); J. B. Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers: Texts and Commentaries of Clement, Ignatius and Polycarp; J. B. Lightfoot and J. R. Harmer, Apostolic Fathers; J. Quasten, Patrology.

Apostolic Succession. A theory of ministry in the church that arose after A.D. 170–200. The Gnostics claimed to possess a secret tradition handed down to them from the apostles. As a counterclaim the Catholic church pointed to each bishop as a true successor to the apostle who had founded the see and therefore to the truth the apostles taught. The bishop, as an authoritative teacher, preserved the apostolic tradition. He was also a guardian of the apostolic Scriptures and the creed. In a generation when the last links with the apostles were fast dying out, this emphasis on apostolic teaching and practice was natural. In the third century the emphasis changed from the open succession of teachers to the bishops as the personal successors of the apostles. This development owed much to the advocacy of Bishop Cyprian of Carthage (248–58). Harnack regards this as a perversion rather than a development.

The terminology is not found in the NT, diadoche (succession) being absent from both the NT and the LXX. There is little evidence for the idea in the NT (cf. 2 Tim. 2:2). All early succession lists were compiled late in the second century.

There is also a difference between the Roman and Anglo-Catholic viewpoints. The former is a centralized autocracy with a papal succession traced back to Peter. The Tractarian teaches that all bishops alike, however insignificant the see, have equal power in a corporation. Thus an apostle transmitted to a bishop, through "the laying on of hands" and prayer, the authority that Christ had conferred on him. This theory of sacramental grace is a barrier to reunion in the Reformed churches, since nonepiscopal bodies are regarded as defective in their ministry.

The weakness of the argument of K. E. Kirk's Apostolic Ministry is its failure to explain the absence of the idea in the first two centuries of the Christian era. Ehrhardt does not supply the defect by postulating a priestly succession derived from the Judaizing church of Jerusalem as it laid stress on the new Israel and the continuity of its priesthood. The idea was in the air in the second century.

Bishop Drury affirms that the apostles left behind three things: their writings; the churches that they founded, instructed, and regulated; and the various orders of ministers for the ordering of these churches. There could be no more apostles in the original sense of that word. The real successor to the apostolate is the NT itself, since it continues their ministry within the church of God. Their office was incommunicable. Three kinds of succession are possible: ecclesiastical (a church that has continued from the beginning), doctrinal (the same teaching that has continued throughout), and episcopal (a line of bishops traced unbroken from early times). This does not necessarily mean that the episcopal office is the same as the apostolic.

R. E. HIGGINSON

See also CHURCH, AUTHORITY IN THE.

Bibliography. H. Bettenson, Documents of the Christian Church; A. Erhardt, Apostolic Succession in the First Two Centuries of the Church; C. Gore, Ministry of the Christian Church; H. Küng, Church; R. Rahner and J. Ratzinger, Episcopate and the Primacy Revelation and Tradition; C. H. Turner, "Apostolic Succession," in Essays on the Early History of the Church, H. B. Swete, ed.

Aquinas, Thomas. See THOMAS AQUINAS.

Archangel. See ANGEL.

Archbishop. See BISHOP; CHURCH OFFICERS.

Archdeacon. See CHURCH OFFICERS; DEACON, DEACONESS.

Archeology and Theology. Archeology is the study of the human past through material remains. Although it is not routinely associated with theology, the two disciplines intersect at several important points. All biblical theology is built upon the Word of God, which has been transmitted by the history of his people. Archeology is a significant tool for understanding that history and is an essential component of sound exegesis. It connects the theologian to the world of the biblical authors and the events which they describe.

Archeology can illuminate the biblical text, and it often yields corroborative evidence which would seem to authenticate the biblical record.

Archeology and Theology

Currently, many evangelicals attempt to “prove the Bible” by appealing to archeological discoveries. In contrast, certain secular scholars sometimes seek to undermine biblical authority by their interpretation of the same evidence. These opposing views are best understood by examining the history of biblical archeology and appreciating the presuppositions each group brings to the biblical text and the material remains.

History of Biblical Archeology. Biblical archeology is but one area of specialization within the relatively young discipline of archeology. It shares many of the same methods and approaches as other divisions of archeology such as Egyptian, Classical, and New World archeology. As its name implies, however, biblical archeology focuses upon the periods reflected in the biblical text and relies heavily upon the Old and New Testaments as legitimate historical sources. This has led to considerable debate as to whether biblical archeology is a scientific discipline in its own right or merely a branch of biblical studies.

Before the 1800s little was known of the Bible’s cultural setting despite its central position in Western culture and religion. Renewed European contact with the Mideast, such as Napoleon’s campaign to Egypt in 1799, kindled a new interest in ancient Near Eastern cultures and the realia (material finds) which they left behind. In subsequent years a series of expeditions to Egypt and Mesopotamia yielded a vast quantity of artifacts and inscriptions, many of which were transported to Europe. A. H. Layard’s excavations in Assyria and Babylonia, for example, brought to light monumental art and architecture as well as numerous cuneiform documents. When deciphered, these documents were found to overlap significantly with the characters and events found in the biblical record. These findings stimulated a renewed interest in the setting of the biblical text. By the middle of the nineteenth century numerous American and European scholars visited the land of the Bible and recorded their explorations. Edward Robinson, C. Conder/H. Kitchener, Charles Warren, and others published valuable surveys of the topography and history of Bible lands.

Archeological exploration of the Holy Land began only in the 1890s with the work of the renowned Egyptologist Sir Flinders Petrie. During his excavations at Tell el-Hesi in the south of Israel/Palestine he introduced the technique known as “sequence dating.” He found that ancient mounds (or “Tells”) contain not only scattered ruins but superimposed layers of civilization built up and destroyed over time. Chronological changes in pottery styles and the presence of datable Egyptian finds helped Petrie reconstruct the history of the site. These principles are reflected in the title of his book A Mound of Many Cities, and they underlie all archeological inquiry in the Holy Land to this day.

Through World War I and subsequent years, a plethora of excavations followed. Dramatic discoveries were made by British, European, and American scholars at biblical sites such as Samaria, Beth-Shemesh, Gezer, Megiddo, Beth Shean, and Jericho. These were overshadowed by the work of William Foxwell Albright at Tell Beit Mirsim just after World War I. He refined Petrie’s methodology and trained several generations of American and Israeli archeologists. He successfully integrated archeology, biblical research, and ancient Near Eastern studies in dramatic new ways, often with stunning results. Albright’s work demonstrated the veracity of the biblical narrative and served as a corrective to the historical-critical school. According to Julius Wellhausen, the chief proponent of this school of thought, the Old Testament was a composite literary creation of limited historical value. In contrast, Albright showed that biblical episodes such as the life of Abraham and Joshua’s conquest belonged to specific historical and cultural settings. He refined the chronology of biblical history and related it to material finds whenever possible. Meanwhile, rigorous excavation by the British at Beth Shean, Lachish, and elsewhere brought significant improvements in archeological method and theory, as well as model publications which have yet to be surpassed.

In the aftermath of World War II the rapid pace of excavation resumed, now within the context of new political boundaries. Foreign teams worked in Transjordan and western Palestine under the auspices of the Jordanians while Israeli and American teams excavated in the new state of Israel. Local Israeli scholarship thrived under scholars who had been trained by Albright. Moreover, Yigael Yadin, Benjamin Mazar, Y. Aharoni, M. Avi-Yonah, and other prominent scholars attempted to reconstruct the historical geography of ancient Israel through the integration of surveys, excavations, and ancient sources. Since the 1950s excavation has continued at a swift rate throughout the land of the Bible as local scholars excavate with teams from their own universities.

Biblical Archeology Today. As of the 1960s, the field of biblical archeology faced new challenges. Under the influence of the social and natural sciences, the focus of archeology and anthropology migrated from typology and historical issues toward comprehensive study of humans as a species. While the new paradigm, known as “new archeology,” instituted many scientific improvements (such as zoology, spatial analysis, etc.) it also introduced new biases against the biblical text. In keeping with this trend, William Dever argued forcefully for the “liberation” of Near Eastern archeology from biblical studies. Hence “Syro-Palestinian archeology” was born. The Bible, it was argued, was never intended to be an historical document and should therefore be viewed with considerable suspicion when one reconstructs the history of the ancient Near East. This negative evaluation can in part be traced to developments in biblical studies and in the culture at large. Recent approaches to the Bible frequently emphasize literary issues at the expense of history and cultural setting. Moreover, since the Bible no longer plays a central, normative role in Western culture, naturally its historical accuracy would be reevaluated and, at times, challenged. The naturalism which underlies “new archeology” is therefore a logical development. By the early 1990s the very expression “biblical archeology” had largely given way to broader, generic terms such as “Syro-Palestinian archeology” and “archeology of the ancient Near East.”

The current debate among archeologists represents a continuation of this dispute, which arises from the presuppositions each scholar brings to the material finds and the biblical text. Two schools have emerged. The “Albright school” continues to emphasize the alliance between archeology and biblical studies, and they are often called the “maximalists.” The “minimalist” school represents the other end of the spectrum. This view, which dominates current literature, is blatantly antagonistic toward the biblical text. The Old Testament, it is argued, was primarily written during the Hellenistic period, long after the events it claims to describe. Every correlation between the Bible and the archeological record is, according to this view, suspect a priori. In the current intellectual and cultural climate, even moderate scholars who ascribe limited historicity to the biblical text are often denounced as “fundamentalists.” This view represents the secularization of the discipline.

Case Study. The conquest of Canaan is representative of trends in current research and the thinking which lies behind them. Archeologists have long puzzled over the seeming discrepancies between the description in the book of Joshua and the archeological record itself. Whereas W. F. Albright and A. Alt sought to harmonize these two bodies of evidence, many contemporary scholars appeal to archeology alone and reject the biblical account as a late fabrication. However, recent investigations at Jericho, Hazor, and the region of Ai reveal destructions that correlate quite well with the period of Joshua. It is also significant that these three sites alone are singled out in the biblical account as being “burnt by fire.” Moreover, recent work by James Hoffmeier finds the Joshua account to be especially reliable when placed within its original cultural and historical context. Similar issues surround recent controversy about the archeology of the United Monarchy, known by some as the “lost tenth century.”

Summary/Emerging Issues. For the theologian archeology can be of value at several levels. First, it provides the cultural and historical setting of the individuals and events recorded in the Bible. It connects believers to the daily life of biblical characters and enables them to better understand God’s qualities and His purposes. Abraham, Joshua, Jesus, and Paul were immersed in cultural settings that are largely foreign to modern readers. As an exegetical tool, for example, archeology helps us understand the purpose of phrases such as “he was gathered to his fathers” (a reference to communal tomb architecture) and “woe to those who lie on beds of ivory” (referring to the affluence of Samaria). The site of Megiddo offers another example. Given its strategic importance, Solomon’s palaces, and Omride fortifications, it is no surprise that it figures prominently in the history of Israel and in its future as well.

Second, archeology increases the believer’s confidence in Scripture, despite occasional ambiguities. The Aramaic inscription from Tell Dan is a case in point. It mentions the “house of David” and offers an extrabiblical account of the wars between the Arameans and the Israelites in the ninth and eighth centuries B.C. (cf. 2 Kings 6–8). Biblical archeology should nevertheless be used primarily as a tool of clarification to illuminate the biblical text. While it can be helpful for apologetics, it should not be viewed as merely a means of “proving the Bible.” A more nuanced approach is preferable.

Third, archeology helps to expose some of the presuppositions that underlie the field of biblical studies. One who denies the veracity of Bible is also likely to reject, at all costs, any corroborative evidence that supports the historical accuracy of the biblical text. Such views, according to L. E. Stager, Doro Professor of Archaeology at Harvard University, are themselves “ideological positions carved in stone . . . intellectual forgeries of the first and post-modern order.” Biblical archeology is therefore a tool not only for understanding the mind of the ancients but also the mind of contemporary people, secular and Christian alike.

J. M. MONSON

Bibliography. A. Biran, Biblical Archaeology Today; A. C. Bouquet, Everyday Life in New Testament Times; M. D. Coogan, J. C. Exum, and L. E. Stager, eds., Scripture and Other Artifacts; J. Finegan, Archaeology of the New Testament; A. Hoerth, Archaeology and the Old Testament; J. Hoffmeier, Israel and Egypt: The Evidence for the Authenticity of the Exodus Tradition; V. Matthews, Manners and Customs in the Bible; A. Mazar, Archaeology of the Land of the Bible; J. McRay, Archaeology and the New Testament; R. Moorey, Century of Biblical Archaeology; K. Schoville, Biblical Archaeology in Focus; N. A. Silberman, Digging for God and Country; J. A. Thompson, Bible and Archaeology.

Aristotle, Aristotelianism

Aristotle, Aristotelianism. Greek philosopher Aristotle (384–322 B.C.) was the son of the court physician to the king of Macedon. At the age of seventeen he went to Plato's Academy in Athens, where he remained for twenty years (367–347) as student and teacher. After Plato's death, he spent the next twelve years away from Athens, serving for three of these years as tutor to the son of Philip II of Macedon, Alexander the Great. In 335 he returned to Athens to open a new school called the Lyceum, where he taught for the next twelve years. Upon the death of Alexander, anti-Macedonian feelings threatened the school, forcing Aristotle to flee to Euboea, where soon afterward he died.

The majority of Aristotle's writings have survived substantially intact and consist of unpublished treatises that either served as his lecture notes or were used as texts by his students. He did some writing in dialogue form, but only fragments quoted by later writers have survived. Among his major works are Ethics, Physics, Metaphysics, Organon, treatises on natural science (e.g., On the Heavens, On the Soul, On the Parts of Animals), Politics, Rhetoric, and Poetics.

Traditionally, Aristotle's writings have been regarded as expressing a finished philosophical system. In this century, however, there have been attempts to find development within Aristotle's thought. Much of the early work on this issue was influenced by Werner Jaeger's division of Aristotle's life into three periods. In the first period (to 347) he was taken to be a loyal Platonist, presenting material in dialogue form and espousing Plato's view of the soul and the forms. The second period (to 335) was one of increasing unhappiness with Platonism in which Aristotle became critical in particular of the doctrine of forms. In the final period (after 335) he became a defender of empiricism, finally rejecting all the essential features of Platonic speculative metaphysics. Recent assessments of Aristotle's philosophy, however, reverse the direction of the development of his thought: Aristotle's earliest writings, it is now held, reflect hostility to Plato's philosophy. As he matured, a more sophisticated view evolved, which, while not Plato's, is closer (in spirit) to Plato's.

Classification of Writings. Aristotle's writings may be divided by subject matter into four major groups:

1. Logical treatises, commonly called the Organon Categories
De interpretatione
Prior Analytics
Posterior Analytics
Topics
2. Writings on natural philosophy and science

On Coming into Being and Passing Away

De caelo

Physics

De historia animalium

De partibus animalium

De generatione animalium

De amina

3. The Metaphysics

4. Works on ethics and politics

Eudemian Ethics

Nicomachean Ethics

Politics

Rhetoric

Politics (fragmentary)

Logic. Aristotle does not speak of logic as a definite part of philosophy; rather, he sees it as a methodological tool involved in all science and philosophy. While the term tool (organon) is not Aristotle's, it is nevertheless true to his understanding. His logic may be divided into three parts: (1) basic modes of being that are apprehended by single concepts and definitions (Categories), (2) the union and separation of these modes of being as expressed by judgments (De interpretatione), and (3) the ways the mind passes from reasoning about known truth to unknown (Prior Analytics and Posterior Analytics).

Aristotle lists the modes of being and kinds of concepts as ten in number: substance (e.g., human or horse), quantity (ten feet long), quality (green), relation (less than), place (Athens), date (400 B.C.), situation or position (sitting), state or having (sober), action (cutting), and passion (being cut). In some lists (e.g., Posterior Analytics) situation and state are omitted. Extramental entities exist as substances, qualities, relations, and so on. The basic concepts grasp these modes of being.

Truth and falsity relate to propositions and judgments, not isolated concepts. Propositions combine or separate two categorical concepts. If these concepts are, for example, combined in both the proposition and reality, then the proposition is true. If not, then it is false.

All science is universal and is known inductively from sense experience of individual substances and their properties. Certain subjects and predicates gained by induction are seen by the mind to be necessarily connected. These form the premises of science in the strict sense, making its foundations self-evident and without need of proof. Further, knowledge can be deduced by syllogistic reasoning. This process, as described in Prior Analytics, requires the discovery of a middle term for its execution.

Natural Philosophy. Nature, for Aristotle, is characterized by change. Therefore, natural philosophy is fundamentally an analysis of the process of change. Change is always discontinuous. There is always an initial privation that is acquired in the final form. However, change is also continuous. Something does not come out of nothing. Thus, there must be a substratum, matter, that endures all change. Aristotle identifies four types of change, the most fundamental being the emergence of a new substance from some preceding substance or substances. Once in existence, any substance may be subject to the other three kinds of change: quality, quantity, and place.

All change may be explained in terms of four causes. The material cause (i.e., the matter from which the thing has evolved) and the formal cause give it shape or structure. The efficient cause imposes the form on the matter, while the final cause is the end to which that substance emerges and that requires the efficient cause to act in a determinate way.

Change also has an important relationship to potentiality. It involves the actualization of the potential. Since there is movement from potentiality to actuality, there must be an external efficient cause that accounts for an object's origin and continued existence. Aristotle held that such an efficient cause was needed for the physical universe as a whole. Therefore, there must be a first, unmoved mover, who is not subject to change. Because there is regularity throughout nature, it may be concluded that this first cause is intelligent.

Aristotle thought that the earth was at the center of the physical universe. It was surrounded by a number of revolving spheres, which explained the movement of the planets. The outermost sphere has the stars and is moved by an aspiration of the unmoved cause.

There are different kinds of material substance. Most basic are the elements and their combinations that make up the realm of nonliving substances. These are moved only by external causes. Among the living substances there are many organisms. Plants that have differentiated parts and act on one another are reproduced and grow of themselves. Animals also have vegetative functions of plants but possess sense organs that make interaction with the environment possible. Through these organs they meet needs and escape danger.

The highest earthly being is humankind. Aristotle gives a whole treatise, De anima, to the study of human nature. Humans are a material substance and thus part of nature. This means that, like other natural entities, humans are composed of underlying matter from which the body has emerged and a soul that gives form or structure to the body. Both body and soul are essential.

The human soul is made of three united parts: the vegetative part allows the human to nourish, grow, and reproduce; the animal part allows sense, desire, and movement; and the relational part, which is distinctively human, allows performance of distinctively human functions.

Metaphysics. The most fundamental reality is being itself. All categories are restricted kinds of being. Metaphysics is the study of being qua being. Everything, whether it changes or is unchanging, whether it is quantitative or nonquantitative, falls within the subject matter of metaphysics. From this perspective the most basic structure of the world is understood. Unlike Plato, who held that the ultimate causes of all things were found in the forms that existed apart from the natural world, Aristotle held that formal structures are to be found in the individual things they determine.

The foundation of reality is not an abstract essence but an individual substance (e.g., this boat or this person). Individual substances are a combination of matter and form. The matter is like a substratum, while the form determines and actualizes the matter. Form makes an entity a certain kind. Other categories such as place, time, action, quantity, quality, and relation inhere in substance as accidents. As such, they cannot exist without substances.

God, or the first mover, is the first cause of all finite existence. He is total actuality and lacks all potentiality, otherwise something prior to him would need to actualize him. The actualization of something potential involves change. Since God is only actuality, he must be changeless, eternal, and immaterial because matter is a form of potency. Being immaterial, he is a mind, not dependent on external objects for reflection but contemplating his own perfect being.

Practical Philosophy. Theoretical philosophy and science seek truth for its own sake. On the other hand, practical philosophy desires truth to guide human action, which is directed outside the agent to some external entity, immanent action (whereby a human being strives for perfection), and immanent actions of human beings who cooperate to perfect themselves in a human community. The proper guide to action is individual ethics. Aristotle's earlier treatment of this topic is found in Eudemian Ethics and his more mature reflection is recorded in Nicomachean Ethics.

Humans have a complex nature, which, like other substances, tries to complete or perfect itself. However, unlike other substances, this nature does not include a set of fixed tendencies that automatically attain the aforementioned goal. Humankind does have reason, which makes possible the apprehension of the ultimate end and guides them to it. The various human appetites must be ruled by reason.

The goal toward which all humans strive with more or less clarity is happiness or well-being. Happiness is the operation of all parts of human nature under reason for an entire life. Some material things will be needed as instruments of action. More important, this life will require that all tendencies respond to an act under the influence of reason. To bring these tendencies under reason requires the learning of basic moral virtues. These virtues are the rational habits to act in a certain way. At first the habit comes from without. Parents may punish and reward behavior, but moral virtue has not really been learned until the habit is internalized and the act done for its own sake.

Aristotle, Aristotelianism

Moral virtue is related to the golden mean. Every virtue is the mean between two extremes. For instance, courage is the mean between cowardice on the one hand and foolhardiness on the other. This mean is not a mathematical or quantitative average but an intellectual mean. With our passions guided and controlled by reason and good fortune, a happy life may be lived. However, the intellectual virtues, since they are most distinctly human, are the crowning pleasures of a happy life. Contemplation and prayer are the most fundamental intellectual virtues because they underlie the rest. They demand less physical aid and may be enjoyed without the help of others.

Aristotle also thinks that humans are political animals in need of community to attain their highest perfection. Community is needed because there the common good takes precedence over individual good, which is only a part of it. The proper goal of politics is happiness and virtue for all citizens.

Aristotelianism. Aristotelianism may be divided into two branches. The Greek European branch grew out of Aristotle's disciple Theophrastus, who took over the Lyceum upon Aristotle's death and elaborated on a number of his teacher's doctrines. It was not long before Aristotelian logic was used and absorbed by groups such as the Stoics and Skeptics. In the first century B.C., the Aristotelian corpus was collected and edited by a group of scholars headed by Andronicus of Rhodes.

Plotinus (A.D. 204–70), the father of Neoplatonism, took what he needed from Aristotle and rejected the rest. He accepted the doctrine of the separate intellect but attacked the ten categories. Porphyry of Tyre (234–ca. 305), a follower of Plotinus, wrote an introduction (Isagoge) to five concepts: species, genus, differential, property, and accident. The Isagoge became a part of the Organon and was the inspiration for the medieval doctrine of the five voices. The importance and popularity of this work was assured by Boethius, who wrote a commentary on it.

During the early Middle Ages, Aristotle's logical works received the greatest attention. Contrasts between substance and accident, matter and form, became important theological distinctions. In the thirteenth century the influence of Aristotle was increased enormously with the translation of his works into Latin from Arabic. Equally important was the availability of Arabic commentaries by major Islamic philosophers. For example, the work of Averroes (1126–98) was more honored in the West than in his homeland. His influence was most directly felt in the work of Albertus Magnus and Thomas Aquinas. Albertus Magnus first came in contact with Averroes's commentaries on Aristotle at the University of Paris. However, it was Albertus's pupil, Thomas Aquinas, who produced a synthesis of Christian thought and Aristotelianism. But Aristotelianism received its bad name through Averroes, who advocated the eternity of the universe, leading the church to condemn the work of Aristotle and Averroes in 1277.

With the canonization of Aquinas and the study of his works, Aristotelianism regained favor. The influence of Aristotle can be seen in the scholastic theologians Duns Scotus and William of Ockham. During the Renaissance, the emphasis on humanism and classical languages led to the scholarly revival of interest in Plato and Aristotle.

The sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries saw another reaction in the West against Aristotelianism. The response was at least partly the result of the astronomical views of thinkers such as Copernicus (1473–1543), whose ideas were in conflict with many of those of Aristotle. The Catholic Church, however, in 1879 put its seal of approval on Aquinas's work with Pope Leo XIII's encyclical Aeterni Patris.

Aristotelianism developed a second branch, called the Arabic Middle branch, which contrasted sharply with the Greek European. In the West, Aristotelianism emerged through the grid of medieval scholasticism, while in the East the formulation of Aristotelian philosophy took a form that very likely would have been rejected by Aristotle. Islamic philosophers read Aristotle through Neoplatonic spectacles, leading to a rather cavalier treatment of his doctrines.

Aristotle's influence in the East reached its zenith in the writings of Avicenna (980–1037) and Averroes. Avicenna was Islam's great Neoplatonist. He wrote works dealing with metaphysics, logic, and the natural sciences. Averroes was a Spanish Muslim who wrote commentaries on Aristotle's works.

P. D. FEINBERG

See also ALBERTUS MAGNUS; AVERROES; DUNS SCOTUS, JOHN; NEOPLATONISM; THOMAS AQUINAS; WILLIAM OF OCKHAM.

Bibliography. F. Copleston, Medieval Philosophy; É. Gilson, History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages; R. P. McKeon, Aristotelianism in Western Christianity; W. D. Ross, Aristotle; W. D. Ross, ed., Works of Aristotle Translated into English; F. Van Steenberghen, Latin Aristotelianism and the Philosophical Movement in the Thirteenth Century.

Arius, Arianism. Arius, the North African priest who gave his name to one of Christianity's most troublesome schisms, was born ca. 250, apparently in Libya, although this is uncertain. He was in all probability a pupil of Lucien of Antioch. During the bishopric of Peter of Alexandria (300–311), Arius was made a deacon in that city and began his stormy pastoral career. He was in rapid succession excommunicated for his association with the Melitians, restored by Bishop Achilles of Alexandria (311–12), and given priestly orders in the church of Baucalis. Sometime between 318 and 323 Arius came into conflict with Bishop Alexander over the nature of Christ. In a confusing series of synods, a truce was attempted between adherents of Alexander and followers of Arius; in March 324, Alexander convened a provincial synod that acknowledged the truce but anathematized Arius. Arius responded with his publication of Thalia (which exists only in Athanasius's refutation) and by repudiating the truce. In February 325 Arius was condemned at a synod in Antioch. The Emperor Constantine was intervening by this time, and it was he who called the first ecumenical council, the Council of Nicaea, which met on 20 May 325 and subsequently condemned Arius and his teaching. Present in the entourage of Alexander at this council was Athanasius. He took little part in the affairs of the Council of Nicaea, but when he became bishop of Alexandria in 328, he was to become the unremitting foe of Arius and Arianism and the unflagging champion of the Nicene formula.

Following his condemnation, Arius was banished to Illyricum, where he continued to write, teach, and appeal to an ever-broadening circle of political and ecclesiastical adherents of Arianism. Around 332 or 333, Constantine opened direct contact with Arius, and in 335 the two met at Nicomedia. There Arius presented a confession that Constantine considered sufficiently orthodox to allow for the reconsideration of Arius's case. Therefore, following the dedication of the Church of the Resurrection in Jerusalem, the Synod of Jerusalem declared for the readmittance of Arius to communion even as he lay dying in Constantinople. Since Arian views were being advanced by many active bishops and members of the court, and Arius himself had ceased to play a vital role in the controversy, his death in 335 or 336 did nothing to diminish the furor in the church. Instead of resolving the issues, the Council of Nicaea launched an empire-wide christological debate by its condemnation of Arius.

Arius was a thoroughgoing Greek rationalist. He inherited the almost universally held Logos Christology of the East. He labored in Alexandria, the center for Origenist teachings on the subordination of the Son to the Father. He blended this heritage into a rationalist Christology that lost the balance Origen had maintained in his subordinationist theology by his insistence on the eternal generation of the Son.

The guard against the error of Arius and the Arianism erected by the symbol and anathemas adopted by the Council of Nicaea serve as an outline of Arius's fundamental position.

Nicaea's "in one Lord Jesus Christ the Son of God, begotten of the Father, only-begotten, that is from the substance of the Father" was to offset Arius's central assertion that God was immutable, unique, unknowable, only one. Therefore Arians felt no substance of God could in any way be communicated or shared with any other being. The council's "true God from true God, begotten not made" set aside Arius's contention that, since God was immutable and unknowable, Christ had to be a created being, made out of nothing by God, first in the created order certainly, but of it. This limited the concept of the preexistence of Christ even while adapting the dominant Logos Christology to Arianism. The Logos, first born, created of God, was incarnate in the Christ, but, asserted Arius, "there was when he was not."

Nicaea's "of one substance with the Father" made the Greek term homoousios the catchword of the orthodox. Arianism developed two parties, one of which felt Christ was of a substance like the Father (homoiousios). A more extreme wing insisted that as a created being Christ was unlike the Father in substance (anomoios). Arius himself would have belonged to the first or more moderate party.

The council's anathemas were extended to all who claimed "there was once when he was not"; "before his generation he was not"; "he was made out of nothing"; "the Son of God is of another subsistence or substance"; and "the Son of God [is] created or alterable or mutable." Arius and subsequent Arians had taught that Christ grew, changed, matured in his understanding of the divine plan according to the Scriptures, and therefore could not be part of the unchanging God. He was not God the Son; rather, he was simply given the title Son of God as an honor.

An observer in that day might well have thought Arianism was going to triumph in the church. Beginning with Constantius, the court was often Arian. Five times Athanasius of Alexandria was driven into exile, interrupting his long episcopate. A series of synods repudiated the Nicene symbol in various ways: Antioch in 341 and Arles in 353. In 355 Liberius of Rome and Ossius of Cordoba were exiled, and a year later Hilary of Poitiers was sent to Phrygia. In 360 in Constantinople, all earlier creeds were disavowed and the term ousia (substance) was outlawed.

Arius, Arianism

The Son was simply declared to be “like the Father who begot him.”

The orthodox counterattack on Arianism pointed out Arian theology reduced Christ to a demigod and in effect reintroduced polytheism into Christianity, since Christ was worshiped among Arians as among the orthodox. But in the long run the most telling argument against Arianism was Athanasius’s constant soteriological battle cry that only God, very God, truly God Incarnate could reconcile and redeem fallen humankind. It was the thorough work of the Cappadocian Fathers—Basil the Great, Gregory of Nyssa, Gregory of Nazianzus—that brought the final resolution that proved theologically acceptable to the church. They divided the concept of substance (ousia) from that of person (hypostasis) and thus allowed the orthodox defenders of the original Nicene formula and the later moderate or semi-Arian party to unite in an understanding of God as one substance and three persons. Christ therefore was one of substance with the Father (homoousion) but a distinct person. With this understanding the Council of Constantinople in 381 was able to reaffirm the Nicene Creed. The able Emperor Theodosius I threw himself on the side of orthodoxy and Arianism began to wane in the empire.

The long struggle with Arianism was not over yet, however, for Ulfilas, famous missionary to the Germanic tribes, had accepted the Homoian statement of Constantinople of 360. Ulfilas taught the similarity of the Son to the Father and the total subordination of the Holy Spirit. He taught the Visigoths north of the Danube, and they in turn carried this semi-Arianism back into Italy. The Vandals were taught by Visigoth priests and in 409 carried the same semi-Arianism across the Pyrenees into Spain. It was not until the end of the seventh century that orthodoxy was to finally absorb Arianism. Yet Arianism has been reborn in the modern era in the form of extreme Unitarianism, and the Jehovah’s Witnesses regard Arius as a forerunner of C. T. Russell.

V. L. WALTER

See also ATHANASIUS; JEHOVAH’S WITNESSES; NICAEA, COUNCIL OF.

Bibliography. J. Daniélou and H. Marrou, Christian Centuries; R. C. Gregg and D. E. Groh, Early Arianism; H. M. Gwatkin, Studies in Arianism; T. A. Kopecek, History of Neo-Arianism; J. H. Newman, Arians of the Fourth Century; R. D. Williams, Arius: Heresy and Tradition.

Ark of the Covenant. A rectangular boxlike structure of acacia wood, about 4’ x 2’ x 2’, with a lining and an external sheathing of pure beaten gold. It was covered by a lid of solid gold, to which was affixed a carved golden cherub at each end. These celestial beings looked down upon the lid, and their wings covered the ark (Exod. 25:10–40). The gold lid to which the cherubim were fastened was called the “mercy seat” (Heb. kappōret, cover), and it was from between the cherubim that God communed with his people (25:22). The ark was the only item of furniture in the most holy place of the tabernacle and contained duplicate tablets of the law (25:16; 2 Kings 11:12), a pot of manna (Exod. 16:33–34), and Aaron’s rod (Num. 17:10). When the ark was moved, it was carried by priests using poles (Num. 4:5); anyone who touched the ark was liable to die (cf. 2 Sam. 6:6–7). The ark survived until the exile, when it was probably taken to Babylon (cf. 2 Kings 24:13).

R. K. HARRISON

See also TABERNACLE, TEMPLE.

Armageddon. A locality (Gk. harmagedōn) mentioned once in the Bible at Revelation 16:16, where the prophet describes the sixth bowl/vial. In this place the “kings of the whole world” will be assembled together under the inspiration of “demonic spirits” (16:14) in order to engage in battle. While the prophet’s explanation that this name is Hebrew is meant to aid the interpreter, scholars generally join Jeremias in concluding that “the riddle of Har Magedon still awaits a solution.”

The chief problem is that the name (harmageddon) does not appear in any extant Hebrew writing. The most popular solution is that we have here a reference to the mountain (har) of Megiddo (magedōn). This has merit because Megiddo was a military stronghold (Josh. 12:21; 17:11; Judg. 1:27; 2 Kings 9:27), and many famous battles were fought in the area: Israel and Sisera (Judg. 5:19), Josiah and Pharaoh Neco (2 Kings 23:29). On the other hand, R. H. Charles wonders if a corruption in the language (ar hemdâ, city of desire; or har migdô, his fruitful mountain) should not point to Jerusalem, the mountain of Israel. Prophetic expectation seems to point to a climactic battle in the neighborhood of Zion (Joel 3:2; Zech. 14:2; 1 Enoch 56:7). Further, if the apocalyptic imagery of Revelation 16–20 derives from Ezekiel 38–39, here again we have a picture of the final battle in the “mountains of Israel” (Ezek. 38:7–23; 39:2). Still others (e.g., Beasley-Murray) suggest that no geographic locality is meant; rather, this name stands for an event. Here the culmination of history is found in the final clash between the forces of God and Satan/evil.

In contemporary theology, Armageddon often takes on this symbolic meaning. In biblical thought the day of the Lord that climaxes history will come amid multinational war (Joel 3:9–15; Zeph. 3:8; Zech. 14:1–5; cf. Mark 13:7, 14–20, 24–27). In Revelation 19:11–21 the armies of heaven engage the kings of the earth in the battle for the millennial kingdom. Rebellion against God and his Messiah will mark the end of the age. The thought that devastating war will typify the end of the world enters even secular thinking. The First World War was termed "Armageddon," and Apocalypse Now, a film by Francis Coppola, contained apocalyptic imagery. Indeed, many conservatives speculate about the threat of nuclear war in modern politics and argue for the imminent fulfillment of the biblical Armageddon. Hal Lindsey's well-known Late Great Planet Earth suggests that Armageddon will come when armies of the West are arrayed against 200 million soldiers from China in a fierce land battle "with the vortex centered at the Valley of Megiddo."

G. M. BURGE

Bibliography. R. H. Charles, Revelation of St. John; R. D. Culver, ZPEB 1:311; J. Jeremias, "Har Magedon (Apoc. 16, 16)," ZNW 31:73-77; TDNT 1:468; R. Mounce, Book of Revelation; J. F. Walvoord, Revelation of Jesus Christ.

Arminianism. The theological stance of James Arminius and the movement that stemmed from him. It views Christian doctrine much as the pre-Augustinian fathers and John Wesley did. In several basic ways it differs from the Augustine-Luther-Calvin tradition.

This form of Protestantism arose in the United Netherlands shortly after the "alteration" from Roman Catholicism had occurred in that country. It stresses Scripture alone as the highest authority for doctrines, and it teaches that justification is by grace alone, there being no meritoriousness in our faith that occasions justification, since it is only through prevenient grace that fallen humanity can exercise that faith.

Arminianism is a distinct kind of Protestant theology for several reasons. One of its distinctions is its teaching on predestination. It teaches predestination, since the Scripture writers do, but it understands that this predecision on God's part is to save the ones who repent and believe. Thus its view is called conditional predestination, since the predetermination of the destiny of individuals is based on God's foreknowledge of the way in which they will either freely reject Christ or freely accept him.

Arminius defended his view most precisely in his commentary on Romans 9, Examination of Perkins' Pamphlet, and Declaration of Sentiments. He argued against supralapsarianism, popularized by John Calvin's son-in-law and Arminius's teacher at Geneva, Theodore Beza, and vigorously defended at the University of Leiden by Francis Gomarus, a colleague of Arminius. Their view was that before the fall, indeed before the creation of humankind, God had already determined what the eternal destiny of each person was to be. Arminius also believed that the sublapsarian unconditional predestination view of Augustine and Luther was unscriptural. This is the view that Adam's sin was freely chosen but that, after Adam's fall, the eternal destiny of each person was determined by the absolutely sovereign God. In his Declaration of Sentiments (1608), Arminius gave twenty arguments against supralapsarianism, which he said (not quite correctly) applied also to sublapsarianism. For example, the view is void of good news; repugnant to God's wise, just, and good nature and to human free nature; "highly dishonorable to Jesus Christ"; "hurtful to the salvation of men"; and "inverts the order of the gospel of Jesus Christ" (which is that we are justified after we believe, not prior to our believing). He said the arguments all boil down to one: unconditional predestination makes God "the author of sin."

Connected with Arminius's view of conditional predestination are other significant teachings of "the quiet Dutchman." One is his emphasis on human freedom. Here he was not Pelagian, as some think. He believed profoundly in original sin, understanding that the will of natural fallen humans is not only maimed and wounded, but that it is entirely unable, apart from prevenient grace, to do any good thing. Another teaching is that Christ's atonement is unlimited in its benefits. He understood that such texts as "he died for all" (2 Cor. 5:15; cf. 2 Cor. 5:14; Titus 2:11; 1 John 2:2) mean what they say, while Puritans such as John Owen and other Calvinists understood that "all" means only all of those previously elected to be saved. A third view is that while God is not willing that any should perish but that all should come to repentance (Matt. 18:14; 1 Tim. 2:4; 2 Pet. 3:9), saving grace is not irresistible, as in classical Calvinism. It can be rejected.

In Arminius's view, believers may lose their salvation and be eternally lost. Quoting as support of this position passages such as 2 Peter 1:10 ("Therefore, my brothers, be all the more eager to make your calling and election sure. For if you do these things you will never fall"), Arminians still seek to nourish and encourage believers so that they might remain in a saved state. While Arminians feel that they have been rather successful in disinclining many Calvinists from such views as unconditional election, limited atonement, and irresistible grace, they realize that they have not widely succeeded in the area of eternal security. R. T. Shank's Life in the Son and H. O. Wiley's three-volume Christian Theology make a good scriptural case against eternal security from within the Arminian tradition, but the position has been unconvincing to Calvinists generally.

A spillover from Calvinism into Arminianism has occurred in recent decades. Many Arminians whose theology is not very precise say that Christ paid the penalty for our sins. Yet such a view is foreign to Arminianism, which teaches instead that Christ suffered for us. Arminians teach that what Christ did he did for every person; therefore what he did could not have been to pay the penalty, since no one would then ever go into eternal perdition. Arminianism teaches that Christ suffered for everyone so that the Father could forgive those who repent and believe; his death is such that all will see that forgiveness is costly and will strive to cease from anarchy in the world God governs. This view is called the governmental theory of the atonement. Its germinal teachings are found in Arminius, but his student, lawyer-theologian Hugo Grotius, delineated the view, and Methodism's John Miley best explicated the theory in his Atonement in Christ (1879). Arminians who know their theology have problems cooperating with Calvinist ministries (e.g., Billy Graham campaigns) because workers are often taught to counsel people that Christ paid the penalty for their sins. But it is an important aspect of the Arminian tradition—from Arminius himself, through John Wesley, to the present—to be of tolerant spirit; so they often cooperate in these ministries without mentioning the matter to the leadership. Arminians assert that Scripture always states that Christ suffered (Acts 17:3, 26:23; 2 Cor. 1:5; Phil. 3:10; Heb. 2:9–10; 13:12; 1 Pet. 1:11; 2:21; 3:18; 4:1, 13)—and never that he was punished—because the Christ who was crucified was guiltless and sinless. They also hold that God the Father would not be forgiving us at all if his justice was satisfied by the real thing that justice needs: punishment. They understand that there can be only punishment or forgiveness, not both—realizing, for example, that a child is either punished or forgiven, not forgiven after punishment has been meted out.

Arminianism

A spillover into Arminianism from Baptist Calvinism is an opposition to infant baptism. Until recently the long Arminian tradition has customarily emphasized infant baptism—as did Arminius and Wesley (Luther and Calvin too, for that matter). It was considered as the sacrament that helps prevent grace be implemented, restraining the child until conversion. Arminians believe that the several household baptisms mentioned in Acts 16–17 and 1 Corinthians 1 imply that infants were baptized and that this act is the NT counterpart of OT circumcision. But the untutored often feel that they should not baptize infants, because so many Baptist-type evangelicals do not.

Another spillover is in eschatological matters. Arminianism is not dispensationalist as such, has not committed itself to a given millennial view, and has little interest in specific prophecies (believing God would have us concentrate on what is clear in Scripture: Christ's redemption and a holy life). But many lay Arminians have succumbed to popular prophetic books like those by Hal Lindsey, who teaches unequivocally that present political events and trends fulfill specific biblical prophecies.

A considerable problem to Arminians is that they have often been misrepresented. Some scholars say that Arminianism is Pelagian, is a form of theological liberalism, and is syncretistic. It is true that one wing of Arminianism picked up Arminius's stress on human freedom and tolerance toward differing theologies, becoming latitudinarian and liberal. Indeed the two denominations in Holland that issued from Arminius are largely such today. But Arminians who promote Arminius's actual teachings and those of the great Arminian John Wesley, whose view and movement have been called "Arminianism on fire," disclaim all those theologically left associations. Such Arminians largely comprise the eight million or so Christians who today constitute the Christian Holiness Association (e.g., the Salvation Army, the Church of the Nazarene, the Wesleyan Church). This kind of Arminianism strongly defends Christ's virgin birth, miracles, bodily resurrection, and substitutionary atonement (his suffering for the punishment believers would have received), the dynamic inspiration and infallibility of Scripture, justification by grace alone through faith alone, and the final destinies of heaven and hell. It is therefore evangelical, but an evangelicalism that differs at certain important points from evangelical Calvinism.

J. K. GRIDER

See also ARMINIUS, JAMES; GROTIUS, HUGO; METHODISM; WATSON, RICHARD; WESLEY, JOHN; WESLEYAN TRADITION; WILEY, HENRY ORTON.

Bibliography. J. Nichols, W. Nichols, J. Arminius, Works of James Arminius; J. K. Grider, WBE 1:143–48; A. H. W. Harrison, Arminianism and the Beginnings of Arminianism; G. O. McCullough, ed., Man's Faith and Freedom; C. Pinnock, Grace Unlimited; C. N. Williams, John Wesley's Theology Today.

Arminius, James (1560–1609). Born at Oudewater in the Netherlands, Arminius was educated at Marburg (1575), Leiden (1576–81), Geneva (1582, 1584–86), and Basel (1582–83). He was pastor of an Amsterdam congregation (1588–1603) and professor at the University of Leiden from 1603 until his death.

He did not write a full systematic theology, as John Calvin had done, but he wrote considerably both during his fifteen-year pastorate and while he was a Leiden professor. His treatise on Romans 7 interpreted verses 7–25 as depicting an awakened (vv. 12, 21), unregenerate (vv. 15, 18, 24) person. His treatise on Romans 9 interpreted the passage, used by many Calvinists to teach unconditional predestination, as teaching conditional predestination. One of his most significant writings is his Examination of Perkins' Pamphlet, which provided a "conditional predestination" answer to Cambridge's William Perkins. His Declaration of Sentiments (1608), which he presented to the governmental authorities at the Hague, gave his arguments against supralapsarianism (the view that each person's destiny was determined by God prior to Adam's fall). It also sought to secure favorable status in the United Netherlands for his own kind of conditional predestination teaching. In addition he wrote an apology against some thirty-one incorrect representations of his views in circulation, Public Disputations, and Seventy-nine Private Disputations (a posthumous publication of his theology class notes at Leiden).

Arminius was the ablest exponent of what various others had already been teaching: that God's predestination of individuals is based on his foreknowledge of the way in which they will freely (in the context of prevenient grace) accept or reject Christ. His teachings were promoted especially by John Wesley and the Methodists and, in our time, by the denominations that constitute the Christian Holiness Association.

J. K. GRIDER

See also ARMINIANISM.

Bibliography. C. Bangs, Arminius; C. Brandt, Life of James Arminius.

Armstrongism. A group founded by Herbert W. Armstrong, made famous by his magazine Plain Truth and radio broadcast "The World Tomorrow." Its full name is the Worldwide Church of God, headquartered at Ambassador College in Pasadena. Armstrongism is a blend of prophetic interpretation, which applies a version of British Israelitism to the American situation, and a variety of other doctrines culled from Adventists and Jehovah's Witnesses. Armstrongism has been shaken by internal disputes between Herbert W. Armstrong and his son Garner Ted Armstrong. Concurrent with this there has arisen an evangelical element within the church that has led to splits as they have sought to bring the church into the mainstream of orthodox Christianity.

I. HEXHAM

See also ADVENTISM; BRITISH ISRAELITISM; JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES.

Bibliography. H. W. Armstrong, This Is the Worldwide Church of God; R. R. Chambers, Plain Truth about Armstrongism; L. F. Deboer, New Pharisaism; J. Hopkins, Armstrong Empire; M. E. Jones, ed., Ambassador Report; J. Tint, Truth Shall Make You Free.

Arnold, Eberhard. See BRUDERHOF.

Art, Christian. Art that is Christian will be Christian art because the artwork meets the norm for art in the Lord's world and breathes a spirit of holiness that recognizes that our creaturely existence plagued by sin needs to be reconciled back to God in Jesus Christ.

Holy Spirited Art in History. During Bible times the Lord raised up choreographers (Exod. 15:20), sculptors (25:9–40), silversmiths (31:1–11), songwriters (Psalms), composers (2 Chron. 5:11–14), storytellers (Judg. 9:7–20; Jesus' parables), poets (cf. Isa. 40), and artisans of many sorts (1 Kings 7:13–22) who made a joyful noise to the Lord and praised God's name with the artistry of their hands, unafraid of violating the commanding Sinai word against making images that might tempt people to idolatry. Despite the ancient oratory (Gen. 4:23–24) and architecture (11:1–9) that was a testimony of godless vanity, artistry was from the beginning a gift that God endowed on human creatures (cf. Adam's poem about Eve in Gen. 2:23). God wanted artistry to be exercised as an obedient and edifying caretaking of the materials, sounds, shapes, sights, words, gestures, and the like that God had provided for the human race to tend.

Catechetical Art and Iconoclasm. By the time the church became a world power under Emperor Constantine, who converted to the Christian faith in 313, arguments on whether images were incipient idolatry (Clement of Alexandria) or a proper, pictorial book of instruction for the illiterate (Gregory of Nyssa) had set the problems for centuries of controversy on visual art.

Byzantine painting in Constantinople after A.D. 330 synthesized earlier attempts at Christian art into a style of rich ornamentation but little figuration. The artisans employed to beautify the churches of Ravenna (sixth century), however, heirs perhaps of Syriac Christian insight, broke new ground in art. The monumentality of Greco-Roman temples and the illusionistic depiction of actual things, common in Hellenistic mimesis, were replaced by a simple, jewel-like splendor in mosaics that showed a sacramental quality. Whether human figures bearing gifts (e.g., the magi) or scenes of pastoral perfection representing the new earth were formed, the visible images of these Christian craft workers seemed to make present and certify a reality that was not yet visible. Even the originally Coptic zoomorphic emblems of angel, lion, calf, and eagle for the Evangelists bore a celebrative note that rather overpowered any didactic focus; the depictions and motifs in Ravenna are more richly liturgical than devotional.

The stand of Pope Gregory the Great (590–604) for catechetical use of images, a position later reaffirmed by the moderating Charlemagne (800–814), became embattled by the 726 edict of Emperor Leo III, which banned image worship; Leo's son, Constantine V (741–75), pursued a vigorous, outright iconoclastic policy that even suppressed images of the Virgin Mary. The Second Council of Nicea (787), however, explicitly enunciated a doctrinal rehabilitation of images, using the precise distinction formulated by John of Damascus between veneration (prosynesis) for images and worship (latria) due God alone. Although antipathy toward picturing God persisted strongly in the church until 867, gradually popular practice not only received the requisite doctrinal justification for using images to teach the Bible stories but also, in line with the Neoplatonic position of Pseudo-Dionysius adopted by John of Damascus, affirmed that holy images were a means of grace. Icons, especially of Christ—who had come to earth in visible flesh—became beloved as mnemonic, mesmerizing aids, approved by the ecclesiastic hierarchy, for mediating communion between God and the ordinary worshiper.

Churched Art and Reformation. Monastic reform movements in the West from the tenth to twelfth century affected art with the ambivalence built in their combined tenets: luxus pro Deo (splendor for God, the Cluniac program of temporal power) opposite mystical renunciation (the Cistercian and later Franciscan orders). Romanesque architecture insulated a determinate, impenetrable space from the lighted, outside world. But subsequent Gothic building of cathedrals, with flying buttresses and stained-glass painting, embodied the principles of scholastic theology in which reason was meant to clarify faith with an exhaustive, concordant order that embraced everything under the sun and soared into a towering anonymity. The increasing presence of gargoyles and Andachtsbilder, cavernous pietà sculptures with relic overtones, hinted at an increasing individualistic and apprehensive fascination with the reality of death that stalked life.

A different spirit coursed through the Canterbury Tales of Geoffrey Chaucer, breathed in the graphic art of figures like Holbein, Dürer, Cranach, and Lucas van Leyden, and found shape in Huguenot psalmody of the Reformation. Now there was a colloquial bounce and an appreciation for creaturely phenomena and a joy of this earthly life lived before God's face, where faith was not seeking analogical understanding of the mysteries of God so much as itself providing a way to walk through the glories and miseries of historical turmoil. Unlike Dante's masterful, allegorical Divina Commedia, an itinerarium mentis ad Deum (the mind's road to God), Chaucer presents a kaleidoscope of society breathing pious grit and bawdy laughter that makes pilgrimage but does it with flesh and blood and peevishness. Following Luther's movement of institutional church reform, woodcuts and engravings began to flourish in northern Europe. Unlike sculpture and frescoes, art on paper lost the stigma of being an idol: you could hold the image in your hands and respond to its message anywhere, outside the precincts of the church. Luther's songs and the original psalm melodies of Louis Bourgeois and others in Geneva also drastically altered church music. Those who were not trained in Gregorian chant and its vocal decoration could now learn tunes with one note per syllable and with repeatable stanzas, so that song-praise came into the mouths of ordinary people, like folksongs.

Although the Council of Trent (1545–63) reasserted the priority of church art in all its mannerist, baroque splendor as a proper catechetical tool, the possibility for art to be Christianly spirited but not under church hegemony—a striking tenet of the Reformation—became a culturally important legacy. In the seventeenth century, the Dutch artists Rembrandt, Vermeer, and many others gave viewers the ability to find blessing in what is homely and to see glory in the creaturely commonplaces of sky and water. The great poet John Milton altered the reforming movement by combining an independent streak in Protestantism (cf. his treatises on divorce and Areopagitica) with an enormously educated classical and Christian humanism, so that the art that embodied such a hybrid world-and-life vision took intellectual pains to “justify the ways of God to men” (Paradise Lost and Paradise Regained). John Bunyan, however, became the mouthpiece for a unadulterated biblical faith that was content to pass through life as a pilgrim while making progress not to an earthly Canterbury but to the heavenly city.

Confessional Art after Secular Enlightenment. Cultural leadership passed out of Christian hands in Western civilization as the deep-reaching secularizing trends of mathematical and empiricist science, Encyclopedist philosophy, and warring mercantilism came to dominate European life in the 1700s. Disciples of Christopher Wren still built churches in England with a delicate, refined gravity; Isaac Watts and the Wesley brothers wrote hymns of simplified quatrains that comforted the many poor in society with the gospel; but pietism, also flourishing in Germany, inhibited Christians both from losing themselves in a show of art and from giving direction in such matters of sensibility. In the New World, however, an amalgam of neoclassical rationality and the transcendentalist idealism of an Emerson could not stifle the resident Puritan consciousness of good struggling against the evil heart of darkness, which surfaced in the rich, symbol-laden narratives of Nathaniel Hawthorne's Scarlet Letter (1850) and Herman Melville's Moby Dick (1851).

As industrialization complicated and upset traditional cultural patterns of privilege, and as a spirit of positivism, along with inventions such as photographic cameras (ca. 1830), faced art with the possibility of being leveled to mere fact, Christian artists like the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood in the mid-nineteenth century opted conservatively to fashion painting in an earlier illustrative style, with true-to-actual-daily-life detail and devout biblical or literary themes. Canvases like William Holman Hunt's Light of the World came to serve as Victorian icons of sorts, mirrors to stimulate the viewer's subjective piety. The initiative of William Morris was more forward looking, intent upon curing urban ugliness with good design and attention to craft; but the "arts-and-craft movement" still had a curious, old-fashioned, medieval feel to its program even while it trimmed architectural form and decorative arts to uncluttered lines. When Christian artisans were not busy setting the cultural pace of their day but looking for norms and patterns of relevance in the past, they tended, it seems, to introduce the faith thematically for confession inside their art or to suffer from touches of obsolescence.

Christian Art in a Pragmatistic Culture. Given the setback to cultural idealism in World War I and the profound jumble of avant-garde euphoria and huckster fashions since European dada and American jazz of the 1920s, the gradual supremacy of technocratic and commercialized interests over art has come to face professional artistry with a crisis: either art goes popular for a mass audience (television and tabloid), or it pulls back into an expensive, esoteric ghetto (the New York art gallery scene, for example). In such a pragmatistic and monopolistic context, art that would be both viable and truly honoring of the Lord's rule in history will be relatively rare and of exceptional quality, or it will find a marginal home in Christian communities outside the hardcore, secular mainstream.

The engravings and paintings of Georges Rouault reinvest the Byzantine tradition with a somber, stained-glass seriousness that is definitely biblical in its horror of modern dehumanizing atrocities and is truly compassionate in composition, color, and gritty style that bespeaks Christian art, whether the topic be kings, prostitutes, or Jesus Christ's passion. The Nobel Prize winner for poetry in 1945, Gabriela Mistral of Chile, updates a Franciscan holiness and gives it a poignant, singing voice that casts halos of comfort around girlish hopes, forgotten prisoners, and even the nests of birds. Canadian painter William Kurelek weds a love for the Brueghel world of low life with a Roman Catholic slant on the poverty of success gained without the presence of the cross; his mark of pristine folk happiness is normally touched by an existential sense of nuclear apocalypse, so the careful observer can never rest easy. What is significant about such varied Christian art born out of Catholic sensitivities today is its unchurchly, worldwide, sorrow-sensitive aura.

A more hidden, "autonomous," or even tangential expression of biblical faith in the art of the twentieth century deserves mention: the sculpture of German Ernst Barlach articulates with rough austerity a forceful cry in wood and metal for reconciliation with God and neighbor that so incurred the anger of the Nazi government it destroyed much of the work. New York's Abraham Rattner not only conceived an enormous stained-glass wall of apocalyptic emblems for a major Chicago synagogue but also grappled time and again in painting with the crucifixion of Christ, trying to exorcise both Golgotha and Auschwitz, as it were, from Jewish experience. Gabriel García Márquez of Colombia, 1982 Nobel prize winner for fiction, exposes small-town political corruption in South America with fantastic horizons that juxtapose real angels, supernatural forces, and the comic foibles of weak people.

The black spiritual of American Civil War days takes on new evangelical fervor in the melodies and lyrics of Mahalia Jackson, whose simple Baptist roots act prophetically through the cascades of rhythmic beat and glorious sound. The paintings, prints, and constructions of Henk Krijger embody reminiscences of both Bauhaus and German expressionism muted and melded into strong, restfully honed shapes and expertly chosen colors that reveal artistry integrated by the Reformation perspective that ordinary life is a vocation to be lived directly before God and to be redeemed while sharing sadness, humor, and hope.

New Ferment and Reforming Categories. Anglo-Catholics everywhere continue to renew the age-old vocabulary of liturgical artistic service. Native people like the Indians and Inuit of North America and many tribal cultures in Africa who came to confess Jesus Christ as Lord through missionary efforts are finding in the current generation their own non-Western idiom for art that shares biblical faith. Mennonites and various holiness communions are now looking for ways to practice Christian art, since the mass media no longer make a secluded escape from artistic praxis feasible. Christian liberal arts colleges in North America have come to form important pocket communities across the land for developing alternative, Christian formation of poetry, painting, music, and theater. Although the Nashville industry continues to break down Christian songwriters into formula sound that will sell well to the middle-class market, large-scale events like the Greenbelt Festival in England are probing pop and rock music with an open-ended desire to find a truly new and powerful, integrated Christian art.

The old categories of "sacred" and "secular" art are misleading, as if art could be first of all "natural" or "neutral," and then sometimes "holy" if it is fitting for church or spells out a biblical message. It is indeed correct to understand that bona fide art may be appropriately harnessed or "encapsulated" into the specially limited service of church (for liturgy), state (in monuments), or business (advertising). But art-as-such, like a novel or music concert, ballet or theater piece, is never uncommitted at the foundational level of human allegiance to Jesus Christ or to a no-god. And art is not holy by virtue of its topic, any particular formula, or being blessed by church officials. When one realizes that Christian art is artistry infused with a genuinely holy spirit, in contrast to art subtly dictated by a Hindu, Buddhist, Muslim, or secular humanist spirit, then the matter of Christian art will be rightly recognized as the fragile task and fruit of obedience in history performed by gifted artisans within Christ's body at large in the world.

Art, Christian

C. G. SEERVELD

See also ESTHETICS, CHRISTIAN VIEW OF.

Bibliography. J. Barzun, Use and Abuse of Art; D. Davie, Gathered Church: The Literature of the English Dissenting Interest, 1700–1930; T. Dean and D. Porter, eds., Art in Question; W. A. Dyrness, Rouault: A Vision of Suffering and Salvation; W. Edgar, Taking Note of Music; T. S. Eliot, Sacred Wood; P. Fuller, Beyond the Crisis in Art; S. Gablik, Has Modernism Failed?; J. H. Hagstrum, Sex and Sensibility: Ideal and Erotic Love from Milton to Mozart; K. Harries, Meaning of Modern Art; R. Hughes, Nothing If Not Critical; Shock of the New: Art and the Century of Change; C. Johansson, Music and Ministry; E. Kitzinger, "Cult of Images in the Age before Iconoclasm," DOP 8:83–150; É. Mâle, Religious Art from the Twelfth to the Eighteenth Century; D. Mendham, Refining Fire; E. Panofsky, Gothic Architecture and Scholasticism; "Art and Reformation," in Symbols in Transformation; H. R. Rookmaaker, Art and the Public Today; Art Needs No Justification; Modern Art and the Death of a Culture; Q. Schultze and R. Anker, eds., Dancing in the Dark: Youth, Popular Culture and the Electronic Media; W. A. Visser 't Hooft, Rembrandt and the Gospel; V. Woolf, Room of One's Own.

Articles, Thirty-nine. See THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES.

Articles of Religion. A term commonly used for the doctrinal standard of the United Methodist Church. The articles stem from the abridgment of the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England prepared by John Wesley for the use in the American Methodist Episcopal Church organized in 1784; Wesley reduced the Thirty-nine Articles to twenty-four. The organizing conference added a twenty-fifth article outlining the church's relationship with the newly formed American government. This article replaced Article 37 of the Book of Common Prayer—a statement on the authority of the British monarch over the church—which Wesley had wisely omitted from his list.

The Articles of Religion as adopted by the 1784 Christmas Conference have remained intact throughout the history of the Methodist Episcopal Church and its successor bodies. The General Conference of 1808 helped to assure this continuity by removing the amendment of the articles from the direct jurisdiction of succeeding General Conferences. It provided for amendment only upon a two-thirds vote of any General Conference recommending change and a subsequent confirmation by a three-fourths vote of all the Annual Conferences. The only change in the original doctrinal statement of the church has been the inclusion of the Confession of Faith of the United Brethren Church in the Book of Discipline at the formation of the present United Methodist Church in 1968. This addition introduced into the official doctrinal statement of the church, for the first time, an article on Christian perfection—a doctrine central to Wesleyan theology but never previously incorporated in the doctrines of the Book of Discipline.

M. E. DIETER

See also WESLEY, JOHN; WESLEYAN TRADITION.

Bibliography. H. M. DuBose, Symbol of Methodism: Being an Inquiry into the History, Authority, Inclusions and Uses of the Twenty-five Articles; A. A. Jameson, Notes on the Twenty-five Articles of Religion as Received and Taught by the Methodists in the United States; T. C. Oden, Doctrinal Standards in the Wesleyan Tradition.

Asbury, Francis (1745–1816). The father of Methodism in the United States, Asbury was born near Birmingham, England. His parents, though poor, gave him a warmly religious upbringing and encouraged him to meet with Methodists for study and prayer after he experienced a religious awakening at the age of thirteen. He soon began to preach, a calling that he dignified with a lifetime of energetic labor. When John Wesley asked for volunteers to go to America as missionaries in 1771, Asbury responded eagerly.

Asbury arrived when the states were still colonies of Great Britain, and he rapidly assumed leadership among the four Methodist missionaries already in America. His colleagues favored a "settled" clergy located in populous areas, but Asbury was convinced that preachers should go where the gospel was most needed—in taverns, jails, fields, and by the wayside. His authoritarian leadership, but even more the strength of his example, set the style for the itinerate or traveling Methodist minister in early America. He would later exhort his associates to "go into every kitchen and shop; address all, aged and young, on the salvation of their souls." Asbury's desire to spread the gospel kept him on the move the rest of his life. During his ministry he traveled nearly three hundred thousand miles, mostly on horseback. He crossed the Appalachians more than sixty times to reach backwoods Americans. He probably saw more of the American countryside than any other person of his generation and may have been the most well-known person in North America.

In spite of Asbury's energetic efforts, the Methodists did not grow rapidly at first. The War for Independence proved a major stumbling block. When violence erupted in 1775, all Methodist missionaries except Asbury returned to England. John Wesley's attacks on the move for independence did not make it any easier for American Methodists. Asbury himself attempted to remain neutral, but when he realized that independence was inevitable, he became a citizen of Delaware.

In the 1780s American Methodists set up an organization to bind established centers in the east with missionary outposts on the frontier. In 1784 Wesley appointed Asbury and Thomas Coke as "general superintendents" of the Methodists in the United States. In December of that year at the historic Christmas Conference in Baltimore, the Methodist Episcopal Church in America was officially organized, with Asbury as its guiding force. From that time the church grew rapidly, particularly west of the mountains, where the roughness of life and the near-barbarism of the population discouraged representatives of more traditional denominations.

Asbury's message in city and wilderness alike was the traditional Protestant one, with special Wesleyan emphases: God's free grace, humankind's liberty to accept or reject that grace, and the Christian's need to strive for the abolition of willful sin after conversion. Asbury's organization of "circuit riders" was perhaps an even greater cause of Methodist success than the doctrine of free grace. He early supported camp meetings and embraced revivals as means of evangelistic outreach. He also worked to solidify gains through the education of laity as well as through the circuit riders.

Throughout his life Asbury was a sterling example of devoted ministry. He preached a gospel, moreover, that reached beyond the inner life to the outer responsibilities of a Christian: he established academies and colleges, he willed his modest estate to the Methodist "Book Concern," he argued against slavery, and he urged abstinence from hard liquor. Statistics never tell a whole story. But when Francis Asbury came to America in 1771, four Methodist ministers were caring for about three hundred laypeople. When he died in 1816, there were two thousand ministers and over two hundred thousand Methodists devoted, as he phrased it, to "the dear Redeemer . . . of precious souls."

M. A. NOLL

See also METHODISM.

Bibliography. F. Baker, From Wesley to Asbury: Studies in Early American Methodism; E. T. Clark, ed., Journal and Letters of Francis Asbury; W. L. Duren, Francis Asbury: Founder of American Methodism; L. C. Rudolph, Francis Asbury.

Ascension Day. Jesus ascended into heaven on the fortieth day after his resurrection (Acts 1:3, 9), and the subsequent period of waiting for the descent of the Holy Spirit appears to have lasted the ten days until Pentecost (Acts 2:1). During the third and early fourth centuries, it seems that the festival of Pentecost commemorated both the ascension of Jesus and the descent of the Holy Spirit, which accords with the juxtaposition in thought in Ephesians 4:8–11. Toward the end of the fourth century, the two events were celebrated separately, and Ascension Day was kept on the fortieth day after Easter. Some modern scholars suggest that this was in fact Jesus' final ascension and that he initially returned to heaven on the day of resurrection.

D. H. WHEATON

See also CHRISTIAN YEAR.

Bibliography. A. A. McArthur, Evolution of the Christian Year; P. Toon, Jesus Christ Is Lord.

Ascension of Christ. That act of the God-man by which he brought to an end his postresurrection appearances to his disciples, was finally parted from them physically, and passed into the other world, to remain there until his second advent (Acts 3:21). Luke describes this event in a word or two in Luke 24:51 and more fully in Acts 1:9. Even if the words "and was taken up into heaven" are not part of the original text of Luke 24:51, we have good reason for saying, in the light of Luke's clear and unambiguous words in his second treatise, that the doubtful words in Luke 24:51 express what was in his mind. In accordance with the oral testimony of the apostles, he carries on his story of the life of Jesus as far as "the time when Jesus was taken up" (Acts 1:22).

According to the Fourth Gospel, our Lord referred on three occasions to his ascending into heaven (John 3:13; 6:62; 20:17). Paul speaks of Christ ascending far above all heavens in order to permeate the whole universe with his presence and power (Eph. 4:10). Phrases such as "received up in glory" (1 Tim. 3:16), "gone into heaven" (1 Pet. 3:22), and "gone through the heavens" (Heb. 4:14) refer to the same event. Paul exhorts the Colossian believers to "seek the things that are above, where Christ is, seated on the right hand of God" (Col. 3:1 RV), and the numerous references in the NT to the session at the right hand of God presuppose the ascension.

In Ephesians 1:20–23 Paul passes directly from the resurrection to the exaltation of Christ to the place of supreme power and authority in the universe. In passages like Romans 8:34 and Colossians 3:1 the session might seem to be thought of as the immediate result of the rising from the dead, thus leaving no room, as some argue, for the ascension as a distinct event; but it is difficult to see that there is any force in an argument derived from Paul's silence in such passages when in Ephesians 4:10 he states so emphatically his belief in the ascension. Our Lord's postresurrection appearances, no doubt, show that he belonged already to the upper world of light and glory; but with the ascension his fleeting visits to his disciples from that world came to an end, and the heavens received him from their sight. Yet, through the indwelling Holy Spirit, they were to come nearer to him than ever before, and he was to be with them forever (John 14:16–18).

Ascension of Christ

To object to the account of the ascension of Christ into heaven as implying a childish and outmoded view of the universe is, more or less, solemn trifling. While we may agree with Westcott when he says that “the change which Christ revealed by the ascension was not a change of place, but a change of state, not local but spiritual” (Revelation of the Risen Lord, 180), on the other hand we are not unscientific when we think of the land where “the king in all his glory without a veil is seen” as the upper world of light and glory, high above us as good is above evil and blessedness above misery.

The Heidelberg Catechism suggests three great benefits that we receive from the ascension. (1) The exalted Lord in heaven is our Advocate in the presence of his Father (Rom. 8:34; Heb. 7:25; 1 John 2:1). As our High Priest he offered on the cross the one perfect and final sacrifice for sins forever (Heb. 10:12), and now having sat down at the right hand of God, he has entered on his priestly ministry in heaven. As our king-priest he communicates, through the Holy Spirit, to all believers the gifts and blessings that he died to win for them. “Christ’s intercession in heaven,” said the old Scottish preacher Robert Traill, “is a kind and powerful remembrance of His people, and of all their concerns, managed with state and majesty; not as a suppliant at the footstool, but at the right hand of the Father.” (2) We have our flesh in heaven, so that, as the subtle Scottish thinker “Rabbi” Duncan said: “The dust of the earth is on the throne of the majesty on high.” In that, as the Heidelberg Catechism says, we have “a sure pledge that He, as our Head, will also take us, His members, up to Himself.” (3) He sends us his Spirit, as the earnest of the promised inheritance.

This third benefit is of supreme importance. The Holy Spirit was not given, in the fullness of his gracious working in the souls of people, until Jesus was glorified (John 7:39). “Being by the right hand of God exalted, and having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, he hath poured forth this, which ye see and hear. For David ascended not into the heavens” (Acts 2:33–34 RV). Thus was it demonstrated to the universe that “the risen Lord lives in heavenly communion with His and our Father, and that He takes an active part in the working of the power as well as of the grace of God in this world” (T. Zahn, Apostles’ Creed, 162).

The ascended Lord is with us in the struggle here (Mark 16:19–20), and we know that he has gone to heaven “our entrance to secure, and our abode prepare” (John 14:2; Heb. 6:20). A. Ross

Bibliography. J. G. Davies, He Ascended into Heaven; M. Loane, Our Risen Lord; A. S. Martin, HDCG 1:124–128; W. Milligan, Ascension and Heavenly Priesthood of Our Lord; A. M. Ramsey, in Studiorum Novi Testamenti Societas Bulletin 2; J. A. Selbie, HDB 1:161–162; H. B. Swete, Ascended Christ; K. C. Thompson, Received Up into Glory: A Study of the Ascension; P. Toon, Ascension of Our Lord.

Ascetic Theology. Classically, ascetic theology has been defined as the branch of theology dealing with the ordinary means of Christian perfection, for example, the disciplined renunciation of personal desires, the imitation of Christ, and the pursuit of charity. On this level it has been distinguished since the seventeenth century from moral theology (which deals with those duties essential for salvation and thus the avoidance of mortal and venial sins) and mystical theology (which deals with the extraordinary grace of God leading to infused contemplation, a passive reception rather than an active pursuit). The border between moral and ascetic theology is hazy at best, while the distinction between it and mystical theology is often denied altogether. This becomes particularly clear when ascetic theology is divided in the usual manner into the purgative, illuminative, and unitive ways. The purgative way, which stresses the cleansing of the soul from all serious sin, clearly overlaps moral theology; and the unitive way, which focuses on union with God, can easily include mystical theology. Only the illuminative way, the practice of positive Christian virtue, remains uniquely the domain of ascetical theology. This threefold division of ascetic theology has been firmly established since Thomas Aquinas, although its roots can be traced to Augustine and earlier. This article will take ascetic theology in its broadest sense, meaning the study of Christian discipline and the spiritual life.

The basis of ascetic theology is in the NT. Jesus spoke of fasting (Matt. 9:15), celibacy (Matt. 19:12), and the renunciation of possessions (Matt. 19:21; Mark 10:28; Luke 9:57–62; 12:33). More important, Jesus called for a general self-renunciation, for “taking up” one’s “cross” in order to follow him (Mark 8:34). The Sermon on the Mount forms the directive for this lifestyle, closing with a call to a disciplined life (Matt. 7:13–27). One must also include the call for constant watchfulness (Matt. 24:42; 25:13, or in John “abiding” in Jesus). Paul picked up these themes with his call for self-discipline (1 Cor. 9:24–27), his exhortations to put off the “old self” (Eph. 4:22) and to put to death the “flesh” or “earthly nature” (Col. 3:5), and his demand that Christians walk by the Spirit (Rom. 8; Gal. 5). Similar examples could be discovered in James, John, or Peter. It is the unified witness of the NT that the Christian life is a discipline, a struggle, and that success in this struggle is enabled by the grace of God or the Holy Spirit.

The postapostolic church, beginning, perhaps, with the Shepherd of Hermas, began producing works on how this discipline was to be pursued; that is, how the goal of perfect charity and fellowship with God was to be gained. Spiritual teaching was quickly connected, first, with martyrdom as its highest good and, then, partially under the influence of Neoplatonism, with virginity as a type of living martyrdom. As the church became one with the Roman Empire, it was the monastic movement that took up and defended the rigor of the early period; this was to be the home of ascetic theology for much of succeeding church history, producing the works of the desert fathers, Basil and the Eastern tradition of spiritual direction, and later the medieval monastic tradition, following in the steps of Benedict and Augustine.

During the Reformation, ascetic theology split into several different streams, some of which were more influenced by the medieval stress on meditation on and identification with the human life of Christ and others more by the spiritual internalization of the life of Christ found in the Devotio Moderna, as seen especially in Thomas à Kempis's Imitation of Christ. The most radical stream was the Anabaptist one, which aimed at a disciplined church with primitive purity: the whole church fulfilled the monastic ideal of imitating Christ. The Catholic stream focused more upon a group of elect "first-class" Christians (e.g., Francis de Sales; Ignatius's Spiritual Exercises), preserving the tradition of deep meditation on the human sufferings of Christ. Lutheran pietism and especially Calvinist Puritanism mediated ascetic theology to their respective traditions with their stress on holy lives (Richard Baxter, and in some respects William Law's Serious Call). Finally came the holiness tradition, beginning with John Wesley. If these various traditions are classified as radical, Catholic, state church, and holiness, one can find a place within them for the Quakers and others who, consciously or unconsciously, repeat the calls of spiritual directors and writers on ascetic theology down the ages (e.g., Richard Foster, Watchman Nee, or George Verwer).

The common themes of ascetic theology in whatever its clothing are the following: (1) a stress on the call of God and thus on God's enabling grace to live the Christian life; ascetic theology (in its basic form) is neither Pelagian nor legalistic; (2) a demand that one forsake sin, including practices that much of the church might find acceptable for "ordinary church people"; this demand is usually related to a literal following of the NT ethic; (3) a call to mortify the "flesh" or sinful nature and its desires, to discipline oneself, which in its best forms is not connected to a Neoplatonic dualistic anthropology (mortification and forsaking sin form the purgative way); (4) an invitation to follow Christ and apply oneself to those virtues that he commanded; (5) a call to surrender to God's will as an act of radical faith, at times in the form of virtually a conversion experience or a second work of grace (this is the illuminative way); and (6) an expectation that through quiet prayer and meditation one will come closer to God and experience him spiritually as "the living word" (Anabaptist) or even as one's divine spouse (Catholic tradition; e.g., Theresa of Avila or John of the Cross) (the unitive way). While all of this can become an individualistic seeking of perfection, the best writers in the tradition are aware of the body of Christ and thus formed their own groups to jointly pursue the goal (e.g., Devotio Moderna; Wesley) and/or expected that the pursuit of perfection would lead to a deeper service to the whole body of Christ (e.g., Fénelon).

In either its narrower classical sense or its broader sense (including a large Protestant tradition), ascetic theology is essentially that part of moral and pastoral theology that aims at the renewal of individuals and the church, deeper spiritual experience, and true holiness in primitive simplicity. As such it is a theological discipline indispensable to the proper functioning of the church.

P. H. DAVIDS

See also DEVOTIO MODERNA; ILLUMINATIVE WAY, THE; MYSTICISM; PURGATIVE WAY, THE; SPIRITUALITY; UNIO MYSTICA; UNITIVE WAY, THE.

Bibliography. D. C. Allison, Silence of Angels; P. Brooks, Christian Spirituality; O. Chadwick, Western Asceticism; E. Cothenet, Imitating Christ; M. Cox, Handbook of Christian Spirituality; K. R. Davis, Anabaptism and Asceticism; A. Devine, Manual of Ascetical Theology; R. Foster, Celebration of Discipline; J. Gardner, Personal Religious Disciplines; O. Hardman, Ideals of Asceticism; F. P. Harton, Elements of the Spiritual Life; U. T. Holmes, History of Christian Spirituality; K. E. Kirk, Vision of God; J. Lindworsky, Christian Asceticism and Modern Man; R. Lovelace, Dynamics of Spiritual Life; Orthodox Spirituality; L. C. Shepherd, Spiritual Writers in Modern Times; M. Thornton, English Spirituality, Heart of the Parish; H. von Campenhausen, Tradition and Life in the Church; R. Williams, Christian Spirituality; V. Wimbush, Ascetic Behavior in Graeco-Roman Antiquity; O. Wyon, Desire for God.

Aseity of God. See GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF.

Ash Wednesday. Traditionally the day for the beginning of Lent, Ash Wednesday gets its name from the custom of dabbing ashes on the head as a sign of penitence. This was originally a part of the discipline of public penitence and from the tenth century came to be used generally for all who attended this service: one explanatory formula read (from Gen. 3:19), "Remember, O man, that you are dust, and unto dust shall you return.”

Ash Wednesday

When Lent was regarded as the church's opportunity to enter into the Lord's discipline of forty days in the wilderness as preparation for ministry, it was recognized that the six weeks following the six Sundays of Lent allowed for only thirty-six days of fasting (Sunday always being a festival of the resurrection). So four preliminary days of fasting were added, and thus the season began (at Rome in the middle of the fifth century) on the Wednesday preceding the first Sunday in Lent.

By tradition, preparations were made for the fasting season by using up scraps of fat, etc., on the previous day, which was known as Shrove Tuesday, and this gave rise to the custom of eating pancakes that day.

D. H. WHEATON

See also CHRISTIAN YEAR.

Bibliography. A. A. McArthur, Evolution of the Christian Year.

Asian Theology. “Theological ideas are created on the European continent, corrected in England, corrupted in America, and crammed into Asia,” said one theologian. Because of rising nationalism and reassertion of traditional values in Asia, shoving “the white man's Christianity” upon Asians is no longer advisable, if it ever was.

In order to understand Asian theology one must examine distinctions between Eastern and Western cultures. Since the end of World War II, Asian theologians have been seeking liberation from Western theologies in order to make the gospel more relevant to their own life situations.

Historically, the development of Asian theology is closely related to the development of indigenization in the early twentieth century and the recent development of the concept of contextualization in missions. In 1930 the International Missionary Council in Jerusalem stressed that the Christian message must be expressed in national and cultural patterns with liturgy, church, music, dance, drama, and building structures accentuating national features. This emphasis on using indigenous art forms and structures was carried over into the area of theology. For example, Kanzo Uchimura, founder of a noted Non-Church Movement in Japan, emphasized a Japanese theology: “If Christianity is literally just one, then what a monotonous religion it is.” He stated that just as there are German, English, Dutch, and American theologies, Japan should have a Japanese theology. He wanted Christianity expressed from the viewpoint of the Japanese; he wanted a Japanese Christianity.

In the early 1970s the Theological Education Fund introduced a new term, “contextualization,” during the Third Mandate Period (1972–77). The concept of indigenization was taken one step further by applying it in the areas of mission, theological approach, and educational method and structure. Contextualization takes into account the processes of secularity, technology, and the struggles for human justice that characterize the history of nations in Asia. Asian theologians, therefore, have used the concepts of indigenization and contextualization to justify the development of Asian theologies.

Since God's revelation in the Scriptures came through a specific cultural form, for example, when God used the Jewish and Hellenistic cultures to record his revelation, many theologians argue that the gospel must also be translated today into the particular forms of Asian cultures. Consequently numerous Asian theologies claim to represent Asian cultural forms: pain-of-God theology (Japan), water-buffalo theology (Thailand), third-eye theology (China), minjung theology (Korea), theology of change (Taiwan), and a score of other national theologies such as Indian theology, Burmese theology, and Sri Lanka theology. The proliferation of Asian theologies has escalated markedly since the 1960s and will continue to multiply in the future. This will undoubtedly produce enormous impact on theological institutions and Christian churches in Asia, to say nothing of conflict and confusion.

The major proponents of Asian theology have been liberal theologians of mainline denominational seminaries. An increasing number of evangelical theologians have sharply reacted against the concept of Asian theology, while other evangelicals insist on the necessity of it.

Due to the existence of divergent religious cultures in Asia, the content of Asian theology is also diversified. It can be classified in four main areas: (1) syncretistic theology, (2) accommodation theology, (3) situational theology, and (4) biblical theology.

Syncretistic Theology. Some Christian theologians and other religious thinkers try to syncretize Christianity with a national religion (e.g., Hinduism, Buddhism, or Islam) in an attempt to contextualize theology into the national situation. The Program Unit on Faith and Witness of the World Council of Churches has sponsored a number of religious dialogues with the leaders of other living religions. Many of these dialogues have resulted in a mutual acceptance of each other's beliefs, since the scope of Hinduism and Buddhism is large enough to accommodate all other religions, including Christianity. Sri Ramakrishna, founder of the Ramakrishna Mission, meditated on Christ, recognized Christ's divinity as an avatar (incarnation) of the Supreme Being (i.e., Krishna and Buddha), and encouraged his disciples to worship Christ.

The idea of cosmic Christ emphasized during the World Council of Churches Assembly in New Delhi in 1961 has become prominent among liberal theologians in India. Raymond Panikkar's Unknown Christ of Hinduism stresses that Christ already indwells the heart of a Hindu and that the mission of the church is not to bring Christ to the Hindu but to bring Christ out of him.

Klaus Klostermaier, a Roman Catholic theologian from Germany, visited Vrindaban, one of the Hindu sacred places in India, to dialogue with Hindu gurus. After these spiritual experiences he testified, "The more I learned of Hinduism, the more surprised I grew that our theology does not offer anything essentially new to the Hindu."

M. M. Thomas, an Indian church leader prominent in the World Council of Churches, expanded the cosmic Christ into a form of secular humanism. He interpreted salvation as humankind finding true humanness so that it is no longer suppressed by social injustice, war, and poverty. Thomas said, "I cannot see any difference between the accepted missionary goal of a Christian Church expressing Christ in terms of the contemporary Hindu thought and life patterns and a Christ-centered Hindu Church of Christ which transforms Hindu thought and life patterns within."

Accommodation Theology. Accommodation is another subtle attempt to contextualize theology in Asia. Just as a hotel accommodates a guest, so theological accommodation considers prevailing customs and religious practices of another culture and accommodates good ideas from other religions. Christian attempts to accommodate other religious ideas are observable particularly in Buddhist countries.

The Thailand Bible Society selected the word dharma (law, duty, virtue, teaching, gospel) for the word Logos in John 1:1, because the dharma in Thai Buddhist culture is as meaningful as the Logos in the Hellenistic world of NT times. In the same way Matteo Ricci, Roman Catholic Jesuit missionary to China in the sixteenth century, chose the words Tien Chu (heavenly Lord) as the name for God because that was the popular Chinese Buddhist concept of God.

Kosome Koyama, a former Japanese missionary professor at Thailand Theological Seminary, in his Waterbuffalo Theology opposes syncretism for not doing justice to either party. He advocates accommodation instead. Koyama believes that one cannot mix Aristotelian pepper with Buddhist salt in the North Thailand theological "kitchen." One must, therefore, emphasize good "neighborology" rather than mere Christology, because every religion has positive as well as negative points. Thai Christians must accept the positive elements of Buddhism in Thailand in order to change their lifestyle.

Song Choan-Seng of Taiwan stresses a "third-dimensional theology" from an Asian perspective in his book Third-Eye Theology. He says, for example, that just as the Holy Spirit works in a Westerner's consciousness to bring about Christian conversion, so he works in the Zen Buddhists of Japan to bring about satori (enlightenment of the mind). Since the same Spirit is working in both religions, the objective of Christian missions should not be evangelization, but rather the interaction of Christian spirituality with Asian spirituality.

Two noted Sri Lankan theologians have a similar interest in accommodating Buddhist terminology and ideas to Christian theology. D. T. Niles, one of the key leaders in the East Asia Christian Conference (now Christian Conference of Asia), did not hesitate to use words such as dharma and sangha to describe Christian "doctrines" and "body of Christ" in his Buddhism and the Claims of Christ. Lyn de Silva, a Methodist minister in Sri Lanka, believes that the teaching of earlier Buddhism on the three basic characteristics of existence—anicca (impermanence), dukkha (suffering), and anatta (no-self)—provides comprehensive analysis of the human predicament that can become a basis for Christian theology. Anicca affirms the status of constant change of all conditional things; dukkha affirms that attachment is the cause for human suffering; and anatta affirms no soul or any permanent entity in humankind. The concepts of anicca and dukkha can be easily accommodated into Christian theology, but anatta proves more difficult due to the biblical concept of immortality.

The accommodation of Asian religious terminologies and concepts such as dharma, Tien Chu, anicca, dukkha, and anatta into Christian theology can be accepted to a certain extent by many Christians as long as the biblical interpretation and meaning are added to such words and concepts. Yet the question of where to draw the line between syncretism and accommodation depends on whether one is willing to accept the unique revelation of God in Jesus Christ and in the Scriptures. A person's answer to the question "Do Buddhists need to be converted to Jesus Christ for the forgiveness of their sins?" will reveal whether they believe that Jesus Christ is the only way to God.

Situational Theology. Another type of Asian theology derives directly from a particular situation. This situational theology may not be in agreement with the biblical and historical doctrines of the Christian church, and yet it speaks to concrete situations in Asia. Kazoh Kitamori's pain-of-God theology in Japan is an excellent illustration. He tried to demonstrate to the suffering people of Japan after their defeat in World War II that the God revealed in the Bible is the God of suffering and pain who could identify with the suffering Japanese.

The minjung theology (theology of the mass of the people) is another typical illustration. The main thrust of ecumenical theology in Asia today leans toward the liberation of persons from social injustice, economic exploitation, political oppression, and racial discrimination. Minjung theology is a Korean version of liberation theology and teaches that Jesus Christ is the liberator of these oppressed people. The major papers from a conference on the minjung theology, October 22–24, 1979, were edited by Young-Bock Kim, director of the Christian Institute for the Study of Justice and Development in Seoul, and published as Minjung Theology: People as the Subjects of History.

Asian Theology

Need for Biblically Oriented Asian Theology. Theology in Asia has been taught by Western missionaries. The West has its own theological formulations derived out of its own cultural background—Calvinism, Arminianism, death of God, etc. Yet in Asia the circumstances facing Christians differ from those in the West. Asian Christians must make their theologies relevant to their living situations in Asia. Some of the main issues that Asian Christians face today are Communism, poverty, suffering, war, idolatry, demon possession, bribery, and cheating.

Most evangelical theologians see the value of allowing Asians to express their theological thoughts within their own contexts. Nevertheless, they are also apprehensive of the danger of syncretism and of minimizing fundamental scriptural teachings during the process of contextualization.

At the Sixth Asia Theological Association Consultation in Seoul, Korea, 1982, some eighty evangelical theologians discussed Asian theology and jointly produced a twenty-page Asian evangelical theologians' declaration, The Bible and Theology in Asia Today. Although there is no particular Asian theology with an evangelical label that is widely accepted by evangelical theologians, this joint evangelical declaration laid down a few guiding principles for theology in different religious contexts of Asia: (1) the authority of the Bible is reaffirmed as the only infallible, inerrant Word of God: "The Bible, not theologians, is to speak in our theology"; (2) Jesus Christ, the only incarnate Son of God, is unique; (3) mission-centered theology aiming to communicate the gospel to the lost is the best protection against syncretism; and (4) love should be the essential part of an Asian theology; only as Christians identify themselves with the needy do they contextualize the gospel.

Conclusion. The key issue in the whole argument around developing an Asian theology is whether in the process of contextualization the biblical and historical doctrines of the Christian church can be preserved without compromise. An analogy can be made with the carrying of the ark of the covenant in the OT. In OT times the ark was carried by ox cart. Today in several Asian countries the ark would be carried by rickshaw, horse, motorcycle, or car. Yet the meaning of the ark must not be changed. Many liberal theologians are trying to change the ark itself.

Asian Christians must listen to, evaluate, and be open-minded to different Asian theological views on contextualization and yet, without compromise, be faithful to the gospel and proclaim it in love, as the apostle Paul exhorts: "Be on your guard, stand firm in the faith, be men of courage, be strong. Do everything in love" (1 Cor. 16:13–14). B. R. Ro

See also PAIN OF GOD THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. G. H. Anderson, ed., Asian Voices in Christian Theology; D. J. Elwood, ed., What Asian Christians Are Thinking; D. J. Elwood and E. P. Nakpil, eds., Human and the Holy; K. Kitamori, Theology of the Pain of God; K. Klostermaier, Hindu and Christian in Vrindaban; C. Michalson, Japanese Contributions to Christian Theology.

Aspersions. See BAPTISM, MODES OF.

Assumption of Mary. See MARY, ASSUMPTION OF.

Assurance. Assurance of faith or salvation denotes the confidence of believers in Christ that notwithstanding their mortal sinful condition they are irrevocably children of God and heirs of heaven. If the president should pardon a convicted criminal, it is proper that this news should be brought to the person's attention. Similarly, if God freely forgives our sins, we should expect that he will assure us of this. Thus just as he convicts the world of sin, righteousness, and judgment, the Holy Spirit, who cannot deceive, provides believers with the certainty of their new standing in the family of God.

The doctrine of spiritual assurance is widely taught in the NT, particularly by Paul, John, and the writer of Hebrews. The apostle Paul plainly teaches that the Spirit of adoption produces in the Christian the assurance of adoption (Rom. 8:15–17; Gal. 4:6). By virtue of God's purposes and work in election, calling, justification, and glorification (Rom. 8:29–30), Paul is convinced that nothing earthly or heavenly can separate the believer from God's love (8:38–39). Christians possess full certainty of God's ability to bring to completion the salvation that he has begun (Phil. 1:6; 2 Tim. 1:12). They ought to possess "complete understanding" (Col. 2:2) and "deep conviction" (1 Thess. 1:5) of their spiritual heritage in Christ. John likewise writes that on the basis of scriptural testimony to Christ's saving work believers can know with certainty that they possess eternal life (John 5:24; 1 John 5:13). Moreover, the testimony of the Holy Spirit in the heart (1 John 4:13; 5:10) and the presence of the fruits of the Spirit in the life (1 John 3:18–19) provide assurance that a person is saved. The author of Hebrews concurs with these teachings when he writes of the "full assurance of hope" (Heb. 6:11 KJV) and the "full assurance of faith"

(10:22) believers may enjoy by virtue of their new relation to Christ.

An examination of biblical teaching discloses that assurance of salvation has both an objective and a subjective basis. First, on the objective authority of the Word of God believers can know that God chose them from the foundation of the world and that Christ made full atonement for their sins, rose from the dead for their justification, lives to make intercession, and will come again to receive them to glory. Assurance in the first place rests not on emotional experience but on the authoritative testimony to Christ's saving work. On the other hand, assurance also involves the deep personal conviction created by the Holy Spirit in the heart that sins have been forgiven, and that a person has been adopted into the family of God and belongs to him forever. The religious affections thus infallibly certify the saving benefits of the gospel.

Scripture makes plain that one may be genuinely saved but lack full assurance of salvation (1 John 5:13). Religious certainty may be weakened by sinful habits, neglect of God's Word, quenching of the Spirit, and physical or mental exhaustion. The normal experience of assurance achieved by faith and obedience results in security in an age of insecurity, selfless service to God and neighbor, and confidence in the face of death.

The doctrine of assurance was given full treatment by Luther, Calvin, and most post-Reformation divines. At the Council of Trent, the Roman Catholic Church rejected the teaching that Christians may be certain they are saved. Given the Roman doctrines of merit and purgatory, only a special revelation from God could provide the individual with assurance of final salvation. Arminians generally believe that the most one can enjoy is assurance at any given moment, since a believer may apostatize and forfeit salvation. Methodism, under the lead of John Wesley, stresses as a central conviction the possession of assurance through the internal witness of the Holy Spirit and a life lived without voluntary sin.

B. DEMAREST

See also APOSTASY; BACKSLIDING; PERSEVERANCE.

Bibliography. L. Berkhof, Encyclopedia of the Lutheran Church; Systematic Theology; H. A. Ironside, Full Assurance.

Astrology. The ancient art or science that claims to discover and interpret the influence of stars and planets on persons or events. Some conclude that the planets actually exert an influence, while others believe that a study of their movements and positions provides an indication or prediction of how a person or event will fare. Astrology is to be distinguished from astronomy in that the latter seeks information about the heavenly bodies and laws governing their movements, while the former deals with alleged meaning in the relationship of heavenly bodies to people and events on earth.

Astrological principles seem to have been developed first in Mesopotamia among the Assyrians and Babylonians during the seventh and sixth centuries B.C. The interpretation of movements and positions of the heavenly bodies was one of the chief means at the disposal of priests for discovering the will and intentions of the gods. But horoscopes for individuals had not yet been developed; astrology was restricted to concerns of public welfare and the king as head of state. During the Persian period, in the late sixth century B.C., cultivation of astrology began in Egypt. After the death of Alexander the Great and the breakup of his empire, astrology found its way from the Seleucid Empire into the western Greek world. During the third century B.C. personal horoscopes became popular, and in the first century B.C. astrological practices spread among the Romans. First-century A.D. emperors Augustus and Tiberius subscribed to astrological practices.

Of great importance to the impact of astrology was Ptolemy (Claudius Ptolemaeus), the celebrated mathematician, astronomer, and geographer of second-century Alexandria. Having established the view that the earth was spherical and that it was the center of the universe, he went on in his Tetrabiblos to provide the standard astrological text of the Middle Ages. In the credulous spirit of the Middle Ages, both Jews and Christians were swept up in the practice of astrology, which was further developed by Muslim Arabs during the seventh to thirteenth centuries. Enjoying considerable popularity even in Western political circles during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, astrology lost its grip after the advent of the new astronomy of Copernicus and Newton during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries and the subsequent arrival of the age of reason. The resurgence of astrology in recent years is due in part to the anxiety and uncertainty of the age and the decline of the influence of Christianity and biblical principles in Western civilization.

The OT is clear in condemning the worship of heavenly bodies (Deut. 4:19; 17:2-5; 2 Kings 17:16), a practice that Manasseh introduced in the southern kingdom (2 Kings 21:5) and Josiah removed (23:5). That was not the end of the matter, however, for Jeremiah refers to Hebrew worship of the "Queen of Heaven" (Ishtar, the planet Venus; Jer. 7:18; 44:17-19) and more generally to worship of heavenly bodies (8:2; 19:13).

But such worship is not the same as the practice of astrology. Isaiah referred specifically to stargazers, literally, "those who divide the heavens," who distinguished the signs of the zodiac (Isa. 47:13). His condemnation of them was clear in his declaration that they could not even save themselves. Hebrews were to seek their God directly. Astrologers were indirectly condemned in

Astrology

Daniel's day, when they could not meet Nebuchadnezzar's demands. Through divine enablement, Daniel stepped into the gap (Dan. 2:27; 4:7; 5:7, 11).

The NT may refer to astrology. Some think that "height" and "depth" in Romans 8:39 are astrological terms, but more likely they are astronomical terms that merely refer to celestial spaces above and below the horizon in which the stars move and from which they rise. The appearance of a star at the birth of Jesus has given rise to much astronomical and astrological discussion. Magi, perhaps Median priests, saw Jesus' star in the east (Matt. 2). Whether it was a nova, comet, conjunction of planets (Jupiter, Mars, and Saturn), or just a supernatural light in the sky, it signified to them the birth of a great ruler among the Jews. An isolated sign like this is no endorsement of astrology. God has the right to meet seeking hearts through a medium they would understand. Since there was a sign in the heavens at Jesus' death (the darkening of the sun) and there will be signs in the heavens at his second coming (cf. Luke 21:25), why should there not be a heavenly sign at his first coming? H. F. Vos

See also OCCULT.

Bibliography. F. Cumont: Astrology and Religion among the Greeks and Romans; F. E. Robbins, ed., Tetrabiblos.

Athanasian Creed. One of three ecumenical creeds widely used in Western Christendom as a profession of the orthodox faith; also referred to as the Symbolum Quicumque because the first words of the Latin text read, "Quicumque vult salvus esse (Whoever wishes to be saved. . .)."

According to tradition, Athanasius, the fourth-century bishop of Alexandria, was the author of the creed. The oldest known instance of the use of his name in this regard is in the first canon of the Synod of Autun (ca. 670). Although doubts concerning Athanasian authorship had been expressed by the sixteenth century, in 1642 Dutch humanist Gerhard Voss demonstrated the impossibility of reconciling the creed with the age of Athanasius. Subsequent scholarship, both Catholic and Protestant, has confirmed the verdict of Voss. Among other factors, the Athanasian Creed is clearly a Latin symbol, whereas Athanasius wrote in Greek. Moreover, it omits all the theological terms dear to Athanasius (e.g., homoousion) but includes the filioque popular in the West.

There have been many suggestions as to the identity of the actual author. One of the more widely held theories is that the date of the creed is ca. 500, the place of composition a south Gaul location influenced by theologians of Lerins, and the special theological issues both Arianism and Nestorianism. These conclusions disqualify Ambrose of Milan, even though several eminent scholars point to him as author. Caesarius of Arles perhaps comes closest to the above specifications. However, the questions of authorship and origin remain open. The earliest copy of the creed occurs in a sermon of Caesarius early in the sixth century. Other manuscripts containing the creed have been dated in the latter part of the seventh and eighth centuries. In these earliest mentions it appears that it functioned both liturgically and catechetically.

The creed was counted as one of the three classic creeds of Christianity by the time of the Reformation. Both Lutheran and Reformed confessional statements recognize the authoritative character of the Quicumque (with the exception of the Westminster Confession, which accords it no formal recognition). However, the contemporary liturgical use of the creed is largely confined to the Roman and Anglican communions.

Structurally the creed is composed of forty carefully modeled clauses or verses, each containing a distinct proposition. These clauses are divided into two clearly demarcated sections. The first centers on the doctrine of God as Trinity. The precise formulation of the doctrine is designed on the one hand to exclude unorthodox viewpoints and on the other hand to express the insights explicit in the church under the influence of Augustine's teaching. Consequently this part of the creed expresses what the church felt to be the necessary understanding of God, the holy Trinity, calling it the fides catholica. The paradox of the unity and the Trinity of God is affirmed in the face of modalism, which attempted to solve the paradox by insisting on the unity while reducing the Trinity to mere successive appearances, and the Arians, who tried to resolve the difficulty by rejecting a unity of essence by dividing the divine substance.

The second section of the Athanasian Creed expresses the church's faith in the incarnation by affirming the doctrinal conclusions reached in controversies regarding the divinity and the humanity of Jesus. The creed does not hesitate to affirm a doctrine that in human experience is paradoxical: the incarnation was a union of two distinctly different natures—the divine and the human—each complete in itself, without either losing its identity. Yet the result of this union is a single person. The creed thus repudiates the teachings that Christ had but one nature (Sabellianism), that the human nature was incomplete (Apollinarianism), that the divine nature was inferior to that of the Father (Arianism), or that in the union of the two natures the identity of one was lost so that the result was simply one nature (Eutychianism).

It is said that no other official statement of the early church sets forth so incisively and with such clarity the profound theology that is implicit in the basic scriptural affirmation that “God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself.” Its somewhat technical phraseology notwithstanding, the concern of the Athanasian Creed is to assert a conception of the Triune God that is free from anthropomorphic polytheism and a conception of the incarnation that holds in tension the vital data concerning Christ’s humanity and divinity. It is this doctrinal perspective that lends significance to the clauses at the beginning and end of the two parts of the creed (“whoever wishes to be saved must think thus”). These clauses do not mean that believers must understand all theological details to be saved or that they must memorize the language of the creed. What is intended is that the Christian faith is distinctly christocentric, trusting in Christ as Savior. The church knows no other way of salvation and therefore must reject all teachings that deny his true deity or his real incarnation.

The creed does not specify the authority, either the Bible or church, upon which it makes its affirmations. It may be considered a scriptural creed because it uses the ideas and sometimes the words of Scripture, and it may be considered a church creed because it is a consensus within the Christian fellowship. The Athanasian Creed remains a superb compendium of trinitarian and christological theology and offers itself as a ready outline for catechetical purposes in keeping with its original intent.

J. F. JOHNSON

See also ATHANASIUS; CREED, CREEDS; FILIOQUE; HOMOIOUSIOS.

Bibliography. J. A. Dörner, History of the Development of the Doctrine of the Person of Christ; J. N. D. Kelly, Athanasian Creed; R. V. Sellers, Two Ancient Christologies; C. A. Swainson, Nicene and Apostles’ Creeds; D. Waterland, Critical History of the Athanasian Creed.

Athanasius (ca. 296–373). Bishop of Alexandria from 328 to 373, an uncompromising foe of Arianism, Athanasius was particularly instrumental in bringing about its condemnation at the council of Nicaea. He is regarded as the greatest theologian of his time.

Athanasius grew up within the order of the imperial church, an institution to which he held fast throughout his life. Of his early years little is known. It is said that he was the son of well-to-do parents, but in later years he made it clear that he was a poor man. As a youth he attracted the notice of Alexander, who presided over the see of Alexandria. At an early age Athanasius was taken into the household of the bishop and provided the best training that the times could afford. His education was essentially Greek; he was a “classicist” and never seems to have acquired any knowledge of Hebrew. He demonstrated, of course, the influence both of his patron, Alexander, and of the earlier Alexandrian thinker, Origen. He numbered among his earlier acquaintances and tutors some who had suffered in the great persecutions, and he no doubt drew some of the intensity of his belief from the fervency engendered in those crucial years. Not long after he turned twenty, Athanasius plunged into writing and produced theological works of lasting importance. Contra Gentiles defended Christianity against paganism, and De incarnatione attempted to explain the doctrine of redemption.

During this period of writing, Athanasius was the secretary and confidant of his bishop, by whom he was personally made deacon. It was in this capacity that he attended the first general council held in Nicaea in 325. At the council the anti-Arian party led by Bishop Alexander won a resounding victory over Arian subordination. The council affirmed that the Son of God was “of one substance with the Father,” which means that both share alike in the fundamental nature of deity. After the council concluded, Athanasius returned with his bishop to Alexandria and continued to work with him in establishing the faith that had been defined at Nicaea. In 328 Alexander died and Athanasius succeeded him in the see.

The tenure of Athanasius as bishop of Alexandria was marked by five periods of exile. His vigorous defense of the Nicene formula caused him to be the target of Arius’s supporters, who rallied after the council. However, during his forty-six years as bishop, there were enough years of relative peace in the empire and the church for Athanasius to accomplish much as a theologian. Admittedly he was a churchman and a pastor rather than a systematic or speculative theologian. This does not mean, however, that his thought is not cogent; rather, his work developed in response to the needs of each moment instead of on the basis of the requirements of a system. His works are pastoral, exegetical, polemical, even biographical; there is no single treatise that attempts to present the totality of his theology. Nevertheless, for Athanasius the truth or falsity of a doctrine is to be judged on the basis of the degree in which it expresses two basic principles of the Christian faith: monotheism and the doctrine of salvation. These are the foci for his theological reflection.

In Contra Gentiles, Athanasius discusses the means by which God can be known. These are principally two: the soul and nature. God may be known through the human soul, for “although God himself is above all, the road that leads to him is not far, nor even outside ourselves, but is within us, and it is possible to find it by ourselves” (30.1). That is, by studying the soul we may infer something about the nature of God. The soul is invisible and immortal; therefore, the true God must be invisible and immortal. To be sure, sin prevents the soul from perfectly attaining the vision of God, but the soul was made according to the divine image and it was intended to be like a mirror in which that image—the Word of God—would shine. This is a Platonic theme that had become part of the Alexandrian tradition since Origen.

Athanasius

It is also possible to know God through his creation, which, “as though in written characters, declares in a loud voice, by its order and harmony, its own Lord and Creator” (Contra Gentiles 34.4). The order of the universe shows not only that there is a God but also that he is one. If there were more than one God, the unity of purpose that can be perceived throughout the cosmos would be impossible. Moreover, the order and reason within nature show that God has created it and rules it through his Word. For Athanasius, the Word of God who rules the world is the living Logos of God—that is, the Word who is God himself. This view of God indicates that Athanasius, even before becoming involved in the Arian conflict, had developed an understanding of the Word that was different, not only from the Arians, but also from that view held by many earlier theologians. Before Athanasius there was a tendency to establish the distinction between Father and the Word on the basis of the contrast between the absolute God and a subordinate deity. This was, Athanasius insisted, incompatible with Christian monotheism.

The other pillar of Athanasius’s theology was soteriology. The salvation of which humanity stands in need is continuous with creation, for it is in fact a re-creation of the fallen humanity. In sin, humankind abandoned the image of God; an element of disintegration was introduced within creation through sin. It can be expelled only through a new work of creation. Consequently, the core of Athanasius’s doctrine of redemption is that only God himself can save humankind. If the salvation that we need is really a new creation, only the Creator can bring it. This requires the Savior to be God, for only God can grant an existence similar to his.

The principles of monotheism and the doctrine of redemption influenced Athanasius in his formulation of arguments against the Arians. Whereas they usually appealed to logical analysis and subtle distinctions, Athanasius constantly referred to the two great pillars of his faith. In this sense, the importance of Athanasius lies not so much in his writings themselves as in the things he defended and preserved in a life full of tension and disturbance. In a critical moment in the church’s history, he maintained the essential character of Christianity in his struggles with Arians and emperors. But for him, Harnack says, the church would probably have fallen into the hands of the Arians.

J. F. JOHNSON

See also ARIUS, ARIANISM; ATHANASIAN CREED; HOMOIOUSIOS; NICAEA, COUNCIL OF.

Bibliography. F. L. Cross, Study of Athanasius; C. R. B. Shapland, Letters of St. Athanasius concerning the Holy Spirit; H. von Campenhausen, Fathers of the Greek Church; J. W. C. Wand, Doctors and Councils.

Atheism. The Greek word atheos (without God) is found only once in the NT, Ephesians 2:12, where it is used in the plural form to designate the condition of being without the true God. It refers to the deepest state of heathen misery (cf. Rom. 1:28). It is not found in either the LXX or the Apocrypha. Both the OT and NT begin with or assume the reality of God, not as some speculative premise, but as universally manifest in nature, humankind’s reason and conscience, and divine revelation. The normal human state includes the knowledge of God; atheism is thus viewed as abnormal. Hebrew has no equivalent word for atheism. In the OT the form of atheism that one encounters is practical atheism—human conduct carried out without consideration of God (Pss. 10:4; 14:1; 53:1; cf. Isa. 31:1; Jer. 2:13, 17–18; 5:12; 18:13–15).

The Greeks used “atheist” in three senses: (1) impious or godless, (2) without supernatural help, and (3) not believing any god or the Greek conception of god. Because Christians denied the popular gods of the day, they were often accused of atheism by pagans. Protestants at times have been called atheists because of their refusal to deify Mary and worship saints. More and more in speculative circles the term came to mean a denial of God or the negation of the spiritual idea.

Just as the first century introduced a devotion to theism unique in its scope and depth, so the twentieth century has produced a somewhat parallel commitment to atheism. This century has seen the development of Communism with its devotion to atheism, as well as the establishment in 1925 of the American Association for the Advancement of Atheism. The latter organization was formed to attack all religions through the distribution of atheistic literature. In 1929 its successor was formed, the League of Militant Atheists, with the goals of undermining the religious foundations of Western society, establishing centers for atheistic lectures, placing atheistic professors, and sponsoring lectureships. By 1932 this organization claimed a membership of five-and-a-half million.

Twentieth-century atheism may be contrasted with older forms in two ways. (1) Today’s atheism claims to be the logical consequence of a rational system that accounts for all human experience without the need to appeal to God. Communism is such an organized and integrated system. At its heart is a materialistic view of history and the complete secularization of life. (2) Earlier atheists were thought to be vulgar and depraved. Today many serve on the faculties of the most prestigious universities, and more often than not the theist seems to be the obscurantist.

Thus, in modern usage four senses of "atheism" may be identified. (1) Classical atheism is not a general denial of God's existence but the rejection of the god of a particular nation. Christians were repeatedly called atheists in this sense because they refused to acknowledge heathen gods. It was also in this sense that Cicero called Socrates and Diagoras of Athens atheists. (2) Philosophical atheism may be contrasted with theism, which affirms a personal, self-conscious deity (not a principle, first cause, or force). (3) Dogmatic atheism is the absolute denial of God's existence. This position is more rare than one might think, as people more often declare themselves agnostics or secularists. There have, however, been those who claimed to hold this view (the eighteenth-century French atheists). (4) Practical atheism does not deny God, but life is lived as if there is no God. There is complete indifference to his claims, and often there is outspoken and defiant wickedness (Ps. 14:1). This form of atheism is widely prevalent, as can be seen from the Scriptures cited above.

Numerous arguments for atheism have been given. (1) The onus of proof is on the theist, since atheism is prima facie a more reasonable position. (2) Closely related is the belief that theistic proofs are inadequate. (3) Theism is harmful to society, as it leads to intolerance and persecution. (4) With advances in modern science, there is no need for God as an explanatory hypothesis. (5) Belief in God is psychologically explainable. (6) Logical positivists argue that theism is neither true nor false because it is unverifiable (e.g., nothing counts for or against it) by public sense experience. (7) Classical theism is logically contradictory or incoherent. For instance, it is claimed that the notion of necessary existence is incoherent and that the existence of an omnipotent, perfectly good God is inconsistent with the presence of evil in the world.

Finally, objections have been raised to atheism in its theoretical form. (1) It is against reason; the existence of something rather than nothing requires God. (2) It is contrary to human experience, where some knowledge of God, no matter how suppressed and distorted, has universally existed. (3) Atheism cannot account for design, order, and regularity in the universe. (4) It cannot explain the existence of humans and mind. P. D. FEINBERG

See also GOD, ARGUMENTS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF.

Bibliography. E. Borne, Atheism; C. Fabro, God in Exile; A. Flew, God and Philosophy; Presumption of Atheism; H. Küng, Does God Exist?; J. Lacroix, Meaning of Modern Atheism; I. Lepp, Atheism in Our Time;

A. MacIntyre and P. Ricoeur, Religious Significance of Atheism; R. Swinburne, Existence of God.

Atheism, Christian. See DEATH OF GOD THEOLOGY.

Athenagoras (second century). Christian apologist. Very little is known about his life. Neither Eusebius nor Jerome mentions his name, but a later account suggests he was Athenian by birth and the first head of the catechetical school at Alexandria. It is said that as a philosopher he read the Scriptures in order to refute them, but was instead converted to Christianity. An Apology dated ca. 177 and attributed to him sought to persuade Marcus Aurelius (emperor 161–180) and his son Commodus that Christians were innocent of various charges (atheism, incest, cannibalism) brought against them by those who had misunderstood or misinterpreted the faith. Athenagoras was the first Christian theologian to place emphasis on the Trinity, which was to become the crucial topic at the Council of Nicea (325). A later treatise, however, On The Resurrection of the Body, does not deal either with Christ's incarnation or with his resurrection, perhaps because it was orchestrated for fellow philosophers. It held that an omnipotent Creator could be expected to reunite body and soul to survive death and experience future reward or punishment. The Apology spoke of God the Maker of all delegating to angels the oversight of particular things, and referred to demons as inciting humans to image-worship. J. D. DOUGLAS Bibliography. H. Cunliffe-Jones, ed., History of Christian Doctrine; J. Quasten, Patrology.

Atonement. The expression make atonement is frequent in Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers, but rare in the rest of the Bible. The basic idea, however, is widespread. The need for it arrives from the sinfulness of humankind, a truth made plain throughout Scripture but infrequent outside the Bible.

In the OT sin is dealt with by the offering of sacrifice. Thus the burnt offering will be accepted "to make atonement" (Lev. 1:4), as also the sin offering and the guilt offering (4:20; 7:7) and especially the sacrifices on the day of atonement (ch. 16). Of course, sacrifice is ineffective if offered in the wrong spirit. To sin "with a high hand" (Num. 15:30 rsv), that is, proudly and presumptuously, to place oneself outside the sphere of God's forgiveness. Many times the prophets denounced the offering of sacrifice as merely external action. But to offer sacrifice as the expression of a repentant and trustful heart is to find atonement. Atonement is sometimes made apart from sacrifice—by paying money (Exod. 30:12–16) or offering life (2 Sam. 21:3–6). In such cases, to make atonement means "to avert punishment, especially the divine anger, by the payment of a kōper, a ransom, which may be of money or which may be of life" (Morris, Apostolic Preaching of the Cross, 166). Throughout the OT sin is serious; it will be punished unless atonement is sought in the way God provided.

Atonement

This truth is repeated and enlarged upon in the NT, where it is made clear that all are sinners (Rom. 3:23) and that hell awaits them (Mark 9:43; Luke 12:5). But it is just as clear that God wills to bring salvation and that he has brought it in the life, death, resurrection, and ascension of his Son. The love of God is the mainspring (John 3:16; Rom. 5:8). We are not to think of a loving Son wringing salvation from a just but stern Father. It is the will of the Father that all be saved, and salvation is accomplished—not with a wave of the hand, so to speak—but by what God has done in Christ: "God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself" (2 Cor. 5:19 RSV), a reconciliation brought about by the death of Christ (Rom. 5:10). The NT emphasizes his death, and it is no accident that the cross has come to be accepted as the symbol of the Christian faith or that words like crux and crucial have the significance they do. The cross is absolutely central to salvation as the NT sees it. This is distinctive of Christianity. Other religions have their martyrs, but the death of Jesus was not that of a martyr. It was that of a Savior. His death saves people from their sins. Christ took their place and died their death (Mark 10:45; 2 Cor. 5:21), the culmination of a ministry in which he consistently made himself one with sinners.

The NT does not put forward a theory of atonement, but there are several indications of the principle on which atonement is effected. Thus sacrifice must be offered—not the sacrifice of animals, which cannot avail for humans (Heb. 10:4), but the perfect sacrifice of Christ (9:26; 10:5–10). Christ paid sin's due penalty (Rom. 3:25–26; 6:23; Gal. 3:13). He redeemed us (Eph. 1:7), paying the price that sets us free (1 Cor. 6:20; Gal. 5:1). He made a new covenant (Heb. 9:15). He won the victory (1 Cor. 15:55–57). He effected the propitiation that turns away the wrath of God (Rom. 3:25) and made the reconciliation that turns enemies into friends (Eph. 2:16). His love and his patient endurance of suffering set an example (1 Pet. 2:21); we are to take up our cross (Luke 9:23). Salvation is many sided. But however it is viewed, Christ has taken our place, doing for us what we could not do for ourselves. Our part is simply to respond in repentance, faith, and selfless living.

L. L. MORRIS

See also ATONEMENT, EXTENT OF; ATONEMENT, THEORIES OF; BLOOD, SACRIFICIAL ASPECTS OF.

Bibliography. J. M. Campbell, Nature of the Atonement; J. Denney, Death of Christ; P. T. Forsyth, Cruciality of the Cross; R. S. Franks, Work of Christ; L. W. Grensted, Short History of the Doctrine of the Atonement; A. A. Hodge, Atonement; M. D. Hooker, Not Ashamed of the Gospel; H. D. McDonald, Atonement of the Death of Christ; New Testament Concept of Atonement; L. Morris, Apostolic Preaching of the Cross; J. K. Mozley, Doctrine of the Atonement; J. Owen, Death of Death in the Death of Christ; G. Smeaton, Doctrine of the Atonement according to Christ; Doctrine of the Atonement according to the Apostles; C. R. Smith, Bible Doctrine of Salvation; J. R. W. Stott, Cross of Christ; R. Wallace, Atoning Death of Christ; J. S. Whale, Victor and Victim.

Atonement, Day of. The day of atonement speaks of the Lord's gracious concern both to deal fully with his people's sins and to make them fully aware that they stand before him, accepted and covered in respect of all iniquity, transgression, and sin (Lev. 16:21).

The day of atonement centered on the high priestly ritual of the two goats (Lev. 16:7–10, 15–17, 20–22), one of which was specified as a "sin offering" (vv. 9, 15). The priest would follow the rules of Leviticus 4, except that he now sprinkled the blood within the veil (v. 15). This was a concealed act (v. 17), observed only by the priest. But the Lord would have his people know, by personal experience, what had thus taken place secretly. He therefore appointed a ceremony (vv. 20–28) to publicize what had been effected by the blood upon the mercy seat. The public ritual stresses, first, the truth of substitution. The laying on of hands (v. 21; cf. 1:4; 3:2; 4:4) expresses the transference of sin from the guilty to the innocent, so that the latter actually becomes a "sin-bearer" (v. 22; cf. Isa. 53:4, 6, 11–12). Second, atonement finally and irreversibly puts sin away: the sin-bearer goes, never to return, to the wilderness (v. 10), a solitary (or cut-off) land (v. 22). In this connection the goat is said to be for "Azazel" (vv. 8, 10, 26), a word, not used elsewhere, that may mean (1) a goat driven off (combining 'ēz [goat] and 'āzal [to go away]), (2) a precipice (symbolic of a remote, menacing place), or (3) the name of a supposed desert demon, signifying not an offering to such a demon but the banishing of sin to the place of total separation from the Lord.

J. A. MOTYER

See also OFFERINGS AND SACRIFICES IN BIBLE TIMES.

Bibliography. T. H. Gaster, IDB 1:325–26; R. K. Harrison, Leviticus; J. C. Rylaarsdam, IDB 1:313–16; G. J. Wenham, Book of Leviticus.

Atonement, Extent of. Although there are variations as to the basic ways in which this subject can be addressed, the choices boil down to two: the death of Jesus was intended to secure salvation either for a limited number or for everyone. The first view is sometimes called "limited atonement," because God limited the effect of Christ's death to a specific number of elect persons, or “particular redemption,” because redemption was for a particular group of people. The second view is sometimes referred to as “unlimited atonement” or “general redemption,” because God did not limit Christ’s redemptive death to the elect but allowed it to be for humankind in general.

Particular Redemption. The doctrine that Jesus died for the elect in particular, securing their redemption, but not for the world, arose as the implications of the doctrine of election and the satisfaction theory of the atonement were developed immediately following the Reformation. A controversy arose that resulted in the pronouncement at the Synod of Dort (1618–19) that Christ’s death was “sufficient for all but efficient for the elect.” This did not satisfy many theologians, even some Calvinists, and the controversy has continued to this day.

Numerous arguments are used to defend the doctrine of limited atonement, but the following represent some of the more frequently found. First, in the Bible there is a qualification as to who will benefit by the death of Christ, thus limiting its effect. Christ is said to have died for “his sheep” (John 10:11, 15), “his church” (Acts 20:28), “the elect” (Rom. 8:32–35), and “his people” (Matt. 1:21). Second, God’s designs are always efficacious and can never be frustrated by humans. Had God intended for all to be saved by the death of Christ, then all would be saved. It is clear that not everyone is saved because the Bible clearly teaches that those who reject Christ are lost. Therefore it stands to reason that Christ could not have died for everyone, because not everyone is saved. To argue that Christ died for everyone is in effect to argue that God’s saving will is not being done or that everyone will be saved, both of which propositions are clearly false. Third, if Christ died for everyone, God would be unfair in sending people to hell for their own sins. No law court allows payment to be exacted twice for the same crime, and God will not do that either. God could not have allowed Christ to die for everyone unless he planned for everyone to be saved, which clearly he did not, because some are lost. Christ paid for the sins of the elect; the lost pay for their own sins. Fourth, to say that Christ died for everyone logically leads to universalism. It is true that not all of those who believe in general redemption believe in universalism; but there is no valid reason that they do not. If they were consistent they would, because they are arguing that Christ paid for everyone’s sins, thus saving them. Fifth, Christ died not just to make salvation possible, but actually to save. To argue that Christ died only to provide the possibility of salvation is to leave open the question of whether anyone is saved. If God’s designs are only of possibilities and not actualities, then no one is secure and everything is open to doubt. The Bible clearly teaches that the death of Jesus actually secures salvation for his people, thus making it a certainty and limiting the atonement (Rom. 5:10; 2 Cor. 5:21; Gal. 1:4; 3:13; Eph. 1:7). Sixth, because there are no conditions to be met in order to be saved (i.e., salvation is by grace and not by works)—not even an act of faith—both repentance and faith are secured for those for whom Christ died. If the design of the atonement were for everyone, then all would receive repentance and faith, but this is clearly false. Therefore, Christ’s death could have been intended only for those who will repent and believe, namely, the elect. Seventh, the passages that speak of Christ’s death for “the world” have been misunderstood. The word world really means the world of the elect, the world of believers, the church, or all nations. Finally, passages that say Christ died for all have also been misunderstood. The word all means “all classes” of people, not everyone.

General Redemption. The doctrine of general redemption argues that the death of Christ was designed to include all humankind, regardless whether all believe. To those who savingly believe it is redemptively applied, and to those who do not believe it provides the benefits of common grace and the removal of any excuse for being lost. God loved them and Christ died for them; they are lost because they refuse to accept the salvation that is sincerely offered to them in Christ. Those who defend general redemption begin by pointing out that it is the historic view of the church, being held by the vast majority of theologians, Reformers, evangelists, and fathers from the beginning of the church until the present day, including virtually all the writers before the Reformation, with the possible exception of Augustine. Among the Reformers the doctrine is found in Luther, Melancthon, Bullinger, Latimer, Cranmer, Coverdale, and even in some of Calvin’s commentaries. For example Calvin says regarding Colossians 1:14, “This redemption was procured through the blood of Christ, for by the sacrifice of his death, all the sins of the world have been expiated”; and on the phrase “shed for many” in Mark 14:24 he says, “By the word ‘many’ he means not a part of the world only, but the whole human race.” Even among Calvinists there is a generalism, called hypothetical universalism, to be found with Moise Amyraut, Richard Baxter, John Bunyan, John Newton, and John Brown, among many others. Is it likely that the overwhelming majority of Christians could have so misunderstood the leading of the Holy Spirit on such an important point?

The second point of the general-redemption argument is that when the Bible says Christ died for all it means just that. The word ought to be taken in its normal sense unless some compelling reason exists to take it otherwise—and no such reason exists. Passages such as Isaiah 53:6; 1 John 2:2; and 1 Timothy 2:1–6; 4:10 make no sense if not taken in the normal way. Third, the Bible says Christ takes away the sin of the world and is the Savior of the world. A study of the word world—especially in John, where it is used seventy-eight times—shows that the world is God-hating, Christ-rejecting, and Satan-dominated. Yet that is the world for which Christ died. There is not one place in the entire NT where “world” means “church” or “the elect.” Fourth, the several arguments that reduce to a charge of universalism are special pleading. Just because one believes that Christ died for all does not mean that all are saved. One must believe in Christ to be saved, so Christ’s death for the world apparently does not secure salvation for all. Paul had no trouble saying that God could be the Savior of all in one sense and of those who believe in another sense (1 Tim. 4:10). Fifth, God is not unfair in condemning those who reject the offer of salvation. He is not exacting judgment twice. Because nonbelievers refuse to accept the death of Christ as their own, the benefits of Christ’s death are not applied to them. They are lost, not because Christ did not die for them, but because they refuse God’s offer of forgiveness. Sixth, it is true that the benefits of Christ’s death are referred to as belonging to the elect, his sheep, his people, but it would have to be shown that Christ died only for them. No one denies that Christ died for them. It is only denied that Christ died exclusively for them. Seventh, the Bible teaches that Christ died for “sinners” (Rom. 5:6–8; 1 Tim. 1:15). The word sinner nowhere means “church” or “the elect,” but simply all of lost humankind. Finally, God sincerely offers the gospel to everyone to believe, not just the elect. How could this be true if Christ did not actually die for everyone? God would know very well that some people could never be saved because he did not allow Christ to pay for their sins. Even Berkhof, a staunch defender of limited atonement, admits, “It need not be denied that there is a real difficulty at this point” (Systematic Theology, 462).

Atonement, Extent of

Summary. Both points of view try to preserve something of theological importance. Defenders of limited atonement stress the certainty of God’s salvation and the initiative he took in offering it to humans. If salvation depended on our work, all would be lost. The defenders of general redemption attempt to preserve the fairness of God and what to them is the clear teaching of Scripture. Salvation is no less certain because Christ died for all. The decision to reject it brings about condemnation, and faith puts one in a saving relationship with Christ who died that we might live. E. A. Litton attempts to mediate the two views in this fashion: “And thus the combatants may not be in reality so much at variance as they had supposed. The most extreme Calvinist may grant that there is room for all if they will come in; the most extreme Arminian must grant that redemption, in its full Scriptural meaning, is not the privilege of all men” (Introduction to Dogmatic Theology, 236).

W. A. ELWELL

See also AMYRALDIANISM; ATONEMENT; ATONEMENT, THEORIES OF; PROPITIATION.

Bibliography. L. Berkhof, Systematic Theology; J. M. Campbell, Nature of the Atonement; J. Davenant, Death of Christ; J. Denney, Death of Christ; N. F. Douty, Death of Christ; A. A. Hodge, Atonement; R. P. Lightner, Death of Christ Died: A Case for Unlimited Atonement; H. Martin, Atonement; J. Owen, Death of Death in the Death of Christ; W. Rushton, Defense of Particular Redemption; G. Smeaton, Doctrine of the Atonement according to the Christ; Doctrine of the Atonement according to the Apostles, A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology; J. B. Torrance, “Incarnation and ‘Limited Atonement,’” EvQ 55:83–94.

Atonement, Limited. See ATONEMENT, EXTENT OF.

Atonement, Theories of. Throughout the Bible the central question is, “How can sinful people ever be accepted by a holy God?” The Bible takes sin seriously, much more seriously than do the other literatures that have come down to us from antiquity. It sees sin as a barrier separating humankind from God (Isa. 59:2), a barrier that humankind was able to erect but is quite unable to demolish. But the truth on which the Bible insists is that God has dealt with the problem. He has made the way whereby sinners may find pardon and God’s enemies may find peace. Salvation is never seen as a human achievement. In the OT, sacrifice has a large place, but it avails not because of any merit it has of itself (cf. Heb. 10:4) but because God has given it as the way (Lev. 17:11). The cross plainly occupies central place in the NT; it is insistent that this is God’s way of bringing salvation. There are many ways of bringing this out. The NT writers do not repeat a stereotyped story. Each writes from his own perspective. But each shows that it is the death of Christ and not any human achievement that brings salvation.

No NT writer sets out a theory of atonement. There are many references to the effectiveness of Christ’s atoning work, and we are not lacking in information about its many-sidedness. Thus Paul gives a good deal of emphasis to the atonement as a process of justification, using the concepts of redemption, propitiation, and reconciliation. Sometimes we read of the cross as a victory or as an example. It is the sacrifice that makes a new covenant, or simply a sacrifice. There are many ways of viewing it. We are left in no doubt about its efficacy and its complexity. View the human spiritual problem as you will, the cross meets the need. But the NT does not say how it does so.

Through the centuries many continuing efforts tried to work out how this was accomplished. Theories of the atonement are legion as believers in different countries and ages have tried to bring together the varied strands of scriptural teaching and to work them into a theory that will help others to understand how God has worked to bring us salvation. The way has been open for this kind of venture, in part at least, because the church has never laid down an official, orthodox view. The early centuries saw great controversies about the person of Christ and the nature of the Trinity. Heresies appeared, were thoroughly discussed, and then disowned. In the end the church accepted the formula of Chalcedon as the standard expression of the orthodox faith. But there was no equivalent with the atonement. People simply held to the satisfying truth that Christ saved them by way of the cross and did not argue about how this salvation was effected. Thus there was no standard formula like the Chalcedonian statement, and this left believers to pursue their quest for a satisfying theory in their own way. To this day no one theory of the atonement has ever won universal acceptance. This should not lead us to abandon the task. Every theory helps us understand a little more of what the cross means, and in any case we are bidden to give a reason of the hope that is in us (1 Pet. 3:15). Theories of the atonement attempt to do just that.

It would be impossible to deal with all the theories of the atonement that have been formulated, but most can be brought under one of three heads: those that view the essence of the matter as the effect of the cross on the believer; those that see it as a victory of some sort; and those that emphasize the Godward aspect. Some prefer a twofold classification, seeing subjective theories as those that emphasize the effect on the believer, in distinction from the objective theories that put the stress on what the atonement achieves quite outside the individual.

Subjective View or Moral Influence Theory. Some form of the subjective or moral view is held widely today, especially among scholars of the liberal school. In all its variations this theory emphasizes the importance of the effect of Christ's cross on the sinner. The view is generally attributed to Abelard, who emphasized the love of God, and is sometimes called the moral-influence theory, or exemplarism. When we look at the cross we see the greatness of divine love, which delivers us from fear and kindles in us an answering love. We respond to love with love and no longer live in selfishness and sin. Other ways of putting it include the view that the sight of the selfless Christ dying for sinners moves us to repentance and faith. If God will do all that for us, we say, then we ought not to continue in sin. So we repent, turn from it, and are saved. The thrust in all this is on personal experience. The atonement, seen in this way, has no effect outside the believer. It is real in the person's experience and nowhere else. This view has been defended in recent times by Hastings Rashdall in Idea of Atonement (1919).

It should be said in the first instant that there is truth in this theory. Taken by itself it is inadequate, but it is not untrue. It is important that we respond to the love of Christ seen on the cross, that we recognize the compelling force of his example. The well-known and well-loved hymn "When I Survey the Wondrous Cross" sets forth nothing but the moral view. Every line of it emphasizes the effect on the observer of surveying the wondrous cross. It strikes home with force. What it says is both true and important. It is when it is claimed that this is all that the atonement means that we must reject it. Taken in this way it is open to serious criticism. If Christ was not actually doing something by his death, then we are confronted with a piece of showmanship, nothing more. If you were drowning in a rushing river and someone jumped in to save you, and in the process the would-be rescuer died, you would recognize the love and sacrifice involved. But if you were sitting safely on land and someone jumped into the torrent to demonstrate love, you would see no point in it and only lament the senseless act. Unless the death of Christ really does something, it is not in fact a demonstration of love.

Atonement as Victory. In the early church there seems to have been little attention given to the way atonement works, but when the question was faced, as often as not the answer came in NT terms. Because of their sin people rightly belong to Satan, the fathers reasoned. But God offered his Son as a ransom, a bargain the evil one eagerly accepted. When Satan got Christ down into hell, however, he found that he could not hold him. On the third day Christ rose triumphant and left Satan without either his original prisoners or the ransom he had accepted in their stead. It did not need a profound intellect to see that God must have foreseen this, but the thought that God deceived the devil did not worry the fathers. They took that as evidence that God is wiser and stronger than Satan. They even worked out illustrations in which the flesh of Jesus was the bait, the deity the fishhook. Satan swallowed the hook along with the bait and was transfixed. This view has been variously called the devil-ransom theory, the classical theory, or the fishhook theory of the atonement.

This kind of metaphor delighted some of the fathers, but after Anselm subjected it to criticism it faded from view. It was not until recent times that Gustaf Aulén (Christus Victor) showed that important truth lies behind the grotesque metaphors. In the end, Christ's atoning work means victory. The devil and all the hosts of evil are defeated. Sin is conquered. Though this has not always been worked into set theories, it has always been there in our Easter hymns. It forms an important element in Christian devotion and it points to a reality that Christians must not lose.

This view must be treated with some care, else we finish up by saying that God saves simply because he is strong—in other words, might is right. This is an impossible conclusion for anyone who takes the Bible seriously. We are warned that this view, of itself, is not adequate. But combined with other views it must find a place in any finally satisfying theory. It is important that Christ has conquered.

Anselm's Satisfaction Theory. In the eleventh century Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, produced a little book, Cur Deus Homo? (Why Did God Become Man?), in which he subjected to severe criticism the patristic view of a ransom paid to Satan. He saw sin dishonoring the majesty of God. Now a sovereign may well be ready in his private capacity to forgive an insult or an injury, but because he is a sovereign he cannot. The state has been dishonored in its head. Appropriate satisfaction must be offered. God is the sovereign Ruler of all, and it is not proper for God to remit any irregularity in his kingdom. Anselm argued that the insult sin has given to God is so great that only one who is God can provide satisfaction. But this insult was done by a human, so only a human could provide the satisfaction. Thus he concluded that one who is both God and human is needed.

Anselm's treatment of the theme raised the discussion to a much higher plane than it had occupied in previous discussions. Most agree, however, that the demonstration is not conclusive. In the end Anselm makes God too much like a king whose dignity has been affronted. He overlooked a sovereign's ability to exhibit clemency and forgiveness without doing harm to his kingdom. A further defect in his view is that Anselm found no necessary connection between Christ's death and the salvation of sinners. Christ merited a great reward because he died when he had no need to (for he had no sin). But he could not receive a reward, for he had everything. To whom then could he more fittingly assign his reward than to those for whom he had died? This makes it more or less a matter of chance that sinners be saved. Not very many these days are prepared to go along with Anselm. But at least he took a serious view of sin, and it is agreed that without this there will be no satisfactory view.

Penal Substitution. The Reformers agreed with Anselm that sin is a serious matter, but they saw it as breaking God's law rather than as insulting his honor. The moral law, they held, is not to be taken lightly. "The wages of sin is death" (Rom. 6:23), and it is this that is the problem for sinful humankind. They took seriously the scriptural teachings about the wrath of God and those that referred to the curse under which sinners lay. It seemed clear to them that the essence of Christ's saving work consisted in his taking the sinner's place. In our stead Christ endured the death that is the wages of sin. He bore the curse that we sinners should have borne (Gal. 3:13). The Reformers did not hesitate to speak of Christ as having borne our punishment or as having appeased the wrath of God in our place.

Such views have been widely criticized. In particular it is pointed out that sin is not an external matter to be transferred easily from one person to another and that, while some forms of penalty are transferable (e.g., the payment of a fine), others are not (imprisonment, capital punishment). It is argued that this theory sets Christ in opposition to the Father by maximizing the love of Christ and minimizing that of the Father. Such criticisms may be valid against some of the ways in which the theory is stated, but they do not shake its essential basis, and they overlook the double identification: Christ is one with sinners (the saved are "in" Christ, Rom. 8:1) and he is one with the Father (he and the Father are one, John 10:30; "God was in Christ, reconciling the world to himself," 2 Cor. 5:19 RSV). They also overlook the large NT support for the theory. It is special pleading to deny that Paul, for example, puts forward this view. It may need to be carefully stated, but this view still says something important about the way Christ won our salvation.

Sacrifice. There is much about sacrifice in the OT and not a little in the NT, and some insist that this gives us the key to understanding the atonement. It is certainly true that the Bible regards Christ's saving act as a sacrifice, and this must enter into any satisfying theory. But unless it is supplemented, it is an explanation that does not explain. The moral view or penal substitution may be right or wrong, but at least they are intelligible. But how does sacrifice save? The answer is not obvious.

Governmental Theory. Hugo Grotius argued that Christ did not bear our punishment but suffered as a penal example whereby the law was honored while sinners were pardoned. This view is called "governmental" because Grotius envisioned God as a ruler or government head who passed a law—in this instance, "The soul that sins shall die." Because God did not want sinners to die, he relaxed that rule and accepted the death of Christ instead. He could have simply forgiven humankind had he wanted to, but that would not have had any value for society. The death of Christ was a public example of the sin and the lengths to which God would go to uphold the moral order of the universe. This view is expounded in great detail in Defensio Fidei Catholicae de Satisfactione Christi adversus F. Socinum (1636).

Summary. All the above views, in their own way, recognize that the atonement is vast and deep. There is nothing quite like it, and it must be understood in its own light. The plight of sinful humans is disastrous, for the NT sees the sinner as lost, suffering hell, perishing, cast into darkness, and more. An atonement that rectifies all this must necessarily be complex. So we need all the vivid concepts: redemption, propitiation, justification, and all the rest. And we need all the theories. Each draws attention to an important aspect of our salvation, and we dare not surrender any. But we are small-minded sinners and the atonement is great and vast. We should not expect that our theories will ever explain it fully. Even when we put them all together, we will no more than begin to comprehend a little of the vastness of God's saving deed. L. L. MORRIS Bibliography. D. M. Baillie, God Was in Christ; K. Barth, Doctrine of Reconciliation; E. Brunner, Mediator; H. Bushnell, Vicarious Sacrifice; J. M. Campbell, Nature of the Atonement; S. Cave, Doctrine of the Work of Christ; R. W. Dale, Atonement; F. W. Dilliston, Significance of the Cross; P. T. Forsyth, Cruciality of the Cross; Work of Christ; R. S. Franks, Work of Christ; L. W. Grensted, Short History of the Doctrine of the Atonement; L. Hodgson, Doctrine of the Atonement; T. H. Hughes, Atonement; J. Knox, Death of Christ; R. C. Moberly, Atonement and Personality; J. Moltmann, Crucified God; L. Morris, Apostolic Preaching of the Cross; Cross in the New Testament; G. O'Collins, Cross Today: An Evaluation of Current Theological Reflections on the Cross of Christ; R. S. Paul, Atonement and the Sacraments; V. Taylor, Atonement in New Testament Teaching; Jesus and His Sacrifice; R. Wallace, Atoning Death of Christ.

Attributes, Communication of. See COMMUNICATION OF ATTRIBUTES, COMMUNICATIO IDIOMATUM.

Attributes of God. See GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF.

Auburn Affirmation (1924). A document issued by liberal Presbyterian ministers in opposition to what they believed was a fundamentalist assault on the church's unity and liberty. Thanks to a conservative majority, the 1923 General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. affirmed the "doctrinal deliverance" of 1910 and 1916, which required all ministerial candidates to accept five "essential and necessary" doctrines: biblical inerrancy, the virgin birth, the death of Christ as a sacrifice to satisfy divine justice, the physical resurrection of Jesus, and his miracles.

Meeting in Auburn, New York, 150 clergy published An Affirmation in January 1924, which attacked the action as intolerant and unconstitutional. Without rejecting the truth of the five essentials per se, the document distinguished between the facts of religion and the theories (i.e., the theological formulation) devised to explain them. While holding earnestly to the "great facts and doctrines" underlying the deliverance, the signers argued that the General Assembly had erred in forcing particular theories on the whole church. Other theories were equally plausible from the Scriptures and Presbyterian standards. Thus, the affirmation stated, "All who hold to these facts and doctrines, whatever theories they may employ to explain them, are worthy of all confidence and fellowship." Furthermore, the document claimed that by singling out certain theological theories and requiring them for ordination, the General Assembly had amended the church's constitution without the necessary concurrence of two-thirds of the presbyteries. In May 1924, on the eve of the next General Assembly, the affirmation was reissued, this time with 1,274 signatures.

The Auburn Affirmation demonstrated the radically different approaches to doctrine and the basis for church unity among Presbyterian conservatives and liberals. Conservatives, for the most part, saw the church as a voluntary society made up of those who agreed on doctrinal issues. In Christianity and Liberalism, Princeton professor J. Gresham Machen argued that historic Christianity and theological liberalism were two totally distinct religions that could never coexist in the same church. Liberals, on the other hand, believed that their differences with conservatives were not over essential matters and that doctrinal agreement was not the most important basis for church unity. In the long run, most northern Presbyterians (who were moderate to conservative theologically) sided with the spirit of the Auburn Affirmation, preferring a more inclusivist policy than the fundamentalists desired.

T. P. WEBER

See also FUNDAMENTALISM; LIBERALISM, THEOLOGICAL.

Bibliography. L. A. Loetscher, Broadening Church; G. Marsden, Fundamentalism and American Culture; E. H. Rian, Presbyterian Conflict.

Auburn Declaration (1837). A statement by New School Presbyterians to prove their loyalty to the Calvinist standards of the church. In the early nineteenth century, Presbyterians in the United States divided into Old School and New School parties over revivalism, interdenominational cooperation, and conformity to the Westminster Confession. In the mid-1830s the more conservative Old School tried unsuccessfully to oust a number of New School ministers for espousing the New Haven theology of Nathaniel Taylor, which allowed greater human participation in the salvation process than did traditional Calvinism. In 1837, however, the Old School mustered enough votes to "excise" four New School synods (Western Reserve in Ohio and Utica, Genesee, and Geneva in New York) from the General

Auburn Declaration

Assembly, thereby cutting New School support by one-half and essentially eliminating its voice in the church.

In August of the same year, about two hundred New School ministers and laypeople met in Auburn, New York, to protest this action and proclaim their faithfulness to Presbyterian standards. Their declaration answered the Old School's charges of widespread "Taylorism" in the New School. It affirmed that election was based on the secret counsel of God's will, not on his foreknowledge of future faith and obedience. It stated that all of Adam's posterity suffered the consequences of his sin and that salvation depended solely on the regenerating power of the Holy Spirit, not human initiative or cooperation.

By any measurement, the Auburn Declaration was well within the boundaries of moderate, nineteenth-century Calvinist orthodoxy. But it probably understated the degree of theological diversity in the New School at the time. As a result, the framers of the declaration were unable to bring about reconciliation with the Old School until 1868, when conservatives were finally convinced that the statement was an accurate reflection of New School sentiments as a whole.

T. P. WEBER

See also NEW HAVEN THEOLOGY; NEW SCHOOL THEOLOGY; OLD SCHOOL THEOLOGY; TAYLOR, NATHANIEL WILLIAM.

Bibliography. S. J. Baird, History of the New School; L. Cheeseman, Differences between the Old and New School Presbyterians; G. Marsden, Evangelical Mind and the New School Presbyterian Experience; S. E. Mead, Nathaniel William Taylor, 1786-1858; H. S. Smith, Changing Conceptions of Original Sin.

Aufklärung. See ENLIGHTENMENT, THE.

Augsburg Confession (1530). The basic Lutheran confession of faith or statement of what is believed in loyalty to Christ and his Word. It was presented at the Diet of Augsburg in 1530. Philip Melancthon was its author, but its teachings are clearly those of Luther.

Charles V called a diet (convention) of the rulers of the Holy Roman Empire to meet in Augsburg in 1530. The emperor was staunchly Roman Catholic and wanted the empire to be loyal to Romanism. He directed those rulers supporting different teachings to present statements of what they believed. Charles wanted religious unity so that the empire could present a united front against foreign enemies, especially the Turks.

Lutheran theologians drafted various preliminary documents, including the Marburg, Schwabach, and Torgau articles. Luther had a hand in their preparation, but he could not attend the diet. He had been outlawed by the Edict of Worms (1521), and the Elector of Saxony could not protect him at Augsburg. Since he had been declared a heretic, his presence would have shifted the focus away from doctrinal issues. His martyrdom would have served no purpose, so Luther remained at the Coburg in constant correspondence with those in Augsburg.

Luther's co-worker, Philip Melancthon, produced the final draft of the Augsburg Confession. At that time he was in doctrinal agreement with Luther, who approved of the confession wholeheartedly. Luther did note that it might have dealt with a few more errors and abuses and that he would not have used such a mild tone. The doctrine of the confession is clearly that of the Reformer himself.

The Augsburg Confession was read publicly at the diet in German on the afternoon of June 25, 1530, by chancellor Christian Beyer of Electoral Saxony. Both the German and the Latin copies were handed in as official. Melancthon altered later editions, partly to render it ambiguous on points such as the real presence of Christ's body and blood in the Lord's Supper. He was inclined to compromise on doctrinal issues, which is why Gnesio-Lutherans often refer to the Unaltered Augsburg Confession. The Augsburg Confession was included in the Book of Concord (1580) as the basic Lutheran confession.

The Augsburg Confession was signed by seven princes and representatives of two independent cities. Believing that the doctrine it taught was biblical and true, they signed it because the diet was precisely a convention of the rulers of the empire. But the confession was not intended to present the teachings of some governmental authority. It stated what was being taught in the churches in those parts of Germany. The first article begins: "The churches among us teach with great consensus. . . ."

In addition to a preface and brief conclusion, the Augsburg Confession has twenty-eight articles: the first twenty-one present Lutheran teaching and reject contrary doctrines; the last seven reject abuses in Christian life. The confession is too brief to fully present the biblical proof or the testimony of previous theologians. In response to a Roman Catholic answer, the Confutation, Melancthon published in 1531 the Apology of the Augsburg Confession, which deals with the controverted issues at greater length.

To discuss the teachings of the Augsburg Confession at length would constitute a theology textbook. We can at best give some idea of what it teaches: the Trinity; original sin as true sin that would condemn if not forgiven; the deity and humanity of Jesus; his sacrifice for all human sin; justification by grace through faith without our works; the gospel, baptism, and the Lord's Supper as actual tools of the Holy Spirit to create and sustain faith; good works as a result, not a cause, of salvation, motivated by the good news that salvation has been earned for us by Christ. Much more could be said, but this indicates that the Augsburg Confession simply teaches the position that Lutherans consider biblical.

The abuses corrected include various false ideas and practices in the Lord's Supper, clerical celibacy, the misuse of confession and absolution, the dietary laws of medieval Romanism, and the idea of a hierarchy in visible Christendom having divine authority in matters of conscience. J. M. DRICKAMER

See also CONFESSIONS OF FAITH; LUTHER, MARTIN; MELANCHTHON, PHILIP.

Bibliography. F. Bente, Historical Introduction to the Symbolical Books of the Evangelical Lutheran Church; H. Fagerberg, New Look at the Lutheran Confessions, 1529–1537; C. P. Krauth, Conservative Reformation and Its Theology; J. M. Reu, Augsburg Confession.

Augustine of Canterbury (d. 604?). The first archbishop of Canterbury. His early years are uncertain, and his death can be placed no more exactly than 604–9, sometime after that of Gregory I, his papal patron. Augustine began as prior of Pope Gregory the Great's own Monastery of St. Andrew in Rome. This was the Gregory whose heart was stirred toward a rebirth of Roman Catholic missions by the auctioning of Anglo-Saxon slave boys in Rome's marketplace around 586. Sometime before 590 Gregory himself set off to go but was recalled only three days' journey from Rome. In 590 Gregory used papal revenues to buy Anglo-Saxon slave boys to be trained as Christians and returned to England. And in 596 he appointed Augustine to head a mission of thirty or forty monks to England.

Augustine did not wish the appointment and went only "under obedience." As he traveled through Gaul, he heard such tales of English savagery that he returned to Rome. Gregory sent him right back, however, so Augustine landed in Thanet early in 597. He was received kindly by King Aethelbert of Kent, whose queen, Bertha, was a Christian. She and her chaplain, the Frankish bishop Liudhard, maintained worship in St. Martin's Church. Aethelbert gave Augustine and his monks a place to live and authority to preach in Canterbury. In rapid succession Augustine converted Aethelbert, baptized him and his subjects (ten thousand on Christmas Day, 597), began building Christ Church and the Monastery of Saints Peter and Paul (which now bears Augustine's name), and in 604 consecrated bishops for London (Mellitus) and Rochester (Justus).

The England Augustine reached was largely pagan because Anglo-Saxon invasions had isolated Christians in the northwest and Wales. Augustine labored in vain to unite these remnant British or Celtic clergy to Rome. Suspicion toward Augustine and differences over liturgy, baptism, and Easter doomed the effort. The conversion of pagans and the reestablishment of Roman Catholicism succeeded only in Kent and Essex in Augustine's decade of ministry, but Gregory responded to these successes. In 597 he called Augustine to Arles to be consecrated bishop, and in 601 he sent the pallium and gave Augustine authority over all English bishops.

In addition to establishing England as a see separate from Gaul, Augustine's ministry resulted in the development of English rites. Gregory advised his new archbishop to establish worship by adapting the usages of other churches to English needs. And of great importance to the entire medieval church, when Augustine inquired of his papal patron how to use church income, Gregory laid down the principle that came to characterize Roman practice: divide income into four equal parts—one each for the bishop, priest, relief of the poor, and upkeep of the church. V. L. WALTER Bibliography. J. R. H. Moorman, History of the Church in England.

Augustine of Hippo (354–430). Greatest of the Latin fathers, bishop of Hippo Regius in the Roman North African province of Numidia, Augustine exercised an unparalleled influence on Western Christianity, both Catholic and Protestant. The corpus of his writings is huge and relatively complete, thanks to their extensive use in the Middle Ages. His theories of history, Christian society, ethics, and just war shaped Western civilization. His views on the essential goodness of creation, the nature of evil, the will, sin, predestination, faith, the sacraments, and the authority of the church were pivotal in the development of Latin church doctrine, furthering its distinctive interest (as versus Eastern Orthodoxy) in human nature and the operations of grace. Most Western theological movements claiming orthodoxy take their stand in the Augustinian tradition.

A master rhetorician, Augustine coined many sayings still familiar today, including: "Love, and do what you will"; "Unity in things necessary, liberty in things doubtful, charity in all things"; "With love for mankind and hatred of sins" (often styled "Love the sinner, but hate the sin"); "Jesus Christ will be the Lord of all, or he will not be Lord at all"; "Seek not to understand that you may believe, but believe that you may understand" (the source of Anselm's famous formula credo ut intelligam); and "Thou hast made us for Thyself, and our hearts are restless until they rest in Thee" (the "God-shaped hole" in every person). As these sayings suggest, for all his exposition and polemic, and for all his attention to the relations of faith and reason, Augustine saw Christian love for God and neighbor as the supreme goal of life and learning.

Augustine of Hippo

Aurelius Augustinus—the praenomen Aurelius is questionable—was born 13 November 354 of middle-class parents in Thagaste (in present-day Tunisia). His father, Patricius, a member of the local council, was a pagan who hoped to see his son advance in the Roman civil service. He figures very little in Augustine's account of his life, dying when Augustine was about 17. The dominant parent was instead his mother, Monica, a devout if imperfect and domineering Christian and the daughter of Christian parents. The young Augustine so excelled at his studies that his father sent him to nearby Madaura and Carthage to study rhetoric. After a period of loose living, he took a woman (name unknown) as his unofficial wife, who soon bore him a son, Adeodatus ("gift of God"). Reading Cicero's Hortensius in Carthage, Augustine was captivated by its exhortation to seek Wisdom, and found himself "with an unbelievable fire in my heart . . . to fly away from earthly things to Thee." But when he turned to the Scriptures for this Wisdom, he found their style and content, especially in the OT, crude in comparison to pagan philosophy. Disillusioned, he was attracted by the "exceedingly well-spoken and fashionable" Manichaeans, followers of a rival religion to Christianity founded a century earlier by the Persian ex-Christian, Mani. Rejecting the OT, presenting their doctrine as the culmination of all religions, offering sophisticated rational demonstration and shunning the authoritarianism of Christianity, they identified evil with matter and good with the spirit, thus locating guilt outside the true self. Augustine joined as an "auditor," not a full member, and at first was an enthusiastic advocate of the new religion. Eventually finding Mani's cosmology unreasonable, but unable to find a satisfying alternative solution to the problems of guilt and evil, he left the Manichees after nine years.

Meanwhile, he became a teacher of rhetoric in Thagaste, Carthage, Rome, and finally Milan, where the imperial court resided. There he garnered the vital new post of city professor of rhetoric, delivering official speeches to publicize the emperor's and consuls' programs. Anticipating a suitable official marriage to a Catholic heiress, he sorrowfully sent away his unofficial wife after fifteen years of cohabitation.

In Milan, Augustine flirted briefly with Skepticism, having learned from Cicero to conceive of Wisdom as a quest rather than an arrival. But he became a catechumen of the church of Milan—perhaps at his mother's bidding, perhaps as a gesture of conformity to a Christian imperial court—and the preaching of the bishop, Ambrose, impressed him. From him Augustine found that Christianity could be erudite and eloquent, and that allegorical interpretation could reveal unsuspected profundity in the Bible. Christian intellectuals introduced him to Neoplatonist philosophy, in which he found answers to the deficiencies of Manichaeism: the Good is utterly transcendent; evil is a privation of good; and the soul, not just the body, partakes in this evil.

Augustine entered a second period of troubled sensual indulgence, heightening his sense of guilt in view of these teachings of God's transcendent goodness. A visiting countryman told him of the ascetic monks of Egypt and their conquests over self. Augustine, astonished that the unlearned should "storm the gates of heaven, while we, for all our learning, lie here groveling in this world of flesh and blood," flung himself under a fig tree in his garden and wept. Just then a child's voice from a neighboring house sang out, "Take up and read!" Taking this as a divine call, Augustine picked up the copy of Paul's writings he had been reading and turned to Romans 13:13–14: "Let us walk honestly, as in the day . . . not in immorality . . . but put on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make no provision for the flesh." This became his moment of resolve.

Immediately he abandoned his career and marriage plans and removed to a country estate in nearby Cassiciacum, where he lived with family, friends, and pupils in a kind of philosophers' retreat within sight of the Alps. There he wrote classical dialogues and his self-searching Soliloquies while pursuing the union of Neoplatonic philosophy with the religion of the Church. He was baptized by Ambrose in Milan on Easter 387.

Augustine took an intimate core of his group homeward to found a smaller community of lay "servants of God." En route from Milan his mother died; in Thagaste his son also died. Augustine's plans turned to founding a monastery—but while attempting to do so in Hippo he was pressed into the priesthood by the congregation in church one Sunday (391). Five years later he replaced the bishop. Thus Augustine the rhetorician-turned-philosopher became Augustine the bishop of Hippo, who combined eloquence, incisiveness, and the love of wisdom with the service of the Catholic church.

The bishop's life was one of constant activity: ecclesiastical duties, preaching, encouraging monastic life, training future bishops, and battling against enemy doctrines within and outside the church. He articulated his most famous theological positions in polemics against the Manichaeans (on evil and the soul), Donatists (on ecclesiology and the sacraments), and Pelagians (on sin and grace).

When one speaks of "Augustinianism" it is usually in reference to his unflattering view of the human condition. Believing that evil is falling away from the Good, Augustine located sin in the misuse of man's highest gift: free rational choice.

Through pride—the deliberate choice to put his will above God’s—Adam fell, and took us all with him into a fallen condition. We remain free, but free only to sin; we inherit not only a tendency to sin, but an inability to choose God. Therefore our salvation becomes impossible without God’s grace, given to some and withheld from others by an inscrutable act of predestination. Pelagius, one of the readers of Augustine’s Confessions, protested that these teachings would encourage moral laxity. The exchange between two men, beginning in 410, anticipated similar debates centuries later between Luther and Erasmus and the Calvinists and Armenians. Augustine’s doctrine of original sin became catholic orthodoxy when the Council of Ephesus (431) condemned Pelagianism along with Nestorianism.

The positive counterpart to Augustine’s bleak anthropology is a high confidence in God’s power to save his chosen ones. Salvation is entirely God’s work, at God’s initiative, and therefore cannot fail. He gives his elect the gift of perseverance, so that even though they sin they will repent and eventually be unable to forsake the good. Before the fall, Adam was able not to sin (posse non peccare); unredeemed humanity cannot avoid sinning (non posse non peccare); but the redeemed of the Lord will attain the highest freedom, being unable to sin (non posse peccare).

It is on this issue of power that Augustine’s soteriology turns. As fallen humans we still have free agency—but we freely choose sin and evil, lacking the power to do otherwise. Thus this very freedom of ours is itself a kind of unfreedom, “for he is freely in bondage who does with pleasure the will of his master.” We are free, responsible, and unfree all at once. Even our virtues—and Augustine does acknowledge virtue among the unregenerate in areas of civil justice—are laced with sinful motives. Agency we have; what we lack is the power to change our choices and our motives. Only after regeneration by the extrinsic power of God can we believe in him and do good out of pure love for him (Enchiridion, 30–32).

Salvation is thus God’s gracious gift, granted rather than earned. Grace is utterly sovereign and efficacious. But for Augustine, grace is not just unmerited, predestinating favor; it is also an infused power unto righteousness, connected intimately with the sacraments. It is the granting of both pardon and goodness, and it comes by gradual process. Here Augustine did not distinguish between justification and sanctification as crisply as would the Reformation.

The basic impulse in Augustine’s doctrines of sin and grace—as in those traditions that build on them (especially the Reformed theology)—is to ascribe all good to God alone. To love any created thing in itself, without reference to God, is sin (On Christian Doctrine, 1. iv, xxii). Thus Augustine countered his anti-Manichaean assertion of the goodness of creation with a stern suspicion of creaturely delights—not because pleasure is evil, but because fallen humanity so easily delights only in the creature rather than delight in God through the created thing.

So impressed was Augustine with the wickedness of misdirected delight that he urged even married priests to abstain from sexual relations, regarding the power of sexual pleasure as unmanageable by the will and therefore to be avoided. Unlike the desert ascetics, Augustine interpreted fallen sexual desire not as a symptom of greed or vainglory, but as a punishment—a specific punishment fitting Adam’s crime. After the fall, sex could never be enjoyed without loosening the body from the control of the will and vaunting the self above God, reminding even Christian spouses in the act of love that they were corrupt. While Augustine certainly did not originate the early Christian denigration of sex, he gave it a powerful boost and bequeathed it to the Middle Ages.

In several other ways Augustine’s theology looks foreign to most Protestant evangelicals. In addition to the literal, he practiced the allegorical interpretation of the Scriptures, and while he declared their inerrancy he also said he would not have believed them had not the Church declared them true. He taught that no one in this life can know with certainty that he is elect. He held with Cyprian that outside the church there is no salvation, and that bishops of the church hold authority by apostolic succession. And he held a high doctrine of the sacraments, teaching that they “place the reality before us and actualize it.” In the controversy with the Donatists—who, after enduring the Diocletian persecutions, declared unholy the sacraments administered by those who had denied Christ, and set up rival churches—he justified the use of coercion against heretics and schismatics in the name of catholic Christianity.

Augustine’s later life saw the beginnings of the fall of the Western Roman Empire. When the Visigoths sacked the Eternal City and pagans ascribed the catastrophe to the abandonment of the Roman gods, Augustine defended Christianity in his City of God, taking the opportunity to develop and apply an eschatological Christian philosophy of history. This, together with his intimate, autobiographical Confessions (written in middle age), is his best-known work. He died with the barbarians literally at the gates, in the third month of the Vandal siege of Hippo. He spent his last days meditating on his sickbed on the penitential Psalms, which were mounted on the wall for that purpose.

Among Augustine’s best-known theological treatises are On Christian Doctrine (important for his views on Scripture, hermeneutics, and preaching), the Enchiridion (a brief manual of doctrine famous for its articulation of original sin), On the Trinity, and Literal Commentary on Genesis (an extensive theology of creation). His Retractions—written three years before his death—review, explain, and correct his life's work. Numerous topical treatises, polemical works, Scriptural commentaries, sermons, and letters round out his writings. B. J. GUNDLACH

Augustine of Hippo

Bibliography. R. Battenhouse, Companion to the Study of St. Augustine; G. Bonner, God's Decree and Man's Destiny: Studies on the Thought of Augustine of Hippo; P. Bright, Augustine and the Bible; P. Brown, Augustine of Hippo; Body and Society: Men, Women, and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity; J. Burnaby, Amor Dei: A Study of the Religion of St. Augustine; H. Chadwick, Augustine; H. Deane, Political and Social Ideas of St. Augustine; É. Gilson, Christian Philosophy of St. Augustine; S. J. Grabowski, Church: An Introduction to the Theology of St. Augustine; R. Guardini, Conversion of St. Augustine; R. Markus, Saeculum: History and Society in the Theology of St. Augustine; H. I. Marrou, St. Augustine and His Influence through the Ages; C. Mayer, ed., Augustinus-Lexikon; O. O'Donovan, Problem of Self-Love in St. Augustine; E. Portalié, Guide to the Thought of St. Augustine; J. E. Rotelle, ed., Works of St. Augustine: A Translation for the 21st Century; T. K. Scott, Augustine: His Thought in Context; F. van der Meer, Augustine the Bishop; Augustinian Studies.

Aulén, Gustaf Emanuel Hildebrand (1879–1978). Swedish theologian and scholar Aulén was appointed professor of theology at the University of Lund in 1913, remaining there until 1933. He then became bishop in Strängnäs (1933–52) and was deeply involved in the Swedish resistance to Nazism. In 1952 he returned to teaching at Lund and also continued his leading role in the ecumenical movement, playing an important part in the first assembly of the World Council of Churches in 1948.

Aulén's theological works span more than half a century. His Faith of the Christian Church was first published in 1923, and the English translation of the fifth Swedish edition is still in print, a model of constructive, ecumenical Lutheran theology. At the age of ninety-four he wrote Jesus in Contemporary Historical Research, in which he gives his analysis of the work of biblical NT scholarship on the life and significance of Christ in the 1960s and early 1970s. Translations of his Church, Law and Society and Eucharist and Sacrifice make his concerns available to an English-speaking audience.

Aulén is best remembered for his classic analysis of theories of the atonement in Christus Victor, written in 1930 while still a professor at the University of Lund. After discussing the biblical and historical aspects of three theories of the atonement—the subjective, Latin (penal), and the classic—Aulén attempts to breathe new life into the classic theory, where Christ's death is seen as the act of God in continuity with his victorious life and resurrection. The atonement is a divine victory overcoming the destructive powers of hell and death, making available and visible the reconciling love of God.

Aulén is noted in the Swedish Lutheran Church as a composer of widely used church music.

S. M. SMITH

Bibliography. G. Wingren, HCT 308–19.

Authority in the Church. See CHURCH, AUTHORITY IN THE.

Authority of the Bible. See BIBLE, AUTHORITY OF.

Auxiliary Bishop. See BISHOP; CHURCH OFFICERS.

Averroes (1126–1198). Islamic philosopher and theologian Ibn Rushd, or Averroes, was born into a learned family of civil judges in Cordoba, Spain, and died at the caliph's court in Marrakesh, Morocco. He held several high civil posts in Islamic Spain and attended one of the caliphs as his personal physician. Though best known for his work in philosophy and theology, which came at the very end of an Islamic attempt to synthesize all Greek philosophy, Averroes was also famous for his knowledge of law (especially his grasp of Islamic legal traditions), medicine (a textbook), and astronomy (attempts to prove the earth round). Against the philosophic view prevailing in the small circle of Islamic philosophers, essentially a Neoplatonic interpretation of Aristotle, Averroes attempted to recover the true Aristotle, that is, to establish the autonomy of philosophical investigation unimpeded by religious and theological considerations. To do so, he commented on nearly all of Aristotle's works, explaining the text word by word in three different versions of varying length and complexity. From those commentaries three problems emerged to confound Islamic and Christian theologians alike.

Truth is one, but there are three different ways to discover it, religious instruction (by way of the Koran or the Bible) being the lowest and philosophical thought the highest. If discrepancies between revealed and reasoned truths should emerge, religious language, meant for all the people, must be interpreted symbolically and yield to the philosophical. This is the foundation for the "double-truth theory" later associated with Averroes's name that suggested religion and philosophy might arrive at or teach truths that seem contrary. Second, Averroes held to the eternity of the world and regarded God chiefly as the essential "motor" thereof, the unmoved mover. Finally, he taught that the soul is the substantial form of the body, suggesting it was also mortal, while each individual intellect, though pure form, is passive (or potential), activated toward understanding by a single agent intellect (usually equated with God or his ideas) who is alone immortal.

Averroes's implied attacks upon divine revelation, creation, and the immortality of the soul put him out of favor with most Muslim thinkers, and the original Arabic versions of many of his works have been lost. They were translated almost immediately into Hebrew and Latin and exercised an enormous influence from the thirteenth to the seventeenth centuries. From the 1230s onward, medieval philosophers and theologians learned their Aristotle through Averroes and regarded him simply as "the commentator." Some, especially from the arts faculty (Boethius of Dacia, Siger of Brabant), seemed much too dangerously receptive to his views on the autonomy of the philosophical investigation, while others (preeminently Thomas Aquinas) learned much from him but neutralized or refuted the most aberrant positions in behalf of Christian orthodoxy. Despite (or perhaps in reaction to) papal condemnations of Averroist positions in 1270 and 1277, John of Jandun and John Baconthorpe openly defended the autonomy of philosophical truths and thus initiated a tradition of "Latin Averroism" that continued into the seventeenth century, linked most often to the University of Padua.

J. VAN ENGEN

Bibliography. Paul Edwards, ed., Encyclopedia of Philosophy 1:220–23; F. E. Peters, Aristotle and the Arabs; F. Van Steenberghen, Thomas Aquinas and Radical Aristotelianism.

Awakenings, Great. See GREAT AWAKENINGS.

Azusa Street Revival. An abandoned Methodist church at 312 Azusa Street in the industrial section of Los Angeles became in 1906 the originating center of modern Pentecostalism. William J. Seymour, a mild-mannered Holiness preacher, founded the Apostolic Faith Gospel Mission on Azusa Street, where a new emphasis on the work of the Holy Spirit rapidly became a local sensation and eventually a worldwide phenomenon. Before coming to Los Angeles, Seymour had been influenced by the ministry of Charles Fox Parham, who had grown up in Methodist and Holiness circles. In his schools in Kansas and Texas, Parham taught that a baptism of "the Holy Ghost and fire" should be expected among those who had been converted and who had gone forward to the perfect sanctification that John Wesley and American Holiness bodies had proclaimed. Parham also pioneered the teaching that a special sign of the Holy Spirit baptism would be "speaking with other tongues." With many others in the Methodist and Holiness traditions at the end of the nineteenth century, he placed a strong emphasis on the gifts of the Spirit, including that of healing.

The revival that began on Azusa Street in 1906 rapidly attracted attention from secular media like the Los Angeles Times. More important, it soon became the center of attraction for thousands of visitors from around the world, who often went back to their homelands proclaiming the need for a special postconversion baptism of the Holy Spirit. These included Florence Crawford (founder of the Apostolic Faith movement in the northwestern United States), missionary T. B. Barratt (who is credited with the establishment of Pentecostalism in Scandinavia and northwestern Europe), William H. Durham of Chicago (early spokesman for Pentecostalism in the Midwest), and Eudorus N. Bell of Fort Worth (first chairman of the Assemblies of God).

Meetings at Azusa Street, which went on daily for three years, were marked by spontaneous prayer and preaching, a nearly unprecedented cooperation between blacks and whites, and the active participation of women. Observers at the time linked Azusa Street with the great Welsh Revival of 1904–5 and the "Latter Rain" movement, which had pockets of influence throughout the United States. Azusa Street remains a potent symbol for the activity of the Holy Spirit to more than fifty million Pentecostals worldwide.

M. A. NOLL

See also PENTECOSTALISM.

Bibliography. R. M. Anderson, Vision of the Disinherited: The Making of American Pentecostalism; F. Bartleman, What Really Happened at "Azusa Street"?; W. J. Hollenweger, Pentecostals; L. G. McClung, ed., Azusa Street and Beyond; V. Synan, Holiness-Pentecostal Movement in the United States; W. E. Warner, ed., Touched by the Fire: Eyewitness Accounts of the Early Twentieth Century Pentecostal Revival.

Bb

Baal-zebul. King Ahaziah, in an act of apostasy, sent to inquire of “Baal-zebul, the god of Ekron,” one of the Philistine cities (2 Kings 1:2–16). The two parts of “Baal-zebul” mean “lord of the fly.” Baal (“lord”) was the Canaanite god of fertility and fire, one of the chief deities of the area. Zebûb means fly or poisonous insect (the same word is used of one of the plagues of Egypt, Exod. 8:20–32). The Philistines may have actually worshiped the fly, or the Jews may have changed zebul (“dwelling,” esp. in the temple or in heaven; hence “the lord of heaven,” or “the Supreme Baal”) to zebûb, the term for the hated insect.

In Mark 3:22 (= Matt. 12:24; cf. 9:34; Luke 11:15) the Pharisees denigrate Jesus and attempt to explain his power over demons as itself of demonic origin by saying, “He has Beelzebul, the prince of the demons.” Here Beelzebul (and its archaic form Be-Elzebul) clearly means Satan. The precise meaning of Beelzebul is uncertain, yet it certainly is related to the name of the pagan deity associated with the perennial enemy of Israel. Its use for Satan is best explained by the principle, “The god of one religion is the demon of another.”

Jesus countered by saying that he cast out demons not by Beelzebul but by God’s power through which the “strong man” (Satan) was bound. This proved the presence of the kingdom of God.

J. J. SCOTT JR.

See also SATAN.

Bibliography. T. K. Cheyne, EB 1:514–15; F. C. Fen-sham, “A Possible Explanation of the Name Baal-zebul of Ekron,” ZAW 79:361–64; W. Foerster, TDNT 1:605–6; L. Gaston, “Beelzebul,” TZ 18:247–55.

Babylon. In biblical history Babylon’s chief significance is as a mighty empire that God used in the early 6th century B.C. as his agent for punishing his people for their stubborn and grievous covenantal disobedience and disloyalty, taking the residents of Judah and Jerusalem into exile. Babylon also symbolizes those who oppose God and his purposes in the world and thus the special object of his wrath.

This infamous role of Babylon within biblical imagery is not obvious from the first text which mentions Babylon, Genesis 10:8–12. Although the name of its founder, Nimrod, whose historical identity remains uncertain, could be translated as “we will rebel” (possibly foreshadowing 11:1–9), his designation as a “champion hunter before the LORD” is intriguing. Babylon, mentioned first as one of his prominent centers in Shinar, is described more fully in 11:1–9. In the Babel narrative, the efforts of humans to preserve unity and make a name for themselves by building a tower rising into the heavens evoke divine intervention. God thwarts Babylon’s building project by mixing up the language: what was intended to be the very “gate of god” (Akkadian bab-ilu) is given to popular etymology as the place of “confusion” (from Hebrew balal). A proposed monument to human effort becomes instead a reminder of divine judgment upon human pride and folly (Wenham).

In the OT historical books the Neo-Babylonian empire is described primarily as the rival and then successor of the Assyrians, ultimately to be overcome by the Persians. The suffering inflicted on Jerusalem by Babylon is expressed vividly in Psalm 137, provoking the shocking imprecation: “Happy is . . . he who seizes your infants and dashes them against the rocks” (vv. 8–9). The prophets repeatedly announce Jerusalem’s inevitable conquest by Babylon (Jer. 20:4–6; Mic. 4:10), going so far as to designate Babylon as God’s punitive “sword” (Ezek. 21, especially v. 19; 30:24–25) and its ruler Nebuchadnezzar as God’s “servant” (Jer. 25:9; 27:6; 43:10) and urging God’s people to submit to them (27:8–11). However, they also condemn Babylon’s arrogance (Isa. 13:19; Jer. 50:31; 51:41) and announce its impending humiliation and destruction (Isa. 47:1–3; 48:14; Jer. 50:2).

The (cultural and economic) dominance of Babylon in Isaiah’s day is suggested by the placement of the “Babylon oracle” (13:1–14:23) at the beginning of Isaiah’s prophecies concerning foreign nations (chs. 13–23). Already a major player on the world scene in Isaiah’s day, sometimes independent of and sometimes dominated by Assyria (cf. Erlandsson), Babylon, “the jewel of kingdoms,” will be overthrown like Sodom and Gomorrah (Isa. 13:19; cf. Jer. 50:39–40), its king’s fall being described in hyperbolic poetic terms (Isa. 14:12–20; cf. 21:9). Given Babylon’s history, it serves as “a fitting symbol of that arrogant pomp and power of the world” and thus Isaiah’s depiction of Babylon’s doom anticipates “the eventual fall of whole world system which stands in opposition to God” (Webb, cf. 13:6–9). The book of Daniel also emphasizes Babylon’s prominence, splendor, and power: Babylon is the head of gold in Nebuchadnezzar’s dream (2:36–38) and the lion in Belshazzar’s dream (7:4).

Jeremiah 51:52–53 appears to allude to the tower of Babel incident, implying that, even in Jeremiah’s day, Babylon still is assaulting the heavens. Babylon thus is denounced not only as a rebellious agent of divine judgment which, in turn, after 70 years will itself feel God’s wrath (25:12–14; 50:24, 29; 51:24) but also as a source of great evil (50:14–15; 51:6–8). In the apocalyptic vision of Zechariah 5:11, a house for wickedness is thus aptly constructed in Babylon.

Building on texts such as these, in the book of Revelation Babylon takes on a fully symbolic significance, becoming the very embodiment of evil and opposition to God. The fall of Babylon is announced in Revelation 14:8 and 18:2–3, alluding to Isaiah 21:9 and Jeremiah 51:7–8; it, too, will drink the Lord’s “cup of wrath” (Rev. 16:19). Revelation 17:5 declares Babylon the Great (cf. Dan. 4:30) to be “the mother of prostitutes and of the abominations of the earth” (cf. Zech. 5:7–8). Babylon’s doom is portrayed in great detail in Revelation 18, a chapter teeming with allusions to the OT prophetic books. Babylon, whose description incorporates features of ancient Babylon, NT Rome, and pagan myths and religious practices, has been identified in various ways in the course of church history: the evil world in general, Jerusalem, Babylon, Rome, the papacy, apostate Christianity. However, within the context of Revelation, it probably is best to see Babylon as the “type” of worldly and idolatrous powers under Satanic control and in rebellion against God and the “antitype” of the heavenly Jerusalem (Rev. 21:1–22:5; cf. Seebass and Watson).

The enigmatic mention of Babylon in 1 Peter 5:13 lacks such sinister associations and should be understood as a metaphor for Rome, a foreign capital, and for the alienation which those who live as foreigners and strangers in the world experience (Michaels, cf. 1 Pet. 1:1; 2:11). Despite the predominantly negative role which Babylon played in Israel’s history (and within biblical imagery), several OT texts (Jer. 42:12; Dan. 4:27) suggests that it is capable of being merciful; according to Brueggemann, “the nations, according to this example of Babylon, are redeemable, transformable, and capable of salvage for the humane purposes of God.” Thus Psalm 87:4 portrays Babylon’s eschatological future as bright. According to the psalmist, Israel’s former oppressor Babylon, along with Rahab (i.e. Egypt), Philistia, Tyre, and Cush, will one day acknowledge the LORD and become “spiritual” citizens of Zion!

R. L. SCHULTZ

Bibliography. W. Brueggemann, “At the Mercy of Babylon: A Subversive Rereading of the Empire” JBL 110: 3–22; S. Erlandsson, Burden of Babylon; H. Seebass, NIDNTT 1:140–42; M. C. Tenney, Interpreting Revelation; D. F. Watson, ABD 1:565–66; B. G. Webb, Message of Isaiah.

Backsliding. A temporary lapse into unbelief and sin following a spiritual conversion. The four relevant Hebrew words in the OT are variously translated “turn away” (Jer. 8:5), “backslidings” (Jer. 5:6), “turn from” (Hos. 11:7), and “waywardness” (Hos. 14:4).

Backsliding in the OT primarily concerns Israel’s forsaking of its covenant relation with Yahweh (see Jer. 2:19; 8:5; 14:7). The nation’s turning from the Lord in disobedience is analogous to the breaking of a sacred marriage vow (Jer. 3:6–22). Specific examples of backsliding in the OT include Saul (1 Sam. 15:11–28), Solomon (1 Kings 11:4–40), Rehoboam (2 Chron. 12:1–2), and Asa (2 Chron. 16:7–9). Although the word backsliding is not found in the NT, there are numerous examples of believers who draw away from fellowship with the Lord—e.g., the disciples (Matt. 26:56), Peter (Matt. 26:69–75), Demas (2 Tim. 4:10), Corinthian Christians (2 Cor. 12:20–21), and churches in Asia (Rev. 2:4, 14–15, 20).

The reason that some who are genuinely converted fall back into a life of sin is that the believer yet possesses the old nature that is “being corrupted by its deceitful desires” (Eph. 4:22; cf. Rom. 7:13–24; 1 Cor. 3:1–3). Specific causes of spiritual backsliding include God-forgetfulness (Ezek. 23:35), unbelief (Heb. 3:12), bitterness (Heb. 12:15), preoccupation with the present world (2 Tim. 4:10), love of money (1 Tim. 6:10), and seductive philosophies (Col. 2:8). Backsliding displeases the Lord (Heb. 10:38), grieves the Holy Spirit (Eph. 4:30), and incurs divine punishment (Lev. 26:18–25). Although backsliding brings untold hurt, most Christians believe that the backslidden believer is not eternally lost. The believer’s union with Christ sealed by the Holy Spirit (Eph. 1:13–14), God’s work of preservation (2 Tim. 1:12), Christ’s effectual intercession (Heb. 7:25), and the fact that the life Christ gives is eternal (John 3:16; 10:28) guarantee the final salvation of every blood-bought child of God.

Backsliding

According to Scripture, backsliding can be prevented by abiding in Christ (John 15:4–7), being spiritually alert (Eph. 6:18), praying constantly (1 Thess. 5:17), and maintaining a good conscience (1 Tim. 1:19). The promises of God to the backslider are exceedingly gracious: “Return to me, and I will return to you,” says the LORD Almighty” (Mal. 3:7); “I will heal their waywardness and love them freely” (Hos. 14:4).

B. DEMAREST

See also ASSURANCE; PERSEVERANCE.

Bibliography. M. H. Smith, Encyclopedia of Christianity 1:511.

Baillie, John (1886–1960). Scottish theologian. Born in a Free Church manse, Baillie studied in Scotland and Germany, and held theological chairs at Auburn Theological Seminary (1920) and Union Theological Seminary (1930) in New York and at Emmanuel College in Toronto (1927) before becoming divinity professor (1934) and principal (1950) at New College, Edinburgh. One of the Church of Scotland’s greatest scholars of this century, Baillie was said in theological outlook to have combined the old liberalism and Barthianism with a strong mystical tendency. He warmly supported the ecumenical movement, became a president of the World Council of Churches, and displayed his gift of statesmanship at the early assemblies, Amsterdam (1948) and Evanston (1954). He unsuccessfully commended a 1957 scheme of union between the national churches of Scotland and England. Among his many books are Our Knowledge of God (1939) and Belief in Progress (1950), but it is for two less technical little works that he is best remembered: Diary of Private Prayer (1936) and Invitation to Pilgrimage (1942). Of the former it was said that in it “he set up a chain of prayer across the world.”

J. D. DOUGLAS

Bibliography. D. S. Klinefelter, “The Theology of John Baillie: A Biographical Introduction” SJT 22:419–36; P. B. O’Leary, Revelation and Faith in Our Knowledge of God According to the Theology of John Baillie; T. F. Torrance, Religion in Life; D. F. Wright, NDT 67–68.

Balfour Declaration (1917). An official statement by British Foreign Secretary Arthur James Balfour on November 2, 1917, announcing the approval by the British government of a Jewish homeland in Palestine. The document was drafted in concert with Jewish leadership and issued to Lord Rothschild, who represented the Zionists.

The declaration reads: “His Majesty’s Government view with favour the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people, and will use their best endeavors to facilitate the achievement of this object, it being clearly understood that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine, or the rights and political status enjoyed by Jews in any other country.”

The Balfour Declaration was the first significant political victory achieved by the Zionist movement. Until this affirmative action by the British cabinet, since the Jewish dispersion no world power had ever granted official recognition to the claim of world Jewry to Eretz Yisrael. It has, accordingly, been compared to the edict of King Cyrus of Persia (Ezra 1:2–4).

Issued during World War I, the declaration was generally regarded as an effort to enlist Jewish support for the Allies. Though the Arab leadership at the time gave consent to the declaration, in the Arab-Israeli struggle in later years, Arabs have often referred to the declaration as “the original sin.”

M. R. WILSON

See also ZIONISM.

Bibliography. H. H. Ben-Sasson, ed., History of the Jewish People; L. J. Stein, EJ 4:130–36; D. Fromkin, Peace to End All Peace; W. Laqueur, ed., Israel-Arab Reader; P. Mansfield, History of the Middle East; C. Pfeiffer, Arab-Israeli Struggle; A. Rubenstein, ed., Return to Zion.

Balthasar, Hans Urs von (1905–1988). Swiss Catholic theologian, one-time Jesuit, his career as an author covered more than sixty years. He was an influential proponent of the Catholic movement which seeks a rediscovery of the church’s patristic theological sources. Combined with his interest in philosophy, literature, and art (as a basis for conversation with modern matters), Balthasar’s writings portray theology as “the critical enthusiasm of the faith.”

In his Glory of the Lord, Balthasar presented theology as the dramatic display of beauty, an inner form of beauty from the subject matter of God’s glory radiating its beauty of form in theology. His emphasis on the form of theology is christocentric; in Word Made Flesh Balthasar contended that Christian existence is a reflection of the divine-human union in Jesus Christ. In his work Theo-Drama Balthasar demonstrated how he wished to restore the dramatic dimension to theology; for example, he portrayed Christology by means of the Son’s dramatic mission rather than by the traditional categories of nature, being, or essence.

Balthasar’s theological style sought to cultivate a Catholic model of the continuity or analogy of being of God and humanity (and the relationship of grace and nature), significantly by means of a conversation with the discontinuity associated with certain Protestant theology, especially that of Barth (Theology of Karl Barth). And his use of Scripture appealed to its fourfold senses and demonstrated a sensitive and critical appreciation for Scripture as the church's book.

A controversial offer from Balthasar concerned the genuineness of the hope for a universal restoration of all humans in Dare We Hope "That All Men Be Saved." His insistence upon the intimacy of Word and sacrament (based in the unity of thought and form) was employed to address Catholic and Protestant differences. Balthasar's work represents a comprehensive and vigorous statement of contemporary Catholic theology, and his influence is evident in the theology of Pope John Paul II.

J. P. CALLAHAN

Bibliography. H. von Balthasar, Credo: Meditations on the Apostle's Creed; God Question and Modern Man; Moment of Christian Witness; Office of Peter and the Structure of the Church; Theological Anthropology; Theology of Henri de Lubac; Who Is a Christian?; M. Kehl and W. Löser, eds., von Balthasar Reader; E. Oakes, Pattern of Redemption: The Theology of Hans Urs von Balthasar; D. L. Schindler, ed., Hans Urs von Balthasar: His Life and Work; A. Scola, Hans Urs von Balthasar: A Theological Style.

Bampton Lectures. Named for John Bampton (1689–1751), graduate of Oxford and canon of Salisbury, these originated in an endowment that provided for eight divinity lectures to be delivered annually in the Church of St. Mary the Virgin, Oxford. Bampton, who left his entire estate for the purpose, stipulated that the subject should be the exposition and defense of the Christian faith, with particular reference to the divine authority of the Scriptures, the authority of patristic writings, and the articles of the Apostles' and Nicene creeds. The lectures, the first series of which was given in 1780, were normally to take place between the day before Palm Sunday and the day before Whitsunday. Because of falling income, they have been delivered only on alternate years since 1895. Chosen by Oxford college heads, the lecturer must be at least a master of arts of Oxford or Cambridge. No scholar may be invited a second time to undertake the project. Publication of the lectures is obligatory, and among the famous publications so sponsored have been those of T. B. Strong (1895), W. R. Inge (1899), N. P. Williams (1924), and R. H. Lightfoot (1934). In recent years some criticism has been expressed that the benefactor's concern for the upholding of orthodoxy has not always been shared by the appointed lecturer.

J. D. DOUGLAS

Banquet, Messianic. See MARRIAGE FEAST OF THE LAMB.

Baptism. Deriving from the Greek baptisma, "baptism" denotes the action of washing or plunging in water, which from the earliest days (Acts 2:41) has been used as the rite of Christian initiation. Its origins have been variously traced to the OT purifications, the lustrations of Jewish sects, and parallel pagan washings, but there can be no doubt that baptism as we know it begins with the baptism of John. Christ himself, by both precedent (Matt. 3:13) and precept (Matt. 28:19), gives us authority for its observance. On this basis it has been practiced by almost all Christians, though attempts have been made to replace it by a baptism of fire or the Spirit in terms of Matthew 3:11.

In essence the action is an extremely simple one though pregnant with meaning. It consists in a going in or under the baptismal water in the name of Christ (Acts 19:5) or more commonly the Trinity (Matt. 28:19). Immersion was fairly certainly the original practice and continued in general use up to the Middle Ages. The Reformers agreed that this best brought out the meaning of baptism as a death and resurrection, but even the early Anabaptists did not think it essential so long as the subject went under the water. The type of water and circumstances of administration are not important, though it seems necessary that there should be a preaching and confession of Christ as integral parts of the administration (cf. Acts 8:37). Other ceremonies may be used at discretion so long as they are not unscriptural and do not distract from the true action.

Discussion has been raised concerning the proper ministers and subjects of the action. In the first instance there may be agreement with Augustine that Christ himself is the true minister ("he will baptize you," Matt. 3:11). But Christ does not give the external baptism directly; he commits this to his disciples (John 4:2). This is taken to mean that baptism should be administered by those to whom there is entrusted, by inward and outward calling, the ministry of Word and sacrament, though laymen have been allowed to baptize in the Roman Church, and some early Baptists conceived the strange notion of baptizing themselves. Normally baptism belongs to the public ministry of the church.

As concerns the subjects, the main difference is between those who practice the baptism of the children of confessing Christians and those who insist on a personal confession as a prerequisite. This point is considered in the two separate articles devoted to the two positions and need not detain us in this exposition of positive baptismal teaching. It may be noted, however, that adult baptisms continue in all churches, that confession is everywhere considered important, and that Baptists often feel impelled to an act of dedicating their children. Among adults it has been a common practice to refuse baptism to those unwilling to leave doubtful callings, though the attempt of one sect to impose a minimum age of thirty years did not meet with common approval. In the case of children, there has been misgiving concerning the infants of parents whose profession of Christian faith is very obviously nominal or insincere. The special case of the mentally impaired demands sympathetic treatment, but there is no warrant for prenatal or forced baptisms, and even less for the baptism of inanimate objects that was practiced in the Middle Ages.

Baptism

A clue to the meaning of baptism is given by three OT types: the flood (1 Pet. 3:19–21), the Red Sea (1 Cor. 10:1–2), and circumcision (Col. 2:11–12). These all refer in different ways to the divine covenant, to its provisional fulfillment in a divine act of judgment and grace, and to the coming and definitive fulfillment in the baptism of the cross. The conjunction of water with death and redemption is particularly apt in the case of the first two; the covenantal aspect is more particularly emphasized in the third.

When we come to the action itself, there are many different but interrelated associations. The most obvious is that of washing (Titus 3:5), the cleansing water being linked with the blood of Christ on the one side and the purifying action of the Spirit on the other (see 1 John 5:6, 8), so that we are brought at once to the divine work of reconciliation. A second is that of initiation, adoption, or, more especially, regeneration (John 3:5), the emphasis again being placed on the operation of the Spirit in virtue of the work of Christ.

These various themes find common focus in the primary thought of baptism (in the destructive, yet also life-giving, power of water) as a drowning and an emergence to new life, i.e., a death and resurrection (Rom. 6:3–4). But here again the true witness of the action is to the work of God in the substitutionary death and resurrection of Christ. This identification with sinners in judgment and renewal is what Jesus accepts when he comes to the baptism of John (Matt. 3:13–17) and fulfills when he takes his place between two thieves on the cross (Luke 23:33). Here we have the real baptism of the NT (Luke 12:50), which makes possible the baptism of our identification with Christ and underlies and is attested by the outward sign. Like preaching and the Lord's Supper, "baptism" is an evangelical word telling us that Christ has died and risen again in our place so that we are dead and alive again in him, with him, and through him (Rom. 6:4, 11).

Like all preaching, however, baptism carries with it the call to that which we should do in response or correspondence to what Christ has done for us. We, too, must make our movement of death and resurrection, not to add to what Christ has done, nor to complete it, nor to compete with it, but in grateful acceptance and application. We do this in three related ways constantly kept before us by our baptism: the initial response of repentance and faith (Gal. 2:20), the lifelong process of mortification and renewal

(Eph. 4:22–23), and the final dissolution and resurrection of the body (1 Cor. 15). This rich signification of baptism, which is irrespective of the time or manner of baptism, is the primary theme that ought to occupy us in baptismal discussion and preaching. But it must be emphasized continually that this personal acceptance or entry is not independent of the once for all and substitutionary work of Christ, which is the true baptism.

It is forgetfulness of this point that leads to misunderstanding of the so-called grace of baptism. One misunderstanding amounts to a virtual denial. Baptism has no grace apart from its psychological effects. It is primarily a sign of something that we do, and its value may be assessed only in explicable religious terms. The fact that spiritual gifts and even faith itself are true gifts of the Holy Spirit, with an element of the mysterious and incalculable, is thus denied.

A second misunderstanding is by distortion or exaggeration. Baptism means the almost automatic infusion of a mysterious substance that accomplishes a miraculous but not very obvious transformation. It is thus to be regarded with awe and fulfilled as an action of absolute necessity to salvation except in very special cases. The true mystery of the Holy Spirit yields before ecclesiastical magic and theological sophistry.

But when baptismal grace is brought into proper relationship to the work of God, we are helped on the way to a fruitful understanding. First, and above all, we remember that behind the external action there lies the true baptism, which is that of the shed blood of Christ. Baptismal grace is the grace of this true reality of baptism, i.e., of the substitutionary work of Christ, or of Christ himself. Only in this sense can we legitimately speak of grace, but in this sense we can and must.

Second, we remember that behind the external action there lies the inward operation of the Spirit moving the recipient to faith in Christ's work and accomplishing regeneration to the life of faith. Baptismal grace is the grace of this internal work of the Spirit, which cannot be presumed (for the Spirit is sovereign) but which we dare to believe where there is a true calling on the name of the Lord.

Third, the action itself is divinely ordained as a means of grace, i.e., a means to present Christ and therefore to fulfill the attesting work of the Spirit. It does not do this by the mere performance of the prescribed rite; it does it in and through its meaning. Nor does it do it alone; its function is primarily to seal and confirm, and therefore it does it in conjunction with the spoken and written word. It need not do it at the time of administration, for under the gracious sovereignty of the Spirit, its fruition may come at a much later date. It does not do it automatically, for whereas Christ is always present and his grace remains, there are those who respond to neither word nor sacrament and therefore miss the true and inward meaning and power.

When we think in these terms, we can see that there is and ought to be a real, though not a magical, baptismal grace that is not affected greatly by the detailed time or mode of administration. The essentials are that we use it (1) to present Christ, (2) in prayer to the Holy Spirit, (3) in trustful dependence upon his sovereign work, and (4) in conjunction with the spoken word. Restored to this evangelical use and freed especially from distorting and unhelpful controversy, baptism might quickly manifest again its power as a summons to live increasingly, or even to begin to live, the life that is ours in Christ crucified and risen for us.

G. W. BROMILEY

See also BAPTISM, BELIEVERS'; BAPTISM, INFANT; BAPTISM, MODES OF; BAPTISMAL REGENERATION; BAPTISM FOR THE DEAD.

Bibliography. G. R. Beasley-Murray, Baptism in the New Testament; G. W. Bromiley, Baptism and the Anglican Reformers; R. T. G. Burnish, Meaning of Baptism; J. Calvin, Institutes; W. F. Flemington, New Testament Doctrine of Baptism; Lima Report, Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry; A. Oepke, TDNT 1:529–46; Reports on Baptism in the Church of Scotland; G. Wainwright, Christian Initiation.

Baptism, Believers'. Where the gospel is first preached or Christian profession has lapsed, baptism is always administered on confession of penitence and faith. In this sense believers' baptism, i.e., the baptism of those who make a profession of faith, has been an accepted and persistent phenomenon in the church. Yet there are powerful groups among Christians who think that we should go further than this. Believers' baptism as they see it is not merely legitimate; it is the only true baptism according to the NT, especially, though not necessarily, in the form of immersion.

This is seen first from the precept that underlies its institution. When Jesus commanded the apostles to baptize, he told them first to make disciples and said nothing whatever about infants (Matt. 28:19). In other words, preaching must always precede baptism, for it is by the Word and not the sacrament that disciples are first made. Baptism can be given only when the recipient has responded to the Word in penitence and faith, and it is to be followed at once by a course of more detailed instruction.

That the apostles understood it in this way is evident from the precedents that have come down to us in Acts. On the day of Pentecost, for example, Peter told the conscience-stricken people to repent and be baptized; he did not mention any special conditions for infants incapable of repentance (Acts 2:38). Again, when the Ethiopian eunuch desired baptism, he was told that there could be no hindrance so long as he believed, and it was on confession of faith that Philip baptized him (Acts 8:36–39). Even when whole households were baptized, we are normally told that they first heard the gospel preached and either believed or received an endowment of the Spirit (cf. Acts 10:45; 16:32–33). In any case, no mention is made of any other type of baptism.

The meaning of baptism as developed by Paul in Romans 6 supports this contention. It is in repentance and faith that we are identified with Jesus Christ in his death, burial, and resurrection. To infants who cannot hear the Word and make the appropriate response, it thus seems to be meaningless and even misleading to speak of baptism into the death and resurrection of Christ. Confessing believers alone know what this means and can work it out in their lives. In baptism, confessing their penitence and faith, they have really turned their back on the old life and have begun to live the new life in Christ. They alone can look back to a meaningful conversion or regeneration and thus receive the confirmation and accept the challenge that comes with baptism. To introduce any other form of baptism is to open the way to perversion or misconception.

To be sure, there is no direct prohibition of infant baptism in the NT. But in the absence of direction either way it is surely better to carry out the sacrament or ordinance as obviously commanded and practiced than to rely on exegetical or theological inference for a different administration. This is particularly the case in view of the weakness or irrelevance of many of the considerations advanced.

Christ's blessing of the children, for example, shows us that the gospel is for little ones and that we have a duty to bring them to Christ, but it says nothing whatever about administering baptism contrary to the acknowledged rule (Mark 10:13–16). Again, the fact that certain characters may be filled with the Spirit from childhood (Luke 1:15) suggests that God may work in infants, but it gives us no warrant to suppose that he normally does so, or that he does so in any given case, or that baptism may be given before this work finds expression in individual repentance and faith. Again, the children of Christians enjoy privileges and perhaps even a status that cannot be ascribed to others. They are reckoned in some sense "holy" by God (1 Cor. 7:14). But here too there is no express connection with baptism or the baptismal identification with Jesus Christ in death and resurrection.

Reference to the household baptisms of Acts is of no greater help. The probability may well be that some of these households included infants, yet this is by no means certain. Even if they did, it is unlikely that the infants were present when the Word was preached, and there is no indication that any infants were actually baptized. At very best this could only be a hazardous inference, and the general drift of the narratives seems to be in a very different direction.

Nor does it serve to introduce the OT sign of circumcision. There is certainly a kinship between the signs. But there are also great differences. The fact that the one was given to infant boys on a fixed day is no argument for giving the other to all children some time in infancy. They belong, if not to different covenants, at least to different dispensations of the one covenant: the one to a preparatory stage, when a national people was singled out and its sons belonged naturally to the people of God, and the other to the fulfillment, when the Israel of God is spiritual and children are added by spiritual rather than natural regeneration. In any case, God himself gave a clear command to circumcise the male descendants of Abraham; he has given no similar command to baptize the male and female descendants of Christians.

Theologically, the insistence upon believers' baptism in all cases seems better calculated to serve the true significance and benefit of baptism and to avoid the errors that so easily threaten it. Only when there is personal confession before baptism can it be seen that personal repentance and faith are necessary to salvation through Christ, and that these do not come magically but through hearing the Word of God. With believers' baptism the ordinance achieves its significance as the mark of a step from darkness and death to light and life. Recipients are thus confirmed in the decision they have taken, brought into the living company of the regenerate, which is the true church, and encouraged to walk in the new life they have begun.

This means that in believers' baptism faith is given its proper weight and sense. The need for faith is recognized, of course, in infant baptism. It is contended that infants may believe by a special work of the Spirit, or that their present or future faith is confessed by the parents or sponsors, or that the parents or sponsors exercise vicarious faith, or even that faith is given in, with, or under the administration. Some of these notions are manifestly unscriptural. In others there is a measure of truth. But none of them meets the requirement of a personal confession of personal faith as invariably fulfilled in believers' baptism.

Again, believers' baptism also carries with it a genuine, as opposed to a spurious, baptismal grace. The expression of repentance and faith in baptism gives conscious assurance of forgiveness and regeneration and carries with it an unmistakable summons to mortification and renewal. Properly understood, this may also be the case with infant baptism, as in the Reformed churches. But a good deal of embarrassed explanation is necessary to make this clear, and there is always the risk of a false understanding, as in the medieval and Romanist view of baptismal regeneration. Baptism on profession of faith is the only effective safeguard against the dangerous notion that baptism itself can automatically transfer the graces it represents.

To the exegetical and theological considerations there may also be added some less important but noteworthy historical arguments. First, there is no decisive evidence for a common Jewish practice of infant baptism in apostolic times. Second, the patristic statement linking infant baptism with the apostles are fragmentary and unconvincing in the earlier stages. Third, examples of believers' baptism are common in the first centuries, and a continuing, if suppressed, witness has always been borne to this requirement. Fourth, the development of infant baptism seems to be linked with the incursion of pagan notions and practices. Finally, there is evidence of greater evangelistic incisiveness and evangelical purity of doctrine where this form of baptism is recognized to be the baptism of the NT.

G. W. BROMILEY

See also BAPTISM; BAPTISM, INFANT; BAPTISM, MODES OF; BAPTISMAL REGENERATION.

Bibliography. K. Aland, Did the Early Church Baptize Infants?; K. Barth, Church Dogmatics; Teaching of the Church Regarding Baptism; A. Booth, Paedobaptism Examined; A. Carson, Baptism in Its Modes and Subjects; J. Gill, Body of Divinity; J. Warns, Baptism.

Baptism, Infant. In a missionary situation the first subjects of baptism are always converts. But throughout Christian history, attested as early as Irenaeus and Origen with a reference back to the apostles, baptism has also been given to the children of professing believers. This has not been solely on grounds of tradition, or in consequence of a perversion, but for what have been regarded as scriptural reasons.

To be sure, there is no direct command to baptize infants. But there is also no prohibition. Again, if we have no clear-cut example of an infant baptism in the NT, there may well have been such in the household baptisms of Acts, and there is also no instance of the child of Christians being baptized on profession of faith. In other words, no decisive guidance is given by direct precept or precedent.

Yet there are two lines of biblical study that are thought to give convincing reasons for the practice. The first is a consideration of detailed passages or statements from the OT and NT. The second is a consideration of the whole underlying theology of baptism as it comes before us in the Bible.

To begin with the detailed passages, we naturally turn first to the types of baptism found in the OT. All these favor the view that God deals with families rather than individuals. When Noah is saved from the flood, his whole family is received with him into the ark (cf. 1 Pet. 3:20–21). When Abraham is given the covenant sign of circumcision, he is commanded to administer it to all male members of his house (Gen. 17; cf. Col. 2:11–12 for the connection between baptism and circumcision). At the Red Sea it is all Israel (men, women, and children) that passes through the waters in the great act of redemption that foreshadows not only the sign of baptism but the work of God behind it (cf. 1 Cor. 10:1–2).

In the NT the ministry of our Lord is particularly rich in relevant statements. He himself becomes a child, and as such is conceived of the Holy Spirit. The Baptist, too, is filled with the Spirit from his mother's womb, so that he might have been a fit subject for baptism no less than circumcision very early in life. Later Christ receives and blesses the little ones (Matt. 19:13–14) and is angry when his disciples rebuff them (Mark 10:14). He says that the things of God are revealed to babes rather than the wise and learned (Luke 10:21). He takes up the statement of Psalm 8:2 about the praise of sucklings (Matt. 21:16). He warns against the danger of offending against little ones who believe in him (Matt. 18:6) and in the same context says that to be Christians we have not to become adults but become as children.

In the first preaching in Acts it is noticeable that Peter confirms the covenant procedure of the OT with the words: "The promise is for you and your children" (2:39). In the light of the OT background and the similar procedure in proselyte baptisms, there is little reason to doubt that the household baptisms would include any children who might belong to the families concerned.

In the Epistles children are particularly addressed in Ephesians, Colossians, and probably 1 John. We also have the important statement in 1 Corinthians 7:14 in which Paul speaks of the children of marriages that have become "mixed" through conversion as "holy." This cannot refer to their civil status, but can only mean that they belong to the covenant people and therefore will obviously have a right to the covenant sign.

It will be noted that in different ways all these statements bring before us the covenant membership of the children of professing believers. They thus introduce us directly to the biblical understanding of baptism that provides the second line of support for baptizing infants.

As the Bible sees it, baptism is not primarily a sign of repentance and faith on the part of the baptized. It is not a sign of anything that we do at all. It is a covenant sign (like circumcision, but without blood shedding) and therefore a sign of the work of God on our behalf, which precedes and makes possible our own responsive movement.

It is a sign of the gracious election of the Father who plans and establishes the covenant. It is therefore a sign of God's calling. Abraham no less than his descendants was first chosen and called by God (Gen. 12:1). Israel was separated to the Lord because he himself had said: "I will be your God and you will be my people" (Jer. 7:23). Of all disciples it must be said: "You did not choose me, but I chose you" (John 15:16). The elective will of God in Christ extends to those who are far off as well as nigh, and the sign of it may be extended not only to those who have resounded, but to their children growing up in the sphere of the divine choice and calling.

Baptism is also a sign of the substitutionary work of the Son in which the covenant is fulfilled. As a witness of death and resurrection, it attests the death and resurrection of the One for the many without whose vicarious action no work even of repentance and faith can be of any avail. It preaches Christ himself as the one who is already dead and risen, so that all are dead and risen in him (2 Cor. 5:14; Col. 3:1) even before the movements of repentance and faith they are summoned to make in identification with him. This substitutionary work is not merely for those who have already believed. It may and must be preached to all, and the sign and seal must be given both to those who accept it and to their children who will be brought up with the knowledge of what God has already done for them once for all and all-sufficiently in Christ.

Finally, baptism is a sign of the regenerative work of the Holy Spirit by which individuals are brought into the covenant in the responsive movement of repentance and faith. But the Holy Spirit is sovereign (John 3:8). He works how and when and in whom he pleases (Augsburg Confession, Art. V). He laughs at human impossibilities (Luke 1:37). He is often present before his ministry is perceived, and his operation is not necessarily coextensive with our apprehension of it. He does not disdain the minds of the undeveloped as fit subjects for the beginning, or if he so disposes, the completion, of his work. So long as there is prayer to the Spirit and a readiness to preach the evangelical Word when the opportunity comes, the infants of Christians may be regarded as within the sphere of this life-giving work, which it is the office of baptism to sign and seal.

Where infant baptism, or paedobaptism, as it is sometimes called, is practiced, it is right and necessary that those who grow to maturity should make their own confession of faith. But they do so with the clear witness that it is not this that saves them, but the work of God already done for them before they believed. The possibility arises, of course, that they will not make this confession or do so formally. But this cannot be avoided by a different mode of administration. It is a problem of preaching and teaching. And even if they do not believe or do so nominally, their prior baptism as a sign of the work of God is a constant witness to call or finally to condemn them.

Baptism, Infant

On the mission field adult baptism will naturally continue. In days of apostasy it can and will be common even in evangelized lands. Indeed, as a witness to the fact that our response is really demanded it is good for the church that there should always be a Baptist section within it. But once the gospel has gained an entry into a family or community, there is good scriptural and theological ground that infant baptism should be the normal practice.

G. W. BROMILEY

See also BAPTISM; BAPTISM, BELIEVERS'.

Bibliography. G. W. Bromiley, Baptism of Infants; J. Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion; O. Cullmann, Baptism in the New Testament; J. Jeremias, Infant Baptism in the First Four Centuries; P. C. Marcel, Biblical Doctrine of Infant Baptism; Reports on Baptism in the Church of Scotland; H. Thielicke, Evangelical Faith; W. Wall, History of Infant Baptism.

Baptism, Lay. The NT affords neither precept nor precedent for the administration of baptism except by an ordained minister. From an early period, however, laymen did give baptism where ministers were not available. The custom was defended by Tertullian and later theologians on the ground that what is received may be passed on, that the sacrament is more important than order, and that the rule of love permits it. Some early authorities insisted on certain qualifications (e.g., monogamy or confirmation), and the medieval church drew up an order of precedence. Luther approved of the practice, seeing in it an exercise of the priesthood of the laity. But the Reformed school rejected and suppressed it on the ground that it is not scriptural, destroys good order, and is linked with the false idea of an absolute necessity of baptism. Baptism by midwives was particularly disliked. The practice was fully debated in the Church of England and eventually discontinued after the Hampton Court Conference in 1604.

G. W. BROMILEY

Bibliography. J. Bingham, Works; G. W. Bromiley, Baptism and the Anglican Reformers.

Baptism, Modes of. There are, generally speaking, two opinions regarding the proper manner of administering baptism: that only immersion is lawful and that the mode is a matter of indifference. It would not be correct to identify the immersionist as the Baptist position, for some Baptists do not accept the necessity of immersion. The early Anabaptists as a rule baptized by pouring, and certain writers who strongly condemn infant baptism are indifferent as to mode (e.g., Karl Barth).

The immersionist position is founded on three arguments. (1) It is argued that the word baptizein means "to immerse," and therefore the command to baptize is itself a command to immerse. Baptizein in classical usage generally meant "to dip," and this use carried over into its use in Scripture (2 Kings 5:10, 14). Immersionists maintain that this meaning continues unaltered in NT usage and that this is confirmed by the use of the prepositions "in" and "into" with baptizein and by certain circumstantial references to baptism being administered in places where large supplies of water could be found (Luke 3:3; John 3:23). (2) Because baptism signifies union with Christ in his burial and resurrection (Rom. 6:4; Col. 2:12), immersionists contend that only sinking under and coming up out of the water adequately express the symbolism of the sacrament. (3) Immersionists lay claim to the testimony of the early church, for which immersion was the primary mode.

The second position, in most cases, is less a case for any particular mode than a rebuttal of the immersionist arguments. It denies that baptism is rightly administered only by immersion; instead, it contends that in the NT baptism, in its external form, is simply a washing, a cleansing, which can as well be effected by pouring (effusion) or sprinkling (aspersion) as by immersion.

While there is widespread agreement that baptizein in classical Greek means "to immerse," because baptizein has become a technical theological term in the NT, it is maintained that the classical and secular usage cannot by itself be normative. The term diathēke, for example, universally means "testament" in the Greek of the NT period, but it cannot be given that meaning in its NT usage. That in its biblical and theological use baptizein has come to mean simply "to wash" or "to purify with water" is indicated by certain occurrences of the term in the LXX and NT where baptizein cannot mean immerse (Sir. 34:25; Luke 11:38; Acts 1:5; 2:3–4, 17; 1 Cor. 10:1–2; Heb. 9:10–23). The last text in particular is a reminder that the purificatory water rites of the OT, the biblical antecedents of baptism, were never immersions. It is further maintained that it is at least implausible that certain baptisms recorded in the NT were immersions (Acts 2:41; 10:47–48; 16:33). Nor, it is contended, can appeal be made to the use of the prepositions "in" and "into," which are ambiguous and, if pressed, in Acts 8:38 would require the immersion of both subject and minister.

While baptism certainly signifies union with Christ in his death and resurrection, it is denied that this has relevance for the mode. In Romans 6:6 union with Christ in his crucifixion and in Galatians 3:27 being clothed with Christ are included in the signification of baptism, but no mode illustrates these aspects of the symbolism of baptism. It is further contended that water is a singularly unlikely symbol for the earth into which one is buried—all the more as Christ was entombed, not buried, in the ground. Actually, sprinkling is as well established in Ezekiel 36:25 and Hebrews 9:10, 13–14; 10:22.

It is conceded that immersion was the primary mode in the early church, but it is pointed out that other modes were permitted (cf. Didache 7; Cyprian, Epistle to Magnus 12; the earliest artistic representations depict baptism by pouring [effusion]), and that some of the influences contributing to the popularity of immersion well may not have been healthy. In general, the nonimmersionist contends that rigor in matters of form is contrary to the spirit of NT worship, contrary to the universal indifference to the mode of celebrating the Lord's Supper, and subject to the scandal that, in principle, the immersionist depopulates the church of most of its membership and most of its finest sons and daughters.

R. S. RAYBURN

See also BAPTISM.

Bibliography. A. Carson, Baptism, Its Mode and Its Subjects; T. J. Contant, Meaning and Use of Baptizein; R. L. Dabney, Lectures in Systematic Theology; J. Gill, Body of Divinity; J. Murray, Christian Baptism; A. Oepke, TDNT 1:529–46; R. G. Rayburn, What about Baptism?; W. G. T. Shedd, Dogmatic Theology; A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology; B. B. Warfield, “How Shall We Baptize?” in Selected Shorter Writings of Benjamin B. Warfield; J. Warns, Baptism; R. Watson, Theological Institutes.

Baptismal Regeneration. Twice in the NT a connection is made between water, or washing in water, and regeneration. In John 3:3 we are told that a man must be born of water and of the Spirit to enter the kingdom of God. In Titus 3:5 we read that we are saved “through the washing of rebirth and renewal by the Holy Spirit.” In view of these passages, of the interrelationship of baptism with Christ's resurrection, and of the fact that baptism is the sacrament of initiation, it is inevitable that there should be some equation between baptism and regeneration. This equation is most strongly made in the phrase “baptismal regeneration.”

The phrase as such is not wholly objectionable so long as the following points are kept clearly in view. The new life of the Christian is in Christ born, crucified, and risen for us. Incorporation into Christ is the work of the Holy Spirit. The true baptism behind the sacramental rite is this saving action of Christ and the Holy Spirit. The rite itself, in conjunction with the Word, attests this work and is a means used by the Holy Spirit to its outworking in the believer. Baptism is not regeneration, however, nor is regeneration baptism, except in this deeper sense and context.

Unfortunately, medieval theology was tempted into a twofold isolation—that of the believer's regeneration from the substitutionary work of Christ, and that of the baptismal rite from baptism in its full and basic sense. In these circumstances the relationship between baptism and regeneration was necessarily misunderstood. “Regeneration” became the supernatural transformation of the believer and “baptism” a divinely appointed means of operation automatically efficacious so long as no bar (e.g., of insincerity) was opposed. The presuming of an absolute necessity of baptism, the emptying of regeneration of any true significance, and the whole problem of postbaptismal sin were evils that resulted from this perverted doctrine.

The Reformers clearly saw and rejected this perversion. But they did not make the mistake of breaking the relationship and treating baptism only as a symbolic rite with psychological effects. Rather, they tried to work back to the true and biblical understanding corrupted in the Romanist scheme. This certainly involves the danger of fresh misunderstanding, as emerges in the famous Gorham controversy in England. Hence, the actual phrase “baptismal regeneration” is much better avoided. But in the long run the best antidote to perversion is the true and positive doctrine.

G. W. BROMILEY

See also BAPTISM.

Bibliography. K. Barth, Church Dogmatics; G. W. Bromiley, Baptism and the Anglican Reformers; L. Morris, The Gospel According to John; J. B. Mozley, Baptismal Controversy; J. C. S. Nias, Gorham and the Bishop of Exeter; A. Oepke, TDNT 1:529–46; E. K. Simpson, Pastoral Epistles.

Baptism for the Dead. The problem of baptism for the dead arises out of the question asked by Paul in 1 Corinthians 15:29: “Now if there is no resurrection, what will those do who are baptized for the dead? If the dead are not raised at all, why are people baptized for them?” Various interpretations have been suggested for this verse. Some take it that the apostle refers to a practice of vicarious baptism as later reported among the Marcionites and Novatianists. On this view, he is not necessarily approving it, but using it for the sake of the argument. The Cataphryges seem to have derived from it a baptizing of corpses. Others construe it as a baptism of the dying or the administration of the sacrament “over dead men's graves.” Most commentators try to avoid any connection with an actual practice, and there is again a wide range of suggestion. Baptism is to fill up the ranks left vacant by the dead, or under the inspiration of their witness, or with a view to death and resurrection in Christ, or more specifically in token that we are dead but may seek our new and true life in the resurrected Christ. Whatever the exact signification, the wider meaning is undoubtedly that baptism is a witness to the resurrection. Baptism loses its meaning if death is not followed by resurrection. G. W. BROMILEY

Baptism for the Dead

Bibliography. H. A. W. Meyer, I Corinthians; A. Plummer, HDB 1:245; R. E. O. White, EDBT 49.

Baptism of Jesus. The baptism of Jesus at the hands of John the Baptist is recounted in some detail in Matthew (3:13–17), told more briefly in Mark (1:9–11), only mentioned in Luke (3:21–22), and unrecorded though probably presumed in John (1:29–34). In all four accounts the anointing of Jesus with the Spirit and the declaration of his sonship are directly linked to the baptism.

Mark and Luke tell us only that Jesus was baptized in the Jordan by John, but Matthew adds that John the Baptist was hesitant and felt unworthy. Jesus, however, urges compliance with the call of God to “fulfill all righteousness.” The fourth evangelist says only that John saw Jesus coming to him and then there follow certain christological declarations by John.

The fundamental feature of all the narratives is that on the occasion of his baptism Jesus is anointed with the Spirit (Matt. 3:16; Mark 1:10; Luke 3:22; John 1:32). It is this anointing with the Spirit that inaugurates the ministry of Jesus that is characterized in the Synoptic Gospels by the power of the Spirit of the new age (Matt. 12:18, 28; Luke 4:18; 11:20; cf. Acts 10:38).

The anointing by the Spirit is the initial act of fulfillment (Luke 4:18, citing Isa. 61:1–2) that characterizes the whole story of Jesus and the subsequent story of the early church. This fulfillment motif is seen at two points. First, in all three of the Synoptic Gospels the temptation experience in the desert immediately follows the anointing of the Spirit; indeed, Jesus is led by the Spirit (Mark: sent out by the Spirit; Luke: led by the Spirit) into the desert. In a paradigmatic narrative the Spirit of the new age is confronted by the Spirit who dominates the present. Jesus’ conquest in the desert becomes the pattern for the rest of the Gospels as they report the power of Jesus to heal the sick and cast out demons. The presence of the Spirit of the new age raises the specter of the “unpardonable sin” against the Spirit, namely, the sin of ascribing to the power of this age the healing work of the Holy Spirit (Matt. 12:31; Mark 3:28; Luke 12:10).

The link between Jesus’ anointing with the Spirit and the fulfillment motif is to be noted also in the fact that Jesus inaugurates his ministry immediately after his baptism and the temptation. “The time has come. The kingdom of God is near. Repent and believe the good news!” (Mark 1:15; cf. Matt. 4:17). Jesus declares the demise of the old and the initial thrust of the new. The promise of prophets is offered and people are invited to enter. From this point on, the burden of the word and work of Jesus is to invite, to initiate newness, to portray the freedom created by the Spirit, as well as to speak judgment upon the old system ruled by law, whose only fruit is oppression.

This significance of Jesus’ anointing by the Spirit at his baptism is further noted in the words by which Jesus confirmed John the Baptist. No one is greater than John, yet anyone in the kingdom is greater. He is the final figure who concludes the old and introduces the new. He is the forerunner (Matt. 11:11–14). The anointing of Jesus at his baptism is the specific midpoint in redemptive history; it is the beginning of fulfillment.

It should be noted that the coming of the Spirit upon Jesus is not the promised baptism in the Spirit, for Jesus himself is the one who will baptize. Further, the baptism in the Spirit is a baptism of judgment and grace. The experience of the Spirit at the baptism of Jesus is a bestowal that establishes the messianic character of his ministry. This is noted in the voice from heaven, “You are my Son, whom I love” (Mark 1:11; Luke 3:22; cf. Matt. 3:17). Jesus’ self-understanding of his sonship to the Father underlies his messianic office. The OT allusion may be either Isaiah 42:1 or Psalm 2:7 or perhaps both. The significance here of the sonship is service to the Father rather than any particular reference to Jesus’ divine nature. The expression is teleological rather than ontological.

Special significance is to be seen in the fact that Jesus submitted to the baptism of John, which was a baptism of repentance for the forgiveness of sins. John has called a sinful and self-righteous people to turn quickly before an impending judgment descends. “The ax is already at the root of the trees” (Matt. 3:10; Luke 3:9). Matthew’s narrative focuses on the issue, for in it the Baptist attempts to protest the inappropriateness of Jesus coming to be baptized. The baptism of Jesus marks his solidarity as the messianic servant with his people. He takes upon himself by this cultic act their condition and their predicament. He becomes their representative. Coming to them and speaking to them he takes his place with them. Incarnation is not only coming to earth but also assuming the burden of life in the flesh. He not only speaks to them but also speaks for them. The Father’s Son becomes the intercessor to the Father. The significance of the baptism of Jesus is set forth in stark terms by Paul: “God made him who had no sin to be sin for us, so that in him we might become the righteousness of God” (2 Cor. 5:21). The baptism is the formal act of “making himself nothing” (Phil. 2:7), of “becoming poor” (2 Cor. 8:9).

It is with reference to this act of solidarity that we see again the significance of the temptations in the desert, for there he experiences in an intense way the predicament of the human condition. He resists the fundamental temptation to use his power—a temptation thrown at him even in his last hour (Matt. 27:40, 42)—in order to bring redemption from below. In his baptism he prepares himself for death—the ultimate expression of nonpower—for the people with whom he identifies, and makes the identification complete.

R. W. LYON

See also JESUS CHRIST.

Bibliography. C. K. Barrett, Holy Spirit and the Gospel Tradition; J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus and the Spirit; W. F. Flemington, New Testament Doctrine of Baptism; G. W. H. Lampe, Seal of the Spirit.

Baptism of the Spirit. Among the greatest blessings conferred by the Christian gospel is the personal indwelling and endowment of the divine Spirit. First conceived as the invisible energy of God active in nature and in history, but occasionally coming upon artists, prophets, leaders, or kings with enabling power, the Spirit of God was promised as the personal and permanent equipment of Messiah for his work (Isa. 11:1–2; 61:1–3). Other prophets extended a similar promise to all God’s people (Joel 2:28–29; cf. Ezek. 36:26–27).

In the New Testament. In due time the prophet John, seeking to prepare the Jews for the Messiah, emphasized one aspect of this remarkable prophecy. He warned of a radical inward and personal purification, accompanying an outward national purgation by judgment. The one alternative he offered to such an immersion (baptism) in “spirit and fire” was to accept his baptism in water as a symbol of total repentance and reformation of life (Matt. 3:11–12; Luke 3:7–17).

In this way the promise of the Spirit first became associated with the language of baptism—a baptism with the Holy Spirit. But far more authoritative and compelling in establishing this connection of the coming of the Spirit with water baptism was the model experience of Jesus. In the moment of his baptism, all four Gospels insist, the Spirit descended like a dove and abode upon him (Matt. 3:16; Mark 1:10; Luke 3:22; John 1:32; cf. Acts 10:38). Thenceforth water baptism and the reception of the Spirit must ever be linked in Christian minds.

John’s contrast of baptism with water and baptism with Holy Spirit, as alternatives, was given a deeper significance, however, when his words were repeated by Jesus (Acts 1:5), echoed by Peter (Acts 11:16), recalled again by the evangelist John (1:26, 33) and Paul (Acts 19:4–6; cf. 1 Cor. 12:13). In these references the Christian’s reception of the Holy Spirit is no longer the alternative to a water baptism of repentance, but at least its fitting analogue, more probably its supplement and fulfillment. Since for Judaism, for

John, and for the apostolic church baptism by water was a rite of initiation into the people of God, the initial experience of the Spirit’s indwelling and endowment came to be called a “baptism in” or “with” the Holy Spirit.

In Greek, the preposition is here ambiguous: en may be local, meaning “within” water or Spirit; or, following Hebrew idiom, it may be instrumental, meaning “by means of” water or Spirit. But, as in the parallel phrases, “baptism in or with fire” or “suffering” (see Mark 10:38–39), the difference between “in” and “with” is more theoretical than practical.

This Judaic and Johannine background explains the strange, and possibly misleading, expression “baptism in or with the Holy Spirit.” For it carries with it the suggestion that God’s Spirit is an element, an energy or instrument, rather than a person. The outpouring of the Spirit (Joel 2:28–29; Acts 2:17, 33) similarly reflects the OT thought of the Spirit as God’s invisible power, manifest only in its results. When the fully Christian conception of the Spirit as a divine person is reached (John 14:17; 16:7; 2 Cor. 3:17; “the Spirit of Jesus,” Acts 16:7), then to speak of “pouring” or “baptism in” the Spirit would seem no longer completely appropriate.

This distinction between the Spirit as person and the Spirit as element or energy is of practical importance, lest a careless use of words lead us to suppose we can manipulate the Spirit’s power rather than surrendering to the Spirit’s will (see 1 Cor. 12:11). That danger noted, the phrase “baptism in the Spirit” is not more vague or nebulous than “baptism into Christ” (Gal. 3:27), “baptized into his death” and resurrection (Rom. 6:3, 5), “baptized into one body” (of Christ, 1 Cor. 12:13). In NT thought baptism signified an experience so deep, radical, transforming, and effectual that only such telescopic phrases could describe its immeasurable consequences.

In particular, the indwelling and endowment with the Holy Spirit, which became available through Christ to all who believe, came inevitably to be linked with, and described in the language of, that crucial public step by which individuals first became Christians and were accepted as members of the Spirit-filled, Spirit-led, Spirit-empowered church of Christ. Quite naturally the experience came to be described as being baptized in or with the Holy Spirit.

In Modern Experience. In modern discussion, however, a slightly different phrase, “the baptism of the Spirit,” has replaced the scriptural phrases, especially in Pentecostal and charismatic circles. In its most common use this new expression has tended to place less emphasis on the indwelling of the Spirit, with the illumination of mind (John 14:26; 16:8–15), the refinement of character (the fruit of the Spirit, Gal. 5:22–23; love, 1 Cor. 12:27–13:13), and the gifts of peace, power, and joy that the Spirit bestows. Instead, while not denying these, the phrase has become associated specifically with the initial and continuing endowment of individuals by the Spirit with miraculous powers, gifts, abilities, and emotional resources, manifest in spiritual healing, speaking in unknown tongues, prophesying, leadership, exuberant emotion, and other forms of equipment for Christian service.

Baptism of the Spirit

Alongside this difference of emphasis as to what qualities of life and service most clearly demonstrate the power of the Spirit, opinion is divided also on how and when the initial reception of the Spirit may be expected.

Some insist that the earliest experience of the Spirit coincides with conversion. They resist any suggestion that so vital an experience could depend in any degree upon a merely ritual event like water baptism. They underline the necessary ministry of the Spirit in bringing any soul to Christ. Without the Spirit no one can call Jesus Lord (1 Cor. 12:3), or be born into the kingdom (John 3:5), or become Christ's at all (Rom. 8:9). Thus, to receive the Spirit is an essential part of salvation itself.

Some insist that in the NT pattern of initiation reception of the Spirit accompanies baptism in water. These argue that apostolic baptism was certainly no mere ritual but a deliberate, and often perilous, public and irrevocable commitment to the lordship of Christ. It was accompanied by the confession of Christ before others, which was essential to saving faith (Rom. 10:9; cf. Matt. 10:32–33), on the part of each repentant believer. Defending the close association of the experience of the Spirit with such a baptism in water, they point to the plain implication of the metaphor itself—"baptism" of the Spirit. They insist that Christ's own baptismal experience sets the norm for every Christian baptism. And they recall, beside the oft-repeated words of John linking water baptism with the promised baptism of the Spirit, Peter's clear instruction and promise at Pentecost: "Repent, and be baptized . . . and you will receive the gift of the Holy Spirit" (Acts 2:38–39).

With perhaps a little more hesitation, defenders of the view that Spirit baptism ought to accompany water baptism draw attention to Paul's action at Ephesus, which sought to repair a baptism that had not conferred the Spirit by one that did (Acts 19:1–6). They also suggest that, on this view, expressions like "born of water and the Spirit" (John 3:5), "washed . . . sanctified . . . justified in the name of the Lord Jesus" (1 Cor. 6:11), and "the washing of rebirth and renewal by the Holy Spirit" (Titus 3:5) are more easily understood.

Others again insist that the baptism of the Spirit is an experience subsequent to conversion and entirely independent of water baptism, possibly replacing it. It is a second blessing, an "in-filling" of the Spirit, supplementing conversion as the young Christian advances to maturity. These would argue that the supposed NT pattern has certainly not been familiar in the historic church. They emphasize that Pentecost was for the first disciples later than, and consequent upon, introduction to Jesus. They recall that some who were already Christians were urged to "be filled with the Spirit" (Eph. 5:18). Above all, they point to the poverty of spiritual experience of many professing (and baptized) Christians as proof that something more than conversion and baptism are needed for a Spirit-filled life.

Differing exegesis and theological debate must not be allowed to obscure the primary truth: that the Spirit of the living Christ seeks to enrich, enable, empower, and use Christians in every generation. The spiritual significance of apostolic baptism and of that prevalent in the modern church is so different that for most Christians the "fullness of the Spirit" will be an experience long subsequent to baptism. But how we describe the experience is less important than that we open mind, heart, and will to the power and joy the Spirit offers to confer. The contemporary church and the modern world greatly need Christians baptized with the Spirit.

R. E. O. WHITE

See also CHARISMATIC MOVEMENT; HOLY SPIRIT; PENTECOSTALISM; SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

Bibliography. H. Berkhof, Doctrine of the Holy Spirit; F. C. Bruner, Theology of the Holy Spirit; J. D. G. Dunn, Baptism in the Holy Spirit; H. M. Ervin, Conversion-Initiation and the Baptism in the Holy Spirit; M. Griffiths, Grace-Gifts; W. H. Griffith Thomas, Holy Spirit of God; H. D. Hunter, Spirit-Baptism: A Pentecostal Alternative; H. I. Lederle, Treasures Old and New: Interpretations of Spirit-Baptism in the Charismatic Renewal Movement; J. I. Packer, Keep in Step with the Spirit; E. F. Scott, Spirit in the New Testament; T. A. Smail, Reflected Glory; D. R. Wheelock, Spirit Baptism in American Pentecostal Thought.

Baptist Tradition, The. It is a popular misunderstanding about Baptists to think that their chief concern is with the administration of baptism. The convictions of Baptists are based primarily on the spiritual nature of the church, and the practice of believers' baptism arises only as a corollary of this and in the light of the NT teaching. The theological position taken up by Baptists may be presented as follows.

Membership of the Church. According to Baptist belief, the church is composed of those who have been born again by the Holy Spirit and who have been brought to personal and saving faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. A living and direct acquaintance with Christ is, therefore, held to be basic to church membership. Negatively, this involves a rejection of the concept that equates a church with a nation. Membership in the church of Christ is not based on the accident or privilege of birth, either in a Christian country or in a Christian family. Baptists therefore repudiate the Anglican and Presbyterian view by deleting the phrase “together with their children” from the definition of the church. Positively, this view of church membership indicates that the church is entered voluntarily and that only believers may participate in its ordinances. All members are equal in status although they vary in gifts.

Nature of the Church. In distinction from churches of the institutional or territorial kind, the Baptist conviction is expressed in the concept of the “gathered church.” The members of the church are joined together by God into a fellowship of life and service under the lordship of Christ. Its members are pledged to live together under his laws and to enter into the fellowship created and maintained by the Holy Spirit. The church conceived of in this way is perceived the most clearly in its local manifestation. Thus, although the church invisible consists of all the redeemed in heaven and in earth, past, present, and future, it may be truly said that wherever believers are living together in the fellowship of the gospel and under the sovereignty of Christ, there is the church.

Government of the Church. Christ is the only head of the church, and the early Baptist pioneers earnestly contended for what they called “the crown rights of the Redeemer.” The local church is autonomous, and this principle of government is sometimes described as the “congregational order of the churches.” Baptists believe in the competence of the local fellowship to govern its own affairs, and because of the theological importance of the local church in contradistinction to connectional systems (episcopal, presbyterian) of church government, Baptists do not speak of the denomination as “the Baptist Church,” but as “the Baptist churches” in any given area. The congregational order of the churches—i.e., the government of the church through the mind of the local congregation—is not to be equated with the humanistic concept of democracy. Democracy is too low and too small a word. The Baptist belief is that the church is to be governed not by an order of priests, nor through higher or central courts, but through the voice of the Holy Spirit in the hearts of the members in each local assembly. Whereas in a strictly democratic order of church government there would be a government of the church by the church, the Baptist position makes recognition of Christ’s rule in the church through the church. From the equality of status of every church member and the recognition of the diversity of gifts, two things follow. First of all, it is acknowledged that each member has a right and duty in the government of the local church, and secondly, that the church gladly accepts the guidance of its chosen leaders.

Baptist churches are usually regarded as independent in their government, but they do not glory in independence for its own sake. The independence of a Baptist church relates to state control, and the Baptists of the seventeenth century in England were in the foremost rank of those who fought for this freedom. Baptists have always recognized the great value of association between churches, and associations of Baptist churches have been characteristic of Baptist life down the centuries. All such association is voluntary, however, and the mistake must not be made of assuming that the Baptist Union or the Baptist World Alliance is coextensive with the Baptist community.

Ordinances of the Church. These are normally spoken of as two, namely, believers’ baptism and the Lord’s Supper, though it would be more proper to speak of three and to include the ordinance of preaching. Baptists have normally preferred to use the word “ordinance” rather than “sacrament” because of certain sacerdotal ideas that the word sacrament has gathered to itself. The word ordinance points to the ordaining authority of Christ that lies behind the practice. Baptists regard the Lord’s Supper somewhat after the Zwinglian manner. The bread and the wine are the divinely given tokens of the Lord’s saving grace, “but the value of the service lies far more in the symbolism of the whole than in the actual elements” (Dakin, 123). Henry Cook writes: “Being symbolic of facts that constitute the heart of the Gospel, they [the ordinances] arouse in the believing soul such feelings of awe and love and prayer that God is able by His Spirit to communicate Himself in a vitalizing and enriching experience of His grace and power.” Baptists acknowledge that the ordinances are thus a means of grace, but not otherwise than is also the preaching of the gospel. The position has been epitomized by saying that the ordinances are a special means of grace but not a means of special grace. It is also part of the Baptist position on this subject that believers’ baptism and the Lord’s Supper are church ordinances, that is to say, they are congregational rather than individual acts. Priestly mediation is abhorrent to Baptists and derogatory to the glory of Christ, who is the only priest.

Ministry of the Church. The ministry is as broad as the fellowship of the church, yet for the purposes of leadership the term “ministry” has been reserved for those who have the responsibility of oversight and instruction. Baptists do not believe in a ministerial order in the sense of a priestly caste. The Baptist minister has no “more” grace than the one who is not a minister; he does not stand any nearer to God by virtue of his official position than does the humblest member of the church. There are diverse gifts, however, and it is recognized that the gift of ministry is by the grace of God, as Paul himself intimated in Ephesians 3:8. Pastors and deacons are chosen and appointed by the local church, though their appointment is frequently made in the wider context of the fellowship of Baptist churches.

Baptist Tradition, The

A Baptist minister becomes so by virtue of an inward call of God, which in turn receives confirmation in the outward call of a church. Public acknowledgment of this call of God is given in a service of ordination, which ordination, it is held, does not confer any kind of superior or ministerial grace but merely recognizes and regularizes the ministry within the church itself. The importance of ordination lies in the fact that the church itself preaches through the minister; and though ordination is not intended to imprison the activity of the Holy Spirit within the bounds of ecclesiastically ordained preachers, there is, nevertheless, considerable importance attached to the due authorization of those who are to speak in the name of the church.

Ecumenicity of the Church. It might seem that the idea of unity would be foreign to Baptists, given their strong views on independence and their doctrine of the autonomy of the church, but such is not the case. It all depends on what is meant by unity. For Baptists unity can mean one of three things: organic union, which is generally looked on unfavorably; cooperation with other denominations, which is encouraged with limits; and cooperation with other Baptists, which is almost unqualifiedly acceptable. Let us look briefly at each of these.

Baptist organizations are largely voluntary, cooperative ventures that have no legal binding force of their members. This is part of the Baptist ethos, allowing for freedom and concerted action to exist at the same time. Hence, the denominations (and there are many) do not exist as units but are simply collections of individual Baptist churches. It came as no surprise then that when the Consultation on Church Union was inaugurated in the 1960s, Baptists were cool to the idea of joining, especially since some form of episcopacy and recognition of apostolic succession (i.e., authoritative ecclesiastical structure) would be required of them. Only the American Baptists showed any interest, but when a general survey showed that fewer than 20 percent were interested in full participation, any plans of union were effectively scrapped. Organic union with other denominations, if it requires giving up Baptist distinctives, is simply out of the question.

Cooperation with other groups is a different matter. As early as the American colonial period Baptists cooperated with Quakers and Roman Catholics in the protection of religious freedom. In 1908 the Northern Baptist Convention was one of the founding members of the Federal Council of Churches; it has actively supported both the World Council of Churches and the National Council of Churches. Baptists are also active in the American Bible Society, on various mission boards, and in numerous civic and social organizations. It should be noted, however, that not all Baptists favor this form of cooperation; Baptists in the North are more inclined to cooperate than those in the South. In fact, this has been a source of tension among various Baptist groups. But most Baptists consider cooperation with non-Baptists appropriate.

Cooperation with other Baptists is strongly encouraged. Among the various Baptist groups exists a deep sense of comradeship that has historical, theological, and psychological roots. Although rather striking differences of style and expression exist among them, Baptists have managed to cooperate in supraregional groups (such as the American Baptist Convention and the Southern Baptist Convention) and in the international Baptist World Alliance, which claims that "There are 192 Baptist unions and conventions in over 200 countries that have a membership of more than 42 million baptized believers. This represents a community of approximately 100 million Baptists in approximately 158,000 member churches." What unites them all is the express purpose of the alliance, to express "the essential oneness of the Baptist people in the Lord Jesus Christ, to impart inspiration to the brotherhood, and to promote the spirit of fellowship, service, and co-operation among its members."

E. F. KEVAN

See also BAPTISM, BELIEVERS'; LANDMARKISM.

Bibliography. O. K. Armstrong and M. Armstrong, Baptists in America; W. H. Brackney, Baptists; H. Cook, What Baptists Stand For; T. Crosby, History of the English Baptists; A. Dakin, Baptist View of the Church and Ministry; T. George, "New Dimensions in Baptist Theology," in New Dimensions in Evangelical Thought, D. Dockery ed.; W. S. Hudson, Baptists in Transition; F. T. Lord, Baptist World Fellowship; H. L. McBeth, Baptist Heritage: Four Centuries of Baptist Witness; H. A. Renfree, Heritage and Horizon: The Baptist Story in Canada; H. W. Robinson, Baptist Principles; W. B. Shurden, ed., Life of Baptists in the Life of the World; S. L. Stealey, ed., Baptist Treasury; R. G. Torbet, History of the Baptists; A. C. Underwood, History of English Baptists; J. K. Zeman, ed., Baptists in Canada.

Barclay, Robert (1648–1690). A Scotsman who was an outstanding theologian of early Quakerism. His theology was forged on the anvil of persecution out of materials gleaned from classical and biblical studies. At age twenty-eight he wrote his great work, Apology for the True Christian Divinity, which Voltaire claimed was the finest church Latin he had ever read. Barclay translated the Apology into English two years later, and many editions have followed since 1678. The Apology and Barclay's ability in public debate revealed a scholarly foundation in the Quaker movement that made its arguments impressive.

Barclay's most controversial thesis is his concept of "direct and unmediated revelation." In brief, Barclay (and other Quakers) held that the primary religious authority is direct experience of Jesus as the living and present Christ. The Scriptures, as the "true and faithful record" of the historic revelation, outwardly corroborate the primary inward experience. Barclay denied that this doctrine of the light of Christ led to anarchic antinomianism, although he was fully aware of the religious and political significance of this doctrine in undercutting preemptive claims by church and state to interpret Scripture and tradition. The doctrine also implied the universal and saving light of Christ as a golden mean between alternatives—arbitrary election or universalism.

Barclay was a tireless advocate of peace, religious liberty, and political rights. He used his influence with royalty on behalf of imprisoned or abused Friends.

A. O. ROBERTS

See also FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF.

Bibliography. D. E. Trueblood, Robert Barclay.

Barclay, William (1907–1978). Scottish biblical scholar. Born in Wick and educated at the universities of Glasgow and Marburg, he was ordained in 1933 and served a Church of Scotland parish in industrial Clydeside. From 1947 he lectured in NT at Glasgow University, where he was promoted to professor in 1964. His Daily Study Bible (NT) won acclaim worldwide and was published in many languages. His gift of communicating with ordinary people, many of them with no religious connection, was further confirmed by a successful television series on the Christian faith. Barclay always urged his students to have some nonreligious interests and to keep abreast of current topics. Doctrinally, he was a universalist who rejected also the virgin birth and regarded miracles as merely symbolic of what Jesus can still do in the world. At one point late in life he advocated a two-tier system of church membership—the first for those who were deeply attracted to Christ, the second for those prepared to make total commitment. Barclay retired in 1974 but continued work on the OT part of his Daily Study Bible until just before his death.

J. D. DOUGLAS

Bibliography. W. Barclay, Spiritual Autobiography; R. D. Kernohan, ed., William Barclay; J. Martin, William Barclay; C. L. Rawlins, William Barclay.

Barmen, Declaration of (1934). An important declaration, in large part written by the theologian Karl Barth, of the Confessing Church in Germany, agreed upon at the Synod of Barmen in 1934.

At the Braune Synod held in Saxony in 1933, the Deutsche Christen (German Christians) had attempted to provide Hitler's National Socialist movement with a theological justification, speaking of a new Christ striving for expression in the German people's community and claiming that a people's state was a central tenet of true religion. The opposition this generated culminated in the Synod of Barmen.

The Barmen Confession, which contains six main paragraphs, attempts to resist the subordination of the Christian gospel and church to any political or social movement as its writers believed the Deutsche Christen had done. It stresses the absolute necessity for submission to, and dependence upon, Jesus Christ as the living Word of God. It also emphasizes the Scriptures, each paragraph developing a scriptural theme. The church, it proclaims, cannot recognize any source of final divine revelation other than Jesus Christ. He and he alone must be its Lord. The Barmen Declaration openly proclaimed its loyalty to what its signers believed to be the historic Protestant Christian faith, and it resisted the compromise of the Deutsche Christen.

J. D. SPICELAND

See also BARTH, KARL; NEO-ORTHODOXY.

Bibliography. W. Niesel, Reformed Symbolics; K. Scholder, Churches and the Third Reich.

Barnes, Albert (1798–1870). One of the most influential American Presbyterian clergymen during the middle third of the nineteenth century and a central figure in the Old School–New School controversy that led to the 1837 denominational division. Born in Rome, New York, he graduated from Hamilton and Princeton. While serving his first charge in Morristown, New Jersey, he attracted attention because of an 1829 revival sermon entitled "The Way of Salvation," which denied the doctrine of original sin and insisted that people were free moral agents who could choose for or against Christian salvation. The Old School conservatives became increasingly alarmed when he accepted a call to the prestigious First Church of Philadelphia and also began a longstanding habit of expressing his biblical interpretations in the form of semischolarly, very widely read commentaries for laymen entitled Notes: Explanatory and Practical. Twice in the 1830s the Philadelphia Synod charged Barnes with doctrinal error, only to have the Presbyterian General Assembly acquit him. These difficulties influenced Barnes to join other New School ministers as an early leader of the independently controlled Union Theological Seminary in New York City.

While Barnes promoted and practiced the New School concept of revivalism that stemmed from the Second Great Awakening, he also led the New School Presbyterians in emphasizing that social concern should be the logical consequence of personal regeneration. Accordingly he vigorously participated in a variety of reform movements, including prohibition and abolition. W. C. RINGENBERG

Barnes, Albert

See also NEW SCHOOL THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. A. Barnes, Church and Slavery; Life at Three Score and Ten; Scriptural Views of Slavery; Sermons on Revivals; G. Junkin, Vindication, Containing a History of the Trial of the Rev. Albert Barnes; G. M. Marsden, Evangelical Mind and the New School Presbyterian Experience; A. J. Stansbury, Trial of the Rev. Albert Barnes.

Barnhouse, Donald Grey (1895–1960). Probably the best-known and most widely followed American Bible teacher during the early middle decades of this century. Born in Watsonville, California, he gained his training in a broad variety of institutions including Biola, Princeton Seminary, Eastern Seminary, and the University of Pennsylvania.

In 1927 Barnhouse accepted the pulpit of Tenth Presbyterian Church in downtown Philadelphia, and it was from this church, where he continued the rest of his life, that he built his national and international empire. As early as 1928 and continuing through most of his career, he spoke over radio networks of up to 455 stations, using the Bible expository method of teaching. The popularity of these broadcasts and later telecasts led to many invitations to conduct Bible conferences, and the increasing demand of these conferences led him, after 1940, to be absent from his pulpit six months a year. Also serving as an outlet for his sermons, Bible studies, essays, and editorials were the two magazines he founded and edited, Revelation (1931–49) and Eternity.

Barnhouse's theology was an eclectic yet independent mix of dispensationalism, Calvinism, and fundamentalism. As a dispensationalist he developed elaborate eschatological schemes, yet he departed significantly from much dispensationalist teaching. His fearless and brusque attacks on liberal Presbyterian clergymen led the Philadelphia Presbytery to censure him in 1932, yet he opposed the fundamentalist concept of separation and in his later years gradually grew mellow in his relations with the Presbyterian Church and the National Council of Churches.

W. C. RINGENBERG

Bibliography. D. G. Barnhouse, God's Methods for Holy Living; God's River; God's Wrath; Guaranteed Deposits; His Own Received Him Not, But—; Life by the Son; Man's Ruin, God's Remedy; Teaching the Word of Truth; also see Barnhouse's many articles and essays in Revelation and Eternity magazines; M. N. Barnhouse, That Man Barnhouse; C. A. Russell, "Donald Grey Barnhouse: Fundamentalist Who Changed," JPH 59:33–57.

Barth, Karl (1886–1968). Reformed theologian, among the most influential of the twentieth century, Barth's development from liberalism to (neo-) orthodoxy and beyond represent the ongoing struggle between Christian faith and modern culture.

Ordained in 1908, he was immersed in the turmoil of pastoring during World War I, a sobering and critical influence on Barth's suspicion of liberalism's cultural theology. His 1919 publication of Der Römerbrief shocked European Christianity with its affirmation of divine freedom and the radically sinful state of human life; it also propelled him into teaching theology academically. He was instrumental in the formation of the Confessing Church's Barmen Declaration (1934), which rejected the Deutsche Christen (German Christians) effort to theologially justify National Socialism; Barmen asserted that Jesus Christ is the one Word of God, thus repudiating any other sources of revelation, power, and authority.

Barth's theological conversion from liberalism rests on his dissatisfaction with the weighty influence of Schleiermacher. Barth traced the roots of a historical shift back to Protestant scholasticism, which was simply canonized in Schleiermacher, a shift from dogmatics (with the object of faith being the Word of God) to the science of religious experience as it takes place in the church (with the object of faith being the Christian faith). He rejected the analogia entis (analogy of being) as the ground for divine revelation and anthropology; and instead, Barth asserted that the analogia fidei (analogy of faith) offered the only means to understand the task of Christian theology (echoing Anselm's credo: "believe in order to understand"). Thus, Barth rejected the viability of a natural theology based on a point of contact between God and the human.

In his thirteen-volume Church Dogmatics, Barth sought to display how theology was not simply a representation of a given theologian's positions but was the church's self-description. Yet the object of theology was God, not the church's own existence or understanding. Theology's task is to speak humanly about the priority of God's grace and Word; thus, there will never finally be a systematic correlation of divine revelation and theology. God's revelation is the reiteration of God's trinitarian identity demonstrated in Christ.

Evangelical attitudes toward Barth have slowly moved away from outright suspicion of Barth toward a more appreciative awareness of Barth's dissatisfaction with liberalism and its intellectual moorings in the Enlightenment. Instead of attempting to grasp his theology through a single theme or idea, current interest in Barth stresses a more irenic evaluation of his theology through various motifs that reappear in his work (especially noted by Hunsinger). Barth's dissatisfaction with the hubris of modernity leads to his distinction as a theologian who breaches the modern and postmodern intellectual worlds.

J. P. CALLAHAN

Bibliography. K. Barth, Anselm: Fides Quaerens Intellectum; Dogmatics in Outline; Evangelical Theology; Theology of Schleiermacher; Letters: 1961–1968; Protestant Theology in the Nineteenth Century; Theological Existence Today; Word of God and the Word of Man; G. C. Berkouwer, Triumph of Grace in the Theology of Karl Barth; E. Busch, Karl Barth: His Life from Letters and Autobiographical Tests; A. Cochrane, Church's Confession under Hitler; D. Ford, Barth and God's Story; H. Hartwell, Theology of Karl Barth: An Introduction; G. Hunsinger, How to Read Karl Barth; R. Jenson, God of the Past and the Future as Seen in the Work of Karl Barth; B. Ramm, After Fundamentalism; T. F. Torrance, Karl Barth: An Introduction to His Early Theology, 1910–1931; H. U. von Balthasar, Theology of Karl Barth.

Basel, First Confession of (1534). This twelve-article statement of the Protestant faith was composed by Oswald Myconius in 1532 and approved and published by the city council of Basel, Switzerland, in 1534 as the official creed of the city. The nearby German city of Mühlhausen approved it in 1536; hence, it is also known as the Confession of Mühlhausen.

The First Confession of Basel is to be distinguished from the First Helvetic Confession of 1536, also known as the Second Confession of Basel, which contained twenty-seven articles and was endorsed by seven Swiss cities. It is also to be distinguished from the Second Helvetic Confession of 1566, composed by Heinrich Bullinger, with thirty extensive chapters and widely endorsed throughout the Reformed world.

Johannes Oecolampadius came to Basel in 1522 and saw the Reformation officially embraced there in 1529. A month before his death in 1531 he addressed the Synod of Basel and included a brief personal confession of faith and paraphrase of the Apostles' Creed. It is generally believed that his successor, Oswald Myconius, used that draft in composing the First Confession of Basel.

The confession is a simple, warm expression of the Protestant faith expressed in contrast to both Roman Catholicism and Anabaptism. The twelve articles deal with God, man, providence, Christ, the church, the Lord's Supper, church discipline, the state, faith and works, the final judgment, God's commands, and infant baptism. Although it lacks a separate article on Scripture, the confession ends this way: "Finally, we desire to submit this our confession to the judgment of the divine Biblical Scriptures. And should we be informed from the same Holy Scriptures of a better one, we have thereby expressed our readiness to be willing at any time to obey God and His holy Word with great thanksgiving."

From 1534 until 1826 the confession was read annually from Basel pulpits during Easter week. It continued in force as Basel's official creed until 1872, when it was set aside under the influence of the liberalized thinking that began with the Enlightenment.

F. H. KLOOSTER

See also CONFESSIONS OF FAITH.

Bibliography. A. C. Cochrane, Reformed Confessions of the 16th Century; P. Schaff, Creeds of Christendom.

Basil the Great (ca. 330–379). Bishop of Caesarea. He was born into a wealthy Christian family in Pontus. After receiving a good education both at home and in Athens, he returned to Caesarea in 356 as a teacher of rhetoric. A year later he was baptized and, following a visit to monastic communities in the eastern Mediterranean, retired to a hermitage on his family estate, where he began his career as a literary defender of the faith. In 364 he left his hermitage at the request of Eusebius, bishop of Caesarea, who ordained him presbyter in that year and whom he succeeded in office in 370. He continued in that office until death, establishing an impressive record as an eloquent defender of Nicaean Christianity.

Basil is known for lasting contributions in three fields. (1) He introduced the idea of a communal monasticism based on love, holiness, and obedience, which replaced individual asceticism. The Rule of St. Basil remains today the basic structure of Eastern monasticism. (2) He established the principle of social concern for both monastic communities and for bishops. While defending the judicial independence of the local bishop from the bishop of Rome (whose lead he accepted in doctrine), he established administrative control over the monasteries and other works of the church. Using this control and setting the example by giving away his own wealth, he organized and administered great works of charity—hospitals, schools, and hostels. (3) He defended orthodox doctrine, particularly the doctrine of the Trinity. In De Spiritu Sancto he defended the deity of the Holy Spirit against the Pneumatomachai. His Adversus Eunomium attacked the Arian heresy, which was at that time being pushed on the church by the Emperor Valens. In this defense of the faith he gave exact meanings to the terms for the Trinity, fixing the formula one substance (ousia) and three persons (hypostaseis) and thus preparing the way for the Council of Constantinople (381). In all of this work he, along with his friend Gregory of Nazianzus and his brother Gregory of Nyssa, mediated between East and West. His books, homilies (especially on the Psalms), commentary on Isaiah 1–6, and letters have been of lasting value to the church, revealing the heart of not just a learned man, but also a loving Christian.

Basil the Great

P. H. DAVIDS

See also CAPPADOCIAN FATHERS.

Bibliography. H. Chadwick, Early Church; W. C. Clark, Ascetic Works of St. Basil; R. S. Deferrari, trans., St. Basil: The Letters; P. J. Fedwick, Basil of Caesarea: Christian, Humanist, Ascetic; J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines; G. L. Prestige, St. Basil the Great and Apollinaris of Laodicea; H. von Campenhausen, Fathers of the Greek Church; J. W. C. Wand, Doctrines and Councils.

Baur, Ferdinand Christian (1792–1860). German Protestant theologian, founder of the Tübingen School of NT criticism. From 1826 until his death he was professor of theology at the University of Tübingen, where he put forward radical views concerning the origin of Christianity and the NT writings. Being convinced that the traditional Christian interpretation of Christian origins (viz., a revelation from God, the incarnation, the bodily resurrection of Christ, etc.) could not be right, he sought to provide a “strictly historical” (nonsupernatural) interpretation of early Christianity. He found in the contemporary philosophy of history espoused by Hegel a ready instrument for his reshaping of historical theology (P. C. Hodgson’s attempt to deny Hegel’s influence on Baur cannot be sustained; cf. works by Geiger and Harris).

Although no one in nineteenth-century Germany exerted a greater influence on the development of the historical-critical method, Baur was more of a philosophical theologian than a biblical scholar or historian. Yet he published five books and a number of significant essays in the area of NT research. Paul the Apostle of Jesus Christ (2 vols., 1845) offers his most extensive exposition of his views. His basic thesis concerning the nature of early Christianity and its resulting documents was first put forward in 1831 in an essay on the so-called Christ-party of Paul’s Corinthian correspondence. His thesis—which remained essentially unchanged throughout his life—was that, in spite of the impression of uniformity of doctrine and practice in the early church gained from a superficial reading of the NT, early Christianity was marked by a severe conflict between two groups who represent very different theologies: a Jewish (Petrine) party and a Gentile (Pauline) party. Thus, it becomes necessary to approach each NT document in terms of its Tendenz, its special theological point of view within the context of the history of primitive Christianity. Baur thought that the NT could be divided into three groups: Palestinian/Jewish (e.g., Matthew, which he considered to be the first Gospel to have been written), Hellenistic/Pauline (Romans, 1 and 2 Corinthians, and Galatians, the only genuine Pauline letters), and Catholic/conciliatory (Acts and most of the rest of the NT). Baur dated Acts in the midsecond century A.D.; it goes without saying that it is wholly untrustworthy as a source of the history of A.D. 30–60.

Although no one today would hold the detailed critical opinions of Baur, some of his assumptions come down to us in the writings of contemporary NT critics—viz., a cleavage between the Palestinian apostles and Paul, the unreliable nature of Luke-Acts, and the inadequacy of traditional orthodoxy. His most famous students were D. F. Strauss, A. Ritschl, and E. Zeller. The first two broke with their mentor in later years; Zeller became his son-in-law.

W. W. GASQUE

See also TÜBINGEN SCHOOL.

Bibliography. W. Baird, History of New Testament Research; W. W. Gasque, History of the Criticism of the Acts of the Apostles; H. Harris, Tübingen School; P. C. Hodgson, Formation of Historical Theology: A Study of F. C. Baur; R. Morgan, ExpT 90:4–10; 88:202–6; “Ferdinand Christian Baur,” Nineteenth-Century Religious Thought in the West 1:261–89, N. Smart et al., ed.

Bavinck, Herman (1854–1921). Alongside Abraham Kuyper, a leading theologian of the neo-Calvinist revival initiated a century ago in the Dutch Reformed Church and still represented in North America by the Christian Reformed Church. Trained at the University of Leiden and the Theological Seminary at Kampen, Bavinck served a church at Franeker (1881–82) before becoming professor of systematic theology first at Kampen (1882–1902) and then at the Free University of Amsterdam (1902–20). His major work was Gereformeerde Dogmatiek (Reformed Dogmatics) in four volumes, first published between 1895 and 1901, of which only the second volume has been translated into English as Doctrine of God.

In piety and lifestyle Bavinck always remained close to his separatist origins, but in his scholarly work he showed a remarkable openness and sensitivity to nineteenth-century developments. Thus, he wrote many important essays on education, ethics (family, women, war, etc.), and even the new discipline of psychology. His first concern, however, was to apply the full scholarly resources of his own age to a renewal of the dogmatic tradition represented by seventeenth-century Reformed scholastic theology. Bavinck considered theology to be the systematic study of the knowledge of God as Christ revealed regarding himself and creation in his Word, a revelation made to the church as encapsulated in its creedal confessions and received in faith by the individual theologian. Bavinck’s philosophical orientation, as revealed in his prolegomena, was more realist, in contrast to Kuyper’s inclination to German idealism, and included a genuine appreciation for the contemporary neo-Thomist revival among Catholics. He sometimes spoke of certain “ideas” found in God and evident as well in creation, in man’s image-likeness to God, and even in predestination. Yet he always insisted upon the primacy of Scripture. Toward the end of his life he encouraged younger colleagues to take up, from a conservative perspective, the difficult problems raised by newer biblical studies. Throughout his life he also insisted on the primacy of God’s gift of grace in the justification of humans, rejecting faith in any human act as preceding or invoking God’s grace. Bavinck deeply influenced many Dutch and American Reformed theologians, though most of their works—e.g., Louis Berkhof’s Systematic Theology—show much less of his broad grasp of the history of theology and his notable philosophical capacity.

J. VAN ENGEN

Bibliography. H. Bavinck, Certainty of Faith; Doctrine of God; Our Reasonable Faith; Philosophy of Revelation.

Baxter, Richard (1615–1691). Generally classified among the top rank of Puritan theologians, Baxter is known for his exemplary ministerial work as well as his approximately two hundred writings. Attaining his education largely through self-instruction, he was ordained in 1638 in the Church of England. His ministry at Kidderminster (1641–60) was marked by a dramatic transformation of the whole life of the community. He supported Parliament in its battle against the king, serving briefly as a military chaplain. He sided with the Nonconformist party and was eventually ejected from the Church of England along with two thousand other clergy in 1662. Throughout his ministry Baxter sought to increase cooperation and tolerance among the Episcopalians, Presbyterians, and independents in church polity. Although forbidden to serve as pastor after 1662, he continued his ministry through writing and preaching.

Three of his writings have been reprinted frequently. Saint’s Everlasting Rest (1650) expounds “the blessed state of the Saints in their enjoyment of God in glory.” It continues to be one of the classics of Christian devotional literature—although its one thousand pages are usually abridged. Reformed Pastor (1656) describes the oversight pastors are to exercise over themselves first and then over their flock. It includes practical guidance for dealing with the pastor’s perennial problems of instructing and guiding the church. Call to the Unconverted (1657) shows Baxter’s evangelistic concern. It consists of an earnest and reasoned appeal to the unconverted to turn to God and accept his mercy. The other important works of Baxter are his Methodus The- ologiae Christianae (1681), written in Latin, which sets forth his theology most systematically, and his autobiography, Reliquiae Baxterianae (1695). These and his other writings are filled with evangelical zeal for the lost, genuine piety, and a desire to bring reconciliation to the warring divisions of Christians in his day.

Baxter’s theology was moderate. He attempted to avoid the acidity of polemical positions and to find truth in the theological center between the extremes. He always sought to isolate the element of truth in erroneous teachings. In theology no less than ecclesiology Baxter sought to be a peacemaker. Thus, his theology made him unpopular among many of his age. For example, Calvinists were offended by his acceptance of universal redemption, while Arminians were offended by his acceptance of personal election. Nevertheless, to his critics Baxter sought to vindicate his views by appeal to the Scriptures and to reason.

O. G. OLIVER JR.

Bibliography. C. F. Allison, Rise of Moralism; T. K. Beougher, Richard Baxter: A Life of Puritan Zeal; W. B. T. Douglas, “Politics and Theology in the Thought of Richard Baxter,” AUSS 15:115–26, 16:305–12; N. H. Keeble, ed., Autobiography of Richard Baxter; N. H. Keeble and G. F. Nuttall, Calendar of the Correspondence of Richard Baxter; C. Kemp, Pastoral Triumph; W. M. Lamont, Richard Baxter and the Millennium; H. Martin, Puritanism and Richard Baxter; G. Nuttall, Richard Baxter; W. Orme, ed., Practical Works of Richard Baxter; R. S. Paul, “Ecclesiology in Richard Baxter’s Autobiography,” in From Faith to Faith, D. Y. Hadidian, ed.; F. J. Powicke, Life of the Reverend Richard Baxter; Reverend Richard Baxter under the Cross; R. Schlatter, ed., Richard Baxter and Puritan Politics.

Beatification. A legal process in the Roman Catholic Church whereby a departed “servant of God” is adjudged worthy of a public cult in a particular place. Such beatified persons, called “blessed,” gain recognition only in particular churches, dioceses, or regions, and are distinguished iconographically by a simple circular diadem. In the ancient and medieval church such cults sprang up locally and often spontaneously. Since the seventeenth century the Roman See, specifically the Congregation of Rites, has claimed control of the process.

The ordinary process originates still with the local bishop, who appoints a postulator to handle the case in Rome. He must establish that all the person’s writings are above suspicion, that his or her holiness was manifest in heroic virtue, and that at least two miracles have been done by his or her intercession. Once all this information has been gathered, verified, and printed, the pope may choose to “introduce the cause,” which transfers jurisdiction to the Roman See, where a similar investigation takes place. If on the recommendation of the Congregation of Rites a person is formally beatified at a public ceremony in the Vatican, the “blessed” then becomes an authorized model of Christian sanctity worthy of imitation in life and veneration in a public cult. This is the first and most significant step toward full canonization. Theologically, the person has been judged by the church to reign now in glory among the blessed and to intercede in behalf of the faithful who call on him or her. J. VAN ENGEN

Beatification

See also CANONIZATION.

Bibliography. Benedict XIV, Heroic Virtue; A. E. Green, NCE 3:55–61.

Beatific Vision. In Roman Catholic theology the beatific vision (visio Dei) refers to the direct, intuitive knowledge of the triune God that perfected souls will enjoy by means of their intellect; that is, the final fruition of the Christian life, in which they will see God as he is in himself. Many of the earliest church fathers—Ignatius, Theophilus, and especially Augustine—already interpreted in this way the numerous scriptural texts that speak of “seeing” and “knowing” God. Although Scripture teaches plainly that God dwells in inaccessible light and that people cannot “see” him in this life, several NT texts (Matt. 5:8; 1 Cor. 13:12; Heb. 12:14; 1 John 3:2, 6; Rev. 22:4) were understood to teach a qualitatively different knowledge and vision of God in eternity.

Medieval theologians, especially Thomas Aquinas and others heavily influenced by Aristotelian philosophy, defined the vision of God as a direct intuition or perception of his very being (essentia), as an eternal act of the intellect (though Augustinians such as Bonaventure and Duns Scotus continued to emphasize the role of love and the will), and as wholly supernatural in character, requiring special means (medium) known as the “light of glory” (lumen gloriae). They then disputed human access to that vision in this life and Christ’s retention of it throughout his earthly days; but they all insisted, contrary to Irenaeus and Pope John XXII, that people could enjoy that vision immediately upon death and not only after their resurrection. Protestant theologians rejected most of this as too narrow and too philosophical a conception of humankind’s eternal blessedness, but without entirely abandoning the term and its associated theological problems. In recent years Roman Catholic and Protestant scholars alike have interpreted the biblical language of “seeing God face to face” much more broadly as living joyfully and everlastingly in the immediate presence of God.

J. VAN ENGEN

Bibliography. G. C. Berkouwer, Return of Christ; K. E. Kirk, Vision of God; M. J. Redle, NCE 2:186–93.

Beelzebub, Beelzebul. See BAAL-ZEBUB.

Begotten. See ONLY BEGOTTEN.

Being. Considered to be the most general property common to everything there is. In early Greek philosophy being was usually contrasted with becoming or change. Being was associated with perfection, and perfection could not change, since any change would be for the worse. Parmenides held that the world did not change and that the apparent change was only an illusion.

Aristotle held that being and unity could not be genera. Taking this hint, others have argued that “there is” and “there are” must be understood differently when applied to objects that belong to different categories. Moreover, Aristotle insisted that to say that something “is,” is not to add anything to its description. From this discussion arose the medieval doctrine of the transcendentals. Aquinas identified “being,” “one,” “true,” “thing,” “something,” and “good” as transcending the categories and as applicable to everything. These transcendentals are often included among the syncategorematic terms—terms that set forth the properties of being qua being, an idea originated by Aristotle, who thought it was the subject matter of metaphysics.

It is not unusual to distinguish different kinds of being. Existence is contrasted with subsistence and other notions. Alexius Meinong, for instance, held that material objects in time and space, as well as shadows and gravitational fields in time and space, exist. Universals, numbers, fictional or imaginary beings (e.g., unicorns) neither exist nor subsist, but possess sosein, which literally means “being so” or essence. Others insist that these latter items subsist; that is, they have being in some sense and are not simply reducible to mere words as the nominalists claim.

The discussion of fictional and nonexistent objects relates metaphysics to philosophical logic. Gotlieb Frege and Bertrand Russell sought a means for dealing with such objects in the language of first order predicate logic. They developed theories about logically proper names and definite descriptions. W. V. O. Quine examined the metaphysical commitment of formal logic and concluded that “to be is to be the value of a variable.”

The discussion of being has had significance for the field of theology. The ontological argument raises the question as to whether existence is strictly speaking a predicate or property. Aristotle, quite apart from this argument, insisted that it was neither. Descartes, on the other hand, argued that existence must be a perfection and used the argument for the existence of a most perfect being, God. It was the assumption that existence was a predicate that was severely criticized by David Hume and Immanuel Kant. To say that something exists is not to add to its description.

Modern logicians have followed Aristotle, Hume, and Kant. To express existence or existential import one uses the existential quantifier.

As natural theology developed in the late Middle Ages, the nature of being became a central issue. God was pure actuality and as such was immutable. He was a necessary being. That is, God is not in need of anything outside of his own being for his existence. On the other hand, all other beings are contingent beings. This means that they depend on something or someone outside themselves for their existence. This distinction becomes fundamental to the cosmological argument. This argument was developed in two directions. As a causal argument, it has been argued that a contingent being needs a first, necessary cause, or an infinite regress results. As a contingency argument, it is maintained that a contingent being remains unexplained without reference to a necessary being who needs no explanation.

The objections to the cosmological argument are that an infinite regress is not intellectually unacceptable, that the idea of a necessary being is either inconsistent or incoherent, and that other contingent beings or causes do explain contingent beings.

In modern theology the concept of being has taken a quite different course. Paul Tillich insisted that God tends to become a being among beings. Eventually God is reduced to a way of speaking about human existence and ideals, making him unbelievable and dispensable. This is the essence of atheism for Tillich. God is "being itself" or "the ground of being." As such, Tillich's God is "the God beyond the God of theism." This view of God has been criticized as perilously close to pantheism and so obscure as to disappear in the depths of philosophical speculation.

In process theology there is an attempt to synthesize the old antithesis between being and becoming. God is thought to be di- or bipolar. The static pole gives the subjective aim and potentiality to objects in reality. The dynamic pole is in constant becoming. Through it, God grasps hold of the process, taking into himself value left by the perishing of objects. P. D. FEINBERG

Bibliography. P. T. Geach, "Form and Existence," in Aquinas, A. Kenny, ed.; É. Gilson, Being and Some Philosophers; Philosophy of St. Thomas Aquinas; E. L. Mascall, He Who Is; J. Owens, Doctrine of Being in the Aristotelian Metaphysics.

Belgic Confession (1561). Sometimes known as the Walloon Confession, this was composed in 1561 by Guido de Bres as an apology for the persecuted band of Reformed Christians in the Lowlands who formed the so-called churches under the cross. Translated from French into Dutch in 1562, it gained synodical approval at Antwerp in 1566, at Wesel in 1568, at Emden in 1571, and definitively at Dordrecht in 1618. Together with the Heidelberg Catechism and the Canons of Dort, it provided the confessional foundation for all Dutch Reformed churches and remains binding still today for members of the Christian Reformed Church in North America. De Bres, a courageous pastor to French-speaking communities in the Lowlands who was martyred at Valenciennes in 1567, modeled his work on the so-called Gallic Confession adopted for all French Reformed churches at Paris in 1559. Like Calvin's Institutes of the Christian Religion, the text breaks down roughly into three parts: the triune God and the knowledge of him from Scripture (Arts. 1–9), Christ's work of creation and redemption (10–23), and the Spirit's work of sanctification in and through the Christian church (24–37)—this last part subdivided again in Calvin. De Bres quoted Scripture liberally and often used the pronoun we to personalize this confession of faith. To distinguish his community from the feared and "detested" Anabaptists (with whom Catholics had often confused them), de Bres asserted the full humanity of Jesus Christ (18), the public rather than sectarian nature of the true church (28–29), infant baptism (34), and the God-given character of civil government (36). As for the Catholics, who had brought the Inquisition down upon them, de Bres sought to find as many common beliefs as possible, especially the Trinity (1, 8, 9), the incarnation (10, 18, 19), and a catholic Christian church (27–29). But he also upheld distinctively Protestant emphases such as the unique authority of Scripture apart from the Apocrypha (3–7), the all-sufficiency of Christ's atoning sacrifice and intercession (21–23, 26), and the nature of good works (24) and of the two sacraments, Holy Baptism and the Holy Supper (34–35). Distinctively Reformed elements may be found in the articles on election (16), sanctification (24), the government of the church (30–32), and the Lord's Supper (35). There is no evidence that the Catholic authorities ever seriously read or were impressed by this little work, but Reformed Christians in the Lowlands quickly adopted it as their own confession of faith. J. VAN ENGEN

See also CONFESSIONS OF FAITH.

Bibliography. A. C. Cochrane, Reformed Confessions of the 16th Century.

Belief, Believe. See FAITH.

Believer. See CHRISTIANS, NAMES OF.

Believers' Baptism. See BAPTISM, BELIEVERS'.

Bellarmino, Robert (1542–1621). A doctor of the church, Bellarmine joined the Jesuit Order in

Bellarmino, Robert

Rome in 1560, taught theology at Louvain (1569–76) and Rome (1576–88), then perhaps the two leading intellectual centers of the Counter-Reformation, and concluded his life as a cardinal in the service of the Roman curia, deeply involved in numerous important political and ecclesiastical missions. Firmly grounded in Aristotelian philosophy and scholastic theology, Bellarmine helped to establish Thomas Aquinas's Summa Theologica as the basic textbook for Jesuit and eventually all Catholic theological education. But he was also a well-trained humanist who demonstrated that rhetorical and historical skills could also be applied to the service of the Roman Church—for instance, his De Scriptoribus ecclesiasticis, a literary history of church authors since the early church. His theological lectures in Rome, published as Disputations concerning Controversies of the Christian Faith against the Heretics of Our Time (1586–93), proved the most forceful theological response to Protestantism to issue from the Counter-Reformation, and was widely used in teaching Catholic apologetics down the early twentieth century. Theologically Bellarmine insisted upon the visible, hierarchical church culminating in the Roman papacy as the only true church, thus excluding Protestants and Orthodox alike; and he ascribed to the papacy an “indirect power” in temporal affairs. His theology of grace defended humankind's free will and “natural inclination to the beatific vision” in a form that went somewhat beyond Aquinas to approach the positions of Molina and other Jesuits.

J. VAN ENGEN

See also COUNTER-REFORMATION.

Bibliography. R. J. Blackwell, Galileo, Bellarmine, and the Bible; J. Brodrick, Life and Work of Blessed Robert Francis Cardinal Bellarmine, S.J. 1542–1621; Robert Bellarmine, Saint and Scholar.

Benedict of Nursia (ca. 480–547). Founder of the monastic order of Benedictines, wrote a rule for his monastery at Monte Cassino that became the norm for monastic legislation in the West from the eighth through the twelfth centuries.

All that we know about Benedict and his teachings comes from his rule and the Dialogues of Gregory the Great. Though his rule was not original, it was a legislative masterpiece for its simplicity and adaptability. It relied heavily on the “Rule of the Master” and was influenced by John Cassian (to whose writings Benedict commends the reader), as well as by Basil, Augustine, and two centuries of monastic practice.

Laced with Scripture, Benedict's rule consists of regulations for seeking God and living the daily Christian life in a community centered in acts of worship. The Christian life is envisioned as a journey; along the way, the disciple is formed as a total person through training in the monastery—a “school for the Lord's service” (RB, Prologue 45). This training involves the three traditional Benedictine vows of stability (actively remaining in the particular community and station of life to which God has called the monk), obedience (especially to the abbot, who must use discretion in leadership as Christ's representative in the community), and conversatio morum (fidelity to monastic life for continual transformation of character).

In all of this the disciple is to exercise moderation. Benedict prohibited extremes, even in ascetic practices. The monk's life is characterized by a balanced life of work (manual labor for self-subsistence, almsgiving, and discipline), study (lectio divina or spiritual reading), and prayer (the “work of God” and primary duty of the monk, to be practiced eight times a day, focusing on the recitation of Psalms, according to Benedict's schedule).

Monasticism was largely rejected by the Protestant Reformers and thus plays little role in contemporary evangelicalism. Furthermore, Benedict's appeal to Cassian makes evangelicals wary of an underlying semi-Pelagianism. Nevertheless, Benedict belongs to an era of undivided Western Christianity; and evangelical spirituality can profit from his teachings, such as emphases on listening, servant-leadership, moderation and balance, stewardship of resources, stability, and hospitality.

D. L. OKHOLM

See also MONASTICISM.

Bibliography. C. Butler, Benedictine Monachism; L. J. Daly, Benedictine Monasticism; Gregory the Great, Dialogues of St. Gregory; T. Fry, ed., RB1980: The Rule of St. Benedict in Latin and English with Notes; T. Kardong, Benedictines; Benedict's Rule: A Translation and Commentary; D. Knowles, Benedictines; Christian Monasticism; J. McCann, St. Benedict; A. C. Meisel and M. L. del Mastro, eds., Rule of St. Benedict.

Benediction. An act or pronouncement of blessing. The Aaronic benediction was given to Aaron and his sons as a part of their ministry in God's behalf toward the people, and is epitomized as a putting of God's name upon them (Num. 6:22–27). The NT parallel is the apostolic benediction (2 Cor. 13:14), which reflects the progress of revelation by its emphasis on the Trinity. Other passages, notably Ephesians 3:20–21; Hebrews 13:20–21; and Jude 24–25, are often treated as benedictions by members of the clergy. The question is whether these are true benedictions or whether they are prayers. In the benediction the minister acts on behalf of God in pronouncing a blessing upon the congregation, whereas in a prayer he is the representative of the people, voicing a supplication to God on their behalf. It appears that in the strict application of the term there is only one benediction in the OT and one in the NT. The benediction is to be distinguished even more sharply from the salutation, which is a common feature of the opening portion of the NT epistles (e.g., Gal. 1:3). Such salutations are the counterpart of the greetings found in the everyday letters of the Hellenistic period, but they inject a spiritual flavor into the greeting that lifts it above the commonplace. It hardly need be said that the practice of inventing benedictions that are not framed in the language of Scripture is of doubtful propriety.

In Roman Catholic theory the virtue of the benediction, which is regarded as quasi-automatic in its efficacy, increases with the rank of the one who pronounces it. "The higher the hierarchical position of him who bestows the blessing, the more powerful it is" (Achelis). It is common practice to "bless" objects also, giving them either a temporary or a permanent character of holiness. In modern times Romanism has introduced the Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament. The priest, having taken the host and placed it in the monstrance, then incenses the Blessed Sacrament. After appropriate singing and prayer, the priest makes the sign of the cross with the monstrance (still containing the host) over the people. This benediction is given in silence.

E. F. HARRISON

Bibliography. E. C. Achelis, "Benediction," SHERK 2:49-50; W. H. Dolbeer, Benediction.

Bengel, Johann Albrecht (1687-1752). German scholar, often regarded as the father of modern textual criticism. Born in Wurtemberg, he studied at Tübingen, was ordained as a Lutheran pastor, and from 1713 taught at a seminary in Denkendorf. His interests ranged over a wide field, but his chief preoccupation was the text of the New Testament. His Apparatus Criticus (1734) might be regarded as the birth of modern New Testament criticism. His policy was expressed in what became a well-known principle, "The more difficult reading is to be preferred." There followed in 1742 the exegetical work Gnomon Novi Testamenti, highly regarded by John Wesley, who translated many of its notes. A full English translation in five volumes appeared in 1857-58. A leader in that moderate form of Pietism that rejected separatist tendencies and remained within the Lutheran Church, Bengel was throughout motivated by a real love for God's Word. He would, says Albert Hauck, "read nothing into the Scriptures, but draw everything from them, and suffer nothing to remain hidden that is really in them."

During the latter part of his career Bengel's writings on apocalyptic literature attracted wide attention and had an impact on the Adventist movement. He anticipated a preliminary millennium in 1836, followed by the millennial kingdom, closing with the end of the world and the final judgment.

Much of the bibliographical material is in German, but J. C. F. Burk's J. A. Bengel's Leben und Wirken (1831) was published in English in 1837.

J. D. DOUGLAS

Berdyaev, Nikolai Aleksandrovich (1874-1948). Russian personalist philosopher-theologian. Born in Kiev, he was exiled by the czarist government as a Marxist in 1898. After the Bolshevik Revolution he was professor of philosophy at Moscow University until deported to Europe by the Soviets in 1922 because of the Christian premises of his socialism. Berdyaev lived as an unwilling exile until his death in France, where he propagated his thought as director of the Religious-Philosophical Academy and editor of the journal The Way and the YMCA Press. A freethinker in early years, Berdyaev embraced the Russian Orthodox Church on the eve of World War I, and though often openly critical of it, he conscientiously remained a member and as such participated in conferences of the ecumenical movement. Nevertheless, by his own admission his thought was atypical within Orthodoxy, though he acknowledged his affinity to Origen and Gregory of Nyssa.

In over twenty books and dozens of articles, Berdyaev presented no orderly system; disjointed ideas fill his works, and frequent aphorisms obscure more than clarify his conceptions. But this is in line with his confession that his vocation was "to proclaim not a doctrine but a view." He freely admitted that his theology was human-centered, because of his conviction that humanity had been deified by the incarnation.

Berdyaev's theology is rather conventionally Trinitarian, incarnational, and redemptive: the Second Person of the eternal Trinity became man to free humanity from evil and transform all creation into God's kingdom. His distinctiveness lies in his radical stress on freedom and creativity. He spoke of freedom as uncreated, independent of God, and eternal. It is the nothingness (Ungrund) out of which God produced his good creation; it also is the occasion for evil and thus pain and suffering. Creativity constitutes the likeness between God and man, created in the divine image and set free by the incarnation to achieve his destiny. Christ, the God-man, destroyed the radical disjunction between man and God and joined the two in the task of transforming "this evil and stricken world."

From this perspective Berdyaev derived his eschatological motif pointing to the achievement of perfect justice for human existence. But unlike Marxism, to which he otherwise remained sympathetic, Berdyaev declared the futility of this hope within history, since any society created by purely human effort would inevitably destroy freedom and creativity. The goal of history lies beyond history, in divine-human destiny, one's obligation to God to express creativity freely. Every creative act strikes a blow against the evil that enslaves humanity, and it unites the actor with God. The proper relation of the person to God, then, is not the objective act of worship but the subjective union of the two in the act of creation.

Berdyaeu himself typified the spiritual turn of many Russian intellectuals away from naturalism after 1900, generally called the Russian religious renaissance; appropriately, his writings now provide a principal impetus to the ongoing religious renaissance in that part of the world, a revival of the interest in spirituality within a segment of the young Russian intelligentsia.

P. D. STEEVES

See also ORTHODOX TRADITION.

Bibliography. N. A. Berdyaeu, Dream and Reality: An Essay in Autobiography; Truth and Revelation; O. F. Clarke, Introduction to Berdyaeu; M. Vallon, Apostle of Freedom; N. Zernov, Russian Religious Renaissance of the Twentieth Century.

Berkeley, George (1685–1753). Irish-born philosopher who presented classic arguments in favor of idealist metaphysics. He produced most of his philosophical work early in life: Essay towards a New Theory of Vision in 1709 and Treatise concerning the Principles of Human Knowledge in 1710. Later he turned to other things—attempts to establish a college in Bermuda and service as an Anglican bishop in Cloyne, Ireland, beginning in 1734.

As an immaterialist Berkeley believed that material substance does not exist. Two kinds of things exist: spirits that perceive ideas and the ideas they perceive. Ideas do not represent something else; the idea of a body or a desk is not related to any material body or desk. According to Berkeley, this immaterialism protects us from skepticism: we have no reason to doubt whether our ideas correctly resemble material objects in the world because there are no material objects. All we know are the ideas present to our minds, and of these we are directly and indubitably aware. Berkeley found no distinction between appearance and reality; appearance is the only reality we have.

Berkeley's basic doctrine is that for something to exist, it must be perceived. If something is an odor, it must be smelled; if it is a color, it must be seen, etc. Moreover, sense information is the only basis for knowledge. We have no way of claiming that there is some material object that we sense because we cannot get beyond our senses to find out.

Do things cease to exist when no human is perceiving them? Berkeley said no, because God continues to perceive them. God also coordinates our ordinary perceptions to give them a lawlike regularity. This regularity simplifies the world for God, who does not have to maintain both a material world and our ability to perceive the world. He merely maintains our perceptions.

Berkeley's idealism need not be considered unorthodox. He believed that Jesus was fully God and fully man. Jesus was just as much in the flesh as you and I are, though flesh is seen as an "idea." Neither the incarnation nor the world at large is an illusion. On the contrary, God himself maintains all such true perceptions in an orderly fashion.

P. DE VRIES

Bibliography. J. Foster and H. Robinson, eds., Essays on Berkeley; A. A. Luce, Life of George Berkeley; E. A. Sillem, George Berkeley and the Proofs for the Existence of God; J. O. Urmson, Berkeley; J. Wild, George Berkeley: A Study of His Life and Philosophy.

Berkhof, Louis (1873–1957). Theologian of the Christian Reformed Church. He was born in Emmen, the Netherlands, and moved to Grand Rapids, Michigan, in 1882. After earning diplomas at Calvin College (1897) and Calvin Theological Seminary (1900), he was ordained in the Christian Reformed Church. A two-year pastorate at Allendale, Michigan, was followed by two years of study at Princeton Theological Seminary (B.D., 1904). He then returned to Grand Rapids to serve the Oakdale Park Christian Reformed Church for two years.

In 1906 Berkhof began a thirty-eight-year teaching career at Calvin Theological Seminary, serving also as the first president of the seminary from 1931 until his retirement in 1944. The first twenty years were devoted to the biblical area, at first both OT and NT subjects but after 1914 NT studies only. In 1926 Berkhof became professor of dogmatics or systematic theology and continued in that field for the next eighteen years. He is best known as a systematic theologian.

English became the language of instruction at Calvin Seminary in 1924, and Berkhof's publications were aimed at the needs of his students. In 1932 his class lectures were published in two volumes as Reformed Dogmatics. A revised and expanded edition appeared in 1938, a single volume of 784 pages entitled Systematic Theology. This is the volume for which he is best known. In addition to this standard work covering the six main branches (loci) of systematic theology, Berkhof added an Introductory Volume to Systematic Theology (1932) on prolegomena issues, which was also subsequently revised and enlarged. He also added a volume on the History of Christian Doctrines (1937), which traced the development of Christian doctrine from the apostolic fathers to the liberalism of Schleiermacher and Ritschl.

In his work on systematic theology Berkhof followed in the line of John Calvin and embraced the development of Reformed theology by the Dutch theologians Abraham Kuyper and Herman Bavinck. The specific influence of the latter's four-volume Gereformeerde Dogmatiek is most evident. Berkhof was not an original or a speculative theologian; he followed well-trying paths. His major significance lay in setting forth the riches of the Reformed heritage in contrast to the major theologies of history. His writing was solid and well organized for classroom use as well as for private study. His Systematic Theology has been widely used in theological seminaries and Bible institutes throughout the United States and Bible institutes throughout the United States and Canada, as well as in conservative circles throughout the world. A Spanish translation appeared in 1969.

In 1921 Berkhof delivered the Stone Lectures at Princeton Theological Seminary; they were published under the title Kingdom of God (1951). He took an active part in the life of the church and published extensively in the denominational papers. The following monographs deserve special mention: Assurance of Faith (1928), Vicarious Atonement Through Christ (1936), Principles of Biblical Interpretation (1950), Aspects of Liberalism (1951), Second Coming of Christ (1953), and Riches of Divine Grace (1948), the latter a collection of ten sermons.

F. H. KLOOSTER

See also BAVINCK, HERMAN; KUYPER, ABRAHAM; REFORMED TRADITION.

Bibliography. J. D. Bratt, Dutch Calvinism in Modern America; P. De Klerk, ed., Bibliography of the Writings of the Professors of Calvin Theological Seminary; H. Zwaanstra, "Louis Berkhof," in Reformed Theology in America, D. F. Wells, ed.

Berkouwer, Gerrit Cornelis (b. 1903). Dutch Reformed theologian. Berkouwer was born on June 8, 1903, in Amsterdam, grew up in a devout Reformed Christian home, and received his theological training at the Free University of Amsterdam (Ph.D., 1932). After holding pastorates in the province of Friesland and then in Amsterdam, Berkouwer began teaching at the Free University in 1940, assuming the Chair of Dogmatics in 1945, a position he held until his retirement in 1973.

Berkouwer was strongly influenced by Herman Bavinck and Abraham Kuyper and their presuppositional theological stance. Over against the liberalism of his day, which had become anthropocentric, and neo-orthodoxy, which had separated God from the world, Berkouwer emphasized the reformation starting points of sola fide and sola Scriptura. This set him in opposition to every form of negative biblical criticism and any view that gave normative status to any human act, even the act of faith itself. Scripture alone must be our norm, and faith is always a response of the human being to God, who calls out through the Holy Spirit.

These emphases form the central themes of Berkouwer's fourteen-volume Studies in Dogmatics (1952–76), perhaps the most monumental evangelical theological project of this century. Written in almost conversational style, these volumes deal with topics of theological concern, such as divine election, faith and sanctification, Holy Scripture, and the church, rather than presenting a tightly argued system of thought.

Berkouwer was a Protestant observer at the Second Vatican Council and wrote a carefully reasoned analysis of Roman Catholic thought following that, Second Vatican Council and the New Theology. This followed his earlier, more critical, Conflict with Rome (ET, 1958). Berkouwer also mellowed somewhat in his appraisal of Karl Barth from his harsher Karl Barth (1937) to Triumph of Grace in the Theology of Karl Barth (ET, 1956).

Perhaps the outstanding Reformed theologian of this generation, Berkouwer never wavered from his commitment to the principles of Scripture, faith, and grace alone.

W. A. ELWELL

Bibliography. K. Runia, "Gerrit Berkouwer" in NDT 89–90; G. L. Watts, HET 193–208; L. B. Smedes, "G. C. Berkouwer" in Creative Minds in Contemporary Theology, 63–98.

Bernard of Clairvaux (1090–1153). The best-known and most widely acclaimed man of his day, canonized in 1174, and made doctor of the church in 1830. Preeminently a monk, Bernard founded the monastery at Clairvaux but was active all his life along a broad spectrum of endeavor. He helped to heal the papal schism of 1130; was the "hammer of heretics" including Henry of Lausanne, Arnold of Brescia, and Peter Abelard; wrote voluminous mystical, theological, and devotional works; and carried on an extensive personal correspondence with emperors, popes, wayward monks, and theologians.

His theology was deeply appreciated by both Luther and Calvin, the latter quoting only Augustine more frequently. As a man of action, contemplation, mystical experience, doctrinal orthodoxy, and administrative skill, Bernard was, for Dante, the theological personification of the "medieval synthesis." In Paradise he is the symbol of that contemplation through which man is given the vision of God; it is he who replaces Beatrice as guide in the final steps of salvation. Bernard's mysticism is largely devoid of any Gnostic and Manichaean quality of later fourteenth- and fifteenth-century mystics.

Bernard was the official preacher of the Second Crusade, and its outcome was bitterly disappointing to him. His devotion to the Virgin

Bernard of Clairvaux

Mary gave great impetus to that movement, which previously had been relatively insignificant in the West. His theology is marked more by ardent piety and synthesis of the best of his age than by brilliance or originality. He was at times both impetuous and obstinate, but his selfless and passionate commitment to his vocation seems to give his work and life an uncommon authority.

Among hymns attributed to him are "Jesus, the Very Thought of Thee," "O Sacred Head Now Wounded," and "Jesus, Thou Joy of Loving Hearts."

C. F. ALLISON

See also MYSTICISM; SPIRITUALITY.

Bibliography. G. R. Evans, Mind of St. Bernard of Clairvaux; É. Gilson, Mystical Theology of Saint Bernard; B. S. James, St. Bernard of Clairvaux; A. J. Luddy, Life and Teaching of St. Bernard; W. W. Williams, Studies in St. Bernard of Clairvaux.

Beza, Theodore (1519–1605). The undisputed leader in Geneva as John Calvin's successor. While his spiritual hegemony was unmarked by significant departures from Calvin's direction, Beza did differ in particular ecclesiastical emphases.

Born in Vézelay, Burgundy, into a well-to-do family, Beza early displayed academic ability and was sent to study under Melchior Wolmar, a crypto-Lutheran professor in Orléans. He became recognized as a major Latin poet after publication of a collection of humanistic poems, Juvenalia. His conversion followed a critical illness, after which he became identified with the Reformation movement.

Beza served as professor of Greek at the Academy of Lausanne from 1549 to 1558, when he was called to the post of both rector and professor at the newly formed Academy of Geneva. Being also an ecumenist, he served tirelessly to bring about a united Protestantism.

Beza's chief contributions to the Swiss Reformation were securing Calvin's gains in Geneva and solidifying the Presbyterian system. He freely borrowed from both Calvin and Martin Bucer. In his pivotal doctrine of the church, Beza, following Bucer, distinguished three marks of the true church: the Word of God, the twofold sacraments, and discipline. He viewed the church as the company of the elect. Election was not, however, the central focus of Beza's ecclesiology. Rather, following Calvin, he treated election under the rubric of the person and work of Christ. Yet Beza created tension in this doctrine by treating it elsewhere in a scholastic manner along rather rigid supralapsarian lines.

Beza posited presbyterian church government as the only acceptable NT policy. He adopted Calvin's view that this order comprises pastors, doctors, elders, and deacons, but he applied this system in the various synodical and local levels more rigidly than did Calvin. Beza's doctrine of the church may be found in his three-volume collection Tractationes Theologicae, especially in his Ad Tractationem de Ministrorum Evangelii . . . Responsio, in which he takes Anglican prelacy to task.

Other key scholarly works are his 1582 edition of the Greek NT and his three-volume Histoire ecclésiastique des églises réformées . . . de France. Concern for the welfare of the church prompted volumes of sermons, commentary, a French translation of many psalms for the Huguenot Psalter, a joint translation with Calvin of the French NT, and an influential confession of faith.

J. H. HALL

Bibliography. H. M. Baird, Theodore Beza: The Counsellor of the French Reformation, 1519–1605; J. S. Bray, Theodore Beza's Doctrine of Predestination; R. Letham, "Theodore Beza: A Reassessment," SJT 40:25–40; T. Maruyama, Reform of the True Church: The Ecclesiology of Theodore Beza; J. Raitt, Eucharistic Theology of Theodore Beza.

Bible. The English word Bible is derived from the Greek biblion, "roll" or "book." (While biblion is really a diminutive of biblos, it has lost this sense in the NT. See Revelation 10:2 where biblaridion is used for a "little scroll.") More exactly, a biblion was a roll of papyrus or byblus, a reed-like plant whose inner bark was dried and fashioned into a writing material widely used in the ancient world.

The word as we use it today, however, has a far more significant connotation than the Greek biblion. While biblion was somewhat neutral—it could be used to designate books of magic (Acts 19:19) or a certificate of divorce (Mark 10:4) as well as sacred books—the word Bible refers to the Book par excellence, the recognized record of divine revelation.

Although this meaning is ecclesiastical in origin, its roots go back into the OT. In Daniel 9:2 (LXX) ta biblia refers to the prophetic writings. In the Prologue to Sirach it refers generally to the OT Scriptures. This usage passed into the Christian church (2 Clem. 14:2) and about the turn of the fifth century was extended to include the entire body of canonical writings as we now have them. The expression ta biblia passed into the vocabulary of the Western church, and in the thirteenth century, by what Westcott calls a "happy solecism," the neuter plural came to be regarded as a feminine singular, and in this form the term passed into the languages of modern Europe. This significant change from plural to singular reflected the growing conception of the Bible as one utterance of God rather than a multitude of voices speaking for him.

The process by which the various books in the Bible were brought together and their value as sacred Scripture recognized is referred to as the history of the canon. Contrary to prevailing critical opinion, there existed, prior to the exile, a large body of sacred literature. Moses wrote down “everything the LORD had said” in the “Book of the Covenant” (Exod. 21–23; 24:4, 7). Joshua’s farewell address was written “in the Book of the Law of God” (Josh. 24:26). Samuel explained the regulations of the kingship and “wrote them down on a scroll” (1 Sam. 10:25). “This is what the LORD says” was the common preface to the utterances of the prophets.

This revelatory literature, although not reaching a fixed form until late in the second century B.C., was nevertheless regarded from the very first as the revealed will of God and therefore binding upon the people. The “oracles of God” were held in highest esteem, and this attitude toward the Scriptures was quite naturally carried over into the early church. Few will deny that Jesus regarded the OT as an inspired record of God’s self-revelation in history. He repeatedly appealed to the Scriptures as authoritative (e.g., Matt. 19:4; 22:29). The early church maintained this same attitude toward the OT, but alongside of it they began to place the words of the Lord. While the OT canon had been formally closed, the coming of Christ had, in a sense, opened it again. God was once again speaking. Since the cross was the central redemptive act of God in history, the NT became a logical necessity. Thus the voice of the apostles, and later their writings, were accepted as the divine commentary on the Christ event.

Viewed as a historical process, the formation of the NT canon occupied some 350 years. In the first century the various books were written and began to be circulated through the churches. The rise of heresy in the second century—especially in the form of Gnosticism with its outstanding spokesman, Marcion—was a powerful impulse toward the formation of a definite canon. A sifting process began in which a valid Scripture distinguished itself from Christian literature in general on the basis of such criteria as apostolic authorship, reception by the churches, and consistency of doctrine with what the church already possessed. The canon was ultimately certified at the Council of Carthage (397).

The claim of the Bible to divine origin is amply justified by its historical influence. Its manuscripts are numbered in the thousands. The NT had barely been put together before translations were made in Latin, Syriac, and Egyptian. Today there is not a language in the civilized world that does not have the Word of God. No other book has been so carefully studied or had so much written on it. Its spiritual influence cannot be estimated. It is preeminently the Book—God’s word in humankind’s language.

R. H. MOUNCE

See also BIBLE, AUTHORITY OF; BIBLE, CANON OF; BIBLE, INERRANCY AND INFALLIBILITY OF; BIBLE, INSPIRATION OF; WORD, WORD OF GOD, WORD OF THE LORD.

Bibliography. P. R. Ackroyd et al., eds., Cambridge History of the Bible; J. Barr, Bible in the Modern World; F. F. Bruce, Books and the Parchments; A. Harnack, Bible Reading in the Early Church; N. O. Hatch and M. A. Noll, Bible in America; D. E. Nineham, ed., Church’s Use of the Bible; A. Richardson, Bible in the Age of Science; B. Smalley, Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages; B. F. Westcott, Bible in the Church.

Bible, Authority of. Authority is the right and power to command, enforce laws, exact obedience, determine or judge (American Heritage Dictionary 1979, 89). In reference to people, authority is the right and capacity of individuals to perform what they will; and by virtue of their position or office, they can command obedience. Authority also has an application to words spoken or written whose accuracy has been established and whose information can consequently be trusted.

In the NT the Greek word exousia is sometimes translated “right” (e.g., John 1:12), or “power” (KJV, e.g., John 19:10), and sometimes “authority” (e.g., Matt. 7:29; 8:9; 9:6; 21:23; John 5:27; 17:2; Acts 9:14). What emerges from its various occurrences is that the possession of exousia is of a power held by right. In some contexts the emphasis falls on the authority the possession of power rightfully gives; in other instances it falls on the reality of the power that conditions the right use of authority.

Authority may be bestowed or inherent. When Jesus was asked by what authority he taught and acted (Matt. 21:23–24) the implication was that his authority was external. His questioners supposed him to be exercising a representative or conferred authority only. On the other hand, in the declaration that Jesus taught with authority (Matt. 7:29) and “with authority and power” expelled unclean spirits (Luke 4:36), the locus of such authority was in his own being. It was, that is to say, an ontological authority. Thus, while the authority for his words and acts was not his own but came from the one who sent him (John 14:10; 17:8), yet these same words and acts had their raison d’être in his own person because they were grounded in his filial relationship with God his Father.

As in the case of Christ, in whom both aspects of authority, the bestowed and the inherent, combined, so is it with the Bible. Because the Bible points beyond itself to God, it has a conferred authority. Yet the Bible has a real authority in itself as the authentic embodiment of God’s self-disclosure. Liberal theologians refuse the Bible this ontological authority, granting it at most a borrowed authority. Some, like Karl Barth, allow this authority to be bestowed by God while insisting that the Bible itself is essentially a human product. Others—e.g., Rudolf Bultmann and Paul Tillich—regard the Bible as a fallible collection of religious writings on which the early church arbitrarily imposed an authority that evangelical piety has continued to uphold. But by refusing to the Bible an ontological authority, liberal theology uncovers its fundamental inconsistency, thereby pronouncing its own condemnation. For insofar as it wishes the acceptance of its own unbiblical speculations, it has to decry the authority of the Bible. Yet insofar as it is concerned to retain the label Christian, it appeals to the Bible as its authoritative source.

An approach to the subject of biblical authority must begin with God himself. For in him all authority is finally located. And he is his own authority, for there is nothing outside him on which his authority is founded. Thus, in making his promise to Abraham, God pledged his own name since he had no one greater by whom to swear (Heb. 6:13). This authority of God is, then, the authority of what God is, which is made known in his self-disclosure, since only in his revelation can God be known. Revelation is therefore the key to God's authority, so that the two, revelation and authority, may be regarded as two sides of the same reality. In revelation God declares his authority.

The prophets of the OT found their certainty in God's revelation. In uttering their message they knew themselves to be declaring God's authoritative will. As God's ambassadors they proclaimed what God required of his people. For Christian faith Christ is known as God's final revelation. In him God's imperial authority is most graciously expressed. Thus is Christ the sum of all that is divinely authoritative for the life of humankind. But this progressive unveiling of God, which culminated in Christ, has been given perpetual form in the biblical writings. Scripture consequently participates in God's authority, so that Christ's relation thereto is decisive as vindicating its authority.

Jesus read "all the Scriptures" of the OT as a prophetic outline of what he came to accomplish; and he took its very language to be the natural, and at the same time the supernatural, expression of his Father's will. By his attitude to and use of the OT, Christ truly validated its divinity. With the same conviction of its divine authority the NT writers accepted it and quoted it; and in its light they themselves, as the inspired interpreters of the saving significance of Christ's person and work, put their own writings on an equal footing with the OT Scriptures as divinely authoritative. In the words of his elect apostles, the full measure of God's revelation in Christ was brought to completion so that Paul could declare, "We have been speaking in the sight of God as those in Christ" (2 Cor. 12:19). Thus do the apostles claim an absolute authority for their writings (e.g., 2 Cor. 10:11; 1 Thess. 2:13; 2 Thess. 2:15; 3:14).

The authority of the Bible is established by its own claims. It is the word of God. Such declarations as, "This is what the LORD says," or its equivalent, occur so frequently in the OT that it can confidently be asserted that the whole account is dominated by the claim. The NT writers also refer to these Scriptures as having God for their source. In the NT itself both Christ and the gospel are spoken of as "the word of God" and so demonstrate the fact that the tie between the two is a vital and necessary one. The gospel, in its central content and many aspects, through the action of the Holy Spirit, is brought into written form by Christ's appointees as God's authoritative word for the church and in the world. Both testaments therefore belong together under the one designation, "the word of God." As God's word the Bible consequently carries in itself God's authority.

It is the Scripture of truth. In the OT the Hebrew word 'emet, rendered "truth" in the KJV and frequently translated "faithfulness" in the NIV (e.g., Ps. 108:4; Hos. 2:20), is constantly predicated of God. God is absolutely faithful (cf. Ps. 117:2), and this absolute faithfulness of God assures his complete trustworthiness. Truthfulness as an attribute of God carries over to characterize all his works (cf. Ps. 57:3) and especially his word. Thus his word is both true and faithful (cf. Ps. 119:89). The whole NT, then, as "the word of God" is to be designated "the Book of Truth" (Dan. 10:21). It partakes of God's own character, of the fundamental truthfulness of him who declares himself to be "not a man, that he should lie" (Num. 23:19; cf. 1 Sam. 15:29; Ps. 89:35). Psalm 31:5 declares that the Lord is the God of truth, while Psalm 119:160 affirms his words as true. In both places the same Hebrew term is employed. The same truth is thus predicated of God and his word.

In the NT the word alētheia has the same fundamental meaning of genuineness and truthfulness as opposed to what is false and unreliable. So God is both true (John 3:33; 7:28; 8:26; 17:3; 1 Thess. 1:9; 1 John 5:20) and truthful (Rom. 3:7; 15:8; et al.). And as God is, so too is his word. His word is truth (John 17:17). The gospel is presented with truthful words (2 Cor. 6:7; cf. Col. 1:5; James 1:18, and the truth of the gospel (Gal. 2:5) is identical with the truth of God (Rom. 3:7).

The Bible is, then, the book of God's truth; and such truth is, as the Westminster Catechism says, "infallible truth." As it is wholly trustworthy regarding its truth, so must it be wholly reliable regarding its facts. And because it is both, it is our divine authority in all things that pertain to life and godliness.

H. D. McDONALD

See also BIBLE, INERRANCY AND INFALLIBILITY OF; BIBLE, INSPIRATION OF.

Bibliography. R. Abba, Nature and Authority of the Bible; D. A. Carson and J. D. Woodbridge, eds., Hermeneutics, Authority, and Canon; H. Cunliffe-Jones, Authority of the Biblical Revelation; R. E. Davies, Problem of Authority in the Continental Reformers; C. H. Dodd, Authority of the Bible; P. T. Forsyth, Principle of Authority; N. Geldenhuys, Supreme Authority; J. Goldingay, Models for Scripture; F. J. A. Hort, Authority of the Bible; G. H. Hospers, Reformed Principle of Authority; R. C. Johnson, Authority in Protestant Theology; D. M. Lloyd-Jones, Authority; H. D. McDonald, Theories of Revelation; L. Oswald, Truth of the Bible; B. Ramm, Patterns of Authority; A. Richardson and W. Schweitzer, eds., Biblical Authority for Today; J. Rogers, ed., Biblical Authority; J. W. C. Wand, Authority of the Scriptures; B. B. Warfield, Inspiration and Authority of the Bible; R. R. Williams, Authority in the Apostolic Age; N. T. Wright, "How Can the Bible Be Authoritative?" Vox Evangelica 21:7-32.

Bible, Canon of. The term canon in Christianity refers to a group of books acknowledged by the early church as the rule of faith and practice. Deriving from the Greek kanōn, which designated a carpenter's rule (possibly borrowed from a Hebrew term, qāneh, referring to a measuring reed six cubits long), the word has been used to identify those books considered to be spiritually superlative, by which all others were measured and found to be of secondary value in general church use.

Both Jews and Christians have canons of scripture. The Jewish canon consists of thirty-nine books; the Christian canon consists of sixty-six for Protestants and seventy-three for Catholics (whose canon includes some of the Apocrypha, regarded by most as of deuterocanonical status). Sacred books are found in all literate religions. The book is generally secondary to the faith, the book or books being a deposit of the faith. The use of a canon varies in world religions—for liturgy, renewal of faith, evangelism, or authority in faith and practice.

The complete process by which these books came to be generally regarded as exclusively authoritative is not known for either the Hebrew or Christian canon. That it transpired under the influence of the Spirit of God is commonly accepted among Christian people. Inspired literature formed only a part of the total religious literature of God's people at any time in their history, and only a portion of the inspired literature finally emerged as canonical in all parts of the ancient world. All inspired literature was authoritative, but it was not all equally beneficial to local groups and thus did not achieve universal or empire-wide acceptance. That is to say, local lists of books were not necessarily identical with the general list, the canon, which eventually consisted of the books common to all the local lists.

Old Testament Canon. The faith of Israel existed independently of a book for hundreds of years between the time of Abraham and Moses. None of the patriarchs before Moses is recorded as having written sacred literature, although the art of writing was well developed at that time in the homeland of Abraham, as the Ebla tablets have dramatically reaffirmed. The Sumerians and Babylonians already had highly developed law codes, and accounts of such events as the great flood appear in their literature. Moses, however, was the first known Hebrew to commit sacred history to writing (Exod. 24:4, 7).

Subsequent to the composition of the Pentateuch, it is recorded that Joshua wrote in the Book of the Law of God (Josh. 24:26). The law was always considered to be from God (Deut. 31:24; Josh. 1:8). The other two divisions of the Hebrew canon, the prophets and writings, were eventually selected out of a larger literature, some of which is mentioned in the OT itself ("Book of the Wars of the LORD," Num. 21:14; "Book of Jasher," Josh. 10:13; "book of the annals of Solomon," 1 Kings 11:41; "records of Samuel the seer, the records of Nathan the prophet, and the records of Gad the seer," 1 Chron. 29:29, et al.; fifteen or more such books are named in the OT).

The oldest surviving list of the canonical scriptures of the OT comes from about A.D. 170, the product of a Christian scholar named Melito of Sardis, who made a trip to Palestine to determine both the order and number of books in the Hebrew Bible. Neither his order nor his contents agree exactly with our modern English Bibles. There is no agreement in order or content in the existing manuscripts of Hebrew, Greek, or Latin Bibles. The modern English Protestant Bible follows the order of the Latin Vulgate and the content of the Hebrew Bible. It is important to remember that the OT was more than a thousand years in writing—the oldest parts being written by Moses and the latest after the Babylonian exile. During the entire period of biblical history, therefore, the Jews lived their faith without a closed canon of Scriptures, such a canon thus not being essential to the practice of the Jewish religion during that time. Why then were the books finally collected into a canon? They were brought together evidently as an act of God's providence, historically prompted by the emergence of apocryphal and pseudepigraphical literature in the intertestamental period and the increasing need to know what the limits of divine revelation were. By the time of Jesus the OT, called Tanaach by modern Judaism, consisted of the Law, Prophets, and Writings (Luke 24:44). Opinions about the full extent of the canon seem not to have been finalized until sometime after the first century A.D.

Bible, Canon of

New Testament Canon. The earliest list of NT books containing only twenty-seven appeared in A.D. 367 in a letter of Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria. The order was Gospels, Acts, General Epistles, Pauline Epistles, Revelation. In the first century Peter spoke of Paul writing "in all his letters" (2 Pet. 3:16), and by the early second century the letters of Ignatius were being collected. Evidence of exclusive collections being made in the second century is seen in the writings of Justin Martyr, who argues for only the four canonical Gospels. Discussion about authorship and authority of various letters appears in writers of the second century, and one canonical list that has been dated from the second to the fourth century, the Muratorian Canon, differentiates between books that are suitable to be read in worship and those that should be read only in private devotion.

The fact that other books formed a larger deposit out of which the twenty-seven eventually emerged is seen in the reference to a prior letter to the Corinthians in 1 Corinthians 5:9, a letter to the Laodiceans in Colossians 4:16, and the inclusion of 1 and 2 Clement in the fifth-century manuscript of the Greek NT, Codex Alexandrinus, as well as Barnabas and Hermas in the fourth-century Codex Sinaiticus. Eusebius cited a letter from the second-century bishop of Corinth, Dionysius, stating that Clement's letter was read in the church there "from time to time for our admonition" (Ecclesiastical History 4.23.11).

The formation of the NT canon was not a conciliar decision. The earliest ecumenical council, Nicea in 325, did not discuss the canon. The first undisputed decision of a council on the canon seems to be from Carthage in 397, which decreed that nothing should be read in the church under the name of the divine Scriptures except the canonical writings. The twenty-seven books of the NT were then listed as the canonical writings. The council could list only those books that were generally regarded by the consensus of use as properly a canon. The formation of the NT canon must, therefore, be regarded as a process rather than an event, and a historical rather than a biblical matter. The coming of the Word of God in print is only slightly more capable of explication than the coming of the Word of God incarnate.

J. R. McRAY

Bibliography. P. R. Ackroyd and C. F. Evans, eds., Cambridge History of the Bible; F. F. Bruce, Canon of Scripture; W. Brueggemann, Creative Word; B. Childs, New Testament as Canon; W. R. Farmer, Jesus and the Gospel; E. J. Goodspeed, Formation of the New Testament; R. M. Grant, Formation of the New Testament; C. R. Gregory, Canon and Text of the New Testament; G. Hahneman, Muratorian Fragment and the Development of the Canon; R. L. Harris, Inspiration and Canoncity of the Bible; H. Koester, Ancient Christian Gospels; S. Z. Leiman, Canon and Massorah of the Hebrew Bible; L. McDonald, Formation of the Christian Biblical Canon; D. Meade, Pseudonymity and Canon; B. Metzger, Canon of the New Testament; H. E. Ryle, Canon of the Old Testament; J. A. Sanders, "Text and Canon: Concepts and Methods," JBL 98:5–29; Torah and Canon; A. Souter, Text and Canon of the New Testament; A. C. Sundberg Jr., "Canon Muratori: A Fourth Century List," HTR 66:1–41; H. von Campenhausen, Formation of the Christian Bible; B. F. Westcott, General Survey of the History of the Canon of the New Testament.

Bible, Inerrancy and Infallibility of. The question of authority is central for any theology. Since Protestant theology has located authority in the Bible, the nature of biblical authority has been a fundamental concern. The reformation passed to its heirs the belief that ultimate authority rests not in reason or a pope, but in an inspired Scripture. Thus, within conservative Protestantism the question of inerrancy has been much debated.

The two words most often used to express the nature of scriptural authority are inerrant and infallible. Though these two terms are, on etymological grounds, approximately synonymous, they are used differently. In Roman Catholic theology inerrant is applied to the Bible, infallible to the church, particularly the teaching function of pope and magisterium. Since Protestants reject the infallibility of both the pope and the church, the word has been used increasingly of the Scriptures. More recently infallible has been championed by those who hold to what B. B. Warfield called limited inspiration but what today is better called limited inerrancy. They limit the Bible's inerrancy to matters of faith and practice, particularly soteriological issues. Stephen T. Davis reflects this tendency when he gives a stipulative definition for infallibility: The Bible makes no false or misleading statements about matters of faith and practice. In this article the two terms shall be used as virtually synonymous.

Definition of Inerrancy. Inerrancy is the view that when all the facts become known, they will demonstrate that the Bible in its original autographs and correctly interpreted is entirely true and never false in all it affirms, whether that relates to doctrine or ethics or to the social, physical, or life sciences.

A number of points in this definition deserve discussion. Inerrancy is not presently demonstrable. Human knowledge is limited in two ways. First, because of our finitude and sinfulness, human beings misinterpret the data that exists. For instance, wrong conclusions can be drawn from inscriptions or texts. Second, we do not possess all the data that comes to bear on the Bible. Some of that data may be lost forever, or they may be awaiting discovery by archeologists. By claiming that inerrancy will be shown to be true after all the facts are known, one recognizes this. The defender of inerrancy argues only that there will be no conflict in the end.

Further, inerrancy applies equally to all parts of the Bible as originally written. This means that no present manuscript or copy of Scripture, no matter how accurate, can be called inerrant.

This definition also relates inerrancy to hermeneutics. Hermeneutics is the science of biblical interpretation. It is necessary to interpret a text properly, to know its correct meaning, before asserting that what a text says is false. Moreover, a key hermeneutical principle taught by the Reformers is the analogy of faith, which demands that apparent contradictions be harmonized if possible. If a passage appears to permit two interpretations, one of which conflicts with another passage and one of which does not, the latter must be adopted.

Probably the most important aspect of this definition is its definition of inerrancy in terms of truth and falsity rather than in terms of error. It has been far more common to define inerrancy as “without error,” but a number of reasons argue for relating inerrancy to truth and falsity. To use “error” is to negate a negative idea. Truth, moreover, is a property of sentences, not words. Certain problems are commonly associated with views related to “error.” Finally, “error” has been defined by some in the contemporary debate in such a way that almost every book ever written will qualify as inerrant. Error, they say, is willful deception; since the Bible never willfully deceives its readers, it is inerrant. This would mean that almost all other books are also inerrant, since few authors intentionally deceive their readers.

Some have suggested that the Bible itself might help in setting the meaning of error. At first this appears to be a good suggestion, but there are reasons to reject it. First, inerrancy and error are theological rather than biblical terms. This means that the Bible applies neither word to itself. This does not mean that it is inappropriate to use these words of the Bible. It is, however, more difficult to define such words. Second, a study of the Hebrew and Greek words for error may be classified into three groups: cases of error where intentionality cannot be involved (e.g., Job 6:24; 19:4), cases of error where intentionality may or may not be involved (e.g., 2 Sam. 6:7), and cases where intentionality must be involved (e.g., Judg. 16:10–12). Error, then, has nothing to do with intentionality.

Admittedly, precision of statement and measurement will not be up to modern standards, but as long as what is said is true, inerrancy is not in doubt.

Finally, the definition states that inerrancy covers all areas of knowledge. Inerrancy is not limited to matters of soteriological or ethical concern. It should be clear that biblical affirmations about faith and ethics are based on God’s action in history. No neat dichotomy can be made between the theological and factual.

Arguments for Inerrancy. The primary arguments for inerrancy are biblical, historical, and epistemological in nature.

The Biblical Argument. At the heart of the belief in an inerrant, infallible Bible is the testimony of Scripture itself. There is some disagreement as to whether Scripture teaches this doctrine explicitly or implicitly. The consensus today is that inerrancy is taught implicitly.

First, the Bible teaches its own inspiration, and this requires inerrancy. The Scriptures are the breath of God (2 Tim. 3:16), which guarantees they are without error.

Second, in Deuteronomy 13:1–5 and 18:20–22 Israel is given criteria for distinguishing God’s message and messenger from false prophecies and prophets. One mark of a divine message is total and absolute truthfulness. A valid parallel can be made between the prophet and the Bible. The prophet’s word was usually oral, although it might be recorded and included in a book; the writers of Scripture communicated God’s word in written form. Both were instruments of divine communication, and in both cases the human element was an essential ingredient.

Third, the Bible teaches its own authority, and this requires inerrancy. The two most commonly cited passages are Matthew 5:17–20 and John 10:34–35. Both record the words of Jesus. In the former Jesus said that heaven and earth will pass away before the smallest detail of the law fails to be fulfilled. The law’s authority rests on the fact that every minute detail will be fulfilled. In John 10:34–35 Jesus says that Scripture cannot be broken and so is absolutely binding. While it is true that both passages emphasize the Bible’s authority, this authority can only be justified by or grounded in inerrancy. Something that contains errors cannot be absolutely authoritative.

Fourth, Scripture uses Scripture in a way that supports its inerrancy. At times an entire argument rests on a single word (e.g., “gods” in John 10:34–35 and Ps. 82:6), the tense of a verb (e.g., the present tense in Matt. 22:32), and the difference between a singular and a plural noun (e.g., “seed” in Gal. 3:16). If the Bible’s inerrancy does not extend to every detail, these arguments lose their force. The use of any word may be a matter of whim and may even be an error. It might be objected that the NT does not always cite OT texts with precision—that as a matter of fact precision is the exception rather than the rule. This is a fair response, and an adequate answer requires more space than is available here. A careful study of the way in which the OT is used in the NT, however, demonstrates that the NT writers quoted the OT not cavalierly but quite carefully.

Bible, Inerrancy and Infallibility of Finally, inerrancy follows from what the Bible says about God's character. Repeatedly, the Scriptures teach that God cannot lie (Num. 23:19; 1 Sam. 15:29; Titus 1:2; Heb. 6:18). If, then, the Bible is from God and his character is behind it, it must be inerrant and infallible.

The Historical Argument. A second argument for biblical inerrancy is that this has been the view of the church throughout its history. One must remember that if inerrancy was part of the corpus of orthodox doctrine, then in many discussions it was assumed rather than defended. Further, the term inerrancy may be a more modern way of expressing the belief in the English language. Nevertheless, in each period of the church's history one can cite clear examples of those who affirm inerrancy.

In the early church Augustine writes, "I have learned to yield this respect and honor only to the canonical books of Scripture: of these alone do I most firmly believe that the authors were completely free from error."

The two great Reformers, Luther and Calvin, bear testimony to biblical infallibility. Luther says, "But everyone, indeed, knows that at times they [the fathers] have erred as men will; therefore I am ready to trust them only when they prove their opinions from Scripture, which has never erred." While Calvin does not use the phrase "without error," there can be little question that he embraced inerrancy. Of the writers of the Gospels he comments, "The Spirit of God . . . appears purposely to have regulated their style in such a manner, that they all wrote one and the same history, with the most perfect agreement, but in different ways."

In modern times one could cite the works of Princeton theologians Archibald Alexander, Charles Hodge, A. A. Hodge, and B. B. Warfield as modern formulators and defenders of the full inerrancy and infallibility of Scripture.

The biblical and historical arguments are clearly more important than the two that follow. Should they be shown to be false, inerrancy would suffer a mortal blow.

The Epistemological Argument. Because epistemologies differ, this argument has been formulated in at least two very different ways. For some, knowledge claims must, to be justified, be indubitable or incorrigible. It is not enough that a belief is true and is believed on good grounds. It must be beyond doubt and question. For such an epistemology inerrancy is essential. Inerrancy guarantees the incorrigibility of every statement of Scripture. Therefore, the contents of Scripture can be objects of knowledge.

Epistemologies that do not require such a high standard of certitude result in this argument for inerrancy: If the Bible is not inerrant, then any claim it makes may be false. This means not that all claims are false, but that some might be. But so much of the Bible is beyond direct verification. Thus, only its inerrancy assures the knower that his or her claim is justified.

The Slippery Slope Argument. Finally, some see inerrancy as so fundamental that those who give it up will soon surrender other central Christian doctrines. A denial of inerrancy starts one down a slope that is slippery and ends in even greater error.

Objections to Inerrancy. The arguments for inerrancy have not gone unchallenged. In what follows, responses by those who object to each argument will be given and answers will be offered.

The Slippery Slope Argument. This argument is both the least important and most disliked by those who do not hold to inerrancy. What kind of relationship exists between the doctrine of inerrancy and other central Christian doctrines, they ask, that the denial of all inerrancy will of necessity lead to a denial of other doctrines? Is it a logical relationship? Is it a causal or psychological relationship? On close examination, none of these seems to be the case. Many people who do not affirm inerrancy are quite clearly orthodox on other matters of doctrine.

What has been said to this point is true. It should be noted, however, that numerous cases do support the slippery slope argument. For many individuals and institutions the surrender of their commitment to inerrancy has been a first step to greater error.

The Epistemological Argument. The epistemological argument has been characterized by some as an example of overbelief. A single error in the Bible should not lead one to conclude that it contains no truth. If one finds one's spouse wrong on some matter, one would be wrong to conclude that one's spouse can never be trusted on any matter.

This objection, however, overlooks two very important matters. First, while it is true that one error in Scripture would not justify the conclusion that everything in it is false, it would call everything in Scripture into question. We could not be sure that everything in it is true. Since the theological is based on the historical and since the historical is open to error, how can one be sure that the theological is true? There is no direct means for verification. Second, while the case of the errant spouse is true as far as it goes, it does not account for all the issues involved in inerrancy. One's spouse does not claim to be inerrant; the Bible does. One's spouse is not omniscient and omnipotent; the God of the Bible is. God knows everything, and he can communicate with humans.

The Historical Argument. Those who reject inerrancy argue that this doctrine is an innovation, primarily of the Princeton theologians in the nineteenth century. Throughout the centuries the church believed in the Bible's authority but not its total inerrancy. The doctrine of inerrancy grew out of an apologetic need. Classical liberalism and its growing commitment to an increasingly radical biblical criticism made the orthodox view of Scripture vulnerable. Therefore, the Princeton theologians devised the doctrine of total inerrancy to stem the rising tide of liberalism. This represented a departure from the views of their predecessors in the orthodox tradition. Calvin, for example, speaks of God “accommodating” himself to humans in the communication of his revelation. Calvin also says that the Bible’s teaching does not need to be harmonized with science, and that anyone who wishes to prove to the unbeliever that the Bible is God’s Word is foolish.

These objections to the historical argument do not do justice to the evidence. They fail to reckon with the host of clear affirmations of inerrancy by Christian theologians throughout the church’s history, only a few of which were given above.

Moreover, the treatment of figures like Calvin is unfair. While Calvin talks about accommodation, he does not mean accommodation to human error. He means that God condescended to speak in language that finite human beings could understand. In one place he says that God spoke only baby talk. He never implies that what God said is in error. On matters of science and proof, the same sort of thing is true. Calvin nowhere says that the Scriptures cannot be harmonized with science or that they cannot be proven to be the Word of God. He felt rather that such an exercise is futile in itself because of sin. Hence, he relied on the testimony of the Holy Spirit to the unbeliever. The problem is in humanity, not in the Scriptures or the evidence for their origin. The theologians of the church may have been wrong in their belief, but they did believe in an inerrant Bible.

The Biblical Argument. A common objection to the biblical argument is that the Bible nowhere teaches its own inerrancy. The point seems to be a subtle one. Those who make this point mean that the Bible nowhere says “all Scripture is inerrant” in the way that it teaches “all Scripture is God-breathed” (2 Tim. 3:16). While it is true that no verse says explicitly that Scripture is inerrant, biblical inerrancy is implied by or follows from a number of things the Bible does teach explicitly.

Another objection is that inerrancy is unfalsifiable. Either the standard for error is so high that nothing can qualify (e.g., even contradictions have difficulty in qualifying), or the falsity or truth of scriptural statements cannot be demonstrated until all the facts are known. The doctrine of inerrancy is not, however, unfalsifiable in principle; it is unfalsifiable only at present. Not everything that bears on the truth and falsity of the Bible is yet available. How then is it possible to affirm so strongly the doctrine of inerrancy now? Should one be more cautious or even suspend judgment? The inerrantist wants to be true to what he or she thinks the Bible teaches. And as independent data have become available (e.g., from archeology), they have shown the Bible to be trustworthy.

Another criticism is that inerrancy fails to recognize sufficiently the human element in the writing of Scripture. The Bible teaches that it is a product of human as well as divine authorship. This objection, though, underestimates the divine element. The Bible is a divine-human book. To deemphasize either side of its authorship is a mistake. Furthermore, this criticism is easily misunderstood, implying that humanity requires error. This is false. The spokesmen of God were human, but inspiration kept them from error.

Finally, it has been objected that since the original autographs no longer exist and since the doctrine applies only to them, inerrancy is meaningless. The identification of inerrancy with the original autographs is a neat hedge against disproof.

Limiting inerrancy to the original autographs could be such a hedge, but it need not be. This qualification of inerrancy grows out of the recognition that errors crop up in the transmission of any text. There is, however, a great difference between a text that is initially inerrant and one that is not. The former, through textual criticism, can be restored to a state very near the inerrant original; the latter leaves far more doubt as to what was really said.

It might be argued that the doctrine of inerrant originals directs attention away from the authority of our present texts. Perhaps inerrantists sometimes fail to emphasize the authority of our present texts and versions as they should. Is the remedy, however, to undercut the base for their authority? To deny the authority of the original is to undermine the authority of the Bible the Christian has today.

P. D. FEINBERG

See also BIBLE, AUTHORITY OF; BIBLE, INSPIRATION OF.

Bibliography. For inerrancy: D. G. Bloesch, Holy Scripture; J. M. Boice, ed., Foundation of Biblical Authority; D. A. Carson and J. D. Woodbridge, eds., Scripture and Truth; H. M. Conn, ed., Inerrancy and Hermeneutic; N. L. Geisler, ed., Inerrancy; J. W. Montgomery, ed., God’s Inerrant Word: An International Symposium on the Trustworthiness of Scripture; R. Pache, Inspiration and Authority of Scripture; J. I. Packer, God Has Spoken; B. B. Warfield, Inspiration and Authority of the Bible; J. D. Woodbridge, Biblical Authority: A Critique of the Rogers/McKim Proposal. Against inerrancy: D. M. Beegle, Scripture, Tradition and Infallibility; S. A. Davis, Debate about the Bible; J. Rogers, ed., Biblical Authority; J. Rogers and D. McKim, Interpretation and Authority of the Bible.

Bible, Inspiration of. The theological idea of inspiration, like its correlative revelation, presupposes a personal/divine mind and will—in Hebrew terminology, the “living God”—acting to communicate with other spirits. The Christian belief in inspiration as well as in revelation rests both on explicit biblical assertions and on the pervading mood of the scriptural record.

Bible, Inspiration of

Biblical Terminology. Today the English verb inspire and noun inspiration bear many meanings. This diverse connotation is already present in the Latin inspiro and inspiratio of the Vulgate Bible. But the technical theological sense of inspiration, largely lost in the secular atmosphere of our time, is clearly asserted by the Scriptures with a special view to the sacred writers and their writings. Defined in this sense, inspiration is a supernatural influence of the Holy Spirit upon divinely chosen agents in consequence of which their writings become trustworthy and authoritative.

The word rendered “inspiration” in the KJV is translated “breath” in the NIV. For example, Job 32:8: “But it is the spirit in a man, the breath of the Almighty, that gives him understanding”; and 2 Timothy 3:16: “All Scripture is God-breathed and is useful for teaching, rebuking, correcting and training in righteousness.” The use of “breath” in place of the KJV’s “inspiration,” serves to remind us of the dramatic fact that the Scriptures refer the creation of the universe (Ps. 33:6), the creation of humans for fellowship with God (Gen. 2:7), and the production of the sacred writings (2 Tim. 3:16) to the spiration of God.

Biblical Teaching. Although the term inspiration occurs infrequently in modern versions and paraphrases, the conception itself remains firmly embedded in the scriptural teaching. The word theopneustos (2 Tim. 3:16), literally God-“spirated” or breathed out, affirms that the living God is the author of Scripture and that Scripture is the product of his creative breath. The biblical sense, therefore, rises above the modern tendency to assign the term inspiration merely a dynamic or functional significance (largely through a critical dependence on Schleiermacher’s artificial disjunction that God communicates life, not truths about himself). Geoffrey W. Bromiley, translator of Karl Barth’s Church Dogmatics, points out that whereas Barth emphasizes the “inspiring” of Scripture—that is, the present activity of the Holy Spirit toward hearers and readers—the Bible itself begins further back with the very “inspiredness” of the sacred writings. The writings themselves, as an end product, are assertedly God-breathed. Precisely this conception of inspired writings, and not simply of inspired persons, sets the biblical conception of inspiration pointedly over against pagan representations of inspiration in which heavy stress is placed on the subjective psychological mood and condition of individuals overmastered by divine afflatus.

While the Pauline passage already noted lays proximate emphasis on the spiritual value of Scripture, it conditions this unique ministry upon a divine origin, in direct consequence of which the sacred record is profitable (cf. ōphēleō, “to advantage”) for teaching, rebuking, correcting, and training in righteousness. The apostle Paul does not hesitate to speak of the sacred Hebrew writings as the veritable “words of God” (Rom. 3:2). James S. Stewart does not overstate the matter when he asserts that Paul as a Jew and later as a Christian held the high view that “every word” of the OT was “the authentic voice of God” (A Man in Christ, 39).

Emphasis on the divine origin of Scripture is found also in the Petrine writings. The “word of the prophets” is declared to be “more certain” than that even of the eyewitnesses of Christ’s glory (2 Pet. 1:17–21). A supernatural quality all its own, therefore, inheres in Scripture. While involving the instrumentality of humans, Scripture is affirmed nonetheless to owe its origin not to human but to divine initiative in a series of statements whose proximate emphasis is the reliability of Scripture: (1) “No prophecy of Scripture came about by the prophet’s own interpretation.” Although the passage is somewhat obscure, it provides no support for the Roman Catholic view that the ordinary believer cannot confidently interpret the Bible but must depend on the teaching ministry of the church. While theologically acceptable, the Scofield Reference Bible comment that no individual verse is self-sufficient but the sense of Scripture as a whole is necessary is exegetically irrelevant. Everett F. Harrison notes that ginetai has the meaning of “emerging,” compatibly with 1:21, and that epilyseōs may point to origination rather than interpretation of Scripture. But the emphasis here may fall on divine illumination as the necessary corollary of divine inspiration so that, while the sense of Scripture is objectively given and determinable by exegesis, it must be discriminated nonetheless by the aid of the same Spirit by whom it was first communicated. In any event, the text precludes identifying the content of Scripture as originally a product of the human writers.

(2) “Prophecy never had its origin in the will of man.” If the previous passage denies one’s ultimate right to interpret Scripture, the present declaration emphatically denies the dependence of Scripture upon human initiative for its origin.

(3) “Men spoke from God as they were carried along by the Holy Spirit.” Only through a determining and constraining influence of the Holy Spirit did the human agents actualize the divine initiative. The word translated “carried along” is pherō (literally, “to bear along,” “to carry”), and implies an activity more specific than mere guidance or direction.

Jesus' View of Scripture. If the passages already cited indicate something not only of the nature but of the extent of inspiration ("all Scripture"; "the word of the prophets," elsewhere a summary term for the entirety of Scripture), a verse from the Johannine writings indicates something of the intensity of inspiration and at the same time enables us to contemplate Jesus' view of Scripture. In John 10:34–35, Jesus singles out an obscure passage in the Psalms ("you are 'gods,'" Ps. 82:6) to reinforce the point that "the Scripture cannot be broken." The reference is doubly significant because it also discredits the modern bias against identifying Scripture as the word of God, on the ground that this assertedly dishonors the supreme revelation of God in the incarnate Christ. But in John 10:35 Jesus of Nazareth, while speaking of himself as indeed the one "whom the Father set apart as his very own and sent into the world," nonetheless refers to those in a past dispensation "to whom the word of God came—and the Scripture cannot be broken." The unavoidable implication is that the whole of Scripture is of irrefragable authority.

This is the viewpoint also of the Sermon on the Mount reported in Matthew's Gospel: "Do not think that I have come to abolish the Law or the Prophets; I have not come to abolish them but to fulfill them. I tell you the truth, until heaven and earth disappear, not the smallest letter, not the least stroke of a pen, will by any means disappear from the Law until everything is accomplished. Anyone who breaks one of the least of these commandments and teaches others to do the same will be called least in the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. 5:17–19). Attempts to turn the repeated declarations, "You have heard that it was said. . . . But I say to you" into a sustained criticism of the Mosaic law have not made their case convincingly against the probability that Jesus' protest is leveled rather against traditional reductions of the actual claim and inner intention of that law. Indeed, the necessary fulfillment of all that is written is a frequent theme on our Lord's lips (Matt. 26:31, 54; Mark 9:12–13; 14:27; John 13:18; 17:12). Whoever searches the Gospel narratives faithfully in view of Jesus' attitude toward the sacred writings will be driven again and again to the conclusion of Reinhold Seeberg: "Jesus himself describes and employs the Old Testament as an infallible authority (e.g., Matt. 5:17; Luke 24:44)" (Text-book of the History of Doctrine, 1:82).

Old Testament View. In both speech and writing the OT prophets are marked off by their unswerving assurance that they were spokesmen for the living God. They believed that the truths they uttered about the Most High and his works and will, and the commands and exhortations they voiced in his name, derived their origin from him and carried his authority. The constantly repeated formula "This is what the LORD says" is so characteristic of the prophets as to leave no doubt that they considered themselves chosen agents of the divine self-communication. Emil Brunner acknowledges that in "the words of God which the Prophets proclaim as those which they have received directly from God, and have been commissioned to repeat, as they have received them . . . perhaps we find the closest analogy to the meaning of the theory of verbal inspiration" (Revelation and Reason, 122). Whoever impugns the confidence of the prophets that they were instruments of the one true God in their disclosure of truths about his nature and dealings with humans is driven, consistently if not necessarily, to delusion as the only possible alternative.

From this same prophetic tradition it is impossible to detach Moses. Himself a prophet rightly called "the founder of prophetic religion," he mediates the law and the priestly and sacrificial elements of revealed religion in the firm belief that he promulgates the veritable will of Jehovah. God would help both Moses and Aaron to speak and would teach them what to do. God told Moses, "[Aaron] will speak to the people for you, and it will be as if he were your mouth and as if you were God to him" (Exod. 4:14–16; cf. 7:1).

The Old and the New. The NT observations about Scripture apply primarily, of course, to the OT writings, which existed in the form of a unitary canon. But the apostles extended the traditional claim to divine inspiration. Jesus their Lord had not only validated the conception of a unique and authoritative corpus of sacred writings, but spoke of a further ministry of teaching by the Spirit (John 14:26; 16:13). The apostles assert confidently that they thus speak by the Spirit (1 Pet. 1:12). They ascribe both the form and matter of their teaching to him (1 Cor. 2:13). They not only assume a divine authority (1 Thess. 4:2, 15; 2 Thess. 3:6, 12), but they make acceptance of their written commands a test of spiritual obedience (1 Cor. 14:37). They even refer to each other's writings with the same regard as for the OT (cf. the identification in 1 Tim. 5:18 of a passage from Luke's Gospel, "The worker deserves his wages" [Luke 10:7] as Scripture, and the juxtaposition of the Pauline Epistles in 2 Pet. 3:16 with "the other Scriptures").

Historical View. The traditional theory—that the Bible as a whole and in every part is the word of God written—held currency until the rise of modern critical theories a century ago. W. Sanday, affirming that the high view was the common Christian belief in the middle of the last century, comments that this view is "substantially not very different from that . . . held two centuries after the Birth of Christ," indeed, that "the same attributes" were predicated of the OT before the New (Inspiration, 392–93). Bromiley notes certain rationalizing tendencies that have arisen on the rim of the high view: the Pharisees' rejection of Jesus of Nazareth as the promised Messiah despite their formal acknowledgment of the divine inspiration of Scripture; the attribution of inspiration to the vowel points and punctuation by seventeenth century Lutheran dogmatians; and a depreciation (e.g., in the Middle Ages) of the role of illumination in the interpretation of Scripture ("The Church Doctrine of Inspiration" in Revelation and the Bible, ed. C. F. H. Henry, 213–16). The Protestant Reformers guarded their view of the Bible from the errors of rationalism and mysticism. To prevent Christianity's decline to mere metaphysics, they stressed that the Holy Spirit alone gives life. And to prevent decline of the Christian religion to formless mysticism, they emphasized the Scriptures as the only trustworthy source of the knowledge of God and his purposes. The historic evangelical view affirms that alongside special divine revelation given in saving acts, God's disclosure has taken the form also of truths and words. This revelation is communicated in a restricted canon of trustworthy writings, deeding fallen humanity an authentic exposition of God and his relations with humans. Scripture itself is viewed as an integral part of God's redemptive activity, a special form of revelation, a unique mode of divine disclosure. In fact, it becomes a decisive factor in God's redemptive activity, interpreting and unifying the whole series of redemptive deeds, and exhibiting their divine meaning and significance.

Critical Theories. The postevolutionary criticism of the Bible carried on by Julius Wellhausen and other modern scholars narrowed the traditional confidence in infallibility by excluding matters of science and history. How much was at stake in a weakening of trust in the historical reliability of Scripture was not at first obvious to those who limited the reliability of the Bible only to matters of faith and practice. For no distinction between historical and doctrinal matters is set up by the NT view of inspiration. No doubt this is due to the fact that the OT history is viewed as the unfolding of God's saving revelation; the historical elements are a central aspect of the revelation. It was soon apparent that scholars who abandoned the trustworthiness of biblical history had furnished an entering wedge for the abandonment of doctrinal elements. Theoretically such an outcome might perhaps have been avoided by an act of will, but in practice it was not. William Newton Clark's Use of the Scriptures in Theology (1905) yielded to the critics biblical theology and ethics as well as biblical science and history, but reserved the teaching of Jesus Christ as authentic. British scholars went further. Since Jesus' endorsement of creation, the patriarchs, Moses, and the giving of the law involved him in an acceptance of biblical science and history, some influential critics accepted only the theological and moral teaching of Jesus. Contemporaries swiftly erased even this remainder, asserting Jesus' theological fallibility. Actual belief in Satan and demons was insufferable to the critical mind, and must therefore invalidate his theological integrity, while the feigned belief in them (as a concession to the times) would invalidate his moral integrity. Yet Jesus had represented his whole ministry as a conquest of Satan and appealed to his exorcism of demons in proof of his supernatural mission. The critics could infer only his limited knowledge even of theological and moral truths. The so-called Chicago school of empirical theologians argued that respect for scientific method in theology disallows any defense whatever of Jesus' absoluteness and infallibility. Harry Emerson Fosdick's Modern Use of the Bible (1924) championed only "abidingly valid" experiences in Jesus' life that could be normatively relived by us. Gerald Birney Smith went another step in Current Christian Thinking (1928); while we may gain inspiration from Jesus, our own experience determines doctrine and a valid outlook on life.

Simultaneously many critical writers sought to discredit the doctrine of an authoritative Scripture as a departure from the view of the biblical writers themselves, or of Jesus of Nazareth before them; or, if admittedly Jesus' view, they sought to dismiss it nonetheless as a theological accommodation, if not an indication of limited knowledge. The internal difficulties of such theories were stated with classic precision by Benjamin B. Warfield ("The Real Problem of Inspiration," in Inspiration and Authority of the Bible). This attempt to conform the biblical view of inspiration to the looser modern critical notions may now be said to have failed. The contemporary revolt strikes more deeply. It attacks the historic view of revelation as well as of inspiration, affirming in deference to the dialectical philosophy that divine revelation does not assume the form of concepts and words—a premise that runs directly counter to the biblical witness.

Whatever must be said for the legitimate rights of criticism, it remains a fact that biblical criticism has met the test of objective scholarship with only qualified success. Higher criticism has shown itself far more efficient in creating a naïve faith in the existence of manuscripts for which there is no overt evidence (e.g., J, E, P, D, Q, first-century nonsupernaturalistic "gospels" and second-century supernaturalistic redactions) than in sustaining the Christian community's confidence in the only manuscripts the church has received as a sacred trust. Perhaps the most significant gain in our generation is the new disposition to approach Scripture in terms of primitive witness instead of remote reconstruction.

While it can shed no additional light on the mode of the Spirit's operation on the chosen writers, biblical criticism may provide a commentary on the nature and extent of that inspiration and on the range of the trustworthiness of Scripture. The admittedly biblical view has been assailed in our generation especially by an appeal to such textual phenomena of Scripture as the Synoptic problem and apparent discrepancies in the reporting of events and numbers. Evangelical scholars have recognized the danger of imputing twentieth-century scientific criteria to the biblical writers. They have noted also that the OT canon so unqualifiedly endorsed by Jesus contains many of the difficulties of the Synoptic problem in the features of the books of Kings and Chronicles. And they concede the proper role of an inductive study of the actual phenomena of Scripture in detailing the doctrine of inspiration derived from the teaching of the Bible.

C. F. H. HENRY

See also BIBLE, INERRANCY AND INFALLIBILITY OF; PLENARY INSPIRATION; VERBAL INSPIRATION.

Bibliography. P. Achtemeier, Inspiration of Scripture; K. Barth, Doctrine of the Word of God; C. Elliott, Treatise on the Inspiration of the Holy Scriptures; T. Engelder, Scripture Cannot Be Broken; L. Gaussen, Theopneustia: The Plenary Inspiration of the Holy Scriptures; F. E. Greenspan, ed., Scripture in Jewish and Christian Tradition; C. F. H. Henry, God, Revelation, and Authority; C. F. H. Henry, ed., Revelation and the Bible; H. D. McDonald, What the Bible Teaches about the Bible; J. Orr, Revelation and Inspiration; J. I. Packer, God Has Spoken; N. B. Stonehouse and P. Woolley, eds., Infallible Word; J. Urquhart, Inspiration and Authority of the Bible; J. C. Wenger, God's Word Written.

Bible, Interpretation of. See INTERPRETATION OF THE BIBLE.

Biblical Criticism. See HIGHER CRITICISM.

Biblical Theology Movement. The standard definition for the "biblical theology movement" has been provided by OT scholar Brevard S. Childs. He perceptively describes the background, rise, flowering, and demise of the American aspect of the movement from the middle of the 1940s to the early part of the 1960s. In a more general sense the biblical theology movement was made up of biblical scholars in North America and Europe who shared liberal, critical assumptions and methods in an attempt to do theology in relation to biblical studies. This new way of doing theology was most fundamentally concerned to do justice to the theological dimension of the Bible, which previous generations of liberal scholars had almost completely neglected. Accordingly the movement reflected an interest of European neo-orthodox theologians of the 1920s and beyond. Neo-orthodoxy and the biblical theology movement shared the common concern to understand the Bible as a fully human book to be investigated with the fully immanent historical-critical method and yet to see the Bible as a vehicle or witness of the divine Word. This meant a meshing of the modern naturalistic-evolutionary worldview as developed by natural science, modern philosophy, and critical history with the biblical view of a God who gives meaning and coherence to this world in his personal acts in history.

It has been shown by James Barr and James D. Smart that the biblical theology movement is not a uniquely American phenomenon (so Childs). In Great Britain and on the European continent the same tendencies inherent in the American aspect of the movement were present, although the setting in Europe was different. In any case, the biblical theology movement, international in scope, was broader than the scene in North America, and Barr claims it "can well be seen in the organized study programs of the international ecumenical movement." Even though there was no formal organization of the movement nationally or internationally, and although there existed varieties of emphases among its proponents, there were nevertheless overriding characteristics that were so typical of the movement that they gave a fairly well defined coherence.

Characteristics. Without attempting to be exhaustive, it will be useful to enumerate typical features that are common to the movement in America and Europe. Among those that characterize both its relative coherence and its distinctiveness are the following:

Reaction to Liberalism. The biblical theology movement was a reaction against the study of the Bible in previous liberal theology where the source criticism of the historical-critical method atomized the biblical text into separate sources, frequently consisting of small isolated entities or fragments of documents. These reconstructed sources were placed in new sociological, political, and cultural contexts in the ancient world and interpreted from this newly reconstructed context. A part of this scholarly reconstruction by means of the presuppositions and procedures of the historical-critical method, which reached its total victory over conservative approaches in Europe by the end of the 1900s and in America by the middle of the 1930s, consisted of a redating and reordering of the biblical materials along the lines of naturalistic-evolutionary developmentalism. Joined to this was the axiom that Israel borrowed extensively from the surrounding pagan cultures and religions and that Israelite and NT faith is best understood from the point of view of natural theology. All of this meant a lack of concern regarding the theological interests of the Bible for church, community, and individual. This sterile liberal theology, devoid of meaning for church and life, remained incompatible to significant segments of Christianity, particularly

Biblical Theology Movement

American Protestantism, which had only reluctantly given in to the historical-critical method in the long and devastating fundamentalist-modernist controversy. The biblical theology movement directed its efforts against the extremes of the historical-critical approach to the Bible, while itself remaining faithful to the historical-critical method, its presuppositions, and its procedures. The attempt of the movement was to move beyond the older liberal position within the liberal framework of the study of the Bible.

Alliance with Neo-orthodoxy. The biblical theology movement was fostered by the neo-orthodox reaction to theological liberalism that developed under the influence of Karl Barth and Emil Brunner in Europe and H. Richard Niebuhr and Reinhold Niebuhr in America. The neo-orthodox reaction against Protestant liberalism's reduction of the Christian faith to universal human and religious truths and moral values became a powerful impetus for the biblical theology movement. It must be noted, however, that neo-orthodoxy was not a return to older Protestant orthodoxy, which held that all Scripture was divinely inspired. By and large the biblical theology movement joined the neo-orthodox view of revelation and inspiration. Revelation is essentially God revealing himself in Christ, and Scripture may become a witness to this revelation. The Bible is not the word of God but may become the word of God in its witness to Christ. Particularly useful to the movement was Brunner's view on revelation in which he attacked classical Protestant and American fundamentalists on the one hand and classical liberals on the other. The biblical theology movement could join ranks with the neo-orthodox theology to wage a common battle against both liberalism in theology and fundamentalism among conservative segments in America.

Greek Versus Hebrew Thought. The biblical theology movement constantly opposed the influence of modern philosophy and its constructs as modes to understand biblical thought. It also tended strongly to reject an understanding of the Bible on the basis of Greek thought and its categories. In its rejection of the domineering effect of modern philosophy it shared once again a concern of neo-orthodoxy. The attempt was to understand the Bible outside certain modern or ancient philosophical norms and patterns of thought. It was argued that the Bible must be understood "in its own categories" (J. Muilenburg) and the scholar must put himself "within the world of the Bible" (B. W. Anderson). The contrast between Greek and Hebrew thought (T. Boman and others) became rather important. Although the NT was written in Greek, the Hebrew mentality was common to both testaments. The idea of the Hebrew mentality led to significant studies of words in both testaments. The outlines of the Hebraic thought patterns were reflected in the words of the Hebrew language, and this Hebraic thought content was also communicated through the vehicle of language (Greek) of the NT.

The Bible within Its Culture. Another characteristic of the biblical theology movement was an emphasis on the distinctiveness of the Bible in its environment. G. E. Wright's book Old Testament against Its Environment (1950) is typical, reflecting in part the concern of the Albright school. The consensus emerged that when there is borrowing or even syncretism, or when there are plain similarities, the differences between the literature of Israel and that of the surrounding nations are far more remarkable than its points of contact. The movement claimed that the most significant things in Israel were not the things it held in common with its neighbors but the things where it differed from them. When the Bible was compared with other contemporary cultures and religions, its uniqueness became apparent. Further, this distinctiveness is not a matter of faith but a matter of scientific historical study. The uniqueness of the biblical faith was determined by historical study and subject to its norms.

Biblical Unity. A concomitant aspect of the distinctiveness of the Bible is its unity, particularly the unity of both testaments. "The attempt to deal with both testaments in a unified way came as a protest against the tendency of increased specialization which had characterized American and British scholarship in the preceding generation" (Childs, 36). The biblical theology movement rejected allegory, typology, and Christology as modes of unity between the testaments. The unity of the Bible was unity in diversity, a unity of divine revelation, mediated through human personality, in a specific historical context (H. H. Rowley), unity of purpose, covenant relation, and divine revelation (Muilenburg), or simply a "higher unity" (R. C. Dentan) or a "kerygmatic unity" (J. S. Glenn). There were others who suggested a fundamental unity in history.

Revelation in History. One of the major tenets of the biblical theology movement was the concept of divine revelation in history. "It provided the key to unlock the Bible for a modern generation and at the same time to understand it theologically" (Childs, 39). The emphasis on revelation in history was used to attack both the conservative position, which holds that the Bible contains eternal truths and serves as a deposit of right doctrine, and the liberal position, which claims that the Bible contains a process of evolving religious discovery or simply progressive revelation. The emphasis on revelation stressed the divine self-disclosure and shifted the content away from propositional revelation and doctrine to the neo-orthodox concept of encounter without propositional content. The corresponding emphasis on history meant that the revelational encounter in history bridged the gap between past and present in that Israel's history became the church's history and subsequently our modern history. In the church's liturgy the believer and the community of faith participate in the same redemptive event by means of recital.

Decline and Evaluation. The biblical theology movement flourished for about a generation, from ca. 1945 to 1965. Childs sees its demise as a major force in American theology in the early 1960s. He is supported by Barr. Against this position it is held that "biblical theology is not a movement or a brand of theology but simply an enlargement of the dimensions of biblical science" (Smart, 11), which is continuing to function on an international scale. Childs appears to have overstated the case in claiming the death of the American biblical theology movement in 1963 but has been correct in his description of the characteristics of the movement as a coherent force within twentieth-century liberal theology. By 1969 such a prominent member of the movement as G. E. Wright appears to have moved from his earlier position supporting a God who acts in history.

There is no easy way of evaluating and assessing the biblical theology movement, because it is part of a trend in modern liberal theology and in part an overlapping with the neo-orthodox movement in our century. The following features may serve as major points of issue that are called for in an assessment of the movement.

The Problem of Hermeneutics. The issue of the adequacy of biblical interpretation within the framework of the historical-critical method remained unresolved. The theologians of the biblical theology movement remained with both feet planted in the historical-critical method. They affirmed the modern worldview with its secular understanding of the spatiotemporal world process, i.e., the world of history and of nature. While the movement was critical of its forefathers in the liberal tradition of theology on a number of points as noted above, in a major sense the members of the biblical theology movement continued the liberal tradition. The secular-scientific (and liberal) understanding of the origin and development of the world along the evolutionary Darwinian model was accepted as axiomatic, and the liberal understanding of the movement of history along general historicist lines was not radically questioned. Onto the contemporary scientific understanding of both nature and history theologians of the biblical theology movement attempted to graft the biblical understanding of God as Creator and Lord who is dynamically active in the process of history (G. E. Wright). This meshing of a "secular" or "atheistic" (A. Schlatter) historical-critical method and a naturalistic-evolutionary worldview with the God of the Bible who gives meaning and coherence to this world in his personal acts in history was "at best only an uneasy dualism" (Gilkey, 91). Childs notes incisively that "the historical-critical method is an inadequate method of studying the Bible as the Scriptures of the church," setting up "an iron curtain between the past and the present" (Childs, 141-42).

The Issue of "What It Meant" and "What It Means." The biblical theology movement attempted to put aside the dichotomy between the past and the present, the historical-critical and theological study of the Bible, or the descriptive and the normative approach to the Bible. The interest in the theological dimension of the Bible was of major concern. Nevertheless, the distinction of "what it meant" as that which is descriptive, objective, and scientific as compared to "what it means" as that which is theological and normative (see K. Stendahl) further complicated what the movement attempted to overcome. While Stendahl's distinction of "what it meant" and "what it means" remains highly debated (see Hasel, Old Testament Theology, 35-75), it struck a blow at the heart of the movement.

The Problem of the Bible. Among the unresolved problems of the biblical theology movement is that of the Bible as a "fully human book and yet as the vehicle for the Divine Word" (Childs, 51). No consensus ever emerged as to whether the element of revelation claimed for the Bible lay in the text, behind the text, in text and event, or in some other mode. Likewise, the modes of unity within the testaments and between the testaments as expounded by such leaders as G. E. Wright, H. H. Rowley, O. Cullmann, R. C. Dentan, F. V. Filson, and others (see Hasel, New Testament Theology, 140-203) did not lead to a consensus.

The Concept of Revelation in History. The issue of history as the locus of divine revelation turned out to be ill-defined and drew heavy attack from several scholars (among them L. Gilkey, W. King, and J. Barr). Among the ambiguities of the concept of revelation in history are those related to the nature of the revelatory events, the sense of history, the relation between revelation and history as well as history and interpretation. Over against these ambiguities from the perspective of the modern historical-critical school of thought, conservative scholars have tended to base their case on the formal statements in Scripture about Scripture itself. In the last analysis history cannot be the authenticating factor of revelation, but the biblical revelation itself is self-authenticating. The concept of revelation in history as an alternative to propositional revelation on the one hand or general revelation on the other did not prove successful. The more recent attempt to replace revelation in history with the view that the OT is "story rather than history" (Barr) does not overcome the ambiguities of history but merely replaces them with those connected with story. Biblical revelation carries within itself its own validation by enabling the recipient of revelation to grasp the content of revelation and to be grasped by the truth of revelation. Due to the fact that biblical revelation is self-authenticating, there can be no external proofs that stand as judges over the revelation of the Bible.

Biblical Theology Movement

In short, the biblical theology movement was a major attempt for a full generation in the twentieth century to correct liberal theology from within itself. It did not succeed because it ultimately remained a captive of the basic modes, thought patterns, presuppositions, and methods of liberal theology itself. It provided, therefore, an additional impetus to more recent attempts that show the basic method of liberalism, i.e., the historical-critical method, as bankrupt (W. Wink) or announce its end (G. Maier) and seek new methods for the study of the Bible and its theology, e.g., a theological-historical method (G. F. Hasel), canonical (B. S. Childs), or structural (D. Patte) method.

G. F. HASEL

Bibliography. D. L. Baker, Two Testaments: One Bible; J. Barr, IDBSup 104–11; B. S. Childs, Biblical Theology in Crisis; Biblical Theology of the Old and New Testament; L. Gilkey, Naming the Whirlwind; “Cosmology, Ontology, and the Travail of Biblical Language,” JR 41:194–205; G. F. Hasel, New Testament Theology: Basic Issues in the Current Debate; Old Testament Theology: Basic Issues in the Current Debate; G. Maier, End of the Historical-Critical Method; D. Patte, What is Structuralism?; J. D. Smart, Past, Present, and Future of Biblical Theology; K. Stendahl, IDB 1:418–32; W. Wink, Bible in Human Transformation: Towards a New Paradigm for Bible Study.

Bioethics. An interdisciplinary branch of ethics in which doctors, philosophers, lawyers, and theologians collaborate to resolve difficult ethical and moral questions raised in the context of modern health care. In one sense bioethics is a very new field, one so new that the term does not appear in any but the most recent dictionaries. In another sense, however, the questions that are the subject of heated debate today are really timeless: What is the nature and value of human life? How are we to understand and respond to human suffering and imperfection? Where there are differences of opinion—e.g., on whether or not to extend routine medical care to handicapped newborns—who decides? Theologians and philosophers? Doctors? The family? The courts? In any event, modern technology and the general secularization of society have made bioethics one very strategic area for thoughtful Christian involvement.

The number of issues in bioethics that are immediately recognizable as matters of current interest is surprising: abortion, euthanasia, genetic engineering, “test-tube babies,” treatment of handicapped newborns, and population control. Other issues lurk just under the surface of popular media attention: the use of “surrogate mothers” who are artificially inseminated and give birth for another individual or couple, sperm banks (including one that carries only the sperm of “geniuses”), cloning, fetal experimentation, legal claims of “wrongful birth” (alleging failed contraception—the defense being, in part, that the mother could have aborted), amniocentesis, and cryogenics (the practice of freezing bodies in the hope that a future “cure” of death will be discovered, enabling them to be brought back to life and health). This article will examine these and other issues and subissues.

James M. Gustafson has observed that Protestant and Catholic ethics have taken rather widely divergent paths. The primary difference, of course, is the magisterium, or teaching authority, of the Roman Catholic Church, which is foreign to all but the most liturgical Protestants. Protestants stand on sola Scriptura, which seems to have been more helpful toward Protestant ethical pronouncements before the dominant social and cultural underpinnings of modern American society lost their vital connection to a Judeo-Christian worldview. Gustafson argues persuasively that both Protestants and Catholics would benefit from rapprochement of the two traditions in the context of addressing common ethical concerns. Protestants would bring to such discussions an openness to current problems and issues that allows for fresh and creative ways to counsel and act. Catholics would contribute the riches of centuries of ordered thought on moral and ethical questions. Each would assist the other in identifying its own shortcomings and blind spots; Protestants would be encouraged to avoid the vagueness and relativism that often attend “open-mindedness,” and Catholics would be encouraged to go beyond rigid and closed positions to where legitimate reconsideration is possible.

It is precisely this realization of the paramount need to avoid ethical relativism that has most animated evangelical consideration of these issues. Joseph Fletcher’s Situation Ethics: A New Morality (1966) typified all that evangelicals most feared in liberal Protestant theology and philosophy. “Situation ethics” or “ethics of consequences,” as it was sometimes called, was resoundingly condemned by evangelicals of all stripes, including Carl F. H. Henry and other evangelical academicians. Evangelicals and other conservative Christians who affirm the orthodox Christian faith have been correct to attack such obvious affronts to traditional teachings on moral principles and values. Yet the battle has been a long one and the warriors are weak; a new enthusiasm is needed to defend old ground and to respond to the numerous novel issues now under discussion. The challenge, however, remains much the same: to balance that which never changes, about which no compromise is possible, with a fresh and Spirit-filled willingness to identify with and help solve problems that oppress people in the trenches of life, where openness and creativity are the order of the day.

Abortion. To offer intelligent Christian counsel on bioethical issues, it is first necessary to know the factual contexts in which the issues arise. Because abortion is the most widely discussed of the bioethical issues, it is appropriate to begin the inquiry there. It is fair to say, with a few relatively small qualifications, that the Christian position on abortion is to be against it. As Harold O. J. Brown has written, “The overwhelming consensus of the spiritual leaders of Protestantism, from the Reformation to the present, is clearly anti-abortion. There is very little doubt among biblically oriented Protestants that abortion is an attack on the image of God in the developing child and is a great evil.” Yet, since the Supreme Court discovered a right of abortion in the Constitution in 1973, liberal Protestant voices have managed to leave an impression in the public mind that Christian teaching on abortion is vague and ambiguous. Some Protestants have gone so far as to argue that Christian “compassion” requires that abortion as one way to deal with an unwanted pregnancy must be baptized with Christian approval. Such arguments, while spurious, have had their regrettable effect on evangelicals, including those writing and teaching on abortion and other bioethical issues.

Christian opposition to abortion is based on belief in the sanctity of human life. Modern secularist views are, to the contrary, viewing human life as only a slightly higher form of animal life—the result of an impersonal evolutionary process without any supernatural element or implications whatever. Thus, the first challenge for the Christian ethicist is to bridge what one writer has described as “a deep philosophical chasm between two radically distinct and diametrically opposed moral visions of humanity.” Evangelicals and other conservative Christians must learn to respond with conviction and clarity to the arguments made for liberal abortion policy. Those arguments, and a brief answer to each, might be summarized as follows:

(1) Argument: A woman has a right to control her own body, and this includes the right to choose abortion. Response: One’s freedom to act extends only to the point that it impinges another’s right not to be acted upon. There are two affected by the abortion decision—the unborn child is not a mere appendage of his or her mother. To kill one for the convenience of another is and always has been morally repugnant. (2) Argument: Those who oppose abortion are imposing their views or “legislating their morality” in a pluralistic society. Response: There is no “values neutrality,” a condition this argument appears to assume. It is not a question of whether but whose morality, or values, will be reflected in the law and public institutions of our pluralistic society. Proposals in this regard, from whomever they might come, must compete in the marketplace of ideas. Moreover, it can be persuasively argued that the closest we could have come to the standard of “values neutrality” would have been for the Supreme Court to have left abortion subject to state regulation, as it was before the 1973 decision. Indeed, in overturning community judgments on abortion in all fifty states, it is the Supreme Court and those supporting their exercise of what Justice White properly termed “raw judicial power” who are imposing their unrepresentative views on a pluralistic populace. (3) Argument: What is really important is the quality of life of the mother and of the child to be allowed to be born. A child has a right to be wanted. Response: Of all the arguments for abortion this one is clearly the most specious. Consider what is being argued—that someone’s precious right to life depends on being able to meet certain genetic or physical standards or, even worse, that this person is wanted (with whether the child can be afforded often being a part of the latter consideration). Malcolm Muggeridge and other insightful social commentators have effectively shown how readily these same arguments are used to support the killing, by commission or omission, of those who have already been born. There is a “slippery slope,” the Muggeridge argument goes, from permissive abortion to active euthanasia, and our society’s laws and public values are dangerously tilting in that direction.

Euthanasia. After abortion, the bioethical issue that has gotten the most attention in modern times is euthanasia. Also referred to as “mercy killing,” euthanasia enthusiasts and their opponents have inspired minor movements of their own. Parading under banners such as “the right to die” and “death with dignity,” proponents of liberalized euthanasia laws have focused their efforts on amending state statutes to redefine “death” and to provide for “living wills.” The idea in regard to the latter is to allow individuals to state their preference concerning medical treatment while they are alert and not in a state of medical emergency. Previous cases in which euthanasia was allowed provide the primary factual context in which such proposals are considered, which causes many problems for those who remain unpersuaded that this is a desirable way for society to move. As the axiom goes, hard cases make bad law (and bad ethics). The emotional exploitation of hard cases has resulted in our permissive national abortion policy, and opponents of liberalized euthanasia laws contend that we are in danger of the same result on euthanasia.

The traditional Christian view of euthanasia has distinguished between active and passive euthanasia. Active euthanasia, as the name suggests, involves an act to terminate the life of another such as administering a lethal dose of pain killer or sleeping pills. Christian ethicists have traditionally condemned active euthanasia. Passive euthanasia involves the withholding of certain forms of treatment and has generally been upheld as moral so long as the measures not taken were extraordinary and not ordinary ones. This latter distinction has been increasingly a difficult one, due in large measure to the constant improvements in medical technology that make today's extraordinary measures tomorrow's ordinary ones. This difficulty, plus the temptation toward relativism in defining these terms, has led Christian ethicist Paul Ramsey to recommend that they be replaced with what he calls a "medical indications policy." Simply stated, Ramsey would favor medical treatment except where it is medically indicated that death is certain and impending. This policy proceeds out of his conviction that one should always choose life where possible. To choose death, as in the case of suicide or murder, is to throw the gift back into the face of the Giver of life, to reveal a lack of confidence that God will be with us in all the exigencies of life, and to surrender to what the Bible calls "the last enemy." Ramsey quotes with approval a distinction made by Arthur Dyck between choosing death (which is disapproved) and choosing how to live while dying (which is approved). As Dyck puts it, "choosing how to live while dying" stands in diametrical opposition to actions that "have the immediate intention of ending life (one's own or another's)"—only the latter of which "repudiates the meaningfulness and worth of . . . life."

One very tragic application of the arguments for euthanasia or mercy killing has been to handicapped newborns. Baby Boy Doe, born in Bloomington, Indiana, in 1982, is an example. This child not only had esophageal atresia—a condition that prevented him from taking nourishment orally—he also had Down's Syndrome. The esophagus problem could have been corrected by surgery, but the parents refused consent. They also refused to allow him to be fed intravenously while his fate was being determined by the courts. Three Indiana courts, including the state supreme court, declined to interfere with that decision. Baby Boy Doe was placed in an isolation room where he died without treatment or nourishment a week after his birth.

Unfortunately, the Baby Doe situation is not an isolated one. George Will, a news commentator who himself has a son with Down's Syndrome, wrote in response to this incident that "the freedom to kill inconvenient life is being extended, precisely as predicted, beyond fetal life to categories of inconvenient infants, such as Down's Syndrome babies." Although exact numbers are unavailable, every indication is that the practice of infanticide of handicapped newborns is widespread and growing. In a 1973 study published in the New England Journal of Medicine, it was reported that 14 percent of the babies in the Yale–New Haven Hospital's intensive care unit died from "nontreatment." Former U.S. surgeon general, Dr. C. Everett Koop, has written persuasively on this subject, pointing out that "nontreatment" is often a euphemism that includes failure to feed—known in a less complex era as starvation and negligent homicide. A more recent news article reported that at Children's Medical Center in Washington, D.C., for example, the decision not to extend medical treatment is made in about 17 percent of the cases. Whatever the precise statistics are, the philosophical acceptance of infanticide by the medical establishment is a grievous situation that cries for a Christian response.

Here the questions asked at the outset of the article are highly relevant. What is the nature and value of human life? How are we to understand and respond to human suffering and imperfection? Where there are differences of opinion, who decides? Ramsey has said what needs to be said in regard to the latter question: "If physicians are going to play God under the pretense of providing relief for the human condition, let us hope they play God as God plays God. Our God is no respecter of persons of good quality. Nor does he curtail his care for us because our parents are poor or have unhappy marriages, or because we are most in need of help." In stark contrast are the views of much of the present medical establishment and many of society's leading ethicists. Typical of their more "progressive" views is the opinion of one of the physicians at the Yale–New Haven Hospital that to be safe from a medical death warrant a baby must be "lovable." Similar is the argument of Millard S. Everett in his book Ideals of Life that "no child should be admitted into the society of the living" who has "any physical or mental defect that would prevent marriage or would make others tolerate his company only from a sense of mercy." To opinions such as these our current policy makers are altogether too open. It is essential that Christians with more traditional views become involved in this vital area of public life, affirming unequivocally the God-given dignity and right to life of each of God's creatures irrespective of "condition of dependency."

Other Issues. Many other bioethical issues might be raised and discussed, but space allows mention of only a few. Each of the following questions is the subject of public controversy.

Does a law prohibiting an individual or couple from paying another woman to have a child for them (after being artificially inseminated with the husband's or another's sperm) violate their “constitutional” right of privacy? Assuming there is no law in a particular state prohibiting a “surrogate mother” to put up her womb for rent, what happens to the baby when the contracting parent or parents decide they do not want the baby after all?

What are the appropriate parameters of the regulation of what is commonly referred to as “genetic engineering”? At what point does responsible pursuit of academic/scientific discovery have to encounter legal and ethical limits? Who should decide what those limits should be?

How ethical is the current national policy in regard to population control of Third World countries? At what point do education and encouragement become manipulation and indoctrination? In this highly controversial area whose values should be reflected in our law and public programs?

Where there is a legitimate shortage of medical equipment or technology, such as is the case in regard to kidney dialysis, who should be allowed the benefit of these scarce resources? When, if ever, should a “cost/benefit analysis” be permitted where human lives are at issue?

What is the extent of medical experimentation of fetuses that survive the disgusting and sickening abortion procedure? What is the best way to monitor and prevent such experimentation in the future?

What is the Christian response to the legal pioneers seeking to create a new “cause of action” for “wrongful life”? Briefly stated, the legal theory depends upon proving that the individual should never have been allowed to be born. Such a suit may be brought by disgruntled parents against a doctor after birth control measures fail or, more alarmingly, by a third party arguing that it would have been in the best interest of the child to have been aborted.

Is submitting to amniocentesis, a medical procedure whereby the possibility of handicaps is identified and in which the only prescribed remedy in the event of a positive prognosis is abortion, ever moral? If so, under what circumstances?

How can Christians provide timeless ethical guidance on questions so futuristic without appearing hopelessly out of touch with modern realities? Asked another way, what is the wisdom of God that is “the same yesterday, today, and forever,” and what is our human finitude in regard to the complex technology available for the delivery of modern health care?

The questions raised are not simple, but there are clear Christian principles that have stood the test of time that are too often ignored when they are publicly debated. The Christian begins by assuming that God the Creator loves his creation. This is what we mean when we contend for the “sanctity of life.” It is fair to say that the conflicts in bioethics, at least on the most fundamental level, are a result of the modern rejection of this assumption. Although referred to here as a Christian assumption, it would be more accurate to speak of it as the Judeo-Christian ethic. In its place, sometimes consciously and sometimes unconsciously, a “quality of life ethic” is offered. It is an offer that should and must be rejected, not only by traditional Jews and Christians, but by anyone wishing to preserve anything remotely resembling the accumulated moral consensus of Western civilization. The bioethical issues may not be all black and white, but neither, as so many of the modern experts imply, are they all gray. The quality of life ethic, which is little more than warmed-over situation ethics, must be unequivocally rejected by Christians seeking to make a faithful and responsible contribution to bioethics. For too long this field has been dominated by the misplaced compassion and specious arguments of ethical relativists, a situation those who affirm the sanctity of life must now give the highest priority.

C. HORN III

See also ABORTION; EUGENICS; ETHICAL SYSTEMS, CHRISTIAN; EUTHANASIA; SITUATION ETHICS; SOCIAL ETHICS.

Bibliography. K. Barth, Bibliography of Bioethics; Church Dogmatics; H. O. J. Brown, Death before Birth; Encyclopedia of Bioethics; J. M. Gustafson, Protestant and Roman Catholic Ethics; T. Hilgers, D. Horan, and D. Mall, eds., New Perspectives on Human Abortion; D. Horan and M. Delahoyde, eds., Infanticide and the Handicapped Newborn; D. Horan and D. Mall, eds., Death, Dying, and Euthanasia; Human Life Review; J. Powell, Abortion: The Silent Holocaust; P. Ramsey, Ethics at the Edge of Life; C. E. Rice, Vanishing Right to Live.

Birth Control. Birth control is properly an issue within marriage, calling for decision on the part of the couple in light of God’s purposes for human sexuality. Foremost of these purposes is the union of a man and a woman in a complementary sexual relationship designed for emotional and erotic fulfillment (Gen. 2:18–24; Prov. 5:18–19; Song of Songs 1:13). Since the mid-sixteenth century the Christian church, both Catholic and Protestant, with varying emphases, has included the “mutual help” of husband and wife along with procreation and sexual purity as one of the prime ends of marriage. The covenanted companionship of marriage (Mal. 2:14) finds its unique expression in the conjugal love of the couple. Sexual delight within marriage is one of the good gifts of God’s creation to be received with thanksgiving by those who believe and know the truth (1 Tim. 4:3–5). Although Augustine taught otherwise, and was wrongly followed for centuries in the Western church, Christian couples may rest assured that the erotic expression of their love—independent of procreation—is fully compatible with true spirituality (cf. 1 Cor. 7:1–5; Heb. 13:4).

Birth Control

The sexual union of the couple, meaningful in itself as an act of self-giving love and mutual pleasure, is also the God-intended way of bringing children into the world. The original mandate to be fruitful and to exercise dominion over the earth is perpetually relevant to human responsibility as the image of God and coworkers with him (Gen. 1:28; 9:1; 35:11). God has ordained marriage as the proper context for the procreation and nurture of children. Husband and wife are not only intimate companions in life and in love but also cooperative partners in the broad cultural calling of humankind. Procreation and dominion over the earth for the glory of God, including the new dimension of redemptive mission, is the joint labor of the couple as heirs together of the grace of life (1 Peter 3:7).

As with the dominion and mission mandates, the procreation mandate calls for thoughtful and rational obedience. Responsible parenthood may entail the limiting or spacing of children for various physical, economic, psychological, or social reasons. Though the Bible places a high value on having children as one of the prime blessings of marriage, the procreation decision is rightly weighed in relation to the other intrinsic goods of the couple's companionship and partnership. Of course, the processes of conception and birth remain ultimately in the Lord's hands. Still the normal responsibility and natural hope of the married couple is to look expectantly to the Lord of life, knowing that "children [are] a reward from him" (Ps. 127:3).

So far there is wide agreement across Christendom. Though there are those who argue that any regulation of birth usurps divine prerogatives (Owen—though he allows exceptions for "sufficient cause"), the intramural debates between Christians largely concern the legitimacy of contraception. (Abortion as a means of birth control continues to be condemned by orthodox Christians of all persuasions.) The Roman Catholic church endorses the practice of abstinence during the woman's fertile cycle as a natural method of family planning but rejects contraception as intrinsically evil on the basis of natural law. Since the sexual organs are by nature generative, to close off the possibility of transmission of life in their use is to go against the will of God. Sexual intercourse need not be for procreation, but it must always be open to procreation because of the "indissoluble nexus" between the unitive and the procreative functions of sexual intercourse. Natural family planning (NFP), it is said, works with nature through abstinence during the fertile cycle; contraception works against nature by artificially rendering sexual intercourse sterile, though the moral objection is not to the artifi- ciality of contraception but to its unnaturalness (Smith).

Both sides in the controversy agree that the function of the sexual organs is not exclusively procreative; that they are a source of pleasure and a means of mutual self-giving expressive of the love and union of the couple; and that they are always relational, whereas they are not always generative. But if it is permissible for a couple to have sexual intercourse while consciously intending to avoid pregnancy (as with the Vatican approved NFP), it seems arbitrary not to allow the most effective means to that end. There is a rational use of freedom in both the calculation of the fertile cycles and in the development of artifices for contraception. There is no biblical reason why human beings may not make use of scientific knowledge in this area; it is "natural" for human beings to do so in that it accords with their nature as free rational agents. For a marriage to be open to the transmission of life does not require that each act of sexual intercourse have the same openness. Contraceptive acts may be regarded within the total sexual life of the couple oriented toward both union and procreation.

D. C. JONES

See also MARRIAGE, MARRIAGE CUSTOMS IN BIBLE TIMES; MARRIAGE, THEOLOGY OF.

Bibliography. CT Institute, "Is Birth Control Christian?" CT (November 11, 1991); D. Doriani, "Birth Dearth or Bring on the Babies?" Journal of Biblical Counseling 12:24–35; J. T. Noonan Jr., Contraception: A History of Its Treatment by the Catholic Theologians and Canonists; S. A. Owen Jr., Letting God Plan Your Family; Pope John Paul II, Familiaris consortio; Pope Paul VI, Humanae vitae; Pope Pius XI, Casti connubii; A. M. Rehwinkel, Planned Parenthood and Birth Control in the Light of Christian Ethics; Second Vatican Council, Gaudium et spes; J. E. Smith, Humanae Vitae: A Generation Later; W. O. Spitzer and C. L. Saylor, eds., Birth Control and the Christian.

Birth, New. See REGENERATION.

Bishop. One who is an overseer (pastor, shepherd) of the flock of God (the church). In the NT period it appears that the title "bishop" described the function of the presbyter (elder). In Acts 20:17–28 and Titus 1:5–7 these two terms may be interchangeable. The qualifications and duties of a bishop are supplied in 1 Timothy 3:2 and Titus 1:7. He is to be of wholesome character and a good teacher.

A clear distinction between the office of bishop and presbyter is seen in the letters of Ignatius, himself the sole bishop of Antioch. Written ca. 117, they testify to the emergence (at least in one geographical area) of what is often called the monarchical episcopate. Each church had a bishop, who was assisted by several presbyters and deacons. Thus, there was a threefold order of ordained ministry. The bishop was seen as the chief celebrant in worship, the chief pastor of the flock, and the chief administrator of the people of God and their possessions. Further to the emergence of the episcopate as distinct from the presbyterate there came a theology of apostolic succession. By ca. 150 it was widely held that bishops were the direct successors of the apostles and the chief guardians of the teaching of the church. This particular theology was expanded in later centuries.

The emergence of the office of bishop as distinct from that of presbyter (priest) may be accounted for by identifying sociological pressures inside and outside the churches in the first century, pressures that necessitated leadership by one man (in contrast to leadership by a group of presbyters). Without denying these human realities, it is also possible to see this development as part of the will of God and as initiated by the apostles as they came to the end of their ministries.

However we account for the origin of bishops as chief pastors, the historical fact is that they became universal in the church from early times until the sixteenth century. As the church expanded and adopted the geographical divisions of the Roman Empire, bishops became chief pastors of areas containing several churches. Those bishops in important cities or with large dioceses were called by such titles as pope, patriarch, metropolitan, and archbishop. To assist diocesan bishops, there emerged suffragan, auxiliary, assistant, and coadjutor bishops.

During the Protestant Reformation some of the new churches abandoned the office of bishop, arguing that in the NT there is no distinction between a bishop and a presbyter. This approach has been dominant within Protestantism since that time. However, the Church of England and certain Scandinavian Lutheran churches retained the traditional office of bishop. Thus, it is now found in the Roman, Orthodox, Eastern, Anglican, and some Lutheran churches.

The title "bishop" is used in certain Protestant denominations where there is no claim that the bishops are in the apostolic succession. Here the word means either pastor or chief pastor.

The traditional office of the bishop is understood in the following ways: (1) He has been ordained by other bishops who are themselves in the apostolic succession. He thereby becomes a sign of the unity of the church in space and time. (2) He alone has the right to ordain deacons and presbyters (priests) and to share in the ordination of other bishops. (3) He is the chief pastor, celebrant, and administrator of the diocese and as such he may delegate these duties to others.

The Roman Catholic and Orthodox churches require bishops to be celibate. As signs of his office, a bishop wears both a pectoral cross and an episcopal ring and he carries a pastoral staff. The method of choosing bishops varies from the democratic vote of the representatives of a diocese (as in parts of Anglicanism) to the decision of the pope (in Roman Catholicism). P. TOON

See also CHURCH OFFICERS; ELDER.

Bibliography. H. W. Beyer, TDNT 2:608–22; R. E. Brown, Priest and Bishop; L. Coenen, NIDNTT 1:188–201; B. Cooke, Ministry of Word and Sacrament; R. P. Johnson, Bishop in the Church; K. Rahner and J. Ratzinger, Episcopate and the Primacy; W. Telfer, Office of a Bishop.

Black Theology. The definition advanced by James Cone necessitates viewing black theology in conjunction with black history and black power. "Black history is recovering a past deliberately destroyed by slave masters, an attempt to revive old survival symbols and create new ones. Black power is an attempt to shape our present economic, social, and political existence according to those actions that destroy the oppressor's hold on black flesh. Black theology places our past and present actions toward black liberation in a theological context, seeking to destroy alien gods and to create value-structures according to the God of black freedom" ("Black Theology and Black Liberation," 1085). While there are many currents in the modern discipline of black theology, most proponents affirm Cone's contention that its essential tasks are to form a new understanding of black dignity among black people and to oppose and eventually destroy white racism. Most spokespersons also analyze the situation of black persons in the light of God's revelation in Jesus Christ and seek to demonstrate the biblical character of resultant conclusions.

Thus, black theology is engaged theology, committed to the amelioration of the condition of black people and consciously locked in battle with white racism. The latter is regularly considered to be a religion and is termed variously "white religion," "whitianity," and "Christianity" (in contrast to true Christianity). G. S. Wilmore's historical research indicates that from the earliest period of blacks in America, deliberate distortions of Christianity were perpetrated so that Christianity would not change the existing relationship between master and slave but would rather lend sanction to the status quo. White anthropologist J. Oliver Buswell III documents erroneous interpretations by which slavery and subsequently discrimination of all sorts were justified.

Rationale. Beginning with the generally accepted principle that the God of Israel and the church act in history to effect the salvation of men and women, black theologians contend that to view salvation as having an exclusively "spiritual" connotation is an irresponsible truncation of its meaning; rather, inherent in the concept are also economic, political, and social dimensions. Attention is directed to the Exodus event in which these dimensions are clearly evident. The conclusion is drawn that God's election of his people and his liberation of them from a variety of conditions of bondage are inextricably related. An additional conclusion is that God is not neutral; on the contrary, Cone quotes Karl Barth's deduction: "In the relations and events in the life of his people, God always takes his stand unconditionally and passionately on this side alone; against those who already enjoy right and privilege and on behalf of those who are denied it and deprived of it" (Black Theology and Black Power, 45; cf. Cone's reference at this juncture to Pss. 10:34; 72:12).

Black Theology

Regarding the NT material, a case is made for Jesus' intentional identification with the same categories of individuals based both upon the accusations of his enemies (Matt. 11:19) and upon his own teaching. Luke 4:18–19 functions as the primary text for black theology (and for most theologies of liberation), for here it is perceived that Jesus' work is essentially one of liberation.

Both testaments, therefore, are viewed as witnessing to the fact that recognition of God's liberating activity is integral to an understanding of his dealing with his people. Cone and others then conclude that, given this unmistakable commitment to the poor and the oppressed, it may be assumed that in the twentieth century Christ's radical identification would be with blackness, for just as identification with Israel clearly spoke to God's taking the side of the weak and the oppressed in the ancient world, so identification with blackness would be the most effective and easily discerned symbol of that choice in contemporary American society. It follows that obedience to God in the present requires of Christians a similar identification with the poor and oppressed, i.e., with blackness. Cone consequently defines heresy as "any activity or teaching that denies the Lordship of Christ or a word that refuses to acknowledge his liberating presence in the struggle for freedom. Heresy is the refusal to speak the truth in light of the One who is the Truth" (God of the Oppressed, 36).

Origin. Black theology's date of origin and its founder are vigorously debated. Among his contemporaries James Cone is primus inter pares due to the number of his publications and, more importantly, because they contain near normative formulations of the discipline. However, not everyone would grant him the status of originator. William Jones, for example, who observes that one's identification of a founder has unmistakable implications for one's definition of black theology, commends the adoption of 1964, the year of the publication of Black Religion, as an expedient date of origin and, by implication, Joseph Washington—its author—as founder. With the presence of the adjective "black" in his title, Washington meets Jones's criterion of indicating "a self-conscious effort to express [his] position in determined opposition to its complement, an alleged white theology, . . . the precondition for undertaking a black theology [being] the prior conclusion that an unacknowledged white theology exists" ("Toward an Interim Assessment of Black Theology," 514).

In the opinion of the present writer, James Cone should indeed be considered the originator of the contemporary expression of black theology. A series of factors combined to inspire him and to create a context of receptivity for his theological program. Significant were the collapse of colonialism and the rise of the Third World, the impact on the black community of returning black soldiers at the conclusion of World War II manifesting increasing unwillingness to accept prejudicial treatment, and the influence of the Black Muslim movement with its emphasis on black pride. Cone further maintains that this crucial reversal in attitude can also be explained in terms of existential philosophy, i.e., that blacks' reaction to the absurdity of the denial of equality in a nation claiming to be democratic was to reject that denial and to commence the struggle for black freedom. The culmination and summary of these aspects is black power, a necessary prerequisite for the emergence of black theology.

The concepts central to black theology, however, have long been articulated by a host of witnesses, among whom are Marcus Garvey, active and highly influential in the period 1916–27 as an advocate of black pride, black self-determination, black capitalism and economic development, a black church, and a black Christ; Nat Turner, leader of a slave rebellion in 1828 and honored by Cone and others not for his bloody uprising but for his perception of God as liberator (not unlike the religious mystics who led peasant revolts in medieval Europe); additional unnamed black religious leaders who, inspired by insights that have never been completely absent in the black community throughout all its generations, kept alive the message of liberation which today is again being declared.

Black Theology in Dialogue. One external debate in which black theologians are involved is the issue: Is black theology bona fide theology? Whether prompted by benign or malicious intent, the questioner, most frequently a white Christian, and the black respondent have difficulty in establishing mutually acceptable evaluative criteria for this discipline, which incorporates at many points an attack on the former's theological position.

An equally lively exchange with potential for reciprocal benefit is underway between black theologians and representatives of the theology of hope. Internal dialogue is likewise extensive.

In Liberation and Reconciliation: A Black Theology, J. Deotis Roberts, although uncompromisingly committed to liberation for black people, insists that to remain Christian, black theology also “must speak of reconciliation that brings black men together and of reconciliation that brings black and white men together” (152). To do otherwise is to move, perhaps unwittingly, from black Christian theology to “the religion of Black Power.” Another critic, Major Jones, detects in Cone and others a tendency toward “theological justification for views akin to black racism.” In the development of his own position, Jones acknowledges indebtedness to the nonviolence of Martin Luther King Jr.

Other spokespersons, focusing on Cone’s theological method, question particularly his dependence on German abstract theology and conclude that “linguistically and conceptually [his program indicates withdrawal] from the cultural and symbolic goal of its raison d’être, the black experience” (review of God of the Oppressed by Hycel B. Taylor in Union Seminary Quarterly Review, summer 1976).

William Jones of Yale criticizes not only Cone but Albert Cleague, Major Jones, Deotis Roberts, individually and as a group on theodicy, in his opinion the central question for black and for Jew alike. He declares, e.g., that “given [Washington’s] description of God’s sovereignty over human history and his activity within it, God’s malice for blacks seems that most probable explanation of black suffering” (Is God a White Racist? 79). Maintaining that attempts of the leading black theologians to reconcile the experience of oppression with the premise of God’s benevolence are not convincing, Jones reconstructs black theology to provide a new foundation, termed by him humanocentric theism, as an alternative to the benevolence-centered theism that underlies the work of others. Jones’s position seeks to recognize the functional ultimacy of humanity by transferring to humanity “areas of control and some of the primary functions that previous theological traditions reserved for God alone” (187). It may be surmised that few black theologians will decide to trust Jones’s fundamentally humanistic perspective.

In a major review of Cone’s initial work (Union Seminary Quarterly Review, summer 1970) the Howard scholar Cain Felder recognizes Cone’s significant contributions to black theology. At one point Felder notes his equivocal attitude toward violence as an option in the liberation struggle. This moderate position is dismissed by Felder in the light of the example of Jesus who, he maintains, was a first-century zealot (denied by most NT scholars). Felder adds that violence should be espoused because of the “growing number of disillusioned blacks who believe that white America is beyond salvation and must, with her church, be destroyed now.”

Appraisal. Black theology is regarded as one of the very few authentically indigenous North American theological movements. In the future it will undergo additional revision as the result of continuing internal dialogue and continuing research into such areas as its African roots. Confrontation with adversaries will also have an impact on it. Alteration will likewise come from dialogue with other liberation movements (feminist theology, Latin American theology of liberation, African theology), which, after having received inspiration and strategy from black theology, now in turn influence it from their respective positions.

The potential for good for the entire church is present if it joins in this dialogue. “If the major portion of the Bible is written by those who, in their own social situation, are the powerless and oppressed, if it is their perspective on the activity of God that is given us by Scripture, then surely a more accurate interpretation of the biblical word can be gained by those who currently stand in a parallel place in our own societies than by those who are powerful” (J. and C. González, Liberation Preaching, 16). All parties may discover that “the Lord has more light and truth to break forth out of his holy Word.” It is conceivable that black theology will serve as an important catalyst in the effecting of this wider dialogue (note B. Reist’s exploration of a mutual openness in Theology in Red, White, and Black).

The primary focus of black theology remains, however, a biblically mandated message of liberation. While acknowledging that blacks as well as whites are sinners, in the contemporary social setting it is particularly the white who must be called to a repentance that not only will mean a relinquishing of racial intolerance but will result in identification with blackness. And in Cone’s words, “Being black in America has very little to do with skin color. To be black means that your heart, your soul, your mind, and your body are where the dispossessed are” (Black Theology and Black Power, 151).

V. CRUZ

Bibliography. W. H. Bentley, Relevance of a Black Evangelical Theology for American Theology; J. O. Buswell III, Slavery, Segregation and Scripture; J. Cone, “Black Theology and Black Liberation,” CCen (September 16, 1970); Black Theology and Black Power; God of the Oppressed; A. Evans, Biblical Theology and the Black Experience; J. and C. González, Liberation Preaching; M. Jones, Black Awareness: A Theology of Hope; W. Jones, Is God a White Racist?; “Toward an Interim Assessment of Black Theology,” CCen (May 3, 1972); B. Reist, Theology in Red, White, and Black; J. D. Roberts, Liberation and Reconciliation; C. Smalley and R. Behan, What Color Is Your God?; T. Skinner, How Black Is the Gospel?; J. Washington, Black Religion; G. S. Wilmore, Black Religion and Black Radicalism;

Black Theology

G. S. Wilmore and J. Cone, eds., Black Theology, A Documentary History 1966–1979.

Blasphemy. In general the word means simply slander or insult and includes any action (e.g., a gesture) as well as any word that devalues another person or being, living or dead. This general secular idea was made more specific in religious contexts, where blasphemy means to insult, mock, or doubt the power of a god.

In the OT it is always this religious use that is intended. Blasphemy is the direct or indirect detracting from the glory and honor of God and therefore the opposite of praising or blessing God. A Hebrew could blaspheme God directly by insulting “the Name” or indirectly by flaunting God’s law (Num. 15:30), but in either case blasphemy, as idolatry (which was the ultimate blasphemy, Isa. 65:7, 66:3; Ezek. 20:27), was punishable by death by stoning (Lev. 24:10–23; 1 Kings 21:9–10). Generally, of course, it is pagans who have never experienced the God of Israel who blaspheme, although Israel’s failures may incite them to it (2 Sam. 12:14). The Assyrians blasphemed the Lord by equating him with the gods of other states; they received a sentence of doom (2 Kings 19:4, 6, 22; Isa. 37:6, 23). The Babylonians mocked God in the exile of Israel (Isa. 52:5), when Edom and other enemies also mocked the forlorn state of the nation (Pss. 44:14; 74:10, 18; Ezek. 35:12; 1 Macc. 2:6).

In the NT blasphemy occurs in its wider Greek meaning as well as its specifically religious sense, for people are slandered, not just God (Rom. 3:8, 1 Cor. 10:30; Eph. 4:31; Titus 3:2). In fact, such slander and abusive language was a danger to Christians; it had been their preconversion habit and was the example of their culture. They were tempted to use it when falling back into old habits of speech. This is roundly condemned (Mark 7:22; cf. Eph. 4:31; Titus 3:2). Men, as James would argue (James 3:1–12), are made in God’s image: to insult even the vilest person while claiming to bless God is inconsistent and evil. All people represent God to some degree.

It is also evil to mock angelic or demonic powers. The devil himself is not to be the object of insult. The NT looks on such mockery as gross presumption, a pride based on a false claim to knowledge and power (2 Pet. 2:10–12; Jude 8–10).

The most common form of blasphemy in the NT, however, is blasphemy of God. In some cases God is directly insulted (Rev. 13:6; 16:9), while in others his word is mocked (Titus 2:5). In still others his revelation and its bearer are derided (Moses in Acts 6:11; Paul in 1 Cor. 4:12–13). But it is with respect to Jesus that the word is mainly used. When Jesus forgave sins (Mark 2:7) he was accused of blasphemy on the grounds that he, being a man, made himself God (John 10:33–36). The same charge was the basis of his condemnation at his trial (Mark 14:61–64), for the Sanhedrin judged his claim to be Christ a mockery of God. The real blasphemy to the NT writers was the mockery of Jesus (Matt. 27:39; Mark 15:29; Luke 23:39), which continues in the persecutors of the church who mock the baptismal vow “Jesus is Lord” (James 2:7) or try to force Christians to curse it (cf. Acts 26:11). Christians themselves expected to be maligned (1 Cor. 4:13; 1 Tim. 1:13; Rev. 2:9; cf. Acts 13:45; 18:6), but they themselves could blaspheme not just by apostasy, but also by false doctrine (Rom. 3:8; 2 Pet. 2:2) or unloving actions that degrade the name of Christ (Rom. 2:24; Titus 2:5).

While blasphemy is forgivable (Matt. 12:31–32; Mark 3:28–29), it is serious. Without repentance one has no choice but to turn the guilty person over to Satan (probably expecting his death) so that he will be taught the necessary lesson (1 Tim. 1:20).

P. H. DAVIDS

Bibliography. H. W. Beyer, TDNT 1:621–25; G. D. Nokes, History of the Crime of Blasphemy; H. Wahrisch, C. Brown, and W. Mundle, NIDNTT 3:340–47.

Blasphemy against the Holy Spirit. A sin mentioned only in Matthew 12:31; Mark 3:28–29; and Luke 12:10. The context in Mark makes it clear that this sin is not just any serious moral failure, or persistence in sin, or insulting or rejecting Jesus or God due to ignorance or rebellion: it is the willful and conscious rejection of God’s activity and its attribution to the devil. The Pharisees saw a notable miracle and heard Jesus’ own teaching, but they chose darkness (John 3:19) and called good evil (Isa. 5:20) by attributing the miracle to the devil. It is the enlightened, willful, high-handed nature of such a sin that makes it unforgivable (not forgiven at death, as the Jews thought, but punished through eternity). First John 5:16 speaks of a sin unto death and Hebrews 6:4–6 speaks of those no agreement can bring to repentance: that is this type of sin. The person is not ignorant but chooses to reject God, to call God the devil. There is nothing more that can be said to such a person nor any miracle or evidence that would help him. By definition, then, no one who worries over committing this sin could have done it, for it rules out a troubled conscience. Instead it stands as a severe warning to those who know God’s truth not to turn from it or to abandon their faith.

P. H. DAVIDS

See also ETERNAL SIN; SIN UNTO DEATH.

Bibliography. C. K. Barrett, Holy Spirit and the Gospel Tradition; H. W. Beyer, TDNT 1:621–25; S. McKnight, EDBT 67–69; G. Smeaton, Doctrine of the Holy Spirit; N. Turner, Christian Words; G. H. Twelftree, DJG 75–77.

Bloesch, Donald G. (b. 1928). Theologian at the University of Dubuque, prolific author, and contestant for Christian orthodoxy, Bloesch is widely regarded as one of the foremost evangelical theologians of this century.

Bloesch's approach to theological resources is eclectic, based in his understanding of evangelical catholicity, and his interests are diverse, including classic theology, church renewal and piety, contemporary battles over and challenges to orthodoxy, and the difficult task of understanding evangelical identity. His theological method stresses the primacy of the inspiration of Scripture, and he is committed to the model of faith seeking understanding as reason in the service of revelation. He critically interacts with the thought of Karl Barth, and his theological judgments can be considered an evangelical reading of Barth.

Bloesch's early interests concerned Christian renewal, piety, and prayer; and theologically he has not moved beyond his concern for a pietistic understanding of these topics. His two-volume Essentials of Evangelical Theology addressed crucial but often contentious theological themes (God, authority, depravity, salvation, piety, ministry, heaven and hell, eschatology). He continues this project in his seven-volume series Christian Foundations, a substantial treatment of evangelical themes in conversation with contemporary theology. Regarding the concern with the language used to speak of God, trinitarianism, feminism, and sexism, Bloesch maintains that God transcends gender, but he argues that God is the ground, source, and creator of gender. In his volume on ethics, Freedom for Obedience, Bloesch argues that evangelical ethics must transcend cultural ideology by faith in God who transcends culture but condescends to reveal himself in historical events.

Bloesch's portrayal of evangelicalism as historical orthodoxy, or catholic in its identity, relies on the twin commitments of the redemptive work of Christ as declared in the Scriptures and the shared experience of conversion and witness to the world; that is, evangelicalism entails a definite doctrine as well as a special kind of experience. His optimism about catholic evangelicalism and his rejection of cultural fundamentalism are evident in his widely read Future of Evangelical Christianity. Bloesch's criticism of both antimodern conservatism and modernistic liberalism, his commitment to Scripture, and his sensitivity to history make him an influential voice in evangelical theology.

J. P. CALLAHAN

Bibliography. D. G. Bloesch, Battle for the Trinity: The Debate over Inclusive God-Language; Centers of Christian Renewal; Christian Foundations Series: God the Almighty; Holy Scripture; Theology of the Word and Spirit; Christian Life and Salvation; Christian Witness in a Secular Age: An Evaluation of Nine Contemporary The- ologians; Crisis of Piety: Essays Toward a Theology of Christian Life; Crumbling Foundations: Death and Rebirth in an Age of Upheaval; Essentials of Evangelical Theology; Evangelical Renaissance; Freedom for Obedience: Evangelical Ethics for Contemporary Times; Ground of Certainty: Toward an Evangelical Theology of Revelation; Invaded Church; Is the Bible Sexist?: Beyond Feminism and Patriarchalism; Jesus Is Victor!: Karl Barth's Doctrine of Salvation; Reform of the Church; Struggle of Prayer; Theological Notebook; Wellsprings of Renewal: Promise in Christian Communal Life.

Blood. The main question here is, Does the blood of Christ mean the death of Christ or the life of Christ released from the body? The second meaning would not normally occur to us, but some scholars hold that this is the view of the OT and that it is taken over into the NT.

The view is based on such passages as Leviticus 17:11: "For the life of a creature is in the blood, and I have given it to you to make atonement for yourselves on the altar; it is the blood that makes atonement for one's life." Sometimes it is said that "the blood is the life" (Deut. 12:23; cf. Gen. 9:4). It is claimed that such passages show that the Hebrews thought of life as somehow resident in the blood. When in the offering of sacrifice the blood of an animal was presented in the prescribed way, it is held that the life of the animal, now released from the body, was presented to God. It was unfortunate for the animal that it died in the process, but that is seen as incidental. The important thing is the freeing of life from the bonds of the body and its presentation to God.

It is contended that when we read in the NT of the blood of Christ, we should understand that Christ's life was set free for a higher purpose, that of bringing salvation. It is not easy to see what this view means. To say that we are saved by the death of Christ is meaningful, but it is not at all obvious how the life of Christ released from the body saves us. If that was the way of it, why did that life come to be in a body in the first place?

Despite the confident claims of those who put it forward, the view that this gives of the OT concept of sacrifice is not easy to sustain. The OT employs the word dām, "blood," three hundred sixty-two times, of which two hundred three refer to death and violence, one hundred three to the blood of sacrifices, seven connect life and blood, with which we should link seventeen that refer to eating meat with blood (as Lev. 17:14). The remaining thirty-two examples do not bear on our problem. These numbers show that when a Hebrew heard the word blood, the most likely association it would arouse would be "death."

No evidence is brought forward to prove that in sacrifice the important idea is the presentation of life. This is held to be obvious once the link between life and blood is pointed out. But that link means that there is a close connection between life and blood: when the blood is shed, the life is ended. However, the ceremonial manipulation of the blood in sacrifice seems to be the ritual presentation before God of the evidence that a death has taken place in obedience to his command. The words certainly do not unambiguously support the view that life is being released and presented to God.

Blood

In the OT in the overwhelming majority of cases blood means death. The passages that link it with life are exceptional. Again, the universal OT view is that sin is so serious that it is punished by death: "The soul who sins is the one who will die" (Ezek. 18:20). The shedding of blood in the sacrifice is most naturally understood as connected with this penalty. Indeed, most of the accounts of the sacrifices include some mention of the death of the victim while they say nothing about its life (e.g., Lev. 1:5). Again, to speak of the life as continuing to exist after the slaying of the animal is to overlook the strong Hebrew connection of life with the body. Life after death means the resurrection of the body, not the immortality of the soul. If a person's life was not thought of apart from the body, it is not easy to see a reason for holding that an animal's life was set free when released from the body. Again, where atonement is brought about by means other than blood, it is never by life, though it may be by death, as when Phinehas slew Zimri and Cozbi (Num. 25:13) or when David delivered seven descendants of Saul to be hanged (2 Sam. 21:3–14). The OT evidence is that blood means death, in the sacrifices as elsewhere.

As in the OT, the largest group in the ninety-eight occurrences of the word in the NT is that for death by violence (twenty-five times). The blood of animal sacrifices (twelve times) will also point to death if our conclusions from the OT are valid.

Some of the references to the blood of Christ must signify his death. Thus Colossians 1:20 refers to "his blood, shed on the cross." Little blood was shed in crucifixion, so that must mean simply his death. Again, Paul speaks of being "justified by his blood" and "saved from God's wrath through him," statements parallel to "reconciled to him through the death of his Son" and "saved through his life" (Rom. 5:9–10). There are references to death in the immediate context, and this is surely the force of "blood" also. Other passages where "blood" plainly means the death of Christ include John 6:53–56 (note the separation of flesh and blood); Acts 5:28; Ephesians 2:13; 1 John 5:6; Revelation 1:5; 19:13.

The references to Christ's blood as a sacrifice (Rom. 3:25; et al.) also point to death, as Hebrews 9:14–15 shows. The context indicates that sacrifice is in mind, but it goes on to refer to death.

The witness of Scripture is clear. Only by a particular interpretation of a few passages can a case be made for thinking that blood means life. When evidence is surveyed as a whole, there is no reasonable doubt that blood points, not to life set free, but to life given up in death. References to blood are a vivid way of saying that we owe our salvation to the death of Christ. L. L. MORRIS

See also ATONEMENT; BLOOD, SACRIFICIAL ASPECTS OF; OFFERINGS AND SACRIFICES IN BIBLE TIMES.

Bibliography. J. Behm, TDNT 1:172–77; S. C. Gayford, Sacrifice and Priesthood; B. Kedar-Kopfstein, TDOT 3:234–50; L. Morris, Apostolic Preaching of the Cross; Atonement; A. M. Stibbs, Meaning of the Word "Blood" in Scripture; F. J. Taylor, RTWB 33–34; V. Taylor, Jesus and His Sacrifice; H. C. Trumbull, Blood Covenant.

Blood, Sacrificial Aspects of. Leviticus 17:11 is the OT's central statement about the significance of blood in the sacrificial system, and what it asserts remains true throughout the regulations for individual sacrifices. (1) The blood of sacrifice is a divine provision: "I have given it to you." This counters any theory of sacrifice that sees in it a human gift designed to attract or excite divine favor. (2) The use of blood in sacrifice is a price-paying act: to make atonement. The meaning of blood must suit the function it fulfills. The verb (kipper) takes its meaning from the related noun (köper), "redemption price" (cf. Exod. 21:30; 30:12; Job 33:24). It means to pay whatever price matches (and cancels) the offense. If the blood pays the price, then its significance is not, as many hold, life released from the flesh and made available to become somehow a gift to God, but life forfeited or laid down in payment for sin. "The life of a creature is in the blood" in the ordinary sense that flesh and blood united make a living being or a living creature, while the separation of blood from flesh is the death of the creature. Thus, in biblical secular usage, to shed blood is to kill (cf. Gen. 9:6). (3) The shedding of the blood of sacrifice is a substitutionary act: the last clause of Leviticus 17:11 should be translated either the blood "makes atonement at the cost of the life" (i.e., the animal's life), or "makes atonement in the place of the life" (i.e., the sinner's life). For the use of the Hebrew preposition bē of price paying, see 1 Kings 2:23; Proverbs 7:23; of exact equivalence or substitution, see Deuteronomy 19:21; 2 Samuel 14:7. Hebrews 9:11–18 confirms in the NT the symbolism of blood as death and applies Leviticus 17:11 to the sacrifice of the Lord Jesus Christ. J. A. MOTYER

See also ATONEMENT; BLOOD; OFFERINGS AND SACRIFICES IN BIBLE TIMES.

Bibliography. R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel; L. Morris, Apostolic Preaching of the Cross; J. A. Motyer, "Priestly Sacrifices in the Old Testament," in Eucharistic Sacrifice, ed. J. I. Packer; G. J. Wenham, Book of Leviticus.

Boasting. Jeremiah 9:23–24 epitomizes the biblical perspective on boasting: "Let not the wise man boast of his wisdom, or the strong man boast of his strength or the rich man boast of his riches, but let him who boasts, boast about this: that he understands and knows me, that I am the LORD, who exercises kindness, justice and righteousness on earth." This passage, as do the entire OT and NT, repudiates boasting about oneself as misplaced praise and enjoins boasting in God, which is appropriately directed praise offered to one who is worthy. The theological premise for the impropriety of boasting in one's self and the propriety of boasting in God is the creature/Creator distinction and the assumption that what one is and does is a gift from God (1 Cor. 4:7) and what God is and does is intrinsic to him. To boast in one's self is to claim the praise and glory that belong to God; it is evil (cf. James 4:16). To boast in God is to give God the praise and glory that are rightfully his.

As is evident in Jeremiah 9:23–24, the same word can be used for the human-oriented boasting that is forbidden (e.g., 1 Kings 20:11; Pss. 10:3; 49:6; 52:1; 97:7; Prov. 20:14; 25:14; 27:1) and the God-oriented boasting that is encouraged (e.g., Pss. 34:2; 44:8). This is true of the most frequently used terms, the OT Hebrew root hālāl and the NT Greek kauch terms (negatively 1 Cor. 3:21; James 4:16; positively 2 Cor. 1:12; 2 Thess. 1:4). Other terms—e.g., the NT Greek alaz terms—are used negatively (Rom. 1:30; 2 Tim. 3:2; James 4:16).

Paul is the one in the NT who has the most to say about boasting—fifty-seven out of sixty-three occurrences of the kauch family of words (five instances are in James and one in Hebrews). He repudiates all boasting in one's righteousness, wisdom, or status before God (Rom. 2:23; 3:27; 4:2; 1 Cor. 1:29; Eph. 2:8–9). For Paul the one appropriate form of boasting is, "Let him who boasts, boast in the Lord" (Jer. 9:24 cited in 1 Cor. 1:31). Boasting in God, which is "through our Lord Jesus Christ" (Rom. 5:11) and "in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Gal. 6:14), encompasses all the aspects of God's work in one's life, and these therefore become occasions through which one may boast in praise and thanks to God. Thus, Paul may boast of individual churches (2 Cor. 1:14; 7:4, 14; 8:24; Phil. 2:16; 1 Thess. 2:19; 2 Thess. 1:4) and even of God's work in his own life (2 Cor. 1:12), because to do so is to give praise to God for what God has done. G. W. KNIGHT III

See also GLORY.

Bibliography. H. C. Hahn, NIDNTT 1:227–29.

Bodily Presence. See LORD'S SUPPER, VIEWS OF.

Bodily Resurrection. See RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD.

Bodily Resurrection of Christ. See RESURRECTION OF CHRIST.

Body, Biblical View of the. In the OT there is no single term corresponding to the NT sōma, the physical body, which is distinct from the soul and/or spirit. The Hebrew terms bāsār ("flesh") in Leviticus 14:9; 15:2; nēbēlā ("corpse, carcass") in 1 Kings 13:22, 24; and gēwīyā in 1 Samuel 31:10, 12 are among those most frequently translated sōma in the LXX and "body" in some of the English translations.

In the NT the word "body" is used approximately one hundred fifty times. The English term "body" is translated from kōlon ("a limb") one time (Heb. 3:17); chrōs ("skin") one time (Acts 19:12); sarx ("flesh") two times (Col. 2:5; Heb. 9:10); ptōma ("corpse") six times (Matt. 14:12; Mark 6:29; 15:45; Rev. 11:8–9); and sōma ("body") approximately one hundred forty times. This last usage is the concern of this article.

Physical Body. In addition to the human body, the bodies of animals are referred to (Gen. 15:11; Judg. 14:8–9; Dan. 7:11; Heb. 13:11; James 3:3). Only one passage refers to the body of a plant (1 Cor. 15:37–38). Also, there is one reference to terrestrial and celestial bodies (1 Cor. 15:40). Although there is no specific reference to angels having bodies, they seem to have an appearance similar to men because they are at times confused with them (Gen. 18:2, 16; Ezek. 9:2; Dan. 10:5–6, 10, 18; 12:6–7; Rev. 20:1).

Earthly Body. Clearly, the predominant usage in the Bible refers to the human body. It has become axiomatic to think of the body as more than the physical body; it is the person as a whole. This concept has been challenged by R. H. Gundry, who examines the usage of sōma in extrabiblical and biblical literature and concludes that it has reference to a person's physical body.

Another term for the physical body is the "flesh" (sarx). Sarx can refer to the bodily substance of man (John 3:6; Gal. 2:20; Phil. 1:22, 24) or of Christ (Rom. 8:3; Col. 1:22), and does not, as much, imply sinfulness. Although the sōma, like the sarx, is subject to lusts (Rom. 6:12) and is mortal (Rom. 6:12; 8:11; cf. 2 Cor. 4:11), it is different in several respects. (1) The body, which can be transformed, is the dwelling place of the Holy Spirit (Rom. 8:11; 1 Cor. 6:19), whereas in the flesh, or "sinful nature," nothing good dwells (Rom. 7:18). (2) The body is for the Lord and is to glorify him (1 Cor. 6:13, 20), whereas the flesh cannot please God (Rom. 8:8). (3) The body is to be an instrument of righteousness rather than sin

Body, Biblical View of the

(Rom. 6:12–13), whereas the flesh only serves as a beachhead for sin (Gal. 5:13) and is at enmity with God (Rom. 8:7; Gal. 5:16–17). (4) The body awaits redemption and resurrection (Rom. 8:23; 1 Cor. 15:35–49), whereas the flesh cannot be resurrected (1 Cor. 15:50) but is destined for death. (5) Since the body will be resurrected, it will face the judgment seat of Christ to be judged for the deeds done in the body (2 Cor. 5:10). The essential difference between the body and flesh is that the body can be transformed whereas the flesh cannot. The body can be used as an instrument for sin or righteousness, but the flesh cannot be an instrument for righteousness but only for sin. J. A. T. Robinson stated it succinctly: “While sarx stands for man, in the solidarity of the creation, in his distance from God, sōma stands for man, in the solidarity of creation, as made for God” (Body, 31).

Bultmann with his existential theology postulates that the sōma is speaking of the whole person rather than the physical body. Robert Jewett says, “Bultmann has turned sōma into its virtual opposite: a symbol for that structure of individual existence which is essentially non-physical” (Paul’s Anthropological Terms, 211). Gundry has responded with a needed correction by showing that the Scriptures present man as “a duality—i.e., a proper unity of two parts—of spirit and body. The spirit is that part through the instrumentality of which man lives in the material and eventful world” (Sōma in Biblical Theology, 201). Therefore, humans are more than just a body; they are physical and immaterial; they are body and soul and/or spirit. The scriptural dualism is not the same as Greek dualism, in which the soul is the prisoner of the body, but rather the body is the instrument through which the immaterial expresses itself. The material and immaterial parts of a person are on a par with one another. Both need redemption and both live eternally. Humans are not just body or just soul/spirit but the combination of them.

Resurrected Body. When a person dies, there is the separation of the immaterial from the material part. At the time of death the material or physical part continues to exist, although it is in the process of decay. For the Christian the body is described as being asleep, awaiting the coming of the Lord (1 Cor. 15:6, 18; 1 Thess. 4:13–16). The immaterial part, at least for the believer, departs immediately to be with the Lord (2 Cor. 5:6–8). Since a person is both immaterial and material, it is thought by many that between death and the resurrection there is an intermediate body. However, since this theory is based primarily on inferences in the story of the rich man and Lazarus (Luke 16:19–31), one cannot be too dogmatic regarding the nature of the intermediate state.

In 1 Corinthians 15:35–49 Paul describes the resurrected body. It is contrasted with the preresurrected body, which is set forth as a “soulish body” or a material body that is governed by the soul. In the creation of Adam, God made him from the dust of the earth and breathed into him and he became a living soul (Gen. 2:7; 1 Cor. 15:45). The human body was designed for earthly existence and is mortal. The resurrected body is described as a “spiritual body” (1 Cor. 15:44). This does not describe its composition but states rather that it is a material body governed by the spirit. It is immortal and designed for a heavenly existence (1 Cor. 15:50–53). Certainly the resurrected body was matter that could be observed by the many people who had seen Christ in his resurrected body (1 Cor. 15:5–8). Also, in the Gospel and Acts narratives Christ was seen by his disciples (Matt. 16:20; 28:9–10; Mark 16:9, 12, 14–18; Luke 24:13–52; John 20:14–21:25; Acts 1:1–11). Although the resurrected body of Christ did have some similarities to the preresurrected body in that he breathed (John 20:22), ate (Luke 24:42–43), and was recognizable (John 20:27–29), it also was different because he was not always immediately recognizable (Luke 24:16–31; John 20:14; 21:4); he could walk through doors or walls (John 20:19, 26; Luke 24:36) and rapidly traverse great distances (Matt. 28:7–10). In conclusion, even though the pre- and postresurrected bodies are contrasted by Paul as perishable/imperishable, dishonor/glory, weakness/power, natural/spiritual (1 Cor. 15:42–44), both are nevertheless physical or material.

Body of Christ. Physical Body. The NT specifically speaks of Christ’s physical body in connection with his death (Matt. 27:58–59; Mark 15:43–45; Luke 23:52; 24:3, 23; John 19:38, 40; 20:12; Col. 1:22; Heb. 10:10). Furthermore, it was a body that could be seen, touched, and heard (John 1:14; 1 John 1:1–3). Jesus’ body had characteristic members of a normal human body. Also, characteristically Jesus was hungry and ate, drank, and became weary. Nothing in the Gospels indicates that Jesus had a body other than a normal human body; neither his friends nor enemies made any remarks to that effect. While on earth he had the frailties of other humans in their bodies.

Communion. At the Last Supper, after Jesus broke the bread, he said, “This is my body” (Matt. 26:26; Mark 14:22; Luke 22:19; 1 Cor. 11:24). With the Passover meal being the setting of that Last Supper, the breaking of the bread symbolized the sacrifice of Jesus’ body as a substitutionary death for all humankind. Paul warns the Corinthians that whoever eats the bread in an unworthy manner is guilty of profaning the body of the Lord (1 Cor. 11:27) and whoever eats and drinks brings judgment upon himself if he does not discern the body (v. 29). Hence the desecration of the Lord's Supper brings shame to Jesus' physical death as the sacrifice for sin and, in the case of many of the Corinthians, it brought judgment upon their physical bodies (v. 30).

Body of Believers. The theological usage of sōma refers to the body of Christ or the church (Rom. 12:5; 1 Cor. 10:16–17; 12:12–27; Eph. 1:23; 2:16; 4:4, 12, 16; 5:23, 30; Col. 1:18, 24; 2:19; 3:15). Here one sees the metaphorical use of “body”; the believers’ are united by the Holy Spirit to Christ in one body. The usage of the individual members of the body and their relationship to each other vividly depicts both the relationship of believers with one another and with Christ and the diversity and unity within the body of Christ (1 Cor. 12:12–31). A theological development of the body of Christ is seen. In Romans 12:4–8 and 1 Corinthians 12:12–30 Paul speaks of the body of Christ as believers with various spiritual gifts unified in their function in the local church setting. Although this same concept is expressed in Paul's later writings (cf. Eph. 4:4–12; 5:30; Col. 3:15), there is the additional feature of Christ being the head of the church (Eph. 1:22; 4:15; 5:23; Col. 1:18; 2:19) with greater emphasis on the universal aspect (Eph. 2:16–18; 3:6; 4:4–16). Therefore, “body” is used metaphorically in “the body of Christ,” and it is compared with the human physical body to denote diversity and unity.

Conclusion. Outside the metaphorical use of “body” with reference to the body of Christ, the term body is consistently used as meaning the physical or material body. Even in the metaphorical usage of the body it is compared with the physical or material body. Humans are more than just physical or material bodies; they are a combination of both the material and immaterial.

H. W. HOEHNER

See also FLESH; MANKIND, DOCTRINE OF.

Bibliography. C. B. Bass, ISBE (Rev.) 1:528–31; J. C. Beker, Paul the Apostle; E. Best, One Body in Christ; R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament, 1:192–203; R. H. Gundry, Sōma in Biblical Theology; D. Guthrie, New Testament Theology; R. Jewett, Paul's Anthropological Terms; IDBSup, 117–18; G. E. Ladd, Theology of the New Testament; S. V. McCasland, IDB 1:451–52; H. Ridderbos, Paul: An Outline of His Theology; J. A. T. Robinson, Body; E. Schweizer and G. Baumgärtel, TDNT 7:1024–94; S. Wibbling, NIDNTT 1:232–38.

Body and Soul. See DICHOTOMY; MANKIND, DOCTRINE OF.

Body of Christ. See CHURCH.

Body, Soul, and Spirit. See MANKIND, DOCTRINE OF; TRICHOTOMY.

Boehme, Jakob (1575–1624). German Lutheran mystic and theosophist. A sickly child who received only an elementary education, he became a shoemaker in Görlitz and throughout his life was active as a merchant and family man, living during some of the difficult times of the Thirty Years' War. Such activities stand in sharp contrast to his mystical experiences, which began in 1600 with a vision induced by a reflection of the sun in a pewter dish. This vision and his subsequent mystical insights led him to write numerous books, including Aurora or Day Dawning, On the Three Principles of Divine Being, Six Theosophical Points, Six Mystical Points, and Way to Christ.

Although he relied heavily on his own mystical approach, Boehme's work shows the influence of Schwenckfeld, Paracelsus, Valentine Weigel, Renaissance Neoplatonism, and Jewish mysticism. The obscure and unusual terminology he used makes the interpretation of his works difficult. His works have been likened to a picnic to which Boehme brings the words and the reader brings the meaning. His dependence upon myth and symbol rather than concepts leads to a manner of expression that is contemplative rather than discursive.

His thought centers on the problem of the unity of good and evil. Much of his work involves an elaborate sevenfold system that explains the divine activity as reflected in nature. These seven qualities divide into two triads, a higher and a lower, between which there is creative energy called the flash. The lower group consists of individualization, diffusion, and the struggle between the two. The higher triad consists of love, expression, and the kingdom of God. People must choose between the lower world of sensation or die to self and live on the higher plane. The true Christian life is an imitation of the sacrifice and triumph of Christ.

These teachings, when coupled with Boehme's opposition to scholastic Protestantism, led to his condemnation by a Lutheran pastor, and for a time he ceased his publications (1612–19). Despite such troubles his influence has been very great in Germany, where the pietist, romantic, and idealist movements each owed something to his teaching, and in England, where the Cambridge Platonists, John Milton, Isaac Newton, William Blake, William Law, and the Behmenists followed his ideas.

R. G. CLOUSE

See also MYSTICISM.

Bibliography. J. Boehme, Way to Christ, P. Erb, trans.; F. Hartman, Jacob Boehme: Life and Doctrines; R. M. Jones, Spiritual Reformers in the 16th and 17th Centuries; J. J. Stoudt, Sunrise to Eternity: A Study of Jacob Boehme's Life; N. Thune, Behmenists and the Philadelphians.

Boethius, Anicius Manlius Torquatus Severinus

Boethius, Anicius Manlius Torquatus Severinus (ca. 480–524). Called by many “the last of the Romans and the first of the scholastics.” A man of prodigious activity and brilliant intellect, Boethius bridged the gap between the ancient and medieval by his enormous literary output. His goal was to translate into Latin all of Aristotle and Plato; thus, these works were made accessible to the Middle Ages. In addition to translations, his writings are in four areas: theological (five survive); philosophical (Consolation of Philosophy, which has been translated repeatedly into almost every European language); works on the four arts of the quadrivium; and logic (most of these survive).

Boethius saw the task of theology as that of making distinctions between reason and faith. Reason was to be marshaled to support faith. He set out to explain the Trinity in terms of Aristotelian categories. God is supersubstantially one with the three persons as internal relations. Since God is and wills the good, evil has no positive existence. Such an approach shows both that Boethius was indebted to Neoplatonism and Stoicism and that he was the logical forerunner of Thomas Aquinas.

Boethius was born in Rome into the Christian family of Anicii, one member of which, Olybrius, was briefly emperor in 472. After his father died in 487, he was raised by the able Senator Symmachus, whose daughter, Rusticana, he married. Boethius became a friend of the Ostrogothic ruler of Rome, Theodoric, who made him a consul of Rome in 510. He may have been head of the Senate, and ca. 520 he was made magister officiorum, head of all civil and other services of Rome. But in 522, shortly after he greeted his two children in the Senate as joint consuls, he was accused of treason by Theodoric, who had become suspicious of all Romans and Christians. It is uncertain whether Boethius was conspiring against Theodoric, but among the charges against him were conspiracy in favor of Emperor Justin I of Constantinople, writing seditious letters, and the practice of magic. Theodoric banished him to prison in Pavia and beheaded him without trial in 524 or 525. It was while he was in prison that Boethius wrote his greatest work, Consolation of Philosophy. V. L. WALTER Bibliography. H. M. Barrett, Boethius: Some Aspects of His Times and Work; H. Chadwick, Boethius: The Consolations of Music, Logic, Theology, and Philosophy; L. Cooper, Concordance of Boethius; M. Gibson, ed., Boethius: His Life, Writings, and Influence; R. M. McInerney, Boethius and Aquinas; H. R. Patch, Tradition of Boethius; H. F. Stewart, Boethius: An Essay.

Bogomils. See CATHARI.

Bohemian Brethren (Unitas Fratrum). A moderate midfifteenth-century group established in the Hussite tradition. After the turmoil and conflict following John Huss's death (1415), many communities arose, convinced that his views on reformation in life and doctrine had been imperfectly realized. Influenced initially by the Utraquist archbishop Rokycana and Peter Chelcicky, one such group under Brother Gregory withdrew to Kunwald, northeast Bohemia, ca. 1457. Its community resembled that of the Waldenses or the Friends of God, with a name later latinized as Unitas Fratrum. Its members rejected military service, oath-taking, the study of science (which sought “to justify every error by Scripture”), and participation in church or civil administration. They stressed practical Christianity in personal and communal life. The spiritual leadership from ca. 1490 came from Brother Lucas, who brought order into its constitution, worship, and doctrine. After his death in 1528 closer relations were established with Lutheranism, but persecution by resurgent Catholicism forced most of the Brethren in Bohemia and (later) Moravia to seek refuge in Poland, Hungary, and Germany where they founded the settlement of Herrnhut. With Zinzendorf they revived the Unity of the Brethren, whose adherents in Poland included J. A. Comenius. J. D. DOUGLAS Bibliography. W. G. Addison, Renewed Church of the United Brethren, 1722–1930; J. H. Clewell, History of Wachovia, The Moravian Church in North Carolina, 1752–1902; E. de Schweinitz, History of the Church Known as the Unitas Fratrum; J. T. Hamilton, History of the Moravian Church during the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Centuries; “History of the Unitas Fratrum or Moravian Church in the United States of America,” in American Church History Series 8:425–508; E. R. Hassé, Moravians; J. E. Hutton, “Moravian Contribution to the Evangelical Revival in England, 1742–55,” in T. F. Tont and J. Tart, eds., Historical Essays by Members of the Owens College, Manchester, A History of the Moravian Church; History of Moravian Missions; R. T. Jenkins, Moravian Brethren in North Wales; E. Langton, History of the Moravian Church; J. J. Sessler, Communal Pietism among Early American Moravians; M. Spinka, John Hus and the Czech Reform; E. J. Whately, Gospel in Bohemia: Sketches of Bohemian Religious History; J. K. Zeman, Anabaptists and the Czech Brethren in Moravia 1526–1628: A Study of Religious Contacts.

Bonaventure (1221–1274). Franciscan scholastic theologian; doctor of the church (Seraphicus) canonized in 1482. Born near Viterbo, in Tuscany, and baptized John Fidanza, in or around the year 1234 he began the study of theology under Alexander of Hales in Paris, where he taught from 1248 to 1255. In 1256 he was appointed to a chair of theology in Paris, but for local reasons the university did not confer its doctorate, with the right officially to occupy the chair, until a year later. By that time Bonaventure, who had entered the Franciscan Order in or about 1238, was chosen as general of the order and thereafter never resumed his teaching activity. In 1273 he was created cardinal archbishop of Albano; the next year he attended the council of Lyons but died unexpectedly there.

Bonaventure's main written works were a commentary on the Sentences of Peter Lombard, the standard theological textbook of that day; Itinerarium mentis ad Deum (journey of the mind, or soul, toward God); and Breviloquium. One central theme of his theology is the journey, or rather the ascent, of the human soul toward God. In this pilgrimage there are three stages. First, since God has left his footprints in the visible world, which he called into being, reason can argue from effects to cause and deduce the existence and power of the Creator from his earthly creation. Since humans are made in God's image, the second stage in this journey is to turn to the inner world of the human soul, with its powers of memory, intellect, and will. This will deepen and enhance the sense of God's being and unity. The doctrine of the Trinity, however, can be known only by supernatural revelation, which discloses that God the Father, who is infinitely good and ever active, gives rise to two processions, one of the Son and the other of the Holy Spirit. The third and final stage of the ascent to God goes beyond reason. It is the mystical contemplation of the ineffable joys of the divine presence, and is the pure gift of the Holy Spirit.

Although Bonaventure allowed Aristotle a limited place in his system, his viewpoint is fundamentally Augustinian in its basic religious orientation and philosophical principles. N. V. HOPE Bibliography. E. Bettoni, Saint Bonaventure; Bonaventure, Mind's Road to God, G. Boas, trans.; J. G. Bougerol, Introduction to the Works of Bonaventure; É. Gilson, Philosophy of Saint Bonaventure.

Bonhoeffer, Dietrich (1906–1945). Lutheran pastor and theologian whose life and legacy have exerted a worldwide influence on theological thought, Christian imagination, piety, and practice in the post-World War II era. Born in Breslau, Germany, Bonhoeffer was executed at the age of thirty-nine in a Nazi concentration camp. At that time he had not attained the international recognition and fame that have been accorded him since the 1950s. It was after the posthumous publication and translation of his Letters and Papers from Prison (first released in 1951) that Bonhoeffer came to the attention of Christendom throughout the world. This volume of his collected correspondence, smuggled out of his prison cell in Berlin-Tegel, was never intended by Bonhoeffer for publication, yet it has become the most popular of his many books. When he wrote the letters, he was imprisoned on charges connected with the smuggling of fourteen Jews to Switzerland and safety.

Bonhoeffer's earlier life hardly pointed him toward a prison cell. A brilliant student, one of eight children in the family of a leading psychiatrist at the University of Berlin, Bonhoeffer received his doctorate in theology from the University of Berlin at the age of twenty-one. After postgraduate work at Union Theological Seminary in New York City, he became Lutheran chaplain and lecturer at the University of Berlin, where he was ministering when Hitler came to power in 1933. Bonhoeffer joined the Confessing Church, consisting of one-third of the Protestant clergy, led by Martin Niemöller, and concerned laity, who in the Barmen Declaration of 1934 protested Nazi inroads and challenges to the integrity of the Christian church in Germany.

After two years as pastor of a German congregation in London (1933–35), Bonhoeffer became director of the Confessing Church seminary in Finkenwalde. Not only was this seminary closed by the Nazi regime in 1937, but Bonhoeffer was eventually forbidden to publish or speak publicly. Although he considered the possibility of accepting the safety of an American teaching position in 1939, he finally decided that if he wanted to serve his fellow Germans as a Christian minister during the impending war, he would have to return to his homeland and suffer with them. His brother-in-law, Hans von Dohnanyi, brought Bonhoeffer into the inner circles of the anti-Nazi resistance and employed him as a double agent in the German military intelligence office (Abwehr). Ostensibly using his international ecumenical connections for Abwehr purposes, Bonhoeffer actually transmitted to the British messages from the group of Germans planning to kill Hitler.

Bonhoeffer's two years as a Nazi prisoner (1943–45), although initially a time of intense spiritual testing, led him to develop a routine of disciplined contemplation and creativity, resulting in writings focused on contemporary and future challenges facing the Christian church. Assessing Christianity's role in "a world come of age," Bonhoeffer's prison letters described a Christian as "a man for others" and the church existing "for others." "Who is Christ for us today?" was his piercing query.

One of Bonhoeffer's most misunderstood concepts concerns a nonreligious interpretation of Christianity. "Religionless Christianity," a term sometimes taken out of context, was used by Bonhoeffer in a letter written to his friend Eberhard Bethge, with whom he shared a common theological heritage and understanding. The phrase is based on a critique of "religion" found in the works of Martin Luther and Karl Barth, both of whom distinguished between faith and religion. According to Luther, religion comes from the flesh, faith from the spirit. For Bonhoeffer the religious act was always something partial, while faith involved the whole of one's life; he understood the call of Jesus "not to a new religion, but to life." The Christian, said Bonhoeffer, participates in the suffering of God in the secular life. Bonhoeffer's emphasis on a "secular interpretation" of Christianity reflects his perception of Europe's historical movement toward a "completely religionless time." Although some of his fragmentary thoughts were later used by theologians who may not have shared his original presuppositions and worldview ("death of God" theologians), Bonhoeffer's earlier works continually stir resonances in traditional centers of Christian piety, both evangelical Protestant and Roman Catholic. Most popular in these circles are Cost of Discipleship (emphasizing obedience, "costly grace" versus "cheap grace") and Life Together (focusing on the discipline and balance of Christian community life).

Bonhoeffer, Dietrich

Sparking responses in both conservative and liberal wings of Christianity, in secular and Marxist writings, Bonhoeffer has also been a source of inspiration and strength for all contemporary Christians who suffer under oppressive political regimes and for Christians in the Third World, especially in Latin America, where liberation theology has drawn on the model of his life and thought. During the years of apartheid rule in South Africa, leaders of the antiapartheid protest movement read Bonhoeffer's books even while imprisoned; in postapartheid South Africa Bonhoeffer's life and writings remain a vital Christian witness for both black and white community leaders who seek to establish and to maintain a just society. Born to privilege, but with a special sensitivity to life's boundary experience, Bonhoeffer spoke of the incomparable value of learning to see the world with "the view from below"—the perspective of the outcast, the powerless, and the oppressed. Thus, he articulated and anticipated the central lesson that Christians, particularly in the privileged West, still need to learn today.

R. ZERNER

Bibliography. W. W. Floyd Jr., gen. ed., Dietrich Bonhoeffer Works; E. Bethge, Bonhoeffer: Exile and Martyr; Dietrich Bonhoeffer, Theologian, Christian, Contemporary; K. W. Clements, Patriotism for Today: Dialogue with Dietrich Bonhoeffer; J. W. De Gruchy, Bonhoeffer and South Africa; Dietrich Bonhoeffer: Witness to Jesus Christ; A. Dumas, Dietrich Bonhoeffer, Theologian of Reality; E. Feil, Theology of Dietrich Bonhoeffer; J. Godsey, Theology of Dietrich Bonhoeffer; J. Godsey and G. B. Kelly, eds., Ethical Responsibility: Bonhoeffer's Legacy to the Churches; C. J. Green, Bonhoeffer: The Sociality of Christ and Humanity; G. Huntemann, Other Bonhoeffer: An Evangelical Reassessment of Dietrich Bonhoeffer; A. J. Klassen, ed., Bonhoeffer Legacy; R. W. Lovin, Christian Faith and Public Choices; M. Marty, ed., Place of Bonhoeffer; H. Ott, Reality and Faith: The Theological Legacy of Dietrich Bonhoeffer; L. Rasmussen, Dietrich

Bonhoeffer: Reality and Resistance; R. G. Smith, ed., World Come of Age; R. Wind, Dietrich Bonhoeffer: A Spoke in the Wheel; W. D. Zimmermann and R. G. Smith, eds., I Knew Dietrich Bonhoeffer.

Book of Common Order. The title used historically by the Church of Scotland and associated Presbyterian churches for their liturgical handbooks. The latest edition bearing the name was published for the Church of Scotland in 1979 and contains forms of service in the traditional "Thou" style of addressing God as well as in more contemporary "You" form.

Contents of this book are the divine service (one shortened and three full orders for Holy Communion together with an outline order of service for public worship when the Lord's Supper is not celebrated), services for Christian initiation, the celebration of marriage, funerals, and the ordination and admission of elders. It also contains a lectionary, two sets of collects, and proper prefaces for the Christian year.

The first book to bear this title was published by authority of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland in 1562 and contained texts for the ministration of the sacraments. Two years later a further edition included material for all purposes, including metrical psalms and versions of other portions of Scripture. The first edition had been largely based on what was known as John Knox's Genevan Service Book (1556), introduced by the Reformer for the English congregation in Geneva, which consisted largely of exiles from the reign of Mary. The attempt to replace the Book of Common Order by the so-called Laudian Liturgy of 1637 precipitated the Solemn League and Covenant, but in 1644 it was displaced by the Directory of Public Worship.

As the Book of Common Order had never been an absolute formulary like the Book of Common Prayer in England, but rather a standard and model of worship, the minister was given freedom for extempore prayer as well as flexibility of usage. This led to very "free" types of services in some churches during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, but this century has seen the resurrection of the Book of Common Order. The United Free Church of Scotland published a book of this title in 1928, and then the Church of Scotland itself, after reuniting with that church, produced the 1940 edition of the Book of Common Order, later revised in 1952. As well as the usual services, this handbook had interesting forms for the dedication of various church buildings and furniture as well as some useful devotional material in prayers for special occasions and graces.

D. H. WHEATON

Bibliography. H. Davies, Worship and Theology in England; W. D. Maxwell, Outline of Christian Worship.

Book of Common Prayer. Historically three books have borne this title in the Church of England, though the title has also been applied to books in other provinces of the Anglican Communion that have been largely derived from these three.

In 1549 the English Parliament passed an Act of Uniformity requiring the clergy to use for the Feast of Pentecost in that year “the Book of the Common Prayer and Administration of the Sacraments and other Rites and Ceremonies of the Church after the Use of the Church of England.” This revised and reformed handbook of worship was largely the work of the archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Cranmer, and in his preface, Cranmer explained that it was to provide common prayer in two senses of the word. From that time the worship of the Church of England, hitherto almost entirely in Latin, was to be in the common tongue (“suche language . . . as they mighte understande and have profite by hearyng the same”), and a common usage in every diocese where previously there had been several different uses.

In conducting worship the clergy had previously needed the missal (for the Mass), breviary (for daily offices), manual (for the occasional offices), and pontifical (for episcopal services). The new book contained all of these except the ordinal (for ordination services), which was published separately in 1550 and revised and bound up in the editions of 1552 and 1662. In addition it included a calendar and lectionary and the litany, together with Coverdale’s translation of the Psalter.

The first prayer book met with little favor. Protestants felt that it did not go far enough in its reforms, and in 1551 Martin Bucer published a critique, in which he set out in detail the areas where the book obscured clear biblical teaching. Further, those who leaned toward Roman Catholicism (notably Bishop Gardiner of Winchester) claimed that the book still taught the old doctrines of the Mass. In consequence Cranmer produced a second prayer book in 1552 in which the Protestant position was much more clearly adopted. These books are known as the First and Second Prayer books of King Edward the Sixth.

When Mary Tudor ascended the English throne in 1553, this second prayer book was proscribed as she reestablished the teaching and practices of the Church of Rome and leading Protestants were martyred. In 1559 Elizabeth I restored the second book with minor alterations. During the next century, with the accession of James I in 1603 and the restoration of Charles II in 1660, the ongoing struggle between extreme Puritans and Episcopalians smoldered continuously, and the Hampton Court (1604) and Savoy (1661) conferences were held in an attempt to resolve the matters at issue. In the end relatively few changes were made, and the 1662 Act of Uniformity introduced a third Book of Common Prayer that was basically that of 1552 in its theological emphasis.

In 1637 the High Church archbishop of Canterbury, William Laud, had attempted to impose on the Scottish church a book that was much more akin to that of 1549 in its doctrinal outlook. Although he was unsuccessful, his book formed the basis of the Book of Common Prayer adopted by the Scottish Episcopal Church in 1764. By a strange quirk of history the Protestant Episcopal Church in America drew on this book in compiling its liturgy, and thus today the Anglican Communion embraces provinces of more Catholic or Protestant theological outlook depending on whether their liturgy is ultimately derived from the 1549 or 1552 archetype.

In 1872 the Act of Uniformity Amendment Act allowed certain modifications in the way the services of the prayer book were used in the Church of England, permitting certain omissions, mainly on weekdays; hence the act became known as the Shortened Services Act. However, no amendment of the text was made at this stage.

A revision of the Book of Common Prayer was proposed in the Church of England in 1927, and although it was approved by the church’s Convocations and House of Laity of Church Assembly, the book was rejected by Parliament largely because it reintroduced controversial pre-Reformation ideas, particularly in the Communion service. Since then the Worship and Doctrine Measure of 1974 has given the Church of England greater freedom to control its liturgy, and in consequence the Alternative Service Book was published in 1980 to supplement with modern services, but not to supersede, the Book of Common Prayer. Authorization of the latter can still be withdrawn only by Parliament.

In the United States, the English Book of Common Prayer was adapted in the aftermath of the American Revolution. Bishop William White of Philadelphia edited one version in the 1780s, which was not adopted by the Episcopal Church, but which a century later was adopted by the Low Church Reformed Episcopal Church. Bishop Samuel Seabury’s edition of the Prayer Book of 1662, somewhat influenced by modifications made by English Nonjurors (1764), became official for the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America (1789), as the former colonial church—newly reorganized after the American Revolution—styled itself. In 1892 and in 1928, the Book of Common Prayer was revised by General Convention, although the basic structure, language, and theology of the Cranmerian tradition were retained. However, in the 1970s, the Episcopal Church followed in the wake of Vatican II, wrestling with a variety of updated language services. In 1979 General Convention authorized a revised Book of Common Prayer that contained two rites, one with modified theology but traditional-sounding wording and another with contemporary language coupled with greater modifications in the underlying theological basis of the Daily Office and Communion services. In addition to the two basic rites, there were a total of six authorized eucharistic prayers, plus an unstructured outline that could be utilized to develop still more. The 1979 Prayer Book has been controversial among traditional Episcopalians, and it served as a cause of separation for several of the Continuing Churches, all of which reject that edition in favor of the 1928 Prayer Book. In addition to the English and American Prayer Books, the Book of Common Prayer is the Anglican standard of worship in Canada (1922, 1959, 1985), Australia (1978), Scotland (1637, 1929), and New Zealand. D. H. WHEATON AND K. W. RICK Bibliography. C. O. Buchanan, B. T. Lloyd, and H. Miller, eds., Anglican Worship Today; G. J. Cuming, History of Anglican Liturgy; S. Sykes and J. Booty, eds., Study of Anglicanism.

Book of Common Prayer

Book of Concord. See CONCORD, BOOK OF.

Book of Life. In ancient cities the names of citizens were recorded in a register until their death; then their names were marked out of the book of the living. This same idea appears in the OT (Exod. 32:32–33; Ps. 69:28; Isa. 4:3). From the idea of being recorded in God's book of the living (or the righteous) comes the sense of belonging to God's eternal kingdom or possessing eternal life (Dan. 12:1; Luke 10:20; Phil. 4:3; Heb. 12:23; Rev. 13:8; 17:8; 20:15; 21:27). For Christ to say that he will never blot out the overcomer's name from the book of life (Rev. 3:5) is the strongest affirmation that death can never separate us from Christ and his life (cf. Rom. 8:38–39). A person enrolled in the book of life by faith remains in it by faithfulness and can be erased only by disloyalty. There is some evidence that a person's name could be removed from the city register before death if he were convicted of a crime. In the first century Christians who were loyal to Christ were under constant threat of being branded political and social rebels and then stripped of their citizenship. But Christ offers them an eternal, safe citizenship in his everlasting kingdom if only they remain loyal to him.

In Revelation 13:8 it has been debated whether the words "from the creation of the world" (also 17:8) belong grammatically with "have not been written" or with "that was slain." In other words, is it the Lamb who was slain from the creation of the world? In Greek either interpretation is grammatically acceptable. But the reference in Revelation 17:8 implies that the word order in the Greek (not the grammar) favors the latter view and suggests that John is deliberately providing a complementary thought to 17:8. In the former instance, the emphasis would rest on the decree in eternity to elect the Son as the redeeming agent for humankind's salvation (13:8; 1 Pet. 1:20); in the latter, stress lies on God's eternal foreknowledge of a company of people who would participate in the elect Son's redeeming work (17:8). In any event, the words "from the creation of the world" cannot be pressed to prove eternal individual election to salvation or damnation, since Revelation 3:5 implies that failure of appropriate human response may remove one's name from the book of life.

A. F. JOHNSON

Bibliography. A. A. Anderson, Psalms (1–72); T. W. Davis, EDBT 74; H. B. Swete, Apocalypse of John.

Booth, Catherine (1829–1890). "Mother of The Salvation Army." Born Catherine Mumford in Derbyshire, a Wesleyan preacher's daughter, she was among those expelled from her church in 1848 for ideas regarded as overenthusiastic. William Booth ministered to this group. He and Catherine married in 1855, and thereafter she played a prominent part in founding the movement that became The Salvation Army in 1878. She was a pioneer in establishing and defending the right of women to preach and in combating the exploitation of women and children (she herself was the mother of eight). Within the Army she consolidated the principle that women have absolute equality with men in privilege, position, and dignity, and she played no small part in winning the sympathy of the upper classes for the new movement. She published a number of papers on practical religion, godliness, aggressive witnessing, popular Christianity, and the Army's position in relation to church and state. In 1888 she was stricken with cancer, and she died in 1890 after great suffering. About this she would say, "God must have permitted it for a great and worthy purpose." Her writings include Aggressive Christianity (1883), Popular Christianity (1887), and Papers on Practical Religion (1890).

J. D. DOUGLAS

See also BOOTH, WILLIAM.

Bibliography. M. Batchelor, Catherine Bramwell-Booth; C. Bramwell-Booth, Catherine Booth; R. J. Green, Catherine Booth; D. Lamb, "Catherine Booth," in Great Christians, R. S. Forman, ed.; C. T. Stead, Mrs. Booth; F. Tucker, Life of Catherine Booth.

Booth, William (1829–1912). Founder of The Salvation Army. Born in Nottingham, he grew up amid poverty, became a pawnbroker's assistant, was converted at fifteen, and subsequently became a Methodist pastor. A missing dimension in his ministry, however, made him restless. For Booth, the Lord's requirements involved loosing the chains of injustice, freeing the captive and oppressed, sharing food and home, clothing the naked, and carrying out family responsibilities. Victorian England, on the other hand, upheld God-appointed stations, especially for the poor. William Booth argued that to speak of godly poverty was no indication that God approved destitution. For him this was no theological issue: people did not stop dying in hopelessness and squalor while theologians discussed nice points of divinity.

Aided by the remarkable Catherine, whom he married in 1855, he began the Christian Mission as a rescue operation in London's East End. Renamed The Salvation Army thirteen years later (1878), it waged war on a dual front—against the pinch of poverty and the power of sin. Mainline churches shunned the new movement; magistrates and police offered little protection when mobs jeered, threw stones, broke windows, vandalized the Army's property. Booth pressed on, seeking castaways; exposing vice; providing homes, food, employment, and medical care; reconciling families; and giving unwelcome publicity to frightful social conditions that no other agency would tackle.

On the basis that the devil was a proud spirit who could not bear to be mocked, Booth identified him as the chief enemy, challenged his monopoly of "all the best tunes," and used the big drum to deafen him. Booth fearlessly waged war against such contemporary evils as the sweat shops and girls sold into prostitution. In 1890 he published In Darkest England—and the Way Out, which set the tone for the Army's increasing emphasis on its social program for which, rather than for the message of "blood and fire," the movement is best known today.

His Army spread throughout the world, but Booth was always very much in control. A writer sent to interview him said he expected to meet a visionary and saint, and found instead the most astute businessman in the city of London. Booth was responsible for a whole network of social and regenerative agencies; Lord Wolseley once described him as the world's greatest organizer.

Criticism came because Booth's Army observed no sacraments. Booth denied he was against them. Perhaps the wranglings these had caused in other churches did not encourage him to change his mind. By the time the century closed, Booth had won his fight: freeman of London, honorary doctor of Oxford, guest at the coronation of Edward VII and of the United States Senate, which he opened with prayer. In 1912 "the General laid down his sword"—and people of all ranks were among the thousands of funeral mourners.

J. D. DOUGLAS

See also BOOTH, CATHERINE.

Bibliography. H. Begbie, Life of General William Booth; B. Booth, Echoes and Memories; R. Collier, General next to God; F. Coutts, Bread for My Neighbour; No Discharge in This War; S. J. Ervine, God's Soldier; R. J. Green, Theology of William Booth; E. H. McKinley, Marching to Glory; A. M. Nicol, General Booth and the Salvation Army.

Born Again. See REGENERATION.

Bossuet, Jacques Bénigne (1627–1704). Perhaps the leading French churchman of the seventeenth century. An important figure in the entourage of Louis XIV, he served as tutor to the king's son and as defender of the independent authority of the French church in opposition to papal claims. He was also a great orator, controversialist, and a formulator of philosophy of history.

Born in Dijon, Bossuet began his studies at the Jesuit school there and completed them at the College of Navarre in Paris. After seven years as canon and archdeacon in Metz (where he tangled with the Reformers), he went to Paris in 1659 and soon became preacher in the royal chapel. In 1681 he became bishop of Meaux, a position he held until his death.

While tutor to the dauphin, Bossuet wrote three important works. The first, a theological Treatise, was a discussion of the nature of God and the nature of man. The second, Discourse on Universal History, followed in the tradition of Augustine's City of God and took the position that the whole course of history was guided by providence. In this work he covered history chronologically from the creation to the reign of Charlemagne. The Politique reminded the dauphin that sovereigns have duties as well as rights and looked forward to a time when France would become a utopia with a Christian philosopher on the throne.

Just as Bossuet became bishop of Meaux, he found it necessary to preside over a conclave of French clergy the king called to defend royal powers and the rights of the French church against the claims of the pope. In his later years he became embroiled in various controversies with rationalist, pantheistic, mystical, Quietistic, and Protestant groups.

H. F. VOS

See also GALLICAN ARTICLES, FOUR; QUIETISM.

Bibliography. J. B. Bossuet, Complete Works; K. Löwith, Meaning in History; E. K. Sanders, Jacques Bénigne Bossuet; W. J. Simpson, Study of Bossuet.

Boston, Thomas (1676–1732). Scottish evangelical minister and leader in the Marrow Controversy. Educated at Edinburgh, he became a noted authority on the Hebrew Bible. Finding a copy of Marrow of Modern Divinity left in Scotland by a Commonwealth soldier, he was intrigued and had the work republished in 1718. This English Puritan work (attributed by some to Edward Fisher) was a compendium of the opinions of the leading

Boston, Thomas

Reformation divines on the doctrine of grace and the offer of the gospel. It immediately set off a storm of controversy, being condemned by the General Assembly of the Scottish church for its alleged antinomianism and defended by twelve divines including Boston. The "Marrow Men," as they were subsequently called, played a large role in the attempt within Scottish Presbyterianism to withstand the growing movement toward Arminianism, which also involved the corollary issue of limited versus universal atonement.

The conflict arose when the Auchterarder Presbytery would not ordain a man who refused to assent to the following proposition: "I believe that it is not sound and orthodox to teach that we must forsake sin in order to our coming to Christ, and instating us in Covenant with God." The assembly overruled the presbytery, and Boston argued against the assembly.

Boston's influence was enhanced by his faithful and exemplary dedication to his parochial tasks and by his popular writings, which include Fourfold State of Human Nature, Crook in the Lot, and his autobiography. C. F. ALLISON

See also MARROW CONTROVERSY.

Bibliography. D. Beaton, Records of the Scottish Church History Society; A. Thomson, Life of Thomas Boston.

Bottomless Pit. See ABYSS.

Bousset, Wilhelm (1865–1920). German NT scholar and leader (with W. Wrede, H. Gunkel, J. Weiss, and W. Heitmüller) of the history of religions approach to biblical study. He taught at Göttingen (1896–1916) and Geissen (1916–20). With Heitmüller he edited the influential journal Theologische Rundschau (1897–1917) and, with Gunkel, the monograph series Forschungen zur Religion und Geschichte des Alten Testamentes und Neuen Testamentes (1903–20). In his influential commentary on the Apocalypse (Meyer series, 1896), Die Religion des Judentums im Neuen Testamentlichen lichen Zeitalter (1902), Die Hauptprobleme des Gnosis (1907), and Kyrios Christos (1913) he attempted to show that intertestamental Judaism was influenced by Iranian and Hellenistic concepts and that primitive Christianity can only be understood against the background of late Judaism and Hellenistic religious syncretism. A significant change took place in the early church as Gentile hero worshipers transferred their allegiance from other "lords" to Jesus the Lord (Kyrios). The disappointment of the early Palestinian church when the parousia of the Son of Man failed to materialize hastened this decisive development in early Christianity. In contrast to earlier scholars Bousset dated this theological change at the middle of the first century rather than the end. Bousset's conclusions were a major influence on Rudolf Bultmann and his disciples. W. W. GASQUE

See also BULTMANN, RUDOLF; HISTORY OF RELIGION SCHOOL.

Bibliography. K. Kamlah, RGG 1:1373–74; W. Kümmel, New Testament: The History of the Investigation of Its Problems; S. Neill and T. Wright, Interpretation of the New Testament: 1861–1986; L. Thomas, DBSup 1:989–92.

Branch. See MESSIAH.

Breaking of Bread. See LORD'S SUPPER.

Brethren of the Common Life. Religious society in the Netherlands between the fourteenth and early seventeenth centuries. It reportedly developed out of regular meetings held in Deventer, where Gerhard Groote and some of his friends foregathered at the home of Florent Radewijns. Groote, an unordained preacher, was the first leader of the new community, which consisted of both clergy and laity. Members took no vows, joined no religious order, but sought to live in God's presence a life of total dedication and to prepare themselves for eternal life. In addition, however, this mystic strain was healthily complemented by active philanthropy toward the poor and by the setting up of hostels for students. Out of this there grew some of the best schools of the fifteenth century. Among those who benefited from training by the Brethren was Erasmus, the greatest humanist of his time. Thomas à Kempis, another student and subsequently community member, produced his Imitation of Christ, which reflects much of the movement's spirit and ideals.

The Brethren represented a reaction against the contemporary moral slackness and lack of religious zeal. Many of their communities (which had spread into Germany and on to Switzerland) derived their income from copying manuscripts, notably Bibles, missals, and prayer books. "You should order the work of your hands" copyists were instructed, "to the end that it may lead you to purity of heart, because you are weak and cannot be always at spiritual exercises, and for this reason was handiwork instituted." Florent assumed the leadership after Groote's death in 1384; he and some others further expanded Brethren interests by becoming Augustinian canons and founding the famous congregation of Windesheim. Known sometimes as the Devotio Moderna, the movement was overtaken by the Reformation, and did not long survive the opening of the seventeenth century. J. D. DOUGLAS

See also DEVOTIO MODERNA; GROOTE, GERARD; THOMAS à KEMPIS.

Bibliography. A. Hyma, Brethren of the Common Life; Christian Renaissance; S. Kettlewell, Thomas à Kempis and the Brethren of the Common Life.

Bride of Christ. See CHURCH.

British Israelitism. The ideas of this group can be traced back to John Sadler's book, Rights of the Kingdom (1649), but its modern form originated with John Wilson's Our Israelitish Origin (1814). The first society to propagate British Israelite views was the Anglo-Saxon Association founded in England in 1879. Today British Israelitism is in decline and only a few scattered groups remain; however, their influence in a somewhat distorted form is to be found in publications like Herbert W. Armstrong's Plain Truth.

There is no authorized version of British Israelitism, but the following outline summarizes their main views. In the Bible God promised Abraham that as long as the sun and moon and stars endure Israel would survive as a nation. From promises found in the OT it is clear that Israel must exist somewhere today and must have had a continuous existence as a national entity right back to the time of Abraham. This required continuity means that the state of Israel, which came into existence in 1948, cannot be the nation of Israel. The present state of Israel is Jewish and therefore must not be confused with the historic nation of Israel. Marshaling a variety of arguments from the Bible and history, British Israelitism argues that the Anglo-Saxon people are the true Israel.

British Israelites claim that after the destruction of David's kingdom, Zedekiah's daughters (Jer. 41:10) escaped death in Egypt (Jer. 44:12-14) and took refuge (Isa. 37:31-32) in one of the "isles" of the sea (Jer. 31:10 KJV) to which they sailed in a ship with Jeremiah. These "isles" were Ireland, from where their descendants reached England and became the royal house. Thus, the British royal family is directly linked to the house of David. The common people, however, reached England after wandering through the continent of Europe, where they were "sifted among all nations" (Amos 9:9; cf. KJV). In the course of this sifting some true Israelites remained in western Europe, enabling British Israelitism to claim members in Germany, the Netherlands, and other parts of the Anglo-Saxon world.

With the Israelite origins of the British people established, OT prophecies are applied to the history of the British empire. America is included in the scheme by the application of Genesis 49:22, which is said to predict the emigration of the Pilgrim fathers, who left their relatives behind to establish a new nation. In addition to taking a highly literalist view of the Bible, British Israelites claim that the Great Pyramid of Egypt enshrines these truths in its measurements, which are sacred.

British Israelitism is not a sect or a cult but rather a fellowship that is to be found in many churches. At its height, around 1900, it claimed over two million members. Today its membership consists of several thousand elderly people. A careful examination of the texts used by British Israelites to support their arguments shows that they flout the rules of biblical exegesis. Even if their arguments were true, Paul's comment in Colossians 3:11 would indicate that they are unimportant. British Israelitism fails to recognize that the promises of God in the OT were sometimes conditional (Deut. 28:58-68; 1 Sam. 2:30), while in other places prophetic language has a symbolic or poetic quality. The historical arguments of British Israelites are equally tenuous, and no reputable historian supports them. Although the Bible does not explicitly state the fact, it is clear that the so-called lost tribes of Israel were largely absorbed into the tribe of Judah.

I. HEXHAM

See also ARMSTRONGISM.

Bibliography. L. Deboer, New Phariseeism; M. H. Gayer, Heritage of the Anglo-Saxon Race; H. L. Goudge, British Israel Theory; J. Tuit, Truth Shall Make You Free; B. Wilson, ed., Patterns of Sectarianism.

Brother. See CHRISTIANS, NAMES OF.

Brother Lawrence (1611-1691). Brother Lawrence was born Nicholas Herman in Lorraine, France. Little is known of his childhood. He was converted in 1629 after reflecting on the radical change the coming spring would bring to a leafless tree.

He entered the army where he was wounded in battle, resulting in a life-long limp. He then served in Paris as an aide to the treasurer of France, M. Fieubert. While in Paris he became enamored with the Discalced Carmelites, the reform of the order that was carried through by St. Teresa and St. John of the Cross. He entered the monastery and became known as "Brother Lawrence of the Resurrection."

Brother Lawrence served his community as a cook for approximately thirty years. The kitchen, which he originally despised, became his place of worship as he learned to do all things, including the most menial of tasks, to the glory of God.

Brother Lawrence published no major works, but soon after his death a few notes and letters he had written were combined with remembrances of conversations and published in 1691. This collection was further edited and has been published in numerous editions as Practice of the

Brother Lawrence

Presence of God, the work for which he is widely known.

Having sought to do everything for the glory of God and with a consciousness of God's presence, Brother Lawrence's position can best be described in his own words: "The time of business does not with me differ from the time of prayer, and in the noise and clatter of my kitchen, while several persons are at the same time calling for different things, I possess God in as great tranquillity as if I were upon my knees at the blessed sacrament." He taught, "This sums up your entire call and duty: to adore God and to love Him, without worrying about the rest."

His mystical piety has been appreciated by Roman Catholics and Protestants alike. Along with Thomas à Kempis' Imitation of Christ and Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, Practice of the Presence of God stands as one of the most widely read and beloved devotional books of all time.

T. K. BEOUGHER

Bibliography. Brother Lawrence, Practice of the Presence of God.

Brown, William Adams (1865–1943). American Presbyterian theologian and social and ecumenical activist. Brown was born in New York City and educated at Yale, at Union Seminary in his hometown, and at Berlin under Harnack. He returned in 1892 to Union, serving on the faculty forty-four years. He was perhaps the most influential liberal theologian of his time and thoroughly representative of that viewpoint. Brown emphasized the life, personality, and certain teachings of the historical Jesus rather than the traditional orthodox doctrines about Christ. He held to the moral influence view of the atonement. He was confident that God works uniquely through Jesus to promote transformation in the lives of his followers and through them to introduce gradually a better social order, the kingdom of God.

Believing that the proof of Christianity was in the practices it motivated, Brown was actively involved in ministry to slum dwellers and supported such causes as the emerging labor movement. Rather than trying to do everything, Brown felt the church should cooperate with home, school, workplace, and government in order to bring about a Christianized society (see Church in America, 1922). In later writings, such as God at Work (1933), there were mild indications of the more realistic influence of neo-orthodoxy.

Brown saw denominational barriers as impediments to the practical task of the church. Accordingly he actively promoted the emerging ecumenical movement by involvement with several strands that would lead to the World Council of Churches. Church: Catholic and Protestant (1935) and Toward a United Church (1946) dealt with this concern.

But Brown was primarily a theological professor, and significantly his autobiography is entitled Teacher and His Times (1940). His influence spread widely beyond his own classes because of Christian Theology in Outline (1906), which was one of the most widely used texts of liberal theology.

D. G. TINDER

See also LIBERALISM, THEOLOGICAL.

Bibliography. W. A. Brown, Teacher and His Times; S. M. Cavert and H. P. Van Dusen, eds., Church through Half a Century: Essays in Honor of William Adams Brown.

Bruce, Frederick Fyvie (1910–1990). Born in Elgin, Scotland. He studied classics at Aberdeen, Cambridge, and Vienna and studied Hebrew at Leeds. Bruce taught classics at Edinburgh and Leeds, and biblical studies at Sheffield; he occupied the Rylands Chair of Biblical Exegesis and Criticism at Manchester from 1959 to 1978. Aberdeen awarded Bruce the honorary doctor of divinity degree in 1957; he was named fellow of the British Academy in 1973.

Although best known as a biblical exegete, Bruce's interests and writings ranged widely. Bruce is one of only two persons to serve as president of both the Society for New Testament Studies and the Society for Old Testament Studies.

Personally Bruce associated with the Plymouth Brethren Assemblies. He described his theological outlook as being generally (loosely) "Reformed" (without infant baptism). Although usually identified with a conservative theological stance, he considered this a result of his studies rather than the framework for them; when he believed evidence so led, he was not hesitant to break with traditional views on critical issues. After hesitating to employ some of the terminology frequently used by evangelicals, an interviewer asked how he would describe his view of Scripture. Bruce replied, "Truth! What's wrong with that?"

Bruce's theological method was complex and intertwined with his interpretative work. It was centered upon his commitment to listen faithfully to the text without presuppositions. He possessed unusual knowledge of the texts and data of the Bible, its backgrounds, and cognate fields. He was strongly committed to the methodology of the classics in biblical and theological research. Against this backdrop he undertook detailed exegetical studies of individual texts. From specific passages he moved to seeking the teachings of the individual biblical documents, authors, and the Scriptures as a whole.

Bruce's insistence on viewing the parts in light of the whole and the whole in light of the parts required special attention to the relation between the Old and New Testaments. He explained his methodology as to “examine the NT interpretation of the OT exegetically, to consider each instance of OT quotation, allusion or application in its immediate NT context . . . [then] . . . to stand back at some distance and view the whole picture—in particular to consider the dominant motifs which recur throughout the Biblical literature and bind the two Testaments together” (New Testament Development of Old Testament Themes, 18).

Finally, in a little known article (“Salvation History in the New Testament,” Man and His Salvation, E. J. Sharpe and J. R. Hinnells, eds. [1973], 75–90), Bruce expounds a form of “salvation in history,” a significant element in his theological method. Characteristically he does so through biblical exposition, in which he details the “progressive unveiling” of God and his work in history, demonstrated by the recounting and interpretations of earlier events by later biblical writers, the significance of David in both testaments, the life of Jesus and his proclamation of the kingdom of God, the assumptions in both Jesus’ and Paul’s teachings, and the nature of New Testament eschatology.

Frederick Fyvie Bruce’s influence and contribution lie, first, in his example of wedding quality scholarship and personal piety; second, in his writings—he published over fifty books, hundreds of articles, essays, and reviews, and edited numerous periodicals, series, and multiple-author volumes; and finally, in his preparation of a generation of students committed to dealing seriously with the biblical text and its implications—at Manchester he supervised more doctoral students than any other member of a British university faculty during that period.

J. J. SCOTT JR.

Bibliography. F. F. Bruce, In Retrospect; Ward Gasque and Laurel Gasque, “F. F. Bruce, 1910–1990,” Reformed Journal (October 1990) 3–5; I. H. Marshall, “Frederick Fyvie Bruce, 1910–90,” Proceedings of the British Academy 80:245–60; “A Select Bibliography of the Writings of F. F. Bruce,” in Apostolic History and the Gospel: Biblical and Historical Essays Presented to F. F. Bruce on His 60th Birthday; “A Select Bibliography of the Writings of Professor F. F. Bruce, 1970–79,” in Pauline Studies: Essays Presented to Professor F. F. Bruce on His 70th Birthday.

Bruderhof. A name associated with the Hutterite branch of Mennonites and subsequently of the group of them that found refuge first in Moravia, then in North America. In twentieth-century Europe the name was continued in a movement founded by Eberhard Arnold in Nazi Germany. Where earlier thinking had been characterized by a strong stand against pedobaptism and sacerdotalism, the modern Bruderhof combined spiritual renewal with social concern. Not surprisingly, it soon incurred the hostility of Hitler’s Gestapo, which felt itself threatened by a peace-loving body that professed a higher allegiance than that due to any secular government. Therein lay a certain irony, for Arnold had written his doctoral dissertation on Nietzsche.

Arnold identified the most sinister powers of modern civilization as the state, the military, and the capitalistic structure. “The tremendous edifice built up by a fallen creation,” he declared, “is incredible. But it will end in death.” Baneful influences had crept also into the church: bureaucracy, arrogant moralism, intolerance, “a spirit of business efficiency,” and sheer pride.

In 1930–31 Arnold visited Bruderhof colonies in North America and was commissioned by one of the Alberta congregations as its missionary to Europe.

A selection of Arnold’s writings and addresses, entitled God’s Revolution, was edited in 1984 by the Hutterian Society of Brothers and J. H. Yoder.

J. D. DOUGLAS

Brunner, Heinrich Emil (1889–1966). Swiss Reformed theologian, one of the “Three Bs” (Barth, Brunner, and Bultmann) who dominated twentieth century theological studies in the Christian world. A part of the circle that developed a new theological movement known variously as the theology of crisis, dialectical theology, neo-orthodoxy, and Barthian theology, Brunner represented the movement’s middle ground. Karl Barth and Brunner were the pioneers of what came to be known popularly as neo-orthodoxy, each developing his thought independently of the other.

Born at Winterthur, near Zurich, Brunner studied at the universities of Zurich and Berlin, earning his Th.D. from the latter in 1913. The period 1913–24 included a year of teaching in England, service in the Swiss militia during World War I, pastoral experience in Switzerland, marriage, and a year of study at Union Theological Seminary in New York (1919–20). From 1924 to 1955 he was professor of systematic and practical theology at the University of Zurich. During these years he made frequent lecture tours in Europe, Britain, and America, and in 1953–55 served as visiting professor at the newly established International Christian University in Tokyo. Returning from Japan in 1955, Brunner suffered a stroke that permanently impaired his speech and writing. In spite of a series of subsequent strokes, he continued to work on a limited basis for several more years and managed to complete the third volume of his magisterial Dogmatics in 1960.

During forty-nine years of active writing, Brunner published at least 396 books and scholarly journal articles, of which twenty-three books were translated into English. Mediator (1927), which was the first attempt to treat the doctrine of Christ in terms of the new dialectical theology, established his reputation and led to his wide popularity as a visiting lecturer. In this work Brunner's thought was deeply influenced by Søren Kierkegaard's dialectic and Martin Buber's I-Thou concept.

A breach between Brunner and Barth over the issue of natural theology culminated in 1934 with the publication of Brunner's Nature and Grace: A Discussion with Karl Barth and Barth' categorical reply, No! In essence, Brunner, unlike Barth, accepted natural theology and the continuing presence of God's image in humans after the fall. As he diminished his contacts with Barth, however, he expanded them with other Christians in the context of the ecumenical movement, though his emphasis in this area was always on spiritual rather than institutional brotherhood established firmly on biblical rather than liberal theology.

Brunner's thought was characterized by a high Christology; an emphasis on personal encounter in Jesus Christ as the centerpiece of the Christian faith; an ethical system that attempted to maintain a balance between individualism and community; and a view of the church rightly patterned on the NT ecclesia as a fellowship of persons in Christ and wrongly constituted by people as an externally organized community. His doctrine of humankind stressed the paradoxical nature of persons as both the image of God and sinners on one hand, and as both individuals and members of a community on the other. Brunner was highly influential in all these areas of his thought except, perhaps, that of the church.

Brunner's greatest enduring impact, however, has been in the field of Christology and in his insistence that God can be known only through personal encounter. In Christology, Brunner was a part of the wrecking crew that attacked the body of then current theological liberalism with its humanistic and essentially Unitarian picture of Jesus. In its place he attempted a fresh restatement of what he regarded as the indispensable Christian belief that the appearance of Jesus Christ was unique and unrepeatable—that Jesus was not just a great teacher or a humanitarian martyr but the one and only incarnation of the Word of God. In this Brunner stressed the incarnation and the resurrection as cornerstones of the Christian faith and accepted the definition of Chalcedon that Jesus Christ is at once true God and true man.

Related to Brunner's Christology was his belief that the truth about the Lord is discovered not through theorizing about his nature but through personal encounter with him, which was for Brunner a primary category of faith and theology. He tried to avoid a false objectivism (which he regarded as typical of unquestioning biblical literalists and dogmatic Roman Catholics) and a false subjectivism (which he regarded as characteristic of certain mystics, romantic liberals, and millenarian and Pentecostal enthusiasts). Thus, in Divine-Human Encounter (1938), Brunner took a middle ground between historic Calvinism and traditional Arminianism, arguing that the biblical witness shows God always to be God-approaching-man and man as always man-coming-from-God, and their meeting point as Jesus Christ. Moreover, he taught that although only God can take the initiative in arranging this meeting, God does not overwhelm his creatures but treats each person as a free and responsible being whom he loves and whose choice is either to accept divine grace in faith or reject it in sin. The primary place in which this revelatory encounter takes place is Jesus Christ, for God reveals himself as Lord and Savior uniquely and decisively in Jesus. However, Brunner also believed that God's revelation of himself and his invitation to encounter continue in several areas of history and experience—namely, in the Scriptures, in the faith of the church, and in the personal testimony of the Holy Spirit in the hearts of individuals. Therefore, since God's revelation is neither timeless nor confined to a certain point in time, God keeps on encountering people.

Orthodox Christians are indebted to Brunner for his telling criticism of theological liberalism—especially of its sentimental and degrading portrayal of Jesus, its optimistic view of the essential goodness of humans, and its progressive idea of history as inevitably leading to the kingdom of God. Moreover, Brunner successfully rehabilitated and restated for the twentieth century many historic Christian doctrines: sin, the incarnation and resurrection of Christ, the centrality of Jesus in salvation, the need for a personal faith, and the church as a fellowship rather than an institution. Finally, and probably most importantly, he reestablished the Scriptures as the norm for faith and practice in Christian churches.

However, Brunner also has been sharply criticized by more orthodox theologians on several counts. For example, they find his rejection of certain doctrines, such as the virgin birth and hell and his dismissal of the Adam and Eve account as symbolic, to be subbiblical and even inconsistent with other of his doctrinal emphases. They point out that at times he seemed almost arbitrary in delineating what was biblical and what was not. For instance, though he appeared to assume that creation out of nothing and the image of God in humanity were biblically true, he rejected the virgin birth and hell as not widely supported in Scriptures. In so doing, it would seem that Brunner's judgment in these matters was obviously rational, despite his belief that he consistently stressed the supremacy of divine revelation over human knowledge, reason, and experience. Further, Brunner is sometimes accused of universalism on the basis of his teachings on the last judgment and ultimate redemption because of his ambiguity on these points. However, since one of his strongest emphases throughout his theology is that of personal responsibility and accountability, it seems unlikely that this was his real intent.

Others have denounced Brunner for system building, for too much emphasis on structure, for being obsessed with form and content, and for his dialectical approach. The most telling criticisms, however, have come from more conservative theologians who have disapproved of his doctrine of the Scriptures, especially in regard to the matter of inspiration. There is no doubt that Brunner accepted biblical authority as the norm for Christian theology, but he regarded inspiration as only one aspect of the larger doctrine of revelation and felt that any attempt to indicate "the how" of it led to unwarranted speculative theory—such as that expressed in the doctrine of inerrancy. It seems fair to point out, however, that he could have said more about the meaning of inspiration for the production and preservation of Scripture, even if he did not believe in the plenary verbal view. Finally, like all neo-orthodox theologians Brunner, from the viewpoint of more traditionally orthodox Christian scholars, appeared arbitrary and capricious at times in his handling of the biblical text.

Brunner and Barth probably did more than any other twentieth-century thinkers to prepare the way for the resurgence of historic biblical Christianity in the Western world in the last half of the twentieth century. In the final analysis, as time passes, historians and historical theologians appear more and more inclined to see Brunner as a scholar with an open and basically liberal mind who arrived at a basically conservative theological position. In any case, his thought, although clearly in what has been labeled the neo-orthodox camp, will continue to be valuable to more conservative theologians in their own attempts to interpret biblical truth to the modern mind.

R. D. LINDER

See also BARTH, KARL; NEO-ORTHODOXY.

Bibliography. H. E. Brunner, Divine Imperative; Dogmatics; Revelation and Reason; J. E. Humphrey, Emil Brunner; P. K. Jewett, Emil Brunner: An Introduction to the Man and His Thought; C. W. Kegley, ed., Theology of Emil Brunner.

Buber, Martin (1878–1965). Jewish religious thinker whose writings have influenced some Christian theologians. Raised in central Europe during the beginning years of Zionism, Buber became involved with that movement soon after his university education was completed. But from 1904 to 1909 he withdrew from public life to learn more about the Hasidism to which his grandparents had introduced him as a boy. Hasidism, a religious movement arising in the mideighteenth century among eastern European Jews, stressed loyalty to the covenant and piety. Around the rabbinic leaders of the movement communities formed that yet lived in and with the world. By the "hallowing of the everyday," by affirming every person in his or her wholeness, it was believed that one could transform oneself and the world for God. This concern to develop true humanity under God through communal relationships in everyday life came to spark all of Buber's thought and activity as an educator, writer, editor, and lecturer.

In 1938 Buber left Germany to become professor of sociology at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. There he enjoyed a distinguished career as a world-renowned proponent of what he took to be the true Hebrew humanism expressed in the Hasidic teaching that "God is to be seen in everything, and reached by every pure deed."

Particularly through his widely read book I and Thou, Buber's ideas on true life as relation became known outside the Jewish world. He claims that in one's life with nature, with other persons, and with spiritual existences, a person can become an "I" only when the object with which one has to do is seen as a "Thou" rather than as an impersonal "it." In and through such relational events there is a meeting with the absolute Other, the eternal Thou, God. This is not so much a mystical union, or the transcendent becoming immanent, as it is an existential encounter taking place in faith.

Buber's concept of the "I-Thou" relationship has been adopted by several Christian theologians, notably Friedrich Gogarten, Karl Heim, Karl Barth, Dietrich Bonhoeffer, and Rudolf Bultmann.

S. R. OBITTS

Bibliography. Writings of Martin Buber, W. Herberg, ed.; M. Buber, Believing Humanism; Between Man and Man; Two Types of Faith; M. Cohn and R. Buber, eds., Martin Buber: A Bibliography of His Writings 1879–1978; M. Friedman, Martin Buber's Life and Work; S. J. Grenz, R. E. Olson, "Emil Brunner: Transcendence in Divine-Human Encounter" in 20th-Century Theology: God and the World in a Transitional Age; G. Schaefer, Hebrew Humanism of Martin Buber; P. Schilpp and M. Friedman, eds., Philosophy of Martin Buber; R. G. Smith, Martin Buber.

Bucer, Martin (1491–1551). A leading figure in the European and English reformation movements. Bucer entered the Dominican Order in 1506, but his eventual emphasis on the work of the Holy Spirit in many ways made him a spiritual ancestor of John Wesley. Born at Schlettstadt in Alsace, he was introduced to Luther's theology in 1518 at Heidelberg. Convinced of the merits of the Reformation, in 1521 he received papal dispensation from his religious vows. His excommunication for preaching Lutheran theology (1523) was preceded by his marriage as a priest in 1522.

Captivated by Luther's disputation against medieval scholasticism (Heidelberg, 1518), Bucer, although a member of Tetzels' order, rose to Luther's defense. Bucer's Summary, a brief treatise, clearly established him as a disciple of Luther and also as one possessed of an independent and free theological spirit. In Summary he heralds the Lutheran theme that people are justified by faith alone. Anyone who cannot so trust or teaches contrary to sola fide is the antichrist. A second, more independent theme—the power and guidance of the Holy Spirit in the reading of Scripture—is amplified. The Word separated from the Spirit and from faith is divorced from Jesus Christ and salvation. This latter theme is exploited systematically by Bucer's most illustrious pupil, John Calvin.

Bucer gradually moved from a Lutheran doctrine of the Eucharist and, under the influence of Zwingli and Carlstadt, embraced a more symbolic interpretation of the sacraments. More radical than Luther, Bucer had no stomach for a doctrine of the ubiquity of the body of Christ; he found solace in Zwingli's notion that Christ's body is in heaven. Unable to embrace Zwingli's claim that the Lord's Supper is not in the strict sense a means of grace, Bucer moved to a middle position that rejected Luther's claim for the ubiquity of Christ's body but subscribed to the Lutheran notion that the sacrament is a means by which God graciously feeds his church; thus, the Lord's Supper is a means of grace. Affirming Zwingli's insistence that Christ's body is in heaven at the right hand of God, Bucer parted company with Zwingli's claim that the Lord's Supper is a memorial only, void of sacramental energy.

Bucer's mediating position thrust him into several conciliatory efforts on the continent and in England. With Wolfgang Capito he coauthored the Tetrapolitan Confession (1530), an attempt drawn up at the Diet of Augsburg to effect reconciliation between the Reformed and evangelical wings. Again in the Concord of Wittenberg (1536) he collaborated with Melancthon to assist Saxon Lutheran theologians in achieving unity over the doctrine of the bodily/spiritual presence of Christ in the sacrament. In England he developed a doctrine of the church as a living extension of the incarnation, committed to transforming the entire political and social order with its stress on discipline, visibility, and transformation of personal and corporate entities. These views were published posthumously as De regno Christi (1557).

Bucer's mediating position endeavored to adjudicate the hostilities between the Zwinglians and Lutherans on the continent. In England his views, especially his emphasis on the work of the Holy Spirit in the individual believer, put him at odds with Luther because Bucer could not take Luther's stance that justification automatically imputes sinful impulses, setting aside the law and the old nature. Bucer therefore committed himself to a two-stage doctrine of justification. First is forgiveness of sin through Jesus Christ without benefit of any human effort or contribution. In the second stage—and the controversial one—one is justified as one begins to perform works of love. This second state (justificatio legis) opens the door for Wesley's doctrine of perfectionism and the Puritan call for visible evidences of the pure life.

In Bucer's latter years as Regius Professor of Divinity at Cambridge, he played a significant role in the creation of the Ordinal of 1550 and in the reform of the Book of Common Prayer (1552). Bucer's doctrine of the church emerged as a significant contribution to the discussion of the church in the Reformation period. His dual emphasis on the church and the Holy Spirit probably influenced Calvin's doctrine of double predestination: only the elect have the Spirit; fruits of the Spirit are evidence that one is among the elect.

P. A. MICKEY

See also TETRAPOLITAN CONFESSION; WITTENBERG, CONCORD OF.

Bibliography. M. Bucer, Common Places of Martin Bucer; H. Eells, Martin Bucer; W. Pauck, Heritage of the Reformation; Melancthon and Bucer; W. P. Stephens, Holy Spirit in the Theology of Martin Bucer.

Buchman, Frank. See MORAL RE-ARMAMENT.

Bulgakov, Sergei Nikolaevich (1870–1944). Russian economist and theologian. Though a son of a Russian Orthodox priest, he abandoned the views of the church during his early life. Graduating from Moscow University (1894), he studied in Berlin, Paris, and London before returning to Russia to teach. He held professorships in political economics at the Polytechnic Institute of Kiev (1901–6), Moscow Institute of Commercial Science (1906–17), and Moscow University (1917–18). Meanwhile he had taken a doctorate in political economics at Moscow University (1912). In 1906 he was a member of the Second Duma (parliament), which sought to liberalize the Russian political system. Gradually returning to the faith of the Eastern Orthodox Church, he was ordained to the priesthood in 1918. Thereafter he served as professor at the University of Sympheropol in the Crimea. Expelled from Russia by the government in 1923, he went first to Prague to teach and then to Paris (1925), where he was professor and dean of the Orthodox Theological Institute.

Bulgakov's intellectual pilgrimage took him from Marxism to idealism to mysticism. He came to believe that the world was animated by a world soul and that God had created the world out of nothing. During his later years his goal was to interpret the main teachings of the Christian church in the light of the doctrine of Sophia, or Holy Wisdom, a third being that mediated between God and the cosmos. Though his orthodoxy was challenged in some quarters, he was never subjected to official interrogation or censure.

Among his many publications are Unfading Light (1917), Jacob's Ladder (1929), Orthodox Church (1935), Comforter (1936), and Wisdom of God, a Brief Summary of Sophiology (1937).

H. F. Vos

Bibliography. J. Kornblatt and R. Gustafson, eds., Russian Religious Thought: Recovering the Roots of Russian Religious Philosophy; L. Zander, God and the World: The World Conception of Father S. Bulgakov.

Bullinger, Johann Heinrich (1504–1575). As successor to Zwingli in Zurich, Bullinger played a major role in the Protestant Reformation. He was the son of a parish priest. While studying theology at Cologne he was stimulated through his study of the early church fathers to a fresh investigation of the Scriptures. After he returned home to Zurich, he joined with Zwingli in the move to reform the church. Four years later, after Zwingli's death, Bullinger became the leader of the Zurich branch of the Swiss reformation. Although the center of Reformed leadership soon passed from Zurich to Geneva and to John Calvin, Bullinger's influence continued for some forty years among those who adhered to Zwingli's version of the Protestant faith. He regularly preached and taught the Scriptures, delivered commentaries on the books of the Bible, set forth theological treatises on the disputed questions of the day, sought to establish and maintain fraternal relations with other Reformed Christians, and wrote a multivolume history of the Reformation.

The best summary of Bullinger's theology is his Decades. This work consisted of fifty long sermons dealing with the major tenets of Christian doctrine. They were published during 1549–51 and soon translated into English, Dutch, and French. In England the Decades served as the officially appointed theological guide for clergy who had not obtained a master's degree. Bullinger also wrote major studies on providence, justification, and the nature of the Scriptures. All told, his works number approximately 150.

Bullinger played an important role in uniting Protestants. He and Calvin sought to avert potential schisms in the Protestant movement through their proposal of the Zurich Agreement (1549). They agreed that believers receive Christ spiritually and are united to him through the Lord's Supper. Later Bullinger authored the Second Helvetic Confession, published in 1566, which became the bond of unity for Calvinistic churches scattered through Europe.

Like the other leaders of the Reformation, Bullinger emphasized the centrality of the Scriptures. The first sermons in his Decades deal with the giving of Scripture as God's all-sufficient revelation to all people for their salvation and sanctification. To comprehend fully the biblical message requires an awareness of the importance of the analogy of faith, reading texts in context, comparing Scripture with Scripture, and, most importantly, "a heart that loves God and seeks his glory." Ultimately the reader is dependent on the Holy Spirit to give understanding of the text.

Bullinger's ecclesiology agreed with that developed by the other Reformers. The invisible church consists of all professing Christians. Only God knows perfectly the members of each. The true church is characterized by proper preaching of the Word of God and faithful administration of the two sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper. The true apostolic succession is found not in historical descent through bishops but in preaching and teaching those truths given by the apostles. While rejecting the papacy and its authoritative claims, Bullinger was willing to judge the Roman Catholic Church as well as Protestantism by the Word proclaimed and the two sacraments administered correctly.

O. G. OLIVER JR.

See also HELVETIC CONFESSIONS; ZURICH AGREEMENT.

Bibliography. J. W. Baker, Heinrich Bullinger and the Covenant: The Other Reformed Tradition; G. W. Bromiley, Historical Theology; G. W. Bromiley, ed., Zwingli and Bullinger; P. Schaff, History of the Christian Church.

Bultmann, Rudolf (1884–1976). One of the twentieth century's most influential liberal theologians. Professor in the University of Marburg, he was well known for his scholarly historical and interpretive writings on the NT. But his scholarship was never mere historical curiosity; he was at heart a churchman, seeking by his scholarship to make his understanding of the Christian message live for his contemporaries.

In Bultmann's view the most pressing task facing theologians in the twentieth century was to discover a "conceptuality" in terms of which the NT could be made understandable to modern people, and then to work out the details of this interpretation. Bultmann believed that he had found such a conceptuality in the existentialist philosophy of Martin Heidegger, and spent virtually his entire career reading the NT as a Heideggerian document and using historical-critical methods to eliminate from the text elements resistive to existentialism.

According to Heidegger's philosophy as Bultmann read it, a person in his or her truest nature is a maker of decisions. If decision making is one's essence, then the future rather than the past is his or her spiritual element, because only the future holds options, and only where there are options can there be decisions. According to Bultmann, one does many things to avoid facing the fact that he or she is a decision maker. One often lives by dead traditions; one lets legalistic ethical systems make decisions; one thinks of one's self as having fixed character traits from which actions issue rather than form; one identifies one's self by reference to social roles and relations to other people, thus refusing total responsibility for his or her identity. In these and other ways one is "inauthentic"—that is, not one's self. Bultmann thinks that when the NT speaks of a person as a "sinner" and under the sway of "death," this Heideggerian understanding of inauthenticity is what it has in mind.

Salvation, then, is "radical openness to the future," which is the same as one's full acknowledgment that he or she is a decision maker. The secular existentialists tend to think one can become authentic by forthrightly confronting his or her own death and insecurity and meaninglessness, but Bultmann maintains that one finds salvation only if he or she receives it as a gift. Thus, he argues that we are in need of a savior, and even goes so far as to say that authenticity can be achieved only through the fact of Jesus Christ.

For Bultmann NT ideas such as the virgin birth, the deity of Jesus, the resurrection of Jesus, the future resurrection of the body, blood atonement for sins, everlasting life, an ethical ideal of human nature, and a salvation history only serve to mislead people about what salvation really is. These are primitive, "mythological" ideas that need to be reinterpreted in existentialist terms. In the 1940s he began to call this interpretive activity "demythologizing," and it is this word above all that is associated, in the popular mind, with the name of Bultmann.

For many NT scholars, Bultmann's theology is less than adequate. First, his uncritical reliance upon Heidegger makes what he says suspect. Is Heidegger really the only one who provides an adequate basis for interpreting reality, and especially the NT? Second, Bultmann's radical skepticism about NT history is excessive. Third, Bultmann's treatment of every major NT doctrine as a "myth" that needs retranslating into Heideggerian philosophy is questionable. Finally, Bultmann's rejection of virtually every essential Christian doctrine as misleading leads one to wonder if Bultmann's system of thought is fundamentally Christian or not.

R. C. ROBERTS

See also DEMYTHOLOGIZATION; EXISTENTIALISM; NEW HERMENEUTIC.

Bibliography. R. Bultmann, Jesus and the Word; Jesus Christ and Mythology; Kerygma and Myth; Theology of the New Testament; E. C. Hobbs, ed., Bultmann, Retrospect and Prospect; R. A. Johnson, Origins of Demythologizing; Rudolf Bultmann: Interpreting Faith for the Modern Era; A. Malet, Thought of Rudolf Bultmann; S. Ogden, Christ Without Myth; N. Perrin, Promise of Bultmann; R. C. Roberts, Rudolf Bultmann's Theology: A Critical Interpretation; J. M. Robinson, ed., Future of Our Religious Past: Essays in Honor of Rudolf Bultmann; W. Schmithals, Introduction to the Theology of Rudolf Bultmann; A. C. Thiselton, Two Horizons: New Testament Hermeneutics and Philosophical Description.

Bunyan, John (1628–1688). One of the most influential authors of the seventeenth century. Although he had a bare minimum of education, a hyperconscientious religious sensitivity, which at times seemed almost paralyzing, led him into the depths of the gospel of grace that he discovered in the Bible.

Active as a lay preacher in the Parliamentary army and during the Commonwealth, he continued to preach during the Restoration and was imprisoned twelve years for doing so. Declining to be freed on the condition that he no longer preach, his famous reply was, "If I am freed today I will preach tomorrow."

During his imprisonment he wrote Pilgrim's Progress, the greatest book of its kind in English; Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners, a spiritual autobiography; and Defense of Justification by Faith, an uncompromising criticism of the rising tide of Pelagianism among Nonconformity and latitudinarianism among the Anglican establishment. He was attacked by Bishop Edward Fowler in a book called Dirt Wiped Off but was favorably mentioned by the illustrious bishop of Lincoln, Thomas Barlow.

Macaulay claims that Holy War, written after Bunyan's imprisonment, "would be the best allegory ever written if Pilgrim's Progress did not exist." Except for the Bible itself, no book was held in such respect among the lower and middle classes of England during the eighteenth century as Pilgrim's Progress. In Scotland and colonial America, Bunyan's popularity exceeded that in England. Jonathan Swift and Samuel Johnson acknowledged his greatness, but on the whole he was ignored in literary circles until the romantic movement in the nineteenth century.

He is duly appreciated for his literary genius by contemporary scholars who have indicated some influences upon him not previously noticed but that have not detracted from their profound appreciation of the "sublime tinker." This literary interest, unfortunately, has not been matched by a comparable appreciation of his doctrine. The unforgettable imagery and unusual blend of thought and passion were grounded in the classical Reformation teachings concerning humankind's fallen nature, grace, imputation, justification, and the atonement—all of which Bunyan seemed to have derived directly from Scripture with little mediation through theologians.

C. F. ALLISON

Bibliography. J. Brown, John Bunyan: His Life, Times and Work; R. G. Collmer, Bunyan in Our Time; J. F. Forrest and R. L. Greaves, John Bunyan: A Reference Guide; R. M. Frye, God, Man, and Satan; R. Greaves, John Bunyan; C. Hill, Tinker and a Poor Man: John Bunyan and His Church; T. B. Macauley, Critical and Historical Essays; R. Sharrock, John Bunyan; O. E. Winslow, John Bunyan.

Burial, Christian. The traditional method of congregations' disposing of the bodies of the dead. Contrary to the Greek and Roman practice of cremation, Christians usually buried their dead. Cremation was not forbidden, but burial in the earth was preferred, according to Tertullian (On the Soul 51) and Augustine (City of God 1.12–13).

We lack details of early Christian customs but know in general they followed those of Judaism. A few exceptional elements should be noted. The corpses were shown special care because of the conviction that believers' bodies were temples of the Holy Spirit. Most significant was the positive emphasis of Christian burials, due to belief in the resurrection of the body because of Christ's bodily resurrection from the dead. In fact, grave sites early were called coemeteria (cemeteries), which means "resting places," because of belief in the resurrection. The earliest Christian cemeteries were located near Rome. As persecution and martyrdom increased, burials came to be associated with the witness of martyrs. As martyrs multiplied, cemeteries became hallowed ground and the tombs of martyrs places of devotion and meditation. In this climate there arose prayers for the dead.

Christian funerals in the fourth century, about which we are better informed, were occasions of joy inspired by the hope of the second coming of Christ, the resurrection of the body, and eternal life. Accordingly, believers wore white garments and burials were performed in the daytime. They rejected pagan customs of lamentation and crowning of the corpse. Instead, the congregation joined in the funeral procession, singing hymns of praise to God. Proper propriety was observed and bearers carried the body to the grave. Prayers were said at the grave, including prayers for the deceased. Christian burials became occasions for the practice of charity as the survivors often gave food and money to the poor.

As time went on, churches were built on or near grave sites. The place of a Christian's burial was considered holy ground. The wealthy and higher clerics were entombed with distinction in churches. In emergencies when there was no access to holy ground, a cross would be put on the grave. It became customary to celebrate the Eucharist at funerals. This practice developed into that of a priest saying Mass for the dead, the Requiem Mass. This is attributable in part to growing belief in purgatory among Christians. Private and public prayers were made for the deceased.

As previously noted, prior to the eighth century, Christian funerals were joyous. That changed, however, as nominal Christianity generally prevailed. Black replaced white as customary funeral dress. Proper order continued to be observed. The body was washed and placed in linen or penitential robes. It was carried by peers, first to the church for Mass, then to the grave. The corpse was laid with the face toward the east. Various ceremonies multiplied. Holy water sprinkled on the body was thought to protect it from demons. Charcoal marked a grave site and kept it from being profaned. Incense was employed to mask the odor of decay and to symbolize prayer for the dead. Ivy and laurel were added to signify the imperishable life. Prayers were made for speedy purification from purgatory and even deliverance from hell. By the later Middle Ages, the form for the funeral service had become fixed. The night before, there were Vespers, followed by the saying of Mattins and Lauds in the night. In the morning Requiem Mass was sung with prayers for the absolution of the dead. The rite of the burial itself involved committal prayers. Requiems were also said on memorial days (the third, seventh or ninth, and thirtieth or fortieth day after death) and on anniversaries.

The Reformation swept away most of these burial rites on theological grounds. The Roman Catholic practices had been undergirded by doctrinal assumptions: the existence of "the third place" besides heaven and hell, purgatory, and the efficacy of the mediation of the church, especially in the Mass, for the departed. By contrast, the Reformers denied the existence of purgatory and lamented the false assurance that belief in it afforded. Furthermore, the church could not affect the fate of the dead in the intermediate state. The resurrection of Christ and the consequent resurrection of believers again assumed center stage. Therefore, the Reformers insisted, corpses should have a Christian burial. Burial was a church matter, a matter for the congregation. The bells summoned the people, and the church was represented by the minister, school children, and other members able to attend. The mourners sang Christian funeral hymns as the procession made its way to the cemetery. Passages were read at the grave site, most commonly 1 Thessalonians 4:13–18 and John 11. Basins were provided for collecting alms for the poor. In some countries the congregation recited the Apostles' Creed after the closing prayer. The Mass for the dead was replaced with the reading of Scripture and a short message on death and the resurrection in the home, the church, or at the grave. Ministers were requested to preach special sermons remembering the life and death of the deceased. The Reformed rejected prayers for the dead, while Luther and the Augsburg Confession permitted it. From this developed the blessing for the dead.

Burial, Christian

The Roman Catholic Church prohibits cremation, while Protestant churches vary on this point. The Roman Catholic Exsequiarum Ordo of 1969 permits an optional service in the house of the deceased and an optional procession to the church. The Requiem Mass now puts a final commendation in place of the absolution of the dead.

According to Greek Orthodox teaching, no Requiem Mass is held, but there are prayers for the dead. At a brief graveside ceremony, the priest throws earth on the corpse with a spade and sprinkles it with oil from the holy lamp or ashes from the censer.

In the Anglican Book of Common Prayer the Dirge is ordered in a modified form, including sentences, a psalm, and a lesson, followed by committal prayers at the grave site. This is to be used for all except people under greater excommunication, the unbaptized, and suicides. Modern Anglican rites also recognize cremation.

R. A. PETERSON

Bibliography. E. Bendann, Death Customs: An Analytical Study of Burial Rites; W. Gresswell, Commentary on the Order for the Burial of the Dead; G. Rowell, Liturgy of Christian Burial.

Burnt Offering. See OFFERINGS AND SACRIFICES IN BIBLE TIMES.

Bushnell, Horace (1802–1876). Known as “the father of American theological liberalism,” Bushnell was a complex figure who incorporated into his thought many of the traditional Puritan elements that later theological conservatives would also preserve. His theology combined the Puritan sense of covenant, influences from Europe and England, a great confidence in the future of America, and an organic view of God’s work in history. He was a resident of Connecticut his entire life, but his thought—whether about great doctrines like the atonement or about national crises like the Civil War—was never provincial.

Bushnell was converted in part through the influence of Samuel Taylor Coleridge’s writings. He attended Yale Divinity School and began a lengthy association with Hartford’s North Church in 1833. The members of this church, to save their respected minister from charges of heresy made by other Congregationalists, eventually left their local consociation. Bushnell enjoyed an unusual ability to reconcile competing theological ideas. His work was a penetrating synthesis of many of the more advanced ideas of his age. He was, for his times, the Christian’s answer to Ralph Waldo Emerson.

Bushnell’s major works spell out the main currents of his thought. Christian Nurture (1847) focused new attention on the religious training of young people. It argued, in contrast to the dominant revivalism of the day, that long-range education was the surest way to inculcate the Christian faith. His most important theological work, a “Dissertation of Language” prefaced to God in Christ (1849), followed soon thereafter. This essay contended that human language is inadequate to the realities of spiritual existence, which always demand symbolic representation. Bushnell himself may not have intended this work as an open invitation to recast orthodox understandings of Christianity, but many who followed in his train used it in that way. Nature and the Supernatural (1858) suggested that all things, natural and supernatural, shared a common spiritual character. His Vicarious Sacrifice (1866) arose out of a deep sense of tragedy at the unfolding of the Civil War combined with a lifetime’s reflection on the nature of Christ’s work. His conclusion was that the death of Christ was intended primarily as an example for the human race to follow in self-giving sacrifice.

Bushnell’s influence hastened the acceptance in America of Friedrich Schleiermacher, Coleridge, and their romantic picture of the world. Bushnell’s theology enjoyed a large following among Americans who were suspicious of revival, optimistic about American democracy, uneasy about American vulgarity, and impressed with European innovations. To this kind of audience Bushnell offered a theological perspective, which, while not itself completely divorced from traditional Protestantism, helped clear the way for a thorough liberalization of the faith.

M. A. NOLL

See also LIBERALISM, THEOLOGICAL.

Bibliography. W. S. Archibald, Horace Bushnell; M. B. Cheyney, Life and Letters of Horace Bushnell; B. M. Cross, Horace Bushnell: Minister to a Changing America; J. O. Duke, Horace Bushnell on the Vitality of Biblical Language; T. T. Munger, Horace Bushnell: Preacher and Theologian; D. L. Smith, Symbolism and Growth: The Religious Thought of Horace Bushnell; H. S. Smith, ed., Horace Bushnell.

Butler, Joseph (1692–1752). A leading eighteenth-century opponent of deism who is credited with considerable success in his defense of the theistic position.

Born in a Presbyterian home in Wantage, Berkshire, he was intended for the Presbyterian ministry but chose not to throw in his lot with the dissenters and entered the ministry of the Church of England instead. After studies at Oxford he was ordained in 1718. He was preacher at Rolls Chapel, London (1719–26), rector of Haughton-le-Skerne (1721–25), rector of Stanhope (1725–40), chaplain to the lord chancellor (1733–36), clerk of the closet to Queen Caroline (1736–37), bishop of Bristol (1738–50), dean of St. Paul's (1740–50), clerk of the closet to George II (1746–50), and bishop of Durham, the richest see in England (1750–52). He declined the archbishopric of Canterbury in 1747. From the above list, it is clear that he was a pluralist—i.e., he held more than one church post at a time. In addition, he received various stipends from the church. He was not greedy, however, and was known for his generosity. He was a shy, sensitive man and never married. It is also clear that Butler enjoyed high positions in English church and state.

Butler lived during the “golden age of English deism,” and he sought to cut the ground from under his deistic opponents. His great literary effort composed to that end was Analogy of Religion Natural and Revealed to the Constitution and Course of Nature (1736). He took the position that the order in nature is paralleled by the order in revelation, intimating that God was author of both. He argued that the order and beauty of nature reveal a creating intelligence with some conscious design in view. So influential was this book that it did more to defeat deism than any other work and was for generations a text on apologetics in college and seminary.

Butler was also intensely practical, as his Fifteen Sermons Preached at the Rolls Chapel (1726) demonstrates. In this he sought to justify to practical people the practice of common virtues (benevolence, compassion, and the like). Practicality also dominated his Six Sermons, one of which was a defense of foreign missions and another an appeal for London hospitals. Most of the rest of his writings were destroyed after his death, according to his instructions. H. F. Vos

See also DEISM.

Bibliography. T. Bartlett, Memoirs of Joseph Butler; A. Duncan-Jones, Butler's Moral Philosophy; DNB 3:519–24; E. C. Mossner, Bishop Butler and the Age of Reason; T. Penelhum, Butler; I. Ramsey, Joseph Butler; W. A. Spooner, Bishop Butler.

Cc

Caird, John (1820–1898). Scottish theologian. Born the son of a Greenock blacksmith, he served Church of Scotland parishes from 1845 to 1862, when he became professor of divinity and later principal (1873) of Glasgow University. A widely acclaimed sermon preached before Queen Victoria was hailed by his famous brother Edward as showing “the hollowness and worthlessness of any religion that wastes itself in feeling, in zeal for orthodoxy, or in the formalities of worship, and fails to consecrate the whole secular existence of man.” His more Calvinistic colleagues condemned his brand of practical Christianity as creedless and heretical, and were appalled when he said he would not trouble to cross the street to convert a man from one denomination to another. Nonetheless he was a champion of the Kirk in those difficult years following the split in the church, and a trainer and encourager of theological students. An acknowledged authority on Spinoza, Caird also reflected strong neo-Hegelian tendencies in his Introduction to the Philosophy of Religion (1880) and in his Gifford Lectures published as Fundamental Ideas of Christianity (1899). He condemned the unreality of making hard divisions between sacred and secular, but he was fiercely criticized for secularizing special revelation and for floating “a spurious semi-biblical theism in terms of philosophy of religion.”

J. D. DOUGLAS

Bibliography. C. L. Warr, Principal Caird.

Cajetan, Thomas de Vio (1469–1534). Protestants remember Cajetan for his dramatic encounter with Martin Luther, but Roman Catholics give him his due as a philosopher, theologian, Bible scholar, and cardinal. He studied in the universities at Bologna and Padua; joined the Dominican Order in 1484; became a member of the Paduan theological faculty in 1493; served in Rome as procurator general for the Dominican Order, 1501–8; and was master general of the Dominican Order, 1508–18. He was given a cardinal's hat in 1517 and became bishop of Gaeta in 1518. In his career he published about 115 works. Some of these were commentaries on Scripture translated and exegeted from Greek and Hebrew texts; they were intended to answer Protestant polemics based on exegesis from the original languages. But as an author and scholar Cajetan made his mark as a major Thomistic philosopher/theologian with his classic commentary on Thomas Aquinas's Summa Theologica.

In 1511 Cajetan became a leading defender of the power of the pope and the monarchical concept of the papacy against the claims of the Council of Pisa (a council not recognized by the Roman Catholic Church because it was not convened by a pope). It is not surprising, then, that Pope Leo X commissioned Cajetan, his legate at the time to the German Imperial Diet, to summon the upstart Martin Luther to Augsburg and to examine and pass judgment on the orthodoxy of Luther's views. Luther and Cajetan met on three successive days in October 1518. In the confrontation Cajetan argued that the pope was above church councils, the entire church, and Scripture. Luther replied that the pope was under the Word of God and asserted that some popes had twisted Scripture. The three days ended at an impasse, with Cajetan ordering Luther to leave his presence and not to return unless he was ready to recant. That night Luther was secretly taken from Augsburg and safely returned to Wittenberg. In 1520 Cajetan helped draft the papal bull Exsurge Domine condemning Luther.

In spite of their sharp differences Luther recognized Cajetan as a person of learning and integrity. Indeed, though staunchly loyal to the Roman Church and Thomistic theology, Cajetan was an active advocate of reform of the abuses within the church.

S. N. GUNDRY

See also LUTHER, MARTIN.

Bibliography. T. de V. Cajetan, Analogy of Names and the Concept of Being; Commentary on Being and Essence; J. Wicks, ed., Cajetan Responds: A Reader in Reformation Controversy.

Calixtus (Kallisen), George (1586–1656). German Lutheran theologian who sought reunion between Lutheranism, Calvinism, and Roman Catholicism. He studied philology, philosophy, and theology, especially patristics, at the University of Helmstedt, where Melancthon's disciples inclined him toward moderate Lutheranism. From 1609 to 1613 he traveled in Germany, Holland, France, and England, becoming better acquainted with Roman Catholic and Calvinist as well as Lutheran churches. After returning home and successfully engaging a Jesuit in debate, he became professor of theology at Helmstedt in 1614, a post he held until his death.

In an age marked by bitter theological controversy he downplayed confessional differences and sought peace between confessions, as is evidenced by his participation in the Colloquy of Thorn in 1645. He endeavored to construct a theological system that would reconcile Lutheran, Calvinist, and Roman Catholic doctrine. He based his work on an appeal to the Scriptures, the Apostles' Creed, and the common faith of the church fathers of the first five centuries. In many writings he set forth his position, which came to be called Syncretism. He was severely criticized by orthodox Lutheran scholars, such as Abraham Calovius, who accused him of leaning toward Roman Catholicism, of secretly espousing Calvinism, and of violating his oath to the Lutheran creeds. Ironically, this peace-loving man provoked the Syncretistic controversy, which continued after his death until it was overshadowed by pietism.

He was an independent and creative thinker who made lasting contributions to systematic theology. He is chiefly responsible for introducing the analytical method in theology that sought to make systematics a practical science. The goal of theological study is not merely to formulate pure doctrine but to enhance the Christian life. He also established ethics as a separate theological discipline.

The work of this irenic theologian deserves a mixed review. His zeal for Christian unity is praiseworthy, as are his appeal to the early history of Christian doctrine and his seeking to appreciate the views of communions different from his own. Nevertheless, his work is marred by a naïve optimism that at worst was in danger of compromising the religious content of the Reformation, as when he downplayed the differences between Rome and the Reformers over justification. Likewise, the attention he devoted to ethics, when he treated it as a theological subdiscipline, was salutary, but by doing so he opened the door for others to detach ethics from systematics and thereby cut it loose from its theological moorings.

R. A. PETERSON

Bibliography. W. C. Dowding, German Theology during the Thirty Years' War: The Life and Correspondence of George Calixtus; E. L. T. Henke, ed., Life and Correspondence of George Calixtus; R. Rouse and S. C. Neill, History of the Ecumenical Movement.

Call, Calling. The developed biblical idea of God's calling is of God summoning men by his Word and laying hold of them by his power to play a part in and enjoy the benefits of his gracious redemptive purposes. This concept is derived from the ordinary secular meaning of the word (LXX and NT, kaleō)—i.e., summon, invite (see Matt. 2:7; 22:3–9)—by the addition of that quality of sovereign effectiveness which Scripture ascribes to the words of God as such. Divine utterance is creative, causing to exist the state of affairs which it declares to be intended (cf. Gen. 1:3; Isa. 55:10–11; Heb. 11:3). The thought in this case is of an act of summoning that effectively evokes from those addressed the response which it invites. The concept passes through various stages of growth before it reaches its final form in the NT epistles.

In the OT. Throughout the OT, Israel regards itself as a family called first by God out of heathendom, in the person of its ancestor (Isa. 51:2), and then from Egyptian bondage (Hos. 11:1), to be his own people (Isa. 43:1), serving him and enjoying his free favor forever. This conviction is most fully stated in Isaiah 40–55. Here the central thought (developed in reference to the coming return from captivity) is that God's gracious once-for-all act of calling sinful Israel into an unbreakable covenant relation with himself guarantees to the nation the eventual everlasting enjoyment of all the kindnesses that omnipotent love can bestow (Isa. 48:12–49:26; 54:6–17). The calling of individuals receives mention only in connection with Israel's corporate destiny, either as the prototype of it (Abraham, Isa. 51:2), or as a summons to further it and bring the Gentiles to share it (Cyrus, Isa. 46:11; 48:15; the servant, 42:6; 49:1). The essence of the thought here is not verbal address (indeed, Cyrus, though called "by name"—i.e., announced as God's "shepherd" and "anointed"—does not know God's voice, Isa. 45:4; cf. 5:26–30; 7:18–20); "calling" signifies rather a disposition of events and destinies whereby God executes his purposes. The prophet's argument rests entirely on the assumption that God's callings express determinations which are unconditional, irreversible, and incapable of frustration (cf. Rom. 11:29). He views God's callings as sovereign acts, the temporal execution of eternal intentions.

In the NT. The thought of calling in the NT has to do with God's approach to the individual. In the Synoptics and Acts the term denotes God's verbal summons, spoken by Christ or in his name, to repentance, faith, salvation, and service (Mark 2:17 = Luke 5:32; Mark 1:20; Acts 2:39).

Call, Calling

The “called” (klētoi) in Matthew 22:14 are the recipients of this summons, as such; they form a larger company than the “chosen” (eklektōi), those who respond. In the Epistles and Revelation, however, the concept is broadened, in accordance with the Isaianic development noted above, to embrace God’s sovereign action in securing a response to his summons. The verb “call” and the noun “calling” (klēsis) now refer to the effective evocation of faith through the gospel by the secret operation of the Holy Spirit, who unites men to Christ according to God’s gracious purpose in election (Rom. 8:30; 1 Cor. 1:9; Gal. 1:15; 2 Thess. 2:13–14; 2 Tim. 1:9; Heb. 9:15; 1 Pet. 2:9; 2 Pet. 1:3, etc.). The “called” are those who have been the subjects of this work, i.e., elect believers (Rom. 1:6–7; 8:28; Jude 1; Rev. 17:14, etc.). This is the effectual or internal calling of classical Reformed theology, the first act in the ordo salutis whereby the benefits of redemption are conveyed to those for whom they were intended (see Rom. 9:23–26). This “upward,” “heavenly” calling to freedom and felicity (Phil. 3:14 RSV; Heb. 3:1; Gal. 5:13; 1 Cor. 7:22 RSV; 1 Thess. 2:12; 1 Pet. 5:10) has ethical implications: it demands a worthy walk (Eph. 4:1) in holiness, patience, peace (1 Thess. 4:7; 1 Pet. 1:15; 2:21; 1 Cor. 7:15; Col. 3:15), and sustained moral exertion (Phil. 3:14; 1 Tim. 6:12).

The terminology of calling has two subordinate applications in the NT: (1) to God’s summons and designation of individuals to particular functions and offices in his redemptive plan (apostleship, Rom. 1:1; missionary preaching, Acts 13:2; 16:10; high priesthood, Heb. 5:4; cf. the calling of Cyrus mentioned above and of Bezaleel Exod. 31:2); (2) to the external circumstances and state of life in which a man’s effectual calling took place (1 Cor. 1:26; 7:20). This is not quite the sense of “occupation” or “trade” which the Reformers supposed that it bore in the latter verse; but their revaluation of secular employment as a true “vocation” to God’s service has too broad a biblical foundation to be invalidated by the detection of this slight inaccuracy.

J. I. PACKER

See also EFFECTUAL CALLING; ELECT, ELECTION.

Bibliography. L. Berkhof, Systematic Theology; L. Coenen, NIDNT 1:271–76; R. Macpherson, HDCG 1:264–66; C. Hodge, Systematic Theology; H. H. Rowley, Biblical Doctrine of Election; K. L. Schmidt, TDNT 3:487–536.

Calovius, Abraham (1612–1686). German Lutheran theologian recognized as one of the leading representatives of seventeenth century Lutheran orthodoxy. Born in East Prussia, he entered the University of Königsberg at age fourteen and received an M.A. at twenty and a doctor of sacred theology at twenty-five. After experience elsewhere as both a professor and pastor, Calovius joined the faculty of the University of Wittenberg as professor of theology in 1650. Later he became primarius and superintendent.

Calovius was rigidly orthodox, but at the same time he was known for his personal, practical piety. He was sympathetic with the concerns of Johann Arndt and Philipp Jakob Spener. His concern for orthodoxy extended to the most precise details of theological formulation, with every biblically based theological point regarded as a fundamental of the faith. This conviction put Calovius in direct opposition to fellow Lutheran George Calixtus, who held that the teaching of the early church as embodied in the Apostles’ Creed was the criterion for fundamental truth. It was a complete doctrinal norm for all time and needed no further definition. Calixtus called upon all churches who accepted the Apostles’ Creed to recognize and cooperate with one another. This, of course, included the Lutheran, Reformed, and Roman Catholic churches.

Calovius labeled Calixtus’s view as “syncretism” and charged that on his view Arians, Socinians, Arminians, and Anabaptists could not be charged with heresy. By way of contrast, Calovius held that all revealed truth is fundamental for salvation. In 1664 Calovius proposed a new confession for Lutherans that is typical of his position. It rejected the following as heresies: that the Trinity is not revealed in the OT; that the angel of the Lord is not Christ; that OT believers did not know and believe the doctrine of Christ’s person and office; that creationism is an explanation for the origin of souls; that the existence of God does not need to be proved by theology; that newly born children do not have real faith; and that Romanists and Calvinists can belong to the true church, can have hope of salvation, and are not condemned to eternal death.

It is difficult to escape the conclusion that Calovius’s de facto definition of the fundamentals of the Christian faith was divine revelation as defined by Calovius. And it should come as no surprise that Calovius exercised his polemic skills not only against fellow Lutheran syncretists but also against Socinians, Calvinists, Arminians, Anabaptists, Roman Catholics, mystics, and the views of Hugo Grotius. Systema Locorum Theologicorum, regarded by some as the high point of Lutheran scholasticism, was his major work in systematic theology; Biblia Illustrata, written to refute Grotius’s commentaries, was his major exegetical work.

S. N. GUNDRY

See also SCHOLASTICISM, PROTESTANT.

Bibliography. W. Elert, Encyclopedia of the Lutheran Church; Structure of Lutheranism; O. W. Heick, History of Christian Thought.

Calvin, John (1509–1564). Father of Reformed and Presbyterian doctrine and theology. Calvin was born in Noyon, Picardie. His father was a notary who served the bishop of Noyon, and as a result Calvin, while still a child, received a canonry in the cathedral that would pay for his education. Although he commenced training for the priesthood at the University of Paris, his father, because of a controversy with the bishop and clergy of the Noyon cathedral, now decided that his son should become a lawyer, and sent him to Orléans, where he studied under Pierre de l'Étoile. Later he studied at Bourges under the humanist lawyer Andrea Alciati. It was probably while in Bourges that he became a Protestant.

On his father's death Calvin returned to Paris, where he became involved with the Protestants there and as a result had to leave, eventually spending some time in Italy and in Basel, Switzerland. In the latter city he published the first edition of the Institutes of the Christian Religion (1536). After wandering around France, he decided to go to Strasbourg, a Protestant city, but while stopping overnight in Geneva he was approached by William Farel, who had introduced the Protestant movement there. After considerable argument Calvin was persuaded to stay and help. Calvin and Farel, however, soon ran into strong opposition and were forced out of the city, Calvin going to Strasbourg, where he stayed for three years (1538–41), ministering to a French Protestant refugee congregation. Called back to Geneva in 1541, he remained there for the rest of his life as the leader of the Reformed Church.

Although Calvin was the pastor of the Église St. Pierre and spent much of his time preaching, his greatest influence came from his writings. Both his Latin and his French were clear and his reasoning lucid. He wrote commentaries on twenty-three of the OT books and on all of the NT except the Apocalypse. In addition he produced a large number of pamphlets—devotional, doctrinal, and polemical. But most important of all, his Institutes of the Christian Religion went through five editions, expanding from a small book of six chapters to a large work of seventy-nine chapters in 1559. Calvin also translated the original Latin versions into French. All these works were widely distributed and read throughout Europe.

Not only was Calvin's influence widespread in his day through his writings, but his impact on the Christian church has continued down to the present day. His works have been translated into many different languages, one of the most recent being the translation of the Institutes of the Christian Religion into Japanese. The result has been that his theological teachings as well as his political and social views have wielded a strong influence on both Christians and non-Christians since the Reformation.

W. S. REID

See also CALVINISM; REFORMED TRADITION.

Bibliography. R. Benedetto, Ford Lewis Battles, eds., Interpreting John Calvin; J. Cadier, Man God Mastered; G. E. Duffield, ed., John Calvin; G. Harkness, John Calvin, the Man and His Ethics; R. T. Kendall, Calvin and English Calvinism to 1649; J. Moura and P. Louvet, Calvin: A Modern Biography; W. Niesel, Theology of Calvin; T. H. L. Parker, John Calvin; W. S. Reid, ed., John Calvin: His Influence on the Western World; H. Y. Reyburn, John Calvin: His Life, Letters and Work; R. Stauffer, Humanness of John Calvin; T. B. Van Halsema, This Was John Calvin; B. B. Warfield, Calvin and Augustine; F. Wendel, Calvin.

Calvinism. John Calvin, often regarded as “the systematizer of the Reformation,” was a second-generation Protestant Reformer of the sixteenth century who brought together biblical doctrine systematically, in a way that no other Reformer before him had done. At the same time, he was not an ivory-tower scholar but a pastor who thought and wrote his theological works always with an eye to the edification of the Christian church. Although his views have not always been popular and have at times been grossly misrepresented, his system of theology has had a very wide influence down to the present time, as indicated by the fact that all Reformed and Presbyterian churches look back to him as the founder of their biblical-theological doctrinal position.

Scripture. The formal principle and source of Calvin's theological system is embodied in the Latin phrase sola Scriptura (Scripture only). In a strict sense Calvin was primarily a biblical theologian. Trained in the techniques of historicogrammatical exegesis through his humanistic and legal studies, he went to the Scriptures to see what they clearly said. He rejected the medieval fourfold interpretation that allowed allegorizing, spiritualizing, and moralizing, insisting that the literal meaning of the words was to be taken in their historical context. On this basis he sought to develop a theology that would set forth in a systematic form the teaching of Scripture. He was, however, no rationalist, for he constantly stressed the fact that while the Bible reveals God and his purposes to us, yet there is always the mystery of the divine Being and counsel which no human thought can penetrate. Deuteronomy 29:29 was a verse to which he referred many times.

The stress which he laid upon the Scriptures was the result of his belief that they were the Word of God and therefore were the final authority for Christian belief and action. He did not believe in a doctrine of dictation, although he did on occasion refer to the writers as God's amanuenses, but held that the Holy Spirit in different and often mysterious ways revealed God's will and work and guided the writers in their recording of them. Thus, the Bible is authoritative in all matters with which it deals, but it does not deal with everything. The individual comes to recognize the Bible as the Word of God not primarily because of logical, historical, or other arguments but by the enlightenment of the Holy Spirit's "internal testimony."

Calvinism

God. This raises the question of how Calvin regarded the God who had so revealed himself. In this he accepted the historic doctrine of the trinity of God, who is Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, the same in substance and equal in power and glory. Further, he laid great stress upon the fact that God is sovereign. This means that God is perfect in all respects, possessor of all power, righteousness, and holiness. He is eternal and completely self-sufficient. Therefore, he is not subject either to time or to any other beings, nor is he reducible to spatiotemporal categories for human understanding and analysis. To his creatures God must always be mysterious, except insofar as he reveals himself to them.

This sovereign God is the source of all that is. But he is not the source in the sense that everything which exists apart from him is an emanation of the divine Being; he is the source of all things in the sense that he is their Creator. He has brought everything into existence, including the creation from nothing of both time and space. How he created everything neither Calvin nor his followers have attempted to explain, for that is in the realm of the mystery of God's action. Nor did God create because he was forced to do so by any necessity. He freely created according to his own plan and purpose, which resulted in a universe that was good.

To Calvin and his followers it is also important to realize that the triune God did not turn away from creation after it was formed, but continues to sustain and maintain its existence and operation. The physical laws that govern the material universe are the result of the continual work and action of the Holy Spirit. Such a doctrine had an important influence on the development of physical science in the late sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, being influential in the thinking of Pierre de la Ramée, Bernard Palissy, and Ambroise Paré in France; Francis Bacon, Robert Boyle, and Isaac Newton in England; and other early physical scientists.

As God sovereignly sustains all his creation, so in his providence he rules over and guides it to the accomplishment of his ultimate purposes that all things might be to the glory of God alone (soli Deo gloria). This rule included even the free actions of man, so that history might achieve the end which God has determined from all eternity. Here again is a mystery which the Calvinist is prepared to accept, since he is prepared to accept the ultimate mystery of God's being and action.

Man. Human beings were created in the image of God, with true knowledge, righteousness, and holiness. Man saw himself as God's creation, placed in creation as the steward of God's handiwork. Being in the image of God, he also had free will, which meant that he had the capacity freely to obey or disobey God's commands. In dealing with man God entered into a covenant relationship with him, promising his favor and blessing, in return for which man was to rule over and subdue nature, recognizing his office as the lord of creation under the sovereign authority of the triune God. This is known in Calvinistic theology as the covenant of works.

Despite this covenant relationship and God's manifest revelation of himself, man chose to think that he could declare his independence of the sovereign God. Tempted by Satan, man asserted himself as an independent being, worshipping the creature rather than the Creator, and thus fell under the judgment of God. The outcome was God's condemnation of man, resulting in man's rejection by God, his total corruption, and his bequeathing of this corruption to his descendants throughout history. Only by the general or common grace of God did man's corruption not work itself out fully or completely in this life.

The sovereign God, however, did not allow his plans and purposes to be frustrated. Already in eternity as part of his secret counsel he had chosen a great number of his fallen creatures for himself, to be reconciled to him. Why he did so God never reveals, except to say that he chose to do this in his mercy, for he quite justly could have rejected the whole human race for its sins. In pursuance of this plan and purpose of redemption the Father sent the Son, the second person of the Trinity, into the world to pay the penalty for the sin of the elect and to fulfill completely the righteousness of God's law on their behalf. In the OT the prophets and patriarchs looked forward to the coming of Christ, trusting in his promised redemption, while in the NT church, which continues down to today, Christians look back to what Christ accomplished for them in history.

To those who are God's chosen ones the Holy Spirit is sent, not only to enlighten them to understand the gospel set forth in the Scriptures but to enable them to accept God's promise of forgiveness. By this "effectual calling" they come to faith in Christ as the one who has redeemed them, trusting in him alone as the one who has met all God's requirements on their behalf. Thus it is by faith alone (sola fidei) that they are saved, through the regenerating power of the Holy Spirit. Thereafter, as God's people they are to live lives which, while never perfectly holy, should manifest the fact that they are his people, seeking always to glorify him in thought, word, and deed.

The Church. God's people now live as those who are God's covenant people. From all eternity the sovereign God purposed to make a covenant with his elect in and through their representative, the Son, who in history redeemed them by his spotless life and sacrifice on Calvary's cross. As citizens of his kingdom they are now called to serve him in the world, which they do as the church. This obligation is laid upon both adult believers and their children, for the covenant is made with parents and children, as it was with Abraham and his descendants in the OT and with believers and their descendants in the NT. Baptism signifies this entry into the membership of the visible body of Christ's people for both children and adults, although in both cases the baptismal vows taken by the adults may be later repudiated. The Lord's Supper is the continuing sacrament of which Christ's people partake in remembrance of him and of his redemptive work for them. But again, it is only as the elements are received and partaken of in faith that the Holy Spirit blesses those who receive the bread and wine, by making them spiritual participants in the body and blood of the Lord.

In the matter of the organization of the church Calvinists have generally agreed on the view that the church is to be governed by elders, those who teach and those who rule or supervise, elected by the church. Some, however, believe that an episcopal form of church government is the proper, or at least an allowable, form of organization. But all agree that as far as possible the outward, visible unity of the church should be maintained, for all Christians are members of the one body of Christ. On the other hand, Calvinists have also allowed for the pluriformity of the church, recognizing that the church is not perfect, but have also insisted that there must be basic uniformity or congruence of doctrine.

Calvinism in History. Although Calvin was the systematizer of the Reformation theology, since his day those who have accepted his structure of theology have continued to develop many of his ideas. During his own lifetime he himself developed his thought in the successive editions of his Institutes of the Christian Religion. With the writing of various Calvinistic confessions, such as the Heidelberg Catechism (1563), the Canons of the Synod of Dort (1618), and the Westminster Confession and Catechisms (1647–48), additions to and further developments in theological thought have appeared. Various theologians during the succeeding years have also elaborated various points which Calvin had raised but had not fully examined. The nineteenth century in particular saw a very considerable expansion of Calvinistic thought under the influence of Abraham Kuyper and Herman Bavinck in the Netherlands, Auguste Lecerc in France, and A. A. Hodge, Charles Hodge, and B. B. Warfield in the United States. The tradition established by these men has been carried on in the present century by John Murray, J. Gresham Machen, and Cornelius Van Til in the United States; Herman Dooyeweerd and D. H. Th. Vollenhoven in the Netherlands; and many others in various countries around the world.

Calvin's influence has by no means been limited to the theological sphere, however, for the implications of his beliefs even in his own day had a wide influence in other areas of thought. His view of the state and the right of the subjects and subordinate magistrates to remove an oppressive ruler helped to lay the foundation for the development of democracy. His views on art have also been important in giving a theological-philosophical foundation for the development of pictorial art in the Netherlands, England, Scotland, and France, to mention only a few countries. Much the same could be said of other fields of human endeavor such as science, economic activity, and social reform. Moreover his thought has spread beyond the confines of the Western world to exercise an influence in places such as Africa, where Calvinists have gone as missionaries. In all these ways Calvinism has wielded, and still does wield, an important influence in the world, seeking to set forth the biblical doctrine of God's sovereign grace.

W. S. REID

See also BAVINCK, HERMAN; CALVIN, JOHN; DOOYEWEERD, HERMAN; FIVE POINTS OF CALVINISM; HODGE, ARCHIBALD ALEXANDER; HODGE, CHARLES; KUYPER, ABRAHAM; MACHEN, JOHN GRESHAM; MURRAY, JOHN; REFORMED TRADITION; VAN TIL, CORNELIUS; WARFIELD, BENJAMIN BRECKENRIDGE.

Bibliography. J. H. Bratt, ed., Heritage of John Calvin; J. Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion; G. E. Duffield, ed., John Calvin; D. E. Holwerda, ed., Exploring the Heritage of John Calvin; J. T. Hoogstra, ed., John Calvin, Contemporary Prophet; A. Kuyper, Lectures on Calvinism; J. T. McNeill, History and Character of Calvinism; W. H. Neuser, ed., Calvinus Theologus; W. Niesel, Theology of Calvin; B. B. Warfield, Calvin and Calvinism.

Calvinistic Methodism. A movement established in Wales by Griffith Jones (1684–1761), Howell Harris (1714–73), and Daniel Rowland (1713–90), revivalists who had significant contacts with the English Methodists. First meeting as an association in 1743, the group ended its loosely knit organization under the influence of George Whitefield. It harbored no desire to break away from the Church of England at its inception, and not until 1795 did separation from the Establishment occur. However, the church did not ordain its own pastors until 1811. By 1823 a Confession of Faith patterned after the Westminster Confession was adopted.

The Calvinistic Methodist or Presbyterian Church of Wales had to wait to secure its autonomy in spiritual affairs until 1933. Active in educational, missionary, social, and political activities, the church's constituency of some 1,350 congregations is heavily Welsh speaking. Its Constitutional

Calvinistic Methodism

Deed (adopted 1823) organizes the church into presbyteries that are united with associations, which in turn comprise a General Assembly. Similar to the Wesleyan Methodist movement in its populist and social appeal, the church remains Calvinistic in its theology and polity. P. A. MICKY

See also CALVINISM; METHODISM; REFORMED TRADITION; WHITEFIELD, GEORGE.

Bibliography. G. E. Clarkson, George Whitefield and Welsh Calvinistic Methodism; W. Williams, Welsh Calvinistic Methodism.

Cambridge Platform (1648). A document summarizing the thinking of Massachusetts's early Puritan leaders on questions of theology and church practice. The government of Massachusetts first called for a synod of churches in 1646. It was concerned that either the Presbyterian drift of England's Puritan Revolution or the radical proposals for church government which that revolution unleashed would undermine New England's traditional distinctives. The synod's first draft leaned in a Presbyterian direction by liberalizing guidelines for baptizing the colony's children. But conditions in England had changed by the time the synod finally issued its "platform" in 1648. With congregationalist sentiments on the rise there, Puritans in New England reaffirmed the congregational convictions of their earliest leaders.

The Platform accepted the Westminster Confession, which had recently appeared in England, on doctrinal matters. But it amended that confession's treatment of the church by incorporating the positions of New World leaders like John Cotton, John Davenport, and Thomas Hooker. The Massachusetts Puritans agreed that the universal church consisted of all whom God had chosen to save. Local churches, however, were to be made up only of professed Christians and their children. The Platform condemned extreme separatism but did proclaim the substantial independence of each local congregation. It authorized synods of ministers to play an advisory role, but no more, for the churches at large. It sanctioned the established practice whereby godly magistrates sometimes intervened in church affairs. And it named pastors, teachers, ruling elders, and deacons as the only legitimate church officers.

The Massachusetts Assembly endorsed the Platform, and the Platform was readily accepted also in the other Puritan colonies—Connecticut, Plymouth, and New Haven. It remains the best place to look for a general statement of what early New England congregationalists thought their churches should be. M. A. NOLL

Bibliography. H. S. Stout, New England Soul; W. Walker, Creeks and Platforms of Congregationalism.

Cambridge Platonism. An important philosophical and theological movement in seventeenth-century England. The leaders were graduates of Cambridge University and Anglican clergymen. Some also became fellows of their college at Cambridge. The major leaders were Ralph Cudworth and Henry More. Others included Benjamin Whichcote, John Smith, Nathaniel Culverwel, and Peter Sterry. These men were called Platonists because of a general interest in the metaphysical perspectives of people from the Platonic tradition, from Plato to Plotinus. They were committed not so much to particular doctrines as to a general Platonistic perspective: a love of truth, a contempt for worldliness, and a concern for justice. They also believed that goodness is eternal and is not in any way based on personal choice—whether our choice or God's choice. Their primary emphasis was the moral life, which they saw to be the essence of Christianity.

The Cambridge Platonists trusted heavily in the human faculty of reason. As a result, they were critical of English empiricism. They rejected the empiricists' belief that the mind has no innate capacities for knowledge because that view seemed to suggest a materialistic picture of human nature, a view that would not give full weight to human rationality. Similarly, they attacked Calvinism because it seemed to them that Calvinists put faith above reason. They also felt that Calvinists were too dogmatic.

The Cambridge Platonists claimed that God is essentially rational. God ordains what is good because it is good; it is not good just because he ordains it. A good Christian shares in this divine rationality and thus has a developed sense of discrimination for what is good. Enthusiastic sects failed their criterion for adequate religion, for the Cambridge Platonists believed that there is no real religion when the mind is not composed.

For the Cambridge Platonists reason is the very voice of God. The absolute values for life which reason dictates are self-evident to those who sincerely seek to live morally. Even the very existence of God can be proved on the basis of the idea of an infinitely perfect being which we find in our minds. This strong emphasis on reason brought them very close to the rationalism of Descartes. Nevertheless, they strongly disagreed with Descartes's sharp distinction between mind and body that made it possible for bodies to be thoroughly mechanical. For them the material world was not so alienated from the influence of God and reason. P. DE VRIES

See also MORE, HENRY

Bibliography. F. J. Powicke, Cambridge Platonists; J. Redwood, Reason, Ridicule and Religion; J. Tulloch, Rational Theology and Christian Philosophy in England in the Seventeenth Century.

Campbell, Alexander (1788–1866). A founder of the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ). Son of Thomas Campbell, a Scotch-Irish Presbyterian minister of the Secession Church, Alexander Campbell was born in County Antrim, Ireland. After studying for a year at Glasgow University, in 1809 he migrated to America, where his father had gone in 1807. Joining the Christian Association of Washington (Pennsylvania), which his father had started, Campbell was ordained to its ministry in 1812, speedily sharing his father's leadership and spending the following years in itinerant preaching in Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, West Virginia, and Tennessee, making converts to his group, whose members called themselves "Disciples of Christ." He expounded his ideas in two monthly magazines, Christian Baptist (1823–30) and its successor, Millennial Harbinger (1830–64). In 1840 he founded Bethany College in West Virginia, serving as its president for over twenty years.

Campbell claimed to derive his theology and churchmanship straight from the Bible, especially the NT, in which the basic pattern of Christian faith and practice was displayed. Church membership was based on personal confession of Jesus Christ as divine Savior and baptism by immersion, this sacrament being not only an act of obedience to Christ's command, but "a means of receiving a formal, distinct, and specific absolution, or release from guilt." The local congregation was the basic cell unit of Christianity, enjoying complete autonomy; but it was expected to cooperate with other Christian groups, both locally and beyond. Two classes of office-bearers were recognized: bishops or elders to give congregational leadership in matters spiritual and deacons to handle temporal concerns. The other Christian sacrament, the Lord's Supper, was observed weekly, according to NT practice.

Campbell hoped that his NT-based churchmanship would promote unity among Protestant evangelicals. But the only lasting merger he brought about was with Barton W. Stone's group, which called themselves "Christians." This union was begun in 1832 and completed during the next few years—though Stone's eastern followers did not join. The resulting group, called the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ), has become "the largest indigenous body having its inception in America." Campbell's followers were earlier called Campbellites. N. V. HOPE Bibliography. A. Campbell, Christian System; C. S. Brown, Disciple from Bethany: The Adventures of Alexander Campbell; B. J. Humble, Campbell and Controversy; J. R. Kellems, Alexander Campbell and the Disciples; D. R. Lindley, Apostles of Freedom; T. L. Miethe, Philosophy and Ethics of Alexander Campbell.

Campbell, John McLeod (1800–1872). Scottish theologian. After five years as minister of Row (modern Rhu), he was arraigned before Dumbar-ton presbytery and found guilty of preaching "the doctrine of universal atonement and pardon through the death of Christ, and also the doctrine that assurance is of the essence of faith and necessary to salvation." The Church of Scotland traditionally held that the atonement referred "only to a certain elected portion of the human family," and stressed God's justice more than they did God's love. Following the presbytery's condemnation, the next general assembly (1831) deposed Campbell from the ministry. His pastoral zeal and saintliness of character, acknowledged even by opponents, were reflected in his ministry in an independent congregation in Glasgow (1833–59).

Such was Campbell's restraint that Nature of the Atonement was not published until 1856. In it he argued that Christ had effected the requisite repentance on behalf of humanity and had fulfilled the condition of forgiveness. This move away from a legal interpretation of the doctrine reportedly created "a brighter, clearer, theological atmosphere purged of Calvinistic gloom." Hailed by James Denney and others as one of Scotland's greatest theologians, Campbell was partially rehabilitated by 1869, when Glasgow University made him an honorary D.D. His book on the atonement has gone through many editions. Campbell's Reminiscences and Reflections, edited by his son, was published in 1873. J. D. DOUGLAS Bibliography. G. M. Tuttle, So Rich a Soil: John McLeod Campbell on Christian Atonement.

Campbell, Thomas. See CAMPBELL, ALEXANDER.

Campbellites. See CAMPBELL, ALEXANDER.

Camp Meetings. See REVIVALISM.

Canon. See CHURCH OFFICERS.

Canonization. A legal process in the Roman Catholic Church whereby a departed "servant of God," already beatified, is declared a saint. Such persons are entered into the "canon" or catalog of saints invoked at the celebration of Mass. Beyond the heroic virtue and miraculous power verified already at beatification, saints must perform at least two additional miracles.

In the early church elevation to sainthood was essentially a local affair and not distinguished from beatification. In an effort to curb superstitious abuses Pope Alexander III (1159–81) ruled that the Roman See would henceforth approve all canonizations. This led eventually to the complicated legal processes worked out by Pope Urban VIII in the seventeenth century and given authoritative exposition in Pope Benedict XIV's Heroic Virtue in the nineteenth.

Canonization

There are several noteworthy differences between beatification (the first step) and canonization. Since Vatican Council I canonization is considered an infallible papal act, thus guaranteeing that these saints are indeed worthy of veneration and able to intercede for the faithful. The beatified receive only local recognition, while saints are venerated throughout the Catholic Church. The cult of the beatified is only permitted, while that of the saints is mandated. Saints alone become patrons of churches and are portrayed with the nimbus (glorioso). However, both beatification and canonization are judgments (the latter infallible) by the church that the person now reigns in glory, is worthy of veneration and imitation, and is able to intercede for the faithful.

J. VAN ENGEN

See also BEATIFICATION.

Bibliography. P. Delhaye, NCE 3:55–61; E. W. Kemp, Canonization and Authority in the Western Church; .

Canon Law. The word “canon” derives from the Greek kanōn meaning “measuring rod,” “rule,” “list.” Hence canon law may be simply defined as the rules of the church for purposes of order, ministry, and discipline. At first these consisted of ad hoc pronouncements by leaders or councils in a local setting. Particularly important were those which came from the greater centers, and especially the canons adopted at Nicea (A.D. 325). Indeed, it was not long before canons were put out under the name of the apostles or great figures of the first centuries, and a necessary process of collection and codification continued through the Dark Ages, with much standardization in the West under Charlemagne. Gratian was the man who brought this process to a virtual culmination in the Roman communion with his famous Decretum (A.D. 1140), which underlies the developed study of canon law in the Middle Ages and is the basis of the modern Corpus Iuris Canonici. The Protestant churches have generally disowned this whole body of legislation and ordinarily avoid the terms “canon” or “canon law,” but insofar as any church must make rules for the ordering of its life and work, various forms of canon law are naturally found in all churches. The Church of England approved a brief code of canons in 1603–4 that was binding upon the clergy and stayed in effect until it was replaced in 1969.

G. W. BROMILEY

Bibliography. J. A. Coriden, T. J. Green, and D. E. Heintschel, eds., Code of Canon Law: A Text and Commentary; N. Edelby et al., eds., Post Conciliar Thoughts: Renewal and Reform of Canon Law; E. W. Kemp, Introduction to Canon Law in the Church of England; R. C. Mortimer, Western Canon Law; B. Tierney, Church Law and Constitutional Thought in the Middle Ages.

Canon of the Bible. See BIBLE, CANON OF.

Capital Punishment. The penalty of death for the commission of a crime is an issue that tends to defy the application of reason. Almost everyone has an opinion on the death penalty; however, few have done the necessary study to understand the complexity of the issue. Supporters of capital punishment cite numerous scriptural passages that seem to lend support to their position. In the OT persons put to death included those who made sacrifices to false gods (Exod. 22:20), the blasphemer (Lev. 24:13), the witch (Exod. 22:18), those who labored on the Sabbath (Num. 15:32), and those who committed similar offenses against the faith and cult of Israel.

On the other hand, those who oppose the death penalty note scriptural exceptions. Cain was not put to death for slaying his brother Abel. The death penalty was not appropriate for a homicide which had no previous enmity (Deut. 19:1–7). Those opposing capital punishment contend Jesus was opposed to the death penalty. In the case of the adulteress Jesus said, “if any one of you is without sin, let him be the first to throw a stone at her” (John 8:2–11). Teaching his disciples about punishment, he said, “You have heard that it was said, ‘Eye for eye, and tooth for tooth.’ But I tell you, ‘Do not resist an evil person. If someone strikes you on the right cheek, turn to him the other also’” (Matt. 5:38–39).

Basic issues in the study of capital punishment are deterrence, protection, and economy. The most frequently advanced argument supporting the death penalty is that the threat of death deters people from committing offenses. Unfortunately, claims of deterrence are personal opinions based on intuition and common sense that are not supported by scientific evidence. Numerous studies have been conducted on the deterrent effect of capital punishment, and there is no evidence to support this position. This is not surprising. Criminologists generally agree that certainty, not severity, leads to deterrence. Those opposing capital punishment contend that this form of punishment is not a deterrent; it is only a threat that is rarely carried out.

A second argument for capital punishment is protection. Supporters of the death penalty claim that it saves lives because murderers sentenced to life imprisonment will kill other prisoners and guards, and that if released by pardon or parole will likely kill again. These assumptions seem reasonable. Those who oppose capital punishment note that available evidence does not support this argument. The overwhelming majority of homicides that occur in prisons occur in death penalty states. Parolees from sentences for willful homicide are not the most likely to murder again. Persons paroled from sentences for armed robbery, aggravated assault, and rape are more homicidal than those incarcerated for willful homicide.

The third argument espoused by those supporting capital punishment is based on the utilitarian notion that it is cheaper to execute than to incarcerate. This argument also has a number of flaws noted by those who oppose capital punishment. Murder trials are very expensive, often lasting weeks. The cost of incarcerating a person on death row is great. A life-terminer, if given the opportunity through prison industries, can support himself and contribute to the maintenance of dependents. In some cases he can make payments to persons deserving of restitution. Those who oppose capital punishment ask how far the argument of economy can be carried. Should we execute all prisoners who are not self-supporting? The humanitarian feelings of the American public would not tolerate mass executions for economic reasons.

Those who oppose capital punishment contend that supporters of the death penalty fail to consider the complexities of our criminal justice system. They contend that most Americans believe the criminal justice system favors the rich over the poor. To execute people in a process known for its inefficiency, ineptness, and occasional incompetence makes little sense. Because of a wide range of systemic problems in the areas of law enforcement, courts, and corrections, those opposing capital punishment see this punishment as extremely unjust.

The complexity of the philosophical and theological issues is reflected in the contentions made by those who support and those who oppose capital punishment. Supporters contend that through the penalty of death we demonstrate to society the importance we place on life. Those who oppose capital punishment contend that the death penalty devalues the worth of life. The fact is, we seldom execute. The existence of such a small number of executions indicates serious problems with capital punishment when it is to be applied. Those who oppose capital punishment contend that this enormous inconsistency is equivalent to legislative hypocrisy and that if the sanction is not going to be applied, it should be abolished.

R. G. CULBERTSON

See also CIVIL LAW AND JUSTICE IN BIBLE TIMES; CRIMINAL LAW AND PUNISHMENT IN BIBLE TIMES.

Bibliography. K. E. Madigan and W. J. Sullivan, Crime and Community in Biblical Perspective; J. A. McCafferty, Capital Punishment; S. T. Reid, Crime and Criminology; T. Sellin, Penalty of Death.

Capito, Wolfgang Fabricius (1478–1541). Known for his contributions to the Reformation, Capito was a Roman Catholic priest from the family Köpfel. He was a friend of Erasmus and corresponded with Luther and Zwingli. Appointed to Strasbourg in 1523, the year of Bucer's arrival, he soon joined the ranks of the Reformers.

In the disputes between the Zwinglians and Lutherans he collaborated with Bucer to write the Tetropolitan Confession (1530), which endeavored to effect a compromise between the Protestants and Evangelicals. Known for his tolerance of the radical, Anabaptist wing of the Reformation, Capito along with Bucer was instrumental in making Strasbourg relatively tolerant of religious dissent. Together with Bucer he prepared the Wittenberg Concord (1536), another effort at compromise and mediation between the Lutherans and Zwinglians. He served as professor of theology in Strasbourg, opening his home to many of the Reformers.

P. A. MICKEY

See also TETRAPOLITAN CONFESSION; WITTENBERG, CONCORD OF.

Bibliography. D. Steinmetz, Reformers in the Wings.

Cappadocian Fathers. Three men of the fourth century, two of them brothers, are known as the Cappadocian Fathers. Basil the Great and Gregory of Nyssa were brothers; Gregory of Nazianzus was their friend from youth. Basil and Gregory of Nazianzus are now classed (along with John Chrysostom and Athanasius) as Doctors of the Greek Church.

Basil and Gregory of Nyssa were born into an aristocratic Christian family in Pontus. Basil was ordained ca. 365 and elected bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia in 370. He labored for effective administration, charity, and the unity of the Eastern churches, which were rent by the Antioch schism after 362 and rivalries between Antioch and Alexandria. He is remembered for his monastic rule and administration. His brother, Gregory of Nyssa, was appointed bishop of Nyssa in 372. He was deposed by Emperor Valens and the Arians in 376 and restored in 378. The most philosophical of the trio, he was the most loyal to the thought of Origen. He was important at the Councils of Constantinople in 381 and 394 in supporting trinitarian orthodoxy.

Gregory of Nazianzus, the theologian of the three, was born at Arianus to Christian parents and became a friend of Basil while studying in Athens. His father, the bishop of Nazianzus, baptized and ordained him. Basil made him bishop of Sasima in a jurisdictional dispute, but Gregory never went there. When his father died in 374 he administered Nazianzus but refused the office. He labored for the Nicene party in Constantinople from 370 to 381 and was elected bishop of Constantinople by that council in 381. In a step of personal sacrifice, to avoid further controversy he resigned and returned to Nazianzus and then to his estate to write.

Cappadocian Fathers

The Cappadocian fathers integrated Origen's best thought into orthodoxy, and by insisting on the formula "three persons but one essence" they preserved that Nicene trinitarian orthodoxy from the Arian and semi-Arian corruption. V. L. WALTER

See also BASIL THE GREAT; GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS; GREGORY OF NYSSA; ORIGEN.

Bibliography. H. von Campenhausen, Fathers of the Greek Church; J. Quasten, Patrology.

Cardinal. A senior official of the Roman Catholic Church who is now always a bishop. Originally a cardinal was a clergyman attached to a parish church or cathedral. Thus the first Roman cardinals were the clergy of the diocese of Rome. From this body the present college of cardinals has evolved. Each member is nominated by the pope, and since 1962 has been raised to the office of bishop if he did not hold it already. In the sixteenth century there was a fixed rule of seventy cardinals, but now there are over one hundred. As a body they advise the pope, help in the government of the church from the Vatican, and when a vacancy arises they elect the new pope (who is usually one of their number). If a cardinal is over eighty years old he cannot participate in this election. Cardinals are required to reside in Rome unless they are diocesan bishops. They wear a special cassock and red skull cap and have the title of "Eminence." P. TOON

See also CHURCH OFFICERS.

Cardinal Virtues, Seven. The seven cardinal virtues as enunciated by the medieval church are faith, hope, love, justice, prudence, temperance, and fortitude. They are "cardinal" in that all other Christian virtues "hinge" (cardo) upon one or another of them.

These virtues are of two kinds. The first three are named "theological" and represent the Pauline triad in 1 Corinthians 13:13 (cf. Gal. 5:5-6; Col. 1:4-5; 1 Thess. 1:3). The other four are "natural" (or "moral") virtues and find their origin in the philosophical thought of ancient Greece. This fourfold classification of virtue was held by Plato to correspond to the natural constitution of the soul. Prudence corresponded to the intellect, temperance to feeling, and fortitude to will. Justice was a social virtue and regulated the others.

It is understandable that pagan morality could not find a place within Christianity without first undergoing a radical transformation. This process begins in earnest with Augustine, who reinterpreted the virtues from a Christian perspective and redirected them toward a new object—devotion to God. The three theological virtues are placed alongside as representing the inner disposition in which the external virtues have their source. Thus while the moral ideas of the past are gradually baptized into Christianity, they become new creations in the process. Even though the schoolmen return to Aristotle as a source of moral speculation, the end product is always Aristotle read in the light of Augustine.

As the natural virtues can be referred to a psychological basis, so also can the theological. Faith relates to intellect, hope to desire, and love to the will. Thus virtue is that moral excellence in which the whole man (in both inner disposition and external act) is rightly oriented to his Creator. R. H. MOUNCE

See also SINS, SEVEN DEADLY.

Bibliography. K. E. Kirk, Some Principles of Moral Theology; J. Stalker, Seven Cardinal Virtues.

Care. See ANXIETY.

Carlstadt, Andreas Bodenstein von (1477–1541). German Protestant Reformer. He studied at Erfurt and Cologne before being assigned in 1505 to teach at the new University of Wittenberg, where as a member of the theological faculty he was known as a defender of the scholastic system of Thomas Aquinas. It was Carlstadt who conferred on Luther the doctor of theology degree in 1512. Like Luther, he underwent a spiritual transformation in which he repudiated his Thomist beliefs and became a supporter of the mobilizing Protestant movement. In 1518 he wrote against Johann Eck in support of Luther, stressing that the Bible itself was to be preferred over the authority of the whole church and its councils. When Eck demanded a public debate, Carlstadt agreed and debated him at Leipzig in 1519. Carlstadt was condemned with Luther and others by a papal bull in 1520.

While Luther was in hiding at Wartburg, Carlstadt and Philip Melancthon took the lead in guiding the Reformation. A natural leader, Carlstadt led the Wittenberg community in reform. On Christmas Day 1521 he celebrated Communion in the Castle Church without priestly dress and without sacrifice or elevation of the host. He even offered the cup to the laity. In January 1522 he married and instructed that all ministers should marry. He also opposed church music, religious images, begging, and religious fraternities. While Luther could endorse many of these changes in the next few years, he believed Carlstadt's reforms to be dangerous to the Reformation movement at that juncture. This would lead to division between the two men. Luther returned to Wittenberg to "calm" the situation. Carlstadt went to Orlamünde in Thuringia, became a popular preacher there, and continued on his path of reform. He renounced his academic degrees, dressed as a peasant, and desired to be called “Brother Andrew” in deference to the priesthood of all believers.

By 1524 Luther was complaining about Carlstadt’s books and reform in Orlamünde. He was sent by the Saxon authorities to Thuringia, debated Carlstadt, and a series of tracts were later exchanged. In September 1524 the Saxon authorities banished Carlstadt, forcing him to leave behind his child and a pregnant wife. Allowed to return in 1525 on the condition that he would not lecture, he was again forced to leave and finally settled in Switzerland. Here his symbolic understanding of Communion was welcomed, and he held a professorship at Basel from 1534 to his death.

Most scholars have taken at face value Luther’s polemic against Carlstadt, portraying him as petty, extreme, and divisive. Some recent scholarship has contended, however, that theological differences were not the crux of the separation in 1522 and that Carlstadt was a brilliant and decent man placed in an impossible political situation—a Reformer sensitive to the needs of the laity.

D. A. RAUSCH

See also LUTHER, MARTIN; REFORMATION, PROTESTANT.

Bibliography. H. Barge, Andreas Bodenstein von Karlstadt; K. Müller, Luther and Karlstadt; J. S. Preus, Carlstadt’s “Ordinaciones” and Luther’s Liberty; G. Rupp, Patterns of Reformation.

Carnell, Edward John (1919–1967). A leader among those post-World War II evangelical theologians in the United States who aimed to correct certain fundamentalist emphases and to restate classical orthodox theology in an intelligent and persuasive manner.

Carnell’s intellectual development was heavily influenced by his personal experiences. From his childhood in a Baptist parsonage in Antigo, Wisconsin, he came to see both the admirable qualities of fundamentalists and their negative attitudes and legalisms.

Carnell attended Wheaton College, Illinois, where he was influenced by Gordon Clark, a Christian rationalist interested in the defense of orthodoxy. Carnell gained his Th.B. and Th.M. degrees from Westminster Theological Seminary with an apologetics major under Cornelius Van Til. His first doctorate was in theology from Harvard University with a dissertation later published under the title Theology of Reinhold Niebuhr (1950). He completed another doctorate in philosophy at Boston University under E. S. Brightman. His Boston dissertation was later published as Burden of Søren Kierkegaard (1965).

Carnell commenced his teaching career in 1945 as professor of philosophy and religion at Gordon College and Divinity School. In 1948 he moved to Fuller Theological Seminary, where he remained until his death, serving as president for five years (1954–59) and, in his later years, as professor of ethics and philosophy of religion.

Carnell first came to theological prominence in 1948 with Introduction to Christian Apologetics, a prize-winning volume which found its way into many classrooms as a textbook for apologetics. He followed with Philosophy of the Christian Religion (1952). In the Introduction, Carnell tried to show that Christianity satisfies the demands of reason. In the Philosophy he argued that Christianity addresses the values of the heart.

Two later books, Christian Commitment (1957) and Kingdom of Love and the Pride of Life (1960), preserved Carnell’s respect for propositional revelation but moved into new realms of evangelical thought. They broadened Carnell’s apologetic to include “knowledge by acquaintance” and a more existential defense of Christianity’s answer to man’s moral predicament. In 1960 Carnell wrote Case for Orthodoxy, his sharpest critique of fundamentalism.

B. L. SHELLEY

Bibliography. R. Nelson, Making and Unmaking of an Evangelical Mind: The Case of Edward Carnell; J. A. Sims, Edward John Carnell: Defender of the Faith.

Caroline Divines. Those seventeenth-century theologians named for the period under Charles I and Charles II. In practice, however, the term more widely refers to Anglicans writing generally in the seventeenth century. The term became current during the Tractarian movement in the nineteenth century.

Attention was drawn to the massive scholarship and extensive learning of these men by the publication in the nineteenth century of the multivolume Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology. They were seen to exemplify an Anglicanism that had appropriated the value of the Reformation, avoided the excesses of Puritanism, and provided Christendom with a “middle way” between Geneva and Rome.

Among the leading figures were Lancelot Andrewes (1555–1626) and William Laud (1573–1645). The former is justly renowned for his scholarship, preaching, and devotional writings. Andrewes has been held up by T. S. Eliot as a model of the blend of thought and passion, form and substance that was a mark of the early seventeenth century. Laud was too soon orbited into affairs of state to be ranked with Andrewes in scholarship, but his role in enforcing uniformity against the Puritans has given his name to the high church reaction at the Restoration.

Much appreciation has been given in modern times to the so-called metaphysical poets: John Donne, George Herbert, Thomas Traherne, and Henry Vaughan. The works of these Caroline figures are characterized by rich metaphor and a strong appreciation of Christian dogma blended in simple piety and worship. C. F. ALLISON

Caroline Divines

See also LAUD, WILLIAM.

Bibliography. C. F. Allison, Rise of Moralism: The Gospel from R. Hooker to R. Baxter; H. R. McAdoo, Spirit of Anglicanism; Structure of Caroline Moral Theology; P. E. Moore and F. L. Cross, Anglicanism; T. Wood, English Casuistical Divinity during the Seventeenth Century.

Carter, Charles Webb (b. 1905). Wesleyan theologian, missionary, and educator. Carter was born on May 14, 1905, in Southport, Indiana, and spent the first eighteen years of his life struggling to find any meaning in life, which was like a "Sahara Desert, with nothing but sandy waste stretching out before me" (Missionaries Extraordinary, 13). A conversion experience in 1923 began a life-long commitment to theological study, evangelism, mission work and Christian education. Carter's own theological education and practical ministry were woven together over the next 36 years. During that time he studied at Dakota Wesleyan University, God's Bible School and Training Home, Marion College (now Indiana Wesleyan University), Winona Lake School of Theology, Asbury Theological Seminary, and Butler University. Interspersed into this education were inner-city mission work, personal evangelism, mission work in Sierra Leone, and teaching at the Clarke Memorial Biblical Seminary (also in Sierra Leone), where Carter was principal and lecturer, and a professorship at Marion College (1946–57).

Carter then taught at Taylor University (1959–71) and again at Marion College (Indiana Wesleyan University) (1974–91), where he became scholar-in-residence.

Eschewing speculative or theoretical thought, Carter is concerned that theology be dynamic and related to life. The foundation of all theology must be the Scripture, seen as "absolute and infallible in itself" (Contemporary Wesleyan Theology, vol. 1, 12). We must build our theology upon that (adding the traditional Wesleyan principles of tradition, reason and Christian experience), always remembering that Scripture is absolute, but our systems are subject to revision. This produces in Carter an irenic spirit and broad tolerance of theological differences, as well as an unshakable commitment to the Word of God.

The doctrine of the Holy Spirit plays a major role in Carter's thought, but he sees this emphasis in Scripture as leading to dynamic, practical consequences, rather than exclusively private, ecstatic experiences. Hence "the divine gift of languages in Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost signified the beginning of the universal missionary program of the gospel" (Person and Ministry of the Holy Spirit, 219).

As may be seen from Carter's life itself, the practical and dynamic needs of mission and evangelism blended together with his academic and theological interests. So it is with his theology: grounded in an absolute revelation of God in Scripture, we build a ministry, a Christian life and a system of thought that readjusts itself as life unfolds, as we live out our theology and not just speculate upon it. W. A. ELWELL

Bibliography. C. W. Carter, Half-Century of American Methodist Missions in West Africa; Missionaries Extraordinary: The Life and Labors of Charles and Elizabeth Carter; Person and Ministry of the Holy Spirit; C. W. Carter, ed., Contemporary Wesleyan Theology; Wesleyan Bible Commentary; C. R. Wilson, HET 209–18.

Case, Shirley Jackson (1872–1947). Although he held several academic and administrative appointments, Case is probably best remembered as a former dean of the University of Chicago Divinity School. He was a prolific writer, with sixteen books, approximately ninety articles, and numerous reviews to his credit, to which must be added his extensive editorial activity.

Case's major contribution to the theological scene related to the study of Christian origins. He attacked both those skeptics who imagined that Christianity could have come about without reference to a historical figure and those "fundamentalists" who argued for the uniqueness of Christianity as a supernaturalistic faith. The former face the herculean task of disposing of the Pauline letters and the Gospels; the latter fail to appreciate how Christianity merely borrowed and adapted the devices of ancient paganism in order to demonstrate its superiority.

Case saw the continuing relevance of the Christian faith in the effort to realize the kingdom of God on earth, as the contemporary church triumphs over obstacles both similar and dissimilar to those encountered by the early church. He spoke with deep appreciation of "the striving social gospel," but emphasized the difficulty and persistence of those forces that stand in the way of Christian success. He concluded that the kingdom of God comes about through the "strenuous endeavor on the part of men who serve him from generation to generation throughout the evolving centuries." M. A. INCH

See also CHICAGO SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. S. J. Case, Christian Philosophy of History; Evolution of Early Christianity; Origins of Christian Supernaturalism; W. Hynes, Shirley Jackson Case and the Chicago School; L. Jennings, "Bibliographer and Bibliography of Shirley Jackson Case," JR 29.

Cassian, John (ca. 360–435). A monk in Palestine and Egypt, influenced by the thought of Evagrius Ponticus, as well as by Platonic and Stoic philosophies. He helped bring Eastern monastic thought to the West, founding two monasteries near Marseilles, where he wrote the Institutes and the Conferences. The former was influential in the Rule of Benedict and outlined the eight principal faults, which became the basis for Gregory's "seven deadly sins." The latter work recounts conversations with leaders of Eastern monasticism. He also wrote an important treatise on the incarnation against Nestorius. Cassian is recognized as a saint in the Eastern church, but was never officially canonized in the West.

Cassian's writing is Christocentric and is shaped by an eschatology that contextualizes the monastic life as a preparation for heaven (see Stewart). The centerpiece of his theology is "purity of heart"—a deep inner peace or tranquility in which the heart is free from all disturbance, a kind of love of which chastity is the perfect expression, and unceasing prayer. It is the goal of this life and a means to our ultimate end, which Cassian calls the "reign of God" or the heavenly "beatitude of seeing God." Fundamental disciplines of the "practical life" (the active ascetic life) become the means to achieve purity of heart, followed by the contemplative phase of spiritual development in ascetic theology.

Other emphases in Cassian's monastic theology include discernment as the highest virtue, humility as the teacher of all virtues and what is necessary to attain discernment, obedience as the evidence of humility, moderation (even in asceticism), and the need for community, particularly to avoid self-deception.

Conference XIII has led some to label Cassian a semi-Pelagian on the question of the origin of the good will. In light of his Eastern orientation and his concern for moral experience rather than metaphysical speculation, Chadwick argues that he was not Pelagian: he emphasized the paramount necessity of an interior work of grace for salvation throughout the entire process, though not in such a way that the freedom of the will (God's gift) was taken away. For Augustine the will to good is dead; for Pelagius, it is healthy; for Cassian, it is sick, needing the indispensable tonic of grace with which it must cooperate in order to be healed. D. L. OKHOLM

Bibliography: J. Cassian, Conferences; O. Chadwick, John Cassian: A Study in Primitive Monasticism; C. Stewart, Cassian the Monk.

Casuistry. The art of applying moral laws, which tend to be general, to specific cases. Ever since Aristotle called attention to what he termed the need for equity, a method for deciding what is the right or wrong act in concrete situations has been an important part of the study of ethics. Indeed, it has been called the goal of ethics.

Christianity, as any other system which includes moral values, has engaged in casuistry. One of the earliest examples is the apostle Paul's rulings about the eating of meat sacrificed to idols and the remarriage of divorced persons. But as a systematically developed science it is more closely identified with Judaism and Roman Catholic Christianity. Jesus' attack upon the scribes and Pharisees for becoming so involved in their casuistry that they were missing the point of the law is well known. In the Roman Catholic Church casuistry has been carefully pursued because of the need for a clerical confessor and his penitent or a private penitent to have ready access to the church's position on the guilt of a past fault or obligation in a future situation. By the fifth century "penitential books" were appearing which included questions for the confessor to ask and exhaustive lists of sins and the corresponding penance.

In the sixteenth century casuistry became dominated by a doctrine called probabilism. It held that in cases where the rightness or wrongness of an act is in doubt, the appropriate response is whatever is probably required on the side of freedom from the regulation in question, even though submission to the regulation is more probably the truth of the matter. In the seventeenth century probabilism came to be considered too lax and was replaced by probabiliorism. This held that in cases of doubt, an act should be considered to fall under the law unless freedom is more probably called for. The eighteenth century saw the revival of a mediating form of probabilism called equiprobabilism, which has remained the preferred position. S. R. OBITS

See also PROBABILISM.

Bibliography. G. W. Bromiley, DCE 85–86; ODCC 244.

Cataphatic Theology. See VIA AFFIRMATIVA, VIA AFFIRMATIONIS.

Catechisms. A catechism is a popular manual of instruction (Gr. katēcheō, to instruct) in Christian beliefs, normally in question and answer form. The word is not used in this sense until the early sixteenth century.

Catechesis originated very early as the teaching given to converts before baptism and developed into the formalized catechumenate (cf. Hippolytus, Apostolic Tradition). It reached its heyday in the fourth and fifth centuries, incorporating quasiliturgical ceremonies like the oral transmission (traditio) by the catechist and rendition (redditio) by the catechumen of the Creed and Lord's Prayer. The system was designed to safeguard the integrity of the church and the secret discipline (disciplina arcani) of its inner life. From the weeks of concentrated preparation prior to the baptism at Easter (the origin of Lent) there survive series of catechetical addresses by Cyril of Jerusalem, Ambrose, Chrysostom, and Theodore of Mopsuestia. Augustine wrote How to Catechize the Uninstructed and Gregory of Nyssa a summa for catechists, his Great Catechetical Oration.

Catechisms

As infant baptism became the norm, the catechumenate declined. During the medieval era no regular ecclesiastical catechesis was provided for children, but various forms of popular teaching materials, based chiefly on the Apostles' Creed, Decalogue, and Lord's Prayer, were produced, from Alcuin's question-and-answer explanation of the Creed and Lord's Prayer to John Gerson's ABC des simples gens. In the late Middle Ages confessional manuals multiplied—e.g., Mirror of a Sinner (ca. 1470), requiring of penitents responsive participation. In these the Decalogue was dominant, but other formulas were involved, such as the Hail Mary, lists of virtues and vices or capital sins, works of charity, and sacraments. Devotional dialogues, such as Mirror of a Christian Man (Faith) of the 1480s, the first lay catechism in German, also used questions and answers. The Waldensians had a catechism in print by 1489, incorporating the traditional formulas but structured around faith, hope, and love (a pattern derived from Augustine's Enchiridion). The Bohemian Brethren's Questions for Children (1522), which was known to Luther, was almost certainly based on the Waldensians' book.

With the Reformation an explosion of catechism production took place, with many a Lutheran pastor compiling his own. Thousands never got beyond manuscript form, and no listing has ever approached completeness. Most of them were detached from any precise connection with baptism or Communion. By far the most influential was Luther's Small Catechism of 1529, published a month after his Great Catechism, which was based on a series of sermons of 1528. Both were intended as aids to pastors. The Small Catechism dealt with the Decalogue, Apostles' Creed, Lord's Prayer, and sacraments, the standard ingredients of subsequent Protestant catechisms. In gestation since his popular expositions of the Decalogue beginning in 1516 and anticipated especially by Short Form of the Ten Commandments . . . the Creed . . . and the Lord's Prayer of 1520, it was also a response to the lamentable ignorance exposed by visitations in Saxony in 1528. Espousing the principle of habituation by verbal repetition, it represented a partial shift of conviction in Luther from the freedom of word and spirit to discipline and regulation. He had no doubt of its significance: "I have brought about such a change that nowadays a girl or boy of fifteen knows more about Christian doctrine than all the theologians of the great universities used to know." He was happy to remain forever "a child and a disciple of the catechism." Teaching children recalled the gospel summons to become like little children, and these catechisms inculcated the Lutheran gospel, reflecting in content its law-faith-prayer sequence. They also stressed social behavior, especially on the fourth and seventh commandments, expanding the narrowly religious focus of late medieval manuals.

Luther's productions had been preceded by some thirty Lutheran catechisms, notably by Johann Brenz, Melanchthon, Wolfgang Capito, Urbanus Rhegius, and Johann Agricola. The first to be entitled "Catechism" was by Andreas Althamer of Brandenburg-Ansbach in 1528. An extraordinary profusion followed Luther's example of 1529, until in the later sixteenth century his Small Catechism became the norm virtually everywhere in Lutheranism. Church ordinances normally legislated the use of catechisms in church, especially during compulsory Sunday afternoon classes for children, and in home and school. They were turned into primers, dialogues, hymns, and pictures for use with children. Other major target audiences were the rural populace and the urban hired laboring class.

Catechisms were anti-Roman from the outset. From around 1530 a catechism for the young was regarded as a salient mark of the reform movement's break with the past and was regularly one of the first innovations of reformed states and cities. All this is observable in the Genevan Reformation. Calvin produced a French catechism in 1537 (Latin 1538), but far more significant was its simpler 1541 successor (Latinized in 1545). He claimed to be recovering ancient practice long corrupted. He reordered the four sections so that Decalogue followed Creed, indicating his understanding of the law as a guide for Christian life. Despite the tendency to verbosity, which became typical of Reformed catechisms, his catechism served as prototype of numerous others, such as John à Lasco's 1554 Emden Catechism, used in East Friesland until superseded by the Heidelberg Catechism of 1563, which has had the widest appeal of all Reformation catechisms. Produced at the order of Elector Frederick III by Zacharias Ursinus and Casper Olevianus, professors at Heidelberg University, for use in the churches and schools of the Palatinate, it is predominantly Calvinist but has enough of Luther in it to constitute a mediating document, "a happy blend of Calvinist precision and comprehensiveness with Lutheran warmth and humanity" (W. A. Curtis). It has three parts: misery (brief), redemption (the Creed, including word and sacraments), and gratitude (including Decalogue and Lord's Prayer). It was approved unrevised by the Synod of Dort (1618), and has been widely used in numerous languages.

In Reformed Protestantism catechizing was often viewed as leading to an evangelically reformed confirmation (cf. Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion 4.19.4, 13). This issued in part from a response, especially by Bucer, to Anabaptist criticisms of infant baptism. The reformed Anglican Catechism appeared simply as part of the confirmation service in the first Prayer Book of 1549. It was probably largely Cranmer's work, drawn partly from popular manuals such as the Bishops' Book (1537) and the King's Book (1543), and William Marshall's Goodly Primer in English (1534), which contained material from Luther's Small Catechism. It had a shortened version of the Commandments and, exceptionally, nothing on the sacraments. The full Decalogue appeared in 1552, a section of the sacraments was added after the Hampton Court Conference of 1604, and further minor changes took place by 1662. It retained a commendable brevity and a much less confessional tone than most sixteenth century catechisms and was well suited for worldwide use in the spread of Anglicanism.

Continental productions such as Oecolampadius's and Bullinger's also circulated in England. Cranmer translated in 1548 Justus Jonas's catechism for Brandenburg-Nuremberg, in successive editions diluting its Lutheranism and revealing his transition to Swiss Reformed theology. Short Catechism . . . for All Schoolmasters to Teach by John Ponet, bishop of Winchester, was printed with versions of the Articles from 1553, and Alexander Nowell's two forms of 1570 and 1572 likewise met the need for a longer catechism than the Prayer Book provided. The Church of England approved a Revised Catechism in 1962.

Catechisms came thick and fast in Scotland. Archbishop Hamilton's Catechism (1552) was a reforming Catholic document, giving too little too late. Already circulating were the metrical catechism sections of largely Lutheran origin published in Gude and Godlie Ballatis, probably largely the work of John Wedderburn and his brothers. The 1541 Genevan Catechism was replaced by the Catechism of the Scottish Reformer John Craig (1581). This first successful Scottish production was superseded partly by the Heidelberg Catechism and conclusively by the Westminster Shorter Catechism. Though lengthy, it is distinctive in presenting only one-line answers. Answers had tended to become either longer and longer or simply affirmatives responding to statements masquerading as questions. Craig's Short Catechism of 1592 was explicitly "A Form of Examination before Communion," indicating a distinctive role in a kirk which had no equivalent to confirmation.

The Shorter and Larger Catechisms of the Westminster Assembly (1647) largely displaced all others in Reformed/Presbyterian churches. They abandon the Creed but incorporate other traditional ingredients, while purveying the Calvinists' distinctive Calvinism in matters such as God's decrees and the Christian Sabbath. The Shorter Catechism is a work of great dignity and has exercised unparalleled influence in Scotland.

The Catholic Counter-Reformation also stimulated the production of catechisms, although the Catechism of the Council of Trent (1566), while based on traditional formulas, is a polemical confession and manual for clerical use. Among popular catechisms the most serviceable proved to be Sum of Christian Doctrine (1555) of the Jesuit Peter Canisius. The Roman Church has produced normally local catechisms, with none attaining general use. In the wake of Vatican Council II the General Catechetical Directory issued by Paul VI in 1971 laid down guidelines for local hierarchies to follow. The controversial Dutch volume of 1968, New Catechism, is not a catechism in the normal sense.

Other traditions have had their own catechisms. Robert Browne's pioneer Statement of Congregational Principles (1582) consists of 185 questions and answers. Robert Barclay's Catechism of 1673 reflects the convictions of the first Quakers, while William Collins and Benjamin Keach were responsible for the Baptist Catechism of 1693, often known as Keach's Catechism. William Nast compiled two popular nineteenth-century Methodist catechisms.

In the Orthodox world Peter Mogilas, the metropolitan of Kiev, produced around 1640 in the form of a catechism the Orthodox Confession of the Catholic and Apostolic Eastern Church, which from the Synod of Jerusalem (1672) became standard throughout the Greek and Russian churches. Directed against both Jesuit Romanism and Cyril Lucar's Calvinism, its three heads are faith (Nicene Creed), hope (Lord's Prayer and Beatitudes), and love (including the Decalogue). It was eventually superseded in the nineteenth century by the Christian Catechism of the Orthodox Catholic Eastern Greco-Russian Church compiled in 1823 by Philaret of Kiev. After revisions it was finally approved in 1839. It follows the pattern of Mogilas's work. Philaret produced a shorter catechism in 1840.

The formality of catechetical dialogue has scarcely survived the diversification of teaching methods in recent years. So far as their use persists, catechisms are more aids for teachers than precise patterns for learning. D. F. WRIGHT

See also CATECHIST; CONFESSIONS OF FAITH; LUTHER'S SMALL CATECHISM; WESTMINSTER CATECHISMS.

Bibliography. H. Bonar, Catechisms of the Scottish Reformation; F. E. Brightman, English Rite; D. Janz, Three Reformation Catechisms: Catholic, Anabaptist, Lutheran; A. F. Mitchell, Catechisms of the Second Reformation; S. Ozment, Reformation in the Cities; A. C.

Catechisms

Repp Sr., Luther's Catechism Comes to America; J. M. Reu, Dr. Martin Luther's Small Catechism: A History of Its Origin, Its Distribution and Its Use; P. Schaff, Creeds of Christendom; G. Strauss, Luther's House of Learning; T. F. Torrance, School of Faith; J. Westerhoff and O. C. Edwards, Faithful Church: Issues in the History of Catechesis.

Catechist. One who instructs others in the Christian faith. The word was originally used in the early church of the person who taught converts the faith and morals of the church in the period leading up to baptism. In traditional Western missionary work local pastors, leaders, and teachers have been called catechists, which was an order of ministry below that of the ordained clergyman. Since 1962 with the revival of the catechumenate in Roman Catholic missions the catechist is often the priest. P. TOON

See also CATECHISMS; CATECHUMEN; CONFESSIONS OF FAITH; LUTHER'S SMALL CATECHISM; WESTMINSTER CATECHISMS.

Bibliography. R. Brownfield, Teaching Religion: A Catechist Collection.

Catechumen. In the early centuries of the church a convert to Christianity was expected to attend Sunday worship (but not take Holy Communion) and to receive instruction before being baptized (usually at Easter). Such a person was known as a catechumen, and he or she, having professed a desire to believe and live as a Christian, was instructed in the faith and morals of Christianity so that a true commitment could be made in baptism. This period of preparation lasted anywhere from one to three years and ended with rigorous examination and discipline during Lent. The latter included being exorcised, fasting, and an all-night vigil before Easter Sunday. It was possible to offer this kind of rigorous preparation when the church was small and converts were comparatively few. Details of the catechumenate for the third century are given in Hippolytus's Apostolic Tradition.

After the rule of Constantine the Great, as the church became more socially acceptable, converts grew, and with a large number of catechumens the period of preparation was reduced, often being an intensive course during Lent. This involved instruction in the meaning of the Creed, exorcism, and learning appropriate teaching by heart (so that it could always be repeated). Examples of the type of instruction given may be seen in the catechetical lectures of Cyril of Jerusalem and of Augustine of Hippo. In this period infants were brought during Lent for exorcism and prayer before their baptism on Easter Day. This practice did not last long, for it became the practice to baptize infants within a week of birth. However, the Lenten ceremonies (chiefly exorcism) were compressed into the first part of the order of baptism for infants used in the medieval period.

The catechumenate is still a feature of the Roman Catholic Church, especially where it is working in the developing world or gaining large numbers of adult converts. The preparation is modeled on that of the early church. Other churches perhaps have a similar aim through classes for confirmation (where there are baptized children) or for baptism (where there are adult converts). P. TOON

Bibliography. J. D. C. Fisher, Christian Initiation: Baptism in the Christian West.

Cathari. This term has been applied to several groups in church history. The basic idea in the word came from the Greek word for "pure" and referred to the groups' special emphasis on purity in life. The most famous group, and the one usually particularized by the term, emerged in Germany in the twelfth century. In other areas of Europe the name was applied to groups such as the Albigenses and the Bogomiles. The Cathari were condemned as heretical by the church and persecuted by the Inquisition. By the fourteenth century their influence was destroyed.

The doctrinal teaching of the Cathari revolved around their attempts to solve the problem of evil. They held to a form of dualism whereby God as the author or principle of good was engaged in battle with an evil principle or spirit. Some Catharists believed this struggle to be an eternal one. From this dualism came a set of faulty teachings: creation was not good since it resulted from the activity of evil spirits; Christ, while the highest of created beings, was neither fully man nor fully God; redemption involved the rescue of the human spirit from the bondage of matter, which was itself viewed as evil; and sin resulted from contact with the world which had been created by the evil spirit. Sins especially despised by the Cathari were the owning of earthly possessions, lying, war, killing of animals, and sexual intercourse even within marriage. The only path to cleansing from sinfulness was by renouncing the world and being admitted to the Cathari church, outside of which there was no hope of salvation. Within the Cathari church were two kinds of members, one known as "believers" and the other known as "perfected ones." To become a "perfected one" involved the laying on of hands, called consolamentum, and it could be received only from one who had already been perfected. The Cathari believed that this consolamentum removed the guilt of original sin and bestowed immortality, but it could be invalidated by the commission of a single transgression afterward. Therefore, many "believers" postponed their consolamentum as long as possible.

Catharism's claim to be the only true church placed it in a struggle to the death with the established Roman Catholic Church. Given its exclusivism and claims to superiority, Catharism was doomed to destruction. However, its call to purity of life and committed spirituality in a day of moral and religious laxity earned it a place among those who have sought renewal in the Christian movement and, perhaps, helped prepare the way at some points for the Protestant Reformation.

O. G. OLIVER JR.

See also MANI; MANICHAISM.

Bibliography. M. D. Lambert, Medieval Heresy; "Motives of the Cathars: Some Reflections," in Religious Motivation, D. Baker, ed.; R. I. Moore, Origins of European Dissent; D. Oblensky, Bogomiles; Z. Oldenbourg, History of the Albigensian Crusade; G. H. Shriver, "Summary of 'Images of Catharism and the Historian's Task,'" CH 40:48-54; W. Wakefield, Heresy, Crusade, and Inquisition; W. L. Wakefield and A. P. Evans, Heresies of the High Middle Ages.

Catholic. A transliteration of the Greek katholikos, "throughout the whole," "general," this word has been used in a variety of senses during the history of the church. In the earlier patristic period it had the denotation of universal. This is its meaning in the first occurrence in a Christian setting—"Wherever Jesus Christ is, there is the catholic church" (Ignatius, Smyrneans 8:2). Here the contrast with the local congregation makes the meaning "universal" mandatory. Justin Martyr could speak of the "catholic" resurrection, which he explains as meaning the resurrection of all men (Dialogues lxxxi). When the term begins to appear in the Apostles' Creed—"the holy catholic church" (ca. 450)—as it had earlier appeared in the Nicene—"one holy catholic and apostolic church"—it retains the sense of universality and thus accents the unity of the church in spite of its wide diffusion. The catholic epistles of the NT were so designated by Origen, Eusebius, and others to indicate that they were intended for the whole church rather than a local congregation.

A second meaning emerges toward the end of the second century, when heresy had become a menace. Catholic becomes the equivalent of orthodox. The Muratorian Canon (ca. 170) refers to certain writings "which cannot be received in the catholic church, for gall cannot be mixed with honey." For the logical connection between this meaning and the former, see Lightfoot on Colossians 1:6. Vincent of Lérins (Commonitorium, 434) in his famous maxim, "What all men have at all times and everywhere believed must be regarded as true," combines the ideas of universality and orthodoxy.

In Reformation times the word became a badge of those churches that adhered to the papacy in contrast to those groups that identified themselves with the Protestant cause. The designation Roman Catholic emerged in connection with the controversy between Rome and the Anglican Church, which insisted on its right to use the term catholic as linking it with the ancient apostolic church. Rome, on the other hand, put forth its claim as the true church because of organizational continuity. Churches could not be regarded as properly "Catholic" unless they submitted to the government of the Roman hierarchy.

Two modern uses should be noted. One is the designation of an individual as a Catholic, a member of the Roman Catholic Church. The word is sometimes employed also to indicate a breadth of spirit or outlook in contrast to that which is regarded as rigidly narrow. This vague use of the word, at times quite latitudinarian, is completely different from the ancient significance, where universality was coupled with precision of Christian belief.

Historians refer to the Old Catholic church as that phase of the development of Christianity which followed the apostolic and preceded the Roman Catholic.

E. F. HARRISON

Bibliography. R. N. Flew and R. E. Davies, eds., Catholicity of Protestantism; D. T. Jenkins, Nature of Catholicity; J. B. Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers; J. Pearson, Exposition of the Creed; H. E. W. Turner, Pattern of Christian Truth.

Catholic Church, Roman. See ROMAN CATHOLICISM.

Catholicism, Liberal. A response by a minority of Catholic intellectuals to the French Revolution and nineteenth-century European liberalism, liberal Catholicism may also be seen as a chapter in the history of reform Catholicism, which has long contended with the majority, conservative, and authoritarian tradition within Roman Catholicism.

The characteristics of liberal Catholicism are best exemplified in its chief exponents. The pioneer of the movement was the passionate French priest and prophet H. F. R. de Lamennais (1782-1854), who developed a new apologetic for Catholicism. The Catholic religion, he maintained, is not evidenced chiefly by miracles and fulfilled prophecies but by its capacity to perpetuate those beliefs which mankind has found essential to an ordered social life: monotheism, the difference between good and evil, the immortality of the soul, and reward or punishment in a future life. Testifying to these beliefs is the sensus communis or general reason, the collective judgments derived from custom, tradition, and education. Hence society is the vehicle of revelation, a belief of great democratic potential. Lamennais's apologetics led to politics. His mission was to promote the social regeneration of Europe through the renaissance of Catholicism. The Catholic church should break with all royalist and absolutist regimes; the papacy should be the guardian of liberty and the champion of democracy; and the people, in whom was hidden the Word of God, should be sovereign.

Catholicism, Liberal

In a daily newspaper, L'Avenir, with its motto "God and Liberty," Lamennais advanced his revolutionary program: freedom of conscience and religion (necessitating the abolition of concordats between the papacy and civil governments and the stopping both of state payment of clergy and of state intervention in the appointment of bishops); freedom (not a monopoly) for the church in education; liberty of the press; freedom of association; universal suffrage; and decentralization of government.

C. R. F. de Montalembert (1810–70), historian and publicist, entered the French Parliament in 1837, seeking to catholicize liberals and to liberalize Catholics. His greatest political victory was the passage in 1850 of the Falloux law, which allowed the development of a Catholic secondary education system independent of the state system.

The commitment by liberal Catholics to education was accompanied by an emphasis on preaching, then unusual in the Roman Catholic Church. The greatest liberal Catholic preacher was the Dominican J. B. H. Lacordaire (1802–61), who attracted vast crowds especially to his Lenten conferences at Notre Dame Cathedral, where his impassioned sermons combined the call for liberty in church and state with ultramontanist (centralization of papal authority in matters of church government and doctrine).

The majority of liberal Catholics remained orthodox, seeking to modernize the church through the political emancipation of the laity and the separation of church and state. A later generation of liberal Catholics, including Lord Acton (1834–1902) in England and J. J. I. von Döllinger (1799–1890) in Germany, advocated autonomy for the laity in doctrinal matters.

The currents of liberal Catholicism led at the beginning of the twentieth century to the much stormier waters of Catholic modernism, which tended to be antidogmatic and anthropocentric. The leading Catholic modernists—Alfred Loisy, George Tyrrell, Baron Friedrich von Hügel, Edouard Le Roy, Maurice Blondel, and Ernesto Buonaiuti—were concerned to reconcile traditional Catholic doctrine with the results of critical scriptural exegesis.

The papacy has consistently criticized and frequently condemned liberal Catholicism for its rationalism and naturalism. Lamennais's political liberalism was condemned by Gregory XVI in the encyclical Mirari vos of 1832. In 1834 in Singulari nos Gregory condemned Lamennais's doctrine that the evolution of truth was part of the progressive evolution of the people (a view later called immanentism). Montalembert concluded that it was not possible to be a Catholic and a liberal after Pius IX's encyclical Quanta Cura and the Syllabus of Errors (both 1864). Acton and Döllinger withdrew their active support of Rome after the promulgation in 1870 of the dogma of papal infallibility. Modernism was condemned in 1907 by Pius X in the decree Lamentabili and the encyclical Pascendi gregis. F. S. PIGGIN

See also ROMAN CATHOLICISM; TYRRELL, GEORGE; ULTRAMONTANISM; VON HÜGEL, FRIEDRICH.

Bibliography. Lord Acton, History of Freedom and Other Essays; J. L. Altholz, Liberal Catholic Movement in England; E. E. Y. Hales, Pio Nono: A Study in European Politics and Religion in the Nineteenth Century; Revolution and Papacy, 1769–1846; D. Holmes, Triumph of the Holy See: A Short History of the Papacy in the Nineteenth Century; T. M. Loomer, Liberal Catholicism, Reform Catholicism, Modernism: A Contribution to a New Orientation in Modernist Research; J. N. Moody, ed., Church and Society: Catholic Social and Political Thought and Movements, 1789–1950; B. M. G. Reardon, Liberalism and Tradition: Aspects of Catholic Thought in Nineteenth-Century France; A. R. Vidler, Prophecy and Papacy: A Study of Lamennais, the Church and the Revolution.

Cause, Causation. Roughly, the relation between two events or states of affairs where the first is necessary or sufficient or both for the occurrence of the second. Reflection on this topic has been an important part of Western thought.

The pre-Socratics speculated about the elements from which all things were formed: earth, air, fire, and water. There is in this a loose similarity to Aristotle's concept of a material cause. However, the pre-Socratics were unable to account for the fact that the universe was ordered and intelligible. Plato's understanding of the causes of things bears similarities to Aristotle's formal cause. He treats the forms or ideas as if they are substances in their own right. Aristotle gave "cause" a much wider definition than it generally has today. He found Plato's doctrine of the forms unacceptable. He tried to explain the existence of all things in terms of themselves, without reference to a distinct metaphysical realm. He distinguished between four types of causes. All material objects have matter and form. Matter, or the material cause, is the "stuff" of which a thing is made. Matter is a relative term for Aristotle; it is relative to the structure that holds it together. For instance, the elements are the material cause of tissue, while tissues are the material cause of bodily organs. Bodily organs are the material cause of the living body.

The formal cause is the shape or structure that a thing takes. The blueprints are the formal cause of the airplane. For Aristotle the formal and material cause are usually inseparable; one requires the other.

Beyond the material and formal cause a thing must have an agent or force that imposes the form on the matter. This is the efficient cause. The builder of the airplane is the efficient cause. This cause most closely approximates the contemporary idea of a cause.

The fourth cause is the final cause. It is the end, goal, or purpose to which a thing aims and terminates. The final cause of an airplane might be said to be to transport things or people.

Medieval philosophers accepted Aristotle's idea of four causes; they also regarded an effect as flowing from the nature or essence of its cause. The medievals held three beliefs about causality to be indisputable: nothing comes from nothing; nothing can give what it does not itself possess; and a cause must have as much perfection or being as its effects.

Modern discussions of causality stem from David Hume's claim that the idea of causation cannot be gained in any simple way from reason or observation. Reason can give only logical relations, and cause and effect are not logical relations. Observation can tell what is really "out there," but these are only regularities of non-necessary constant conjunction. That is, observation confirms that some things regularly follow on other things. Experience leads the observer to expect that certain perceptions will always be joined to others in a predictable way. Thus, the necessity that one feels is due to custom or habit.

Immanuel Kant accepted Hume's criticisms as decisive. He saw that such an analysis was damaging to a belief in scientific truths that were universal and necessary. His solution to the problem of the credibility of scientific laws and the questionable character of causality was to argue that causality is a necessary, universal, a priori category of the mind. For man to have knowledge objects must conform to this and other categories of the understanding.

While causation may involve regularity, philosophers have asked, Is that all? Regularities may be significant or accidental. More recently causation has been analyzed in terms of counterfactual conditionals: "If c_1 had not occurred, e_2 would not have occurred." However, it is not clear what makes such an analysis true.

Heisenberg's uncertainty principle has had a profound effect upon the notion of causality. He argued that it is in principle impossible to discover both the momentum and position of a fundamental particle. (It should be noted that it has been a matter of dispute whether particles have both momentum and position.) It is possible to state the behavior of such particles in terms of probabilities, so that one can predict with virtual certainty the behavior of masses of particles (i.e., objects). Such a position raises some questions about causality. Has physics given up or undermined causation? Is it sensible to think that individual subatomic movements are caused, although these causes in principle can never be discovered?

The whole matter of causality has been of interest to Christian theology. Two of the theistic proofs for God's existence depend heavily upon Aristotelian and medieval notions of causality. Both the causal and contingency forms of the cosmological argument depend on the idea that God alone can be the first cause. All other causes are secondary. These secondary causes never explain ultimately their effects. The teleological argument depends heavily, at least in some forms, on the idea that a cause cannot give to its effect what it does not itself have. Therefore, since the world exhibits intelligent design, its cause must be intelligent. Modern understanding of causality, as well as a widespread belief in evolutionary theory, has made these arguments less convincing to many today.

P. D. FEINBERG

See also GOD, ARGUMENTS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF.

Bibliography. D. Hume, Treatise of Human Nature; I. Kant, Critique of Pure Reason; D. Lerner, ed., Cause and Effect; B. Russell, Our Knowledge of the External World; R. Swinburne, Existence of God.

Celibacy. The state of being unmarried for purposes of religious devotion and ethical purity. The practice has been a feature of many Christian groups and has also been observed by other religions for a variety of reasons. Since the fourth century celibacy has been a standard imposed on Roman Catholic clergy despite recurring agitation to have it laid aside. The Protestant Reformers denied the biblical validity of imposed celibacy; Luther, Zwingli, and Calvin all married.

The major influence giving rise to celibacy was the pagan dualism that replaced the healthy emphasis on marriage and family life the early church inherited from both the Old and New Testaments. This dualism was common to many religious movements and philosophies of the time. Its underlying theme was the rejection of all things physical as evil in contrast to the goodness of the spiritual. It soon became the accepted practice in the Western church for those fully devoted to God's service to separate themselves from physical realities such as sexual relations and their obvious setting in Christian marriage. Celibacy thus became the norm for monastics and priests. The Eastern church made an exception in not imposing celibacy upon clergy ordained after marriage.

Alongside its emphasis on the normalcy of marriage, including sexual relations and the family structure, the NT teaches the value of celibacy. John the Baptizer, Paul, and Jesus himself might be cited as examples of celibates. Further, in Matthew 19 and 1 Corinthians 7 the Scriptures speak of the value of celibacy. Both Paul (1 Cor. 7:7) and Jesus (Matt. 19:12) indicate such celibacy is a gift from God not given to all persons. Those receiving the gift are to forgo the married state for the sake of greater freedom and less worldly entanglements in serving God. This does not mean that to marry is sinful, as Paul indicates in 1 Corinthians 7:9, 28, 36, 38. To forbid marriage is considered demonic in 1 Timothy 4:1–3. The normal expectation is that church leaders will be married and maintain an exemplary family life (1 Tim. 3:1–3; Titus 1:6). While no Christian should be forced to practice celibacy, those receiving the gift of celibacy from God should be encouraged to do so as an expression of their service in the kingdom.

Celibacy

O. G. OLIVER JR.

Bibliography. W. Bassett and P. Huzing, eds., Celibacy in the Church; C. Frazee, "Origins of Clerical Celibacy in the Western Church," CH 41:149–67; G. Frein, ed., Celibacy: The Necessary Option; H. Lea, History of Sacerdotal Celibacy in the Christian Church; B. J. Leonard, "Celibacy as a Christian Life-Style in the History of the Church," RE 74:21–32; H. J. M. Nouwen, "Celibacy," PP 27:79–90; P. Schaff, History of the Christian Church.

Cereal Offering. See OFFERINGS AND SACRIFICES IN BIBLE TIMES.

Ceremonial Law. See LAW, BIBLICAL CONCEPT OF.

Chafer, Lewis Sperry (1871–1952). Born into a minister's family and educated in music at Oberlin College and Conservatory of Music, Chafer began his ministry as a traveling gospel singer. Later he turned to an evangelistic ministry. However, his disciple-teacher relationship with C. I. Scofield from 1901 until Scofield's death in 1921 resulted in the redirection of Chafer's service to Bible teaching.

In 1922 Chafer moved to Dallas, Texas, for the express purpose of establishing the Dallas Theological Seminary, which came into existence in 1924 and which he served as president and professor of systematic theology until his death.

The study and teaching of theology was thrust on Chafer by the death of W. H. Griffith Thomas, who was slated to teach theology at the new seminary but who died the summer before it opened. Chafer's theology may be characterized as biblical, Calvinistic, premillennial, and dispensational; but chiefly he was a strong exponent of the grace of God. This central concept was related to his Calvinism (though he taught unlimited atonement); to his understanding of the distinctiveness of the church, the body of Christ, in the program of God (thus his dispensationalism); to his emphasis on the faithfulness of God to fulfill his promises to Israel (thus his premillennial-ism); and to grace as the ruling principle of the Christian life, coupled with an emphasis on the ministry of the Holy Spirit.

Chafer was a skilled theologian, as may be seen in his excellent and often unique treatment of soteriology and pneumatology, and his theological writings gave academic status to his dispensational premillennial viewpoint. Undoubtedly his teaching, writings, and popular ministry exerted a major influence for biblical understanding on the church in the twentieth century and beyond.

C. C. RYRIE

See also DISPENSATION, DISPENSATIONALISM.

Bibliography. L. S. Chafer, Dispensationalism; Ephesian Letter; Grace; He That Is Spiritual; Kingdom in History and Prophecy; Major Bible Themes; Salvation; Satan; Systematic Theology; True Evangelism; C. A. Blasing, HET 83–96.

Chalcedon, Council of (451). The Council of Chalcedon, the fourth ecumenical council of the church, was summoned by the Eastern Emperor Marcion. It was convened specifically to establish ecclesiastical unity in the East, and its definitive formulation, the Chalcedonian Creed or Definition, became and remains the measure of orthodoxy for christological statements concerning the two natures of Christ.

The work of Chalcedon can be understood only in the light of a series of christological declarations beginning with the Council of Nicea (325). The Nicene Creed declared that Christ is of the same divine substance with the Father, against Arius, who taught that Christ had a beginning and was only of similar substance. The Council of Constantinople (381) both ratified and refined the Nicene Creed, in opposition to continuing Arianism, and declared against Apollinarianism, which stated that Christ's human soul had been replaced by the divine Logos. Moreover, Constantinople declared that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son.

In the post-Constantinople period the christological heresies were Nestorianism and Eutychianism. The former posited a virtual separation of the two natures of Christ, with overemphasis upon his human nature, whereas the latter, reacting to Nestorianism, declared that the incarnate Christ had only one nature. Nestorianism was defeated at the Council of Ephesus in 431, but Eutychianism was upheld by the so-called Robber Council held in Ephesus in 449. This set the stage for the Council of Chalcedon two years later.

Marcion ascended the imperial throne in 450 and immediately sought to bring about church unity, which was imperiled by dissension concerning the two natures of Christ. Pope Leo I wished a general council to be held in Italy but settled for Chalcedon in Asia Minor as nearer the capital.

The Council of Chalcedon met in October 451, with more than five hundred bishops and several papal legates in attendance. There existed a general consensus among the bishops simply to ratify the Nicene tradition interpreted by Constantinople along with the letters of Cyril of Alexandria to Nestorius and John of Antioch and Pope Leo's letter to Flavian (the so-called Tome, or Epistola Dogmatica). Had majority opinion prevailed there would have existed no need for further defining the faith. Nevertheless, the imperial commissioners deemed it necessary, in the interest of unity, to define the faith as it related to the two natures in the person of Christ.

The council proceeded in three steps to its work of unification. First, it reaffirmed the Nicene tradition; second, it accepted as orthodox the letters of Cyril and Leo; and third, it provided a definition of the faith.

There existed two overarching concerns—maintenance of the unity of Christ's person and establishment of the two natures of Christ. Use was made of letters of both Cyril and Leo along with a letter of Flavian. The first draft of the definition, which is not extant, was deemed deficient in not clearly allowing for two natures. With much effort the council passed a definition which both negated the one-nature incarnational theory of Eutyches and affirmed the two-nature declaration as orthodox. Mary was declared to be the "God-bearer" (Theotokos) of God the Son, who at the incarnation became "truly man." Thus Christ was declared as to his deity "consubstantial with the Father," and as to his humanity "consubstantial with us in manhood."

The council then dealt with the unity of the two natures and concluded that the deity and humanity of Christ exist "without confusion, without change, without division, without separation." Thus the two natures (physis), consubstantial (homoousios) with the Godhead in Christ's divine nature and consubstantial (homoousios) with us as to his human nature, were coalesced in one person (prosōpon).

Thus the Chalcedonian Creed safeguarded both the divine and human natures of Christ existing in one person in unchangeable union. Since salvation was uppermost in the minds of the framers of this definitive creed, they knew that only a Christ who was truly God and man could save men.

Although the Chalcedonian Creed became, and continues to be, the standard for christological orthodoxy, it did not prevent continuing opposition from those seeking to coalesce the two natures into one, such as the monophysite and monothelite heresies in the succeeding two centuries.

J. H. HALL

See also CONSTANTINOPLE, FIRST COUNCIL OF; COUNCILS, CHURCH; NICEA, COUNCIL OF.

Bibliography. P. T. R. Gray, Defense of Chalcedon in the East; J. S. MacArthur, Chalcedon; R. V. Sellers, Council of Chalcedon; F. Young, From Nicaea to Chalcedon.

Chambers, Oswald (1874–1917). Bible teacher, author, devotional leader. Chambers was born on July 24, 1874, in Aberdeen, Scotland, the son of a Baptist pastor. Although raised in a Christian home, his conversion came in 1890 after hearing C. H. Spurgeon preach. He studied art at the University of Edinburgh and had a promising future in the field, but sensing God's call to ministry, he instead entered the Dunoon Gospel Training College in 1897, where he later became a tutor in philosophy and psychology and taught art. While a student, he developed a passion for evangelism, received the baptism of the Holy Spirit, and began speaking at outdoor evangelistic meetings. After leaving the school, he traveled with a Japanese evangelist to America and Japan holding meetings among Methodist and Holiness groups (1906–7), subsequently becoming a traveling representative in England, Scotland, and Ireland for the Pentecostal League of Prayer (1907–10). He was principal of the Bible Training College in London (1911–15). For the last two years of his forty-two year life, he served as a YMCA chaplain among soldiers in desert camps in Egypt, where he had great influence among the military personnel. He died on November 15, 1917, in Egypt several weeks after an emergency appendectomy. Chamber's enduring contribution was the devotional classic, My Utmost for His Highest, compiled from his lectures and published by his wife in 1927. Along with his other writings assembled from his talks to students and soldiers, it urged personal holiness and victorious living in Christ, and blended mystical spirituality with common-sense personal responsibility.

P. A. ERICKSEN

Bibliography. O. Chambers, My Utmost for His Highest; D. McCasland, Oswald Chambers: Abandoned to God.

Channing, William Ellery (1780–1842). The most important spokesman for Unitarianism in the first half of the nineteenth century. He grew up in Rhode Island under the preaching of the strict Calvinist Samuel Hopkins, and he had a conversion experience as a Harvard undergraduate—experiences which, in spite of his later beliefs, he never regretted. In 1803 he became the minister of Boston's Federal Street Congregational Church, where he remained for the rest of his life. His presence along with a liberal Harvard College made Boston the Unitarian stronghold. It was not in Boston, however, but in Baltimore in 1819, at the ordination of Jared Sparks, that Channing preached a sermon which set out the basic outlines of his Unitarian beliefs. Here he denied the traditional understanding of the Trinity. He qualified severely the sense in which Christ should be considered divine. And he went further than the evolving convictions of New England's moderate Calvinists in softening concepts of depravity and the substitutionary atonement. In other works he affirmed the perfectibility of humanity, the fatherhood of God, and the moral perfection of Christ. As a nineteenth-century "evangelical" Unitarian, Channing continued to affirm the reality of the resurrection and genuineness of other NT miracles. To him these constituted solid rational proof for the supernatural character of Christianity. He believed that the Bible recorded inspiration but felt, as he said in 1819, that it is "a book written for men, in the language of men, and that its meaning is to be sought in the same manner as that of other books." He would later in life criticize others, such as the transcendentalist Ralph Waldo Emerson, for taking further exceptions to traditional Christianity. Emerson, nonetheless, later in his own life looked back on Channing as the "bishop" of transcendentalism in the 1830s. Channing's moderate and temperate personality did much to spread his views. He also took strong stands against slavery and the use of liquor.

M. A. NOLL

See also UNITARIANISM.

Bibliography. D. Robinson, ed., William Ellery Channing: Selected Writings; C. Wright, Beginnings of Unitarianism in America.

Charismata. See SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

Charismatic Movement. An expression used to refer to a movement within historic churches that began in the 1950s. In the earlier stages the movement was often termed "neo-Pentecostal"; in more recent years it has frequently been referred to as the "charismatic renewal" or the "charismatic renewal movement." Therefore, participants are usually described as "charismatics."

On the American scene it is possible to date significant charismatic beginnings to the year 1960 with the national publicity given to certain events connected with the ministry of Dennis Bennett, at that time Episcopal rector in Van Nuys, California. Since then there has been a continuing growth of the movement within many of the mainline churches: first, such Protestant churches as Episcopal, Lutheran, and Presbyterian (early 1960s); second, the Roman Catholic (beginning in 1967); and third, the Greek Orthodox (about 1971). The charismatic movement has affected almost every historic church and has spread to many churches and countries beyond the United States. This continuing growth has resulted in a multiplicity of national, regional, and local conferences, the production of a wide range of literature, and increasing attention to doctrinal and theological questions both within and outside the movement. The challenge to the churches may be seen in the fact that since 1960 well over one hundred official denominational documents—regional, national, continental, and international—on the charismatic movement have been produced.

The immediate background of the charismatic movement is "classical Pentecostalism" dating from the early twentieth century, with its emphasis on baptism with (or in) the Holy Spirit as an endowment of power subsequent to conversion, speaking in tongues as the initial evidence of this baptism, and the continuing validity of the spiritual gifts (charismata) of 1 Corinthians 12:8–10. Because of such distinctive emphases these early "Pentecostals"—as they came to be called—found no place in the mainline churches (they either freely left or were forced out) and thus founded their own. As a result there gradually came into being such "classical" Pentecostal denominations as the Assemblies of God, the Pentecostal Holiness Church, the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee), the Church of God in Christ, and the International Church of the Foursquare Gospel. The charismatic movement, while related historically and doctrinally to classical Pentecostalism, has largely stayed within the historic church bodies or has spilled over into interdenominational church fellowships. In neither case has there been any significant movement toward the classical Pentecostal churches. Hence today the charismatic movement, despite its "classical" parentage, exists almost totally outside official Pentecostal denominations.

Special Emphases. Particular emphases are reflected variously in the charismatic movement.

Baptism with the Holy Spirit. There is common recognition of baptism with the Holy Spirit as a distinctive Christian experience. It is viewed as an event wherein the believer is "filled with" the presence and power of the Holy Spirit. Baptism with the Holy Spirit is understood to result from "the gift of the Holy Spirit," wherein the Spirit is freely "poured out," "falls upon," "comes on," "anoints," "endues" the believer with "power from on high." This event/experience is the moment of initiation into the Spirit-filled life. Spirit baptism is said to occur either at the time of conversion (through repentance and forgiveness) or subsequent thereto. Baptism with the Holy Spirit, accordingly, is not identified with conversion. It is viewed as an experience of being filled with the Holy Spirit that brings about powerful witness to Jesus Christ. Through this Spirit baptism the exalted Christ carries forward his ministry in the church and world.

The gift of the Holy Spirit wherein Spirit baptism occurs is understood as an act of God's sovereign grace. Accordingly, the gift may be received only through faith in Jesus Christ, who is the mediator of the gift and the baptism. Participants in the charismatic movement emphasize the centrality of Christ (not the Holy Spirit) and the unique instrumentality of faith in him. It is the same Christ who through his life, death, and resurrection saves and forgives the lost who also through his exaltation to "the right hand of the Father" sends forth the Holy Spirit upon the redeemed. So it is by the same faith that both turning from sin and empowering for ministry are to be received from him. Charismatics generally hold that conversion and the gift of the Spirit, though both received by faith, may or may not happen at the same time. The book of Acts is viewed as exhibiting two patterns: a separation (however brief or long) between conversion and the gift of the Holy Spirit (the original one hundred twenty, the Samaritans, Saul of Tarsus, and the Ephesian twelve), and a simultaneous reception of both (the centurion household in Caesarea). Hence, it is by way of faith—not necessarily at the initial moment—that the gift of the Spirit is received.

Participants in the charismatic movement also frequently point to the pattern of Jesus' own life, which includes both his conception by the Holy Spirit and the later descent of the Holy Spirit upon him. Jesus was therefore both born of the Spirit as Savior and anointed with the Spirit as he began his ministry. So it is said that correspondingly there is needed both a birth of the Spirit for salvation and an anointing of the Spirit for ministry in his name.

This leads to the emphasis of charismatics on such matters as prayer, commitment, and expectancy as the context for the gift of the Holy Spirit. So it was with Jesus' life leading up to the descent of the Spirit; also with the one hundred twenty disciples who waited in the upper room prior to Pentecost; likewise a number of others according to several additional accounts in the book of Acts. Prayer preceding the reception of the Holy Spirit particularly stands out in the accounts of the Samaritans, Saul of Tarsus, and the centurion household in Caesarea. Seeing a similar pattern in the life of Jesus, the original disciples, and the early church, many charismatics affirm that in a spirit of prayer, commitment, and expectancy they were visited by the Holy Spirit. Such an event, it is claimed, did not occur by human effort, not through some work beyond faith; rather it happened to those who in faith were open to receive what God had promised to give.

Whereas the basic purpose of Spirit baptism is power for ministry and service, charismatics speak of a number of effects. Since it is the Holy Spirit who is given (not something he gives), many speak primarily of a strong sense of the reality of God, the Holy Spirit dynamically present, bearing witness to Jesus Christ and glorifying the Father. There is testimony to an enhanced sense of the Scriptures as the written Word of God, since the same Holy Spirit who inspired them fully is now said to be moving freely in the lives of the believers. Many charismatics also testify to an abounding joy, a deeper assurance of salvation, a new boldness for witness to Jesus Christ, and an enriched fellowship with other Christians. On this last point, one of the most noticeable features of the charismatic movement is the sense of koinōnia (close fellowship) that binds them together not only in a local fellowship but also across ancient denominational barriers. Accordingly, many claim that the charismatic movement is the true fulfillment of the Lord's prayer to the Father "that all of them may be one" (John 17:21).

Speaking in Tongues. In the charismatic movement speaking in tongues—glossolalia—occupies a significant place. Speaking in tongues is generally understood to be communication with God in language that is other than one known to the speaker. A person does the speaking—that is, he freely uses his vocal apparatus—but it is claimed that the Holy Spirit gives the utterance. It is viewed as transcendent speech by the enabling of the Holy Spirit.

Speaking in tongues is considered by some charismatics to be the miraculous utterance of an unlearned foreign language (so in classical Pentecostalism). This is claimed, first, on the basis of the narrative in Acts 1, that since the Scripture says that the disciples "began to speak in other tongues" and "each one heard them speaking in his own language," the disciples must have been speaking the languages or tongues of the listeners. Second, there is the frequently given testimony that on many occasions people have heard their own language spoken by someone who was totally ignorant of what he was saying. However, many charismatics hold that the otherness of tongues is qualitative rather than quantitative, that "other tongues" are not natural (i.e., human languages) but spiritual. Accordingly, if someone says that he heard a person speaking in his own language, this is viewed as occurring because the Holy Spirit immediately interpreted what was said (hence it was not a hearing of but a hearing in one's own language). From this perspective there is no difference between the tongues referred to in Acts 2 and 1 Corinthians 12–14. The former were not foreign languages and the latter ecstatic speech; both are utterances of the Holy Spirit that can be understood only when interpreted by the Holy Spirit. Charismatics who have embraced this understanding of "other tongues" believe that it best harmonizes the biblical witness, that it retains the spirituality of tongues, and that it accords with the empirical fact that there are no concrete data (for example, from the study of recordings of tongues) of an unknown language being spoken.

Charismatic Movement

The essential charismatic claim about glossolalia is that this is the vehicle of communication par excellence between man and God. It is the language of transcendent prayer and praise. In tongues there is speech to God which goes beyond the mental into the spiritual. Charismatics frequently state that in tongues there is a fulfillment of the intense desire to offer total praise to God not only with the mind but also with the heart and spirit. Therein one goes beyond the most elevated of earthly expressions—even “hosannas” and “hallelujahs”—into spiritual utterance: the praise of God in language given by the Holy Spirit. In the regular life of prayer tongues are said to occupy a primary place. Such prayer is identified with praying in the spirit or with the spirit, which, since it is not mental, can be done at all times. This spiritual prayer does not intend to eliminate mental prayer, i.e., prayer with the understanding, but to afford the continuous undergirding and background for all conceptual prayer. The ideal is prayer with the spirit and with the mind (in that order). Where prayer passes into praise it may likewise be singing with the spirit and singing with the mind. For the charismatic movement at large singing in the spirit—singing in tongues—occupies an important place, particularly in situations of community worship. Therein both words and melody are free expressions believed to be given spontaneously by the Holy Spirit. This, often combined with more usual singing, is seen as the apex of worship: it is the worship of God in psalms and human and (climactically) spiritual songs.

Speaking in tongues is understood to be not irrational but suprarational utterance. It is not the forsaking of the rational for the nonsensical—hence gibberish—but the fulfillment and transcendence of the rational in the spiritual. Charismatics are not disturbed by linguists who claim that glossolalia has no observable language structure, for if such were the case, speaking in tongues would not be spiritual but rational speech. Further, speaking in tongues is not viewed as ecstatic utterance—in the sense of uncontrolled, highly emotional, perhaps frenzied activity. While containing a strong emotional element, glossolalia runs deeper than the emotions. Both reason (or mind) and emotions are aspects of the human psyche (psychē), whether on the conscious or subconscious level. Speaking in tongues is thus understood to be transpsychical; it belongs to the realm of the spirit (pneuma).

Most persons in the charismatic movement view speaking in tongues as directly connected with the event of Spirit baptism. The Scriptures in Acts which specifically record speaking in tongues (2:4; 10:46; 19:6) state that it occurred with persons who had just received the gift of the Holy Spirit. Glossolalia in Acts therefore is closely linked with Spirit baptism, as an immediately ensuing activity. Hence, most charismatics believe that there can be no speaking in tongues without prior Spirit baptism (this is the opposite of saying that there can be no Spirit baptism without speaking in tongues). The reason would seem to follow from the very nature of baptism in the Spirit: a fullness of the Spirit that overflows into transcendent prayer and praise. Granted this fullness—the outpouring of the Spirit—glossolalia may be expected. Further, when speaking in tongues is recorded in the book of Acts, the Scriptures state or imply that everyone present participated. Thus charismatics generally conclude that speaking in tongues is not limited to some but is the province of all. Also these very tongues may thereafter become an ongoing part of the life of prayer and worship. Such tongues are sometimes called “devotional tongues” and are viewed as an important part of the prayer life of the Spirit-baptized believers.

In addition to viewing glossolalia as a concomitant of Spirit baptism and belonging to the Spirit-filled life, most charismatics affirm that though one may speak in tongues as a consequence of Spirit baptism, he may not have “the gift of tongues” for ministry in the body of believers. This is based not on Acts but on 1 Corinthians 12, where Paul depicts tongues as one of several manifestations of the Holy Spirit for the common good. In this situation tongues are to be spoken as the Spirit apportions, by the few not the many, and only when there is one present to interpret. Though all may be able to speak in tongues (Paul’s expressed desire), not all are so directed by the Holy Spirit. The phenomenon of tongues is the same—whether in Acts or 1 Corinthians, whether in the life of prayer or in the body of believers; it is addressed not to men but to God. However, the practice of tongues is said to be quite different in that what belongs to the life of the Spirit-filled believer is not necessarily exercised by him in the Christian fellowship.

Finally, there are those in the charismatic movement who place little emphasis on speaking in tongues. They do not disregard glossolalia, or by any means rule it out, but, focusing almost entirely on 1 Corinthians 12–14, view speaking in tongues as only one of several manifestations of the Holy Spirit. Hence if one does not speak in tongues, this does not signify any lack of Spirit baptism; it is only that the Holy Spirit has not apportioned to such a person that particular gift. Such a view, based more on the distribution of gifts in 1 Corinthians than the association of glossolalia with Spirit baptism in Acts, is obviously quite different from what has previously been described. Accordingly, to many other charismatics this failure to relate glossolalia primarily to the gift of the Spirit as its concomitant and as an ensuing expression in the life of prayer and praise is to overlook the basic purpose of tongues.

Spiritual Gifts. By definition the charismatic movement is concerned with charismata, the Greek term for “gifts of grace.” Everywhere throughout the charismatic movement there is the claim that all the charismata, or charisms, mentioned in Scripture are, or should be, operational in the Christian community. Whereas in large sectors of Christendom many of the gifts have been viewed as belonging only to first-century Christianity, the charismatic movement stresses their continuing importance. Many charismatics prefer the name “charismatic renewal” to “charismatic movement” to lay emphasis on a renewal of the gifts in our time.

It is generally recognized that the biblical charismata include a wide range of gifts as described in Romans 12:6–8; 1 Peter 4:10–11; and 1 Corinthians 12–14. (The word “charisma” is also used in Rom. 1:11; 5:15–16; 6:23; 1 Cor. 1:7; 7:7; 2 Cor. 1:11; 1 Tim. 4:14; 2 Tim. 1:6; “charismata” in Rom. 11:29.) All these gifts, charismatics hold, should be functional in the body of Christ. The focal point of charismatics, however, is 1 Corinthians 12–14, especially 12:4–11. They suggest a number of reasons for this: (1) These charismata alone are described as “the manifestation of the Spirit,” and hence they have unique importance as the direct expression and action of the Holy Spirit. The spiritual gifts, accordingly, make for a dynamic, vital community life. (2) The spiritual gifts are “power tools” for the upbuilding of the community. Each one functioning properly is essential to the full life of the body. (3) The exercise of the spiritual charismata by all makes for total ministry. It is not just the few (e.g., pastors, elders, deacons) who are to be channels for the Spirit’s manifestation, but each person in the community. (4) A body of Christians in which spiritual gifts—along with other gifts and ministries—are operating is a community of spontaneity in worship, dynamism in ministry, and rich fellowship with one another. (5) It is through the exercise of these spiritual gifts that the church comes alive to “high voltage” Christianity: an extraordinary sense of the exalted Lord’s presence in the Spirit moving powerfully among his people.

A profile on charismatic understanding of the spiritual gifts would include the following. All the gifts of the Spirit are viewed as extraordinary, supernatural, and permanent. The spiritual charismata as described in 1 Corinthians 12:8–10 are not arranged in a hierarchy so that “word of wisdom” is the highest and “interpretation of tongues” the least. The greatest gift at a given time is that which edifies most. All the spiritual gifts, especially prophecy (the direct utterance of God to his people in their own language), are earnestly to be desired (1 Cor. 14:1); thus an attitude of “seek not” about any gift is a violation of God’s intention for his people. The gifts of the Spirit, because of their high potency and possible abuse, need to be carefully ordered. Abuse, however, does not call for disuse but proper use. The spiritual gifts will not cease until we see him “face to face”; then they will be no longer needed for the edification of the community. Love is the “way” of the gifts—without love they profit nothing—and love will endure forever.

A word should be added about the relation of baptism with the Holy Spirit to the gifts of the Spirit. Charismatics often state that baptism in the Spirit is initiation into the dynamic dimension; the gifts of the Spirit are dynamic manifestation. Hence baptism with the Spirit is for living in power and glory; the spiritual charismata are works of power and glory. Many charismatics affirm that whenever Spirit baptism occurs, the gifts, which are already resident in the Christian community, become all the more freely and fully exercised.

Finally, charismatics generally recognize that spiritual gifts cannot substitute for spiritual fruit. The fruits of the Spirit—love, joy, peace, etc. (Gal. 5:22)—represent the maturation of the believer in Christ. The most immature believer, if he is open to the Holy Spirit, may be Spirit-filled and exercising extraordinary gifts, and yet have experienced little of the Spirit’s sanctifying grace. Such a person needs all the more to grow up into Christ.

Evaluations. Outside evaluations of the charismatic movement vary today from outright rejection to mixed acceptance. There are more than one hundred favorable official denominational documents that demonstrate on the whole an increasing openness, but with reservations, to many of its features. Critics of the theology of the charismatic movement have expressed disagreements variously. (1) Baptism with the Holy Spirit: some hold that it is improper, biblically and theologically, to refer to this as an experience possibly subsequent to conversion; others claim that whereas Spirit baptism may be a second experience, the primary purpose is not empowering but sanctification. (2) Speaking in tongues: some do not recognize glossolalia as having any longer a connection with Spirit baptism (the book of Acts being viewed as transitional) but consider it as only a lesser gift of the Holy Spirit available to some, or no longer available at all. (3) Spiritual gifts: some divide the spiritual gifts into “temporary” and “permanent,” claiming that the former have been withdrawn whereas the latter continue; tongues and prophecy in particular are said to have ceased with the completion of the canon of Scripture. It is apparent from such criticisms that much more theological work needs to be done.

Charismatic Movement

J. R. WILLIAMS

See also BAPTISM OF THE SPIRIT; PENTECOSTALISM; SPIRITUAL GIFTS; TONGUES, SPEAKING IN.

Bibliography. Charismatic: D. J. Bennett, Holy Spirit and You; L. Christenson, Speaking in Tongues and Its Significance for the Church; S. Clark, Baptized in the Spirit; Spiritual Gifts; H. M. Ervin, Spirit Baptism; M. Harper, Power for the Body of Christ; K. McDonnell, ed., Holy Spirit and Power: The Catholic Charismatic Renewal; J. Rea, Holy Spirit in the Bible; R. P. Spittler, ed., Perspectives on the New Pentecostalism; L. J. Cardinal Suenens, New Pentecost?; J. R. Williams, Era of the Spirit; Pentecostal Reality; Gift of the Holy Spirit Today; Renewal Theology; Salvation, the Holy Spirit, and Christian Living.

Documentary: K. McDonnell, Presence, Power, Praise: Documents on the Charismatic Renewal in the Churches, 1960–1980.

Noncharismatic: F. D. Bruner, Theology of the Holy Spirit: The Pentecostal Experience and the New Testament Witness; J. D. G. Dunn, Baptism in the Holy Spirit; A. A. Hoekema, Holy Spirit Baptism; J. F. MacArthur, Charismatic Chaos; J. R. W. Stott, Baptism and Fullness of the Holy Spirit.

Chasten, Chastisement. See CHURCH DISCIPLINE.

Chemnitz, Martin (1522–1586). A leading influence in consolidating Lutheran doctrine and practice in the generation after Luther's death. A popular adage runs: "Si Martinus non fuisset, Martinus vix stetisset" ("If Martin Chemnitz had not come along, Martin Luther would hardly have survived").

Chemnitz was born at Treuenbrietzen, near Wittenberg. Recognized as a child of superior intellectual gifts, he was sent to the Latin school in Wittenberg. He left school to lend a hand in the family clothmaking trade but returned to school at Magdeburg (1539–42). In 1545 he went to the University at Wittenberg to study under Philip Melancthon. When the Smalcald War disrupted Wittenberg temporarily, Chemnitz went to Königsberg, where he earned the degree of magister. It was here that he developed a deep interest in the study of theology. He was appointed librarian of the ducal library at Königsberg, and in 1554 he was admitted to the philosophical faculty of Wittenberg. His large student audiences were a testimony to his effectiveness as a teacher. However, he soon moved to Brunswick, where he accepted a call as a preacher and a coadjutor to the Lutheran superintendent of churches. He continued to serve Brunswick faithfully until his death.

Chemnitz is justly famous as churchman and preacher; nevertheless, his abiding significance rests on his work in connection with the controversies between the Roman Catholic Church and the churches which adhered to the Augsburg Confession and the strife which rent the latter churches after Luther's death. The first led to his Examen of the canons and decrees of the Council of Trent; the second to his large part in the production and acceptance of the Formula of Concord in 1577.

A short writing by Chemnitz against the Jesuit order brought him into conflict with Jacob Andrada, who sought to discredit Chemnitz's critique of the Jesuits by defending the theology of Trent. In response to Andrada, Chemnitz produced the Examen—a four-volume analysis of the decrees of Trent showing from Scripture and from both the most ancient and modern teachers of the church where the Tridentine formulations departed from the teachings of the Bible. In the first of these volumes Chemnitz worked out the so-called formal principle of the Reformation, that Scripture, and not tradition or a combination of Scripture and tradition, is the source and norm of doctrine in the Christian church. In the remaining three volumes he treated the sacraments and the abuses in the Roman Church that the Council of Trent had sought to defend. The Examen is widely acknowledged as not only a masterful polemic against the decrees of Trent but also a thorough exposition of the teaching of Reformation Lutheranism.

The serious dissensions which broke out among the Lutherans following Luther's death involved the understanding of several specific doctrines—original sin and conversion, the Lord's Supper, and ecclesiastical ceremonies. Chemnitz was one of several leaders who attempted to clarify the points at issue and allay the controversies. He wrote and rewrote the separate articles of the Formula of Concord and helped persuade pastors and princes to subscribe to the final document.

Chemnitz was a prolific writer. His works include De Duabus Naturis, a treatise on the two natures in Christ, and Harmony of the Four Gospels, which he did not manage to finish but which was carried to completion by Polycarp Leyser and Johann Gerhard and published posthumously.

J. F. JOHNSON

See also CONCORD, FORMULA OF.

Bibliography. T. Jungkuntz, Formulators of the Formula of Concord; E. F. Klug, From Luther to Chemnitz: On Scripture and the Word; R. D. Preus, Theology of Post-Reformation Lutheranism.

Cherub, Cherubim. See ANGEL.

Chesterton, Gilbert Keith (1874–1936). Christian writer and apologist. Born of Anglican parents in London, Chesterton from 1900 gained a reputation as a literary figure. His whimsical way with words was pressed into Christian service as his faith grew. In Orthodoxy (1908) he declared that anyone could fall into fads from Gnosticism to Christian Science. "But to have avoided them all," he continued, "has been one whirling adventure; and in my vision the heavenly chariot flies thundering through the ages, the dull heresies sprawling and prostrate, the wild truth reeling but erect." Against R. J. Campbell he argued that belief in sin as well as in goodness was more favorable to social reform than was the woolly optimism that refused to recognize evil. He held that the acid test of all religions lay in the question: what do they deny? He became a Roman Catholic in 1922; he would have done it earlier, but he was "much too frightened of that tremendous Reality on the altar."

Like his friend Ronald Knox, he was both entertainer and Christian apologist. He concluded that "in all that welter of inconsistent and incompatible heresies, the one and only really unparadonable heresy was orthodoxy." He complained that "the act of defending any of the cardinal virtues has today all the exhilaration of a vice." He saw clearly the crossroads at which Western civilization stood on deserting the path of religion and a God-centered universe. He blamed personal and national greed for World War I. Too many people were paying too much attention to the spice of life and too little attention to life itself. "Each day," he said, "is a special gift; something that might not have been." Chesterton early discovered the value of paradox as "truth standing on its head to gain attention." He could make others think by statements bizarre enough to pass their defenses and explode devastatingly within their minds. Most of his theological works came after he became a Roman Catholic, including Everlasting Man (1925) and Avowals and Denials (1934). C. S. Lewis and Ronald Knox acknowledged their intellectual and spiritual debt to him.

J. D. DOUGLAS

See also LEWIS, CLIVE STAPLES.

Bibliography. G. K. Chesterton, Autobiography; D. Barker, G. K. Chesterton; I. Boyd, Novels of G. K. Chesterton; J. Coates, Chesterton and the Edwardian Cultural Crisis; D. J. Conlon, ed., G. K. Chesterton: A Half-Century of Views; M. Coren, Gilbert, the Man Who Was G. K. Chesterton; A. S. Dale, Art of G. K. Chesterton; Outline of Sanity: A Biography of G. K. Chesterton; M. Finch, G. K. Chesterton; Q. Lauer, G. K. Chesterton: Philosopher without Portfolio; M. MacDonald and A. A. Tadie, eds., Riddle of Joy: G. K. Chesterton and C. S. Lewis; A. L. Maycock, Man Who Was Orthodox; J. Pearce, Wisdom and Innocence; M. Ward, Gilbert Keith Chesterton.

Chicago School of Theology. From the early 1900s scholars at the Divinity School of the University of Chicago worked toward a modernist theology. These scholars accepted the historical-critical approach to the Bible, to Christian origins, to church history, and to the development of Christian theology. Many of them—although on this issue some strongly dissented—also accepted a philosophical approach to the modern restatement of Christian theology. The philosophy was, depending on the individual scholar, either pragmatism or a process form of empiricism. This community of scholars and its modernist, historical-critical, and pragmatic or process-empirical point of view are known as the Chicago school of theology. In the mid-1960s the department of theology in the Divinity School appointed a number of faculty who, particularly on the issue of using process forms of philosophy to restate Christian doctrine, represented other points of view. The resultant pluralism marked the end of the Chicago school of theology.

The early years of the Chicago school produced men such as George Burman Foster, who, at the turn of the century, agonized over the import of the "death of God" for Christianity. Shirley Jackson Case applied the historical-critical method to Scripture, while his colleague Shailer Mathews applied the same method to the development of Christian doctrine. For Case and Mathews the historical-critical method meant looking for social, psychological, economic, and other causes for the emergence of the Bible and Christian doctrine. Mathews also emphasized the immanence of God and the nature of Christianity as a social movement. Edward Scribner Ames focused on the psychology of religion and on pragmatism as the context for modern theology.

During its first two and a half decades the Divinity School self-consciously functioned as a center for the promotion of the modernist movement, both academically and in the Protestant churches. The faculty produced a wide variety of materials for popular audiences, preached endless sermons, and spoke at an amazing variety of local clubs. They vigorously fought the theological conservatives, convinced that the future was theirs. Shailer Mathews took World War I as the opportunity to suggest to the Chicago Daily News that the conservative premillennialists were probably being supported by the Germans, and he recommended a government investigation. Shirley Jackson Case, on the contrary, in his essay "The Premillennial Menace" suggested a link between premillennialism and the communists of the Industrial Workers of the World.

In 1927 Henry Nelson Wieman joined the Chicago faculty, bringing an increased emphasis on philosophical theology. Wieman's first contribution to the Divinity School was to explicate the process philosophy of Alfred North Whitehead. This increased focus on philosophical theology seems to have had two sources. First, while the early historical-critical scholars could assume cosmic—that is, divine—support for modernist values, their studies had reached the level of sophistication where this cosmic support needed to be justified. Second, many people after World War I were not all convinced that humane, liberal, and progressive values could be found at the heart of modern culture. The claim that such values, derived from Christianity and cosmically supported, were immanent in modern democratic culture was the heart of modernism. Neo-orthodox theology, however, was based precisely on the skepticism about modern culture. Neo-orthodox theologians such as Barth in Europe and the Niebuhr brothers in America presented a profound challenge to the modernism of the Chicago school—a challenge that evoked an increased philosophical sophistication in the Chicago men. In a significant sense the Chicago men considered the neo-orthodox as their foes until the breakup of the school.

Chicago School of Theology

While Wieman's own interests later shifted away from Whitehead, other scholars carried on the philosophical tradition of process empiricism. The strictest Whiteheadian was Bernard M. Loomer, who served as dean of the Divinity School from 1945 to 1953. As dean, Loomer encouraged the organization of the school's curriculum largely on a Whiteheadian basis. Daniel Day Williams and Bernard Eugene Meland sought to use process philosophy as a foundation for restating Christian doctrine, but both men were sensitive to philosophical resources in addition to Whitehead. Holding a joint appointment in the Divinity School and the philosophy department was Charles Hartshorne. As a young man at Harvard, Hartshorne had been a junior colleague of Whitehead's. While the paramount expositor of Whitehead, Hartshorne worked out his own version of process philosophy which, especially in its doctrine of God, depended less on a Whiteheadian type of empiricism and more on strictly logical considerations.

Although after 1927 process philosophy typically provided the foundation for constructive theology, it never completely dominated the Divinity School, even its department of theology. Historical theologians Wilhelm Pauck and Jaroslav Pelikan provided critiques of the use of philosophy, and of process philosophy in particular, as the foundation for Christian theology. By the mid-1960s, however, all the men mentioned previously had moved from Chicago or had retired, and their replacements represented a pluralism of theological methodologies. While the contemporary faculty accepts the historical-critical method, it no longer focuses primarily on modernist theology. And while Whiteheadian and process forms of theology continue to be vigorously pursued, they are now but one of many options. Perhaps the old Chicago school of theology lives, not so much in Chicago alone, but in the contemporary reemergence of process theology throughout the United States and Canada, many of the leaders of this revival having taken their doctorates at Chicago.

S. T. FRANKLIN

See also CASE, SHIRLEY JACKSON; LIBERALISM, THEOLOGICAL; MATHEWS, SHAILER; PROCESS THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. C. H. Arnold, Near the Edge of Battle; L. E. Axel, God or Man at Chicago: The Chicago School of Theology; W. Dean, American Religious Empiricism; W. J. Hynes, Shirley Jackson Case and the Chicago School; B. E. Meland, ed., Future of Empirical Theology; C. Peden, Chicago School.

Chicago Statement on Biblical Inerrancy. An affirmation of the inerrancy of Scripture drawn up by 268 evangelical scholars at a conference in Chicago in October 1978. The International Council on Biblical Inerrancy (ICBI), which sponsored the conference, sought to win Christians to the view that inerrancy is true and important. Fourteen position papers were published in 1979 by Zondervan under the title Inerrancy, edited by Norman Geisler.

The Chicago Statement approaches 5000 words and includes a preface and three parts: a summary statement, nineteen articles of affirmation and denial, and an exposition. The preface sets the tone by affirming an essential bond between the truth of Holy Scripture and an adequate confession of its authority. The signers "gladly acknowledge that many who deny the inerrancy of Scripture do not display the consequences of this denial in the rest of their belief and behavior." Nevertheless, they affirm that to deny inerrancy is to "set aside the witness of Jesus Christ."

The short statement consists of five points. (1) God, who only speaks truth, has inspired Scripture to reveal Christ to sinners. (2) The Bible, "written by men, prepared and superintended by the Spirit, is of infallible divine authority in all matters upon which it touches." (3) The Holy Spirit, the divine author of Scripture, illumines readers and authenticates Scripture. (4) The Bible is without error in all its teaching. (5) Scripture's authority is impaired if inerrancy is limited or denied.

Part two consists of nineteen articles, each with brief affirmation and corresponding denial. Scripture is divine revelation and not merely a witness to revelation. Language is an adequate vehicle for revelation because God used language to reveal himself to human beings made in his image. The origin of the Bible is divine, although its mode of inspiration is a mystery. God did not override the personalities of the writers of Scripture but used their personalities and literary styles to produce his very word. Inspiration pertains only to the autographs, but their absence does not render "the assertion of Biblical inerrancy invalid or irrelevant." The possibility of Scripture's being infallible and errant in its assertions is denied. The Bible is inerrant in matters of religion, science, and history. It is denied that Jesus' teaching about Scripture can be dismissed by appeals to accommodation. Inerrancy has been the historic position of the Christian church; it was not invented by Protestant Scholasticism. The concluding denial is worthy of quotation: "We deny that such confession [of inerrancy] is necessary for salvation. However, we further deny that inerrancy can be rejected without grave consequences, both to the individual and to the Church."

Part three is a five-page exposition written by Anglican theologian James I. Packer. It endeavors to set the doctrine of inerrancy within the context of the broader teachings of Scripture about itself.

R. A. PETERSON

See also BIBLE, INERRANCY AND INFALLIBILITY OF; BIBLE, INSPIRATION OF; PLENARY INSPIRATION; VERBAL INSPIRATION.

Bibliography. J. Gregory, M. Noll, and R. Preus, The Proceedings of the Conference on Biblical Inerrancy; F. Humphreys, "Baptist Faith and Message and the Chicago Statement on Inerrancy," The Proceedings of the Conference on Biblical Inerrancy; K. S. Kantzer, ed., Applying the Scriptures: Papers from ICBI Summit III; E. D. Radmacher and R. D. Preus, eds., Hermeneutics, Inerrancy, and the Bible; D. P. Scaer, "International Council on Biblical Inerrancy, Summit II," CTQ 47:153–58; International Council on Biblical Inerrancy, Chicago Statement, JETS 21.

Chief Priest. See PRIESTS AND LEVITES.

Chiliasm. See MILLENNIUM, VIEWS OF THE.

Choose, Chosen. See ELECT, ELECTION.

Chrism. See CHRISTENING.

Christ, Jesus. See JESUS CHRIST.

Christ, Offices of. See OFFICES OF CHRIST.

Christening. This word would appear to have two derivations and thus to be used with twofold significance. From the Greek chriō ("I anoint"), it was used to describe the anointing with oil (the chrism) by the bishop when baptism, anointing, and sometimes the laying on of hands were all administered as one rite in the ancient church. This symbol was seen as pointing to the imparting of the gift of the same Holy Spirit who came upon (or christened, made into Christ) Jesus at his baptism (Mark 1:10–11). Middle English used the word loosely as an equivalent to baptism (i.e., making a Christian). The word then came to be applied to the giving of the name in baptism, and from the sixteenth century it has been used as a synonym for naming. D. H. WHEATON Bibliography. G. W. H. Lampe, Seal of the Spirit; A. Schmemmann, Of Water and the Spirit; E. C. Whitaker, Baptismal Liturgy.

Christian. See CHRISTIANS, NAMES OF.

Christian Calendar. See CHRISTIAN YEAR.

Christian Ethics. See ETHICAL SYSTEMS, CHRISTIAN.

Christian Feminism. See FEMINISM, CHRISTIAN.

Christianity and Culture. The relations between Christianity and culture have varied according to circumstances and particular perceptions of culture. Although modern social science has given us a more detailed understanding of culture, we are basically concerned with the way God's work of redemption—both in Scripture and in history—has confronted and changed the social order in its created context, and also with the ways believing communities have viewed and responded to their environment. The church confronts these issues whenever it seeks to live its faith and give a credible witness in the place to which God has called it.

The world "culture" originally referred to cultivating the ground, and it has never completely lost this rapport with natural productivity. While the word is often used more narrowly for the fine arts, culture is better understood as the total pattern of a people's behavior; and it is in this latter sense that the word will be used in this article. Culture includes all behavior that is learned and transmitted by the symbols (rites, artifacts, language, etc.) of a particular group and that grows out of certain ideas or assumptions that we call a worldview.

Biblical and Theological Framework. Old Testament. The Bible has no word for culture as such, but it is clear from the beginning that God created man and woman as creatures of culture. The early chapters of Genesis present the created order as an interrelated community in which relations with God, the earth, and human beings all played a part. There is an implied covenant between man and God that must be lived out in a social context by a people embedded in creation. Clearly the order was good (Gen. 1:31), and the human process of having dominion was good as well.

The fall following Adam and Eve's rebellion against God's instructions resulted in a disordered community and a culture that reflected human pride (Gen. 11:4). God's intervention, from the choosing of Abraham to the deliverance from Egypt, should be seen in terms of God's purpose to restore and renew the created order through a people reflecting his character.

It is a mistake to see the law as an expression of God's desire for his people to have a unique cultural system. Much of Israel's culture was common to other nations of the ancient Near East. True, contact with other cultures was forbidden upon entrance into Canaan (Josh. 6:18), but this was because they were subject to God's wrath due to their wickedness, not because they were foreign.

Indeed, anthropologists studying the OT recognize that Israel, due to its geography, had greater exposure to influences from neighboring peoples than almost any other ancient nation. Bible scholars have begun to appreciate how biblical practices—e.g., the ornamentation of the temple or even the covenant idea—have close parallels in neighboring cultures. So in the process of revelation God is not concerned to give his people a special culture, but to intervene and reveal his will so that institutions and practices that already existed could be reformed and become suitable vehicles of his glory. Of course this meant that much from neighboring cultures had to be forbidden, and even those institutions that Israel had in common with its neighbors—like the priesthood or kingship—were transformed under the impact of God's instructions (e.g., Deut. 17:14–20).

As Israel prospered during the monarchy, among other things, it forgot that its institutions were a means of furthering God's purposes and saw them as ends in themselves, so that God had to expel Israel from the land and send it to live in an alien culture. Even there God promised a sprout from the stump of Jesse would encompass the renewal of all creation (Isa. 11); in the meantime they must seek the welfare of the land in which they were dwelling (Jer. 29:5–7).

New Testament. God's desire to redeem and restore human cultural patterns is implied in the ministry of Christ, who came with a clear consciousness of fulfilling the redemptive purpose of the OT. His earth-shattering re-creative work focused on the resurrection, ascension, and Pentecost, which were seen as fulfillment of the OT promises for covenant life and community.

The oft-repeated remark that the NT is indifferent to culture holds only for a very narrow view of culture. The Christian experience with Christ was seen to have great implications for culture (cf. Paul's advice to Philemon). And if the OT vision of earthly and human renewal is borne in mind, it can be seen that Christ's earthly work started a process of transformation that will be gloriously completed when he returns to judge the world, a consummation which by our response of faith and obedience we are already made to taste.

As in the OT, the environment of the NT church was highly cosmopolitan. Roman administration and Greek language and culture all favored the exchange of ideas. NT writers often used terms familiar to a broad spectrum of people: John makes use of words like logos or sophia to express the transforming reality of the Word made flesh; Paul shows respect for a great variety of cultural practices (Rom. 14; 1 Cor. 10:23–33; Col. 2:16; 1 Tim. 4:3–4) to underline the genuine liberation that comes from being in Christ. This is not to say that the gospel was compatible with any and every cultural pattern. There were fundamental encounters with Judaizers who insisted on a Jewish culture for all believers and with Greeks who believed wisdom expressed an immanent order discoverable by human reason. For these, the coming of Christ was the decisive element; new meaning was given to the witness of the Jewish law and to the Greek quest for human wisdom.

Historical Perspective. The Early Church. The church was born in the midst of major intellectual traditions. Some, such as Justin Martyr, felt that good culture was a reflection of the divine Logos and preliminary training for the gospel. Others agreed with Tertullian, who insisted that culture was the locus of sin and that salvation involved an ethical separation from surrounding influences. But it soon became clear that if the church was to communicate its faith in terms the world understood, it too, like the NT church, must make use of current expressions. The ideas of infinitude and eternity, which the Greeks were reluctant to apply to God, were used to describe the Christian God; the Near Eastern idea of a transcendent source of all things influenced later formulations of the doctrine of creation; and Plotinus's intelligible world was used to describe the New Jerusalem and to formulate a way to God from within. At other points, however—as in views of history and providence—Christianity broke sharply with these influences.

The conversion of Emperor Constantine (A.D. 312) decisively changed the position of Christianity in the world, if not the character of Christianity itself, and made it possible for a particular civilization to be identified with Christianity. The temptation was to view the faith in an institutional way rather than as the power of God to reform individuals and communities. Augustine contributed the first general interpretation of history and culture in his City of God. There he argued that history involved a continuous struggle between the city of man ruled by cupiditas (or covetousness) and the city of God ruled by love. With the fall of classical culture Augustine had come to feel a certain pessimism about human achievement and the need to rely on God's grace. The fall, he believed, created a split in human consciousness which could be healed only by submission to the church and an appropriation of its art and liturgy as a way of achieving oblique knowledge of God. Biblical imagery then replaced the classics as the basis for a “Christian culture” (cf. his On Christian Doctrine), thus laying the foundation for medieval art and worship.

Meanwhile in the East theologians stressed the earth as a potential vehicle of God’s spirit and saw redemption in terms of divinization (Athanasius), a restoring of its “image” of God. This recaptured some OT echoes lost in the West and led to the rich mystical traditions of the Orthodox Churches.

Middle Ages. From Augustine there developed the view that everything on earth conformed to some heavenly pattern. Bonaventure pictured the world as a road leading to God where he could be read in every object. For Aquinas culture as a reflection of man’s natural end must conform to natural law. Since “it is natural for man to be a social and political animal,” life in society is prescribed by natural law. Grace, God’s assistance, perfects rather than judges what is naturally good, since our end is implicit in our nature. This view understood the eternal significance of human achievement—our work “bears eternal fruit,” as Dante put it in the Divine Comedy—even as it reduced its historical significance and sometimes elicited uncritical loyalty to particular embodiments of Christian civilization.

Reformation. The decisive critique of the medieval view of culture came with the Reformation. The Copernican revolution and the voyages of discovery focused on the possibilities of earthly life. The static medieval worldview was broken, and the Reformers began to define Christian purposes not in terms of imaging some eternal pattern but in realizing a future ideal. John Calvin emphasized the sovereign interventions of God and the definitive victory of Christ which the resurrection highlights. The ascension implies the filling of all things with his glory, and so the Christian can be optimistic about this world order. The dynamic kingdom of Christ presses through the church to bring all mankind under the sway of the gospel.

Martin Luther, on the other hand, reacting against medieval pretensions of Christian culture, emphasized the sinful character of human work and the need for grace. Cultural forms then have no positive value and serve only to restrain evil. The spontaneous act of love that God produces in the believer can be performed in any calling and in any case will not be fully manifest until Christ returns. The church leavens society, but its influence is often visible only to faith.

The radical stream of the Reformation—sometimes called Anabaptism—picked up ascetic and perfectionist currents in the church and stressed personal conversion and a separated Christian community. Their view of the pervasive character of sin, their emphasis on the immanent return of Christ, and perhaps their minority status made them generally pessimistic about the possibilities of human culture.

Enlightenment. The Reformation conscience and the Renaissance emphasis on this world both contributed to a process of secularization in the West wherein the Christian consensus of the Middle Ages gradually gave way to the goals of the secular state. Christian ideals were often influential on society (as they are to this day), but belief in the Christian reality was given up. By the late eighteenth century, during what is known as the Enlightenment, the world was understood in immanent terms; God was distant and uninvolved; man had come of age. Lying behind this faith was the conviction that “the human situation is fundamentally characterized by conflict with nature” rather than conflict with God (H. R. Niebuhr). Moreover, there was every confidence that this conflict was being won, and the way was open to identify Christianity with Western European (and later North American) culture and to the cultural imperialism of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries.

Hegel’s idea of the immanent development of spiritual reality in human cultures marked a final stage of the influence of Christianity on European culture. Soon Nietzsche announced that God was dead and all values must be reformulated. Karl Löwith calls the resulting nihilism “the only real belief of educated people” at the end of the nineteenth century.

Modern Period. World War I seemed to confirm Nietzsche’s cynicism and the absence of all Christian influences on culture and dashed the hopes of some who had believed it possible to bring in the millennium. Not surprisingly, most Christians were negative about the drift of Western culture and contented themselves with fighting on very narrow fronts. In an early attempt to make a critical judgment on modern post-Christian culture, T. S. Eliot in 1934 argued that modern literature was ruled by secularism and individualism. More recently evangelicals Francis Schaeffer and H. R. Rookmaaker traced the alienation of modern culture to the surrender of Christian values since the Renaissance. B. I. Bell and C. S. Lewis have described the manipulation and dehumanization that have resulted from modern consumer society and the resultant “starved sensibilities.” More positively Paul Tillich has pointed out that modern cultural forms still express basic religious or absolute commitments and make possible an experience of depth.

The most far-reaching influence on Christian thinking about culture since World War II has come about by the growing impact of the social sciences. These studies have shown us that culture is more than an intellectual worldview; it is also a complex of symbols—including objects, words, and events—by which a people orient themselves in the world. The meaning and thus the implications of the Christian commitment are seen to be pervasive throughout human culture, making possible a new, holistic understanding of the gospel. Cross-cultural communication of the faith has suggested the need to appropriate the resources of both sender and receptor cultures to achieve a fuller comprehension of Christian truth. In all communities there is the growing awareness that the Word of God, not some particular culture, will correct faults and redeem strengths, and every cultural perception of Christian truth and Scripture can be used to enhance our understanding of the gospel “until we all reach unity in the faith and in the knowledge of the Son of God” (Eph. 4:13).

Christianity and Culture

Typology. The history of the encounter between Christianity and culture shows certain typical responses that reflect varying theological emphases and historical contingencies. At the risk of arbitrary division, we may suggest three typical views that have been influential on evangelical thinking.

Anabaptist. Throughout Christian history a radical and rigorist stream has appeared, emphasizing the fallen character of this world order and the necessity of creating alternative structures that more closely follow the model of the church’s crucified Lord. Finding its clearest expression in the Radical Reformation, that view has continued to influence Christians through churches in this tradition and the many pietist groups that share its spirit. An extreme expression of this point of view is Watchman Nee, who believed that salvation involved the total severance of a person from this world’s system. The Christian lives in the world as in an alien environment—like a diver in water—and so should develop an attitude of detachment. The earthly work of the Christian is always under death sentence; his only hope is God’s final deliverance. A more moderate proponent of this view is Jacques Ellul, who argued that civilization looks to a new work of God wherein the New Jerusalem will displace this fallen city. Meanwhile we continue to work, realizing “we are participating in a work of death which is under a curse.” A more positive and influential expression of this tendency comes from J. H. Yoder. For Yoder, Jesus came to effect a social revolution by the formation of a new voluntary community rather than by an encounter with the powers. Christ founded a new order with alternative patterns of leadership and life style that will eventually condemn and displace the old dying order. The way of the cross, Yoder believes, is an “alternative to both insurrection and quietism.” This view has given clear expression to the apocalyptic and transcendent elements of Christianity, and many representatives have exerted a strong prophetic influence, though they have hesitated to engage in active public efforts to improve existing conditions.

Anglo-Catholic. Other Christians have insisted more on the distinction between the spheres of grace and nature. Continuing the medieval tradition, thinkers of this bent believe the area of human culture is indifferent to religious values. J. H. Newman gave a classic expression to this view a century ago when he claimed that culture has value on its own (natural) level but it cannot be the locus of virtue: “Intellectual cultivation is not the cause or proper antecedent of anything supernatural.” In our century C. S. Lewis has taken a similar view. He believes the NT is unmistakably cold toward culture, which must be dispensed with the minute it conflicts with the service of God. The good of culture may be analogous to Christian good but it is not the same—he does not know, he confesses, how spiritual and cultural goods are to be reconciled. These thinkers correctly give priority to spiritual values, but they are not able to suggest critical perspectives shaped by Christian truth and so tend to support the cultural status quo.

Reformed. Since Justin Martyr there have been Christians convinced that culture can be taken captive to the lordship of Christ. Emphasizing the creative power of God and the victorious work of Christ, these thinkers tend to be more optimistic about human structures, feeling that however wicked and depraved certain institutions may appear, they do not lie outside of Christ’s kingship. Calvin gave classic expression to this position, and he has been followed by the tradition of Reformed and Presbyterian Christianity. Early in our century Abraham Kuyper gave a concise expression to this view, which places the self-glorification of God in the center of Christian thinking about culture. All human labor collectively exhibits the image of God and by common grace is given to honor Christ, the mediator of creation. Culture then can be the means of controlling the influence of sin and, because of Christ’s work which restores creation in its root, can begin to reflect the triumph of Christ’s restored kingship which will be consummated at the second coming. Kuyper believes that genuine development in society will carry over into eternity (Rev. 21:24) even if the last days display an apostasy in spiritual things. This view has had a great influence on societies where it is present and exhibits an attractive emphasis on the lordship of Christ and the actuality of his kingdom; its weakness has been a tendency to triumphalism that underestimates the power and extent of evil.

Theological Conclusion. From the evidence surveyed, is it possible to suggest some guidelines for a Christian approach to culture? Some agree with H. R. Niebuhr that the relativities of our faith and station suggest we leave our options open. But certain biblical parameters may be proffered. Evangelicals have been properly concerned that cultural influences not challenge or dilute the authority of Christ and his Word. But clearly this problem cannot be solved by an avoidance of culture; it is impossible to commit oneself to Christ in isolation from our culture. A measure of solidarity with our environment is inevitable; we are products of it, and as Christians we are responsible to it as salt and light. Sin moreover is rebellion against God and his Word, and so the basic struggle in culture is not with nature but with the forces of evil. It follows that we cannot avoid the struggle for righteousness in the cultural sphere. As Milton put it: "It is one thing to be naïve and ignorant of moral options; it is quite another to be aware of options and choose to obey God." For visible purity, while it comes from God, cannot be realized except by trial, and trial comes by what is contrary.

The basic need for Christians through the ages has been a faith large enough to include the whole of the biblical material—that sees God as Creator and Sustainer; that honors Christ as both Logos and Lord; and that envisions in redemption both the reconciliation of the sinner and the renewal of the created order. This leads to a realistic optimism, for commitment to God frees us from subservience to lesser principles and helps us keep them in proper perspective. Scripture is the norm for all peoples and times, but the supracultural element must always be expressed in some particular cultural form, even if those forms are transformed as the Holy Spirit applies the reality of the kingdom. Meanwhile in our families and communities let us pray for the delight of the child who is astonished simply to be and for the wisdom of the sage to discern and contend for the truth. For the "little deeds of little men and women, all incomplete and imperfect . . . , are crucial and have their place in God's great schemes" (H. R. Rookmaaker).

W. A. DYRNESS

Bibliography. E. Caillet, Christian Approach to Culture; T. S. Eliot, Notes toward a Definition of Culture; "Religion and Literature," in Selected Essays; J. Ellul, Meaning of the City; C. H. Kraft, Christianity in Culture; A. Kuyper, Lectures on Calvinism; C. S. Lewis, "Christianity in Culture," in Christian Reflections; W. Nee, Love Not the World; E. A. Nida, Customs and Culture; H. R. Niebuhr, Christ and Culture; F. Schaeffer, How Should We Then Live?; J. Stott and R. Coote, eds., Down to Earth: Studies in Christianity and Culture; P. Tillich, Theology of Culture; J. H. Yoder, Politics of Jesus.

Christianity and Religions. The celebration of religious diversity in the Western world has re-confronted the Church with fundamental theological issues. Is the spirituality and religious piety of adherents of other religions authentic? Is salvation available outside a knowledge of the gospel of Jesus Christ? No other issue is more important for Christian identity right now. For these questions target the central Christian doctrines: the veracity of Scripture, the nature of God, humanity's sinfulness, the uniqueness of Jesus' person and work, and the church's mission.

Christianity was born in a religiously pluralistic world, so these questions are not new. But in the late twentieth century the relation between Christianity and other religions has focused theologically on the location of salvation and is answered through the threefold typology of pluralism, inclusivism, and exclusivism. Pluralism construes salvation as independently available in many cultures and religions; in inclusivism Jesus Christ is the normative fulfillment of the salvation available throughout other cultures; and exclusivism claims that salvation is available only through faith in God's special acts in history, culminating in Jesus Christ.

The deficiencies of this typology are becoming increasingly conspicuous. For in this framing of the debate the pluralist and inclusivist positions assume that salvation can be a generic transcultural concept and accessible despite the social and historical context. Not only does this eradicate the otherness of non-Western religions, it also ignores postmodern analyses regarding the social and historical particularity of all awareness and praxis. Additionally, the label "exclusivism" prejudicially connotes arrogance and close-mindedness, so we employ "particularism" as a more appropriate term. And typically this category is falsely restricted to those who deny God's universal salvific will, making it difficult to categorize the positions of John Wesley or Lesslie Newbigin. Despite the problems with this typology, a replacement is not yet in sight.

Particularism. Particularism holds that salvation is available only through faith in God's special words and deeds in history, culminating in Jesus Christ. Particularism, which has dominated the history of the church until the Enlightenment, is reflected in the venerable phrase "no salvation outside the church," used by both Catholics and the Reformers. This position has been central to evangelicalism's identity and explains its deep commitment to missions. Representatives within the wider Protestant world include Lesslie Newbigin and Karl Barth. The following theses help explicate this position.

1. Humanity's appalling sinfulness. While God reveals himself as the Creator and the holy Judge through creation and human nature (Rom. 1:19–20; 2:14–15; Acts 14:17; 17:27), after the fall this general revelation only renders humanity "inexcusable" (Rom. 1:20; 2:1). Not only does creation become ambiguous (Gen. 3:17), but sinful humans, who naturally seek the Infinite because they are created in God's image, now misuse general revelation to construct images to keep God under their control due to their fear of a holy Judge (Rom. 1:21–32). Similarly the religions are understood dialectically, as reflecting God's general revelation through humanity's quest for God, but corrupted by sin. In his Athens speech, Paul linked the Greeks' religiosity and God's general revelation, but he also noted that worshipping idols and an unknown god evidenced their suppression of this revelation (Acts 17:22–31).

2. Jesus Christ, the God-man, constitutes salvation. The sinner faces the holy God's wrath and condemnation unless saved by his grace (John 3:18). Beginning with the protoevangelium (Gen. 3:15) and throughout the biblical trajectory, God freely demonstrates his mercy by acting in history to promise salvation. God fulfilled this promise when the Son assumed flesh in Jesus Christ and constituted the reality of salvation. Just as Jesus is not a symbol for an immanent historical process, but God's unique intervention in history, so also the salvation he establishes is unique and present only through faith in him (John 14:6). Thus Jesus Christ is the only mediator between God and man, and the only name by which we can be saved (Acts 4:12; 1 Tim. 2:5). Christ's work illustrates why salvation is through this name alone. For in this cosmos where natural evils abound, how else can I know that God is merciful to the sinner, unless God distinguishes himself from this fallen world by his salvific acts in history? Moreover, Christ's righteous life and death is the promised atonement for our sins. How else can the sinner approach the holy God "with freedom and confidence," except by trusting in Jesus' righteousness (Rom. 3:22; Eph. 3:12)? Finally, what hope for the future is found in the fallen created order? Rather God's supernatural acts in history, culminating in Christ's resurrection, demonstrates that Jesus fulfilled the promise by defeating Satan and changing the very destiny of creation (1 Cor. 15:19; Eph. 1:20–23).

3. Special revelation provides the means of salvation. Salvation is gained by faith on the promise which Jesus Christ fulfilled (Rom. 4:13–25; Gal. 3:18; Heb. 11:11). As a result, saving faith is not implicit or anonymous; for faith has an object, namely, God's special revelation. This particularity precludes homogenizing Christianity and other religions. God's self-revelation in Jesus Christ irreducibly specifies the Christian God and his standard for righteousness; Christ's death and resurrection, which establishes reconciliation and a new destiny for creation, defines communion with God; and Jesus' self-sacrificial love delineates godly praxis. Simply put, there is an ineradicable christological cast to Christian salvation. Not only is there an ineffaceable difference between God's revelation and the religions, but those without Christ are perishing (John 3:18; Rom. 10:9–15). Consequently the church's mission is to proclaim the gospel of Jesus Christ, calling to repentance and salvation those who are perishing.

4. Options regarding those who have not heard. The scandal of particularity raises questions regarding those who have not heard. (a) Restrictivism. Some particularists hold that only those hearing the gospel of Jesus Christ and explicitly trusting in him in this life can be saved; all others are swept into a lost eternity (Frankfort Declaration). Appropriately labeled restrictivism, this stance is usually linked with classical Calvinism, which insists that God desires the salvation of only a few, namely, the elect (John 17:9). (b) Agnosticism. However, most particularists confess that God desires that all sinners be saved (1 Tim. 2:4; 2 Pet. 3:9) and treat agnostically the difficult question regarding infants, the mentally retarded, and those who have never heard, leaving their fate in God's hands (Gen. 18:25). For example, major evangelical conferences—from the 1974 Lausanne Congress to the 1989 Evangelical Affirmations Consultation—are pessimistically agnostic toward the unevangelized, confessing that special revelation is necessary for salvation but going no further than Scripture. While basically agnostic, others construe the access to salvation for the unevangelized more optimistically, speculating on God's use of dreams or even prevenient grace. Wesley for example refused to damn the pagan world, because "I have no authority from the word of God," and left the matter in God's hands who alone is the final Judge. (c) Postmortem evangelization. Others propose universal evangelization through the nonbeliever's encounter with Christ at death, or after death (Donald Bloesch). Simply put, particularism encompasses a range of positions—a point acknowledged by evangelicals but seldom by others.

Inclusivism. Inclusivism holds that God's immanent and saving grace is available to all ages and cultures but exemplified in the final degree in Jesus Christ. Inclusivism has an ancient heritage in the church, first espoused by Justin Martyr through his Logos Christianity. But it became dominant when Protestant liberalism attempted to answer the challenges of the Enlightenment. Dissatisfaction with particularism, especially with its inability to speak definitively regarding the universal availability of salvation, has produced a massive theological shift in modern theology. Following Karl Rahner and Vatican II many Catholics espouse inclusivism; they are now being joined by some post-conservative evangelicals (Clark Pinnock, John Sanders, Stanley Grenz). The following theses help explicate this position.

1. God's salvific grace is universal. If God really desires to save everyone (John 3:16; Acts 10:35; Heb. 11:6; 1 Tim. 2:4; 2 Pet. 3:9;), then God must provide the means to achieve that end. The biblical instances of pagan saints (Melchizedek, Job, Cornelius) support the thesis that saving grace is universally available in all cultures, without regard to geography or time.

2. Jesus Christ is the final expression of God's saving grace. While confessing the uniqueness of Jesus, inclusivists employ various constructs to link the particularity of salvation in Jesus Christ with God's universal salvific will. Some theologians simply assert that salvation's ontological ground in Jesus' person and work is different from its epistemological access, which may be available through other means. Rahner also confesses that this universal grace is "the salvation won by Christ" and constructs Jesus as the final or completing cause of God's universal salvific will. But many have attacked this theological bridge between the universality of grace and the particularity of Jesus' salvation, and question whether saving grace in other religions and anonymous Christians actually has this homogeneous telos. As a result, constructs employing the Spirit or a Logos Christology are now common. The pneumatological argument sees the omnipresent Spirit as preparing for the fullness of salvation present in Christ (Pinnock). Similarly, in Logos Christology Jesus is understood as the clearest or the final expression of the Logos's universal saving presence. In both instances Jesus is the normative fulfillment of God's universal grace, not salvation's constitutive mediator.

3. Salvific grace assumes historical form. Insisting that salvation must be concretely available, inclusivists do not simply focus on morality, conscience, and providence as means of salvation, but also refer to the religions. While acknowledging that the religions contain much error, Pinnock cautiously argues that God employs elements of the religions as a way of evoking faith. But the religions do not mediate salvation. The faith that saves is not confined to a religious framework; rather faith in God saves, not knowing a certain minimum information. Pinnock identifies those saved in this way as "pre-Messianic believers" awaiting the fullness of salvation in Jesus Christ which will be received later. Rahner argues on the basis of the Old Testament religion, which provided salvation despite its corruption and errors, that other religions containing "supernatural grace-filled elements" are lawful channels of grace until Christianity becomes an alternative. Rahner even labels those who are saved through the faithful practice of their religion "anonymous Christians." So the non-Christian is already touched by God's saving grace; the gospel simply makes explicit what is already implicit universally. So the Christian missionary task now becomes completion and fulfillment. As Vatican II's Ad gentes counsels, "whatever truth and grace are to be found among the nations, as a sort of secret presence of God, this [missionary] activity frees from all taint of evil and restores to Christ its maker."

Criticism. (1) In Scripture God's universal saving will is always linked to particular means, God's special revelation. God desires everyone to be saved and come to a knowledge of the truth (1 Tim. 2:4) through the "one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself as a ransom for all" (1 Tim. 2:5-6; see also John 3:16, 18; Acts 10:35, 43; 1 Pet. 3:9, 12). Nor is there evidence that the "pious pagans" of Scripture lacked special revelation. Certainly, Cornelius was not saved until he trusted on Christ (Acts 11:14-17). Inclusivism distorts the biblical revelation. (2) Inclusivism appears to reduce Jesus to one who merely expresses our salvation, not the one who actually constituted it. Scripture, by contrast, insists that Jesus Christ is the one who established salvation by his unique work in his life, death and resurrection (John 14:6; Rom. 5:9-10; Eph. 2:5-10). Viewing Jesus as simply the one who perfectly acts out God's ever-present love for a rebellious humanity also subverts the biblical emphasis on God's holiness and undercuts the propitiatory view of Christ's atoning work. (3) Doesn't the inclusivist's universal salvific grace lose the particularity of salvation in Jesus Christ? Certainly pious non-Christians would not find it meaningful to be identified as "believers awaiting messianic salvation" or even "anonymous Christians." Such a vague use of terms like "salvation," "faith," and "God" is misleading. For each culture offers disparate ideas of God and the human purpose. How can faith be Christian without its distinctive object that defines God as holy yet merciful to sinners in Jesus Christ? (4) Inclusivism undermines the urgency of missions. The gospel calls to repentance and salvation those who are perishing (John 3:16). And salvation includes repentance, which is not an enhancement but a reversal of one's ways.

Pluralism. Pluralism, or more accurately, normative religious pluralism, maintains that the religions can provide independent salvific access to the divine Reality. Jesus' uniqueness is repudiated as imperialistic and contradicting God's universal love for humankind. Pluralism is a recent position in Christian theological discussions. As a result, the case for pluralism varies. Some identify a commonality within all the religions, e.g., religions are historically conditioned human constructs of an ineffable mystical experience (Wilfred Cantwell Smith). Others argue that the heightened awareness of cultural relativities reveals all religions as world-viewish constructs, which precludes absolutist claims (Ernst Troeltsch). Attacking exclusivism and inclusivism as oppressive toward other cultures, some argue that only pluralism can establish an interreligious dialogue that brings justice for the oppressed (Paul Knitter). However, the most prominent advocate for pluralism, John Hick, brilliantly combines elements of these key arguments.

John Hick's Pluralism. While recognizing the religions' varying culturally conditioned concepts of the transcendent, Hick discerns a common soteriological structure among the religions, namely, moving humans from self-centeredness to a limitlessly better state centered in the Real. Compassion and goodness reflect a right relationship to God or the Real. Lacking public evidence that any religion is soteriologically or morally superior to the others, Hick concludes that pluralism is true. This grounds Hick's call for a theocentric understanding of the religions, in contrast to a Christocentric one: the religions independently mediate this soteriological power.

Kant's noumenal/phenomenal distinction enables Hick to account for the breadth of religious concepts of the Real or the Ultimate. The noumenal Real transcends all human concepts: "the Real in itself cannot properly be said to be personal or impersonal, purposive or non-purposive, good or evil, substance or process, even one or many." Phenomenally the Real is variously conceived by the religions; nevertheless, the Real mediates soteriological power through the religions. So the various religions must be adjudicated soteriologically, not theoretically. Moreover, missions cannot aim at converting other religious adherents but is transformed into dialogue with other religions which aims at reforming Christian doctrine and broadening its understanding of the Real.

Since other traditions have their own independent and equally valid access to God, deconstructing the classical Christian confessions is essential to Hick's pluralist program. Hick specifically targets Scripture's authority, the Trinity, and Jesus' person and work, including the substitutionary atonement. He proposes, for instance, that the incarnation be understood as a metaphor, a personal confession for Christians alone, for others have their own independent insight into God.

Criticism. (1) While Hick identifies a common soteriological structure, the religions' own concrete understandings of salvation and its various paths and goals cannot be reduced to his abstract pluralistic formula: transformation from self-centeredness to a new centering in the Real. The Muslim's Paradise and the Theravada Buddhist's search for nirvana can be subsumed under the same generic category only by effacing their particularity. (2) Hick's Kantian distinction between the phenomenal and noumenal Real at best ensues in a form of agnosticism. Every religious belief is transformed into simply a phenomenal apprehension of the unknown noumenal Real. Since the noumenal Real even transcends moral categories, how can Hick legitimately claim that the Real mediates a moral or soteriological power through the religions? Hasn't Hick's strategy of denying Jesus' uniqueness inadvertently undermined his own confession of God's love? (3) While masquerading under the label of toleration, Hick's pluralism undermines the integrity and particularity of the religions. Otherwise pluralists would not try to reduce the Christian's commitment to the Trinity and the incarnation.

T. R. PHILLIPS

Bibliography. D. A. Carson, Gagging of God; J. A. DiNoia, Diversity of Religions: A Christian Perspective; S. J. Grenz, "Toward an Evangelical Theology of the Religions," Journal of Ecumenical Studies 31/1-2:49-65; S. M. Heim, Salvation: Truth and Difference in Religion; J. Hick, Christian Theology of Religions; Interpretation of Religion; J. Hick and P. Knitter, eds., Myth of Christian Uniqueness: Toward a Pluralistic Theology of Religions; P. F. Knitter, No Other Name: A Critical Survey of Christian Attitudes toward the World Religions; H. Netland, Dissonant Voices: Religious Pluralism and the Question of Truth; L. Newbigin, Gospel in a Pluralist Society; D. Okholm and T. Phillips, eds., Four Views on Salvation in a Pluralist World; C. Pincock, Wideness in God's Mercy: The Finality of Jesus Christ in a World of Religions; J. Sanders, No Other Name: An Investigation into the Destiny of the Unevangelized.

Christian Liberty. See LIBERTY, CHRISTIAN.

Christians, Names of. Christian. The name by which followers of Jesus Christ are now generally known among themselves and in the world achieved its preeminence only gradually. According to Acts 11:26 the name originated in Antioch. In the narrative of Acts it occurs once more (26:28) on the lips of Agrippa. 1 Peter 4:16 is the only other occurrence in the NT, again with the suggestion of use by unbelievers. From Roman writers (Tacitus, Annals xv, 44; Suetonius, Nero xvi; Pliny, Epistles X.xcvi) comes the evidence that "Christian" was in common use among the citizenry of Rome by the reign of Nero and elsewhere in the empire by the end of the first century. Ignatius, also from Antioch, is the only one of the apostolic fathers to employ the term (Magnesians 10; Romans 3; Philadelphians 6), but by the end of the second century it was well established in the church. It was too fitting not to use ("You belong to Christ," Mark 9:41).

Though a controverted point, it seems likely that the name did not originate with the Christians themselves (contra Chrysostom, Homily on John xix, 3). Certain facts converge to suggest a pagan origin: it achieved general acceptance in the church slowly; it is not employed as a self-designation in the NT; and its early use by pagans. So far as the evidence goes, the usages are uniformly set in the context of the persecution of Christians, and the Jews would hardly have dignified their enemies with a name derived from christos, the Anointed One, whom they also were expecting.

Whether or not originally intended as a jibe, as the common title for believers in the Roman world, it soon became the name for which followers of Jesus Christ were persecuted (1 Pet. 4:16; Pliny, Epistles X.xcvi). Perhaps largely as a result, in the second century "I am a Christian" became the triumphant confession of many martyrs (Martyrdom of Polycarp 10; Eusebius, History V.i, 19).

The name itself is formed after the usual Latin manner to signify the followers or adherents of a man named Christ (cf. "Herodians," Mark 3:6). This indicates that the originators of the name took Christ as a proper name and not as the designation of his office, the Anointed One. This fact invalidates the argument, though not the conclusion, of some older writers who found in the name "Christian" the doctrine that believers are united to the Lord Jesus in his anointing and thus participate in his messianic offices and functions, becoming in him, in a subordinate way, prophets, priests, and kings (P. Mastricht, Theoretico-Practica Theologia V.iii.16, 40). The pagan origin of the name need not set aside, however, the suggestion of Eusebius, among others (History I.iv, 4), that Christian is the "new name" prophesied in Isaiah 65:15.

Disciple. The characteristic name for those who gathered around Jesus during his ministry was "disciple." He was the teacher or master; they were his disciples (mathētai), a term involving too much personal attachment and commitment to be adequately rendered by "pupil." The name was carried over into Acts, where it frequently has the general sense of Christian (cf. Acts 14:21). The use of the term in Acts for those who had no acquaintance with Jesus during the days of his flesh serves as a reminder that the relationship of subsequent generations of Christians to the exalted Christ is not essentially different from that enjoyed by those who walked with him on the earth. It further indicates that the Lord's solemn sayings regarding the nature and cost of discipleship must be given their full weight in the construction of a doctrine of the Christian life (cf. Luke 6:40; 14:25–33).

However common the term may be in Acts, it disappears completely from the rest of the NT. Apparently "disciple" was no more adequate as a permanent title for Christians than "teacher" or "rabbi" was for Jesus, whose lordship was now fully revealed and understood. It had the further disadvantage that the term was common in Greek and Jewish circles (cf. in the Gospels disciples of John the Baptist, of the Pharisees, of Moses) and thus required some elaboration to be distinctively Christian (e.g., "disciples of the Lord," Acts 9:1).

The term was revived as a title for Christians in the second century, but primarily with reference to martyrdom. It thus became honorific (cf. Ignatius, Ephesians 1).

Brother. This word occurs as frequently as "disciple" in Acts as a name for Christians. The parallel use of these titles, as in Acts 18:27, indicates that as technical terms they were virtually synonymous. Unlike "disciple," however, "brother" survived as a common self-designation in the rest of the NT and in early Christian literature. As a title it is expressive of the spiritual bond between fellow believers and of the obligation to love one another (Rom. 12:10; 1 Pet. 3:8). Christians did not always live up to the name (1 Cor. 6:8).

The terminology of brotherhood has roots in the OT (Exod. 2:11 KJV; Ps. 22:22), in Jewish custom (cf. Acts 28:21), and in the teaching of Jesus (Matt. 23:8). In a few cases the term indicates the primary relationship between Christians and Christ himself (Matt. 28:10; John 20:17; Rom. 8:29; Heb. 2:11–12, 17).

Some NT occurrences of this name are illustrations of the profound reconciliation which the gospel effects between hitherto estranged men (Acts 9:17; Philem. 16). It is the supernatural character of Christian brotherhood which sets it apart from what was and is a common idea in other religions and in society generally.

So central to Christian experience was the brotherhood of believers and thus so common was this self-designation that it became well known in the pagan world and was often the object of ridicule (Tertullian, Apology xxxix). Nevertheless, even pagan commentators were forced to admit that the name did correspond to Christian conduct (e.g., Lucian, De Morte Peregrini xiii).

The term, as a general name for Christians, is found only sporadically after the third century, surviving primarily in clerical circles. It reappeared in the later Middle Ages (e.g., Brethren of the Common Life) and has been employed by some groups in the modern church.

Saint. Though rare in Acts, this is a common title in Paul and Revelation, appearing almost exclusively in the plural as a collective. It is an OT name for God's people (Ps. 34:9 qēdōšīm, LXX hagioi; Ps. 85:8 hāsīdīm, LXX hosioi) and derives from the doctrines of God's intrinsic holiness and the holiness of his people by reason of their relationship to him (Deut. 7:6; Lev. 19:1; 20:26). In the NT also the fundamental idea of sainthood is separation to God or belonging to God. Thus the "holiness" of Christians is, in the first place, objective (1 Cor. 7:14). They are saints or holy by virtue of their being people of God (Eph. 2:19–22), chosen and loved by God (Col. 3:12), called (Rom. 1:7), in Christ (1 Cor. 1:30; Phil. 1:1), and the objects of the work of the Holy Spirit (2 Thess. 2:13). The ethical dimension, subjective holiness or sainthood, is thus secondary, though no less important

Christians, Names of

(Eph. 5:3; Heb. 12:14). The name thus bound believers to their holy God, to the great acts by which he separated them to himself, and to a life corresponding to his holiness.

The name survived as a general title for Christians only through the second century. Perhaps as a result of the juxtaposition of sainthood and martyrdom in Revelation (16:6; 17:6), it gradually became an honorific title for confessors, martyrs, and ascetics.

Believer. Given the centrality of faith in the NT it is predictable that a name for Christians should emerge from this direction. This is another title which is rooted in the OT (Gen. 15:6; Isa. 7:9; Hab. 2:4). In the verbal form (e.g., Acts 5:14 πιστευοντες) the connection with the NT doctrine of faith as trust and confidence in God's mercy apprehended in Christ is clear (cf. John 20:31; Rom. 3:22). The absolute form (e.g., Acts 16:1; Eph. 1:1 πιστος) is ambiguous. It can mean either "believer" or "faithful, trustworthy." In any case, certain occurrences in the NT substantiate its technical use as a title for Christians (2 Cor. 6:15; 1 Tim. 4:10, 12).

Follower of the Way. Six times in Acts, and all in connection with Paul, the Christian faith and community are designated "the Way" (hē hodos, 9:2; 19:9, 23; 22:4; 24:14, 22), making Christians "followers of the Way" or "those who belong to the Way." Acts 24:14 suggests that this was a Christian self-designation.

The background of this title is to be found in the OT use of "way" (derek) for the behavior of men (Ps. 1:6), the will of God (Gen. 18:19; Isa. 30:21), and the saving action of God (Ps. 67:2; Isa. 40:3), in Christ's teaching about the two ways, one leading to life and the other to destruction (Matt. 7:13–14), and in his identification of himself as the way (John 14:6), the only avenue of salvation (cf. Heb. 9:8; 10:20). From the Dead Sea Scrolls we learn that the Qumran community also designated itself and its life "the Way."

Though "follower of the Way" did not survive as a title, the concept may be found in the exposition of the two ways in Didache 1–6 and Barnabas 18–21.

Friend. It is not certain whether "the friends" (hoi philoi) in Acts 27:3 and 3 John 15 are Christians in general or merely actual acquaintances. If the former, the title, like "brother," links the Christian with God and Christ (John 15:13–15; James 2:23) and with his fellows. It was apparently a popular title in Gnostic circles and was revived by certain medieval mystics (Friends of God) and later still by the Society of Friends (Quakers).

Nazarene. Coming from a Jew in Acts 24:5 this name is clearly a slur. In this the church found itself bearing its master's reproach (cf. John 1:46). According to Tertullian (Against Mar- cion iv, 8), it continued to serve Jews as a name for Christians. Later it was used by the Persians and Muslims. Similar to Nazarene is Galilean, which, though not used as a title for Christians in the NT (cf. Acts 2:7), was later used scornfully by enemies of the church such as the emperor Julian (Gregory of Nazianzus, Oratation 4). Both terms on hostile lips are suggestive of meanness of origin and culture.

Designations. In addition to these titles there is a large number of designations for Christians that never achieved the status of names by which Christians addressed one another or were addressed by unbelievers. Some of the more theologically important of these are "children of God" (Rom. 8:16; 1 John 3:1), "servant" (Acts 4:29; Rom. 1:1), "soldier" (2 Tim. 2:3), "heir" (Rom. 8:17; Gal. 3:29), and "elect" (1 Pet. 1:1).

Further, there is a set of such designations that directly identify Christians with OT Israel, among which may be mentioned "my [God's] people" (Rom. 9:25), "sons of God" (Rom. 8:19; Gal. 3:26), "children of promise" (Gal. 4:28), "children of Abraham" (Gal. 3:7), "Abraham's seed" (Gal. 3:29), "Israel" (Gal. 6:16; Heb. 8:8), and "circumcision" (Phil. 3:3).

Finally, there are descriptive phrases such as "those who call upon the name of our Lord Jesus Christ" (1 Cor. 1:2) and "those who obey God's commandments and hold to the testimony of Jesus" (Rev. 12:17).

The names for Christians taken together furnish the materials for a theology of the Christian life. In particular, they bind Christians to their Lord and Master, to one another, to the OT and the history of salvation, and to their high and holy calling. It is an unhappy observation that some of the richest of these titles fell out of use quite early and have never been restored to their original importance.

R. S. RAYBURN

Bibliography. E. J. Bickerman, "Name of Christians," HTR 42:109–24; H. J. Cadbury, Beginnings of Christianity; A. Harnack, Mission and Expansion of Christianity in the First Three Centuries; H. B. Mattingly, "Origin of the Name Christiani," JTS new series 9:26–37.

Christian Science. See CHURCH OF CHRIST, SCIENTIST.

Christian Socialism. See SOCIALISM, CHRISTIAN.

Christian Year. The Christian year includes the various seasons of the year designated by the liturgical churches. It does not begin on January 1 but on the first Sunday of Advent, which usually falls about a month before Christmas. The central feast within the seasons of the year is Easter rather than Christmas. Time is made holy within this yearly experience, and this is believed to help lead human beings toward heaven. The various feast days of the seasons help believers to remember aspects of the life of Jesus Christ and various saints who have sought to follow in the footsteps of Christ.

Vatican Council II discusses the year in its Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy. The seasons and feasts all have a liturgical aspect since each of them has the worship of God as its ultimate purpose. Vatican Council II tries to show how the feasts of the saints and of the Blessed Virgin Mary are related to the mysteries of Christ. The paschal mystery is shown forth in the life of Mary and the lives of the saints. Pius XII in his writing Mediator Dei asks Christians to concentrate ever more seriously upon the paschal mysteries in order to more clearly realize how they are redeemed by Christ. He insists that the year of the church is not a boring record of a previous time period, but rather a vibrant reliving of the paschal mysteries.

There are actually two levels in the year. One deals with the feasts of Jesus Christ, while the other deals with the feasts of Mary and the saints. The feasts of the saints grew out of the celebrations of various particular communities. As these communities corresponded among themselves, they began to copy feasts and to devise a kind of temporal sequence concerning them. Pius V decided to schematize the year more clearly in the sixteenth century. By the twentieth century there were over 250 feasts. It was feared that the feasts of the saints were overshadowing the celebration of the mysteries of Jesus Christ, so Pius X emphasized that all feasts had to be centered ultimately upon Jesus Christ. In 1960 some of the feasts of the saints were actually dropped from the year for various reasons. Vatican Council II attempted to simplify things to an even greater extent. The feasts which are still celebrated always involve remembering a particular historical happening. In reference to saints, their deaths rather than their births are celebrated. It is believed that their death has become their birth or entrance into heaven.

Many feast days are movable in the sense that they can happen on various dates within the year, but some feasts are fixed to a particular day in the year. Easter is the most notable movable feast, whereas Christmas is the most notable fixed feast day. Some fixed feast days cannot be celebrated if they occur on a Sunday because Sunday always celebrates God as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. The feasts always must draw one to reflect upon God as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit in one way or another.

The most important parts of the Christian year celebrate the historical aspects of the redeeming power of Jesus Christ in union with events in his own life. Every Sunday celebrates the paschal event of Jesus Christ. The apostles began the custom of celebrating Sunday, but many of the Jewish Christians retained Sabbath worship together with Sunday for several decades.

For some reason Fridays and Wednesdays became more important days in between Sundays. They were declared to be fasting days. Friday was usually held to be more important than Wednesday. Sometimes the fasting on these two days was related to a series of prayers which helped prepare the early Christians for Sunday celebrations. The least important weekday was Saturday.

The Easter Season. The prime feast of the Christian year is Easter. The Sunday called Septuagesima begins the preparation of the faithful for Easter. The Easter celebration in a sense does not end until the celebration of Pentecost. Easter celebrates not only the resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ but also his passion and death within the context of his resurrection. His death and resurrection must always be held together in the minds of the faithful.

Holy Week is the most important preparation for Easter. Holy Week begins with Palm Sunday. It introduces us to the life of Jesus as he advances toward his passion and death. Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday of Holy Week are not too important, but Holy Thursday celebrates in vivid form the Last Supper of our Lord Jesus Christ and his apostles. Part of the vividness involves the washing of feet in remembrance of Christ, who washed the feet of his apostles to demonstrate his humility and his desire to serve mankind. Good Friday celebrates the passion and death of Christ. No Mass is celebrated on Good Friday. Holy Communion consecrated on Holy Thursday is retained for Good Friday, when it is distributed to the faithful. The veneration of the cross is the most moving experience for many of the faithful on Good Friday because it dramatically reminds them of the death of their Lord Jesus Christ. Holy Saturday consists in quiet and reflective preparation for Easter itself.

Easter is celebrated as an octave lasting eight days. Each day deals with various aspects of the resurrected Christ. The faithful experience how the life of the resurrected Christ affects them in the order of redemption by seeing how he affected the early Christians after his resurrection and before his ascension into heaven. The entire Easter season is to be a period of joy culminating in the happiness surrounding the placing of Jesus at the right hand of God, his Father, in heaven. The season closes with Pentecost, which celebrates the coming of the Holy Spirit to the early Christians so that they might rejoice in their strength and find the inspiration to go out and convert the world to Jesus Christ.

The Christmas Season. The Christmas period is second in importance to Easter, although some of the faithful appear to place more stress upon Christmas—although the stress may not be for a spiritual reason. The Christmas season not only celebrates the birth of Christ; it also celebrates his childhood with Mary and Joseph. As part of the Christian year the Christmas season developed later than the Easter season, although the feast of Christmas itself comes from Roman times. The feast of Christmas was developed by the church to combat a pagan feast that was celebrated yearly on December 25. The Advent period deals with the coming of Christ and the preparation the faithful should make to receive him in their hearts. His incarnation celebrates not only his birth but also his messianic age, which is the beginning of the end of the world as it marches toward eternity. Advent combines some recognition of sin on the part of the faithful with the joy that Jesus, their Savior, is coming.

Christian Year

The feast of the Epiphany ends the Christmas season, but the Sundays after the Epiphany have themes which are related to it. (The Sundays after Pentecost appear to be quite separate from the Easter season.) The only real order in those Sundays is the fact that each of them is celebrating the paschal mysteries of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Feasts of the Saints. The Christian year as described above revolves around Jesus Christ. Within this Christian year on a less important level are the feasts of the saints. Many of these involve a celebration of the early martyrs. When Constantine declared Christianity to be the religion of the Roman Empire, the martyrs began to be revered for the suffering and death they experienced previous to the time of Constantine. The deaths of the martyrs were related to the death of Christ. Relics of the martyrs also became important aspects of various feasts. Charlemagne continued the celebration of the martyrs after the Roman Empire fell apart.

Martyrs still today are considered to be the most important representatives of the saints in their feast days. There are about 120 feasts of martyrs. Some of the feasts are suspect, in part in reference to the exploits of certain martyrs. The positivist approach to the historicity of some martyrs and their exploits cannot, however, take too much away from the symbolic lessons that the various feasts of martyrs can teach the faithful. A martyr must have shed his blood for Christ, which reminds the faithful symbolically of the shedding of Christ's blood for our redemption.

Confessors are not martyrs in the strict sense of having shed their blood for Christ, but it is required of a confessor that he or she should have suffered in one way or another for Christ. Ascetics and bishops on occasion were considered to be types of confessors of the faith. Ascetics led a life of partial suffering in an effort to be like the martyrs of the age of persecution.

The notion that virginity was a very holy way of living caused the faithful to revere various women. Some virgins or "holy women" who were widows were also truly martyrs. Agatha and Perpetua are revered not only for being martyrs but also for their courage when tortured for refusing to submit sexually to their tormentors.

The Roman Catholic Church also has a series of feasts celebrating various aspects of the life of the Virgin Mary. Devotion to the Blessed Virgin developed in the early church. One of the first feasts somewhat related to Mary was the Feast of the Purification, which has Jesus as its central aspect. Although the assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary did not become a dogma of the church until much later, the Feast of the Assumption was being celebrated as early as the eighth century.

The Christian year, when it is celebrated, must always ultimately seek to immerse the faithful in the experiences of the life, death, and resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ. In this way it can serve as a means of leading the faithful closer to Jesus Christ and as an encouragement to them as they seek to become more like Christ. T. J. GERMAN

See also ADVENT; ALL SAINTS DAY; ASCENSION DAY; CHRISTMAS; EASTER; GOOD FRIDAY; HALLOWEEN; HOLY SATURDAY; HOLY WEEK; LENT; MAUNDY THURSDAY; PALM SUNDAY; PENTECOST.

Bibliography. I. H. Dalmais, Introduction to the Liturgy; H. Jenny, Paschal Mystery in the Christian Year; A. Löhr, Year of Our Lord; A. A. McArthur, Evolution of the Christian Year; T. Merton, Seasons of Celebration; J. C. J. Metford, Christian Year; P. Parsch, Church's Year of Grace; O. Rousseau, Progress of the Liturgy; M. H. Shepherd, Worship of the Church.

Christmas. The day observed by Christians in commemoration of the birth of Jesus Christ. The Scriptures do not reveal the exact date of Christ's birth, and the earliest Christians had no fixed time for observing it. However, by the late fourth century Christmas was generally celebrated in the churches, although on differing dates in different locales. Various methods were used in an attempt to compute the day of Christ's birth; among dates suggested by early churchmen were January 6, April 18, April 19, May 20, and according to Hippolytus (ca. 170–ca. 236), in his Commentary on Daniel, "Our Lord was born on Wednesday, December 25, in the 42nd year (2 B.C.) of the reign of Augustus." December 25 eventually became the officially recognized date for Christmas because it coincided with the pagan festivals celebrating Saturnalia and the winter solstice. The church thereby offered the people a Christian alternative to the pagan festivities and eventually reinterpreted many of their symbols and actions in ways acceptable to Christian faith and practice. For example, Jesus Christ was presented as the Sun of Righteousness (Mal. 4:2), replacing the sun god, Sol Invictus. As Christianity spread throughout Europe, it assimilated into its observances many customs of the pagan winter festivals such as holly, mistletoe, the Christmas tree, and log fires. At the same time new Christmas customs such as the nativity crib and the singing of carols were introduced by Christians.

In every period of Christian history the observance of Christmas has been opposed by a minority of Christian leaders. Usually one or more of three factors have been involved in this opposition: (1) a rejection of ecclesiastical authority in its attempt to establish official feast days, of which Christmas is one; (2) an objection to the drinking, partying, and immorality associated in every age with Christmas festivities; (3) the long-standing and continuing associations of Christmas with pagan religious ideas and practices. Some Protestants, especially those in the Calvinistic tradition—including Calvin himself, Knox, the English and American Puritans, and many Presbyterians—refused to celebrate Christmas. However, the Lutherans, the continental Reformers, and most other Protestants defended the observance of Christmas and sought to emphasize its deeper truth expressed in the doctrine of the incarnation. By the midtwentieth century Christmas had come to be observed almost universally in some form or another by Christians throughout the world. With the expansion of Christianity into the cultures of Africa, Asia, and Latin America, many new customs and ideas were incorporated into the Christian celebration of Christmas. O. G. OLIVER JR.

See also CHRISTIAN YEAR.

Bibliography. L. W. Cowie and J. S. Gummer, Christian Calendar; O. Cullmann, "Origin of Christmas," in Early Church; A. A. McArthur, Evolution of the Christian Year; P. Schaff, History of the Christian Church; T. J. Talley, Origins of the Liturgical Year.

Christology. New Testament Christology. In the NT the writers indicate who Jesus is by describing the significance of the work he came to do and the office he came to fulfill. Amidst the varied descriptions of his work and office, always mainly in terms of the OT, there is a unified blending of one aspect with another, and a development that means an enrichment, without any cancellation of earlier tradition.

Jesus in the Gospels. His humanity is taken for granted in the Synoptic Gospels, as if it could not possibly occur to anyone to question it. We see him lying in the cradle, growing, learning, subject to hunger, anxiety, doubt, disappointment, and surprise (Mark 2:15; 14:33; 15:34; Luke 2:40; 7:9), and finally to death and burial. But elsewhere his true humanity is specifically witnessed to, as if it might be called in question (John 1:14; Gal. 4:4), or its significance neglected (Heb. 2:9; 17; 4:15; 5:7–8; 12:2).

Besides this emphasis on his true humanity, there is nevertheless always an emphasis on the fact that even in his humanity he is sinless and also utterly different from other men; his significance must not be sought by ranking him alongside the greatest or wisest or holiest of all other men. The virgin birth and the resurrection are signs that here we have something unique in the realm of humanity. Who or what he is can be discovered only by contrasting him with others, and it shines out most clearly when all others are against him. The event of his coming to suffer and triumph as man in our midst is absolutely decisive for every individual he encounters and for the destiny of the whole world (John 3:16–18; 10:27–28; 12:31; 16:11; 1 John 3:8). In his coming the kingdom of God has come (Mark 1:15). His miracles are signs that this is so (Luke 11:20). Woe, therefore, to those who misinterpret them (Mark 3:22–29). He acts and speaks with heavenly regal authority. He can challenge men to lay down their lives for his own sake (Matt. 10:39). The kingdom is indeed his own kingdom (Matt. 16:28; Luke 22:30). He is the One who, in uttering what is simply his own mind, at the same time utters the eternal and decisive word of God (Matt. 5:22, 28; 24:35). His word effects what it proclaims (Matt. 8:3; Mark 11:21) as God's word does. He has the authority and power even to forgive sins (Mark 2:1–12).

Christ. His true significance can be understood only when his relationship to the people in whose midst he was born is understood. In the events that are set in motion in his earthly career God's purpose and covenant with Israel is fulfilled. He is the One who comes to do what neither the people of the OT nor their anointed representatives—the prophets, priests, and kings—could do. But they had been promised that One would rise up in their own midst who would yet make good what all of them had utterly failed to make good. In this sense Jesus of Nazareth is the One anointed with the Spirit and power (Acts 10:38) to be the true Messiah or Christ (John 1:41; Rom. 9:5) of his people. He is the true prophet (Mark 9:7; Luke 13:33; John 1:21; 6:14), priest (John 17; Hebrews), and king (Matt. 2:2; 21:5; 27:11), as, e.g., his baptism (Matt. 3:13–17) and his use of Isaiah 61 (Luke 4:16–22) indicate. In receiving this anointing and fulfilling this messianic purpose, he receives from his contemporaries the titles Christ (Mark 8:29) and Son of David (Matt. 9:27; 12:23; 15:22; cf. Luke 1:32; Rom. 1:3; Rev. 5:5).

But he gives himself and receives also many other titles which help to illuminate the office he fulfilled and which are even more decisive in indicating who he is. A comparison of the current messianic ideas of Judaism with both the teaching of Jesus himself and the witness of the NT shows that Jesus selected certain features of messianic tradition which he emphasized and allowed to crystallize round his own person. Certain messianic titles are used by him and of him in preference to others, and are themselves reinterpreted in the use he makes of them and in the relationship he gives them to himself and to one another. This is partly the reason for his "messianic reserve" (Matt. 8:4; 16:20; John 10:24).

Christology

Son of Man. Jesus used the title "Son of Man" of himself more than any other. There are passages in the OT where the phrase means simply "man" (e.g., Ps. 8:4), and at times Jesus' use of it corresponds to this meaning (cf. Matt. 8:20). But the majority of contexts indicate that in using this title Jesus is thinking of Daniel 7:13, where the "Son of Man" is a heavenly figure, both an individual and at the same time the ideal representative of the people of God. In the Jewish apocalyptic tradition this Son of Man is regarded as a preexistent one who will come at the end of the ages as judge and as a light to the Gentiles (cf. Mark 14:62). Jesus sometimes uses this title when he emphasizes his authority and power (Mark 2:10; 2:28; Luke 12:8–10). At other times he uses it when he is emphasizing his humility and incognito (Mark 10:45; 14:21; Luke 19:10; 9:58). In the Gospel of John the title is used in contexts which emphasize his preexistence, his descent into the world in a humiliation that both conceals and manifests his glory (John 3:13–14; 6:62–63), his role of uniting heaven and earth (John 1:51), and his coming to judge men and hold the messianic banquet (John 5:27; 6:27).

Though "Son of Man" is used only by Jesus of himself, what it signified is otherwise expressed, especially in Romans 5 and 1 Corinthians 15, where Christ is described as the "man from heaven" and the "second Adam." Paul here takes up hints in the Synoptic Gospels that in the coming of Christ there is a new creation (Matt. 19:28) in which his part is to be related to and contrasted with that of Adam in the first creation (cf., e.g., Mark 1:13; Luke 3:38). Both Adam and Christ have the representative relationship to the whole of mankind that is involved in the conception "Son of Man." But Christ is regarded as one whose identification with all mankind is far more deep and complete than that of Adam. In his redeeming action salvation is provided for all mankind. By faith in him all can participate in a salvation already accomplished in him. He is also the image and glory of God (2 Cor. 4:4, 6; Col. 1:15), which man was made to reflect (1 Cor. 11:7) and which Christians are meant to put on in participating in the new creation (Col. 3:10).

Servant. Jesus' self-identification with men is brought out in passages that recall the suffering servant of Isaiah (Matt. 12:18; Mark 10:45; Luke 24:26). It is in his baptismal experience that he enters this role (cf. Isa. 42:1 and Matt. 3:17) of suffering as the one in whom all his people are represented and who is offered for the sins of the world (Isa. 53; John 1:29). Jesus is explicitly called the "servant" in the early preaching of the church (Acts 3:13, 26; 4:27, 30), and the thought of him as such was also in Paul's mind (cf. Rom. 4:25; 5:19; 2 Cor. 5:21).

In the humiliation of his self-identification with our humanity (Heb. 2:9, 17; 4:15; 5:7; 12:2) he fulfills the part not only of victim, but also of high priest, offering himself once for all (7:27; 9:12; 10:10) in a self-offering that brings about forever a new relationship between God and man. His "baptism," the fulfillment of which he accomplishes in his earthly career culminating in his cross (cf. Luke 12:50), is his self-sanctification to his eternal priesthood, and in and through this self-sanctification his people are sanctified forever (John 17:19; Heb. 10:14).

Son of God. The title "Son of God" is not used by Jesus himself to the same extent as "Son of Man" (though cf., e.g., Mark 12:6), but it is the name given to him (cf. Luke 1:35) by the heavenly voice at his baptism and transfiguration (Mark 1:11; 9:7), by Peter in his moment of illumination (Matt. 16:16), by the demons (Mark 5:7), and by the centurion (Mark 15:39).

This title "Son of God" is messianic. In the OT, Israel is the "son" (Exod. 4:22; Hos. 11:1). The king (2 Sam. 7:14; Ps. 2:7) and possibly the priests (Mal. 1:6) are also given this title. Jesus, therefore, in using and acknowledging this title is assuming the name of one in whom the true destiny of Israel is to be fulfilled.

But the title also reflects the unique filial consciousness of Jesus in the midst of such a messianic task (cf. Ps. 2:7; Matt. 11:27; Mark 13:32; 14:36). This has the profoundest christological implications. He is not simply a son but the Son (John 20:17). This consciousness, which is revealed at high points in the Synoptic Gospels, is regarded in John as forming the continuous conscious background of Jesus' life. The Son and the Father are one (John 5:19, 30; 16:32) in will (4:34; 6:38; 7:28; 8:42; 13:3) and activity (14:10) and in giving eternal life (10:30). The Son is in the Father and the Father in the Son (10:38; 14:10). The Son, like the Father, has life and quickening power in himself (5:26). The Father loves the Son (3:35; 10:17; 17:23–24) and commits all things into his hands (5:35), giving him authority to judge (5:22). The title also implies a unity of being and nature with the Father, uniqueness of origin and preexistence (John 3:16; Heb. 1:2).

Lord. Though Paul also uses the title "Son of God," he most frequently refers to Jesus as "Lord." This term did not originate with Paul. Jesus is addressed and referred to in the Gospels as Lord (Matt. 7:21; Mark 11:3; Luke 6:46). Here the title can refer primarily to his teaching authority (Luke 11:1; 12:41), but it can also have a deeper significance (Matt. 8:25; Luke 5:8).

Though it is most frequently given to him after his exaltation, he himself quoted Psalm 110:1 and prepared for this use (Mark 12:35–37).

Christ's lordship extends over the course of history and all the powers of evil (1 Cor. 2:6–8; 8:5; 15:24; Col. 2:15), and must be the ruling concern in the life of the church (1 Cor. 7:10, 25; Eph. 6:7). As Lord he will come to judge (2 Thess. 1:7).

Though his work in his humiliation is also the exercise of lordship, it was after the resurrection and ascension that the title of Lord was most spontaneously conferred on Jesus (Acts 2:32–36; Phil. 2:1–11) by the early church. They prayed to him as they would pray to God (Acts 7:59–60; 1 Cor. 1:2; cf. Rev. 3:14, 21; 22:16). His name as Lord is linked in the closest association with that of God himself (1 Cor. 1:3; 2 Cor. 1:2; cf. Rev. 17:14; 19:16; and Deut. 10:17). To him are referred the promises and attributes of the Lord (Yahweh) in the OT (cf. Acts 2:21 and 38; Rom. 10:3 and Joel 2:32; 1 Thess. 5:2 and Amos 5:18; Phil. 2:10–11 and Isa. 45:23). To him are freely applied the language and formulas which are used of God himself, so that it is difficult to decide in a passage like Romans 9:5 whether it is the Father or the Son to whom reference is made. In John 1:1, 18; 20:28; 2 Thessalonians 1:12; 1 Timothy 3:16; Titus 2:13; and 2 Peter 1:1, Jesus is confessed as "God."

Word. The statement, "The Word became flesh" (John 1:14), relates Jesus both to the Wisdom of God in the OT (which has a personal character, Prov. 8) and to the law of God (Deut. 30:11–14; Isa. 2:3) as these are revealed and declared in the going forth of the Word by which God creates, reveals himself, and fulfills his will in history (Ps. 33:6; Isa. 55:10–11; 11:4; Rev. 1:16). There is here a close relationship between word and event. In the NT it becomes clearer that the Word is not merely a message proclaimed but is Christ himself (cf. John 8:31 and 15:17; Eph. 3:17 and Col. 3:16; 1 Pet. 1:3 and 23). What Paul expresses in Colossians 1, John expresses in his prologue. In both passages (and in Heb. 1:1–14) the place of Christ as the One who in the beginning was the agent of God's creative activity is asserted. In bearing witness to these aspects of Jesus Christ it is inevitable that the NT should witness to his preexistence. He was "in the beginning" (John 1:1–3; Heb. 1:2–10). His very coming (Mark 1:24; 2:17; Luke 12:49) involves him in deep self-abasement (2 Cor. 8:9; Phil. 2:5–7) in fulfillment of a purpose ordained for him from the foundation of the world (Rev. 13:8). In the Gospel of John he gives this testimony in his own words (John 8:58; 17:5, 24).

Yet while his coming from the Father involves no diminution of his Godhead, there is nevertheless a subordination of the incarnate Son to the Father within the relationship of love and equality which subsists between the Father and the Son (John 14:28). For it is the Father who sends and the Son who is sent (10:36), the Father who gives and the Son who receives (5:26), the Father who ordains and the Son who fulfills (10:18). Christ belongs to God who is the Head (1 Cor. 3:23; 11:3) and in the end will subject all things to him (1 Cor. 15:28).

Patristic Christology. In the period immediately following the NT, the apostolic fathers (A.D. 90–140) can speak highly of Christ. We have a sermon beginning: "Brethren, we ought so to think of Jesus Christ, as of God, as the Judge of the quick and the dead" (2 Clement). Ignatius with his emphasis on both the true deity and humanity of Christ, can refer to the "blood of God." Even when their witness falls short of this, there is a real attempt to combat both Ebionitism, which looked on Christ as a man born naturally, on whom the Holy Spirit came at his baptism, and also docetism, which asserted that the humanity and sufferings of Christ were apparent rather than real.

The apologists of the next generation (e.g., Justin, ca. 100–165, and Theophilus of Antioch) sought to commend the gospel to the educated and to defend it in face of attacks by pagans and Jews. Their conception of the place of Christ was determined, however, by current philosophical ideas of the logos rather than by the historic revelation given in the gospel, and for them Christianity tends to become a new law or philosophy and Christ another God inferior to the highest God.

Melito of Sardis at this time, however, spoke clearly of Christ as both God and man, and Irenaeus, in meeting the challenge of Gnosticism, returned also to a more biblical standpoint, viewing the person of Christ always in close connection with his work of redemption and revelation, in fulfillment of which "he became what we are, in order that he might make us to become even what he is himself." He thus became the new Head of our race and recovered what had been lost in Adam, saving us through a process of "recapitulation." In thus identifying himself with us he is both true God and true man. Tertullian also made his contribution to Christology in combating Gnosticism and the various forms of what came to be known as monarchianism (dynamism, modalism, Sabellianism), which had reacted in different ways against the apparent worship of Christ as a second God beside the Father. He was the first to teach that the Father and Son are of "one substance," and spoke of three persons in the Godhead.

Origen had a decisive influence in the development of Christology in the East. He taught the eternal generation of the Son from the Father and used the term homoousios. Yet at the same time his complicated doctrine included a view of Christ as an intermediate being, spanning the distance between the utterly transcendent being of God and this created world. Both sides in the later Arian controversy, which began ca. 318, show influences which may be traced to Origen.

Christology

Arius denied the possibility of any divine emanation, or contact with the world, or of any distinction within the Godhead. Therefore the Word is made out of nothing before time. Though called God, he is not very God. Arius denied to Christ a human soul. The Council of Nicea (325) condemned Arius by insisting that the Son was not simply the "first born of all creation" but was indeed "of one essence with the Father." In his long struggle against Arianism, Athanasius sought to uphold the unity of essence of the Father and Son by basing his argument not on a philosophical doctrine of the nature of the Logos, but on the nature of the redemption accomplished by the Word in the flesh. Only God himself, taking on human flesh and dying and rising in our flesh, can effect a redemption that consists in being saved from sin and corruption and death, and in being raised to share the nature of God himself.

After Nicea the question was raised: If Jesus Christ be truly God, how can he be at the same time truly man? Apollinaris tried to safeguard the unity of the person of the God-man by denying that he had complete manhood. He assumed that man was composed of three parts: body, irrational or animal soul, and rational soul or intellect (nous). In Jesus the human nous was displaced by the divine Logos. But this denied the true reality of Christ's humanity and indeed of the incarnation itself and therefore of salvation. The most cogent objection to it was expressed by Gregory of Nazianzus: "The unassumed is the unhealed." Christ must be true man as well as true God. Apollinaris was condemned at Constantinople in 381.

How, then, can God and man be united in one person? The controversy became focused on Nestorius, bishop of Constantinople, who refused to approve the use of the phrase "mother of God" (Theotokos) as applied to Mary, who, he asserted, bore not the Godhead but "a man who was the organ of the Godhead." In spite of the fact that Nestorius clearly asserted that the God-man was one person, he seemed to think of the two natures as existing side by side and so sharply distinguished them that the suffering of the humanity could not be attributed to the Godhead. This separation was condemned, and Nestorius's deposition at the Council of Ephesus (431) was brought about largely by the influence of Cyril in reasserting a unity of the two natures in Christ's person so complete that the impassible Word can be said to have suffered death. Cyril sought to avoid Apollinarianism by asserting that the humanity of Christ was complete and entire but had no independent subsistence (anhypostasis).

A controversy arose over one of Cyril's followers, Eutyches, who asserted that in the incarnate Christ the two natures coalesced in one. This implied a docetic view of Christ's human nature and called in question his consubstantiality with us. Eutychianism and Nestorianism were finally condemned at the Council of Chalcedon (451), which taught one Christ in two natures united in one person or hypostasis, yet remaining "without confusion, without conversion, without division, without separation."

Further controversies were yet to arise before the mind of the church could be made up as to how the human nature could indeed retain its complete humanity and yet be without independent subsistence. It was Leontius of Byzantium who advanced the formula that enabled the majority to agree on an interpretation of the Chalcedonian formula. The human nature of Christ, he taught, was not an independent hypostasis (anhypostatic), but it was enhypostatic, i.e., it had its subsistence in and through the Logos.

A further controversy arose as to whether two natures meant that Christ had two wills or centers of volition. A formula was first devised to suit the monothelites, who asserted that the God-man, though in two natures, worked by one divine-human energy. But finally, in spite of the preference of Honorius, bishop of Rome, for a formula asserting "one will" in Christ, the Western church in 649 decreed that there were "two natural wills" in Christ, and this was made the decision of the whole church at the sixth ecumenical council at Constantinople in 680, the views of Pope Honorius I being condemned as heresy.

Further Development. The theologians of the Middle Ages accepted the authority of patristic Christology and allowed their thought and experience to be enriched by Augustine's stress on the real humanity of Christ in his atoning work, as our example in humility, and on mystical experience. But this emphasis on the humanity of Christ tended to be made only when he was presented in his passion as the one who mediates between man and a distant and terrible God. In their more abstract discussion of the person of Christ there was a tendency to present one who has little share in our real humanity. The humanity of Jesus, however, became the focus of mystical devotion in Bernard of Clairvaux, who stressed the union of the soul with the Bridegroom.

At the Reformation, Luther's Christology was based on Christ as true God and true man in inseparable unity. He spoke of the "wondrous exchange" by which, through the union of Christ with human nature, his righteousness becomes ours, and our sins become his. He refused to tolerate any thinking that might lead to speculation about the God-man divorced either from the historical person of Jesus himself or from the work he came to do and the office he came to fulfill in redeeming us. But Luther taught that the doctrine of the “communication of attributes” (communicatio idiomatum) meant that there was a mutual transference of qualities or attributes between the divine and human natures in Christ, and developed this to mean a mutual interpenetration of divine and human qualities or properties, verging on the very commingling of natures that Chalcedonian Christology had avoided. In Lutheran orthodoxy this led to a later controversy as to how far the manhood of the Son of God shared in and exercised such attributes of divine majesty, how far it was capable of doing so, and how far Jesus used or renounced these attributes during his human life.

Calvin also approved of the orthodox christological statements of the church councils. He taught that when the Word became incarnate he did not suspend nor alter his normal function of upholding the universe. He found the extreme statements of Lutheran Christology guilty of a tendency toward the heresy of Eutyches, and insisted that the two natures in Christ are distinct though never separate. Yet in the unity of person in Christ, one nature is so closely involved in the activities and events which concern the other that the human nature can be spoken of as if it partook of divine attributes. Salvation is accomplished not only by the divine nature working through the human but is indeed the accomplishment of the human Jesus, who worked out a perfect obedience and sanctification for all men in his own person (the humanity being not only the instrument but the “material cause” of salvation). This salvation is worked out in fulfillment of the threefold office of prophet, priest, and king.

There is here a divergence between the Lutheran and Reformed teaching. The Lutherans laid the stress upon a union of two natures in a communion in which the human nature is assumed into the divine nature. The Reformed theologians refused to think of an assumption of the human nature into the divine, but rather of an assumption of the human nature into the divine person of the Son, in whom there was a direct union between the two natures. Thus, while keeping to the patristic conception of the communicatio idiomatum, they developed the concept of the communicatio operationum (i.e., that the properties of the two natures coincide in the one person) in order to speak of an active communion between the natures without teaching a doctrine of mutual interpenetration. The importance of the communicatio operationum (which also came to be taken up by Lutherans) is that it corrects the rather static way of speaking of the hypostatic union in patristic theology, by seeing the person and the work of Christ in inseparable unity, and so asserts a dynamic communion between the divine and human natures of Christ in terms of his atoning and reconciling work. It stresses the union of two natures for his mediatorial operation in such a way that this work proceeds from the one person of the God-man by the distinctive effectiveness of both natures. In this light the hypostatic union is seen as the ontological side of the dynamic action of reconciliation, and so incarnation and atonement are essentially complementary.

Since the early nineteenth century the tendency has been to try to depart from the Chalcedonian doctrine of the two natures on the ground that this could not be related to the human Jesus portrayed in the Gospels, and that it made use of terms which were alien both to Holy Scripture and to current modes of expression. Schleiermacher built up a Christology on the basis of finding in Christ a unique and archetypal consciousness of utter filial dependence on the Father. In Lutheran Christology there was a further important development, the attributes of the humanity of Jesus being regarded as limiting those of his deity, according to the “kenotic” theory of Thomasius. According to this view, the Word, in the incarnation, deprived himself of his “external” attributes of omnipotence, omnipresence, and omniscience, yet still retained the “essential” moral attributes. Though always remaining God, he ceased to exist in the form of God. Even his self-consciousness as God was absorbed in the single awakening and growing consciousness of the God-man. Ritschl, too, stressed the importance of the ethical attributes of the person of Christ and of refusing to speculate beyond the revelation of God found in the historic Jesus, who must have for us the value of God and whose perfect moral nature is both human and divine. Early in the twentieth century modern conceptions of personality and scientific and philosophical doctrines of evolution enabled theologians to produce further variations in the development of nineteenth-century Christology.

The middle years of the twentieth century saw a return to the use of the Chalcedonian doctrine of the two natures, particularly as interpreted in the Reformed tradition, and a realization that this apparently paradoxical formula is meant to point toward the mystery of the unique relationship of grace set up here between the divine and human in the person and work of the God-man. This mystery must not be thought of apart from atonement, for it is perfected and worked out in history through the whole work of Christ crucified and risen and ascended. To share in this mystery of the new unity of God and man in Christ in some measure is also given to the church through the Spirit. This means that our Christology is decisive in determining our doctrine of the church and of the work of sacraments as used in the church. Our Christology must indeed indicate the direction in which we seek to solve all theological problems where we are dealing with the relation of a human event or reality to the grace of God in Christ. In this christological pattern the whole of our theological system should find its coherence and unity.

Christology

Nor must this mystery be thought of in abstraction from the person of Jesus shown to us in the Gospels in the historical context of the life of Israel. The human life and teaching of the historical Jesus have to be given full place in his saving work as essential and not incidental or merely instrumental in his atoning reconciliation. Here we must give due weight to modern biblical study in helping us to realize both what kind of a man Jesus was and yet also to see this Jesus of history as the Christ of faith, the Lord, the Son of God. Through the study of his office and work we come to understand how his humanity is not only truly individual but is also truly representative.

Modern theological discussion continues to be a witness to the centrality of Jesus Christ himself in matters of faith and is dominated by the two closely related questions: "Who is Jesus Christ?" and "What has he done for the world?" The context in which these questions are raised has, however, changed. In the nineteenth century many of the radical restatements of christological belief were often felt to imply a rejection of orthodox faith and were argued for as such. It is often claimed today, however, that restatements of this type, if they arise from a sincere response to Jesus, deserve to be regarded as valid modern interpretations of the same truth to which the older statements bore witness in their day. Those who formulated the earlier creeds, it is held, were expressing in their statements simply their own contemporary experience of being redeemed by Jesus. Their statements need not be interpreted literally in order to be confessed truly, even if their language continues to be occasionally used.

It is held, moreover, that modern man with his secular and scientific outlook cannot possibly be asked seriously to think of the universe as providing the background necessary to give credibility to talk of a preexistent Son of God descending into our midst from heaven and finally ascending. The early church, when it affirmed such things of Jesus, was simply using the pictures given by current religious myths of the time in order to give expression to the new liberty and self-understanding given to them as they found themselves addressed by God as Jesus, especially in the proclamation of his cross. Some church theologians believe that what the early witnesses meant by their statements can today be adequately reexpressed without recourse even to talk of an incarnation. Discontent continues to be expressed, exactly as it was in last century, over words like "essence," "substance," and "nature." It is claimed that these are now mere dictionary terms of no current use in making meaningful statements.

In the midst of such desire to express the meaning of Christ in new ways, Jesus is often spoken of simply as an agent through whose mediation and example we are enabled to find authentic self-expression and new being, and enter into a meaningful experience of reality and the world. Doubt is raised about our need for his continuing work and ministry. Even when we are directed to his person, it is as if to one who is symbolic of something else, and who points entirely beyond himself. We seem at times to be confronted by an Arianism content to affirm that the Son is simply "of like substance" with the Father, at times with a docetism for which the reality of the human nature is of little importance.

Much recent NT study has, however, been undertaken in the belief that the Gospels do provide us with sufficient historical detail about Jesus to give us a reliable picture of the kind of man he actually was. The importance of regaining such a genuine understanding of his humanity as a basis for our Christology has been stressed. Wolfhart Pannenberg has criticized Karl Barth and others who have followed him for beginning their christological thought from the standpoint of God himself: i.e., by first assuming the Trinity and the incarnation, and then arguing downward, viewing the humanity of Jesus against this transcendent background. Pannenberg himself believes that such initial presupposition of the divinity of Jesus will involve us inevitably in a Christology marked by disjunction and paradox, and will pose insoluble problems in relation to the unity of his person. Moreover, it will obscure our understanding of his true humanity.

Pannenberg seeks to form a "Christology from below," moving upward from Jesus' life and death toward his transformation in his resurrection and exaltation through the grace of God. Pannenberg believes that there are legendary elements in the Gospel history (e.g., the virgin birth). He stresses the need to interpret Jesus and his death from the standpoint of our own experience of history as well as from the standpoint of the OT. Karl Rahner, on the Roman Catholic side, also pursues a Christology beginning with the humanity of Jesus and based on anthropology.

We have to question whether the NT accounts of Jesus allow us to make such a one-sided approach and to follow such a method. Consistently Jesus is presented in the Gospels as one who is both truly man and truly God. The first witnesses did not try to present him to us in a manhood existing apart from the mystery of his unique union with God. It does not seem possible, therefore, that we ourselves should have access to the reality to which they are pointing unless we try to grasp him in the strange interpenetration of these two aspects that seems to mark their accounts of him. That the "Word became flesh" seems to imply that we cannot have the flesh apart from the Word nor the Word apart from the flesh.

What the Gospel writers intended to give us in their witness must therefore determine both our own approach and the method we adopt in our investigation. Hans Frei has more recently produced a study in Christology in which he attempts to face the problems of our approach to the Gospel narratives. He insists that Jesus Christ is known to the Christian believer in a manner that includes personal knowledge but also at the same time surpasses it mysteriously. Moreover, "we can no longer think of God except as we think of Jesus at the same time nor of Jesus except in reference to God." Frei also insists that while we can think of other people rightly without them being present, we cannot properly think of Jesus as not being present. We cannot indeed know his identity without being in his presence.

Recent developments: The abiding question which dominates recent christological study remains the one which Jesus asked, "Who do people say that I am?" In the modern mix of Christologies the formula of Chalcedon is often discounted, as well as the New Testament witness itself, to the person of Jesus Christ. Is there any continuity between the Christ presented in the gospels/epistles with the Jesus of history? This is the question which occupied the first two "quests for the historical Jesus" and which again surfaces in the current trends which many summarize as the "third quest." The "first quest" began with the assumption that there was a radical difference between the Jesus of history and the Christ of faith who was the invention of the church. The effective end of the "first quest" came with the publication of Albert Schweitzer's Quest of the Historical Jesus. Schweitzer argued that the Jesus of history which was portrayed in the "lives of Jesus" was nothing more than a figure designed by rationalism. The true Jesus was a strange apocalyptic figure who "comes to us as one unknown." After Schweitzer, christological reflection left off the "quest for the historical Jesus" and even discounted historical concerns as significant for Christology. Rudolf Bultmann loudly proclaimed from Marburg that history was not relevant for Christology. All that needed to be known was that Jesus existed. What is important is the proclamation of the church, the kerygma, behind which one cannot go to find the historical Jesus. In reaction to Bultmann the "new quest" began when Ernst Käsemann gave his monumental lecture in 1953 entitled "The Problem of the Historical Jesus." In this essay he argued that though the Gospels presented interpretations of Jesus (kerygma) they also preserved authentic historical narrative. In contrast to the "first quest" this "new quest" assumed that there was much more common ground between the Jesus of history and Christ of faith.

The "new quest" came to an end in the late 1960s and early 1970s and only recently has a "third quest" begun. This renewed quest is an amalgamation of perspectives with regard to the question of faith and history and in their quest scholars come to the table with a wide variety of critical and historical tools. Generally speaking, the desire is to locate Jesus within his social context. The "Jesus Seminar" has been a player in this quest with their novel method of voting to identify the authentic sayings of Jesus and their inclusion of the Gospel of Thomas as a source for Christology. The images of Jesus which have emerged from those involved in the "third quest" include Jesus as the Cynic sage, Jesus as the eschatological prophet who awaits the restoration of Israel, Jesus the charismatic teacher, Jesus the prophet for social change or for pacific love for one's enemy, Jesus the exorcist, and Jesus as the Sophia (Wisdom) of God. There has also been a resurgence of kenotic Christology. While many of those involved in the "third quest" find evidence in the NT for the historical Jesus, not a few modern Christologies begin rather with the social location of the modern reader. These "contextual Christologies" start with human experience and not Scripture or Chalcedon. In his article entitled "Jesus Christ with an Asian Face," Peter C. Phan states, "the Asian reality as described above, and not Bible and/or tradition, is the starting point." Among the Christologies which are emerging are those which understand Christ from a feminist perspective ("Christa" or "Sophia"), a Latin perspective, an Afro-American perspective, a middle-class North American perspective, and even from the Buddhist perspective ("Jesus the Bodhisattva"). Among those participating in the multifaceted "third quest" are a number of evangelical theologians who are attempting their own new appraisal of Jesus, such as N. T. Wright. Wright reaffirms that Jesus is the Messiah and as such was the fulfillment of Israel's messianic hopes. Scripture continues to be the source of evangelical Christologies as Millard Erickson shows in his "contemporary incarnational Christology" and as Murray Harris demonstrates in his case for NT understanding of Jesus as God.

R. S. WALLACE AND G. L. GREEN

See also JESUS CHRIST; LOGOS; MESSIAH; WORD, WORD OF GOD, WORD OF THE LORD.

Bibliography. D. M. Baillie, God Was in Christ; K. Barth, Church Dogmatics; E. Brunner, Mediator; O. Cullmann, Christology of the New Testament; J. A. Dorner, History of the Development of the Doctrine of the Person of Christ; J. D. G. Dunn, Christology in the Making; M. Erickson, Word Became Flesh: A Contemporary Incarnational Theology; M. Fonyas, Person of Jesus Christ in the Decisions of the Ecumenical Councils;

Christology

H. W. Frei, Identity of Jesus Christ; M. Harris, Jesus as God: The New Testament Use of Theos in Reference to Jesus; H. R. Mackintosh, Person of Christ; R. A. Norris, Christological Controversy; W. Pannenberg, Jesus—God and Man; H. Relton, Study in Christology; E. Schillebeeckx, Christ; Jesus; Jesus and Christ; L. B. Smedes, Incarnation; Trends in Modern Anglican Thought; B. Witherington III, Christology of Jesus; Jesus Quest: The Third Search for the Jew of Nazareth; N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God.

Chrysostom, John (ca. 347–407). One of the Doctors of the Greek Church. Born at Antioch, Syria, and raised by his widowed Christian mother, he excelled in rhetorical and legal studies under the famous teacher Libanius. Unsatisfied as a lawyer, John abandoned his career to devote himself to Christian asceticism. He was baptized by bishop Meletius and instructed in Christianity by Diodorus, teacher of the Antiochene School and later bishop of Tarsus. For some years John lived as a monk at home while caring for his mother and assisting Meletius in worship services as a reader. About 373, after his mother's death, he left Antioch to take up a more rigorous monasticism in the mountains. This gave him the opportunity to complete the memorization of both the Old and New Testaments, but the severity of the discipline ruined his health and forced him to adopt a less strenuous lifestyle in the city. He was ordained deacon in 381. The new bishop, Flavius, made him elder in 386 and assigned him the task of preaching. In this role his rhetorical skills amplified by his scholarship and piety earned him a reputation as a biblical expositor second to none. Later generations have affirmed his greatness on the basis of his published sermons, treatises, and letters. Sixth-century churchmen began regularly referring to him as "Chrysostomos" (golden mouthed).

In 398 John became patriarch of Constantinople. He labored to correct the laxness of the clergy and the corrupt life of the city. He was particularly plain spoken about the indulgent lifestyle of the wealthy women of the city, including the emperor's wife, Eudoxia. Powerful enemies, including Eudoxia, several bishops, and even the Patriarch Theophilus of Alexandria, conspired more than once to depose John. In 404, after defying an imperial order, Chrysostom was exiled to the eastern frontier. Three years later he was ordered to march to a more remote location and died on the way from exposure and exhaustion.

John's theology was expressed primarily in his sermons and was neither systematic, precise, nor original. His sermons drew spiritual and moral applications from a literal and grammatical exegesis of the Scriptures, most effectively from the Pauline Epistles, Matthew, and John. He played no active part in any major controversy, but he was the most popular and unquestionably orthodox of the Antiochene fathers. H. K. GALLATIN

See also ANTIOCHENE THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. D. Attwater, St. John Chrysostom, Pastor and Preacher; P. C. Bauer, John Chrysostom and His Time; D. Burger, Complete Bibliography of Scholarship on the Life and Works of St. John Chrysostom; J. N. D. Kelly, Golden Mouth: The Story of John Chrysostom, Ascetic, Preacher, Bishop; S. C. Neill, Chrysostom and His Message; J. Pelikan, Preaching of Chrysostom; P. Schaff, "Life and Work of St. John Chrysostom," NPNF 9:3–23; R. V. Sellers, Two Ancient Christologies; W. R. W. Stephens, Saint Chrysostom: His Life and Times; B. Vanderberghe, John the Golden Mouth.

Church. Our word "church," like its cognate forms, kirche, kerk, kirk, comes from the Greek adjective, to kuriakon, used first of the house of the Lord, then of his people. The NT word, ekklesiā, is used of a public assemblage summoned by a herald (Acts 19:32, 39, 40); in the LXX, however, it means the assembly or congregation of the Israelites, especially when gathered before the Lord for religious purposes. Accordingly, it is used in the NT for the congregation which the living God assembles about his Messiah Jesus. Thus the church is the spiritual family of God, the Christian fellowship created by the Holy Spirit through the testimony to the mighty acts of God in Christ Jesus. Wherever the Holy Spirit unites worshipping souls to Christ and to each other there is the mystery of the church.

The Definition of the Church. More fully stated, the one church of God is not an institutional but a supernatural entity which is in process of growth towards the world to come. It is the sphere of the action of the risen and ascended Lord. All its members are in Christ and are knit together by a supernatural kinship. All their gifts and activities continue the work of Christ by the power of the Holy Spirit, originate from Christ, and are co-ordinated by him to the final goal. Then the church will appear in the age to come as the one people of God united in one congregation before the throne, as the one celestial city—the new Jerusalem.

The Marks of the Church. The Lord brings and keeps his people in covenant fellowship with himself by his Spirit and his Word (Isa. 59:21). His voice is heard in the proclamation of his Word and his acts are seen in the administration of his sacraments. Accordingly, these with prayer and praise are the marks of the visible church, the means the Holy Spirit uses to bring individuals to personal faith and to nourish believers in the corporate worship of the Christian community. As they receive God's promises, he forgives the sins of his people and seals them with his sacraments for the world to come.

The Biblical History of the Church. The existence of the church is a revelation of the gracious heart of God. The Father chose his eternal Son to become the Savior of sinners, the Messiah of the whole Israel of God. In him God chose the people for his own possession and called individuals into this fellowship. This one people of God includes the patriarchs, the congregation of ancient Israel, Jesus and his disciples, the primitive community of his resurrection, and the Christian church.

For the people of God, the OT period was the dispensation of promise, the NT that of fulfillment. Jesus Christ revealed not a new God, but a new way of worshiping the same God. In the OT it is "the whole assembly of the congregation of Israel" (Deut. 31:30) who hear the law (Deut. 4:10; 9:10; 18:16; Acts 7:38), who sacrifice the passover lamb (Exod. 12), whom God redeems from Egypt (Exod. 15:13, 16; Ps. 74:2; 77:15; Acts 20:28), with whom God makes the covenant at Sinai (Exod. 33–35), for whose sins expiatory sacrifices are provided (Lev. 4 and 16), who are a holy nation to praise God (Exod. 19:6; Ps. 22:22; Hos. 2:23; cf. Heb. 2:12; 1 Pet. 2:9–10). Other NT passages also recognize a unity with the OT people of God (Matt. 8:11; Rom. 11:16–28; 1 Cor. 10:1–4). The messianic expectation of the OT includes the formation of a faithful new Israel. In Christ the God of the OT speaks so that the NT church is the fulfillment of the OT congregation.

The several steps in the formation of the new Israel of God include the calling of the disciples to gather as sheep about their shepherd, the confession of Peter, the Last Supper, the cross and the resurrection, Pentecost and the sending out of the apostles as eyewitnesses of the resurrection. Jesus bound the disciples not to the Torah of the rabbis nor to the ideas of a Socrates, but to himself. To this fellowship gathered around God's saving self-revelation in the Messiah, Jesus gave the kerygma, the Lord's prayer, the sacraments with common praise following the Last Supper, and distinct code with special teachings on such matters as divorce, authoritative teachers, a common purse and treasurer.

God's dealings with men are marked first by a narrowing of the channel that the stream of revelation may be deepened and then thereafter that the blessing may become world-wide. Thus he dealt first with the human race, then with the nation of Israel, later with the remnant thereof, further with the few pious families from which John, Jesus, and the first disciples came. When the Good Shepherd was taken, all the disciples forsook him and fled so that the Israel of God was one person, the Savior who died on Calvary for the sins of the world. But God raised up from the dead our Lord Jesus Christ and sent that Great Shepherd of the sheep to gather again the flock. At the appointed mountain over five hundred met him at one time, three thousand were converted at Pentecost, and the Lord continued to add together daily those who were being saved.

On the basis of the OT and the gospel preparation, Christ poured forth the Holy Spirit at Pentecost to constitute the assembled fellowship the church of God. The Spirit anointed, christened, sealed every member of the gathering. From the exalted Christ, he came to be the life and guide of the church until the return of her Lord. In bringing the gospel to the Gentile world, God established a new missionary center, Antioch, called a new voice, the Apostle Paul, and approved a new name for his people, Christian.

The Nature of the Church. The Apostle Paul speaks of the whole and of each local group as "the church" even as he uses this term for a household of believers as well as for larger gatherings. Thus it is not the addition of churches which makes the whole church, nor is the whole church divided into separate congregations. But wherever the church meets she exists as a whole, she is the church in that place. The particular congregation represents the universal church, and, through participation in the redemption of Christ, mystically comprehends the whole of which it is the local manifestation.

The terms "the church of God," "the churches in Christ" reach their full expression in "the churches of God . . . in Christ Jesus," (1 Thess. 2:14). This phraseology indicates that the significant features of the church are her relationship to God and to Jesus Christ.

As to the former, the church is a fact established by God. It is his supernatural act. According to the consentient testimony of the Old and of the New Testaments, this is not a man-made myth but a God-given fact. The same God who spoke the word of promise to ancient Israel speaks the word of fulfillment to the Christian congregation. As the Father reveals the Son, the Messiah builds his church (Matt. 11:25–30; 16:17–18). At Pentecost the three miracles manifest the direct action of God establishing his church. The NT speaks of the church as God's building, his planting, his vineyard, his temple, his household, his olive tree, his city, and his people. It describes her ministers as the gifts of God (1 Cor. 12:28), of the ascended Christ (Eph. 4:11), or of the Holy Spirit (Acts 20:28). Paul recognized the priority of the Jerusalem church not because of the personal importance of the individuals who composed it, but because this fellowship of men and women was the assembly of God in Christ. That is, he recognized the fact of God's action and did not treat it as a matter of human speculation which was at his disposal.

As the church is a fact established by God, so is she the place where God acts for our salvation. Here the risen Lord encounters men, changes them from rebels against their Maker into children of their heavenly Father, brings them from enmity into peace. It pleases God by the foolishness of the kerygma to save those who believe (1 Cor. 1:21). The gospel is the power of God who saves us and called us to faith (Rom. 1:16; 15:16 f.; 2 Tim. 1:8). As we observe the outward functioning of the Word and the sacraments with the bodily senses, it is not less important that we contemplate the activity of God in the church with the ear and the eye of faith. Preaching becomes more effective as it calls men more often to behold God working for them than when it scolds men for not working better for God. "God, the Creator of heaven and earth, speaks with thee through His preachers, baptizes, catechises, absolves thee through the ministry of His own sacraments" (Luther). As the sacrament is administered, Christ is not less busy giving himself and his blessings to the believer than the minister is in distributing the bread and the cup to the communicants. The Reformers speak of the Sabbath as the day in which we are to rest from our labors that God may work in us. As God generates believers by the preaching of the Word of Christ, and nourishes them by the sacraments of his grace, faith beholds the face of the Lord in the form of the church of the living God.

Church

God's acts in the church are in Christ Jesus. An adequate recognition of Jesus as the Messiah and of the mighty acts of God in him establishes the integral relation of the church to her Lord. The King-Messiah and the people of God belong together. As the shepherd implies the flock, as the hen gathers her chickens under her wings, as the vine has many branches, the body its several members, as the foundation supports its building, as the Servant justifies many, as the Son of Man stands for the saints of the Most High, as the King implies the kingdom, so the Messiah has his twelve and the Lord his church. Jesus spoke of "my church" and of "my flock," and these two are linked together in Acts 20:28. The several lines of parallel thoughts support the infrequent use by Jesus of the word church (Matt. 16:18; 18:17). Following his exaltation, by the one Holy Spirit we are all baptized into the one body of Christ and each is given a special function in his body. Christ is the church herself in that she is the body of Christ, and yet Christ is distinct from the church in that while she is the body he is her Head, and at the same time her Lord, her Judge, her Bridegroom. Her life, her holiness and her unity are in him.

The heavenly church is the bride awaiting Christ her Bridegroom (Mark 2:19, 20; Rom. 7:1-6; 2 Cor. 11:2; and especially Ephesians and Rev. 19-21). Christ loved the church and gave himself up for her. Having cleansed the church by the washing of water with the Word, he is now sanctifying her in order that he may present her spotless for the marriage feast of the Lamb. Thus, within the heart of Christ's bride there should ever be a great longing for the hour when all the shadows shall flee before the flaming of his advent feet.

The Ministry of the Church. The one essential ministry of the church is, therefore, the ministry of her Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. Hebrews and Revelation reveal the Lamb in the midst of the throne, the High Priest ever interceding at the heavenly altar of prayer as the focus of Christian worship. By his heavenly ministration all of God's people have access to the throne of grace. In the NT church there is no chancel separating the clergy from the laity. All of the flock are God's heritage (clergy), a royal priesthood, a people (laity) for God's own possession (1 Pet. 2:9; 5:2-3).

As under-shepherds, Christ appointed first of all the apostles who had companied with him through his ministry and who were eyewitnesses of his resurrection. By the apostolic kerygma, God brought those who had not seen Jesus into a like precious faith with the apostles. As they directly represent Christ and speak with the authority he has conferred, so there is no way to him which detours around the apostolic witness to Christ. They preached Christ Jesus as Lord and themselves servants for Christ's sake (2 Cor. 4:5). While the church belongs to Christ, the apostles belong to the church, not the church to them (1 Cor. 3:22). Lest any one would think they baptized in their own name, it was their custom to have baptism performed by their associates (Acts 10:47; 1 Cor. 1:13-17).

Following the apostles were the prophets who brought words from God for the practical problems of life and were responsible to the church. Then there were evangelists gifted in presenting the gospel to win men to Christ and teachers to instruct them in Christian living. In the local congregations there was a plurality of officers: elders to oversee the work and conduct of the church, and deacons to distribute to the necessities of saints. In this latter service, ministering women ably assisted.

The Mission of the Church. Our Lord Jesus Christ is the sun about which the whole mission of the church revolves. Public worship is the encounter of the risen Redeemer with his people; evangelism is calling men to the Savior; publishing the law of God is proclaiming his lordship; Christian nurture is feeding his lambs and disciplining his flock; ministering to the needs of men is continuing the work of the Great Physician.

In the whole work and witness of the church, Jesus Christ is to be recognized as Lord, the only King in Zion. Her business is to obey his will, to proclaim not her own but his reign. For God has established him upon that throne of which David's was a type (Isa. 9:6-7; Luke 1:26-35; Acts

2:25–36). He has been enthroned with all authority that he may give repentance and remission of sins (Matt. 28:18; Acts 5:31). Thanks to his intercession, his people have access to the throne of grace for mercy and help in every time of need. Every mercy received from Christ, every comfort of the Spirit, every assurance of the Father's love is a testimony to the praise of the glory of God's grace. And the church is this witness, the concrete evidence of the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, the love of God and the communion of the Holy Spirit. R. G. CLOUSE

See also CHRISTIAN YEAR; CHURCH, AUTHORITY IN THE; CHURCH AND STATE; CHURCH DISCIPLINE; CHURCH GOVERNMENT; CHURCH GROWTH MOVEMENT; CHURCH OFFICERS.

Bibliography. G. Anlin, Universal Church in God's Design; D. D. Bannerman, Scripture Doctrine of the Church; G. C. Berkouwer, Church; E. Brunner, Christian Doctrine of the Church, Faith, and the Consummation; L. Coenen, NIDNT 1:291–307; A. Cole, Body of Christ; O. Cullmann, Early Church; A. Dulles, Models of the Church; R. N. Flew, Jesus and His Church; F. J. A. Hort, Christian Ecclesia; E. G. Jay, Church; G. Johnston, Doctrine of the Church in the New Testament; H. Küng, Church; P. Minear, Images of the Church in the New Testament; L. Newbigin, Household of God; A. Nygren, Christ and His Church; R. L. Sancy, Church in God's Program; A. Schlatter, Church in the New Testament Period; K. L. Schmidt, TDNT 3:50–536; H. Schwarz, Christian Church; E. Schweizer, Church as the Body of Christ; T. F. Torrance, Royal Priesthood; D. Watson, I Believe in the Church.

Church, Authority in the. This subject is made difficult not only by the rich diversity of the NT witness but also by the diverse trajectories of ecclesiastical traditions from postapostolic times on.

The Locus of Authority. Arguably, the strongest authoritative human voices in the earliest churches were the apostles (in the narrow sense of that flexible term, i.e., the Twelve [Matthias replacing Judas] plus Paul). Their authority extended beyond the local congregation, even beyond congregations they had been instrumental in founding (for how else could Peter's influence be felt in Corinth and Paul's in Colossae?), but it was not without limit. A Peter could prove inconsistent in practice (Gal. 2:11–14), and a Paul could be mistaken in judgment (Acts 15:37–40; cf. 2 Tim. 4:11). The objective truth of the gospel, Paul insists, enjoys an antecedent authority; if even an apostle tampers with that, he is to be reckoned anathema (Gal. 1:8–9). So an authoritative gospel must be passed on. That Paul in an early epistle can speak of the old covenant as being read (2 Cor. 3:14) not only presupposes that Christians enjoy a new covenant but anticipates a reading of the new covenant (and therefore a NT canon) with scriptural authority analogous to that of the OT (2 Pet. 3:15–16). In such cases, however, whether the penman be an apostle or not, the authority rests in the resulting inspired Scriptures, not the human being who inscripturates them (2 Tim. 3:16).

Analogous things could be affirmed of OT prophets. Indeed, it can be argued rather compellingly that the true NT analogue to the OT prophet is not the NT prophet but the NT apostle (in the narrow sense). The apostles enjoy a self-conscious authority as God-chosen custodians of the gospel; and if they prefer to exercise their authority with meekness in an effort to win spiritually minded consensus (e.g., 1 Cor. 5:1–10; 2 Cor. 10:6; 1 Pet. 5:1–4), they are also prepared, if need be, to impose their authority without seeking consensus, and even against the consensus (e.g., Acts 5:1–11; 1 Cor. 4:18–21; 2 Cor. 10:11; 13:2–3; 3 John 10). Their authority is especially prominent in their role as interpreters both of the OT Scriptures and of the teachings of Jesus, as well as of his ministry, death, resurrection, and ascension. The church devoted itself to the apostles' teaching (Acts 2:42).

NT prophets likewise enjoyed wide authority. Some of them may have been itinerant, not restricting their ministrations to one congregation. "Prophecy" in the NT ranges from Spirit-empowered preaching to direct propositional messages from God; but the degree or kind of inspiration and the corresponding authority status of the prophet are limited. It is virtually impossible to conceive of 1 Corinthians 14:29 being applied to OT prophets (once their credentials were accepted) or to NT apostles.

Those who seem consistently to enjoy the greatest authority at the level of the local congregation are the elders, almost certainly the same as those also labeled bishops (or overseers) and pastors (Acts 20:17–28; cf. Eph. 4:11; 1 Tim. 3:1–7; Titus 1:5, 7; 1 Pet. 5:1–2). The first term stems from the synagogue and from village organization; the second reflects genuine oversight and authority; and the third betrays an agrarian background ("pastor" derives from a Latin root meaning "shepherd"). In a typical list of qualifications for this office/function (e.g., 1 Tim. 3:1–7) we discover that almost every entry is mandated elsewhere of all believers. What is distinctive about the elder reduces to two things: (1) He must not be a recent convert. Clearly this is a relative term, largely dictated by how recently the church in question came into being, since Paul appointed elders mere months after their conversion in some instances (e.g., Acts 14:23). (2) He must be able to teach, which presupposes a growing grasp of the gospel and of the Scriptures and an ability to communicate them well. The other qualifications mentioned (e.g., an overseer must be given to hospitality, etc.) suggest that he must excel in the graces and deportment expected of all believers. He who would lead the church must himself be a good reflection of it, not a mere professional.

Church, Authority in the

In general, the sphere of responsibility and authority for these bishops-elders-pastors is the local church; there is little compelling evidence for the view that a bishop, for instance, unlike elders, exerted authority over several congregations. A plurality of elders, if not mandated, appears to have been common, and perhaps the norm. On the other hand, only “church” (ekklēsia in the singular) is used for the congregation of all believers in one city, never “churches”; one reads of churches in Galatia, but of the church in Antioch or Jerusalem or Ephesus. Thus it is possible, though not certain, that a single elder may have exercised authority in relation to one house group—a house group that in some cases constituted part of the citywide church—so that the individual elder would nevertheless be one of many in that citywide “church” taken as a whole.

The apparent anomalies to this limitation on the sphere of elders can be credibly explained. The writer of 2 John and 3 John labels himself an “elder,” even though he is seeking to influence the affairs of other churches; but most likely this particular elder is writing with apostolic prerogatives. The same is true of Peter when he refers to himself as an elder (1 Pet. 5:1). The position of James in Acts 15 is peculiar, but the evidence is being stretched when interpreters conclude that James chaired the proceedings. The case is laid before the apostles and elders (v. 4); “the apostles and elders, with the whole church” (v. 22) make the final decisions; and the apostles and elders write the letter (v. 23). Peter speaks as an apostle, James as an elder; it is not obvious that either “chaired” the meeting. But even if James did so, the crucial decisions were taken by the apostles, elders, and the church in concert.

Deacons may trace the origin of their office/function to the appointment of the seven (Acts 6), but this is uncertain. When lists of qualifications are presented elsewhere (e.g., 1 Tim. 3:8–13), stress is laid (as in the case of elders) on features which signify spiritual maturity; but in this instance teaching is not required. Deacons were responsible to serve the church in a variety of subsidiary roles, but enjoyed no church-recognized teaching authority akin to that of elders.

Patterns of Authority. The more difficult question is how these two offices/functions—that is, elders/pastors/overseers and deacons—relate their authority to the authority of the local church or to some broader grouping of churches. Historically one of three avenues has been followed, with many variations.

Congregationalism tends to place the ultimate choices in the hands of the entire congregation. In part this stance is a reaction against the interposition of a priestly class between God and man; the priesthood of all believers (1 Pet. 2:9) is central. Churches decide alongside the apostles and elders (Acts 15:22); churches are responsible to protect themselves against false teachers (Galatians; 2 Cor. 10–13; 2 John); churches become the final court of appeal (Matt. 18:17); and even when the apostle Paul wants some discipline to be exercised, he appeals to the entire local church in solemn assembly (1 Cor. 5:4).

Episcopacy labels its chief ministers bishops and lesser ones presbyters (or priests) and deacons. Some within this camp see the function of the bishops as heir to the apostles; others point to the intermediate roles of Timothy and Titus as portrayed in the Pastoral Epistles—men who had power themselves to appoint elders (Titus 1:5), as had the apostles in the churches they founded (Acts 14:23). Certainly the threefold ministry was defended as early as Ignatius (ca. A.D. 110), without, apparently, a traumatic debate reflecting change.

Presbyterianism points out that presbyters in the NT occupy the most important place after the apostles; and in any location the plurality of presbyters (or elders) seems to argue for a committee or college of presbyters who exercised general oversight over the congregation in the area (1 Thess. 5:12–13; Heb. 13:17).

As most frequently practiced, all three of these prevailing patterns raise questions. Presbyterianism has raised an inference from Scripture to the status of principle. Episcopacy makes disjunctions between bishop and elder that cannot be defended from the NT, and therefore appeals to Timothy and Titus as paradigms are futile, not least because their functions are best explained on other lines (and in any case they are not called “bishops” over against some lesser clergy status). Congregationalism tends to read principles of democratic majority vote into NT churches. Ironically, some forms of congregationalism elevate the pastor, once he has been voted in, to near papal authority, in practice if not in theory.

The problem may lie in the fact that we have too often envisaged church authority flowing in straight lines, whether up or down, instead of recognizing the somewhat more fluid reality of the NT. The normal responsibility for and authority of leadership in the NT rests with the bishops-elders-pastors; but if they are interested in pursuing biblical patterns of leadership, they will be concerned to demonstrate observable growth not only in their grasp of truth but also in their lived discipline (1 Tim. 4:14–16). They will comprehend that spiritual leadership, far from lording it over others (Matt. 20:25–28), is a balanced combination of oversight (1 Tim. 4:11–13; 6:17–19; Titus 3:9–11) and example (1 Tim. 4:12; 6:6–11, 17–18; 1 Pet. 5:1–4), which, far from being antithetical, are mutually reinforcing. By the same token such leaders prefer not to dictate terms but to lead the church into spiritually minded consensus. Whereas Christians are encouraged to support and submit to spiritual leadership (e.g., Heb. 13:17), such encouragement must not be considered a blank check; churches are responsible for and have the authority to discipline false teachers and must recognize an antecedent commitment not to a pastor but to the truth of the gospel. Modern models are not so much wrong as frequently lopsided, favoring a prejudicial selection of the NT data. Similarly, the Ignatian defense of a threefold ministry was not so much a rebellious aberration as an attempt to ground the rising monarchical episcopate in Scripture in order to use it to ward off traveling preachers who were frequently found spreading Gnostic heresy.

Spheres of Authority. The spheres in which ecclesiastical authority (however such authority is to be manifested) operates are primarily three. First, the early Christian churches exercised discipline, which ranged all the way from private and thoughtful admonition (e.g., Gal. 6:1) to excommunication (a severe social pressure when the entire church was cooperating) and even the handing over of a person to Satan (e.g., 1 Cor. 5:5; cf. Matt. 16:19; 18:18). Calvin was not wrong to identify church discipline as the third distinguishing mark of the NT church. Second, they enjoyed responsibility for and authority over a substantial range of questions affecting internal order—e.g., arrangement for collection of monies for relief of the poor (2 Cor. 8–9) or the administration of the Lord’s Supper (1 Cor. 11:20–26). Third, churches had some responsibility and authority in the selection of deacons and elders and delegates (e.g., Acts 6:3–6; 15:22; 1 Cor. 16:3).

In no case were decisions established by mere majority approval; nor were these spheres of authority the exclusive prerogatives of the entire congregation. Apostles appointed elders, and Timothy had hands laid on him both by the apostle Paul and by the presbytery (1 Tim. 4:14; 2 Tim. 1:6). This need not mean such appointment was made without close consultation with the church; but if the authority granted Titus is significant (Titus 1:5), it appears that oversight, especially in the case of fledgling churches, was exercised first by the apostles and then by their appointees.

In sum, there is dynamic tension among the constituent parts of the church as far as the authority of each is concerned. Two boundaries, to say the least, are fixed: (1) the church is not at liberty to ignore or countermand or contravene the authority of the gospel itself, now at last in-scripturated, without sooner or later calling into question its own status as church; (2) the church of the NT does not expect its authority to be administered directly to the surrounding world, but to be felt through the transformed and redemptive lives of its members. D. A. CARSON

See also CHURCH; CHURCH DISCIPLINE; CHURCH GOVERNMENT; CHURCH OFFICERS.

Bibliography. W. Bauer, Orthodoxy and Heresy in Earliest Christianity; G. Bertram, TDNT 5:596–625; J. Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion; R. W. Dale, Manual of Congregational Principles; E. J. Forrester and G. W. Bromiley, ISBE (rev.) 1:696–98; J. Gray, “Nature and Function of Adult Christian Education in the Church,” SJT 19: 457–63; W. Grudem, Gift of Prophecy in 1 Corinthians; E. Hatch, Organization of the Early Christian Churches; C. Hodge, Discussions in Church Polity; F. J. A. Hort, Christian Ecclesia; K. E. Kirk, ed., Apostolic Ministry; T. A. Lacey, Authority in the Church; J. B. Lightfoot, “Christian Ministry,” Commentary on Philippians; T. W. Manson, Church’s Ministry; B. H. Streeter, Primitive Church; H. B. Swete, ed., Essays on the Early History of the Church and Ministry; H. von Campenhausen, Ecclesiastical Authority and Spiritual Power in the Church of the First Three Centuries; R. R. Williams, Authority in the Apostolic Age.

Church and State. The phrase refers to an ancient differentiation between two kinds of institutions that have structured and defined the lives of human beings. In this arrangement one of these authority structures—the state—has been primarily concerned with temporal life as an end in itself, while the other—the church—has been concerned with temporal life as a means to spiritual ends. Moreover, “church and state” designates a certain kind of tension implicit in any society that contains these two institutions, even in those in which there is no attempt to separate them.

The issue of the most desirable relationship between church and state is older than the Christian faith and has been a persistent theme in its history. Jesus clearly taught the principle of separating the two realms. His dictum to “give to Caesar what is Caesar’s, and to God what is God’s” (Matt. 22:21) marked the beginning of a new epoch in the history of relations between religion and the state. For the first time, a formal distinction was made between the obligations owed to both.

Jesus did not indicate where the exact line of demarcation lay; consequently, since at least the fourth century Christian theologians and other scholars have argued over where it should be drawn. The resulting discussions stretching over the centuries since that time constitute an almost impenetrable historical-theological swamp. The debate continues in the Christian world today and is especially intense in highly pluralistic societies like the United States.

Historical Background. Christian thinkers made no attempt to formulate a theory of church-state relations until Christianity became a state religion in the fourth century. Before that time, even though they had no legal right to exist, believers generally followed Paul's admonition to "submit . . . to the governing authorities" (Rom. 13:1) except when that subjection conflicted with explicitly understood commands of God or the preaching of the gospel (Acts 5:29). Moreover, the duty of obedience to civil rulers was always qualified by the condition that these authorities were doing their work of restraining evil and seeking peace and safety (cf. Rom. 13:1–7 and Rev. 13).

Church and State

Widespread persecution of the early Christians was frequent, beginning at least as early as the reign of Nero in the middle of the century. The final effort to eradicate Christians from the Roman world took place under Diocletian in 303. It failed, and with the Edict of Milan in 313 Christianity became an officially recognized religion in the Roman Empire. By the end of the century the Roman rulers had decreed that Christianity was the sole official religion of the empire.

This new arrangement created a need for closer definition of the relationships between church and state, but such theory developed only gradually. For one thing, it was during this period that the church became an institution in the modern sense. For another, the Emperor Constantine I, in keeping with previous custom, regarded himself as the religious leader of the realm (pontifex maximus) and assumed the right to intervene in church affairs. Later rulers gave up this title but continued to consider themselves responsible for directing church activities.

The removal of the capital from Rome to Constantinople (Byzantium) in 330, among other factors, led to a different conception of church-state relations in the East than that in the West. In the Eastern Roman Empire (later the Byzantine Empire) and consequently in Eastern Orthodoxy the prevailing theory and practice came to be caesaropapism—that is, supreme authority over the church exercised by the secular ruler, even in doctrinal matters. In the West, the church had more freedom from direct control by the civil authorities.

Partly because of the ineffective political leadership in the Western Empire and partly because of the inherent authority accorded the church in Rome, the Roman bishops had to take responsibility for judicial affairs, military defense, and other secular matters. It was in this context that Bishop Gelasius I initially stated the doctrine of the two swords in 494: "There are two powers by which this world is chiefly ruled; the sacred authority of the popes and the royal power. Of these the priestly power is much more important because it has to render account for the kings of men themselves at the divine tribunal. . . . You know that it behooves you, in matters concerning the reception and reverent administration of the sacraments, to be obedient to the ecclesiastical authority rather than to control it."

During the Middle Ages (ca. 500–1500) the theory of the two spheres, the spiritual and the temporal, was generally accepted, but the question of supremacy remained undefined. To be sure, the state was universally considered a Christian institution in this period, obligated to nourish, protect, and further the faith. Church law held that the state was obligated to punish heretics, and this obligation was accepted by the state. But there was also endless debate among theologians and canon lawyers over the real meaning of Gelasius's two swords theory. The text of his statement was analyzed and the etymological significance studied in order to deduce the implications of spiritual supremacy for temporal affairs. Eventually the concept of a single society with two aspects, each with its own responsibilities, was worked out. However, it was a slow and painful process.

During the early Middle Ages the church struggled to free itself from intrusion by secular rulers. For example, after the sixth century, emancipated from direct control from Byzantium, the popes increased in prestige and power, in both the spiritual and temporal realms. But an important event in church-state relations took place in 800 when Pope Leo III crowned Charlemagne as emperor. Charlemagne had tried to revive the empire in the West and held views close to caesaropapism. He would have liked to limit the role of the pope to purely spiritual affairs, but he had no competent heirs to continue his policies. For their part, later popes used the precedent of Charlemagne's coronation to show that emperors received their crowns from the papacy. On the other hand, later emperors claimed the right to approve those elected to papal office. Thus, by the eleventh century the elements of a major confrontation between pope and emperor, church and state, were present.

When Pope Gregory VII, an advocate of reform, challenged the right of Emperor Henry IV to appoint the archbishop of Milan, the investiture controversy ensued. In 1075 Gregory issued a decree forbidding lay investiture and asserted that popes had the power to depose emperors. After considerable maneuvering by both parties—including Gregory's dramatic but temporary triumph at Canossa in 1077—a compromise was worked out by the Concordat of Worms in 1122. Bishops in the empire were to be chosen according to canon law but invested with their insignia by an ecclesiastical officer. The practice was copied elsewhere and tensions eased somewhat.

However, the issues of the right of the popes to depose kings and the role of the secular rulers in selecting appointees to high church offices were worked out only gradually over the decades, the papacy eventually becoming dominant. This trend culminated in the reign of Pope Innocent III (1198–1216), the most powerful pontiff in Christian history. Under Innocent, and for about a century thereafter, it was clear that royal power was subordinate to pontifical authority. The thirteenth century was the zenith of papal power in terms of church-state relations. However, the aspirations of kings to consolidate their national strength and the discrediting of the papacy during the period of the Babylonian Captivity of the Church (1309–77) and the Great Papal Schism (1378–1417) which followed led to the curtailment of papal influence and prestige. These factors and the growth of the Renaissance papacy in the fifteenth century further weakened the papal office and helped set the stage for the coming of the Protestant Reformation.

The Reformation and Its Aftermath. The Protestant Reformers challenged the authority of the church in general and the papacy in particular, in both the spiritual and political realms. This further diminished the ability of the church to control and/or intervene in political affairs. Moreover, in place of the late medieval theory of ultimate pontifical authority in church-state matters, the Reformers posited a variety of different approaches. Martin Luther sharply distinguished the temporal from the spiritual but considered many ecclesiastical functions, such as administration, as nonessentials. Therefore, most of the Lutheran states developed an Erastian territorial system in which the princes supervised church affairs. John Calvin tried to make a clear distinction between the spheres of church and state, believing that it was the duty of the latter to maintain peace, protect the church, and follow biblical guidelines in civil affairs. In general, Geneva and the Reformed churches of Europe attempted to follow his views and avoid civil domination. The Church of England adopted an Erastian position by substituting the king for the pope as the head of the church and by designating king and Parliament to regulate ecclesiastical government, worship, and discipline.

However, the Anabaptists and other Radical Reformers insisted that the correct biblical emphasis was to separate completely the spheres of church and state. Their position seemed so anarchical at the time that they were severely persecuted by all other parties, Protestant and Catholic alike. In turn, the Anabaptists passed on their views on church and state to related movements in seventeenth-century England—Baptists, Quakers, and Independents.

More than any other religious group in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, those of Baptist views—John Smyth, Thomas Helwys, Leonard Busher, John Murton, John Bunyan, John Clarke, Roger Williams, Isaac Backus, and John Leland, among others—championed the concept that the logical corollary to the doctrine of religious liberty was the principle of the separation of church and state. On the basis of such Scriptures as Matthew 22, Romans 13, and James 4:12 they argued that this was the only way to safeguard religious freedom and the priesthood of the believer. By this they meant that the state had no right to interfere with the religious beliefs and practices of individuals or congregations, and that the church for its part had no claim upon the state for financial support. To receive public money was to invite government control and the loss of religious identity.

Also in the eighteenth century, Enlightenment natural rights theorists such as John Locke and Hugo Grotius popularized the view that civil government was rooted in a social contract rather than in God's appointment. Armed with this concept the emerging national states tended to make the church subservient to the common good of society and came to expect institutional religion to steer clear of political issues. However, the development of this concept in Europe and the remainder of the world was uneven, and attempts at state control of the church recurred. Only in the newly created United States of America did the government clearly agree to a new system that sought to guarantee religious freedom through separation of church and state.

The American Experiment. Conditions in the American colonies prior to 1776 were not favorable to the establishment of a single church. To be sure, during most of the period many of the individual colonies had an established church—Congregationalism in New England and the Church of England in most other places. However, there was no state church in Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, or Delaware, while in many other places large numbers of Baptists and Quakers opposed those that existed. Numerous dissenters and the need to attract settlers regardless of religious persuasion made it difficult to enforce establishment. By the time of the revolution, when the new states wrote their constitutions, most of them had disestablished their churches. Gradually all would abandon the concept. Vestiges of an establishment lingered in Massachusetts until 1833.

The U.S. Constitution forbade religious tests for public office and its First Amendment provided that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." A new experiment in church-state relations had been inaugurated with the strong backing of Baptists, Mennonites, Quakers, and most Methodists and Presbyterians—all of whom were Bible-believing Christians who wanted to protect the freedom of the churches and individual consciences from the state—and the support of the founding fathers—most of whom were rationalist deists who wanted to protect the state from clerical domination. Moreover, there was the practical matter of the prevailing denominational pluralism in the new nation that made it impossible to agree upon which church to establish.

Church and State

Although the original intentions of the founding fathers and their supporters are now debated, it appears that Thomas Jefferson and his party and the vast majority of evangelical Protestants, the dominant religious group of the early national period, assumed that there was a “wall of separation” between the two institutions which should be maintained at all costs, for the good of the republic and the health of true religion. They considered that government best which governed least, regarded religion as primarily a private affair between an individual and God, and saw no reason for conflict between politics and religion. Although they wanted a strict separation of the institutions of church and state, they did not try to segregate religion from national life. General references to the majority religion were acceptable in what was then a largely homogeneous nation. This common view dominated church-state relations in America throughout the nineteenth century.

However, there was also a minority view, expressed by John Adams and others, that the main concern of the First Amendment was to keep the federal government from interfering with religious matters so that each state could handle such questions. Some eventually extended this to a claim that the goal was to make the United States a Christian nation, but neutral in respect to particular denominations.

As America became more religiously and culturally heterogeneous in the twentieth century, the dominant nineteenth century view of a rather rigorous separation of church and state was increasingly challenged. Many now argue that there was actually no unanimity among those who voted for the First Amendment and that it is impossible to determine their original intent. This has resulted in a sharp division in interpretation, with some arguing for a veritable “Berlin Wall” of separation that would clearly secularize society by excluding anything religious from national life and others arguing for a more porous wall that would allow for the flow of a virile civil religion into the stream of national affairs.

Historically speaking, this new period of church-state relations began in the 1920s when the old Protestant establishment committed cultural suicide in the internecine fundamentalist-modernist controversy. Theologically speaking, it dates from the wave of theological liberalism that engulfed Protestantism in the first quarter of the twentieth century, thus diminishing the ability of American society to resist the encroachments of secular humanism and to assimilate the great waves of new immigrants that swept into America in this period. Legally and politically speaking, it stems from 1940, when a landmark decision by the Supreme Court (Cantwell et al. vs. State of Conn.) resulted in a dramatic shift in church-state cases from state to federal jurisdiction. Since that time the court has dealt with a number of critical religious issues related in some way to the First Amendment: laws governing business on Sundays, taxation of church property, religion and prayers in the public schools, public support for parochial education, church lobbying, conscientious objection, abortion, pornography and censorship, and resistance to war taxes. Currently in the offering are other questions concerning church and state, such as the status of military chaplains and legislation to limit the activities of so-called cults.

In the period since 1940 several principles have been established by the Supreme Court in dealing with church-state matters. For example, it invoked the “child benefit theory” (i.e., the state may override the decisions of the church for the benefit of a child) in 1947 (Everson vs. Bd. of Ed., N.J.). In 1971 (Earle vs. DiCenso and Lemon vs. Kurtzman) it established the principle of “evidence of excessive entanglement” of church and state. Nevertheless, it has been difficult for the Supreme Court to decide what is and is not equivalent to “an establishment of religion” in twentieth century America and to determine where the freedom of an individual or group conflicts with the freedom of others or with obligations to the larger good of the community. Moreover, the competing forces of diverse religious and ethnic groups along with a lack of a clear national consensus on moral values have made it difficult to reach decisions on church and state acceptable to a clear majority of Americans.

Theologians, historians, and other scholars have not contributed a great deal to the discussion of church-state issues since World War II. The monumental work of Anson Phelps Stokes and Leo Pfeffer is an exception and provides the beginning point for any analysis of current church-state relations in America. James E. Wood Jr. and the Journal of Church and State have also provided vigorous leadership in this area, and such organizations as Americans United for Separation of Church and State remain in the forefront of such discussion and analysis. But even AUSCS, long an advocate of the “wall of separation,” appears to be less “united” on the issues than it once was. Finally, there is considerable evidence that the increasing number of adherents of authoritarian religious cults and denominations and the presence of the new religious right in America will have a profound role in altering the meaning of “separation of church and state” in the years to come—probably in the direction of more government involvement in religion.

Conclusions. Islam, Hinduism, and most of the other major religions of the world have not produced a doctrine of separation of church and state comparable to that championed by evangelical Protestants and Enlightenment rationalists and eventually implemented in the United States. For example, in many Muslim countries there is no separation of church and state in the Western sense. In others there is formal separation of the institutions but a close link between them in terms of favored treatment and anticonversion laws.

On the other hand, the validity of the principle of church-state separation has been increasingly recognized all over the world in the twentieth century. Nearly every European country has disestablished former state churches, and in some nations, such as France, a radical separation has been effected. Even in most Marxist states church and state are constitutionally separated, not in order to ensure religious freedom but in order to make certain that religious groups stay out of government affairs and to keep them under supervision.

In one sense the concept of separation of church and state has come almost universally to have normative value. Most secular governments prefer to have some kind of line of demarcation between the sacred and the profane, at least in terms of institutional expression. On the other hand, the principle has not yet been definitively articulated, not even in its American homeland. Moreover, there are emerging movements—such as Islamic republicanism in Iran—which renounce any attempt to separate the institutions. In America growing numbers of people appear to have abandoned the more traditional emphasis on a “wall of separation” in favor of some kind of bland civil religion that will allow for more open-ended cooperation between the two institutions. It remains to be seen if people today can distinguish between the impossibility of separating religion from politics, on the one hand, and the desirability of keeping church and state on their respective sides of the religious-political wall, on the other.

R. D. LINDER

See also CHURCH; CIVIL RELIGION; GOVERNMENT.

Bibliography. R. H. Bainton, Travail of Religious Liberty; J. C. Bennett, Christians and the State; H. B. Clark II, ed., Freedom of Religion in America; P. R. Coleman-Norton, Roman State and Christian Church; O. Cullmann, State in the New Testament; R. F. Drinan, Religion, the Courts, and Public Policy; W. R. Estep Jr., Anabaptist Story; W. C. Fletcher, Soviet Believers; J. L. Garrett Jr., Our Heritage of Religious Freedom; E. Helmreich, ed., Church and State in Europe; A. G. Huegli, ed., Church and State God; F. H. Littell, From State Church to Pluralism; M. J. Malbin, Religion and Politics; A. J. Menendez, Church-State Relations: An Annotated Bibliography; K. F. Morrison, Two Kingdoms; L. Pfeffer, Church, State and Freedom, God, Caesar and the Consti- tution; E. A. Smith, ed., Church-State Relations in Ecumenical Perspective; F. J. Sorauf, Wall of Separation; A. P. Stokes and L. Pfeffer, Church and State in the United States; B. Tierney, Crisis of Church and State, 1050–1300; J. F. Wilson, ed., Church and State in American History; J. E. Wood Jr., Problem of Nationalism in Church-State Relationships.

Church Councils. See COUNCILS, CHURCH.

Church Discipline. As an ecclesiastical function discipline is mandated by the Great Commission’s “Go and make disciples” (Matt. 28:19–20). A disciple is one who voluntarily places himself under the discipline of a master—meaning for the Christian believer learning to “do all that I have commanded you” and meaning for the church the schooling of would-be disciples in doing the Lord’s revealed will. The universal form of discipline, then (though not always so perceived), is the preaching of the Word of God—confessed in Protestantism as one of the keys to the kingdom of Heaven (Matt. 16:19; 18:18).

Because the believer is formed as disciple by what comes out in behavior as obedient response to what goes in as Word (Matt. 15:11), and because a saving faith is evidenced by the fruit of good works (James 2:17), the church’s disciplining includes active supervision of each member’s conduct. The Head of the body requires such “guardianship” at the hands of church leaders (Acts 20:28) by whatever title designated; and the believer is required to pay heed to their admonition (Heb. 13:17). In this stricter sense disciplinary supervision of members’ faith and life is confessed in the church as a second key to the kingdom.

Procedures for the administration of ecclesiastical discipline—from loving admonition (Gal. 6:1) to excommunication (1 Cor. 5:13)—are commonly prescribed by denominational polities. They will usually move, as required, from private, personal counsel by representatives of the congregation’s ruling body, through meeting with that body, through announcement to the congregation (usually at first anonymously) with request for urgent supplication, to public naming of the discipline, culminating in eventual excommunication—assuming that there has been stubborn refusal to acknowledge sin and pursue amendment (Matt. 18:15–17 sets the pattern). Throughout these steps the recalcitrant member is usually placed under “silent censure,” i.e., advised not to partake of the Lord’s Supper (1 Cor. 11:27–32)—a separation confirmed, if unrepented, by excommunication.

The disciplinary process seeks the restoration of the wandering member to the body. Heaven rejoices with local congregation when the erring one repents (Luke 15:7).

Church Discipline

The ultimate disciplinary act of excommunication aims at both (1) etching out the awesome issue involved, leading still to restoration of the severed member; and (2) maintaining the integrity of the church—for the body not only risks spreading rebellion when instances of it are ignored (1 Cor. 5:7) but is blemished before the world by sins winked at (Jude 5–13). Moreover, God himself is blasphemed by the Christian's unrepented misbehavior (Rom. 2:23–24). Discipline due but ignored is not love but sentimentality, love's counterfeit.

Creating disciples through discipline is both the burden of “the law and the prophets” (Matt. 5:17–20) and the thrust of the NT.

For Protestantism the church universal takes on visibility in the local congregation. It is there that the keys are exercised and discipline is thus administered. In a time when the universal church is dispersed into churches, the administration of discipline seems to be complicated by the probability that the disciplinee will flee to—and be welcomed by—another congregation. This likelihood, combined with the rage for “church growth,” tends to give discipline a flabby and indecisive character. But the local congregational leadership does well to remember that the Lord requires of their hands an accounting of each member (Ezek. 3:20–21; Acts 20:26–27). What the disciplined member does becomes his responsibility; what the leaders fail to do is inexcusably theirs.

L. R. DEKOSTER

Bibliography. J. Bannerman, Church of Christ; J. Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion; L. DeKoster and G. Berghoef, Elders' Handbook; H. Heppel, Reformed Dogmatics.

Church Government. Basically there are three types of church government—the episcopal, the presbyterian, and the congregational—each of which takes on features from the others. Episcopalianism, for example, finds a large place for presbyters in its synods and elsewhere, and its congregations have many functions of their own. The congregations of Presbyterian churches also play a large part, while the appearance of moderators attests a movement toward episcopal supervision. The very existence of such groupings as Congregational and Baptist Unions with their presidents shows that churches with a basically congregational polity are yet alive to the value of other elements in the Christian tradition. Yet the general categories do apply.

Episcopacy. In this system the chief ministers of the church are bishops. Other ministers are presbyters (or priests) and deacons. All these are mentioned in the NT, although there bishops and presbyters seem to be identical. Those who see an episcopal system in the NT point to the function of the apostles, which some think was passed on to bishops whom the apostles ordained. They see as important the position of James of Jerusalem, which is not unlike that of the later bishop. The functions of Timothy and Titus as revealed in the Pastoral Epistles show these men to have been something of a transition between the apostles and the bishops of later times. The apostles are said to have practiced ordination by the laying on of hands (Acts 6:6; 1 Tim. 4:14), and they appointed elders in the churches they founded (Acts 14:23), presumably with the laying on of hands. On this view the apostles were the supreme ministers in the early church, and they took care that suitable men were ordained to the ministry. To some of them they entrusted the power to ordain and so provided for the continuance of the ministry in succeeding generations.

It is further alleged that the organization of the church subsequent to NT days supports this view. In the time of Ignatius the threefold ministry was clearly in existence in Asia Minor. By the end of the second century it is attested for Gaul and Africa by the writings of Irenaeus and Tertullian. Nowhere is there evidence of a violent struggle such as would be natural if a divinely ordained congregationalism or presbyterianism were overthrown. The same threefold ministry is seen as universal throughout the early church as soon as there is sufficient evidence to show us the nature of the ministry. The conclusion is drawn that episcopacy is the primitive and rightful form of church government.

But there are objections. There is no evidence that bishops differed from presbyters in NT days. It is going too far to say that all the ministry of these times was of apostolic origin. There were churches not of apostolic foundation, like that in Colossae, which do not seem to have lacked a ministry. Again, some of the early church orders, including the Didache, are congregational in outlook. The case is far from proven.

Nevertheless, episcopacy is undoubtedly early and practically universal. In time divisions appeared, notably the great schism in 1054 when the Orthodox Church in the East separated from the Roman Catholic Church in the West. Both continue to be episcopal and hold to the doctrine of apostolic succession. But there are differences. The Orthodox Church is a federation of self-governing churches, each with its own patriarch. The Roman Catholic church is more centralized, and its bishops are appointed by the pope. There are doctrinal differences, such as different views of the filioque clause in the Nicene Creed.

At the Reformation there were further separations. The Church of England rejected Roman supremacy but retained the historic episcopate. Some of the Lutheran churches opted for an episcopal system but did not remain in the historic succession. In more recent times other churches have decided to have bishops—e.g., some Methodist churches—and these too have rejected the historic succession. There have been other divisions, such as the separation of the Old Catholics when the dogma of papal infallibility was proclaimed. More Christians accept episcopacy than any other form of church government, but episcopal churches are for the most part not in communion with one another.

Presbyterianism. This system emphasizes the importance of elders, or presbyters. Its adherents do not usually hold that this polity is the only one in the NT. At the Reformation the Presbyterian leaders thought that they were restoring the original form of church government, but this would not be vigorously defended by many Presbyterians today. It is recognized that there has been much development, but it is held that this took place under the guidance of the Holy Spirit and that in any case the essentials of the presbyterian system are scriptural. It is beyond question that in the NT presbyters occupy an important place. They are identical with the bishops and form the principal local ministry. In each place there appears to have been a group of presbyters who formed a kind of college or committee which was in charge of local church affairs. That is the natural conclusion to which exhortations like Hebrews 13:17 and 1 Thessalonians 5:12–13 point. From the account of the council at Jerusalem in Acts 15 we see that the presbyters occupied an important place at the very highest levels of the early church. In the subapostolic age the bishop's authority developed at the expense of that of the presbyters. This was due to such circumstances as the need for a strong leader in times of persecution and in the controversies against heretics, and perhaps also to the prestige attached to the minister who regularly conducted the service of Holy Communion.

There is much that is convincing in this case. But we must also bear in mind the considerations urged by upholders of the other ways of viewing church government. What is beyond doubt is that from the Reformation onward the presbyterian form of church government has been of very great importance. John Calvin organized the four churches in Geneva on the basis of his understanding of the NT ministry as fourfold: the pastor, the doctor (or teacher), the deacon, and the presbyter (or elder). It was the pastor who had the care of the congregation. This was not the full presbyterian system, but it laid the foundation for it, and presbyterianism developed in Switzerland, Germany, France, the Netherlands, and elsewhere. On the continent the name "Reformed" is used for these churches.

Another important development in Geneva took place in a congregation of exiles from Queen Mary's England. They met under their elected pastors, John Knox and Christopher Goodman, and developed along presbyterian lines. After the accession of Elizabeth, Knox returned to Scotland, and his work led in time to the full emergence of the Presbyterian Church in that country, from where it spread to northern Ireland. England for a number of reasons did not accept presbyterianism as wholeheartedly as did Scotland, but a presbyterian church emerged there also. From this church Welsh presbyterianism took its origin. From Europe, more particularly from Britain, the church spread to America, where it became one of the most significant groups of Christians. In the great missionary movement of modern times missionaries carried the presbyterian form of the church far and wide, and national presbyterian churches were formed in many parts of the world.

Presbyterian churches are independent of one another, but they have in common that they accept such standards as the Belgic Confession, the Heidelberg Catechism, or the Westminster Confession, and that they practice a presbyterial form of church government. The local congregation elects its "session," which governs its affairs. It is led by the minister, the "teaching elder," who is chosen and called by the congregation. He is, however, ordained by the presbytery, which consists of the teaching and ruling elders from a group of congregations over which it exercises jurisdiction. Above it is a General Assembly. In all courts parity between teaching and ruling elders is important. There has been a tendency for smaller bodies of presbyterians to appear among those who are dissatisfied with the laxity (as they see it) in the way some of the larger churches hold to classic presbyterianism.

Congregationalism. As the name implies, this puts the emphasis on the place of the congregation. Perhaps it would not be unfair to say that the chief scriptural buttresses of this position are the facts that Christ is the head of his church (Col. 1:18, etc.) and that there is a priesthood of all believers (1 Pet. 2:9). It is fundamental to NT teaching that Christ has not left his church. He is the living Lord among his people. Where but two or three are gathered in his name, he is in the midst. Nor is it any less fundamental that the way into the very holiest of all presences is open to the humblest believer (Heb. 10:19–20). Other religions of the first century required the interposition of a priestly caste if anyone wished to approach God, but the Christians would have none of this. Christ's priestly work has done away with the necessity for any earthly priest as the mediator of access to God. Added to this is the emphasis on the local congregation in the NT. There, it is maintained, we see autonomous congregations, not subject to episcopal or presbyterial control. The apostles, it is true, exercise a certain authority, but it is the authority of founders of churches and of the Lord's own apostles. After their death there was no divinely instituted apostolate to take their place. Instead the local congregations were still self-governing, as we see from local church orders like the Didache. Appeal is also made to the democratic principle. The NT makes it clear that Christians are all one in Christ and there is no room for any absolute human authority.

Church Government

Congregationalism as a system appeared after the Reformation. Some among the Reformed decisively rejected the idea of a state church and saw believers as forming a "gathered church," those who have heard the call of Christ and have responded. An Englishman, Robert Browne, published in Holland a famous treatise, "Reformation without Tarrying for Any" (1582), in which he affirmed the principle of the gathered church, its independence of bishops and magistrates, and its right to ordain its ministers. Denied the freedom to put all this into practice in England, many who held these views crossed into Holland. It was from the church at Leiden that the Pilgrim Fathers sailed for America in 1620 and established congregationalism in the new world, where it became very important.

Congregationalism is much wider than the church that bears the name. Baptists, for example, usually have congregational polity. They see the local congregation as independent and not subject to any outside authority. So is it with several other denominations. In addition there are Christians who from time to time set up their own congregations with no links with anyone. Congregationalists generally oppose creedal tests. This leads to an admirable toleration. But it also opens up the way to a distortion of NT Christianity, and some congregationalists have passed over into unitarianism. Nevertheless congregationalism remains a widely held form of Christianity, and it undeniably points to important NT values.

Conclusion. A consideration of all the evidence leaves us with the conclusion that it is impossible to read back any of our modern systems into the apostolic age. If we are determined to shut our eyes to all that conflicts with our own system we may find it there, but scarcely otherwise. It is better to recognize that in the NT church there were elements that were capable of being developed into the episcopal, presbyterian, and congregational systems and which in point of fact have so developed. But while there is no reason that any modern Christian should not hold fast to his particular church polity and rejoice in the values it secures to him, that does not give him license to unchurch others whose reading of the evidence is different. L. L. MORRIS

See also CHURCH, AUTHORITY IN THE; CHURCH OFFICERS.

Bibliography. R. W. Dale, Manual of Congregational Principles; E. Hatch, Organization of the Early Christian Churches; C. Hodge, Church and its Polity; K. E. Kirk, ed., Apostolic Ministry; J. B. Lightfoot, "Christian Ministry," in Commentary on Philippians; T. W. Manson, Church's Ministry; J. Moffatt, Presbyterian Church; J. N. Ogilvie, Presbyterian Churches of Christendom; B. H. Streeter, Primitive Church; H. B. Swete, ed., Essays on the Early History of the Church and Ministry; W. Telfer, Office of a Bishop.

Church Growth Movement. God's church has grown enormously since its inception nearly two thousand years ago. The Church Growth movement as a whole has dedicated itself to understanding why and how this growth has taken place so as to facilitate the continuing growth of the church until the Lord returns.

Background. The Church Growth movement has as its practical and theoretical foundations both Anglo-American and German missiological roots. The Anglo-American concept of the "three-self church" of Henry Venn (1796–1873) and Rufus Anderson (1796–1880) has been especially prominent in Church Growth theory. The "three-self" formula proposed that national churches be self-supporting, self-governing, and self-propagating. Venn further proposed the "euthanasia of mission" through development of indigenous leadership and the limitation of size in Christian companies (small groups). John L. Nevius (1829–93) incorporated the three-self concept in what is known as the "Nevius method," a six-point plan for developing strong national churches, which was implemented in Korea in 1894. The Nevius method was seen as significant by the Church Growth movement because (1) it was built on the idea of developing an indigenous church and (2) it worked. Finally, Roland Allen's (1868–1947) focus on the mission of the church as communicating Christ, propagating the faith, and multiplying churches (seen in Spontaneous Expansion of the Church and Missionary Methods: St. Paul's or Ours?) permeates the modern Church Growth movement.

The German mission theorists contributed the ideas of reaching "peoples," indigenization, and Christianization of a people. Those who helped to lay the foundation for the modern Church Growth movement include Gustav Warneck, Ludwig Nommensen, and Bruno Guttmann. Warneck (1834–1910) is generally regarded as the founder of the Protestant science of missions. He built his work on a combination of Scripture and experience, relying on the latter to the extent that at times he used it as the basis for validating his scriptural exposition (a trend still found in the modern Church Growth movement). Warneck considered that the task of mission is both the extension of the kingdom of God (e.g., Christianization) and the founding of the church. He emphasized that in founding a church it was best not to focus on individual invitations to join.

Though this might be a first stage, the aim was the development of churches of people groups, which would result in the Christianization of whole peoples. Nommensen (1834–1918) worked among the Bataks in Sumatra. Facing the prospect of encroaching Islam, he focused his efforts on building a “people’s church” that could survive persecution. To do this, he worked in the framework of mass movements and also developed church leadership structures that were interwoven into the existing indigenous social order. Guttman (1876–1966) spent thirty-six years among the Chagga people of Tanzania. He theorized that there God had created three primeval forms of human organization (clan, neighborhood, and age-group) and that they were being destroyed by traditional missionary methods, which separated man from his culture by their focus on individual conversion. He proposed that missions strategy work within a culture to revive the remnants of these God-given social structures. The result was a theoretical foundation for the concept of mass conversion and a mission methodology of perfecting existing social structures (Christianizing). It should be noted that German mission theorists since World War II have strongly rejected the “people’s churches” approach.

Origin. It is generally acknowledged that the founder of the modern Church Growth movement is Donald Anderson McGavran (1897–1989). McGavran, himself born of missionary parents, worked as a Disciples of Christ educational missionary in India from 1923 to 1954. While on the field, he was unsettled at seeing that the total results of decades of dedicated missionary work was only twenty to thirty small, stagnant churches. He started to wonder what caused churches to grow, and his interest was further aroused by his survey research work with J. Waskom Pickett and the publication of Pickett’s 1933 study Mass Movements in India. Pickett’s research resulted in three concepts that were incorporated by Church Growth: (1) more people came to Christ when mass conversion was allowed than by individual conversion, (2) the quality of mass movement Christians was equal to the post-baptismal care given them, and (3) the popular belief that the process of forming people into churches must necessarily be long and difficult was not correct. Spurred on by the results of Pickett’s study, and equipped with a methodology of survey research from his own participation in the study, McGavran began what turned into a life-long work involving travel to many countries on every continent of the world to research how churches grow.

Several of the basic principles McGavran used in developing his approach to church growth come from the Anglo-American and German missiological roots, including the concepts of responsive peoples, mass conversions, people movements, Christianization, the use of small groups led by local leaders, and the development of an indigenous “people’s” church. In general, however, he avoided some of the extremes of both his German (e.g., over-emphasis on existing social orders and the mythic conceptions of “folk”) and the Anglo-American (e.g., autonomous rather than Christonomous churches) roots.

The written beginning of the movement came with Bridges of God (1955), in which McGavran put forth four key issues:

Theological: Following Allen, the central purpose of God’s mission was reaching lost people, bringing them to Christ, and incorporating them into responsible membership in Christian churches.

Ethical: From his own observations and work with Pickett, he proposed that God’s resources were being used without asking whether or not the kingdom of God was being advanced by the programs they were supporting. There was need for greater accountability.

Missiological: Following the German missiological theorists and Pickett’s study, McGavran proposed a need, in non-Western contexts, to shift our focus away from individual decisions to group decisions. Linked with this was the well-known Homogeneous Unit Principle, McGavran’s observation that people like to become Christians without crossing racial, linguistic, or class barriers. His application of working within social orders by maintaining homogeneity within an individual church parallels the German missiological people’s churches concept.

Procedural: McGavran proposed the recognition of two distinct stages of Christianization. The first stage was “discipling” (which McGavran used in reference to conversion and incorporation into the body of Christ) and the second “perfecting” (the lifelong process of bringing a new Christian to maturity).

The primary significance of McGavran’s next book, How Churches Grow (1959), was that in it he used the analytical techniques for which the Church Growth movement is now known to critique missions policies from 1925 to 1955. In 1961, the formal organization of the movement began when McGavran established the Institute of Church Growth in Eugene, Oregon (at Northwest Christian College). In 1965 he accepted the invitation to become the founding Dean of the Fuller School of World Mission. In 1970 he published Understanding Church Growth, which is the major work of the movement. Currently in its third edition (1990), it still is used as the basic text for introducing students to the international side of Church Growth.

Until 1971 the focus of the Church Growth movement had been primarily the non-Western world. At that time, however, C. Peter Wagner, a colleague of McGavran at Fuller School of World Mission, realized that the principles applied equally in the United States and recruited students for a Church Growth class at Fuller. Win Arn, one of the early students, established the Institute of American Church Growth and was soon holding seminars around America.

Church Growth Movement

The Modern Movement and Influence. Today, the Church Growth movement is recognized as one of the most influential movements of the late twentieth century. It is now established as a discrete academic field of study at many major theological institutions. It has a strong sociological and anthropological foundation as well as a continuing emphasis on being a pragmatic rather than a purely theoretical discipline.

Characterizing the modern framework, C. Peter Wagner proposes six minimum elements of the Church Growth movement:

1. Non-growth displeases God (it is abnormal, a disease, and correctable).
2. Numerical growth of the church is a priority with God and focuses on new disciples rather than on decisions.
3. Disciples are tangible, identifiable, countable people that increase the church numerically.
4. Limited time, money, and resources require strategy based on results.
5. Social and behavioral sciences are valid tools in measuring and encouraging church growth.
6. Research is essential for maximum growth.

We might add that the most significant methodological approach initiated by the Church Growth movement is the “people” approach to world evangelization, which has almost taken on a life of its own. From the annual Unreached Peoples directories to various “adopt a people” projects, this particular idea has had a tremendous impact on mission strategy in the last quarter of the twentieth century.

Evaluation. Church Growth has not been without its critics over the years. Even with the addition of theologically trained faculty at Fuller School of World Mission, those criticisms have not abated. Several of the most common critiques are worth noting.

First, the accusation leveled most often is that the Church Growth movement tends to replace people with numbers and has fostered a bottom-line mentality that is more appropriate for a business context than a church context. Critics maintain that the Church Growth movement appears to have replaced the glorifying of God as the primary task of the Church with numerical growth.

This bottom-line mentality is seen not just in the numbers emphasis. It also appears in the wholesale borrowing of management, planning, and marketing practices from American business.

A second critique is that in the process of demystifying the growth of the church the movement tends to reduce the role of the Holy Spirit to that of sociological caretaker who is limited in his work to our own ability of finding effective means by which he can work.

A third critique of the movement is that its proponents, like Warneck, have allowed experience to dictate the interpretation of Scripture. Church Growth has a sociological base built on the Durkheimian foundation that religious belief (doctrine) is social experience. Linked with this is the tendency to naïvely proof-text sociological propositions. For example, Church Growth proponents maintain that God sees the task of the Great Commission as disciplining individuals of every people group and support it by translating Matthew’s panta ta ethne in Matthew 28:19 as “all the peoples” (the NIV and NASB read “all nations”), though few, if any, notable New Testament scholars agree with this interpretation.

A fourth criticism is that throughout the Church Growth literature there is confusion over terminology. For example, the “principles” advocated by Church Growth often appear to be developed as descriptive observations of social phenomena and then promulgated as prescriptive principles. The most commonly criticized “principle” is the Homogeneous Unit Principle. In reality, it is not a “principle,” but a descriptive observation that people do not like to cross ethnic, linguistic, or other social barriers in coming to Christ. Generally it is not the observation that critics attack, but the confusion of the observation as a principle and the resulting proposed applications. In this instance, the application that we should keep our churches homogeneous or ethnically pure so that they will grow more rapidly has been criticized as ethnocentric at best and racist at worst.

Finally, in spite of the theoretical framework of cultural sensitivity, the Church Growth movement has been accused of being largely insensitive in its borrowing of predominately North American business principles in its approach to planning, managing, and (more recently) marketing a church.

Future of Church Growth. There is little doubt that Church Growth as a discipline is here to stay. We rejoice in this, for it has several strengths to offer the body of Christ in understanding the growth of God’s church. For example, it has pioneered something of a paradigm shift within evangelicalism, namely that the growth of the church is not limited to a mysterious work of the Holy Spirit, but includes social dynamics that can be studied for our benefit.

Further, it has maintained unswerving support of the importance of the task of evangelism and the process of enfolding new believers into the body of Christ in a way that recognizes the primacy of Scripture and the reality of culture in the life of every Christian. Another contribution is the bringing to a level of awareness several significant issues facing the church (e.g., homogeneity, responsive peoples, the limited success of cooperation, the role of demographic changes in the growth of local churches).

As a movement, Church Growth has also fostered the development of significant methodological changes, especially the concept of raising up indigenous churches and the peoples approach to evangelism. Additionally, it has shown convincingly that the numerical growth of the church is a factor that must be considered in determining its health—while we must not depend on numbers for analysis, neither should we discard any reference to them. Finally, the movement has awakened the church to the need of bringing the laity more into the active life of the church. Together with this, it has promoted and enhanced the small group cell approach as a means of providing a climate within a church in which the needs of every individual may be met.

While acknowledging these strengths as important contributions of the Church Growth movement, we must also note several areas of concern for the future of the movement. First, and most significant, the Church Growth approach to theological methodology needs to be redeveloped. To date descriptive findings have too often been presented as prescriptive principles. In particular, the overly simplistic appeals to proof-texts need to be changed if the Church Growth movement is to find credibility as a theological discipline. Additionally, Church Growth proponents need to address the criticism of overdependence on a quantitative focus and show in their writings and research a greater recognition of the role of quality growth in church development.

Church Growth also needs to become more sensitive to the charge that it tends to reduce the growth of the church to a purely sociological phenomenon and must be weaned from its North American business mentality and show more sensitivity to cultural differences in management and organizational frameworks.

Finally, with the exception of the territorial spirits issue, much of what has been written and presented by Church Growth in the past several years has been a rehashing of old ideas rather than a presentation of genuinely new ones. This must change if the movement is to retain its freshness and energy as a discipline.

Conclusion. Though the theoretical roots go back to the nineteenth century, the modern Church Growth movement has been an entirely twentieth-century movement. By and large, it has had a largely positive impact on the twentieth-century evangelical church not only in the United States but around the world. A. S. MOREAU

See also MISSIOLOGY; CHURCH.

Bibliography. W. J. Abraham, Logic of Evangelism; R. Allen, Spontaneous Expansion of the Church; Missionary Methods: St. Paul's or Ours?; O. Costas, Church and Its Mission: A Shattering Critique from the Third World; E. Gibbs, I Believe in Church Growth; O. Guinness, Dining with the Devil: The Megachurch Movement Flirts with Modernity; M. Hodges, Indigenous Church; D. A. McGavran, Bridges of God; How Churches Grow; Understanding Church Growth; J. R. McQuilkin, Measuring the Church Growth Movement; G. Peters, Theology of Church Growth; W. R. Shenk, ed., Exploring Church Growth; E. Towns, Complete Book of Church Growth; C. P. Wagner, Church Growth and the Whole Gospel; Your Church Can Grow; C. P. Wagner, ed., Church Growth: The State of the Art; D. D. Webster, Selling Jesus: What's Wrong with Marketing the Church?

Church of Christ, Scientist. An organization founded by Mary Baker Eddy in an effort to reinstate primitive Christianity and its lost element of healing. In 1876 Eddy formed the Christian Scientists Association and three years later chartered the Church of Christ, Scientist. The church was reorganized into its present form in 1892. The First Church of Christ, Scientist, of Boston is known as the mother church, and other Christian Science churches are considered branches, although each is independently governed. The tenets and bylaws of the church were incorporated by Eddy into the church manual of 1895. The church's fundamental theological teachings are presented in Eddy's Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures.

Theologically, the Church of Christ, Scientist, does not concur with the basic tenets of historic orthodox Christianity. Although it uses the theological vocabulary of traditional Christianity, it assigns metaphysical meanings to the terms. The sources of authority for the church are the Bible and Eddy's writings. Members accept Eddy's writings as divine revelation and interpret the Bible allegorically through her works. The most significant authority for the church is Science and Health, which was published in 1875 and regularly revised until Eddy's death in 1910. Eddy referred to this volume as containing the perfect word of God, and thus as divine and infallible teaching.

Christian Science's view of God is monistic. God is divine principle, not a supreme being. God is mind, and mind is all. Nothing possesses reality or exists which is not mind. The characteristics and attributes of God become God. The Trinity is constituted by the threefold nature of divine principle (God): life, truth, and love. God, Christ, and Holy Spirit are not persons. The Church of Christ, Scientist

Christology of Christian Science denies a physical incarnation of Christ and insists Mary conceived Christ only as a spiritual idea. Since God is mind and spirit, and nothing exists which is not spirit, there can be no matter or flesh; these are only illusions. Thus Christ did not possess a body and did not die on a cross. The need of an atonement is nullified since sin, evil, sickness, and death are delusions, not reality. God is good, and nothing can exist which is not good. Christian Science teaches man is created in God's image as spirit, mind, and good; thus man is incapable of sin, sickness, and death. Man is placed on a plane of equality with God in his origin, character, and eternity. The metaphysical presuppositions of the church insist that heaven and hell are present states of man's thoughts, not real future dwelling places.

Christian Science church services are simple and uniform worldwide. They focus upon the uniform lesson-sermons which are read aloud from the Bible and Science and Health by readers elected from the congregation. There is no clergy or priesthood. The sacraments are not special rites. Baptism means the spiritual purification of daily life and the Eucharist is silent spiritual communion with God. No visible elements are used. Salvation to the Christian Scientist is the gaining of the understanding that man's life is wholly derived from God the Spirit and is not mortal and material.

P. G. CHAPPELL

See also EDDY, MARY BAKER.

Bibliography. E. S. Bates and J. V. Dittmore, Mrs. Eddy, the Truth and the Tradition; C. S. Braden, Christian Science Today; S. Gottschalk, Emergence of Christian Science in American Religious Life; R. Peel, Christian Science: Its Encounter with American Culture; L. P. Powell, Christian Science, the Faith and Its Founder; E. M. Ramsay, Christian Science and Its Discoverer.

Church Officers. Archbishop. One who presides over a "province" in the Church of England or the Roman Church. A province is a geographical area in which a number of dioceses are grouped together for administrative purposes: the bishop of the chief see or archdiocese is termed the archbishop or metropolitan. The term, derived from the Roman Empire, dates from ca. A.D. 350. (Derivations: Gr. archi, "chief," and episkopos, "overseer, bishop.")

Archdeacon. A cleric who exercises delegated administrative authority under a bishop. The duties are of a general disciplinary character; they also include a particular responsibility for the temporal property of the church. Originally, an archdeacon was the chief of the deacons who assisted the bishop hence the name oculus et manus episcopi (eyes and hands of the overseer). The office has occasionally carried the right of succession.

Auxiliary Bishop. In the early church the bishop was the leader of the local Christian community. With the growth of churches and the formation of geographical groups of churches into dioceses it became necessary for the responsibilities of spiritual oversight and episcopal ministry to be shared. Various titles have been used to describe the bishops created for this role, such as assistant, auxiliary, coadjutor, and suffragan, and each of these has its own significance. The term "auxiliary" is most commonly used in the Roman Catholic Church on both sides of the Atlantic and, unlike "coadjutor," carries with it no implications of succession.

Bishop. In NT times the leader of a congregation was called a bishop or elder. Very soon the two became separate offices and the bishop became the chief pastor ruling over several churches in one geographical area. During the Reformation some of the newly formed Protestant churches abandoned the title of bishop and reverted to the title of elder. Bishops of large or important areas are called variously pope, patriarch, metropolitan, and archbishop.

Canon. A member of the chapter of a cathedral. Appointment is by either nomination or election. "Residentiary canons" form part of the salaried staff of a cathedral and have general responsibility for the maintenance of services, the care of the fabric, etc. "Nonresidentiary" canons (or honorary canons) are unsalaried but enjoy certain privileges, including a cathedral stall. The title derives from the fact that in the Middle Ages chapters were usually composed of clergy living under a rule (canon) of life.

Cardinal. In the Roman Catholic Church the cardinals rank immediately after the pope and, when assembled in consistory, act as his immediate counselors. When a vacancy occurs they meet in secret session to elect a pope. There are three ranks: cardinal-priests, cardinal-deacons, and cardinal-bishops.

Coadjutor Bishop. A bishop who assists the diocesan bishop to administer and serve the diocese. In the Roman Catholic Church since Vatican Council II the coadjutor bishop always has the right of succession, whereas an auxiliary bishop does not. This custom is not necessarily the case in Anglicanism. The coadjutor is a true bishop in every sense (rightly ordained with the power to ordain), but he needs the permission of the diocesan bishop to act in the diocese.

Curate. Originally a clergyman who had the "cure" of souls; today a clergyman (either deacon or priest) who assists a parochial clergyman. Curate is the term popularly used to describe an assistant or unbeneficed clergyman.

Deacon, Deaconess. An office in the early church that emphasized service, modeled on a similar office in the Jewish synagogue. Deacons and deaconesses were to free the apostles for other works of ministry (Acts 6:1–6). Their qualifications are mentioned in 1 Timothy 3:8–13, and women were admitted to this order (Rom. 16:1; 1 Tim. 3:11).

Dean. The head of a cathedral church ranking immediately after the bishop. He presides over the chapter and is responsible for the ordering and government of the cathedral. The title is also used in a nonecclesiastical sense, e.g., the dean of a college or the dean of a faculty.

Elder. A leader of the NT church, synonymous with bishop in the early period; his function was to rule the church for the spiritual good of the people. A congregation could have more than one elder. The qualifications for elder are found in Titus 1:5–9.

Metropolitan. The title of a bishop exercising provincial, and not merely diocesan, powers. The title first appears in the fourth canon of the Council of Nicea (325). Metropolitanans are commonly called archbishops or primates.

Moderator. In the Presbyterian Church the moderator is the presbyter or elder who presides over a presbytery, synod, or General Assembly. He has only a casting vote. He is primus inter pares (the first among equals) and holds office for a limited period (generally one year).

Patriarch. A title (dating from the sixth century) for the bishops of the five chief sees: Rome, Alexandria, Antioch, Constantinople, and Jerusalem.

Prebendary. The occupant of a cathedral benefice. The title dates from the Middle Ages, when “prebends” were usually endowed from the revenue of various cathedral estates. The title has generally been superseded by that of “canon.”

Presbyter. Another name for elder.

Rector. Historically, a rector, as distinguished from a vicar, is a parish incumbent whose tithes are not inappropriate. With the commutation of tithes into money this distinction no longer exists. The title is used in Scotland for the head of a school and in Europe for the secular head of a university. It is also the title for the head of a Jesuit house.

Rural Dean. The title for the clergyman who is appointed by a bishop as head of a group of parishes. The rural dean acts as a link between the bishop and the clergy, but his functions have been increasingly overshadowed and superseded by those of the archdeacon.

Suffragan Bishop. The term may be applied to bishops in two main senses. First, all diocesan bishops are suffragans when they join with the archbishop or metropolitan in synod and cast their “suffrage.” Second, and more generally, assistants to diocesan bishops are described as suffragans.

Superintendent. In the Church of Scotland superintendents were first appointed under the First Book of Discipline (1560) to oversee various territorial districts. While enjoying a certain measure of superiority, they are subject to the control and censure of the other ministers associated with them. In the Lutheran Church there are also superintendents, but in the Scandinavian churches the title “bishop” is retained. The term is also found in some Methodist churches.

Vicar. In medieval times, when a church was appropriated to a monastery, the revenue was paid to the monastery, and a monk was employed to perform the duties of the parish. Later, a secular priest, called a vicar (Lat. vicarius, “a substitute”), was employed. Today, the vicar is simply the incumbent of a parish with the same status and duties as a rector. S. B. BABBAGE

See also BISHOP; CARDINAL; CHURCH GOVERNMENT; CLERGY; DEACON, DEACONESS; ELDER; MAJOR ORDERS; MINISTER; MINOR ORDERS; ORDAIN, ORDINATION; ORDERS, HOLY; PAPACY; PATRIARCH.

Bibliography. E. M. Howe, Women and Church Leadership; C. B. McAfee, Ruling Elder, His Duties and His Opportunities.

Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. See MORMONISM.

Civil Disobedience. The performance of an intentional act that is prohibited by the civil authority or a refusal to perform an act that is required by the civil authority. Civil disobedience may be carried out by an individual or a group, and it may be directed at a very specific issue or more generally at the governing authorities. Illegal meetings, speeches, publications and demonstrations, sit-ins at racially segregated establishments during the civil rights movement, refusal to register for the military draft, and refusal to surrender personal or financial records to the state—these are all examples of civil disobedience. While violence technically may be a form of civil disobedience, discussions of the topic usually are restricted to the range of actions from passive noncooperation to nonviolent resistance.

For Christian theology and ethics the problem of civil disobedience is raised by two facts. First, Christians are called to an unqualified obedience to their Lord and God (Deut. 13:4; Jer. 7:23; John 14:15). Second, Christians are called to submit to the governing authorities and to recognize that, even where the civil authority is not Christian, God uses (or can use) it as his servant for good (cf. Rom. 13:1–7; 1 Pet. 2:13–17). Civil disobedience becomes an issue when these two claims come into conflict, i.e., when God commands us to do something which the civil authority prohibits or the civil authority commands us to do something which God prohibits.

That the conflict is real and that civil disobedience may be a Christian option is acknowledged by much of the church throughout history and, most importantly, by the Bible itself. Daniel's illegal prayer (Dan. 6), Peter's illegal preaching (Acts 5:27–32), and Paul's refusal to leave his prison cell as ordered (Acts 16:35–40) are but three examples of biblical civil disobedience. Prominent examples in the history of the church would include illegal preaching and assembly, illegal printing and dissemination of Scripture, refusal to take oaths, refusal of military service, refusal to baptize children, refusal to worship the emperor, and violation of racially segregationist laws.

Civil Disobedience

While the basic principle is clear—"We must obey God rather than men" (Acts 5:29)—careful discernment is necessary to distinguish a biblically warranted occasion for civil disobedience from a mere rationalization of illegal protest growing out of other motives and interests. Rigorous and prayerful searching of the Word of God must be accompanied by careful analysis of the sociopolitical situation. While individual conscience is finally responsible before God, great emphasis must be placed on the church as a community of moral discernment and support. The burden of proof falls on individuals who deviate from the consensus of a praying, biblically informed community.

The clearest indication for civil disobedience has always been an overt conflict between civil authority and the central tasks of discipleship: prayer and worship together in the presence of God, proclamation of the gospel in all its dimensions, and the various tasks of healing (Mark 3:14–15; Luke 9:1–2). The Ten Commandments, the message of the prophets on God's justice, the Sermon on the Mount, and the apostolic teaching on the social implications of the gospel are other essential sources for a clear perception of the command of God which supersedes all other commands.

If it becomes apparent that there is a real conflict between the demands of biblical justice and love and the demands of the state, and if all available legal avenues of reform are exhausted, then civil disobedience may be warranted. And while Christians are ruled by the call to faithfulness much more than the call to measurable effectiveness, civil disobedience probably should be avoided if its practice is likely to produce, directly or indirectly, an increase in repression or injustice for others.

Finally, the choice of tactics must receive careful attention. What are the means appropriate to the end that is sought? The range of options runs from passive noncooperation to more active obstruction, demonstration, and nonviolent resistance. Beyond this range some would argue that sabotage, destruction of property, and even violent revolt may on occasion be warranted. The critical factor from the standpoint of Christian theology and ethics is to recognize the indissoluble link between means and end. The means affect the character of the end and thus should exhibit as much as possible the character of the desired end (peace, justice, truthfulness, etc.). Godly ends are achieved by godly means.

Those who are led to engage in civil disobedience must remain humble and rigorously self-critical. Many Christians would also argue that while disobedience is possible, insubordination is not. This means that during and after the disobedience the practitioners should remain subordinate to the penalties and consequences meted out by the civil authority (jail, punishment, exile, etc.) and/or flee rather than attempt to evade these consequences by direct, violent overthrow of the superordinate powers. D. W. GILL

See also SOCIAL ETHICS.

Bibliography. J. Childress, Civil Disobedience and Political Obligation; S. C. Mott, Biblical Ethics and Social Change; D. B. Stevick, Civil Disobedience and the Christian.

Civil Law and Justice in Bible Times. The discussion of any aspect of law in the OT must come, sooner or later, to Leviticus 19, a microcosm of the whole legal principle of Scripture. From the point of view of this present article, the testimony of Leviticus 19 is that, while civil law in the OT is expressed in enactments appropriate to its purposes, it is not to be distinguished in principle from any of the other commandments of God, domestic, moral, ceremonial, or personal. Leviticus 19 seems to be almost designedly without pattern or structure; it sweeps together into one place rules and directives of every kind. A principle of kindness (v. 14) lies between one of commercial honesty (v. 13) and integrity in justice (v. 15); sexual purity (v. 20), sound husbandry (v. 23), the avoidance of pagan religious practice (vv. 26–28), family honor (v. 29), Sabbath keeping (v. 30), and respect for the aged (v. 32) and for the immigrant (v. 33) all seem to be on the same level—and essentially they are, for all alike arise from one common consideration, "I am the Lord."

What is thus true in Leviticus 19 is capable of wide illustration in the OT. To Amos, social violence (3:10) and personal self-indulgence (3:15) are alike sins which the Lord will punish (3:14) and are alike offenses against his holiness (4:2). The law of the Lord is one law, and the legal procedure and principles of jurisprudence are, within their own sphere, manifestations of the holy nature of the Lord who gave them. It is important for us to realize this lest we should think that what was enacted for a time and a society so seemingly different from our own has no testimony to bear to us or no word of direction for the present day.

Forms and Procedures. The development of legal procedures in the OT partakes of the distinctive nature of biblical progression of truth whereby nothing is lost in route but old truth is caught up and perpetuated by the newer truth which followed on.

The Patriarchal Period. There is no record of written laws throughout the period of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, though incidents like the transaction over the cave of Machpelah (Gen. 23) and the status of the servant Eliezer as Abram's adopted son (Gen. 15:3) reflect norms and forms known from outside the Bible. We may suppose that Noahic covenantal law with its prescription of the death penalty would have remained in force. Genesis 38 reveals that justice was dispensed by a family court convened by the head of the family to whom the offense had to be reported and who pronounced sentence. The same incident shows that such justice was not arbitrary but according to the facts received in evidence.

The Mosaic Settlement. Circumstances compelled Moses to decentralize the administration of justice (Exod. 18:13–26), and he did so in a far-reaching fashion, right down to what must have been a minor rank of officials (rulers of tens, v. 25). Possibly it was at this point that the older system of family justice was interwoven with the newer procedures, leaving the head of the family to continue as the first tier of judicial administration.

Moses made provision for lower and higher courts (Exod. 18:26), and it is plain that this practice continued, even though details of procedure are not stated. Thus, in Deuteronomy 22:28–29 it seems to be the father of the family who enforces the prescribed penalty, whereas in verses 13–21 he brings the case to the elders. Above the court of the elders was that of the priests (Deut. 17:8–13). During his lifetime Moses was the supreme court, and it may be that the special place given to the high priest in cases of murder and manslaughter (Num. 35:25, etc.) indicates that Moses envisaged the high priest would become the supreme court for the post-Mosaic period—or, possibly, the high priest in conjunction with some sort of national tribunal as expressed by the word “congregation” in Numbers 35:24.

Under the Monarchy. The period covered by Judges 1 through 1 Samuel 12 was plainly one in which the simplicity of the earlier provisions for the maintenance and execution of justice were proving insufficient for the growing complexity of life within the twelve-tribe confederacy. The scintillating charismatic figures of the judges achieved no more than limited stability and security for the people. The recurring refrain that “the land had rest for . . . years” (e.g., Judg. 5:31; 8:28) is more a confession of failure than anything else. Within the testimony of the book of Judges it is part of the evidence that another form of government, productive of enduring benefits, was required (cf. 17:6; 18:1; 19:1; 21:25). Even in the case of Samuel this was so. His achievements were great, including a national revival of religion (1 Sam. 7:2–17), but his area of administrative control was comparatively circumscribed (7:15–17) and the attempt to introduce his sons as deputies was a disaster (8:1–4). There is nothing, therefore, to counter the revelation given in Judges that the land was in religious (Judges 17:1–13), social (18:1–31), moral, and political (19:1–21:25) disarray—a situation which, as the author of Judges saw it, only monarchy could remedy.

The eldership continued through the period of the judges (Judg. 8:16; 11:5; 21:16) and of Samuel (1 Sam. 4:3; 8:4), into the monarchies of Saul (1 Sam. 16:4; 30:26), David (2 Sam. 17:4; 19:11), Solomon (1 Kings 8:1), and the divided kingdoms (1 Kings 21:8; 2 Kings 23:1). On top of this the kings imposed a palace-based bureaucracy (2 Sam. 8:15–18; 1 Kings 4:1–6) and, at least in the case of Solomon, a new administrative division of the land (1 Kings 4:7–19). Some, possibly too much, of the administration of justice remained directly in the king's own hand (cf. 1 Kings 3:28). Absalom was able to make a good deal of headway for his rebellion because of the inefficiency of the royal courts (2 Sam. 15:1–6). And even as late as King Zedekiah (Jer. 38:7) it appears that the causes of the tribes came before the royal court.

Principles of Jurisprudence. The Lex Talionis. The basic principle of OT jurisprudence was absolute equity, enunciated in the striking and memorable form “an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth.” This is often unthinkingly criticized as if it were a license for savagery, but reflection establishes that its intention was to secure as exact an equation as is humanly possible between crime and punishment.

The law is stated three times. The first statement (Exod. 21:23) simply requires that equity must govern all court practice; indeed, words could not make the great principle of equivalence clearer. The second statement (Lev. 24:17–22) adds that the rule of equity applies to all alike, alien as well as nativeborn. The third (Deut. 19:19–21) goes further by claiming that this absolutely equal apportionment of justice promotes a wholesome society and acts as an effective deterrent. Far from being a charter for excess, the lex talionis (the “eye for an eye” principle) guards the rights of the guilty (who must not be punished beyond their deserts) as much as it maintains the dignity of the law. Far from being a piece of ancient barbarism, it should still apply—and God help the state, ancient or modern, where it does not.

The Death Penalty and Theories of Punishment. The OT, then, insists that the punishment must match the crime, no more, no less. In this way earthly courts seek to reproduce the absolute justice of the God of Israel. For, ideally considered, coming before the courts was coming before God (Exod. 22:8; Deut. 19:17), and the legal process was meant to be one aspect of the obedience-blessing/disobedience-cursing syndrome which the OT teaches to be the Lord's providential order in the whole course of history. In his law the Lord has testified to his own nature, and the upholding of the dignity of the law is a duty in honor of God.

The clearest example the OT affords of the working of the lex talionis was that "life shall go for life." The case for the death penalty is not argued: there is a special seriousness in the crime of murder in that a particular despite is done to the image of God in man (Gen. 9:6) and the principle of equity must be invoked. Can anything else vindicate the law in the face of this violation, when life is arrogantly and high-handedly taken by murder?

The OT does not seem to say anything about punishment as reformatory of the criminal, though Leviticus 26:23 reveals that the Lord is moved by a reformatory impulse in punishing his people, and Deuteronomy 4:36 (using the same verb) teaches that the giving of the law had itself a reformatory aim. But reformation is not developed in the OT as a theory of punishment. On the other hand, the purging of society and the deterrence of other potential offenders are both taken into account (e.g., Lev. 20:14; Deut. 13:5, 11; 17:7; 19:19–20). But these ends are not achieved by punishments either of obvious leniency or of notable severity but by the steady application of the lex talionis: the apportionment to each crime of its due reward. To purge society and to deter others are by-products of the retribution theory of punishment which the OT affirms.

We have no evidence other than in the case of the death penalty about the application in detail of the principle of equivalence. The OT recognized a practice of commuting punishments and of substituting monetary fines. Ordinarily the principle of the lex talionis would have been safeguarded by the payment of carefully assessed damages to the offended party (e.g., Exod. 21:19, 22, 33–34; 22:1–15). Likewise the OT took note of degrees of murder (e.g., Exod. 21:13) and provided cities of refuge for cases of manslaughter (Num. 35:9–15; Deut. 19:1–13). Yet, even so, the city of refuge was not a soft option: the closeness of the city-arrest (the ancient equivalent of "house-arrest") (Num. 35:26–28) and the continuing threat that the "avenger" would exact his penalty indicate the sense of moral outrage with which the OT viewed even unintentional taking of life.

The Value of the Person. The cry of the defenseless has often gone unheard in every society at every period of history, but it is doubtful if there was ever a legal system which, in its intention, was so committed to protecting people from injustice and repression. The prophets were outraged when the upright figure of Justice was made to lie prone and when sectional, influential interests used the forms of legality to secure personal ends (cf. 1 Kings 21:17–24; Isa. 5:8–10; Amos 8:4–7). The messianic forecast of the perfect king stressed his concern for the needy (e.g., Ps. 72:2–4, 12–14; Isa. 11:4). This was doubtless in contrast to many a Davidic ruler, yet it ever held up to such the ideal inherent in his office. As ever in the Bible, this concern for the needy had a theological basis: according to Deuteronomy 10:17–19 the God of Israel, who knows no favoritism and is not open to bribes, reaches out specially to the helpless and in this is to be imitated by his people.

In this same spirit the OT forbids favoritism and insists on even-handed justice (e.g., Exod. 23:3; Lev. 19:15). To foster this Moses extended the legal system down to the family unit (rulers of tens) so as to make justice available to all. He insisted on integrity on the judicial bench (Deut. 16:18–20); he established rules of evidence (Num. 35:30; Deut. 17:6; 19:15); he regulated punishment so as to preserve the personal dignity of the guilty; he insisted that the law should take its course in a humane way (Exod. 22:25–27); and, more than any other legislator, he concerned himself with the protection of women—the slave girl (Exod. 21:7–11), the female prisoner of war (Deut. 21:10–14), the "hated" wife (Deut. 21:15–17), and even the extraordinary rules for the case of husbandly suspicion (Num. 5:11–31) where, surely, the ceremony was devised to favor the suspected wife. Just as the OT shows that when law is flouted love evaporates, so also it insists that without law love is not liberated to flourish and, furthermore, that law itself must be infilled with love if it is to reflect the character of the God in whose name it was administered. J. A. MOTYER

See also CAPITAL PUNISHMENT; CRIMINAL LAW AND PUNISHMENT IN BIBLE TIMES; LAW, BIBLICAL CONCEPT OF.

Bibliography. B. N. Kaye and G. J. Wenham, eds., Law, Morality and the Bible; J. A. Motyer, Image of God: Law and Liberty in Biblical Ethics; Law and Life; O. O'Donovan, Measure for Measure: Justice in Punishment and the Sentence of Death; A. Phillips, Ancient Israel's Criminal Law.

Civil Religion. Also called civic, public, or political religion, civil religion refers to the widespread acceptance by a people of a body of religio-political traits connected with their nation's history and destiny. It serves to relate their society to the realm of ultimate meaning, enables the self-interpretation of the society, and functions as the integrating symbolism of the nation. It is the “operative religion” of a society (Will Herberg), the system of rituals, symbols, values, norms, and allegiances that function in the ongoing life of the community and provide it with an overarching sense of unity that transcends all internal conflicts and differences. A civil religion is distinctive in that it has reference to power within the state yet transcends that power by focusing on ultimate conditions. Theoretically it gives both the justification for power and a basis for criticizing those who exercise power. “Civil” faith must in some sense be independent of the church as such or it will merely be an ecclesiastical legitimization of the state, and it must be genuinely a “religion” or it will be just secular nationalism (Phillip Hammond). It requires a “civil theology” because this provides the society with meaning and a destiny, interprets the historical experience, and affords a sense of dynamism, uniqueness, and identity (Maureen Henry). Reduced to its bare essentials, civil religion means that the state utilizes a consensus of religious sentiments, concepts, and symbols—either directly or indirectly, consciously or unconsciously—for its own political purposes. Commentators view it as a “general” religious faith and contrast it with the “particular” faith of sectarian or denominational groups which can claim the allegiance of only a segment of the population.

Although the traits commonly associated with civil religion appear as far back as classical antiquity, when each Greek city-state had its own gods, dogmas, and worship, Plato developed the outlines of a civil theology in Republic, and the Roman emperor functioned both as the chief priest in the state cult and as an object of worship, the term was actually coined by Jean-Jacques Rousseau in Social Contract (1762). He identified the civil faith as something that could deal with religious diversity and at the same time cement people’s allegiance to civil society, thereby achieving and ensuring social peace after the long era of disruptive, religiously inspired wars. It was, however, not until the 1950s and 1960s that civil religion became a major topic of theological discussion. The catalyst that propelled it into the center of scholarly attention was a paper presented by sociologist Robert N. Bellah in 1965, which boldly asserted: “Few have realized that there actually exists alongside of and rather clearly differentiated from the churches an elaborate and well-institutionalized civil religion in America.” This was followed by a heated debate in academic circles as to the nature of the public faith and whether in fact it even was a valid concept.

The key problem was that of definition, and this continues to be a matter of contention and intense confusion among scholars of civil religion. Russell E. Richey and Donald G. Jones attempted to resolve the difficulty by sketching out five broad, essentially interrelated meanings advanced by various writers, especially ones who treat the American phenomenon. They are (1) folk religion—the common religion that emerges out of the ethos and history of the society and competes with particularistic religion; (2) the transcendent universal religion of the nation—a common faith that stands in judgment over the folkways of the people and the nation and as a corrective against idolatrous tendencies in particular forms of Christianity and Judaism; (3) religious nationalism—the nation takes on a sovereign, self-transcendent character and becomes the object of adoration and glorification; (4) the democratic faith—the humane values of equality, freedom, and justice that exist without necessary dependence on a transcendent deity or a spiritualized nation represent civil religion at its best; and (5) Protestant civic piety—the fusion of Protestantism and nationalism in the American ethos which is reflected by moralism, individualism, activism, pragmatism, and missionizing the world.

An alternative offered by Martin E. Marty proposes that there are two kinds of civil religion, one that sees an objective, transcendent deity as the reference point for the social process (the nation under God) and one that stresses national self-transcendence. Within these are two approaches—the “priestly,” which is celebrative, affirmative, and culture-building, and the “prophetic,” which is dialectical but tends toward the judgmental. In the first category he includes Dwight Eisenhower as priest and Jonathan Edwards, Abraham Lincoln, and Reinhold Niebuhr as prophets. In the national self-transcendent grouping he places Robert Welch, Richard Nixon, and J. Paul Williams as priests and Sidney Mead and Robert Bellah as prophets. Arguing in a totally different direction, John Murray Cuddihy maintained that the American faith is nothing more than “religious civility,” a complex code of rites which instructs people in the ways of being religiously inoffensive, tolerant, and sensitive to the beliefs of others. John F. Wilson suggested that the ambiguities of the civil religion debate stem from the “uncritically mixed modes of analysis and the confusion of models by different interpreters,” and he delineated four major “constructions,” each based on a distinctive set of premises and intellectual traditions. The models are (1) societal—emphasizes every collectivity or social entity as sacred; (2) cultural—oriented toward analysis of the way in which a particular set of values functions in terms of interaction among the members of a given social order; that is, the symbolic unity and coherence of a society; (3) political—looks at the role of religious behavior and beliefs within a political society; and (4) theological—places the content of public religion in an overarching framework of meaning that provides norms for the political order, general culture, and society as a whole.

Civil Religion

Although it is obvious that civil religion is an extremely vague and controversial concept, writers have detected its manifestations in a wide range of countries and societies, especially England, South Africa, Japan, and the United States. Most attention has been paid to the American scene, where a civil religion appeared that allowed the nation to be understood in a transcendent manner, while at the same time religious pluralism flourished at the grass-roots level. Since there was a need for common symbols of national purpose that no single church could supply and since people, whether or not they were church members, felt at liberty to use religious symbols, the so-called secular institutions and their personnel occupied a preeminent role in the civil religion. The ideology that underlay this alliance between politics and religion was (1) there is a God; (2) his will can be known through democratic procedures; (3) America has been God's primary agent in history; and (4) the nation has been the chief source of identity for Americans. They were viewed as God's chosen people who made the exodus to the promised land across the sea and became a city on a hill, a light to the nations, proclaiming the message of democracy as the salvific doctrine that would lead mankind to freedom, prosperity, and happiness. Evidences of the civil faith include the biblical imagery and references to Almighty God and providence that have pervaded the speeches and public documents of American leaders from the very earliest times, the prominent display of the nation's flag in church sanctuaries, the inclusion of "under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance, and above all the national motto: "In God We Trust."

Supporters of civil religion insist that the ideas of transcendence and covenant hold the nation accountable, constitute cement in an otherwise heterogeneous society, challenge the country to fulfill its most noble ideals, and serve as instruments in the hands of wise political leaders (such as Lincoln and Martin Luther King Jr.) to inspire people to higher levels of achievement. Critics condemn it for idolizing the nation, tempting patriotic enthusiasts to distort and even falsify national history in order to make it fit civil religion preconceptions, demeaning the dignity of God by reducing him to the level of a tribal deity, providing a tool for public leaders to drum up support for questionable policies and ventures, and ignoring the needs of suppressed minorities within the national community. Many regard a biblical, evangelical faith and civil religion as incompatible, but there is no consensus in the conservative Protestant community on the question.

R. V. PIERARD

Bibliography. R. N. Bellah, Beyond Belief; Broken Covenant: American Civil Religion in Time of Trial; R. N. Bellah and P. E. Hammond, Varieties of Civil Religion; C. Cherry, God's New Israel; J. M. Cuddihy, No Offense: Civil Religion and Protestant Taste; R. T. Handy, Christian America; M. Henry, Intoxication of Power: An Analysis of Civil Religion in Relation to Ideology; D. G. Jones and R. E. Richey, eds., American Civil Religion; M. E. Marty, Nation of Behavers; S. E. Mead, Nation with the Soul of a Church; J. Moltmann et al., Religion and Political Society; T. D. Moodie, Rise of Afrikanerdom: Power, Apartheid, and the Afrikaner Civil Religion; R. V. Pierard and R. D. Linder, Twilight of the Saints: Biblical Christianity and Civil Religion in America; A. J. Reichley, Civil Religion and the Presidency; Religion in American Public Life; E. A. Smith, Religion of the Republic; E. L. Tuveson, Redeemer Nation: The Idea of America's Millennial Role; J. F. Wilson, Public Religion in American Culture.

Civil Righteousness. To say that all men are totally depraved is to say that the corruption of sinful nature permeates the whole man, including all the faculties of his being—intellect, emotion, will, personality, etc. This is not to say that all men are as evil as they can be, or that they give unrestrained expression to all forms of wickedness, or that they are completely devoid, in their natural state, of certain amiable qualities, or that they have no virtues in a limited sense, or that they cannot render a certain obedience to some legal standard or code of conduct. Those positive qualities and moral virtues that may be exhibited and the acts of civil obedience that may be performed constitute what theologians call civil righteousness (justitia civilis).

The fact that men, even in an unregenerate condition, can render some good is a result of God's common grace extended to human beings indiscriminately as image-bearers of the divine nature. This grace restrains the general destructive process of sin within the human race; enables men, although estranged from their Creator, to develop skills and abilities, to harness the forces of nature, and so make a positive contribution to the cultural, scientific, and social welfare of the world; and promotes within the conscience the praise of good and the condemnation of evil. It is, therefore, this grace which serves as the foundation from which all demonstrations of civil righteousness flow.

While it is true that the earthly existence of mankind is enhanced by the presence of civil righteousness, it must be stated categorically that such righteousness has no redemptive value. It cannot save men from eternal judgment nor earn for them eternal life. The manifestation of civil righteousness may evoke the approbation of men, but it will commend no one to a righteous God in whose eyes all human righteousness, including civil righteousness, is as filthy rags (Isa. 64:6).

W. W. BENTON

See also GRACE.

Civil Rights. A civil right is an entitlement that citizens possess over against the state or other citizens as contained in a constitution and a statutory law. Civil rights may refer to more general rights such as the classic ones to freedom of speech, press, religion, and assembly. These are commonly called civil liberties. More often people use the phrase “civil rights” to designate more specific rights that have emerged as a response to the moral claims of powerless social groups, especially those that have been historically subjected to unfair treatment by the majority (or more powerful minorities). In Anglo-Saxon legal tradition criminal suspects, for example, are given procedural safeguards such as the right to a writ of habeas corpus and to a trial by jury.

To claim a right against another is clearly different from seeking a favor secured by their gracious consent. What rights may a citizen legitimately expect to claim? Some argue that these should be limited to the more procedural questions such as due process under the law. Others assert that they must include the requirements for equal material resources or at least equal access to those conditions by which one’s social well-being is guaranteed. This latter view is reflected in the United Nations’ International Covenant on Economic, Social, and Cultural Rights (1966), which declares that citizens of all nations have a right to an adequate and continually improving standard of living. This includes rights to food, to a decent job, to adequate medical care, and even to “periodic holidays with pay.” The debate about what constitutes one’s civil rights underlies much of the civil strife in the modern world.

In Western Political Thought. Civil rights laws in the West rest upon fundamental moral principles that have been nurtured in the natural law tradition. The idea of natural law stretches back to the early Greek, Roman, and Christian writers, who affirmed that certain “laws” were eternal and that every human being was capable of recognizing them. One significant corollary of natural law thinking was the insistence upon human equality. This provided a ready-made criterion which early social critics used to help undermine established institutions that treated groups of people unfairly. Roman jurisprudence, which fashioned Western legal practice, was greatly influenced by this development.

The success of natural law was facilitated by Christian writers who, influenced by Greek and Roman ideas, found the concept compatible with Paul’s statement that the Gentiles “show that the requirements of the law are written in their hearts” (Rom. 2:15). Through the influence of Thomas Aquinas the natural law tradition provided the foundation for most civil and canon laws in the Middle Ages. By the eighteenth century natural law theory reached its political height. John Locke, for instance, believed that all humans are the workmanship of the one all-powerful and wise Maker and, consequently, that the state of nature has a law of which nothing is more evident than that all people are equal. All rights and duties humans owe each other in the sociopolitical realm are derived from this claim. Both the United States and French Declarations of Independence affirm as “self-evident” truths or “simple and incontestable principles” that “all men are created equal” or are “born and remain free and equal in rights.” Undergirding these truths was the declared assumption that all people possess an “equal station to which the laws of nature and nature’s God entitle them.”

The emphasis upon human rights in the West not only springs from natural law theory; it is also rooted in the soil which nurtured the Judeo-Christian faith. The earliest known law codes and documents recognized minimal civil rights for people belonging to vulnerable groups. Early Egyptians instituted a right for the poor to be ferried across a river if they could not pay and established positive legal duties to widows and orphans. Likewise, Babylonian, Assyrian, and Hittite law secured certain minimal rights for widows, children, concubines, slaves, debtors, and hirelings.

In the Bible. The Hebrew laws surpassed other contemporary codes in affirming the equal treatment of all citizens regardless of social standing. Some OT laws even surpass many contemporary progressive statutes in affirming civil rights. Since the laws which protected citizens were established by God, they were quite secure. Not even the king could neglect them with impunity; see Ahab and Jezebel’s punishment for their evil action in killing Naboth to gain his vineyard (1 Kings 21). These statutes not only established procedural guarantees before the law, but they also granted the powerless certain economic claims against the wealthy. Thus, the hungry had the right to glean food from another’s crop (Lev. 19:9–10; Deut. 23:24; 24:19–22; Matt. 12:1). Debtors could expect their loans to be canceled after seven years (Deut. 15:7–11). The sojourners, widows, and orphans were given special rights to the food brought to the temple as a tithe (14:28–29).

The Israelites’ deep sense of social justice was a flowering of their belief in Yahweh’s creative activity. The human creature as male and female was formed in the very image of God (Gen. 1:27) and could even be described as but a “little less” than God (Ps. 8:5). Since human beings are so highly praised, to oppress, afflict, and harshly treat them as did the Egyptians was an inherent violation of their dignity and roused both the compassion and wrath of God (Deut. 26:5–9). God's purpose in delivering the people became the rationale for Israel's own system of civil rights for powerless groups (Lev. 19:34; Deut. 24:22).

Civil Rights

Unfortunately, even in Israel the rights of the poor were often neglected or even despised. The prophets, however, became an eloquent moral force in reaffirming the civil rights tradition. Their visions of the Holy God radicalized their understanding of sin and sensitized them to the extent of economic exploitation occurring in the land (Isa. 5:16; 6:3–5; Jer. 22:13–17; Ezek. 18:5–18; Hos. 6:4–9; Mic. 3:1–4). The prophets were so insistent upon the restoration of civil rights that, on occasion, they linked spiritual activity with seeking justice (Isa. 58:3–9; Jer. 9:23–24; Amos 5:4–15; Mic. 6:8). The prophetic material is not alone in defending civil rights. The popular proverbs and religious hymns also highlight that concern (Pss. 15; 113:7–9; Prov. 14:31; 29:7).

The NT reflects the same strong civil rights position as embodied in the OT. The teachings of Jesus are well within the prophetic focus and are highly critical of unjust treatment for disenfranchised groups. On more than one occasion he reminded his adversaries that a human being is of great value (Matt. 12:12; Luke 14:5). In his "inaugural discourse" Jesus insisted that factors such as social status or national identity were irrelevant to God's care for people (see Luke 4:16–32, where God even heals an enemy Syrian). Moreover, he saw himself as the champion of the underclasses, the messianic liberator of the oppressed (4:18). Jesus' teachings and activities continually reinforced the moral standing of the penniless (Mark 12:41–44), the diseased (Matt. 14:13–14), the aged (15:4–6), women (John 4:7–42), children (Mark 10:13–14), and other socially weak groups such as prisoners (Matt. 25:36) and the blind (11:4–6).

The writings of Paul and the communal practices of the early church (Acts 2:44–45; 4:34–35) mediated the same moral and theological grounding for civil rights as was found in the OT and the teachings of Jesus. Paul's theological affirmations of human equality were unequivocal (1 Cor. 7:3–4; 2 Cor. 8:13–15; Gal. 3:28), although on occasion he accommodated his beliefs to historical realities (see 1 Tim. 2:11, where Paul suggests that women who are uneducated should not lead in the church). Paul's doctrine of justification by faith, which implied that all humans come before God as sinners and not as meriting favor, may have been Christianity's greatest contribution to the development of civil rights in the West. After the Reformation the belief in justification by faith resulted in freedom of conscience and belief, a seedbed for other rights within the state.

In the United States. Civil rights in America have been historically linked to the struggle of blacks to gain full equality. The Civil Rights Act of 1866 granted citizenship to blacks and was the first major rights legislation in the United States. The Constitution was also amended to outlaw slavery and give blacks the right to vote, although these laws were often defied outright or watered down by court interpretations. Under the influence of black protests, which initially emerged from the black church under the general leadership of Martin Luther King Jr., some important civil rights gains were made during the 1950s and 60s. These strides culminated in the Civil Rights Acts of 1964 and 1968, which outlawed discrimination in housing, employment, education, voting, and public accommodations.

The relative success of the civil rights movement has inspired other groups to press for their rights as citizens, even if some of the demands are excessive. These include women, Native Americans, Hispanics, prisoners, mental patients, homosexuals, tenants, the handicapped, the aged and children, aliens and refugees, the poor, the unborn, consumers, and employees. Many church groups and organizations of nearly all theological persuasions are actively engaged in supporting these various groups in procuring their civil rights.

D. J. MILLER

Bibliography. E. Corwin, "Higher Law" Background of American Constitutional Law; A. P. d'Entrevres, Natural Law: An Historical Survey; C. Fisher, Minorities, Civil Rights and Protest; G. Forell and W. Lazareth, eds., Human Rights: Rhetoric or Reality; M. L. King Jr., Why We Can't Wait; W. Laqueur and B. Rubin, eds., Human Rights Reader; D. Lyons, Rights; A. Miller, ed., Christian Declaration of Human Rights; J. Miranda, Marx and the Bible; A. Muller and N. Greinacher, eds., Church and the Rights of Man; P. Ramsey, Basic Christian Ethics; J. Rawls, Theory of Justice; H. Shue, Basic Rights: Subsistence, Affluence, and U.S. Foreign Policy; J. A. Sigler, American Rights Policies.

Clark, Gordon Haddon (1902–1985). Evangelical philosopher and educator. Gordon Clark was born August 31, 1902, in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, where he grew up in a Reformed Presbyterian parsonage. His father, David, was a scholar and theologian, author of Syllabus of Systematic Theology. He graduated from the University of Pennsylvania (A.B., 1924; Ph.D., 1929), where he taught philosophy from 1924 to 1936, also teaching part-time at Reformed Episcopal Seminary from 1929 to 1936. Clark was an excellent scholar and teacher, contributing numerous articles to New Scholasticism and Philosophical Review and publishing in the field of academic philosophy, including Readings in Ethics (1931); Selections from Hellenistic Philosophy (1940); History of Philosophy (1941), along with other authors; and Thales to Dewey (1957).

In Thales to Dewey Clark proceeds through the history of Western thought, trenchantly pointing out the inadequacy of human thought that attempts to establish itself independently of God's self-revelation.

From 1936 to 1943 Clark taught philosophy at Wheaton College, Illinois, where he numbered among his students such future evangelical luminaries as Carl F. H. Henry, E. J. Carnell, and Billy Graham. Clark's Calvinism, although of a traditional Westminster Confession sort, was ill-suited to the somewhat Arminian atmosphere of Wheaton at that time and so he resigned, as did the College's president, J. Oliver Buswell Jr. Clark would later defend his commitment to the Westminster Confession in What Presbyterians Believe (1956). Clark became the chairman of the Philosophy Department at Butler University in 1945, where he taught until 1973.

In 1951 Clark delivered the Payton Lectures at Fuller Theological Seminary, which were published as Christian View of Men and Things (1952), probably his major work. It was an attempt to restate for a new generation what James Orr had attempted to do in Christian View of God and the World (1893). It was essentially an attack on all secular attempts to know ultimate reality, postulating that only on the basis of the rational self-revelation of God as found in Scripture can truth be known. For Clark truth can be known and "truth is the same for God and man." This point he made to counter the philosophy of Immanuel Kant whose Idealism had rejected the knowability of God, the empiricism of John Dewey, and what he felt was the ultimate skepticism of the theologian Cornelius Van Til of Westminster Theological Seminary. A protracted theological battle had taken place in the church courts of the Orthodox Presbyterian Church following Clark's ordination in that body as teaching elder in 1944. Van Til accused Clark of heresy for asserting that human beings may know things in the same way (univocally) as God knows them, contending that because of a supposed qualitative difference between God's knowledge and ours we may only know things analogically. The battle ended with the exoneration of Clark in 1948, but he, not unnaturally, left the Orthodox Presbyterian Church.

Clark left Butler University in 1973 intending to spend his later years in fruitful retirement, but was persuaded to teach at the recently founded Covenant College, Tennessee, where he stayed from 1974 to 1983. He died in Westcliffe, Colorado, on April 9, 1985.

Gordon Clark was one of the most important evangelical thinkers of the twentieth century, both for what he said and for the formative impact he had on others. His former student Carl F. H. Henry said that "[no one] has addressed the broad sweep of contemporary concerns from an evangelical Protestant point of view more comprehensively than Gordon H. Clark." His emphasis on the knowability of God, the rationality of Christianity in our present irrationalistic secular age, his trenchant criticism of modern skepticism, his insistence on seeking the truth wherever it can be found and his unswerving commitment to the Scriptures as the foundation for all valid understanding of the universe are the legacy Clark left to the twenty-first century.

W. A. ELWELL

Bibliography. J. Robbins, ed., Gordon Clark: Personal Recollections; F. H. Klooster, Incomprehensibility of God in the Orthodox Presbyterian Conflict; R. Nash, HET 182–192; R. Nash, ed., Philosophy of Gordon Clark; M. Noll and C. Niemczyk, "Evangelicals and the Self-consciously Reformed," in Variety of American Evangelism, ed. D. W. Dayton and R. K. Johnston.

Cleanness, Uncleanness. Like other ancient Near Eastern civilizations ancient Israel had a concept that we call ceremonial or ritual cleanness (tāhōr) and uncleanness (tāmē). Therefore, the OT contains many laws describing what made one become unclean and the purification ritual necessary to return to the desirable status of being clean. These laws for cleanness concentrated on prohibited food (Lev. 11), bodily emissions (15), various kinds of skin disease (13), death (Num. 19:11–19), and places (Lev. 18:24–30). Purification rituals varied but included a waiting period (12:2–5), a cleansing agent such as water (15:5), blood (14:25), or fire (Num. 31:23), and a sacrifice or offering (Lev. 5:6).

Various explanations have been offered for these laws of cleanness and uncleanness. A summary of the more important ones follows.

The distinctions were hygienic. Unclean animals were unfit to eat because they were carriers of disease, while the clean animals were relatively safe to eat. Washing and purification have always been consistent with sound medical practice.

The distinctions were cultic. Unclean animals were closely associated with the negative religious practices of Israel's neighbors and therefore were to be shunned completely by ancient Israel.

The distinctions were symbolic. This is an anthropological approach developed by Mary Douglas (Purity and Danger). She suggests that systems of distinguishing cleanness and uncleanness were really ways of ordering the universe. Laws of cleanness symbolized wholeness and normality, while the laws of uncleanness symbolized chaos and disorder. Priests had to be free from physical deformity (Lev. 21:17–21); improper unions (Lev. 20:20) and mixtures (19:19) were prohibited. Clean animals conformed to a standard (pure) type, while unclean animals departed from this standard in one way or another (ch. 11).

Cleanness, Uncleanness

Each of these explanations has some value, but the symbolic interpretation is more comprehensive and has been gaining additional supporters.

Israel's approach to cleanness was also connected to Yahweh and his holiness. Priests were to distinguish between both the holy and profane and the clean and unclean (Lev. 10:10). While cleanness and holiness were not identical, cleanness was one important aspect of holiness, and priests were extensively involved in many purification rituals. So we may conclude that the laws of cleanness were indirect aids to remind the ancient Israelite of the purity and holiness of his God (11:44–45).

In the NT the ceremonial aspects of cleanness (katharos) and uncleanness (akathartēs) gave way to an emphasis on moral purity and impurity. Jesus stressed that it was not what went into a man that defiled him, but what came out of him (Matt. 15:1–20; Mark 7:1–23). Mark (7:19) added that Jesus declared all foods to be clean. However, this issue was not easily resolved in the early church. Unclean foods distinguished and divided Jews, including Christian Jews, from Gentiles (Acts 10 and 15). However, when Gentiles were incorporated into the church, the food laws lost their symbolic significance and were eventually dropped. Acts 15:9 indicates that both Jewish and Gentile believers were clean because of God's work of cleansing, not because of observing dietary laws. The book of Hebrews went on to show that the work of Christ made not only purification rituals but also other OT ceremonial practices unnecessary. Romans 14:14 sums up the NT position: "No food is unclean in itself. But if anyone regards something as unclean then for him it is unclean."

J. C. MOYER

Bibliography. J. Hartley, ISBE (rev.) 1:718–23; G. J. Wenham, Leviticus; "Theology of Unclean Food," EvQ 53:6–15.

Clement of Alexandria (ca. 150–ca. 215). Titus Flavius Clemens, Greek theologian and writer, was the first significant representative of the Alexandrian theological tradition. Born of pagan parents in Athens, Clement went to Alexandria, where he succeeded his teacher Pantaenus as head of the Catechetical School. In 202 persecution forced him to leave Alexandria, apparently never to return.

Of Clement's writings four are preserved complete: Protreptikos (an exhortation addressed to the Greeks urging their conversion); Paedagogos (a portrayal of Christ as tutor instructing the faithful in their conduct); Stromata (miscellaneous thoughts primarily concerning the relation of faith to philosophy); "Who Is the Rich Man That Is Saved?" (an exposition of Mark 10:17–31, arguing that wealth, if rightfully used, is not un-Christian). Of other writings only fragments remain, especially of the Hypotyposes, a commentary on the Scriptures.

Clement is important for his positive approach to philosophy that laid the foundations for Christian humanism and for the idea of philosophy as "handmaid" to theology. The idea of the Logos dominates his thinking. The divine Logos, creator of all things, guides all good men and causes all right thought. Greek philosophy was, therefore, a partial revelation and prepared the Greeks for Christ just as the law prepared the Hebrews. Christ is the Logos incarnate through whom man attains to perfection and true gnōsis (knowledge). Against the Gnostics, who disparaged faith, Clement considers faith the necessary first principle and foundation for knowledge, which itself is the perfection of faith. Man becomes a "true Gnostic" by love and contemplation. Through self-control and love man rids himself of passions, reaching finally the state of impassibility wherein he attains to the likeness of God. With this idea Clement profoundly influenced Greek Christian spirituality.

W. C. WEINRICH

See also ALEXANDRIAN THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. D. J. M. Bradley, "Transfiguration of the Stoic Ethic in Clement of Alexandria," Aug 14:41–66; J. Ferguson, "Achievement of Clement of Alexandria," RelS 12:59–80; W. E. G. Floyd, Clement of Alexandria's Treatment of the Problem of Evil; S. R. C. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria: A Study in Christian Platonism and Gnosticism; E. Molland, Conception of the Gospel in the Alexandrian Theology; E. F. Osborn, Philosophy of Clement of Alexandria; J. Quasten, Patrology; R. B. Tollington, Clement of Alexandria: A Study in Christian Liberalism.

Clement of Rome. See APOSTOLIC FATHERS.

Clergy. The word derives from the Greek klēros, "a lot," which points to a method of selection like that in Acts 1:26 (in Acts 1:17 "part" [KJV] translates klēros). As early as Jerome it was pointed out that the term is ambiguous. It may denote those chosen to be God's, the Lord's "lot" (as in Deut. 32:9), or it may signify those whose lot or portion is the Lord (cf. Ps. 16:5). In the NT the word is not used of a restricted group among the believers, and in 1 Peter 5:3 the plural is used of God's people as a whole ("God's heritage," KJV). But by the time of Tertullian it was used of the ordained office-bearers in the church, viz., bishops, priests, and deacons. Later the word came to include the minor orders, and sometimes, it seems, members of religious orders or even educated people generally. But this use did not last, and the term now denotes regular members of the ordained ministry of the church (without respect to denomination) as distinct from lay people generally.

L. L. MORRIS

Clergy, Secular. See SECULAR CLERGY.

Cloud of Unknowing, The (ca. 1370). Anonymous work of medieval spirituality and mysticism. It was written during the century of Julian of Norwich, Catherine of Siena, and Meister Eckhart. Its author remains a mystery and the text yields minimal clues as to his identity. He was only twenty-four years old when he wrote. The blessing conferred on his readers, in the final paragraph, may indicate that he was a priest. He wrote in the vernacular. It would appear that he kept his identity a secret in an attempt to direct the reader's attention to God rather than himself. The book represents the apophatic tradition of the via negativa, the "way of negation." The weaknesses of Cloud are those common to all apophatic literature. In seeking to underscore God's transcendence and inaccessibility, the immanence of God and his proximity is often neglected. The apophatic must always be balanced by the cataphatic or via affirmativa, the way of affirmation.

The author reminds his readers that since God is infinite and human beings are finite and fallen, any understanding of God in essence must be limited. The best theological formulations are mere approximations. God is too vast to be apprehended by human speculation. Thus the contemplative, in pursuit of God remains always in a "cloud of unknowing." Whatever has been learned of God in one moment, must be amended in the next, if an understanding of God is to be just, rendering him his due. Since the gifts of God, displayed in the world he has created, can become rivals for our affection and thereby distractions in the pursuit of God, the contemplative must put between himself and the world a "cloud of forgetting." On the surface it appears that the author is suggesting the contemplative should forget the material in pursuit of the higher spiritual good. He is certainly an ascetic; however it would be too strong a judgment to define him as a Gnostic. The "forgetting" is to be done at those places where the desire for earthly things distracts from the pursuit of God and "the cloud of unknowing." Mary, choosing to sit at the feet of Jesus, over Martha, who is distracted by many things, becomes the example of one who is experiencing the cloud of unknowing between her and God, and the cloud of forgetting between her and the world's distractions.

The contemplative life is guarded by humility, a knowledge of the soul and its operations, and the grace of God. Humility is discovered in two ways; first, in a growing awareness of oneself, for "whoever truly saw and felt himself as he is would truly be humble" (Cloud, 13). Second, it is also found in "the superabundant love and worth of God in himself: gazing on which all nature trembles, all scholars are fools, all saints and angels blind" (Cloud, 13). The soul is the higher than all else in the natural order; by it an individual moves to either virtue or vice. The process whereby the soul is guided in its pursuit of "the cloud of unknowing" is the grace of God.

Cloud of Unknowing has influenced many works in the apophatic tradition. C. S. Lewis called it the "most striking representative in English" of the "negative Theology" (Discarded Image, 70).
J. R. ROOT

Bibliography. Cloud of Unknowing and Other Works; W. R. Inge, Studies of English Mystics; W. Johnston, Mysticism of the Cloud of Unknowing; C. S. Lewis, Discarded Image; E. Underhill, Mystics of the Church.

Coadjutor Bishop. See BISHOP; CHURCH OFFICERS.

Cobb, John B., Jr. (b. 1925). American process theologian and clergyman of the United Methodist Church. Influenced by the thought of Alfred North Whitehead, Cobb sought to forge a new Christian natural theology based upon a process conception of the evolutionary transcendence of God. He argues that classical theism's understanding of a static divine transcendence and a hard and fast distinction between the divine and created realms is untenable in light of modern science. While God is logically prior to the world, he is immanently close to it such that God and the world are interdependent realities.

The scientific picture of an evolving universe converges with Christ's proclamation of the coming kingdom of God in a dynamic reality in which all things are "lured" beyond the dictates and givens of the past into an infinitely possible future. The source of this "teleological pull" is nothing less than God, whom Cobb refers to as "the One Who Calls." Rather than effecting his rule through coercion or decree, God relates to the world through persuasive and responsive love.

Cobb sought to reformulate Christology along process lines as well. He spoke of God's transcendent or "primordial" nature as the logos. As an incarnation of the logos, Christ is the embodiment of the primordial divine nature and thus is both the initial aim of all occasions of experience and the lure to creative transformation.

A prolific writer, Cobb has contributed to pastoral theology, political and ecological theology, feminist theology, economics, and religious pluralism. Born in Kobe, Japan, to missionary parents, he has been especially concerned to forge an interfaith dialogue between Christianity and Buddhism.

From an evangelical perspective, Cobb's theology is problematic at virtually every turn. The natural processes of history are associated with God's nature and redemptive intention, and thus sin and evil are underemphasized. Transcendence

Cobb, John B., Jr.

all but swallows up immanence, and an impersonal Christ-principle takes precedence over Jesus. M. WILLIAMS

See also PANENTHEISM; PROCESS THEOLOGY; WHITEHEAD, ALFRED NORTH.

Bibliography. J. B. Cobb, Christian Natural Theology; Structure of Christian Existence; Christ in a Pluralistic Age; Beyond Dialogue; Process Theology as Political Theology; G. J. Boelhower, Process Christology of John B. Cobb, Jr.; D. R. Griffin, HCT 691–709; D. R. Griffin and T. J. J. Altizer, eds., John Cobb's Theology in Process.

Cocceius, Johannes (1603–1669). Linguist and biblical theologian, Johann Koch (Latinized to Cocceius) was born in Bremen. In his inaugural at Bremen in 1630, where he was appointed professor of Oriental languages, Cocceius defended the science of biblical philology and indicated his aversion to scholastic theology and philosophy. Six years later he accepted a similar position at the University of Franeker, where he continued to develop his own system of grammatico-historical exegesis. After fourteen years there he was appointed professor of theology at Leiden, where he remained until his death.

Cocceius's views are set forth in his Doctrine of the Covenant and Testaments of God (1648) and in his Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (1655). Holding that Scripture should always be interpreted in context without foreign presuppositions, he opposed the prevailing Cartesian philosophical influences of his day and also the prevailing orthodoxy of the Reformed Church. In this latter he held, contrary to Voetius of Utrecht, who interpreted Scripture according to the conclusions of the Synod of Dort, that truth should be derived from Scripture itself, in the same manner as the Reformers had sought to understand it. Biblical subjects should be understood in biblical terms. Using a strict exegetical method, he developed a biblical theology in which he distinguished three different periods in the history of God's dealings with his people. In his relationship to mankind God established a covenant of works with Adam. This was supplanted by a covenant of grace made with Moses in which there were three periods—before, during, and after Moses' time. The new covenant is given in Jesus Christ. Using allegorical exegesis Cocceius found prophetic types of Christ throughout the OT and was accused of fanciful exegesis by his opponents. With a proper understanding of the "hidden sense of Scripture," Cocceius held, one could discover the seven periods of the history of the church.

Cocceius's distinction between the forgiveness of sins in the OT, which was imperfect and incomplete and which prevented God's people from having the assurance and blessing that Christians possess, and the forgiveness enjoyed after the event of the cross aroused opposition by those who felt that he was engaged in a dangerous historicizing of Scripture. Moreover, his belief that the Sabbath was instituted in the desert, not in the Garden of Eden, and that it is not binding on Christians got him into difficulty. Although famous as a covenantal theologian, his covenantal theology was not new; it is found in Olevianus, Bullinger, and others. The theological conflict begun in his lifetime was continued by his disciples and their opponents for a half century after his death. M. E. OSTERHAVEN

See also COVENANT THEOLOGY; FEDERAL THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. P. A. Lillback, NDT 173–76; C. S. McCoy, "Johannes Cocceius: Federal Theologian," SJT 16:352–70.

Cohabitation. The situation of those who live together in a sexual relationship without being married. While cohabitation represents only a very small percentage of American households, it has rapidly increased in recent decades especially among younger Americans. Estimates are that for around ten percent of Americans in their twenties cohabitation is a reality. Recent data also shows an increase in the percentage of those who choose never to wed. If this same rate of increase continues, by the year 2012 nearly one half of all families in the United States would include unmarried people living together. Already in 1982 25 percent of students on college campuses reported that they had lived with someone of the opposite sex. Cohabitation covers a wide variety of relationships from temporary casual arrangements of convenience to more committed lifelong substitutes for marriage. "About 38 percent of women 15–44 years of age had never been married when interviewed. The percent never married was higher in every age group in 1995 than it was in 1982. About half of women 25–39 years of age have had an unmarried cohabitation with a man at some time in their lives; 10 to 11 percent of women in their twenties are currently cohabiting with a man. About 30 percent of women 25–39 years of age lived with a man before their first marriage. 57 percent of all first cohabitations among women 15–44 resulted in marriage, about one-third of the cohabitations dissolved, and about 10 percent were still intact at time of interview."

Some people believe that the rising incidence of cohabitation is due primarily to a general breakdown in personal morality. Others see an assortment of broader social forces contributing to its upswing. Changing sexual values and patterns, an emphasis upon individual human growth, the liberalization of living arrangements on college campuses, the phenomenon of extended adolescence and later marriage, more effective contraception, and the high cost of housing are all factors that encourage cohabitation. Moreover, tax and social security laws tend to discourage some couples from marrying.

Most Christians stand firmly against cohabitation and are more than slightly alarmed by its increasing frequency and almost routine social acceptance. The moral problem of unwed people living together is grounded in the historical Christian belief that sexual activity outside marriage is an offense against God's law and a disservice to one's partner. Nevertheless, many people who cohabit claim to hold positive views of marriage. They justify their action by asserting that love is the key ingredient of their relationship and that a marriage license would contribute scarcely anything to that love. While Christians have usually insisted that sexual activity must be nurtured by love, they have also maintained that its most sublime meaning is achieved when it is linked to marriage. This view has emerged from the belief in God's extraordinary activity in creation and consequent unique alliance with humans. When the world was commanded into being, God determined that human relationships would be guided by structured obligations so that the world might not revert to an enslaving social chaos (Gen. 2:15–25).

Throughout the Scriptures, God's relation to humans is described in covenantal terms with recognizable concrete stipulations. Human life is placed upon a moral footing and is fulfilled by the faithful exercise of stated responsibilities. Relationships between humans are likewise depicted as covenantal, with mutual responsibilities arising from contractual commitments. These human covenants acquire their power and durability from their origin in God's covenant-making activity (1 Sam. 20:8–23). One corollary of this suggests that God created the state and its legal authority to provide the means whereby these human covenants might be fulfilled (Rom. 13:1–7). Marriage is one of the more significant legal covenants which God has provided. Thus, the claim is only partially true that human ties are made in heaven apart from the concrete legal arrangements. Rather they are also made on earth, as affirmed by a theology that describes God as Creator of both heaven and earth.

The God-ordained provision of a marriage contract does not diminish the element of love in a couple's relationship, as is often implied by cohabitators. On the contrary, the Bible portrays the concept of love itself in covenantal terms. Thus, one of the Hebrew words for love (hesed) is often translated "loyal love" or "steadfast love," and is occasionally found in the idiom "covenant and steadfast love" (Deut. 7:9; Neh. 1:5; 9:32). Rather than stifling a couple's relationship, this type of covenantal love actually liberates it. At its highest point marriage provides mutual emancipation within the boundaries of certain expectations, responsibilities, and loyalties; i.e., marriage permits the most mature expression of love to develop. Cohabitation, on the other hand, permits mutual exploitation within the context of potential flight.

God's original command in creation was that male and female "cleave" to one another in covenantal partnership, or marriage (Gen. 2:24 KJV). This bond bestowed meaning upon their sexual activity as expressed by the phrase "one flesh" (Gen. 2:24). It highlights the complete interchange of the two selves, as in the bride's delightful declaration in the Song of Solomon, "My lover is mine and I am his" (2:16). Sexual experience, as a pleasurable expression of a couple's bond, is the recurring sign of their mutual self-giving, and this includes the physical, moral/spiritual, and legal dimensions. In the NT Paul infuses meaning to sexual experience within marriage by deriving it from the "hidden truth" of Christ's total love for his bride, the church, and the church's resulting loyal love to him (Eph. 5:32).

A link exists between these biblical traditions and subsequent cultural expressions of love, sex, and marriage. Thus, in the West it is nearly impossible to escape the layers of moral and legal implications that underlie these activities. At its deepest level sexual pleasure is a presentation of the self to the other in a way that culturally symbolizes mutual commitment and bonding. Marriage affirms this by specifying and guarding certain expectations and responsibilities. This does not happen, however, in cohabitation. Thus far, all research has shown that, on the whole, cohabiting couples evidence less commitment than those who marry. Cohabitation is a form of social interaction which may communicate that a couple might be important to each other, but they are not so important that they wish to leap into a relationship of ultimacy and permanence. In cohabitation sexual expression is a structurally false symbol of a totally committed relationship.

Many Christians believe that the church should respond to cohabitation by neither condoning nor condemning the people who practice it. Rather it should oppose those questionable social forces that tend to encourage and even subsidize it. In this view parents, relatives, friends, and the church are urged to continue a gospel ministry of care to those who live together outside of marriage, helping the couple to deal with their own individual circumstances, while addressing the broader social trends that tend to perpetuate this lifestyle.

D. J. MILLER

See also MARRIAGE, THEOLOGY OF.

Bibliography. E. Achtemeier, Committed Marriage; P. Bertocci, Sex, Love, and the Person; E. Macklin, "Review of Research on Non-marital Cohabitation in the United States," in Exploring Intimate Life Styles,

Cohabitation

B. Murstein, ed.; W. H. Masters and V. Johnson, Pleasure Bond: A New Look at Sexuality and Commitment; P. Ramsey, Deeds and Rules in Christian Ethics; L. Smedes, Sex for Christians; H. Thielicke, Ethics of Sex; E. Wheat and G. Wheat, Intended for Pleasure.

Coke, Thomas (1747–1814). Probably the most important figure in the spread of worldwide Methodism in the generation following the death of John Wesley. Born in Brecon, Wales, he graduated from Jesus College, Oxford, in 1768, and was ordained an Anglican priest in 1772. While serving as a curate at South Petherton in Somerset, he gradually adopted Methodistic enthusiasm, open air meetings, and cottage services. These led to his dismissal, after which he formally joined the Methodists in 1777 and moved to London to become Wesley's assistant during the latter's declining years.

Following an appeal from American Methodists for ordained clergy to administer the sacraments, Wesley sent an organizational team headed by Coke as superintendent to the United States in 1784. Coke found Francis Asbury, the only English Methodist missionary to remain in America during the Revolution, well in control of American Methodism, and he largely accepted Asbury's natural authority. During the next two decades Coke made eight return visits.

Coke's contribution to Methodism was less that of innovator than that of zealous promoter and organizer. As a widely traveled preacher he skillfully and effectively presented Wesley's ideas, appealing to the hearts rather than the heads of his listeners. While he did not claim significance as a writer, he did produce a Bible commentary, a journal of his first five trips to America, and a history of the West Indies. His greatest contribution was that of promoter of Methodist missions from England and America to Ireland, Africa, the West Indies, and elsewhere during the formative period of Methodist missionary expansion.

W. C. RINGENBERG

See also METHODISM.

Bibliography. T. Coke, Commentary on the Bible; History of the West Indies; Journals; Plan of the Society for the Establishment of Missions among the Heathen; W. A. Candler, Life of Thomas Coke; C. J. Davey, Mad about Mission: The Story of Dr. Thomas Coke; J. A. Vickers, Thomas Coke: Apostle of Methodism.

Collegialism. The teaching that church and state are collegia, voluntary associations or societies created by the will of the members to unite together. Each society is independent of the other in its aims and purposes. Thus the civil authority (king or magistrate) cannot interfere in the life of the church. Such teaching has its origin in the natural rights theories of Hugo Grotius and S. Pufendorf, but the actual word itself was probably coined by J. H. Boehmer of Halle (d. 1745). Collegialism normally presupposes one major church in each territory and is to be distinguished from both territorialism and Erastianism.

P. TOON

See also ERASTIANISM; TERRITORIALISM.

Comforter. See HOLY SPIRIT.

Command, Commandment. See LAW, BIBLICAL CONCEPT OF.

Commandment, The New. Although the law of Moses contained an abundance of commandments from God for Israel, it was everywhere understood that the supreme commandment was to love God, with the result that the Shema (Num. 15:37–41; Deut. 6:4–9; 11:13–21) was recited daily and posted on the doorpost of every home. A second command like it in importance was to love one's neighbor as oneself (Matt. 22:39), as required in Leviticus 19:18. Jesus considered this second command to be of equal importance to the love of God and said, "There is no other greater commandment than these" (Mark 12:31). But the same law demanded that one love not only his neighbor but also the stranger who lived with him (Lev. 19:34), and that he love them both as he loved himself (Lev. 19:18, 34). So when Jesus said he was giving his disciples a new commandment to love one another, he was undoubtedly referring to this requirement of the law but with an even deeper meaning, which was to love as he had loved them (John 13:34). Years later John thus wrote that the commandment was both old and new (1 John 2:7–8; 2 John 5). Love, as understood in the Western world, is an emotion which cannot be commanded, but in the Semitic world of the Bible it was rather a matter of volition and included the keeping of God's commandments (John 14:15; 1 John 2:3–4). In the final analysis, love is the mark of discipleship (John 13:35).

J. R. McRAY

Bibliography. C. Brown, NIDNTT 2:538–51; J. Moffatt, Love in the New Testament; G. Quell and E. Stauffer, TDNT 1:21–55.

Commission, Great. See GREAT COMMISSION.

Common Grace. See GRACE.

Common Order, Book of. See BOOK OF COMMON ORDER.

Common Prayer, Book of. See BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER.

Communication of Attributes, Communicatio Idiomatum. The communication of attributes means that whatever can be attributed to (said about) either the divine or the human nature in Christ is to be attributed to the entire person. Whatever is true of either nature is true of the person. This is only a detailed discussion of the fact that Jesus Christ is one person, not two. It does not add to the statement that the God-man is one person.

Orthodox theologians have always taught that Jesus Christ is both true God and true man, yet only one person. This truth was rejected by Nestorianism but affirmed by the Councils of Ephesus (431) and Chalcedon (451). To deny that Christ is one person is to deny the incarnation (John 1:14).

In several respects Lutheran and Reformed theologians have disagreed about the communication of attributes since the Reformation. Because this doctrine is more characteristic of Lutheran than Reformed theology, it will be presented here in the categories common among Lutherans. Some Reformed disagreements will be noted.

Genus Idiomaticum (Category of Attributes). The properties of each nature are ascribed to the person, using any of his names or titles. For example, the Lord of glory was crucified (1 Cor. 2:8). This is no word game. It is a reality according to the Bible.

Genus Maiestaticum (Category of Majesty). The divine attributes are communicated (given) to Christ's human nature. Christ received according to his human nature the omnipotence, omniscience, and omnipresence which he as true God always possessed (Matt. 11:27; 28:18–20; John 3:34–35; Col. 1:19). The divine nature does not receive human limitations because God cannot change. Reformed theologians claim that Christ's human nature received only finite gifts, not divine attributes.

Genus Apotelesmaticum (Category of Works). What Christ did for our salvation he did as the God-man. All his works for us are his works as God and man (Gal. 4:4; Heb. 2:14–15; 1 John 3:8). Reformed theologians have tended to designate Christ's acts as the acts of one nature or the other.

J. M. DRICKAMER

See also CHALCEDON, COUNCIL OF; CHEMNITZ, MARTIN; CHRISTOLOGY; EPHESUS, COUNCIL OF; LUTHERAN TRADITION.

Bibliography. L. Berkhof, Systematic Theology; M. Chemnitz, Two Natures in Christ; F. Pieper, Christian Dogmatics.

Communicatio Operationum. The communicatio of operations. The concept used by both Lutheran and Reformed theologians of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries to refer to the common work of the two natures of Christ in the work of salvation. It indicates that the "mediatorial work of Christ" (the apotelesmata) is common to both natures, and that the action and operation of each nature by which the work is carried out is according to its own attributes. Inasmuch as the distinct acts of the two natures concur and unite in one and the same person, the work forms an undivided unity, bearing a divine-human character, accomplished "in, with, and through" both natures. Because of the strength of the union of the two natures of Christ, "what Christ is or does according to the divine nature the whole Christ is said to be or do; and . . . what he is and does or has suffered according to the human nature the whole Christ, the Son of God, God, is said . . . to be, to do or to have suffered." Unlike the Lutherans, who viewed the shared operations of the natures as resulting directly from the communicatio idiomatum, the Reformed understood it as a separate work (communicatio apotelesmatum) by which the "distinct operations of both natures are brought to completion in the one work" of the divine-human Christ.

C. W. MITCHELL

See also CHRISTOLOGY; COMMUNICATION OF ATTRIBUTES, COMMUNICATIO IDIOMATUM.

Bibliography. Martin Chemnitz, Formula of Concord; On the Two Natures of Christ.

Communion, Holy. See LORD'S SUPPER.

Communion of Saints. For many centuries believers have affirmed in the Apostles' Creed their faith in "the communion of saints." The phrase is probably the latest addition to the creed, not being attested before the fifth century. It is absent from all the Eastern creeds.

This affirmation of belief has been interpreted in various ways. The traditional, and probably the best, interpretation refers the phrase to the union of all believers, living or dead, in Christ, stressing their common life in Christ and their sharing of all the blessings of God. Some medieval interpreters, including Thomas Aquinas, read the phrase as "the communion in holy things" (a reading which the Latin text allows), referring it to the sacraments, especially the Eucharist. Others, such as Karl Barth, have chosen a mixture of these views. As a rule the Reformers and the Reformed confessions follow the traditional interpretation, sometimes limiting the idea to living believers.

It has been common for Catholic and Anglo-Catholic interpreters to use this article of the creed as justification for the practice of prayers for the dead. Since such prayers do not seem to have biblical sanction, this inference is unacceptable.

Communion of Saints

To the traditional view, that the phrase refers to the existing unity of all believers in Christ and their common sharing of his grace, must be added a more modern emphasis on the need for this unity to be actualized in the church. Believing in the communion of saints is more than affirming an existing unity, since it calls the church to fellowship, to mutuality, and to the sharing of "all good gifts" received from God. F. Q. GOUVEA

See also APOSTLES' CREED; FELLOWSHIP; INVOCATION OF THE SAINTS; PRAYERS FOR THE DEAD; VENERATION OF SAINTS.

Bibliography. F. J. Badcock, JTS 21:106-26; K. Barth, Dogmatics in Outline; S. Benko, Meaning of Sanctorum Communis; D. Bonhoeffer, Communion of Saints; L. Cunningham, Meaning of Saints; R. M. Green, Religion and Moral Reason: A New Method; J. P. Kirsch, Doctrine of the Communion of Saints in Christian Antiquity; J. Köstlin, SHERK 3:181-82; J. Pearson, Exposition of the Creed; H. B. Swete, Holy Catholic Church: The Communion of Saints.

Communitarianism, Community of Goods. In the early Christian church Christian life centered on worship. In the wake of Pentecost a desire to worship God appears to have led to a spontaneous sharing of goods in the church of Jerusalem (Acts 2:42-47; 4:32-37). In the Acts of the Apostles this sharing of goods was interpreted as a manifestation of the work of the Holy Spirit (5:3). Throughout the NT writings the welfare of other Christians is of constant concern. Hospitality and aid are continually advocated (1 Cor. 16).

The idealism and communitarianism of the early church has served as an example throughout church history which various individuals and movements have sought to emulate. At different times the appeal of "having all things in common" has led to different syntheses of Christian thought with the prevailing philosophical ethos. Thus Jewish apocalyptic thought has often provided a motive for Christians to share their worldly goods as they awaited the end of the world. Similarly, certain forms of Greek philosophy have led Christians to scorn material pleasures and to organize movements that were stoic in their simplicity. Hermits, ascetics, and monastic orders have all sought to renounce private property and live in accordance with the demands of poverty. Within the Roman Catholic Church the monastic life has always been the ideal to which the layman was expected to aspire. The great example of such spiritual poverty in the Middle Ages was the Franciscans. But they and groups inspired by them, such as the lay Brethren of the Common Life, never developed consistent economic theories. Rather, they were united in a devotion to apostolic poverty as an ideal.

Both Wycliffe and Hus, forerunners of Luther, espoused theories of society which today we would call socialist. However, due to the persecution of their followers no society was developed based upon their theories.

During the Reformation some religious groups developed socialist views. These include the Anabaptist Hutterites, who followed Jacob Hutter, a Reformer who was burned at the stake in 1536, and the Calvinist Levelers of Cromwell's England.

In American religious history communal groups have played an important role. These include the Shakers, who followed the teachings of Mother Ann Lee (1736-84), and the perfectionist Oneida Community of John Humphrey Noyes (1811-86). Although heretical in terms of traditional Christian theology, both these groups had considerable social impact upon American society. The Shakers are credited with inventing the washing machine, while the Oneida Community developed silver plating and became an important industrial enterprise.

During the nineteenth century the theology of F. D. Maurice played an important role in legitimating and promoting Christian socialism. In the twentieth century William Temple is an outstanding example of the British Christian socialist tradition. Ecclesiastically the work of Maurice helped inspire such High Church Anglican groups as the Community of the Resurrection, which was founded with the encouragement of Charles Gore in 1892.

Christian socialism has also had a considerable impact in North America, where it appears to have been inspired by both the liberal theology of Horace Bushnell and the evangelical revivalism of Charles Finney. In the United States, Christian socialism became associated with liberal theology and the social gospel movement in the early part of the twentieth century and has been largely rejected by evangelical Christians. Only in the mid-1970s, after several decades of staunch conservatism, did young evangelicals once more begin to examine the socialist heritage of certain forms of evangelical thought. In Canada the Christian socialist heritage has been relatively more successful, and its influence can be seen in the formation of both the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation (CCF), the forerunner of the present New Democratic Party (NDP), and the Social Credit movement of William Aberhart.

Today most North American Christians reject socialism in favor of some form of free enterprise capitalism. However, a significant minority of younger evangelicals in Europe, North America, and the Third World are reexamining and advocating some form of Christian socialism and communalism. With the break-up of the Soviet Union and the collapse of communism, however, this is quickly losing its appeal. I. HEXHAM

See also MONASTICISM; SOCIALISM, CHRISTIAN; UTOPIANISM.

Bibliography. D. Clark, Basic Communities: Towards an Alternative Society; D. Hayden, Seven American Utopias; R. Quebedeaux, Worldly Evangelicals; R. Sider, Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger; B. Zablocki, Joyful Community.

Comparative Religion. Comparative religion is the term used of disparate approaches offered in the last 150 years by Euro-Americans scholars to understand religion. It is not unified in its understanding of the object of its study, namely "religion," in the method or rules by which it makes comparisons, nor in the conclusions it offers. The study of comparative religion has been conducted primarily in the university, where increasingly it has replaced the theological inquiry which dominated the study of religion in the West up until about 1900.

Modern comparative religion had its beginnings in the middle of the nineteenth century in the work of Europeans Max Muller and Edward Burnett Tylor. They studied archaic societies and "primitives" to discover the cause and origin of religion itself. Muller sought to place the study of religion on a scientific basis by determining the nature of religion, the laws it follows, and the history of its growth. Like some scholars today, Muller assumed that religion is a genus of which the separate religions are species.

Edward Burnett Tylor's study of tribal societies led him to define religion as "a belief in spiritual beings," which resulted in coining the word "animism." Tylor theorized that primitives reasoned their way to the concept of spirit beings from their experience in dreams, visions, and trances. If a recently deceased chief appeared in a dream, he must, therefore, enjoy post-mortem existence. Thus "religion" was born. Tylor's focus on the origin of religion remained a preoccupation of scholars into the twentieth century. Interestingly, his definition of "religion" survived even though his critics were correct to point out that there was not one shred of evidence that belief in spirit beings originated in this way. Nor can animism be considered the earliest belief, since many primitives also held to a belief in the existence of a high god.

Sociologist Emile Durkheim (1858-1917) continued the debate about the origin of religion by theorizing that primitives gained their sense of a transcendent reality not from mistaken ideas based on dreams but from real experience in social gatherings. Hunters and gatherers came together periodically after extended periods of isolation in the bush. The emotional rush they experienced in mass gatherings presented a reality to them which they mistakenly identified as a spirit being but in fact was none other than "society" itself. God was reducible to "society." Durkheim was thus credited with providing a "realist" interpretation of religion that offset the illusionist view of religion offered by his contemporary Sigmund Freud.

Durkheim's more enduring contributions to comparative religion were twofold. First, he introduced the notion of how religion functions in society, which became a dominant explanatory theme among sociologists and anthropologists. He also proposed that religious belief had to do with the "sacred," while nonreligious belief had to do with the "profane." Subsequently, many scholars turned their attention to seek the "essence" of the "sacred." Phenomenologists such as W. Bede Kristensen found the essence not by comparing religions as wholes but by extracting from them "similar facts and phenomena," which were assembled and studied in groups. In this way, religious phenomena from the various traditions were classified and compared. Examples of operative categories are sacrifice, prayer, ritual purification, oracle, and kingship. Scholars today decline, as a whole, to place much weight on this approach, because its categories are arbitrary and it tends to remove a particular belief or practice from the religious system of which it is a part and apart from which it loses its meaning.

In the second half of the twentieth century "comparative religion" came more and more to be linked with historical and descriptive principles and less dominated by a priori evolutionary assumptions. Some scholars began to think more carefully about the limits and contribution of description and how this was related to but different from intuitive and normative or theological approaches. Nevertheless, the scholarly conclusions of comparative religion as a whole often conflicted due to underlying methods combining or confusing historical and metaphysical issues.

A dominant figure was Mircea Eliade, whose writings and students at the University of Chicago popularized an approach that has been called both phenomenology and history of religion. Eliade's view was that all religions participate in and reflect symbols that are universal in time and place: eggs, trees, water, moon, sun, stars. His voluminous writings culled fascinating material from the religious world past and present to show that every religion had symbols that were "hierophanies" or manifestations of the "sacred." Eliade's works attracted great public attention, but increasingly scholars found it difficult to accept that sacred structures could be legitimated on historical grounds, as he seemed to claim.

As the twentieth century progressed, a new reality and a new direction for comparative religion was proposed. Globalism brought believers of the world's religions into direct contact with each other, requiring greater understanding and providing increased opportunity for scholarly learning.

Comparative Religion

A second reality was the growing realization that religion was not an academic abstraction but a living personal experience. In his pioneering work, "The Meaning and End of Religion" (1962), Wilfred Cantwell Smith examined the history of the Western academic tradition's use of the word "religion" and urged that the sterile word "religion" be replaced by the term "faith." As religion was only a scholarly construct, it failed to provide the heuristic means to get at people's real experiences with the transcendent. Smith's "personalism" insisted that what should be important to scholars is what individuals and communities of individuals feel and experience. Statements about such topics as doctrines, rituals, prayers, and sacrifices had meaning but only as they reflected the faith of real people. Smith also argued that terms such as "Hinduism" and "Buddhism" be avoided since they implied a homogeneous and unified faith that was neither true to the religious past nor consistent with the contemporary diversity found in these communities. When one studies Hindus or Buddhists of the past or present, it is apparent they often differ between themselves and that these communities change significantly over time. Smith's emphasis on the meaning of religion for the person led him to argue that scholarly statements, to be valid, must be recognized as intelligible by the believers of that religion.

Moving further in this direction, historian of religion Robert Baird called religious scholars to examine more closely their definition of "religion." In his "Category Formation and the History of Religion" (1972) he retains the word "religion" but avoids the "essentialist" understandings of the past by proposing a functional definition of religion as "that which is of supreme or ultimate importance to an individual or group." This provides scholars with a question that can be used to study individuals, communities, and diachronic religious data, and enable comparisons to be made between religions and between religions and their subtraditions. Comparative religion, in this approach, opens understanding to what individuals and communities value, what are their chief aims or goals, and what religious means are proposed to achieve religious ends. The application of this method demonstrates that on the descriptive level, religions are usually much more different than alike, and frequently modified over time, and it uncovers what is supremely valued.

Other scholars, however, continue to be fascinated by what they see as transreligious uniformities and common symbols. Eliade's phenomenology, Joseph Campbell's televised studies of world myths and art, and Huston Smith's focus on a nondescript transcendent have informed and fascinated the English-speaking public like never before. These perpetuate, to some considerable extent, the same message that underlay the earliest attempts at comparative religion, namely, that there is a common religious reality lying behind the diversity of religious experience. The possibility of illusory, false, imagined, or demonic entities is not entertained.

The future of the discipline of comparative religion is bright. Much to the surprise of secular social engineers and intellectuals, religion remains a major force in human culture and is enjoying something of a revival worldwide. The demise of atheistic Marxism, the expansion of evangelical and Pentecostal Christianity, and the renewal of Islam has had much to do with this. The most recent trend in comparative religion is the search for ways to promote peaceful coexistence between religious communities which inhabit tight quarters and dwell on common ground.

J. F. LEWIS

Bibliography. M. J. Adler, Truth in Religion: The Plurality of Religions and the Unity of Truth; R. D. Baird, Category Formation and the History of Religion; "Postscript: Methodology, Theory and Explanation in the Study of Religion," in Methodological Issues in Religious Studies, ed. R. D. Baird; U. Bianchi, "History of Religions," in ER 6:339-408; E. Durkheim, Elementary Forms of the Religious Life; M. Eliade, Patterns in Comparative Religion: A Study in the Element of the Sacred in the History of Religious Phenomena; M. Eliade and J. M. Kitagawa, History of Religions: Essays in Methodology; E. E. Evans-Pritchard, Theories of Primitive Religion; H. Kraemer, Religion and the Christian Faith; J. F. Lewis and W. G. Travis, Religious Traditions of the World; D. L. Pals, Seven Theories of Religion; H. Penner, "Is Phenomenology a Method for the Study of Religion?" in Bucknell Review 18 3:29-54; E. Sharpe, Comparative Religion: A History; N. Smart, Science of Religion and the Sociology of Knowledge and Worldviews: Crosscultural Explorations of Human Beliefs; H. Smith, Religions of Man; J. Z. Smith, Imagining Religion: From Babylon to Jonestown; W. C. Smith, Meaning and End of Religion; "Religion as Symbolism," in New Encyclopedia Britannica Propaedia, 498-500; J. Waardenburg, Classical Approaches to the Study of Religion.

Conciliarism. A reform movement in the Western church of the fifteenth century arising from the Great Schism (1378-1417), during which first two and then three popes contended for the loyalty of Christendom. Such a scandalous situation effectively weakened the papacy as an institution, and led thinkers such as Jean Gerson, Pierre d'Ailly, and Francesco Zarabella to affirm, following William of Ockham and others, that though God had indeed given the church final authority in matters of faith and morals, this authority was vested, not in the pope, but in the church as a whole, and that it should thus be exercised by a general council. These ideas led to the conciliarist movement, which reached the peak of its influence in the Council of Constance (1414–18). This council not only ended the schism by deposing all three popes, but also affirmed the authority of general councils over the pope. These decrees, which would have completely changed the authority structure of the church, were accepted at that critical moment. But they began to be disregarded as soon as another pope was elected and were finally overturned by Pius II in his bull Execrabilis in 1460. This marked the end of conciliarism as a movement, though its ideas remained influential for some time.

From a Protestant point of view conciliarism, though a step in the right direction in its rejection of papal authority, was not sufficiently radical; it failed to see that, while the church does have authority (Matt. 16:19; 18:18), this is a relative authority, since it is controlled and limited by the inspired Word of God.

F. Q. GOUVEA

See also CHURCH, AUTHORITY IN THE; PAPACY.

Bibliography. H. Bettenson, Documents of the Christian Church; G. Holmes, Europe: Hierarchy and Revolt 1320–1450; F. Oakley, Natural Law, Conciliarism and Consent in the Late Middle Ages; G. H. W. Parker, Morning Star; W. Ullman, Short History of the Papacy in the Middle Ages; W. Walker, History of the Christian Church.

Concomitance. This is a technical term used in the eucharistic theology of Roman Catholicism to describe the presence of both the body and blood of Christ in each of the species of bread and wine, and thus to afford a theological justification for the denial of the cup to the laity. More widely, it denotes the presence of the whole Christ, i.e., his human soul and Godhead, together with the body and blood in virtue of the hypostatic union. It is sometimes linked with grace to describe the divine operation which accompanies human actions as distinct from the preventent grace which precedes.

G. W. BROMILEY

See also LORD'S SUPPER, VIEWS OF; REAL PRESENCE.

Concord, Book of (1580). Sometimes called Confessions of the Evangelical Lutheran Church (German) or Concordia (Latin), this contains all the generally accepted symbols of the Lutheran Church. The Book of Concord comprises the following creeds and confessions: (1) the Apostles' Creed (ca. 186); (2) the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed (381); (3) the Athanasian Creed (ca. 350–600); (4) Luther's Large and Small Catechisms (1529); (5) the Augsburg Confession, written by Melanchthon and submitted by the elector of Saxony and other Lutheran princes at Augsburg in 1530; (6) the Apology of the Augsburg Confession (1531), written by Melanchthon against the Roman confutation which had rejected the Augsburg Confession; (7) the Smalcald Articles (1537), written by Luther and summarizing the Protestant understanding of the major articles of faith for a church council that was never called; (8) the Treatise on the Power and Primacy of the Pope (1537), written by Melanchthon to augment the Smalcald Articles; and (9) the Formula of Concord (1577), written to settle a number of disputes arising among Lutherans after Luther's death.

The Book of Concord was subscribed by over eight thousand pastors and by numerous territories and imperial cities of Germany. It was accepted in Sweden and Hungary, but only the confessions before 1531 were accepted officially in Denmark-Norway (although the later confessions were never rejected). Since 1580 most Lutheran pastors throughout the world have subscribed at their ordination to the Book of Concord. None of the Book of Concord is confined to any national church, but all the confessions are considered ecumenical, i.e., orthodox and biblical and to be accepted by any Christian. All attempts since 1580 to add confessions to the Book of Concord have failed, although it has never been considered a sort of "closed canon."

R. D. PREUS

See also CONCORD, FORMULA OF.

Bibliography. F. Bente, Historical Introductions to the Book of Concord; H. Fagerberg, New Look at the Lutheran Confessions (1529–1537); R. Preus, Getting into the Theology of Concord; D. Scaer, Getting into the Story of Concord; E. Schlink, Theology of the Lutheran Confessions.

Concord, Formula of (1577). The last symbol, or confession, representing the doctrinal position of the Evangelical Lutheran Church. It was completed in 1577 and was published in the Book of Concord in 1578. It culminated some thirty years of arduous theological study and labor expended by hundreds of faithful Lutheran theologians as they sought to settle a number of doctrinal controversies which beset Lutheranism after Luther's death. Upon his death Lutheranism quickly fell into two parties. The Philippists (sometimes called Synergists or Crypto-Calvinists) followed the more mediating spirit of Philip Melanchthon as he veered toward a synergistic doctrine of conversion and a weakening of total depravity and as he formulated a doctrine of the Lord's Supper which, although Lutheran, was couched in terminology acceptable to the Reformed. Opposing the Philippists were the Gnesio (authentic) Lutherans who pointed out the deviations of Melanchthon and his followers, particularly condemning Melanchthon for accepting the Leipzig Interim, a compromise and evangelical politico-theological statement of faith and practice imposed by Emperor Charles V on the Lutherans in the German Empire after their defeat in the Smalcald War (1547).

Concord, Formula of

When the two parties could not settle their controversies, a third large group of younger theologians arose to heal the division. Chief among these were James Andreae, who spearheaded the effort toward concord, Martin Chemnitz, David Chytraeus, and Nikolaus Selnecker. These men, who had been students of Melancthon and respected him highly, were also firmly committed to Luther's theology on the points at issue. They represented the best scholarship and most respected leadership among the Lutherans of the day. After almost thirty years of doctrinal discussion throughout Germany and many abortive attempts to construct doctrinal statements that would unite Lutherans again in the theology of Luther and the earlier Lutheran confessions, the Formula of Concord was written in 1577. The document, together with an Epitome written by Andreae, was submitted to the Lutheran pastors, churches, and princes and subscribed by thirty-five imperial cities, the electors of Saxony, Brandenburg, and the Palatinate, and about eight thousand pastors.

The Formula of Concord deals with the following articles of faith: (1) original sin (affirming total depravity); (2) bondage of the will (affirming monergism in conversion and salvation by grace alone); (3) justification (stressing the forensic nature of justification); (4) good works; (5) the distinction between law and gospel; (6) the third use of the law (i.e., the necessity of preaching law in the Christian community); (7) the Lord's Supper (confessing the Lutheran doctrine of the sacramental union and the real presence); (8) the person of Christ (emphasizing the communication of attributes of the two natures); (9) the descent into hell (Christ's actual descent and victory over the forces of evil); (10) adiaphora; (11) predestination (to salvation by grace for Christ's sake, but not to hell); (12) various heresies (Anabaptism, Schwenckfeldianism, Neo-Arianism, etc.).

R. D. PREUS

See also CONCORD, BOOK OF.

Bibliography. E. F. Klug, Getting into the Formula of Concord; R. D. Preus and W. H. Rosin, eds., Contemporary Look at the Formula of Concord; E. Schlink, Theology of the Lutheran Confessions.

Concursus. Concurrence (concursum divinum) is the term used to denote the relationship between the divine activity and that of finite creatures within God's providential control of the world. Scripture frequently speaks about the absolute sovereignty of God; it also emphasizes the reality of human decision and responsibility. The cooperation between the divine and human wills was treated by Augustine in his anti-Pelagian writings, but the doctrine of concurrence was not worked out until later. In the schoolmen, particularly Aquinas (Contra Gentiles 3:66–67; Summa Theologica i.q.105), the doctrine is elaborated with heavy reliance on philosophical terminology. Later debate was over the question whether God acts mediately or immediately, i.e., through the gifts which he has bestowed on creatures, such as intelligence and will, or more directly in influencing their actions. Whereas Lutheran theologians have shown sympathy with the treatment of the subject, Reformed theology in general has rejected the doctrine of concurrence as introducing into theological discussion philosophical notions about causation that are foreign to the Bible and considers the doctrine of providence under the topics of preservation and government.

M. E. OSTERHAVEN

Bibliography. G. C. Berkouwer, Providence of God.

Condemnation. See JUDGMENT.

Conditional Immortality. The doctrine that immortality was not a natural endowment of man at creation but is a gift from God to the redeemed who believe in Christ. Those who do not receive Christ ultimately lose all consciousness or existence. It is related to annihilationism, which teaches that all men were created immortal but that those who do not repent and believe in Christ will, by a positive act of God, be deprived of immortality and reduced to nonexistence at death.

Some of the early church fathers made statements which could be taken to support conditional immortality. Thus Irenaeus argued that free but mortal man must be obedient to God in order to become immortal. Disobedience brings death, but obedience results in immortality (Against Heresies 4.38.3; 5.23.1). This teaching enjoyed some degree of popularity in the nineteenth century through the writings of E. White, J. B. Heard, and the prebendaries Constable and Row in England, Richard Rothe in Germany, A. Sabatier in France, E. Petavel and Ch. Secretan in Switzerland, and in the United States through C. F. Hudson, W. R. Huntington, C. C. Baker, B. W. Bacon, and Horace Bushnell.

Recently the subject has been opened up again by John Wenham ("Case for Conditional Immortality," 161–91 in Universalism and the Doctrine of Hell), John R. W. Stott (Essentials, 314–15), Edward Fudge (Fire That Consumes) and Clark Pinnock (Criswell Theological Review 4/2:243–59). Stott is the most tentative, saying, "I do not dogmatize about the position to which I have come. I hold it tentatively. But I do plead for frank dialogue among Evangelicals on the basis of Scripture" (Essentials, 320). He calls F. F. Bruce to his defense, saying, "The late professor F. F. Bruce wrote to me in 1989 that 'Annihilation is certainly an acceptable interpretation of the relevant NT passages.” He added, “For myself I remain agnostic. My position is similar” (Evangelical Review of Theology 18/1:34).

These views have been vigorously opposed by those holding the traditional position, including K. S. Harmon, “The Case against Conditionalism,” in Universalism and the Doctrine of Hell, 173–224; John Walvoord in Four Views on Hell, 11–35; S. Chan, “Logic of Hell,” Evangelical Review of Theology 18/1:20–32; T. Phillips, “Hell: A Christological Reflection,” in Through No Fault of Their Own, 47–59; and L. Dixon, Other Side of the Good News.

Beyond the historical support like that cited above, conditionalists appeal to the Scriptures for additional evidence. (1) Only God is said to be immortal (1 Tim. 6:16); (2) eternal life is described as a gift from God imparted only to the believing person (John 10:27–28; 17:3; Rom. 2:7; 6:22–23; Gal. 6:8); and (3) the wicked are said to “perish” or to be “destroyed,” which is taken to mean that the nonredeemed will be reduced to nonexistence.

Yet in each of the above cases a satisfactory alternative explanation is available. (1) While God alone has inherent immortality, he chooses to impart immortality to certain of his creatures. (2) All men have a derivative immortality. We should not blur the distinction between immortality of existence with God’s gift of eternal life to the believer in Christ. Immortality is continued existence, while eternal life speaks of a special kind of continued existence in the fellowship and blessing of the triune God. (3) The destruction of the wicked cannot arbitrarily be assumed to mean their nonexistence. Rather, it speaks of their deprivation and loss of well-being.

Furthermore, the doctrine of the resurrection of the wicked to condemnation argues against conditional immortality (John 5:28–29; cf. Rev. 20:6, “the first resurrection” implying a second resurrection which is the “second death”). It is this doctrine of resurrection which strikes a blow at both the Greek concept of the immortality of the soul and the conditional immortality viewpoint. Thus the biblical view of man concerns total man (body and soul). Immortality is a gift to all men in virtue of their creation and it is the total man which is immortal, hence the biblical emphasis on the resurrection of the body for both the wicked and the redeemed.

A. F. JOHNSON AND W. A. ELWELL

See also ANNIHILATIONISM; FINAL STATE; HELL.

Bibliography. L. Berkhof, Systematic Theology; H. O. J. Brown, “Will the Lost Suffer Forever?” Criswell Theological Review 4/2:261–278; N. M. Cameron, ed., Universalism and the Doctrine of Hell; S. Chan, “The Logic of Hell: A Response to Annihilationism,” Evangelical Review of Theology 18/1:20–32; W. V. Crockett, ed., Four Views on Hell; W. V. Crockett and J. G. Sigountos, eds., Through No Fault of Their Own; D. L. Edwards and J. R. W. Stott, Evangelical Essentials: A Liberal Evangelical Dialogue; F. W. Farrar, Eternal Hope; L. Froom, Conditionalist Faith of our Fathers; E. Fudge, “Final End of the Wicked,” JETS 27/3:325–34; Fire That Consumes; V. C. Grounds, “Final State of the Wicked,” JETS 24/3:211–220; R. Morey, Death and the Afterlife; C. Pinnock, “Destruction of the Finally Impenitent,” Criswell Theological Review 4/2:243–59; E. B. Pusey, What Is of Faith as to Everlasting Punishment?; J. R. W. Stott, “Logic of Hell: A Brief Rejoinder,” Evangelical Review of Theology 18/1:33–34; S. H. Travis, Christ and the Judgment of God; B. B. Warfield, SHERK 1:183–86.

Cone, James H. (b. 1938). African-American theologian, born in Arkansas, nurtured in the African Methodist Episcopal Church, educated at Philander Smith College (B.A., 1958), Garrett Theological Seminary (B.D., 1961), and Northwestern University (Ph.D., 1965), where he specialized in the history and literature of religion and wrote a doctoral dissertation on “The Doctrine of Man in the Theology of Karl Barth.” Since 1969 he has taught at Union Theological Seminary in New York, being named Charles A. Briggs Professor of Systematic Theology in 1977.

Cone burst into national prominence with the publication of his first book, Black Theology and Black Power (1969), a largely polemical work written out of frustration with the European and American theological establishment’s failure to address the black struggle for racial justice. Relying on insights derived from both Malcolm X and Martin Luther King Jr., Cone set about the task of developing “a black theology, a theology whose sole purpose is to apply the freeing power of the gospel to black people under white oppression.” This meant taking the black social experience as the starting point of theology and consequently infusing theology with an attitude permeated with black consciousness of white oppression.

Cone followed through immediately with a more constructive work, Black Theology of Liberation (1970), which he himself regards as his “initial attempt to construct a new perspective for the discipline of theology, using the Bible and the black struggle for freedom as its chief sources.” In this work liberation emerged more profoundly as the organizing principle of Cone’s theology, earning him the credit of being the progenitor of black liberation theology. It has remained the central motif of all of his subsequent writing.

In the preface to the 1986 edition of Black Theology of Liberation, Cone enumerates four self-diagnosed weaknesses of his seminal work that are highly illuminating. In addition to his “inordinate methodological dependency upon the neo-orthodox theology of Karl Barth,” Cone was stung by the criticism of his peers for his failure to make a clean break with Eurocentric theology, a defect he set about to remedy in God of the Oppressed (1975)—he acknowledged (1) his unre-ceptivity to the problem of sexism, (2) his lack of a global perspective on oppression, and (3) his need to provide an economic and class analysis of oppression.

These admissions point to the inadequacy of an exclusively race-based theology. They also serve to locate Cone within the broader intellectual stream of “progressive” thought with its standard social critique based on experience. What is normative for theology is not divine revelation but the struggle of the oppressed for social justice. The contribution of the Bible is therefore pragmatic and relative. On this point Cone is explicit. In the preface to the twentieth anniversary edition of Black Theology and Black Power he wrote: “As in 1969, I still regard Jesus Christ today as the chief focus of my perspective on God but not to the exclusion of other religious perspectives. God’s reality is not bound by one manifestation of the divine in Jesus but can be found wherever people are being empowered to fight for freedom.”

D. C. JONES

See also BLACK THEOLOGY; LIBERATION THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. J. H. Cone, Black Theology and Black Power; Black Theology of Liberation; Spirituals and the Blues; God of the Oppressed; My Soul Looks Back; For My People; Speaking the Truth; Martin and Malcolm and America; J. H. Cone and G. S. Wilmore, eds., Black Theology: A Documentary History; R. Burrow Jr., James H. Cone and Black Liberation Theology; G. S. Wilmore, “Revolution Unfulfilled, but Not Invalidated,” in Black Theology of Liberation: Twentieth Anniversary Edition.

Confessing Church. The Confessing Church (Bekennende Kirche) constitutes a movement (from September 1933 onward) mainly within the German Protestant Church whose very existence helped discredit the doctrinally liberal, extremely nationalistic, and racist anti-Semitic efforts of the “German Christians” (roots in Prussia and Thuringia) and the totalitarian German state under Hitler which backed the “German Christians.” In the initial phase of the movement the Confessing Church was unanimously committed to the Reformation Confessions, upheld true faith, Protestant preaching, and above all the confession that Jesus is supreme Lord of all. It maintained that these essentials were being seriously limited and compromised by the German Christians and the totalitarian regime they supported. Among the major theologians influencing the Confessing Church were K. Barth and D. Bonhoeffer, while the Berlin pastor M. Niemöller, H. Lilje, and others led the movement organizationally. In the beginning of 1934 representatives of 170 Reformed Churches met at Barmen for a “free” synod. This precipitated the now famous May 1934 gathering of 139 Reformed, Lutheran, and Union representatives from 18 territorial churches. The Barmen Confessional Synod (May 29–30, 1934, under H. Asmussen’s coordination) which issued the Barmen Declaration (B.D.), formally opposed and condemned the establishment of the exclusive and centralized rule of the Nazi-German Christians within the Protestant state-church and established a Provisional Church Administration for pockets of the Confessing Church within the parochial administrations of the German Christians. It insisted on the distinct sovereignties of the state and the church (articles one and five of the B.D.).

The Confessing Church had partial roots in the confessional revival of the nineteenth century (with conservative and nationalistic tendencies) and was also strongly influenced by those (esp. K. Barth, M. Niemöller, and D. Bonhoeffer) who stressed the need for “confessing Christ” in the contemporary political and ecclesiastical situation (e.g., Jesus as supreme ruler over all of life [articles two and three of the B.D.]; the stance against euthanasia and anti-Semitism; the refusal to accept the Nazi Führer Prinzip [leader principle; article four of the B.D.]; a statement rejecting the totalitarian state as opposing the scriptural mandate [article five of the B.D.]). Subsequent synods were held in Dahlem (1934), Augsburg (1935), and Bad Oeynhausen (1936) on account of—and despite—increased persecution by Hitler’s regime. Internally, however, the Confessing Church was not unified for very long. The self-understanding and legal status of the Confessing Church ranged from cooperation (mostly in the South of Germany where the German Christians had been less influential; [see also the influence of the less combative, yet partially resistant Lutheran Council with Bishop A. Marahrens of Hanover, T. Wurm of Württemberg, and H. Meiser of Bavaria]) with the German Christians and state agencies to viewing the Confessing Church as a separate and distinct (“true”, M. Niemöller) church body (mostly in the North and Northeast of Germany [esp. Prussia and Saxony] where the German Christians had more influence). From 1936 onwards the Confessing Church lost much of its involvement in the Lutheran state church in the South, which reinforced the above-mentioned internal rift.

Prior to—and during—World War II the Confessing Church underwent much harassment by the German Secret Police (Gestapo; e.g., the arrest of M. Niemöller and other pastors as early as 1937; drafting of nearly half of all clergy; barring of paper for printing Bibles). There also existed two distinct branches of the Confessing Church: one following the union of Lutheran and Reformed Churches, the other pursuing exclusively Lutheran state-church purposes.

Following the collapse of Nazi Germany and the German Christian effort, representatives of the Confessing Church were initially significantly involved (together with the Lutheran Council) in rebuilding the Protestant state-church (renamed Protestant Church of Germany) (Evangelische Kirche in Deutschland, EKD) after World War II in 1945. The Stuttgart declaration of guilt (October 1945) exemplified this. All structures of the Confessing Church were merged with the Protestant (Lutheran) state church by 1948. After 1949 even the influence of the concerns of the Confessing Church began to wane; they nevertheless still live on in various current movements. H. F. BAYER

See also BARMEN, DECLARATION OF; BARTH, KARL; BONHOEFFER, DIETRICH; GERMAN CHRISTIANS.

Bibliography. A. Frey, Cross and Swastika; S. Herman, Rebirth of the German Church; P. B. Means, Things That are Caesar's: The Genesis of the German Church Conflict; K. Scholder, Churches and the Third Reich.

Confession. The Hebrew yādā and Greek homologeō (plus derivatives and related concepts) convey the idea of confession, acknowledgment, and praise of God's character and glorious works, often with expression of man's confession of faith in God and in his Son, Jesus Christ; also man's admission to God of his sins and wicked works.

In the OT one acknowledges and praises God's name: "We give you thanks, and praise your glorious name" (1 Chron. 29:13; cf. Ps. 145:1). Also the very person of God is praised: thanks is given to God who is good (Ps. 106:1), whose name (and therefore person) is holy (97:12; 99:3), great, and awesome (99:3). Exalted above all, God is praised as God of gods and Lord of lords (136:2-3) and the God of heaven (136:26). He is praised for his works of creation (89:5; 136:4-9) and providential acts to his people (136:10-24) and creatures (36:25). A believer's true commitment to God is implied in such praise.

In the NT emphasis is placed on the personal acknowledgment of Christ: "Whoever acknowledges me before men" (Matt. 10:32) and particular acknowledgment of him as Savior and Lord (Rom. 10:9; cf. Phil. 2:11). This confession of Christ includes acknowledging him in his deity as the Son of God (Matt. 16:16; 1 John 4:15) and in his humanity as incarnate in the flesh (1 John 4:2; 2 John 7).

The Bible also teaches that one is to confess his sins to this sovereign God. In the OT Levitical sacrifices this is portrayed when the worshiper confesses his sins over the head of the sacrificial animal (cf. Lev. 1:4; 16:21) which is a picture or type of Christ, the Lamb of God (John 1:29) bearing the sins of his people (Isa. 53:6; 1 Cor. 5:7). The OT also emphasizes the great confessions of Israel's sins (Ezra 10:1; Neh. 1:6; 9:2-3; Dan. 9:4, 20). Personal confession is seen in David's acknowledgment (Ps. 32:5).

Confession of sin is also emphasized in the NT (Matt. 3:6; Mark 1:5), and with it is connected the promise of forgiveness of sins (1 John 1:9; cf. Matt. 6:12), a forgiveness based solely on the death of Christ (Eph. 1:7). That confession of sin, an acknowledgment that forgiveness is possible only through Christ the risen Lord, God uses as an instrument in bringing the sinner to salvation (Rom. 10:9-10). This is to be a sacrifice of praise to God (Heb. 13:15). Although confession of sin is to be made to God alone (Luke 18:13), on occasion believers are encouraged to share their confession with one another (James 5:16). W. H. MARE

Bibliography. R. H. Alexander, TWOT 1:364-66; V. C. Grounds, ZPEB 1:937-39; O. Michel, TDNT 5:199-219; W. A. Quanbeck, IDB 1:667-68.

Confession of 1967. The United Presbyterian Church in the United States of America adopted the Confession of 1967 as part of its Book of Confessions in 1967. Included with this confession are the Nicene Creed, the Apostles' Creed, the Scots Confession, the Heidelberg Catechism, the Second Helvetic Confession, the Westminster Confession and Shorter Catechism, and the Declaration of Barmen.

The central theme of the confession is reconciliation. Its three parts are God's Work of Reconciliation, the Ministry of Reconciliation, and the Fulfillment of Reconciliation. Closely intertwined throughout are a view of covenant and a continuing focus on Jesus Christ as the one in whom reconciliation takes place.

Assuming the doctrines of the Trinity and the person of Christ, the confession describes Jesus of Nazareth as a Palestinian Jew in whom "true humanity was realized once and for all." As the risen Christ he is also the Savior for all joined to him by faith as well as the judge of all people. New life and hope are marks of those who respond to Christ in faith, repentance, and obedience. The Scriptures as the "word of God written" and the "witness without parallel" to Jesus Christ are where the church finds its faith and obedience nourished and regulated.

The church as the reconciling community is to serve God by speaking and acting appropriately in the world and by carrying the gospel to all people. Four problems are mentioned as particularly urgent for the church to act upon at the present time: discrimination, international conflicts, poverty, and sexual anarchy. The gifts of the church are cited, and the confession ends with an affirmation of the final triumph of God. D. K. MCKIM

See also CONFESSIONS OF FAITH.

Bibliography. Book of Confessions; E. A. Dowey Jr., Commentary on the Confession of 1967 and an Intro- duction to The Book of Confessions”; J. B. Rogers, “Biblical Authority and Confessional Change,” JPH 59:131–59; “Symposium—A Confessional Church,” McCQ 19:2.

Confessions of Faith. Variations on the term “confession” are found in the NT (e.g., 1 Tim. 3:16; 6:13). In the early church the word was used to describe the testimony of martyrs as they were about to meet their deaths. Its most common usage, however, designates the formal statements of Christian faith written by Protestants since the earliest days of the Reformation. As such, “confessions” are closely related to several other kinds of brief, authoritative summations of belief. The term “creed” most frequently refers to statements from the early church that Christians in all times and places have recognized—the Apostles’ Creed, the Nicene Creed, the Definition of Chalcedon, and (less frequently) the Athanasian Creed. While Orthodox Churches honor the deliverances of seven ancient ecumenical councils, and while the Roman Catholic Church continues to use the term “creed” for later doctrinal formulations (as “the Creed of the Council of Trent,” 1564), it is not uncommon to speak of just the Apostles’ or, even more commonly, the Nicene affirmation as the creed. “Catechisms” are structured statements of faith written in the form of questions and answers which often fulfill the same functions as confessions. Finally, the technical term “symbol” is a general designation for any formal statement—whether creed, confession, or catechism—that sets apart the community which professes it from those who do not.

The Reformation and Confessions. Conditions in the sixteenth century were ripe for the composition of confessions. The publications of Luther, Calvin, Zwingli, and other Reformation leaders had brought momentous theological questions to the fore. When entire communities, or just the leaders, turned to their teachings, an immediate demand arose for uncomplicated yet authoritative statements of the new faith. The leading Reformers were also deeply involved in the day-to-day life of the churches where they sensed the uneasiness of the people—whether at the abuses of Rome or at their own innovations. And they early on saw the necessity for brief theological summaries that all could understand.

In addition, the very nature of the Reformation and the very character of the sixteenth century greatly stimulated the urge to write confessions. The Reformers posed Scripture as the ultimate authority for all of life, even if this undercut received Catholic tradition. They spoke of the priesthood of believers and the internal testimony of the Holy Spirit, in spite of the fact that these teachings called the pronouncements of Rome’s infallible magisterium into question. The Reformers also challenged Catholic influence in the state. They proposed a new reading of history to support their own push for reform. And they had a passion for restoring the NT purity of Christian belief and practice. Yet every assault on an established belief and every challenge to a traditional practice called for a rationale, a concise statement of the reasons for change.

It was not, however, merely in the religious sphere that change prepared the way for newer confessions of faith. Europe in general was passing through a period of rapid evolution. Virtually every support for traditional Roman Catholic belief was under fire. If the Reformers challenged Catholic interference in the state and Catholic involvement in the economy, so too did monarchs of the new nation-states question the church’s traditional political role, and the burgeoning class of merchants challenged its accustomed authority in the world of trade. If Luther and Calvin called upon Rome to rethink its interpretation of Scripture, so too did leaders of the Renaissance challenge other intellectual traditions in art, political theory, literature, and history. If the Reformation raised troubling questions in theology, so too had several generations of academicians raised troubling issues in philosophy. In short, the world of the sixteenth century needed new statements of Christian belief, not just to reorient Christian life but to reposition Christianity itself within the forces of early modern Europe.

The great outpouring of confessions in the first century and a half of Protestantism performed a multitude of functions. Authoritative statements of Christian belief enshrined the new ideas of the theologians, but in forms that could also provide regular instruction for the common faithful. They lifted a standard around which a local community could rally and which could make plain the differences with opponents. They made possible a regathering of belief and practice in the interests of unity, even as they established a norm to discipline the erring. And for Catholics, the writing of confessionlike statements made it possible to discriminate between acceptable modifications in their ancient faith and unacceptable deviations from its traditional norms.

The Confessions of Protestants. Very early in the Reformation, Protestants began to set down their vision of the faith. In little more than the first decade of reform in Switzerland, Ulrich Zwingli himself superintended the publication of four confessional documents—the Sixty-seven Articles of Zurich in 1523 (to bring his own canton to break with Rome), the Ten Theses of Berne in 1528 (to solidify reform in that city), the Confession of Faith to Charles V in 1530 (to inform the emperor of Protestant convictions), and the Exposition of the Faith to King Francis I in 1531 (to move the French sovereign to a more even-handed attitude toward Protestants). In Germany, meanwhile, Luther had published his Small Catechism in 1529 after a disappointing tour of Saxony revealed gross ignorance of elemental biblical material, not even to speak of the main Reformation principles. And in 1530 the Protestant princes of Germany confessed their faith before the emperor at Augsburg in a document written by Philip Melancthon which has stood as the touchstone of Lutheran theology ever since. The same pattern appeared in other Protestant regions. Soon after the magistrates or the common people accepted Reformation teaching, a single individual or a small group would be commissioned to write a definitive statement of faith. The process was the same for Basel, Geneva, and Zurich, for the French Protestants, for Lutheran communities in Germany and Scandinavia, for Scotland, Holland, Bohemia, Poland, and England. And at the close of the Council of Trent (1545–63), which defined orthodox Catholicism in lengthy canons and decrees, Rome also recapitulated its faith in a brief, authoritative statement. (Since that time the Catholic Church has published many catechisms to communicate the Tridentine faith, including the Baltimore Catechism which has long been used in the United States. The new Catholic catechism of 1994 [English] embodies also teaching from the Second Vatican Council [1962–65]).

The very nature of Protestantism as a politically diverse movement prevented the formulation of a single inclusive confession. Yet in the Reformation's "second generation" considerable consolidation did occur. Lutherans wrote many confessions throughout the sixteenth century, but in 1580 they authorized the Book of Concord to designate the specific symbols which were to ground their teaching—the Apostles', Nicene, and Athanasian Creeds, the Smalcald Articles (1537), the Formula of Concord (1577), and especially Luther's Small and Large Catechisms (1529) and the Augsburg Confession (1530). Scandinavian Lutherans tended to consolidate even more thoroughly by neglecting the Book of Concord and rallying instead around just the Augsburg Confession.

In Reformed areas the same process was at work. The different Protestant cities of Switzerland wrote many catechisms and statements of belief, including several that attempted to mediate Protestant differences concerning the Lord's Supper. Eventually, however, several of them settled on the Second Helvetic Confession (1566), originally composed for his own use by Heinrich Bullinger, Zwingli's successor in Zurich. Although the Heidelberg Catechism (1563) was written to pacify Protestant strife in just that one city, it became a rallying symbol for Reformed groups in Germany, Holland, and elsewhere. Similar consolidation occurred in the British Isles, where the Thirty-nine Articles (1563) emerged with the sanction of Elizabeth I as the official statement of the English church. Those in England and Scotland who leaned more consistently to Calvinism were not entirely unhappy with the articles, and they proposed modifications or alternative symbols of their own, a process which culminated in the 1640s with the Westminster Confession and Catechisms. Although Protestants continued to write confessions, certain of the earlier documents have enjoyed a substantial and lingering influence.

The writing of confessions has never stopped, especially in the United States. The profusion of new denominations in America and the branching off of old bodies into new configurations has created a situation in which composition proceeds with great regularity. American Congregationalists, Baptists, Methodists, and Presbyterians among many others have rewritten Old World creeds to fit the New World situation (e.g., the Congregationalist Saybrook Platform of 1708 or the American Presbyterian revisions of the Westminster Confession in 1788). Others have composed altogether new documents (e.g., the New Hampshire Confession of Faith for Baptists in 1833). Americans have also issued confession-like statements as the charters for new denominations (e.g., Thomas Campbell's "Declaration and Address" of 1809 which helped found the Disciples of Christ). They have written confessions in response to shifting theological perceptions (e.g., the Presbyterian Confession of 1967). And even the Lutherans, among the most conservative of Protestants, have at times proposed modifications in the Augsburg Confession, although these have been regularly turned back.

The writing of confessions is not by any means an exclusively American enterprise. Two of the most significant Protestant confessions of the twentieth century arose beyond the shores of the United States: the Barmen Declaration in 1934, in which German "confessing Christians" announced their determination to live by the Word of God come what may, and the Lausanne Covenant of 1974, which expressed the faith of evangelicals from around the world on theological and social matters. The ecumenical movement has also led to a series of important confessional statements in this century (e.g., "The Call to Unity" of the Lausanne Faith and Order Conference, 1927). And even the Catholics have experienced a kind of confessional activity with the decrees on papal infallibility from the first Vatican Council in 1870 and from Pope Pius XII on the assumption of the Virgin Mary in 1950.

The Place of Confessions in the Churches. Given the diversity of Protestants, it is not surprising that the heirs of the Reformation also put confessions to use in diverse ways. Some of the differences can be explained by the circumstances of their composition. Others arise from differing Protestant attitudes toward confessions themselves. Confessions, in the first place, reflect the developmental stage of the group for which they were written. Luther's Small Catechism of 1529, a manual for private and family instruction, has more spontaneity of expression and more concern for simplified essentials than the Augsburg Confession of 1530, composed for presentation to the emperor and to theologians, or the Formula of Concord of 1577, written to quiet a lengthy series of theological controversies among the Lutherans. Confessions also differ depending on the theological circumstances which called them into existence. The Christian Reformed Church holds both the Heidelberg Catechism and the Canons of Dort (1619) among its official confessional statements. They are, however, quite different documents, since the Heidelberg Catechism was written for pastoral and irenic purposes, while the Canons of Dort were a response to one set of narrow theological issues. It also makes considerable difference whether the confession came into being with the support of an entire community or as the outcry of a besieged minority. England's Parliament commissioned the Westminster Confession and gave its authors time and much support to write it. Quite predictably, it turned out to be a comprehensive and balanced statement. The Anabaptist Schleithem Articles (1527), by contrast, were written under duress by Michael Sattler, who was put to death for his convictions only three months after penning the document. Not surprisingly, it turns out to neglect general areas of Christian agreement in order to emphasize the distinctive doctrines and practices of the Swiss Brethren. Although they are sometimes forgotten, the historical conditions surrounding the composition of a confession sometimes explain a great deal about the thrust of the document.

Confessions of Faith

Other distinctive features in the employment of confessions are related more to attitudes concerning authority or the church. Baptists who seek to ground faith exclusively on the Bible alone will regard the New Hampshire Confession as merely advisory; Anglicans and Episcopalians will differ among themselves over whether the Thirty-nine Articles are a current denominational standard or an antiquarian statement of merely historical interest; some smaller Presbyterian bodies will insist that their ministers and elders follow the Westminster Confession and Catechisms to the letter. In the past the denominations of greater centralization (episcopal or presbyterian) tended to place more weight on confessions than those of greater decentralization (congregational). But now some of the historically confessional bodies sit much looser to statements of faith than do independent churches and organizations.

Confessions also reflect different theological perspectives. Even in the great era of confession writing following the Reformation, it was possible to distinguish broadly between two sorts of statements—those which emphasized the drama of redemption and those which placed greater emphasis on the truth of the faith. The first gave heightened attention to the person of God and his loving mercy toward sinners, or at least moved these topics to the top of the agenda. They included the Augsburg Confession, Luther's Small Catechism, Zwingli's Sixty-seven Articles and Ten Theses of Berne, the Heidelberg Catechism, the Scots Confession (1560), and the Thirty-nine Articles. The second began with the truths of revelation in Scripture before going on to a discussion of God's activity. Among these were the First Helvetic Confession (1536), the Second Helvetic Confession, the French Confession of Calvin (1559), the Belgic Confession (1561), the Irish Articles of James Ussher (1615), and the Westminster Confession. Many of the two types of confessions were fully compatible with each other (e.g., the Reformation movement in Holland adopted both the Heidelberg Catechism and the Belgic Confession). But in structuring themselves along different lines, these documents testified to the way in which theological vision shapes confessional emphasis. In subsequent centuries a much wider range of theological convictions has found expression in a much less harmonious group of Protestant confessions.

The Propriety of Confessions. Confessions have served Protestants as bridges between scriptural revelation and particular cultures. They arise in response to a need for understanding Christian teaching concerning a particular problem or in a particular place. As such, many confessions have had their hour in the sun and passed quietly away. Others, because of affective power or balanced judiciousness, have endured. Some of these have become extremely important to their communions, so much so that in practice it is nearly unthinkable to challenge the confession openly while remaining a member in good standing. Yet even in these cases Protestants insist, as the great student of the creeds Philip Schaff once put it, that "the authority of symbols, as of all human compositions, is relative and limited. It is not coordinate with, but always subordinate to, the Bible, as the only infallible rule of the Christian faith and practice." Many Protestant confessions acknowledge this fact directly by including a statement that even the best of human documents are liable to error.

The realization that confessions err, combined with Protestant allegiance to Scripture, has led especially some independent groups to disparage confessions entirely. A rallying cry for this point of view, which gained popularity in America during the early nineteenth century, has been the slogan, "No creed but the Bible." In point of fact, however, all Protestant bodies have operated under the authority of either formal, written confessions or informal, unwritten standards that function like confessions. In the latter case a series of inarticulate guidelines, often regulating belief and practice to the minutest detail, shapes the thought and actions of the members of the communion.

Protestants who value written confessions make two arguments to those who play down their importance. The first is practical. They contend that a written confessional document encourages clarity of belief and openness in theological discussion. Unwritten standards, it is argued, are overly susceptible to the manipulation of power brokers or the vagaries of selective application. The second defense is scriptural. Those who affirm the value of confessions point to the many places in the NT where formalized summaries of belief are taken for granted as aids to faith and practice (e.g., “what was preached,” 1 Cor. 1:21; “the truth,” 2 Thess. 2:13; “the gospel,” 1 Cor. 15:1–8; “the word,” Gal. 6:6; “the teaching of Christ,” 2 John 9–10; “the trustworthy message,” Titus 1:9; “the form of teaching,” Rom. 6:17; “the teachings,” 1 Cor. 11:2; “teaching,” 2 Thess. 3:6; and even that which we “confess,” 1 Tim. 3:16 NASB). Defenders of Protestant confessionalism regard these biblical precedents as ample warrant for the continued employment of confessions.

To be sure, Protestants do not ascribe to their confessions the same status the Roman Catholic Church gives to its doctrinal promulgations. Protestant confessionalists acknowledge the work of the Holy Spirit in the unfolding of doctrine throughout history and in the writing of confessions, but they regard that work always as an illumination or an extension of the absolute standards of Scripture. The churches have no independent capacity to compose confessions but are everywhere dependent upon the authoritative norm of Scripture. And they may certainly make mistakes. While Roman Catholics, on the other hand, also treat Scripture as a norm, they believe that the Holy Spirit inspires the teaching magisterium of the church in such a way as to make its definite pronouncements coordinate in authority with the Bible. The self-correcting statements of the Protestant confessions—that even the best of confessions must not encroach upon the ultimate authority of Scripture—differentiate the authority of Protestant confessions from Catholic dogmas.

Although Protestants do not regard confessions as absolute authorities in matters of faith and practice, many of them have found confessions to be valuable introductions to Christian belief, helpful summaries of Scripture, and dependable guides to the Christian life.

M. A. NOLL

See also AUGSBURG CONFESSION; CONCORD, BOOK OF; CONFESSION OF 1967; HEIDELBERG CATECHISM; HELVETIC CONFESSIONS; IRISH ARTICLES; LUTHER'S SMALL CATECHISM; NEW HAMPSHIRE CONFESSION; SCOTS CONFESSION; SMALCALD ARTICLES; THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES; WESTMINSTER CONFESSION OF FAITH.

Bibliography. G. R. Evans, Problems of Authority in Reformation Debates; J. H. Leith, Creeeds of the Churches; M. A. Noll, ed., Confessions and Catechisms of the Reformation; P. Schaff, Creeeds of Christendom; T. G. Tappert, ed., Book of Concord.

Confirmation. One of the seven sacraments of both the Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox church. The Roman Church teaches that it was instituted by Christ, through his disciples, for the church. Its early history is somewhat uncertain, and only gradually did it receive recognition as a sacrament. It was given a sacramental status by Peter Lombard in the twelfth century, by Thomas Aquinas in the thirteenth century, and finally by the Council of Trent in the sixteenth century. One of the two sacraments administered by a bishop in the Roman Catholic Church, its purpose is to make those who have been baptized in the faith strong soldiers of Jesus Christ. It is administered to children before they receive their first Communion, generally at about the age of twelve. Concerning it Aquinas wrote: “Confirmation is to baptism what growth is to generation.” It is administered according to this form: “I sign thee with the sign of the Cross and confirm thee with the chrism of salvation.” Since it confers an indelible character upon the recipient, it is administered but once. According to Roman Catholic theology, sanctifying grace is increased in the soul, and a special sacramental grace consisting of the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit is conferred upon the recipient. This has recently been reaffirmed by Pope Paul VI in the Apostolic Constitution on the Sacrament of Confirmation (1971), where he says, “Through the sacrament of confirmation, those who have been born anew in baptism receive the inexpressible Gift, the Holy Spirit himself, by which they are endowed . . . with special strength.”

In the Lutheran Church confirmation is a rite rather than a sacrament, and the recipient offers it as a confirmation in his own heart of those baptismal vows which his parents assumed on his behalf. It is administered but once at about thirteen or fourteen years of age and admits the recipient to the Communion. In the Episcopal Church it is a sacramental rite completing baptism.

C. G. SINGER

See also BAPTISM; SACRAMENT.

Bibliography. G. W. Bromiley, Sacramental Teaching and Practice in the Reformation Churches; C. Buchanan,

Confirmation

Anglican Confirmation; H. J. D. Denzinger, Sources of Catholic Dogma; G. Dix, Theology of Confirmation in Relation to Baptism; J. D. C. Fisher, Confirmation Then and Now; G. W. H. Lampe, Seal of the Spirit; T. A. Marsha, Gift of Community, Baptism, and Confirmation; G. C. Richards, Baptism and Confirmation; L. S. Thornton, Confirmation.

Congregationalism. See CHURCH GOVERNMENT.

Conscience. Personal awareness of moral accountability to (not necessarily self-consciously) acknowledged norms. Conscience reflects (though imperfectly in fallen humans) the divine norms “written on their hearts” (Rom. 2:15) as an aspect of humans imaging God, living coram Deo, “in the presence of God.”

Despite no Old Testament term for conscience (but see lēb, “heart”), awareness of accountability is evident from the first human sin (Gen. 3:7–8). David (1 Sam. 24:5; Pss. 32:3–4; 51:3) likewise manifests conscience.

New Testament suneidēsis is primarily Pauline (20 of 30 occurrences), especially in the Corinthian dispute about eating meat offered to idols (11 times). It occurs twice in accounts of Paul’s trial testimony (Acts 23:1; 24:16).

Conscience may be “good” (1 Tim. 1:5, 19; 1 Peter 3:21), “pure” (Titus 1:15; Heb. 9:14), or “clear” (Acts 23:1; 24:16; 1 Tim. 3:9; 2 Tim. 1:3; Heb. 13:18; 1 Pet. 3:16), or it may be “guilty” (Heb. 10:22), “corrupted” (Titus 1:15) or “seared” (1 Tim. 4:2). It may be “weak” (1 Cor. 8:7, 10, 12) or, presumably, “strong” (cf. “weak” or “strong” faith, Rom. 14), and the “strong” should have regard to the “weak.” Christ’s death (Heb. 9:14; 10:22) and resurrection (1 Pet. 3:21) cleanses consciences as the Mosaic cults could not (Heb. 9:9; 10:2).

Conscience condemns but also approves (Acts 23:1; Rom. 2:15; 9:1; 1 Cor. 4:4; 2 Cor. 1:12; 4:2; 5:11). It judges the actions of others as well as one’s own (1 Cor. 8:10–12; 10:25–27; 2 Cor. 4:2; 5:11).

It is always wrong to violate conscience, but if it is not instructed in God’s will (1 Cor. 8:2, 7; cf. Rom. 12:1–2), heeding conscience is not necessarily righteous.

Augustine’s contrast between concupiscence and love for God highlighted conscience (e.g., Confessions 10.2.2). Aquinas related conscience to intellect, not will, distinguishing between synderēsis, disposition to moral judgment, and conscience, its act (Summa Theologica Ia.79.12–13), but Calvin, like Luther, related it to the person as a whole before God (e.g., Institutes of the Christian Religion 3.19.15). Kant viewed its authority as the imperative voice of the deontological “moral law within,” but Freud’s theory of the super-ego, imposed by family and society, faulted conscience as repressive.

S. R. SPENCER

Bibliography. J. W. Gladwin, New Dictionary of Christian Ethics and Pastoral Theology; P. W. Gooch, NTS 33:244–54; J. M. Gundry-Volf, DPL 153–6; H. C. Hahn and C. Brown, NIDNTT 1:348–53; C. Maurer, TDNT 7:899–919; G. T. Meadors, EDBT 113–5; C. A. Pierce, Conscience in the New Testament; S. S. Smalley, NBD, 2nd ed., 226–7; M. E. Thrall, NTS 14:118–25; R. Zachman, Assurance of Faith: Conscience in the Theology of Martin Luther and John Calvin.

Conscientious Objection. See PACIFISM.

Consensus Tigurinus. See ZURICH AGREEMENT.

Consistent Eschatology. The biblical understanding of last things has long been disputed. Jesus’ views in particular have come under close scrutiny since Albert Schweitzer’s Quest of the Historical Jesus (1906). Schweitzer (following J. Weiss) argued that Jesus viewed the coming age as radically discontinuous with the present one. Jesus saw himself (wrongly, in Schweitzer’s view) as the “Son of Man” who would come on the clouds of heaven and establish God’s reign on earth. Jesus and his message can be understood only if his view of last things is seen as the essential feature of his entire self-understanding and message. His radical eschatology must be read into his outlook across the board comprehensively and consistently. From this viewpoint the school of “consistent” (German konsequent) eschatology was named. (“Thoroughgoing” eschatology refers to the same outlook.) Itself a reaction against nineteenth-century liberalism’s noneschatological Jesus, Schweitzer’s model was later revamped by the existentialist eschatology of Bultmann and form criticism and (from a different angle) opposed by C. H. Dodd’s insistence on “realized” eschatology.

If Schweitzer stressed the “not yet” aspect of Jesus’ view—the heart of what he foretold lay in the future—and if Dodd stressed the “already”—what Jesus promised was already present in his life and ministry—most New Testament scholars have been content to see elements of both convictions at work in Jesus’ sayings. Yet some are insisting once more that apocalyptic elements of Jesus’ proclamation were later superimpositions on his simpler, noneschatological teachings. As this de-eschatologized Jesus continues to make a comeback, “consistent” eschatology is sure to attract interest in response.

R. W. YARBROUGH

See also BULTMANN, RUDOLF; DODD, CHARLES HAROLD; ESCHATOLOGY; SCHWEITZER, ALBERT.

Bibliography. O. Cullmann, Salvation in History; C. H. Dodd, History and the Gospel; J. Jeremias, Parables of Jesus; J. Weiss, Jesus’ Proclamation of the King- dom; B. Witherington, Jesus, Paul and the End of the World; Jesus Quest.

Constantinople, First Council of (381). The gathering in Constantinople of 150 Eastern bishops at the request of the Emperor Theodosius I was later regarded by the Council of Chalcedon (451) as the second great ecumenical council of the church. Most importantly it marked the end of over fifty years of Arian political and theological dominance in the East and the restoration and pneumatological extension of Nicene orthodoxy.

The path of history from Nicea to Constantinople is twisted with various political and theological figures and several theological and synodal skirmishes between Arianism and orthodoxy. The varied array of heresies that emerged during this period is given in the council's first canon, where they are also anathematized. A brief examination of these will set the theological context.

Semi-Arians. This name was applied to those who tried to steer a middle course between Nicene orthodoxy and Arianism. Too sensitive to Sabellian implications and the biblical absence of the term homoousion to fully embrace Nicea and recoiling from blatant Arian characterizations of the Son as a creature, they took refuge in the term homoiousion. By this they taught that the Son was like (homoiōs) the Father but not necessarily the same in essence. This ambiguous position was held by many who were very close to orthodoxy—e.g., Cyril of Jerusalem—as well as those who were more of an Arian disposition—e.g., Basil of Ancyra. Due to the efforts of Athanasius and Hilary of Poitiers many of this party were reconciled to orthodoxy, especially as more radical Arian positions developed.

Pneumatomachians. In the post-Nicene period attention was turned to the Holy Spirit and his relation to the discussions on the Father and the Son. About 360, Athanasius wrote to correct an Egyptian heresy advocated by the Tropicists in which the Spirit was said to have been created out of nothing. Athanasius maintained instead the deity of the Spirit and his homoousia with the Father and the Son. After this the pneumatomachians (literally “Spirit-fighters”) appeared within the homoiousion party. Led by Eustathius of Sebaste (after 373), they tried to assert a nondivine, noncreaturely, intermediate status for the Spirit, even after affirming the homoousia of the Son. They were opposed by the Cappadocians, who taught the full deity and homoousia of the Spirit both implicitly (as in Basil, On the Holy Spirit) and explicitly (as in Gregory of Nazianzus, Oration 31). It is this Cappadocian (and Athanasian) theology that prevailed at the Council of Constantinople.

Eunomians or Anomoians. Founded by Aetius of Antioch and led by Eunomius of Cyzicus at the time of the council, these held the radical Arian position that refused any compromise with orthodoxy. They taught a Neoplatonic hierarchy of three beings that were in essence utterly unlike (anomoios) each other, though possessing relative divinity (thus confirming the charge of polytheism).

Eudoxians. These held a classical Arian position particularly advocated at the time of the council by the followers of Eudoxius, former bishop of Antioch (358) and Constantinople (360). He was known for the jest: “The Father is impious (since he worships no one), but the Son is pious (since he worships the Father).”

Sabellians, Marcellians, and Photinians. Since the Arians vigorously insisted that the homoousion logically reduced to Sabellianism, it was necessary for the council to repudiate this heresy. One who actually came close to espousing it was Marcellus of Ancyra, who resisted the Cappadocian trinitarian development in which three hypostases were distinguished while maintaining one ousia. Marcellus preferred to speak of the expansion of an indivisible Monad (God) which resulted in the externalization of the (until then) immanently existing Logos (the Son) at the time of incarnation, with an expected future contraction of the Logos back into the Monad. Although he was exonerated of the Sabellian label at Rome (341) and Sardica (343), Constantinople condemned his deviant views. Photinus of Sirmium, a pupil of Marcellus, developed his teacher's views into an adoptionist Christology and was condemned for the heresy of Paul of Samosata at various councils.

Apollinarians. Constantinople brought a final condemnation on this christological heresy which originated within the Nicene camp. A former friend of Athanasius, Apollinarius of Laodicea zealously advocated the deity of the Logos and upheld the homoousion. However, in his concern to avoid the dualistic personality of an adoptionistic Christology, he capitulated to the Arian error in which the Logos completely replaced the human soul and mind in the incarnate Christ. For this deficient humanity he was opposed reluctantly by Athanasius and vigorously by the Cappadocians.

The theology of the Council of Constantinople is set forth first by the condemnation of these heresies. More positively, it was expressed in a published statement of doctrine, a tomos, and the creed of the council. Unfortunately, the tomos is no longer extant except for what is reflected of it in the letter of the synod of 382. The creed is to be found not in the records of Constantinople, but in those of the Council of Chalcedon (451), where a creed attributed to Constantinople (C) was read along with the Nicene Creed (N). C happens to be the creed that is read in churches today under the title of the Nicene Creed, but it is more appropriately known as the

Constantinople, First Council of

Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed. Without recounting the scholarly debates on C, it seems most likely that it was a local form of N, adopted by Constantinople and amended to reflect the council's pneumatology. Thus the Council of Constantinople did not see itself as producing a new creed but rather as reaffirming and upholding the faith of Nicea. At Chalcedon, however, concern for the pure form of N led them to distinguish between N and C.

The pneumatological emendation of the Nicene faith followed the example of Basil by limiting itself to biblical words and phrases. The Spirit is confessed to be the "Lord" and "Life-giver," the one "who with the Father and the Son is together worshiped and together glorified." The homoousia of the Spirit is not explicitly affirmed here, probably because of a last-minute attempt to reconcile the pneumatomachians. However, the homoousion apparently was affirmed in the final document, since the letter of the synod of 382 summarizes the council's doctrine as faith in the uncreated, consubstantial, and coeternal Trinity.

Besides the reaffirmation of Nicene orthodoxy, this developed pneumatology, which made possible a full trinitarian doctrine for the East, was the most important contribution of the Council of Constantinople.

C. BLAISING

See also APOLLINARIANISM; ARIUS, ARIANISM; ATHANASIAN CREED; BASIL THE GREAT; CAPPADOCIAN FATHERS; COUNCILS, CHURCH; GREGORY OF ATHANASIOS; GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS; HOMOOUSIOS; MONARCHIANISM; NICEA, COUNCIL OF.

Bibliography. W. P. DuBose, Ecumenical Councils; H. M. Gwatkin, Studies of Arianism; J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Creeds; Early Christian Doctrines; C. E. Raven, Apollinarianism; R. Seeberg, Textbook of the History of Doctrines; J. Taylor, "First Council of Constantinople (381)," Pru 13:47–54, 91–97.

Constantinople, Second Council of (553). The gathering in Constantinople of 165 bishops is regarded as the fifth ecumenical council of the church. It was called by the emperor Justinian under the presidency of Eutychius, patriarch of Constantinople. Pope Vigilius of Rome spurned an invitation to the council, largely due to meager representation of Western bishops. The council was an attempt to settle the prolonged Three Chapters' controversy. The Council of Chalcedon in 451 had not achieved unanimity on christological matters; instead, it sparked the Monophysite controversy. The Monophysites were suspicious of Chalcedon and especially opposed three Antiochene theologians, Theodore of Mopsuestia, Theodoret of Cyrrhus, and Ibas of Edessa, whom Chalcedon had spared condemnation. The Monophysites disapproved of the Three Chapters, namely the person and works of Theodore, some of the writings of Theodoret, and a letter of Ibas, claiming that they were hopelessly tainted by Nestorianism.

In 551 Justinian, desiring to bring harmony to his realm by placating the Monophysites, issued a decree condemning the Three Chapters. Then he convoked the council to set forth a more moderate interpretation of Chalcedon. The Three Chapters were condemned and their authors declared anathema. Any Nestorian interpretation of Chalcedon was ruled out by insisting upon the unity of the Person of Christ in his two natures. Christ's human nature was not independent, but received its identity by virtue of its union with the divine person of the Son of God. The authority of Chalcedon was upheld when the council anathematized any who said that its formula permits the error condemned there.

Although Pope Vigilius formally accepted the decisions of the council in 554, the Western church, out of devotion to Chalcedon, rejected them for years. Milan and Aquileia even severed communion with Rome, and relations were not restored by Milan until the end of the sixth century, and by Aquileia until the end of the seventh.

Although Roman Catholics and Eastern Orthodox count it among the seven ecumenical councils, Protestants do not generally regard it as highly as they do the first four councils.

R. A. PETERSON

See also CONSTANTINOPLE, FIRST COUNCIL OF; MONOPHYSITISM; NESTORIUS, NESTORIANISM.

Constantinople, Third Council of (681). The gathering in Constantinople of 174 Eastern bishops is regarded as the sixth ecumenical council of the church. It was called by Emperor Constantine IV (Pogonatus) and was presided over by three papal legates, who represented Pope Agatho. The Second Council of Constantinople did not settle all arguments concerning the person of Christ. Some easterners, now that they were forbidden to teach that Christ had only one nature, emphasized the unity of his person by insisting that the two natures had only one will (Greek thelēma) and one operation (energeia). Hence, this position was called Monothelitism. In 638, Emperor Heraclius, in an attempt to restore unity in his realm by inviting Monophysites back to the Orthodox Church in the light of the threat of Islam, taught Monothelitism with the apparent support of Patriarch Sergius.

Constantine IV was prompted to call this council by a letter from Pope Agatho stating that in Christ there were two wills not contrary to one another. The council agreed with Agatho and in its Dogmatic Decree reaffirmed Chalcedon by appealing to the creeds of 325 and 381. It added that Christ had two wills and two operations and that "each nature with the communion of the other willed and wrought that which was proper to itself." There was complete harmony between the divine and human wills in the God-man, because the human will always voluntarily followed the divine. The same position was affirmed regarding the two operations in the person of Christ. The council condemned the proponents of Monothelitism, including Macarius, patriarch of Antioch, and Pope Honorius I, who in 634 had espoused the doctrine in a letter. This has proved an embarrassment to Roman Catholic apologists in their attempts to defend papal infallibility. Nevertheless, Rome triumphed over the East when its formula was accepted.

This council succeeded in establishing christological unity between Rome and Constantinople. The Nestorian and Monophysite churches, however, were permanently separated from the Orthodox Church.

R. A. PETERSON

See also CONSTANTINOPLE, FIRST COUNCIL OF; MONOTHELITISM.

Constructive Theology. In the 1970s a group of American theologians of nonevangelical persuasion designed a long-range work group on constructive theology. The study group of approximately twenty-five theologians adopted as its agenda the task of clarifying how the church can meet and shape the actual world with a Christian message freed from bondage to arcane models of vertical transcendence. Their theme is that the traditional package of classical orthodox faith is discredited and must be reshaped to meet the needs of the modern world.

The character and objectives of the work group were first described by Julian Hartt in Occasional Papers of the Institute for Ecumenical and Cultural Research, March 1979. The work group undertook its initial study under the auspices of the institute, and Hartt's article nicely summarizes the goals of the new theology. The members of the work group included, from Vanderbilt Divinity School, Edward Farley, John Forstman, Peter Hodgson, Eugene TeSelle, Sallie McFague, and Robert C. Williams, and, from other schools, Carl Braaten (Lutheran School of Theology, Chicago), David Burrell (Notre Dame), John Cobb (Claremont School of Theology), Stephen Crites (Wesleyan University), Langdon Gilkey and David Tracy (University of Chicago Divinity School), Gordon Kaufman and George Rupp (Harvard Divinity School), George Kehm (Pittsburgh Theological Seminary), David Kelsey (Yale Divinity School), Robert H. King (Millsaps College), Walter Lowe (Candler School of Theology), Schubert Ogden and John Deschner (Perkins School of Theology), George Stroup (Princeton Theological Seminary), and Robert R. Williams (Hiram College).

The first item on the agenda addresses the authority of Scripture. Hartt asserts that the faith of our fathers may be living still, but we are not under a divine mandate to accept our theological fathers' views and uses of Scripture. Indeed, he says, hardly anything better illustrates the power of historical relativism in our time than the need to produce constructive—constructive rather than past-regarding—views on the authority and function of Scripture in theological work. American theologians are not as tied to biblical theology as their European counterparts, and accordingly are not likely to claim direct scriptural warrant for every serious theological proposal about God, man, nature, and history. The group concludes that the authority of Scripture is a question that cannot be resolved by appealing directly to Scripture itself; the decision to make Scripture the ultimate norm of Christian life and thought cannot be shown to have been a decision made in Scripture but is an inescapable theological decision that can be neither resolved nor vindicated by exegetical maneuvers.

The decision of the work group not to take a strong stand on the authority of Scripture reflects their tacit assumption regarding the question of authority in the Christian life: in a pluralistic society such as ours the matter is left as vague as possible. The assumption is that a devotedly pluralistic culture will not stand for a theology based on the absolutely normative authority of Scripture.

The large question the work group wrestled with is the problem of theological method. The pattern that has emerged is Hegelian. Basic Christian doctrines have been assigned to various members who will follow a common format. First, a brief account of the historical development of the doctrine will be presented (thesis); then will follow an analysis of the factors in the modern world that have eroded the traditional meanings of the doctrine (antithesis); and finally the constructive work of the group will proceed to reformulate the traditional doctrine in terms acceptable to the mood of modernity (synthesis).

In this dialectical enterprise contemporary criticisms of traditional Christian doctrines determine the final reformulations. That this is clearly the case, and that the authority of Enlightenment modernity has replaced the authority of Scripture, comes out in a major presupposition of the work group. Much of the traditional package of the Christian faith has been discredited. Christian supernaturalism may be just an attachment of dubious classical philosophical systems to Christian faith. In any event, the work group feels that modern secularist attacks have overpowered the central element of "vertical transcendence," or the supernatural, in traditional theology. Accordingly, one of the principal questions the constructive theologians of the work group face, along with the minister in the pulpit, is whether the Christian message can be freed from bondage to arcane models of vertical transcendence; so bound, the church's message fails to reckon with the shape and movement of the actual world. The factor which works most powerfully to discredit the traditional package is the enormity of evil in our time.

Constructive Theology

The first published volume of the work group's research appeared in 1982 under the title Christian Theology: An Introduction to Its Traditions and Tasks, edited by Peter Hodgson and Robert King. The book is a collaborative venture that addresses the traditional doctrines of Christian faith: Scripture and tradition, God, revelation, creation and providence, human being, sin and evil, Christ and salvation, church, Holy Spirit and the Christian life, kingdom of God and the life everlasting, and world religions. The evangelical reader will gauge the effectiveness of this renewed attempt at an older venture of theological liberalism by the pluralistic and nonsupernatural assumptions expressed in the articles. The authors seem convinced that in this new age progressive theologians are aware, as their foremothers and forefathers were not, that theology is a constructive enterprise and that Christianity is but one religion among many.

Since this volume (with subsequent results of the collaborative process) is designed to be used as a textbook in colleges, universities, and seminaries, it warrants the careful scrutiny and reply of orthodox scholars. Primary concerns include the epistemological assumption of the work group that modern pluralism is normative over Scripture, that classical Christianity is arcane, discredited, and addresses the problem of evil less well in our time than constructive theology, and whether the adjective "constructive" properly describes an enterprise that promotes the deconstruction and demolition of biblical faith as a central task in the reconstruction of theology for our time.

R. G. GRUENLER

See also COBB, JOHN B. JR.; GILKEY, LANGDON BROWN; LIBERATION THEOLOGY; MCFAGUE, SALLIE; OGDEN, SCHUBERT; POSTLIBERAL THEOLOGY; POST-MODERNISM; PROCESS THEOLOGY; TRACY, DAVID.

Consubstantiation. See LORD'S SUPPER, VIEWS OF.

Consummation of the Age. See ESCHATOLOGY.

Contextualization of Theology. The genesis of the neologism "contextualization" must be understood in order to understand its meaning and method. An October 1970 circular letter from Nikos A. Nissiotis (then director of the Ecumenical Institute of the World Council of Churches [WCC]) regarding the imminent 1971 consultation on "Dogmatic or Contextual Theology" in Switzerland emphasized the need for a new point of departure in theologizing. His concern, subsequently reinforced by the consultation, was to give preference to a "contextual or experiential" theology that grows out of the contemporary historical scene and thought, in contrast to systematic or dogmatic theologies the aegis of which are discoverable in the biblical tradition and confessional statements based on the biblical text.

Along with other discussions, the 1971 consultation reflected the "Third Mandate" effort of the WCC's Theological Education Fund (TEF) and its directors Shoki Coe and Aharon Sapsejian to discern the issues and challenges to theological education posed by secularism, technology, and a variety of social and religious struggles, especially in the Third World. In 1972 the TEF report Ministry in Context introduced "contextualization" as a term and approach designed to supersede the indigenization approach that had been dominant in mission theory for over a century. The new emphasis was viewed as including the positive elements of the older term but going beyond this in order to take the new challenge into account in theologizing as well as ministering.

The rootage of contextualized theology is to be found in the Christian-Marxist dialogue; the impetus given to the secularization of the theology by Vatican II and the social encyclicals dealing with the aggiornamento (modernization) of the church in the world; the economic and sociopolitical analyses of Latin America put forth at the 1968 Medellín meeting of the Latin American Bishops Conference (CELAM); and the Uppsala General Assembly of the WCC (1968), where the agenda of the world was taken as the agenda of the church and the idea of the unity of the church as a sign of the unity of mankind was introduced. Precursors of the kind of contextualization advocated in the conciliar movement include the theology of hope, the theology of liberation, and black theology. In accordance with these trends and concerns TEF leaders attempted to "press beyond" the more static indigenization (self-supporting, self-governing, self-propagating) concept in mission to one that is more dynamic, open to change, and future-oriented. Accordingly, contextuality has been defined by Shoki Coe as critically assessing contexts in the light of the missio Dei, and contextualization has been advocated as a new way of theologizing which takes into account the dialectic between contextuality and contextualization. The aegis of theologizing has been located in praxis within the world rather than in the exegesis of Scripture. And mission has become a matter of discerning what God is doing in the contemporary world and participating in that task rather than participating in a missionary task delineated in the NT. The mixed results of such theologizing are discoverable in the recent works of such scholars as John Mbiti, E. W. Fashole-Luke, Néstor Paz, Choan-Seng Song, and Kosuke Koyama (see Mission Trends No. 3). As an examination of the resultant theologies will show, the gains resulting from an increased awareness of the “cultural bent” of Western theologies and the need for taking non-Western cultural contexts much more seriously have been often undercut by a theological method which prizes analysis of cultural and sociopolitical contexts more than the grammaticohistorical interpretation of the Bible and consideration of the historic creeds of the church.

More conservative scholars have not been slow to respond. Along with potential gains of contextualized theology they see new digressions from the biblical mandate. The International Congress on World Evangelization in Lausanne (1972) gave some attention to contextualization. Brought together by the Lausanne Continuation Committee, a group of mostly conservative theologians and missiologists meeting at Willowbank, Bermuda (1974), studied the issues growing out of the developing contextualization theory and practice (see Down to Earth). Other responses by conservatives and evangelicals to contextualized theology in general and liberation theology in particular have been coming from a wide spectrum of conservative evangelicals. These responses are divergent. Some feel that the term is already so ambiguous and misleading that it should be abandoned altogether. A majority, however, take the approach of redefining the word and redirecting the method. This latter group differs in such matters as the importance to be attached to cultures; the relation between evangelism and humanitarian and sociopolitical action in mission; and the relationships between faith and theologizing, meaning and symbol, form and function, and meaning and relevance. A broad consensus among conservatives has emerged, however. It is understood, for example, that theologies developed in the Third World will give special attention to such issues as demonism, sorcery, and ancestor veneration, and less emphasis to matters of classification and ontological/functional questions. At the same time, it is recognized that theological reflection without epistemological control and revelatory givens can lay no valid claim to being Christian. Western and Third World theologians who base their teachings on Scripture may indeed develop different theologies. But they will develop theologies that are complementary, not contradictory. Moreover, these Western and Third World theologians will be in a position to encourage one another to a richer understanding of the person, purpose, and provision of God and to challenge one another to faithfulness to his Word. More recently the field has “settled” and no really significant development has taken place, except in the areas of new types of ethnotheologies being developed (African, Asian, Oceanic, etc.). Theoretically more has been done in hermeneutics than contextualization, and the inclusion of cultural issues in the North American theological scene has seen more significant development than contextualization per se.

While adaptation to cultural contexts and existential situations is incumbent upon both theologians and participants in mission, adherence to the Scriptures must be viewed as basic to all authentic theologizing and missionizing.

D. J. HESSELGRAVE

Bibliography. G. H. Anderson and T. F. Stransky, eds., Mission Trends No. 3: Third World Theologies; S. B. Bevans, Models of Contextual Theology; W. A. Dyrness, Learning about Theology from the Third World; W. A. Dyrness, ed., Emerging Voices in Global Christian Theology; D. S. Gilliland, Word among Us: Contextualizing Theology for Mission Today; D. J. Hesselgrave and E. Rommen, Contextualization: Meaning and Methods; E. A. Núñez and W. D. Taylor, Crisis in Latin America: An Evangelical Perspective; R. J. Schreiter, Constructing Local Theologies; J. R. W. Stott and R. T. Coote, eds., Down to Earth: Studies in Christianity and Culture.

Contingency Argument for God. See GOD, ARGUMENTS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF.

Contingent Being. See BEING.

Continuous Creation. See CREATION, CONTINUOUS.

Contraception. See BIRTH CONTROL.

Contra-Remonstrants. The name given the Dutch defenders of Calvinist orthodoxy in their struggle with the Arminians in the early seventeenth century. Francis Gomarus, a colleague of James Arminius at the University of Leyden, attacked his teaching that the human will is free in matters pertaining to salvation. A great controversy was thus ignited. A year after Arminius died in 1609, Arminian ministers adopted a Remonstrance written by Johannes Uitenbogaert, their new leader. It had five points: (1) conditional election, (2) universal atonement, (3) saving faith as due to the Holy Spirit, (4) resistible grace, (5) perseverance as uncertain.

The Dutch Calvinists framed a Contra-Remonstrance, a counter-declaration, which was made public at the Conference at The Hague in 1611. The introduction accused the Arminians of seeking to change the religion of the Dutch Reformed Church as evidenced by their desire to revise the Belgic Confession. The Contra-Remonstrance maintained: (1) All human beings are totally depraved and incapable of saving themselves; (2) God predestines to both salvation and reprobation; (3) believers' children are to be considered as elect, and if they die in infancy, as saved; (4) election is not based on foreseen faith or deeds, but solely on God's favor; (5) Christ's atonement is sufficient for all, but efficient only for the elect; (6) faith and conversion are the results of the Holy Spirit's work of regeneration; (7) the elect will persevere because God preserves them; and (8) these truths do not breed carelessness, but virtue. The conclusion rejected the Arminian distortions of Calvinism and pled for a national synod. Henceforth, these Calvinists were called Contra-Remonstrants.

Contra-Remonstrants

The Dutch States-General, under its leader Oldebarnevelt, inclined toward the Arminian party chiefly due to its Erastian views. The Contra-Remonstrants continued the fight under the leadership of Gomarus, Hommius, Plancius, and Bogerman. The decisive political event occurred in 1618, when Prince Maurice of Orange sided with the Calvinists. A national synod was held at Dort in 1618–19, where, with the support of delegates of Reformed churches from many nations, the Calvinism of the Contra-Remonstrants was upheld and the Arminians and their views condemned.

R. A. PETERSON

See also DORT, SYNOD OF; GOMARUS, FRANCIS; REMONSTRANTS.

Bibliography. D. Nobbs, Theocracy and Toleration: A Study of the Disputes in Dutch Calvinism, 1600–1650; P. Schaff, Creeeds of Christendom; T. Scott, Articles of the Synod of Dort and Its Rejection of Errors.

Contribution, Gift of. See SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

Conversion. An integral concept in the Bible, though it does not always appear under this name in English translations. In the OT it is directly related to the Hebrew sûb, the twelfth most frequently used verb, which signifies to turn back, go back, come back, or return. It is also associated with the Hebrew niham, which means to be sorry or to regret. In the NT the two principal words indicating "to turn" are epistrephō and metanoēō. The latter and its cognates indicate a renewal of mind and heart, heartfelt repentance. A key passage in the Synoptic Gospels is Matthew 18:3: "Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven" (KJV). In the NEB the first part reads, "Unless you turn round. . . ."

In the developing Catholic tradition conversion was more and more associated with the sacraments of baptism, penance, and confirmation. It was said that in baptism one receives the remission of sins, but for sins committed after baptism one must have recourse to the sacrament of penance, which entails confession of sins, absolution by the priest, and acts of penitence, which mitigate the severity of the temporal consequences of sin.

As mysticism penetrated Catholic spirituality, conversion came to be associated with the first stage of the mystical way, purgation—which, it was hoped, would lead to illumination and finally to contemplative union. The beginning of the illuminative way was often marked by what was called a second conversion.

Monastic spirituality, heavily influenced by mysticism, saw a twofold blessing of the Spirit: in baptism and in monastic dedication. The latter was frequently referred to as both a second baptism and a second conversion. It was regarded as a new empowering of the Spirit for vocation. Conversion in this context means retiring from the world and commitment to the religious life.

In Reformation theology conversion was understood as the human response to regeneration, the infusion of new life into the soul. Conversion was held to be dependent on grace; it was seen as an act empowered and directed by divine grace. Calvinism was inclined to portray this grace as irresistible, with the result that conversion became a virtually spontaneous turning of the one who was elected to receive grace. Luther believed that conversion could be aborted and that one could fall away from one's conversion. Both Calvin and Luther envisaged the whole Christian life as a life of conversion.

Among the later evangelicals conversion came to be associated with a crisis experience that inaugurates the new life in Christ. In some circles it was regarded as an event involving total transformation. In the Holiness Movement conversion was seen as the initiation of Christian life and entire sanctification as the fulfillment of Christian life.

Karl Barth in the twentieth century has portrayed conversion (Umkehr) as the pivotal event in history, the liberation and renewal of the world in Jesus Christ. The awakenings to the reality of this event can be described as conversion (Bekehrung) in a secondary sense.

In an evangelical theology that seeks to be true to Scripture and the Reformation, conversion has two sides, divine and human. It represents the incursion of divine grace into human life, the resurrection from spiritual death to eternal life. It is commonly said that we are active in conversion just as we are passive in regeneration, but this must not be understood synergistically. We are active only on the basis of grace, only through the power of grace. We do not procure salvation, but we decide for salvation once our inward eyes are opened to its reality. Conversion is the sign but not the condition of our justification, whose sole source is the free, unconditional grace of God.

Conversion is both an event and a process. It signifies the action of the Holy Spirit upon us by which we are moved to respond to Jesus Christ in faith. It also includes the continuing work of the Holy Spirit within us purifying us of discord and contumacy, remolding us in the image of Christ. This work of purification is accomplished as we repent and cling to Christ anew.

Again, conversion is both personal and social. While it basically connotes a change in our relationship with God, it indicates at the same time an alteration in our attitudes toward our fellow human beings. Conversion is a spiritual event with far-reaching social implications. It entails accepting Christ not only as Savior from sin but also as Lord of all of life.

Finally, conversion must be seen as the beginning of our ascent to Christian perfection. What is needed is not a second conversion by which such perfection is secured but the continuing and maintaining of a conversion that is never completed in this life. Evangelical theology in the tradition of the Reformation contends that we can make progress toward perfection, but we can never attain it as a realized goal. Even the converted need to repent, even the sanctified need to turn again to Christ and be cleansed anew (cf. Ps. 51:10–12; Luke 17:3–4; 22:32; Rom. 13:14; Eph. 4:22–24; Rev. 2:4–5, 16; 3:19).

We cannot be converted through our own power, but we can repent and turn to Christ through the power of his Spirit. We cannot maintain our walk with Christ on the basis of our own resources, but we can maintain this walk with the aid of his Spirit. Conversion entails the promise of sanctification just as it reveals the gift of justification.

D. G. BLOESCH

See also EVANGELISM; FAITH; GRACE; JUSTIFICATION; REGENERATION; SALVATION; SANCTIFICATION.

Bibliography. J. Baillie, Baptism and Conversion; K. Barth, Church Dogmatics; D. G. Bloesch, Christian Life and Salvation; Crisis of Piety; Essentials of Evangelical Theology; J. Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion; B. Citron, New Birth; A. B. Crabtree, Restored Relationship; P. T. Forsyth, Work of Christ; J. H. Gerstner, Steps to Salvation; A. Koeberle, Quest for Holiness; K. Rahner, Christian Commitment; E. Routley, Gift of Conversion; H. Schmid, Doctrinal Theology of the Evangelical Lutheran Church; W. G. T. Shedd, Dogmatic Theology; P. S. Watson, Concept of Grace.

Cooperation, Ecclesiastical. See ECUMENISM.

Correction. See CHURCH DISCIPLINE.

Cosmological Argument for God. See GOD, ARGUMENTS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF.

Councils, Church. A council is a conference called by the leaders of the church to give guidance to the church. The first council took place in Jerusalem (ca. A.D. 50) for the purpose of opposing Judaizing efforts and is recorded in Acts 15. The results of this first Council of Jerusalem were normative for the entire early Christian church. However, the Jerusalem Council must be distinguished from succeeding councils in that it had apostolic leadership.

A council may be either ecumenical and thus representative of the entire church, or it may be local, having regional or local representation. For example, twelve regional councils met to discuss the Arian heresy between the ecumenical councils of Nicea in 325 and Constantinople in 381.

Whereas previously the term "ecumenical" meant a representation based on the widest geographical coverage, during our present millennium the meaning shifted to denote the pope's inherent authority to declare a council ecumenical. Thus the pope, understood as exercising Christ's rule on earth, has authority to declare or to reject a council as ecumenical. Although this papal prerogative was operative earlier, it finds explicit affirmation in the Vatican II decree "Light of the Nations," which states: "A council is never ecumenical unless it is confirmed or at least accepted as such by the successor of Peter." The situation became problematic with general councils that had been called by emperors, as was Nicea in 325. These were declared ecumenical by the popes after the fact.

It was precisely to this absolute authority of the pope to convene councils that Martin Luther directed one of his significant 1520 pamphlets, Address to the Christian Nobility. Luther viewed such papal prerogatives as one of the "three walls" that had to be broken down.

Historically, councils have been called by emperors, popes, and bishops. The first seven councils were convoked in the East by emperors and were thus typical of Eastern caesaropapism (state over church). In the Western church the pope typically convened councils, except for a time during the Great Schism (1378–1417) when the plurality of bishops both convened councils and deposed popes (conciliarism). Indeed, the Council of Constance in 1415 proclaimed the superiority of general councils over the pope. But their supremacy was short-lived. By 1500 the pontiff had overcome the conciliar movement and was again convening councils.

While both Roman Catholics and the Eastern Orthodox churches regard the first councils as ecumenical, Protestant churches also regard as valid many of the declarations of these councils. This is because these councils largely concerned themselves with controversies over the deity, person, and natures of Christ. After the split between the Roman Catholic (Western) and Orthodox (Eastern) churches each branch began its own authoritative councils.

Councils, Church

The most significant of the early councils were Nicaea (325) and Chalcedon (451). The former settled the issue of the nature of Christ as God, whereas the latter dealt with the issues of the twofold natures of Christ and their unity. In the case of Nicaea a presbyter of Alexandria, Arius, maintained that Christ was not the eternal Son of God. Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria, vigorously opposed that idea, declaring Christ to be of the same substance (homoousios) with God. Athanasius and orthodoxy prevailed. In general, this was the first theological declaration binding on the entire postapostolic church.

The Council of Chalcedon was called in 451 by the emperor Marcion for the purpose of settling disputes and clarifying the issue of the unity of the two natures of Christ. The resultant Chalcedonian Creed, or Definition, afforded the entire Christian Church a standard of christological orthodoxy in declaring that Christ's two natures exist "without confusion, without change, without division, without separation."

Subsequent councils found it necessary to consolidate the gains of Chalcedon and to oppose further christological errors. These councils terminated with the Third Council of Constantinople in 680–81.

In the West the Second Synod of Orange (529) was very significant in both combating semi-Pelagianism and setting forth the gracious character of salvation apart from works. Although it was not officially ecumenical, its declarations prevailed de jure but not de facto in the Roman Catholic Church down to the Reformation era.

After the separation of the Eastern and Western churches in 1054 it became characteristic of the pope to convene councils in the Roman Catholic Church. Beginning in 1123 a series of so-called Lateran Councils was held at Rome in the Church of St. John Lateran. The most important of these was the Fourth Lateran Council (1215) convened by the great Pope Innocent III. This council declared transubstantiation to be the accepted interpretation of Christ's presence in the Lord's Supper.

The next most significant council was the Council of Trent, 1545–63. This council should be viewed as both a counter to the Protestant Reformation and an establishing of key tenets of Roman Catholicism. Both Scripture and tradition were declared authoritative for the church. Salvation by grace alone through faith was jettisoned in favor of sacramental and works righteousness. Modern Roman Catholicism, in general, continues to be Tridentine Catholicism.

The two Vatican Councils each represent both the old and the new. Vatican I (1869–70) made official what had long been practiced—papal infallibility. Vatican II (1962–65) was attended by both traditional and radical Roman Catholics. Its pronouncements regarding the universal character of the church approach sheer universalism. Its more open stance toward the Bible is hailed by most Protestants as very salutary. Thus the term used at Vatican II, aggiornamento (modernization), has to some extent been realized in post-Vatican II Roman Catholicism. J. H. HALL

See also CHALCEDON, COUNCIL OF; CONSTANTINOPLE, FIRST COUNCIL OF; ECUMENICAL COUNCILS; EPHESUS, COUNCIL OF; NICEA, COUNCIL OF; TRENT, COUNCIL OF; VATICAN COUNCIL I; VATICAN COUNCIL II.

Bibliography. G. J. Cuming and D. Baker, eds., Councils and Assemblies; P. Hughes, Church in Crisis: A History of the General Councils 325–1870.

Counter-Reformation. The label for the Roman Catholic revival of the sixteenth century. It emphasizes that the reaction to the Protestant challenge was the dominant theme of contemporary Catholicism. The movement is also labeled the Catholic Reformation and the Catholic renaissance, since elements of Catholic reform and revival predated the Protestant Reformation and were, like Protestantism, a response to the widespread aspiration for religious regeneration pervading late fifteenth-century Europe. It is now better understood that the two reformations—Protestant and Catholic—though believing themselves to be in opposition, had many similarities and drew on a common past: the revival of preaching exemplified in the great pre-Reformation preachers like Jan Hus, Bernardino of Siena, and Savonarola; the Christ-centered, practical mysticism of the Devotio Moderna; the movement for ecclesiastical reform headed by Cardinal Ximénez de Cisneros in Spain but also well represented by reforming bishops in France and Germany.

The Counter-Reformation is sometimes described as a Spanish movement. Over three thousand mystical works are known to have been written in sixteenth century Spain, suggesting that mysticism was a popular movement. But the dominant Spanish mystics were three aristocrats: Teresa of Ávila (1515–82), John of the Cross (1542–91), and Ignatius of Loyola (1491–1556). Two of the three great instruments of the Counter-Reformation stemmed from Spain, namely the Society of Jesus and the Inquisition. The third was the Council of Trent, which was finally convened in 1545 after constant pressure from the Emperor Charles V, grandson of Spain's great reforming monarchs, Ferdinand and Isabella.

The Society of Jesus (Jesuits), incorporated in 1540, was the most remarkable of the new orders of reformed priests (clerks regular) who lived among the faithful rather than withdrawing into monasteries. Other orders included the Theatines (1524), Somaschi (1532), and Barnabites (1534). The founder of the Jesuits, Ignatius of Loyola, sought to prepare his followers for a life of triumphal service and heroic self-sacrifice through his Spiritual Exercises, a series of practical meditations. The Jesuits ministered to the poor, educated boys, and evangelized the heathen. Francis Xavier (1506–52), a Spanish Jesuit, traveled to Goa, South India, Ceylon, Malaya, and Japan on his amazing missionary journeys. When Ignatius died, the society had around 1,000 members administering 100 foundations. A century later there were over 15,000 Jesuits and 550 foundations, testifying to the sustained vitality of the Counter-Reformation.

The Roman Inquisition was established in 1542 by Pope Paul III to suppress Lutheranism in Italy. Cardinal Caraffa, its Inquisitor General, later Pope Paul IV (1555–59), directed that heretics in high places should be dealt with most severely, “for on their punishment, the salvation of the classes beneath them depends.” The Roman Inquisition reached its peak during the pontificate of the zealot Pius V (1566–72), systematically extirpating Italian Protestants and securing Italy as a base for a counteroffensive on the Protestant north.

The corrupt hierarchy of the Roman Catholic Church was dramatically reformed in the wake of the Council of Trent. Dioceses mushroomed in areas where there was felt to be a particular Protestant threat. Bishops carried out frequent visitations of their dioceses and established seminaries for the training of clergy. The number of church buildings and clergy increased markedly. The most vigorous of the reforming popes, Sixtus V (1585–90), established fifteen “congregations” or commissions to prepare papal pronouncements and strategy. Some Protestant gains were reversed under the direction of such theologians as Robert Bellarmine (1542–1621) and Peter Canisius (1521–97). The Counter-Reformation in general, and the Council of Trent in particular, strengthened the position of the pope and the forces of clericalism and authoritarianism. However, the genuinely spiritual concerns that these developments evidenced need not be denied.

F. S. PIGGIN

See also REFORMATION, PROTESTANT; SOCIETY OF JESUS; TRENT, COUNCIL OF.

Bibliography. H. Daniel-Rops, Catholic Reformation; J. Delumeau, Catholicism between Luther and Voltaire; A. G. Dickens, Counter-Reformation; P. Dudon, St. Ignatius of Loyola; H. O. Evvenett, Spirit of the Counter-Reformation; P. Janelle, Catholic Reformation; B. J. Kidd, Counter-Reformation, 1550–1600; Spiritual Exercises of St. Ignatius, tr. A. Mottola; M. R. O’Connell, Counter-Reformation 1559–1610; A. D. Wright, Counter-Reformation.

Covenant. A compact or agreement between two parties binding them mutually to undertakings on each other’s behalf. Theologically (used of relations between God and man) it denotes a gracious undertaking entered into by God for the benefit and blessing of humanity, and specifically of those who by faith receive the promises and commit themselves to the obligations which this undertaking involves.

In the OT. Uniformly the word used to express the covenant concept is the Hebrew bērit. The original meaning of this word was probably “fetter” or “obligation,” coming from a root bārâ, “to bind.” This root does not occur as a verb in Hebrew, but it does occur in Akkadian as bārû, “to bind,” and appears as a noun in the Akkadian birûtu, which means “bond” or “fetter.” Thus a bērit would originally signify a relationship between two parties wherein each bound himself to perform a certain service or duty for the other. But some scholars prefer to derive this noun from the verb bārâ “to eat,” which occurs in 2 Samuel 12:17; 13:6; etc., and thus interpret it as “a meal” or “food,” with reference to the sacrificial meal which the contracting parties often ate together when ratifying their agreement before the deity who was invoked as protector and guarantor of the covenant. Still others trace it from a bārâ meaning “to perceive” or “to determine”; hence bērit would involve the basic idea of “vision.” But neither of these explanations commends itself as being so fitting or appropriate to the basic character of a covenant as the idea of “bond” preferred by the majority of scholars.

A general characteristic of the OT bērit is its unalterable and permanently binding character. The parties to a covenant obligated themselves to carry out their respective commitments under the penalty of divine retribution should they later attempt to avoid them. Usually, although not necessarily, the promise of each was supported by some sort of legal consideration or quid pro quo. But where the one party to the agreement was greatly superior to the other in power or authority, the situation was a bit different: the ruler or man of authority would in the enactment of the bērit simply announce his governmental decree or constitution which he thought best to impose upon those under him, and they for their part expressed their acceptance and readiness to conform to what he had ordained. Doubtless it was true even in this type of covenant that the ruler implicitly committed himself to rule for the best interests of his people and to contrive for their protection against their foes.

But in the case of the promulgation of a covenant by God with his chosen people, this one-sided aspect of the transaction was even more apparent, since the contracting parties stood upon entirely different levels. In this case the covenant constituted a divine announcement of God’s holy will to extend the benefits of his unmerited grace to those who were willing by faith to receive them, and who by entering into a personal commitment to God bound themselves to him by ties of absolute obligation. The characteristic statement of this relationship occurs in the formula "I will be their God and they shall be my people" (cf. Jer. 11:4; 24:7; 30:22; 32:38; Ezek. 11:20; 14:11; 36:28; 37:23; Zech. 8:8; etc.). This signifies that God unreservedly gives himself to his people and that they in turn give themselves to him and belong to him. Thus they are his "peculiar treasure" (sēgullā—Exod. 19:5; Deut. 7:6; 14:2; 26:18; Ps. 135:4; Mal. 3:17). His motive in adopting them as his own covenant children is stated to be "lovingkindness" or "covenant-love" (hesed), a term with which bērit is often associated (cf. Deut. 7:9; 1 Kings 8:23; Dan. 9:4). (Compare also 1 Sam. 20:8, where Jonathan is said to exercise hesed in his covenant relationship with David.) This presents a remarkable contrast to the motivation attributed by the heathen Semites to their gods, who were uniformly depicted as entering into covenant relations with their devotees for the purpose of extracting service and nourishment from their altars, more or less like the feudal lords of human society who extract their support from the labor of their vassals.

Covenant

One very important element in God's covenant relations with Israel lay in the dual aspect of conditionality and unconditionality. Were his solemn promises, which partook of the nature of a binding oath (cf. Deut. 7:8), to be understood as capable of nonfulfillment, in case of the failure of man to live up to his obligations toward God? Or was there a sense in which God's covenant undertakings were absolutely sure of fulfillment, regardless of the unfaithfulness of man? The answer to this much-debated question seems to be: (1) that the promises made by the Lord in the covenant of grace represent decrees that he will surely bring to pass, when conditions are ripe for their fulfillment; (2) that the personal benefit—and especially the spiritual and eternal benefit—of the divine promise will accrue only to those individuals of the covenant people of God who manifest a true and living faith (demonstrated by a godly life). Thus the first aspect is brought out by the initial form of the covenant with Abram in Genesis 12:1–3; there is no shadow of doubt but what God will truly make of Abram a great nation, and make his name great, and shall bless all the nations of earth through him and his posterity (cf. Gal. 3:8). This is set forth as God's plan from the very beginning; nothing shall frustrate it. On the other hand, the individual children of Abraham are to receive personal benefit only as they manifest the faith and obedience of Abraham; thus Exodus 19:5–6 ("Now if you obey me fully and keep my covenant, then . . . you will be my treasured possession. . . . You will be for me a kingdom of priests and a holy nation"). In other words, God will see to it that his plan of redemption will be carried out in history, but he will also see to it that none partake of the eternal benefits of the covenant in violation of the demands of holiness. No child of the covenant who presents to him a faithless and insincere heart shall be included in its blessings.

This triumphantly enduring quality of the covenant of grace is especially set forth by the prophets in the form of the "new covenant." In the classic passage on this theme (Jer. 31:31–37) the earliest phase of the covenant (that was effected at Sinai) is shown to have been temporary and provisional because of the flagrant violation of it by the Israelite nation as a whole, and because of their failure to know or acknowledge God as their personal Lord and Savior. But there is a time coming, says the Lord, when he will put his holy law into their very hearts, so that their inclination and desire will be to live according to his holy standard. Moreover he shall beget within them a sense of sonship toward himself, so that they shall have a personal knowledge and love of him that will not require artificial human teaching. Furthermore the carrying out of this redeeming purpose is stated to be as sure as the continued existence of sun, moon, and stars, or even of the foundations of heaven itself.

In the NT. The term for covenant employed in the NT is diathēkē, the word used constantly in the LXX for bērit. Since the ordinary Greek word for "contract" or "compact" (synthēkē) implied equality on the part of the contracting parties, the Greek-speaking Jews preferred diathēkē (coming from diatithēmai, "to make a disposition of one's own property") in the sense of a unilateral enactment. In secular Greek this word usually meant "will" or "testament," but even classical authors like Aristophanes occasionally used it of a covenant wherein one of the two parties had an overwhelming superiority over the other and could dictate his own terms. Hence the biblical diathēkē signified (in a way much more specific than did bērit) an arrangement made by one party with plenary power, which the other party may accept or reject but cannot alter. Johannes Behm (TDNT 2:137) defines it as "the decree (Verfügung) of God, the powerful disclosure of the sovereign will of God in history whereby he constitutes the relationship, the authoritative divine ordinance (institution), which introduces a corresponding order of affairs." There is just one passage in which the more usual secular significance of "will" or "testament" appears along with the covenantal idea: Hebrews 9:15–17. A legal analogy is drawn from the fact that a testator must die before his will can take effect; so also in the enactment of the Mosaic covenant there was slain a sacrificial animal, representing the atonement of Christ, and it was the blood of that victim which was sprinkled upon the people and the covenantal document itself. But even here the predominant notion in diathēke is “covenant” rather than “testament.” C. L. ARCHER JR.

See also COVENANT, NEW.

Bibliography. K. Baltzer, Covenant Formulary; J. Behm and G. Quell, TDNT 2:106–34; G. R. Berry, ISBE 2:727–29; A. B. Davidson, Theology of the Old Testament; W. Eichrodt, Theology of the Old Testament; G. Gurt, NIDNTT 1:365–76; D. R. Hillers, Covenant: History of a Biblical Idea; M. G. Kline, Treaty of the Great King; D. J. McCarthy, OT Covenant; G. E. Mendenhall, Law and Covenant in Israel and the Ancient Near East; G. Oehler, Theology of the Old Testament; W. Oesterley and T. H. Robinson, Hebrew Religion; G. Vos, Biblical Theology.

Covenant, New. Jeremiah first speaks of a new covenant in his prophecy of a great work of salvation which God would perform sometime in the future (Jer. 31:31–34). In substance, Jeremiah’s new covenant prophecy has strong affinities with other prophetic texts that depict the triumph and consummation of the kingdom of God in the world (cf. Isa. 11:6–9; 54:11–15; 59:20–21; Jer. 32:36–41; 33:14–26; Ezek. 16:59–63). The term is found six times in the NT (1 Cor. 11:25; 2 Cor. 3:6; Heb. 8:8; 9:15; 12:24; and the disputed reading in Luke 22:20) though the idea of a new covenant is present elsewhere (cf. Rom. 11:27; Gal. 4:21–31). In 2 Corinthians 3:4–18 the new covenant is contrasted with the old covenant in the context of Paul’s contrasting his ministry with that of Moses. By the time of Tertullian, Old Covenant (Vetus Testamentum) and New Covenant (Novum Testamentum) appear as designations of the pre-Christian and Christian Scriptures respectively.

In Christian theology generally the new covenant has been identified with the Christian dispensation, the religiohistorical economy introduced by Christ and the apostles. Accordingly, it is the fulfillment of the promises of the old covenant and is better by degrees than that former covenant by virtue of its clearer view of Christ and redemption, its richer experience of the Holy Spirit, and by the greater liberty which it grants to believers.

Particularly in Reformed theology, as a result of its careful reflection on the scriptural doctrine of the covenants, the new covenant came to be given a double aspect. To account for the fact that there has ever been but one covenant of God with his people, of which Christ is the mediator, and the fact that in Jeremiah and the NT the term “new covenant” is a synonym for the gospel of Christ and the divine application of redemption, the new covenant was identified both strictly with that form of the covenant of grace manifested after the incarnation and broadly with the covenant of grace in general (cf. F. Turretin, Institutio Theologiae Elencticae, 12.8.5).

A better solution is to forsake altogether the religio-historical identifications of the two covenants. Jeremiah’s prophecy of a new covenant is a prophecy of the ultimate consummation of the kingdom of God, and in Paul and Hebrews the contrast between the old covenant and the new covenant has to do not with relative distinctions between the two dispensations of God’s covenant of grace succeeding one another in time but with the radical antithesis of two subjective situations: the formalism, legalism, unbelief, and death of ancient Israel on the one hand and the genuine experience of salvation by all believers on the other.

R. S. RAYBURN

See also COVENANT.

Bibliography. Augustine, Spirit and the Letter; Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion; R. L. Dabney, Lectures in Systematic Theology; Irenaeus, Against Heresies; W. Kaiser, “Old Promise and the New Covenant,” JETS 15:11–23; J. Murray, Covenant of Grace; O. P. Robertson, Christ of the Covenants; W. B. Wallis, “Pauline Conception of the Old Covenant,” Presb 4:71–83; H. Witius, Economy of the Covenants between God and Man.

Covenant of Grace. See COVENANT THEOLOGY.

Covenant of Redemption. See COVENANT THEOLOGY.

Covenant of Works. See COVENANT THEOLOGY.

Covenant Theology. Although God’s covenant with his people is central to the biblical revelation and is mentioned in patristic and late medieval writings, it was not developed as a doctrine until the Reformation of the sixteenth century. Ulrich Zwingli and Heinrich Bullinger, laboring together in Switzerland, saw that Scripture teaches that God has established a covenantal relationship with humanity which includes his gracious promises and our obligations. Bullinger’s voluminous writings include a treatise entitled “One and Eternal Testament or Covenant” (1534), which influenced later Reformed thinking. Although Calvin gave the covenant less prominence in his writings than Bullinger, it appears frequently, and in some of his successors it assumes central importance again. The emphasis on God’s covenantal dealings with the human race tended to lessen what appeared to some to be harshness in the earlier Reformed theology which emanated from Geneva with its emphasis on the divine sovereignty and predestination. These latter doctrines received special treatment by Calvin during and after the Bolsec controversy, by Beza in his long career in Geneva, and by the Synod of Dort in the Netherlands in its response to Arminianism. The shift in accent was not intended to weaken church teaching regarding other doctrine, however, and most Reformed theology stressed God's sovereignty in salvation manifested in his covenantal relations with mankind. Covenantal, or federal, theology, as this came to be called, saw the covenant as a compact, or agreement, which God established as a reflection of the relationship existing between the three persons of the Holy Trinity. From Switzerland covenant theology passed over into Germany, and from there into the Netherlands and the British Isles. Among its early and most influential advocates were, besides Zwingli and Bullinger, Olevianus (Concerning the Nature of the Covenant of Grace between God and the Elect, 1585), Cocceius (Doctrine of the Covenant and Testaments of God, 1648), and Witsius (Oeconomy of the Covenants, 1685). Covenant theology was taken up into the Westminster Confession and came to have an important place in the theology of Scotland and New England.

Covenant Theology

The Covenant of Works. Having created man in his own image as a free creature with knowledge, righteousness, and holiness, God entered into covenant with Adam that he might bestow upon him further blessing. Called variously the Edenic covenant, the covenant of nature, the covenant of life, or preferably the covenant of works, this pact consisted of (1) a promise of eternal life upon the condition of perfect obedience throughout a probationary period; (2) the threat of death upon disobedience; and (3) the sacrament of the tree of life, or, in addition, the sacraments of paradise and the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. Although the term "covenant" is not mentioned in the first chapters of Genesis, it is held that all the elements of a covenant are present even though the promise of eternal life is there by implication only. Before the fall Adam was perfect but could still have sinned; had he retained his perfection throughout the probationary period, he would have been confirmed in righteousness and been unable to sin. Inasmuch as he was acting not only for himself but representatively for mankind, Adam's acts were not just private to himself. His fall therefore affected the entire human race that was to come after him; all are now conceived and born in sin. Without a special intervention of God there would be no hope; all would be lost forever.

The good news, however, is that God has intervened in behalf of humankind with another covenant. Unlike the earlier covenant of works, whose mandate was "Do this and you shall live" (cf. Rom. 10:5; Gal. 3:12), the covenant of grace is bestowed on people in their sinful condition with the promise that, in spite of their inability to keep any of the commandments of God, out of sheer grace he forgives their sin and accepts them as his children through the merits of his Son, the Lord Jesus Christ, on the condition of faith.

The Covenant of Redemption. According to covenant theology, the covenant of grace, established in history, is founded on still another covenant, the covenant of redemption, which is defined as the eternal pact between God the Father and God the Son concerning the salvation of humankind. Scripture teaches that within the Godhead there are three persons, the same in essence, glory, and power, objective to each other. The Father loves the Son, commissions him, gives him a people, the right to judge, and authority over all mankind (Ps. 2:7-8; John 3:16; 5:20, 22, 36; 10:17-18; 17:2, 4, 6, 9, 24; Heb. 1:8-13); the Son loves the Father, delights to do his will, and has shared his glory forever (John 5:19; 17:5; Heb. 10:7). The Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit commune with each other; this is one of the meanings of the Christian doctrine of the Trinity. On this foundation the covenant theology affirms that God the Father and God the Son covenanted together for the redemption of the human race, the Father appointing the Son to be the mediator, the Second Adam, whose life would be given for the salvation of the world, and the Son accepting the commission, promising that he would do the work which the Father had given him to do and fulfill all righteousness by obeying the law of God. Thus before the foundation of the world, within the eternal being of God, it had been determined that creation would not be destroyed by sin, but that rebellion and iniquity would be overcome by God's grace, that Christ would become the new head of humanity, the Savior of the world, and that God would be glorified.

The Covenant of Grace. This covenant has been made by God with mankind. In it he offers life and salvation through Christ to all who believe. Inasmuch as none can believe without the special grace of God, it is more exact to say that the covenant of grace is made by God with believers, or the elect. Jesus said that all those whom the Father had given him would come to him and that those who come would surely be accepted (John 6:37). Herein is seen the close relation between the covenant of grace and the covenant of redemption, with the former resting on the latter. From eternity the Father has given a people to the Son; to them was given the promised Holy Spirit so that they might live in fellowship with God. Christ is the mediator of the covenant of grace inasmuch as he has borne the guilt of sinners and restored them to a saving relationship to God (Heb. 8:6; 9:15; 12:24). He is mediator, not only in the sense of arbitrator, although that is the sense in which the word is used in 1 Timothy 2:5, but in the sense of having fulfilled all the conditions necessary for procuring eternal salvation for his people. Thus Hebrews 7:22 calls Jesus the “surety” or “guarantee” of the new covenant, which is better than that which came through Moses. Within the context of this last passage repeated mention is made of God’s promise to Christ and his people. He will be their God and they will be his people. He will bestow on them the grace they need to confess his name and live with him forever; in humble dependence on him for their every need, they will live in trustful obedience from day to day. This latter, in Scripture called faith, is the sole condition of the covenant, and even it is a gift of God (Eph. 2:8–9).

Although the covenant of grace includes various dispensations of history, it is essentially one. From the promise in the garden (Gen. 3:15), through the covenant made with Noah (Gen. 6–9), to the day that the covenant was established with Abraham, there is abundant evidence of God’s grace. With Abraham a new beginning is made which the later, Sinaitic covenant implements and strengthens. At Sinai the covenant assumes a national form and stress is laid on the law of God. This is not intended to alter the gracious character of the covenant, however (Gal. 3:17–18), but it is to serve to train Israel until the time would come when God himself would appear in its midst. In Jesus the new form of the covenant that had been promised by the prophets is manifest, and that which was of a temporary nature in the old form of the covenant disappears (Jer. 31:31–34; Heb. 8). While there is unity and continuity in the covenant of grace throughout history, the coming of Christ and the subsequent gift of the Holy Spirit have brought rich gifts unknown in an earlier age. These are a foretaste of future blessedness when this present world passes away and the Holy City, the New Jerusalem, comes down out of heaven from God (Rev. 21:2).

M. E. OSTERHAVEN

See also COVENANT; FEDERAL THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. J. W. Baker, Heinrich Bullinger and the Covenant; H. Bavinck, Our Reasonable Faith; L. Berkhof, Systematic Theology; H. Heppe, Reformed Dogmatics; C. Hodge, Systematic Theology; C. S. McCoy, “Johannes Cocceius: Federal Theologian,” SJT 16; M. McGiffert, “From Moses to Adam: The Making of the Covenant of Works,” SCJ 19; “Grace and Works: The Rise and Division of Covenant Divinity in Elizabethan Puritanism,” HTR 75; J. Murray, Covenant of Grace; M. E. Osterhaven, “Calvin on the Covenant,” in Readings in Calvin’s Theology, ed. D. K. McKim; D. A. Weir, Origins of the Federal Theology in Sixteenth-Century Reformation Thought.

Creation, Continuous. The theory that the universe is a result of a new creation from moment to moment. The name of the school of thought in cosmology to which continuous creation cosmology refers is the “Steady State Cosmology.” It points to a universe which is expanding, but which is infinite in age—thus the assumption of the “continuous creation” of matter in the intergalactic medium to keep the density of the universe constant. For Christians who hold this position, God is regarded as both the originator of all being and the only cause of all natural effects in each successive moment. Thus sustenance or preservation is really continued creation.

This view was held by the New England theologians Edwards, Hopkins, and Emmons, and more recently by Rothe in Germany. Opponents of the steady state continuous creation view (Hoyle, Bondi, and Gold) stress that regular activity is not the mere repetition of an initial decision but an act of the will quite different in kind. Moreover, if God’s will is the only force in the universe, the divine will must in that case be the author of human sin. Finally, continuous creation tends to pantheism; mind and matter alike become phenomena of one force and, in the end, the distinct existence and personality of God is lost.

The continuous creation theory of scientific cosmology is in contrast with theories which postulate a beginning to the universe (e.g., the “big bang” theory). In 1929 Edwin Hubble discovered the expansion of the universe. Many cosmologists now infer a time of origin in a highly localized sense. The continuous creation “steady state” cosmologists retain an expanding universe but posit a continuous creation of hydrogen in the intergalactic medium to keep the density of the universe constant. The identification and detection of the microwave background radiation in 1965 dealt a severe blow to the steady state and continuous creation theory, since this radiation is identified as being the remnant of the radiation from the “big bang.” Some cosmologists also argue that continuous creation and its implications of an infinite age for the universe conflicts with the second law of thermodynamics, in which entropy (disorganization) increases with time. Further creation would be required to remove the accumulated entropy.

Recent data from the satellite COBE, the Cosmic Background Explorer, measured the microwave background radiation to at least a part in one hundred million. It found a fit of the microwave background radiation to a black body spectrum (as predicated by the Big Bang Cosmology) to better than four significant figures—strong agreement indeed. The steady state cosmology does not predict such a black body radiation. Thus, adding the results of COBE has left us with practically all astronomers and cosmologists using some form of the Big Bang theory (the so-called standard model).

M. H. MACDONALD AND O. K. KRIENKE JR.

See also CREATION, DOCTRINE OF; ORIGIN OF THE UNIVERSE.

Creation, Continuous

Bibliography. G. O. Abell, Exploration of the Universe; J. M. Pasachoff, Contemporary Astronomy; H. L. Shipman, Black Holes, Quasars, and the Universe; A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology.

Creation, Doctrine of. Both the opening verse of the Bible and the opening sentence of the Apostles' Creed confess God as Creator. In Scripture the theme of God as Creator of the "heavens and the earth" (Gen. 1:1) is prominent in both the OT (Isa. 40:28; 42:5; 45:18) and NT (Mark 13:19; Rev. 10:6). God is the Creator of humans (Gen. 1:27; 5:2; Isa. 45:12; Mal. 2:10; Mark 10:6), of Israel (Isa. 43:15), indeed of "all things" (Eph. 3:9; Col. 1:16; Rev. 4:11). Creation occurs by God's word (Gen. 1:3, etc.) so that when he speaks, all comes into being (Pss. 33:9; 148:5). His word of command which calls into being things that had no prior existence was uttered by the Word who was with God and is God (John 1:1-14). "All things were made through him, and without him was not anything made that was made" is the statement of John 1:3 with reference to the Word of God, Jesus Christ the Son who became flesh (John 1:14). Of Christ it is said that "by him all things were created" (Col. 1:16; cf. 1 Cor. 8:6), thus making Jesus Christ the agent of creation. The work of God's Spirit is also involved (Gen. 1:2; Job 33:4; Ps. 104:30). Creation is the work of the triune God and is an article of faith, as Hebrews 11:3 clearly shows.

Theologically, the doctrine of creation as an act of the triune God is of great importance. The history of the church's early creeds and confessions indicates this plainly. Struggles with Gnosticism, Arianism, and Manichaeism revolved in part around God as Creator and the relation of the Creator to the Redeemer, Jesus Christ. The church's three creedal statements from the early period reflect its attempt to join creation and redemption in the one living God. The Apostles' Creed added the phrase "maker of heaven and earth" to the old Roman Creed and recognized the Creator as the Father of Jesus Christ. The Nicene trinitarian statement (A.D. 325) spoke of the "maker of all things visible and invisible" who is "of the same substance" (homoousios) as the Son. The Council of Chalcedon (A.D. 451), after affirming earlier creeds that identified God as "Ruler of all, the maker of heaven and earth and of all things seen and unseen," confessed Jesus Christ as "very God and very man," thus again uniting Creator and Redeemer. The Creator God is not detached from the God who works for our salvation in Jesus Christ through his Holy Spirit.

Significance of Creation. Since God as Creator is the explanation for the existence of the world and for human existence, it is the activity of creation that establishes our deepest and most essential relation to God: as Creator and thus Lord. The doctrine of God as Creator, then, is perhaps the most basic conception of God that we know.

The church has held firmly to this doctrine over against other views of the relationship of God to the world. Pantheism teaches that "all is God." God is the world and all that is in it. Philosophically this is monism. Many dualistic systems have posited two equal and primary principles in the universe. In some of these "creation" occurs when two complementary principles unite in some way to produce a new "form" out of the already existing, independent "matter" or principles. Dualism is found in Eastern creation myths where a God of order subjugates a monster or principle of chaos. Perhaps the best-known form of a dualistic view is from the Platonic picture of creation in the Timaeus, where the Demiurge shapes the world out of chaos while viewing eternal "ideas" above him. Forms of dualism were the most prominent views of creation in the Hellenistic world of early Christianity. Gnosticism and Manichaeism were both dualistic systems.

Variations of these include emanationism, which explains the origins of reality by supposing a perfect and transcendent principle from which all else is derived by the process of "emanation," eternal generation (Aristotle), which posits the universe as having always existed, and deism, which gives a place to God as Creator but then totally removes him from any involvement in the world. Against all these the Christian doctrine of creation proclaims God as the Creator ex nihilo. This means God brought the world into existence "out of nothing" through a purposeful act of his free will. In this the Christian doctrine confesses God as the almighty and sovereign Lord of all existence. Dualistic systems, by positing another power besides God, limit this sovereignty and are thus to be rejected. By stressing God as Creator "out of nothing" instead of "out of matter" or what already existed, Christian theology rejects the moral dualism that often stems from metaphysical dualism (as in Manichaeism); namely, that matter must be evil since it is in principle opposed to God who is the source of good. The creative act of God sets God apart from all that is created, and thus monism is rejected as well. The Fourth Lateran Council (1215) made the term ex nihilo an official part of church teaching.

Theology of Creation. From the affirmation of God as Creator ex nihilo a number of theological points follow. Langdon Gilkey has cited three major dimensions of what this means theologically.

God Is the Source of All That There Is. God is the sovereign Lord over all things. No other principle or power can be coequal or coeternal with God. Since all that is comes from God's will as its source, nothing in existence is in itself evil. The biblical picture is of a good Creator whose creative word is powerful and wise (Jer. 10:12; Prov. 3:19) and who created all things good (Gen.

1:31). Creation ex nihilo by a good God points to the essential goodness of all things that can be directed and transformed by God's power. God as sole Creator means no thing or no one else may be worshiped. All forms of idolatry are prohibited. God's creative act ex nihilo was a unique act, unlike any natural or human act with which we are familiar. The relation between Creator and creature must thus be spoken of in a way that differs from how we speak of the relation of one finite event to another. Therefore the theological doctrine of creation cannot be examined in the fashion of contemporary science, which by definition deals only with the relations of finite events within limits and boundaries. The Christian doctrine of creation concerns ultimate origins, not the proximate origins with which science is concerned.

Creatures Are Dependent yet Real and Good. The Christian doctrine over against monistic pantheism affirms that creaturely existence is real because God created it and is thus "good" if it is in relationship to God. Human creatures have been given freedom and intelligence which may be used either to affirm or deny the fundamental relationship of existence, dependence on God. From this arises understandings of sin and grace in which creatures rebel and reject their Creator or are "re-created" by him through Jesus Christ (2 Cor. 5:17) into a relationship of love and fulfillment. The basic Christian view of the goodness of life helps make science possible by stressing the orderliness and relational aspects of life and value possible by nurturing the desire to control nature for positive human purposes.

God Creates in Freedom and with Purpose. Against theories of how the world was created by emanation, as rays of light from the sun, or generation through a process of mating and birth, or by craft, as a carpenter would form a box out of wood, the Christian doctrine of creation ex nihilo abandons any explanation of "how" creation took place. Creation was a free act of the free God. The act was an expression of the character of God which is variously described in the Scriptures but which finds its primary focus in love (1 John 4:16), specifically in God's love for the world as shown in Jesus Christ (John 3:16). In creation and in God's continuing sustaining and providing for creation, God is working out his ultimate purposes for humanity and the world. This means human life can be meaningful, intelligible, and purposeful even in the face of evil or "anything else in all creation," because life can be grounded in "the love of God that is in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom. 8:39). This points finally to God's purpose of creating "new heavens and a new earth" (Isa. 65:17; cf. 66:22; 2 Pet. 3:13; Rev. 21:1).

Contemporary Thought on Creation. Contemporary conversations between theologians and philosophers and between theologians and scientists have often addressed matters of creation in relation to such diverse issues as time, evolution, origins of the cosmos, the nature of human knowledge, and language about God. The doctrine of creation must be in dialogue with such figures as Newton, Einstein, Planck, Polanyi, Sagan, and a host of others.

T. F. Torrance has discussed three ideas from the early church developed from the doctrines of the incarnation and creation ex nihilo which have powerfully affected both natural science and theology. These are: (1) the rational unity of the universe, meaning that God as Creator is the ultimate source of all order, the unifier of all things, and that all things in the universe are open to rational inquiry; (2) the contingent rationality or intelligibility of the universe, meaning that science can probe the universe's natural and intrinsic order; and (3) the contingent freedom of the universe, meaning that God as transcendent Lord of the universe is not indebted to it or bound by it. Thus the universe is indebted to God and fully dependent on God for its origin and continuity.

Jürgen Moltmann's major work, God in Creation: A New Theology of Creation and the Spirit of God emerged out of intense concern with the contemporary ecological crisis. Moltmann presents an ecological doctrine of creation, calling for a re-assessment of God's relationship to the world as the divine creation. All things must be perceived in their relationship to the total whole of creation, while humans should see themselves as participating in the natural world in mutual relationality.

Moltmann also emphasizes the trinitarian nature of the doctrine of creation, stressing the relatedness of the three persons of the Trinity to each other, emphasizing the theme of mutual indwelling (Gr. periochoresis) of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. God the Father is the Creator, the Son is the mediator of creation, and the Holy Spirit is the life-giving divine energy within creation. It is the Spirit to whom Moltmann refers when he speaks of "God in Creation."

Moltmann's doctrine of creation is messianic in that creation is to be understood in light of the conviction of the gospel that Jesus Christ is the Messiah. Creation and redemption are drawn together through the eschatological nature of redemption, which is not to remove persons from the created world, but to confirm humanity's solidarity in relationship to the rest of God's creation. The Spirit co-suffers with the creation that awaits its ultimate liberation (Rom. 8:19-23).

The ecological and eschatological aspects of Moltmann's doctrine of creation are fused in the image of the Sabbath as the anticipation of the final goal of God's created work in which God rests in creation and creation rests in God. The Sabbath serves to correct an anthropological interpretation of humans as the "crown" of God's creation in that God rested on the “seventh day”—the final day of the divine activity. This day, and not the creation of humanity, is the apex of God’s creative acts. When humans keep the Sabbath, and do not interfere with their environments, they are acknowledging creation to be God’s work and themselves as valuable in God’s sight.

Creation, Doctrine of

D. K. McKIM

See also GOD, DOCTRINE OF.

Bibliography. K. Barth, Church Dogmatics; E. Bruner, Christian Doctrine of Creation and Redemption; L. Gilkey, Maker of Heaven and Earth; Z. Hayes, What Are They Saying about Creation?; S. Jaki, Cosmos and Creator; Science and Creation; Road of Science and the Ways to God; P. K. Jewett, God, Creation, and Revelation: A Neo-Evangelical Theology; E. Klaaren, Religious Origins of Modern Science; J. Moltmann, God in Creation: A New Theology of Creation and the Spirit of God; W. Pannenberg, Toward a Theology of Nature: Essays on Science and Faith; T. Peters, ed., Cosmos as Creation: Theology and Science in Consonance; H. Ross, Creator and the Cosmos; Creation and Time; Fingerprint of God; G. L. Schroeder, Genesis and the Big Bang; T. F. Torrance, Ground and Grammar of Theology.

Creation, New; Creature, New. See NEW CREATION, NEW CREATURE.

Creationism. See SOUL.

Creed, Creeds. “Creed” derives from the Latin credo, “I believe.” The form is active, denoting not just a body of beliefs but confession of faith. This faith is trust: not “I believe that” (though this is included) but “I believe in.” It is also individual; creeds may take the plural form of “we believe,” but the term itself comes from the first person singular of the Latin: “I believe.”

Biblical Basis. Creeds in the developed sense plainly do not occur in Scripture. Yet this does not put them in antithesis to Scripture, for creeds have always been meant to express essential biblical truths. Furthermore, Scripture itself offers some rudimentary creedal forms that provide models for later statements. The Shema of the OT (Deut. 6:4–9) falls into this category, and many scholars regard Deuteronomy 26:5–9 as a little credo. In the NT many references to “traditions” (2 Thess. 2:15 NASB), the “word” (Gal. 6:6), and the “proclamation” (Rom. 16:25) suggest that a common message already formed a focus for faith, while confession of Jesus as Christ (John 1:41), Son of God (Rom. 1:4), Lord (Rom. 10:9), and God (John 20:28; Rom. 9:5; Titus 2:13) constitutes an obvious starting point for the development of creeds in public confession. Acts 8:37, although a later addition to the NT, offers very early a simple creedal confession in baptism. This is, of course, exclusively christological (cf. baptism in Christ’s name in Acts 8:16; 10:48), leading to the theory that creeds consisted originally only of the second article. Nevertheless, the NT also contains many passages, culminating in Matthew 28:19, which include either the Father or the Father and the Holy Spirit in a more comprehensive trinitarian formulation of a doctrinal, confessional, or liturgical type.

Creedal Functions. Baptismal. When more fixed creedal forms began to emerge out of the biblical materials, they probably did so first in the context of baptism. A creed offered the candidates the opportunity to make the confession of the lips demanded in Rom. 10:9–10. At first the form of words would vary, but familiar patterns soon began to develop. Fragmentary creeds from the second century—e.g., the DerBalyzeh Papyrus—support the thesis that creeds quickly became trinitarian, or were so from the outset. This is implied also in Didache 7.1 and substantiated by the Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus. The common view is that the mode of confession was responsive rather than declaratory.

Instructional. With a view to the baptismal confession, creeds soon came to serve as a syllabus for catechetical instruction in Christian doctrine. The level of teaching might vary from simple exposition to the advanced theological presentation of the Catecheses of Cyril of Jerusalem in the fourth century. All candidates, however, were to acquire and display some understanding of the profession they would make. A sincere commitment was demanded as well as intellectual apprehension (Cyril’s Procatechesis).

Doctrinal. The rise of heresies helped to expand the first rudimentary statements into the more developed formulas of later centuries. A phrase like “maker of heaven and earth” was probably inserted to counteract the Gnostic separation of the true God from the creator, while the reference to the virgin birth and the stress on Christ’s death safeguarded the reality of Jesus’ human life and ministry. The Arian heresy produced another crop of additions (notably “of one substance with the Father”) designed predominantly to express Christ’s essential deity. These modifications gave the creeds a new function as a key to the proper understanding of Scripture (Tertullian) and as tests of orthodoxy for the clergy.

Liturgical. Being used in baptism, creeds had from the very first a liturgical function. It was seen, however, that confession of faith is a constituent of all true worship. This led to the incorporation of the Nicene Creed into the regular eucharistic sequence, first in the East, then in Spain, and finally in Rome. Placing the creed after the reading of Scripture made it possible for believers to respond to the gospel with an individual or congregational affirmation of faith.

The Three Creeds. Apostles’. In Christian history three creeds from the early church have achieved particular prominence. The first was supposedly written by the apostles under special inspiration and thus came to be called the Apostles' Symbol or Creed (Synod of Milan, 390). Lorenzo Valla finally refuted the story of its origin, which the East never accepted, and scholars now recognize that while the old Roman Creed (expounded by Rufinus, 404) no doubt underlies it, it derives from various sources. In its present form it is known only from the eighth century and seems to have come from Gaul or Spain. Nevertheless it came into regular use in the West, and the Reformers gave it their sanction in catechisms, confessions, and liturgies.

Nicene. Despite its name, the Nicene Creed must be distinguished from the creed of Nicea (325). Yet it embodies in altered form, and without the anathemas, the christological teaching which Nicea adopted in answer to Arianism. It probably rests on creeds from Jerusalem and Antioch. Whether it was subscribed at Constantinople I in 381 has been much debated, but Chalcedon recognized it (451) and Constantinople II (553) accepted it as a revision of Nicea. The West on its own added the filioque clause ("and from the Son") to the statement on the Holy Spirit, but the East never conceded its orthodoxy or the validity of its mode of insertion. In both East and West this creed became the primary eucharistic confession.

Athanasian. The creed popularly attributed to Athanasius is commonly thought to be a fourth- or fifth-century canticle of unknown authorship. As a more direct statement on the Trinity it became a test of the orthodoxy and competence of the clergy in the West at least from the seventh century. It differs from the other two main creeds in structure, in its more complex doctrinal character, and in its inclusion of opening and closing monitions. The Reformers valued it highly, the Anglicans even making some liturgical use of it, but the East did not recognize it, and in general its catechetical and liturgical usefulness has been limited.

Conclusion. The dangers of creed-making are obvious. Creeds can become formal, complex, and abstract. They can be almost illimitably expanded. They can be superimposed on Scripture. Properly handled, however, they facilitate public confession, form a succinct basis of teaching, safeguard pure doctrine, and constitute an appropriate focus for the church's fellowship in faith.

G. W. BROMILEY

See also APOSTLES' CREED; ATHANASIAN CREED; CONFESSIONS OF FAITH; FILIOQUE; NICEA, COUNCIL OF.

Bibliography. F. J. Badcock, History of the Creeds; O. Cullmann, Earliest Christian Confessions; W. A. Curtis, History of the Creeds and Confessions of Faith; J. N. D. Kelly, Athanasian Creed; Early Christian Creeds; A. C. McGiffert, Apostles' Creed; P. Schaff, Creeds of Christendom; H. B. Swete, Apostles' Creed; C. H. Turner, History of Use of Creeds and Anathemas.

Cremation. See BURIAL, CHRISTIAN.

Criminal Law and Punishment in Bible Times.

Our knowledge of ancient Near Eastern law derives mainly from law codes surviving intact or as fragments, as with the codes of Ur-Nammu (ca. 2050 B.C.), Bilalama (ca. 1925 B.C.), Lipit-Ishtar (ca. 1860 B.C.), and Hammurabi (ca. 1760 B.C.), the Hittite laws (ca. 1450 B.C.), the Assyrian code (ca. 1350 B.C.), and the Hebrew covenant code (Exod. 21–23; ca. 1250 B.C.).

The codes formalized existing law or else instituted reforms, often after a period of conquest or change of monarchy, and set out in detail the protection afforded the individual and the lifestyle expected by both king and deity. Because divine intervention was frequently considered instrumental in the inspiration of law and its communication to man, crime was regarded as a rejection of deity, and thus there was little differentiation between religious, criminal, and civil law.

A group or tribe would covenant with a deity to follow certain religious practices and other more general behavior patterns for the sake of community well-being, and this relationship helped to unify the diverse interests and activities of group members. By agreeing to a covenant the community trusted its future prospects to a deity, but the infractions punished by that deity, usually in the form of natural disasters or defeat in battle, resulted in punishment for the entire community. Some penalties for transgression, however, could be administered by the group.

Punishment was frequently limited to compensation of equal value ("an eye for an eye"), although severe penalties, including death, were prescribed for stealing animals, as in Hammurabi's code (section 8). In general, the less developed the culture (as with the Assyrian laws), the more savage was the punishment, which often involved death. Probably the most civilized of ancient law codes was that of the Hittites, although biblical law had a stronger ethical content.

Religious Offenses. Concern to maintain monotheism was paramount among the Hebrews, and this resulted in crimes of idolatry—the worship of gods other than Yahweh (Exod. 20:4–5; Deut. 5:8–9), blasphemy (Lev. 24:11–16), and Sabbath-breaking (Exod. 16:23; 20:9–10; Num. 15:32–36) becoming capital offenses. By contrast the Hittites, who were protecting an agricultural economy, enforced laws relating to the land, and frequently imposed fines for infractions while occasionally making death or facial mutilation the penalty. The Hebrews regarded infant sacrifice (Lev. 20:2), false prophecy (Jer.

Criminal Law and Punishment in Bible Times

26:8–9), or any form of premeditated crime as an offense against God, and this kind of religious violation was usually punished by death.

Personal Injury. Premeditated murder was punished by death (Exod. 21:12), but a man who had killed accidentally could be shielded and obtain sanctuary (Num. 35:10–28; cf. Exod. 21:12–15, 18–23). Kidnapping also merited the death penalty (Exod. 21:16). Some laws related to accidental injury and prescribed recompense. In the code of Hammurabi the fine levied included payment for the physician who treated the injury (section 206). Among the Hebrews an offender whose assault caused a permanent injury or possibly the loss of an eye or limb suffered an identical injury as punishment. A slave who suffered permanent injury from his master received his freedom as compensation (Exod. 21:26–27).

Laws Concerning Property. Damage to property or crops caused willfully or through negligence was punished by fines or restitution (Exod. 22:6; code of Hammurabi 53–56). Injuries caused to or by animals, particularly bulls, figure prominently in the code of Hammurabi (sections 250–52) as well as in the covenant code (Exod. 21:28–22:4). Hammurabi's code legislated that an accident was forgivable whereas negligence was not, and compensation was paid according to the rank of the injured party.

In ancient times a woman was considered the property and/or the responsibility of a man. Before marriage she was the property of her father and after marriage of her husband. If widowed, she was often the responsibility of the nearest male relative (Ruth 3:13). The recognized victim in sexual offenses was thus the property owner, to whom compensation was paid; but because of the value society placed on high moral standards and sexual purity in Israel, adultery, rape, or seduction was punished severely. If the rape of an engaged girl occurred out-of-doors, the seducer was put to death, the theory being that if the girl had cried out, she could not have been heard (Deut. 22:25–27). If it occurred indoors, both were executed, the girl then being considered a willing partner in the crime against her fiancé. A child was the property of his parents and as such was expected to honor and obey them. Cursing a parent was punishable by death (Exod. 21:17), as was assault on a parent (21:15). By Mosaic times a child could not be executed by the parent without an accusation first being brought before the council. If the son was found guilty by the elders of drunkenness, laziness, or persistent disobedience, the adult males would stone him to death (Deut. 21:18–21).

A convicted robber had to return what he had stolen, and an additional 20 percent in punitive damages was added as a deterrent (Lev. 6:2–7). In Babylonia a householder catching a burglar breaking into his house could have him executed and walled up in the breach he had made, according to the code of Hammurabi (section 21). Larceny, frequently of an animal, resulted in a three- to fivefold restitution (Exod. 22:1–4); but if unable to pay, the offender worked as a slave for an appropriate length of time.

Crimes Reflecting Lifestyle. In ancient society a man's word was his bond, and false accusations merited the resultant punishment for the crime of which the defendant was accused. In the code of Hammurabi the one falsely accusing a man of murder was to be put to death (section 1). Perjury was considered a crime against God as well as against a neighbor. The individual was expected to take personal and financial responsibility for property entrusted to him and to make restitution at the rate of 100 percent for loss or 200 percent for dishonesty or connivance (Exod. 22:9–11). Members of the community requiring special protection included widows, orphans, the poor, or foreigners. The punishment of their oppressors came directly from the Lord, who was likely to place their own families in similar jeopardy (Exod. 22:21–24, 26–27; 23:9; Deut. 23:20; 24:17). Sexual acts considered crimes were incest, intercourse during menstruation (Lev. 15:24; 18:19; 20:18), and bestiality (Lev. 18:23; 20:15–16). Other general laws punished the removal of boundary markers (Deut. 19:14) and use of false weights (Lev. 19:35; Deut. 25:15; Prov. 11:1; 20:23; Mic. 6:11). Bribery was forbidden, but no penalty was specified (Exod. 23:8).

Punishments. Capital punishment took the form of stoning or beheading, the latter particularly for crimes against the king (2 Sam. 16:9; 2 Kings 6:31–32). Execution by the sword was often used for religious crimes (Exod. 32:27; Deut. 13:15). Burning is mentioned for sexual offenses (Lev. 20:14; 21:9), although branding may sometimes have been inferred. The holy ground of Mount Sinai was sacred, and those defiling it were shot to death with arrows. As a deterrent corpses were exhibited by hanging, but hanging was not a form of execution (Gen. 40:19; Josh. 8:29; 10:26; 2 Sam. 4:12). The body was suspended over a wooden gallows. Execution by impalement on a wooden spike was frequent among the Assyrians. Crucifixion was used in 167–166 B.C. as punishment for those who refused to abandon their Jewish faith (Josephus, Antiquities xii.5.4), and this form of execution remained popular in the Roman period. Death by stoning was used for religious offenses, for adultery, and for a disobedient child (Lev. 24:15–16; Num. 15:32–36; Deut. 13:1–10; 17:2–7; 21:18–21; 22:22–24). In Roman times the victim was sometimes placed on a scaffold to be stoned.

Physical punishment included beating with rods (Exod. 21:20; Prov. 13:24; 26:3; Isa. 9:4; 2 Cor. 11:25) and scourging or flogging, which was done with a leather whip of several strands, sometimes with small pieces of bone or metal inserted in the ends. Forty lashes was the normal number (Deut. 25:1–3), later reduced by one (2 Cor. 11:24). Scourging was also used as a form of persuasive interrogation (Acts 22:24). It was customary in Roman times for a prisoner to be scourged after being condemned to death, not before, as Jesus was (Luke 23:16, 22; John 19:1). Gouging out a prisoner's eyes was a normal practice in the Near East (Num. 16:14; Judg. 16:21; 1 Sam. 11:2; Prov. 30:17). Mutilation as punishment, or as self-inflicted in cultic practices, was also common except among the Hebrews, who regarded the body as sacred because it was made in God's image. They felt justified, however, in mutilating their enemies by cutting off their thumbs and large toes so that they could no longer fight. Mutilation of the face and hands was prescribed in the code of Hammurabi and the Assyrian enactments. The prophet Hanani was put in prison (2 Chron. 16:10) and Jeremiah (Jer. 20:2–3) was placed in the stocks. In Roman times this could be used as a form of torture as well as an indignity.

Many punishments, even capital punishments, were to be carried out by the nearest living relative of the victim. Thus some form of vengeance seems involved, as well as possible clemency on occasion.

H. W. PERKIN

Bibliography. D. Amram, "Retaliation and Compensation," JQR new series 2:191–211; J. R. Baker, Women's Rights in Old Testament Times; J. Blenkinsopp, Wisdom and Law in the Old Testament: The Ordering of Life in Israel and Early Judaism; C. M. Carmichael, Origins of Biblical Law: The Decalogues and the Book of the Covenant; Women, Law, and the Genesis Traditions; G. C. Chirigno, Debt Slavery in Israel in the Ancient Near East; H. B. Clark, Biblical Law; D. J. Cohen, Law, Violence, and Community in Classical Athens; D. Daube, Studies in Biblical Law; I. Drapkin, Crime and Punishment in the Ancient World; G. R. Driver and J. C. Miles, Assyrian Laws; Babylonian Laws; M. Greenberg, "Biblical Conception of Asylum," JBL 78:125–32; J. A. Hoyle, Punishment in the Bible; B. S. Jackson, Theft in Early Jewish Law; B. N. Kaye and G. J. Wenham, Law, Morality and the Bible; M. G. Kline, Treaty of the Great King; D. J. McCarthy, Treaty and Covenant; G. E. Mendenhall, Law and Covenant in Israel and the Ancient Near East; S. M. Paul, Studies in the Book of the Covenant; J. Pritchard, ed., Ancient Near Eastern Texts; O. F. Robinson, Criminal Law of Ancient Rome; A. J. Skaist, Old Babylonian Loan Contract: Its History and Geography; J. M. P. Smith, Origin and History of Hebrew Law.

Crisis Theology. See NEO-ORTHODOXY.

Cross, Crucifixion. The Greek word for "cross," stauros, literally refers to an upright, pointed stake or pale. The word xylon is usually "wood" or "tree." In the NT and in some other literature of the time both frequently refer to a particularly cruel and degrading form of capital punishment known as crucifixion. In both canonical and later Christian literature "cross" and "crucifixion" take on a particularly important significance because of their connection with the death of Jesus and his expectations of his disciples. Any understanding of crucifixion in the ancient world must include the facts related to the act itself, its effect upon the victim, and the sociocultural implications attached to it.

Method of Crucifixion. Crucifixion involved elevating the condemned upon a pole, some form of frame or scaffolding, or a natural tree, thus exposing him to public view and derision. In many cases the individual was put to death through some other means and all or a part of the body (usually the head) then elevated. In other circumstances it became the actual means of execution. Because of the effect of crucifixion upon the body and the lengthy period which usually elapsed before death, it represented the most painful, cruel, and barbaric form of execution. Its roots are lost in history. In one form or another it is known to have been practiced by many groups (such as the Indians, Scythians, Celts, Germani, Britanni, and Taurians) but is most closely associated with the Persians, Carthaginians, Phoenicians, Greeks, and especially the Romans. Some evidence suggests that it may have been associated with religious human sacrifice as well as a means of punishment.

Earlier forms probably involved impaling the condemned on a single pole or suspending him by wedging the head between a Y at one end of the implement. By NT times there seem to have been several different forms of "crosses" commonly used by the Romans. In addition to the single pole (crux simplex), most involved the use of at least two separate pieces of wood to construct a frame. However, crucifixion gave executioners opportunity to use their most cruel and sadistic creativity; victims were occasionally hung in grotesque positions by a variety of means. The two cross forms most likely used for the execution of Jesus are the St. Anthony's cross (crux commissa), shaped like a T, or the Latin cross (crux immissa), on which the vertical piece rises above both the horizontal cross-bar (patibulum) and the head of the victim; the statement in Matthew 27:37 (cf. Luke 23:38) that the inscription was placed "over his head" and most ancient tradition favor the latter.

Detailed descriptions of crucifixion are few; writers seem to have avoided the subject. Recent archeological discoveries, including skeletal remains of a crucifixion in first-century Palestine (at Giv'at ha-Mivtar in Jerusalem), have added considerably to our knowledge of the act. It seems that the Gospel accounts of the death of Jesus describe a standard Roman procedure for crucifixion. After the pronouncement of sentence, the condemned was required to carry the horizontal piece to the place of execution, always outside the city. The leader of the four-man execution squad led the procession bearing a sign detailing the reason for the execution. There the victim was flogged (this seems to have preceded condemnation in the case of Jesus—possibly to elicit sympathy). The victim's outstretched arms were affixed to the cross-bar by either nails or ropes. This was then raised and secured to the perpendicular pole (which in some areas may have been left in place permanently, both for convenience and as a warning). A small board or peg may have been provided as sort of a seat to bear some of the weight of the condemned (this actually may have prolonged suffering by prohibiting suffocation). The feet were then secured in a manner forcing the knees into a bent position. Contrary to popular contemporary opinion, crosses were not high; the feet were probably only a few inches above the ground. The sign describing the accusation was secured to the cross.

Cross, Crucifixion

Death usually came slowly; it was not unusual for persons to survive for days on the cross. Exposure, disease, hunger, shock, and exhaustion were the usual immediate causes of death. Occasionally death was "mercifully" hastened by breaking the legs of the condemned. In Jesus' case death came much more swiftly than usual. A spear was thrust into his side to assure he was really dead before the body was removed (John 19:31–37). Bodies of the crucified were often left unburied and eaten by carnivorous birds and beasts, thus adding to the disgrace.

The social stigma and disgrace associated with crucifixion in the ancient world can hardly be overstated. It was usually reserved for slaves, criminals of the worst sort from the lowest levels of society, military deserters, and especially traitors. In only rare cases were Roman citizens, no matter what their crime, crucified. Among the Jews it carried an additional stigma. Deuteronomy 21:23, "A hanged man is accursed by God," was understood to mean that the very method of death brought a divine curse upon the crucified. Thus, the idea of a crucified Messiah posed a special problem for such Jews as Paul (cf. 1 Cor. 1:27–29; Gal. 3:13).

Significance of the Cross. NT writers assume the historicity of the crucifixion of Jesus and focus their attention upon its significance. In it they understand that he "who was in very nature God, did not consider equality with God something to be grasped," "humbled himself," having taken "the very nature of a servant," and endured "even death on a cross" (Phil 2:6–8). This demonstrates the ultimate of humiliation and degradation. Yet, they affirm, the crucifixion of Jesus, the Messiah (Christ), was the will and act of God with eternal and cosmic significance. At the simplest level, the crucifixion of Jesus was the means by which God provided salvation, the forgiveness of sins (cf. 1 Cor. 15:3). Christ crucified becomes the summary of the Christian message (1 Cor. 2:2). The cross of Jesus, the beloved Son of God, is the supreme demonstration of the love God has for sinful man (cf. John 3:16; 15:16). In Jesus' death God deals concretely with the sin and guilt which offends his holiness and separates man from his Creator. Because of the cross God becomes both the righteous and just Judge and, at the same time, the one who makes forgiveness available and justifies believers (cf. Rom. 3:26). The condemning legal demands set against man have been "canceled," nailed to the cross (Col. 2:14). The word of the cross is God's word of reconciliation (2 Cor. 5:19).

The cross is also the symbol of discipleship. To first-century Palestinians, who often witnessed the condemned carrying the crossbar to the site of their final torture, Jesus' word, "If anyone would come after me, he must . . . take up his cross and follow me" (Mark 8:34; cf. Matt. 10:38; Luke 14:27), must have come with a jolting, graphic impact. Jesus insists that the humiliation and suffering that culminated in his crucifixion were to characterize the experience of his followers. "It is enough," he says, "for the student to be like his teacher" (Matt. 10:24). Crucifixion becomes a part of the identification between Christ and the believer, who is "crucified with Christ" (Gal. 2:20). The negative side of the characteristics of the new life of the Christian consists in having "crucified" sinful natures and desires (Gal. 5:24).

When understood in its historical, social context, Paul's statement that the proclamation of Christ crucified is a "stumbling block" or "scandal" (skandalon) to the Jews and "foolishness" (mōria) to the Gentiles is both logical and clear. Yet for Christians it remains an act and demonstration of "the power of God and the wisdom of God" (1 Cor. 1:23–24). J. J. SCOTT JR.

See also ATONEMENT.

Bibliography. M. Hengel, Crucifixion; B. Siede et al., NIDNTT 1:389–405; J. F. Strange, IDBSup 199–200.

Cross, Theology of the. See THEOLOGIA CRUCIS.

Crown. A headdress worn to symbolize honor, joy, victory, or official standing. In the OT there are four types of crowns. (1) The high priest's crown was a gold plate inscribed with "Holy to the Lord" and fastened to his turban by blue lace; it symbolized his consecration to represent the people to the Lord (Exod. 29:6; 39:30; Lev. 21:12). (2) Hebrew kings normally wore a light crown, a narrow band of silk studded with jewels (2 Sam. 1:10). The crown symbolized their divine appointment (2 Kings 11:12; Pss. 21:3; 89:39; 132:18; Ezek. 21:25–26). (3) Pagan kings and idols wore massive crowns of gold and jewels, which were at times taken by Israelite Kings and worn as a sign of empire (2 Sam. 12:30; 1 Chron. 20:2; Esth. 1:11; Zech. 9:16). Zechariah made such a crown for Joshua, the high priest, symbolizing the unity of priestly and royal office (Zech. 6:11, 14). (4) A crown or wreath of flowers was used at banquets as a symbol of joy and celebration (Song. 3:11; Isa. 28:1; Wisd. Sol. 2:8). The word "crown" was also used symbolically to indicate royalty (Prov. 27:24), glory (Job 19:9; Ps. 8:5; Isa. 28:5; Ezek. 16:12), joy (Ezek. 23:42), or pride (Job 31:36; Isa. 28:1, 3).

In the NT two words for crown are used. One, stephanos, is strictly speaking a chaplet or circlet, usually a laurel wreath worn at banquets or given as a civic or military honor. Paul contrasts this withering crown to the Christian's imperishable one (1 Cor. 9:25; 2 Tim. 2:5), seeing his converts as his own garland (Phil. 4:1; 1 Thess. 2:19).

The Christian is urged to train as an athlete to gain his crown (1 Cor. 9:25), which God will award in the last day (2 Tim. 4:8), and to beware of losing it (Rev. 3:11). As a victor's wreath a crown is the glory of Christ (Heb. 2:7, 9), the eternal life won by Christians who persevere (James 1:12; 1 Pet. 5:4; Rev. 2:10), and the victory of Christ (Rev. 6:2; 14:14) and others (Rev. 9:7; 12:1). Normally stephanos does not indicate royalty, for diadēma (diadem) is the royal crown; but Christ's crown of thorns, while apparently in part an ironic parody of the victor's wreath (Mark 15:17), was in combination with robe and scepter a royal symbol (Mark 15:26), showing a flexibility in the use of the term. The bleeding Christ was mocked as a comic king as well as a helpless victor.

Diadem (diadēma) is rare in the NT. It is a symbol of royalty in each use: the dragon, the beast from the sea, and Christ (Rev. 12:3; 13:1; 19:12).

P. H. DAVIDS

Bibliography. H. St. J. Hart, "Crown of Thorns in John 19:2-5," JTS n.s. 3:66-75; C. J. Hemer, NIDNTT 1:405-6; K. A. Kitchen, IBD 1:345; W. M. Ramsay, Letters to the Seven Churches.

Crucifixion. See CROSS, CRUCIFIXION.

Crypto-Calvinism. In the sixteenth century questions arose about how much the influence of Calvin should be allowed to penetrate into Lutheranism. Philip Melancthon and some of his followers (Philippists) were accused of being too accommodating to Calvin's doctrines and of thus practicing Crypto-Calvinism, or "secret" Calvinism, whereby Calvin's views were covertly being held by members of the Lutheran church. In particular, controversies raged over the Lord's Supper, with debates taking place in Heidelberg, Bremen, and Saxony.

In 1552 Joachim Westphal, an ardent Lutheran, published a book that pointed out divergences between Luther and Calvin, including their differences on the Lord's Supper. Strict Lutherans held views of the ubiquity (omnipresence) of Christ's glorified body, its physical presence in the Supper, and the partaking of Christ's body by unbelievers. Melancthon, however, inclined toward Calvin's view that Christ was genuinely present at the Supper but in a spiritual way, but he did not wish to commit himself publicly. His spirit of conciliation toward the Reformed had earlier led him to change his Augsburg Confession by omitting from its article on the Supper the phrase "truly present" and the condemnation of opposite views (1542). But after Melancthon's death, his views were declared to have been the same as Luther's.

The Elector Augustus of Wittenberg declared the Philippists to be enemies of the state, expelling or imprisoning all of their leaders. In 1574 a commemorative medal was struck celebrating true Lutheranism's victory. The Formula of Concord (1577) formalized theologically the rejection of the view of Calvin and his followers that the "true, essential, and living body and blood of Christ" become truly present in the Holy Supper only "spiritually by faith." D. K. McKIM

See also CONCORD, FORMULA OF; MELANCTHON, PHILIP.

Bibliography. F. Bente, Historical Introduction to the Book of Concord; J. L. González, History of Christian Thought; K. R. Hagenbach, Text-Book of the History of Doctrines; R. Seeberg, Text-book of the History of Doctrines; D. C. Steinmetz, Reformers in the Wings.

Cudworth, Ralph (1617-1688). Cambridge Platonist. He was born in Aller, Somersetshire, and educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, where in 1645 he was appointed Master of Clare Hall, and in 1654 Master of Christ College. Unlike his father, a minister of robust Puritan sympathies, Cudworth was a strong advocate for a non-partisan and charitable spirit (see his Sermon before the House of Commons, 1647). Although a philosopher he directed the majority of his attention to fundamental theological issues. Against the materialistic atheism and determinism of Hobbes and the anti-Christian elements of Cartesianism he affirmed the supreme reality of God and asserted the priority and primacy of spiritual realities, the freedom of the will, and the eternity of moral concepts. He attacked the Calvinist doctrine of predestination and argued for a more reasoned and less rigid and dogmatic approach to questions of theology. To this end he published his major work, True Intellectual System of the Universe (1678), in which he confirmed orthodox beliefs about God and the world by means of reason. By reason Cudworth meant above all a spiritual faculty by which spiritual reality is discerned. True religion is to be achieved chiefly through the purification of the affections and disciplining of the will. His emphasis on reason and morality and lack of attention to traditional interpretations of such central doctrines as sin, sacrifice, and incarnation led by the end of the seventeenth century to radically different conclusions from his own. Among his other works published after his death are Treatise concerning Eternal and Immutable Morality (1731), and Treatise of Free Will (1838).

Cudworth, Ralph

C. W. MITCHELL

Bibliography. G. Aspelin, Cudworth's Interpretation of Greek Philosophy; G. Cragg, From Puritanism to the Age of Reason; G. Cragg, ed., Cambridge Platonists; L. Gysi, Platonism and Cartesianism in the Philosophy of Ralph Cudworth; C. Lowrey, Philosophy of Ralph Cudworth; J. A. Passmore, Ralph Cudworth, An Interpretation; W. R. Stott, Introduction to Cudworth's "Treatise concerning Eternal and Immutable Morality"; B. Willey, Seventeenth Century Background.

Cullmann, Oscar (1902–1999). Cullmann grew up in the bilingual zone along Germany's border with France. Educated in France in the 1920s under liberal influence, historical studies made him realize that much theological scholarship suppressed the witness of the biblical documents that it handled. He states that he "gradually came to a deeper theological understanding of things of which the New Testament speaks but which were then strange to me" when his historical labors on ancient documents could not be squared with the only quasi-biblical claims championed by his modernist theological mentors.

Cullmann's theological contribution lies most of all in his decades-long insistence on the historical orientation of New Testament writers and the documents they penned. An historically conditioned saving event, he found, belongs to the essence of the New Testament message. Here he battled on two fronts. On the one side was Karl Barth, whom Cullmann at first greeted as an ally in the fight against decrepit liberalism. Like Adolf Schlatter, however, Cullmann quickly realized that (especially the early) Barth was a neo-Kantian idealist rather than a historical-biblical realist. So while Barth and Cullmann later served on the same faculty at Basel, they made little to no common cause theologically.

On another front, and more spiritedly, Cullmann sought to demythologize Rudolf Bultmann. Mainline German biblical scholarship never gave much of a hearing to Cullmann after Bultmann in 1948 panned his first major book Christ and Time, but Cullmann refused to abandon the struggle to establish the fact that the gospel involves something far more profound than authentic self-understanding as per existentialist thought. Whereas Bultmann could deny miracles and even Christ's bodily resurrection, yet insist that he was not rejecting the New Testament witness, only reinterpreting it for modern people, Cullmann crafted careful studies implying that Bultmann's hermeneutic was de facto disbelief theologically and poor historical reasoning empirically.

Along with his creditable case for a salvation-historical reading of the New Testament rather than Barth's dialectical-theological or Bultmann's existentialist approach, Cullmann championed the view that Jesus of Nazareth's earthly work (not some later personal experiences, insights, or decisions) was the basis for christological claims made about him by New Testament writers. In presenting this so-called functional Christology Cullmann denied that he was attacking the ontological categories of later trinitarian formulations. But he wished to show that New Testament statements about Jesus were not mere theologoumena (arbitrary doctrinal precepts); they were rather rooted in observed and divinely vouchsafed historical phenomena that were and remain intrinsic to those statements.

Cullmann's work is open to debate. On the one hand is his magisterial Salvation in History. This lays out his mature understanding of the New Testament's salvation-historical message, including its significance for ethics. Here the "already-not yet" nature of New Testament eschatology looms large, although Cullmann had long before noted and traced out the implications of this creative tension. On the other hand his Prayer in the New Testament deserves mention as a high point in topical studies by New Testament theologians of the twentieth century. Framed in the language of critical exegesis and undergirded by decades of research and reflection, the aged Cullmann writes frankly about human sin and weakness, God's love and Holy Spirit, the submission called for by God's fierce majesty, the glory of personal communion with the Lord, and the mystery of the saints' participation, through prayer, in bringing God's plan to perfection in Christ.

Not a few twentieth-century theologians made their names by calling for dismantling of traditional Christian theology. In the long run Cullmann's reputation hinges on whether he was right in his contrarian insistence that hermeneutical categories need to arise out of the biblical texts themselves and that there is, as compared with Barth and Bultmann, a positive relation between revelation and history, in the New Testament writings and still today.

R. W. YARBROUGH

Bibliography. O. Cullmann, Christ and Time; Christology of the New Testament; Prayer in the New Testament; Salvation in History; T. Dorman, Hermeneutics of Oscar Cullmann.

Cults. Defining a cult is far more difficult than is often appreciated. Many evangelical Christians support the activities of Jews for Jesus and see them as a legitimate missionary group. But members of the Jewish community regard them as an evil and deceptive cult, a fact that well illustrates the problems surrounding the word. In its modern form the word "cult" was originally used by Ernst Troeltsch in his classic work, Social Teaching of the Christian Churches (1912), where he classifies religious groups in terms of church, sect, and cult. For Troeltsch the cult represents a mystical or spiritual form of religion that appeals to intellectuals and the educated classes. At the heart of the cult is a spirituality which seeks to enliven a dead orthodoxy. Thus for Troeltsch the early Luther, many Puritans, and pietism can be seen as examples of cultic religion. Although Troeltsch's ideas about the distinction between church and sect generated a vigorous debate, little attention has been paid to his views on the cult. However, several liberal writers influenced by Troeltsch have seen evangelical Christianity in terms of a cult.

More important for the modern usage of the word "cult" has been the development of evangelical polemics against groups which they have seen as heretical. The classic work on this subject, which probably gave the word its modern usage, is Jan van Baalen's Chaos of Cults (1938). In this work van Baalen expounds the beliefs of various religious groups such as theosophy, Christian Science, Mormonism, and Jehovah's Witnesses, and subjects them to a rigorous theological critique from an evangelical perspective. In the last twenty years a large number of evangelical books dealing with cults have appeared. Over the course of time these have increasingly concentrated on the allegedly fraudulent claims of the cults, the immoralities of their leaders, and the ways in which their followers are deceived. As a result, in many cases a transition has occurred from a theological argument refuting the claims of various religious groups to a reliance upon psychological arguments which suggest that members of these groups are in some way brainwashed. This development poses a great danger for evangelical Christianity, as can be seen from William Sargent's Battle for the Mind (1957). In this book Sargent takes evangelical conversion as a classic example of brainwashing. More recently this argument has been developed by Jim Siegelman and Flo Conway in their popular book Snapping (1979), where the experience of born-again Christians is compared to the process by which people join groups like the Moonies. Such books as these and stories in the media about brainwashing have led to considerable pressure on governments in various American states, Canada, Britain, and Germany for anticonversion laws. These laws are supposedly aimed at groups like the Moonies. But because of their lack of definition (cf. the Lasher Amendment, State of New York in Assembly, 11122-A, March 25, 1980) they are in practice aimed at any form of change of lifestyle brought about by a religious conversion.

Today the real problem of cults is the propaganda value of the word "cult" in a secular society. Although there are reliable statistics to show that the total membership of groups like the Children of God, the Unification Church (Moonies), and Hare Krishna is less than 35,000 in the United States and even fewer in other Western countries, these groups are presented as a major threat to society. As a result secularists are able to urge the acceptance of laws which replace religious freedom by a grudgingly granted religious toleration. Rather than persisting with the use of a word which has now become a propaganda weapon, the academic practice of calling such groups "new religious movements" should be followed. An alternative to this neutral terminology available for Christians who oppose such groups on theological grounds would be to revive the usage of "heretic" or simply call such groups "spiritual counterfeits." Such a procedure would move the debate away from psychological theories that can be used by secularists against Christianity to the arena of theological discussion and religious argument.

I. HEXHAM

See also HERESY; SECT, SECTARIANISM.

Bibliography. R. S. Ellwood, Religious and Spiritual Groups in Modern America; C. Y. Glock and R. N. Bellah, eds., New Religious Consciousness; M. Hill, Sociology of Religion; W. R. Martin, Kingdom of the Cults; J. Needleman and G. Baker, eds., Understanding the New Religions; H. W. Richardson, ed., New Religions and Mental Health; T. Robbins and D. Anthony, eds., In Gods We Trust; I. I. Zaretzky and M. P. Leone, eds., Religious Movements in Contemporary America.

Culture and Christianity. See CHRISTIANITY AND CULTURE.

Curate. See CHURCH OFFICERS.

Curse. The Scriptures employ the term "curse" (OT noun forms, qēlālā and hērem; verb, 'ārar; NT noun forms, katara and anathema; verb, kataraomai) in certain well-defined significations. In general usage a curse is an imprecation or an expressed wish for evil. If it be directed against God, it is blasphemy (Job 1:5, 11; 2:5, 9). It may be a desire uttered to God against another person or thing. A curse was considered to have an innate power to carry itself into effect (Zech. 5:1-3, where the curse inevitably found its victim). Curses among the heathen were supposed to be possessed of the power of self-realization (Num. 22-24 with Balaam). In Scripture a curse was invariably related to sin (Gen. 3) and disobedience (Deut. 11:28; Isa. 24:5–6). In certain cases the concept of oath suffices to convey the meaning (Judg. 17:2; Isa. 65:15).

Curse

In its specific usage the curse was an act of dedicating or devoting to God. Things or persons thus devoted could not be used for private purposes (Lev. 27:28). In time of war a city was devoted to the Lord. This included the slaying of men and animals (Deut. 20:12–14; Josh. 6:26); the burning of combustibles (Deut. 7:25); the placing of metals in the temple (Josh. 6:24); and the imposition of the ban on those who violated these provisions (Josh. 6:18). How literally the ban was carried out may be seen from the tragic history of Achan and his family, and the experience of Hiel the Bethelite (Josh. 7:1–26 and 1 Kings 16:34). The Canaanites as a nation were set apart for this kind of destruction (Josh. 2:10; 6:17).

In its higher significance the curse indicates a thing devoted to an exclusively sacred use. It amounts then to a vow. Compare the consecration of John the Baptist (Luke 1:15; 7:33) and the misuse of the vow among the people of Israel by an evasion instituted by their religious leaders (Mark 7:11–13). It denotes, as seen, the ban of extermination and occurs frequently in the OT, but there is no clear instance of this in the NT. The ban of annihilation was replaced at times by the discipline of excommunication (John 9:22; 12:42; 16:2; Matt. 18:17). Ezra 10:8 is understood to approximate the later rabbinic practice of excommunication (Matt. 18:17; Luke 6:22). Admittedly, the Lukan reference may have a wider application.

One regular use of the word is in contrast to blessing. When the term is so employed, there are no sacred associations, and the connotation of the word runs the gamut from divine to satanic. Before the people of Israel entered Canaan they were given the choice of obedience and God's blessing or disobedience and the curse. The curse was placed symbolically on Mount Ebal, while the blessings were attached to Mount Gerizim (Deut. 27:13–26). The rarity of the curse in the NT is in keeping with the spirit of the new age (Matt. 21:19; Mark 11:12–14, 20–21).

The curse has a definite christological reference. Paul states that Christ became a curse for us (Gal. 3:13) by bearing the penalty of the law (Deut. 21:23). The curse of the law (Deut. 27:26) fell upon him by the manner of his death as well as the fact of it. It was a criminal's death and so under the curse.

C. L. FEINBERG

Bibliography. D. Anst, NIDNTT 1:413–18; J. Behm, TDNT 1:353–56; J. B. Lightfoot, Galatians; J. B. Payne, Theology of the Older Testament.

Cyprian (200–258). Caecilius Cyprianus was born in North Africa to a wealthy and highly cultured pagan family. After having distinguished himself as a master of rhetoric he was converted to Christianity and renounced his wealth and pagan culture. He was quickly raised through the presbytery to become bishop of Carthage about 248. He had an influential pastoral ministry and produced various writings before his martyrdom in 258.

Cyprian was not primarily a theologian as was Tertullian, to whom he looked with respect. However, in his handling of certain pastoral and schismatic problems he expressed certain views that decisively shaped the church's ecclesiology until Augustine and also down through the Middle Ages. The most serious of these problems was the Novatian schism, a split beginning in Rome among orthodox parties over the treatment of lapsed Christians during the Decian persecution. Cyprian's views advocating degrees of penance became the accepted practice and contributed to the Roman Catholic doctrine of penance. In order to condemn the schism Cyprian contended that the unity of the church was episcopal, not theological. The oneness of the church was to be found in the union of the college of bishops. Disassociation from the bishops was ipso facto separation from the true church. He taught that the episcopal unity was expressed in Christ's mandate to Peter (Matt. 16:18). The bishops as the successors of the apostles manifest this unity.

There are two versions of Cyprian's argument in On the Unity of the Church, both apparently genuinely Cyprian. The papal version is that he argues for the primacy of Peter, the other that he contends for coequality among all apostles and therefore all bishops. Cyprian goes on in this treatise to make the classic statements: "He is not a Christian who is not in Christ's church"; "He cannot have God for his father who has not the church for his mother"; and "There is no salvation outside the church."

Cyprian strongly contended for the correlation of Spirit baptism and regeneration with water baptism, resisting those (including Stephen of Rome) who were inclined to separate them. He also is important in the development of the doctrine of the Mass, as he taught that the Supper was a sacrifice of Christ's body and blood which the priest, functioning in Christ's stead, offers up to God the Father on behalf of the people.

C. BLAISING

See also DONATISM; NOVATIAN SCHISM.

Bibliography. P. Hinchliff, Cyprian of Carthage; J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines; J. Quasten, Patrology; M. Sage, Cyprian; G. S. M. Walker, Churchmanship of St. Cyprian.

Cyril of Alexandria (d. 444). Patriarch of Alexandria 412–44. During Cyril's patriarchate his ministry was racked by controversy with Nestorius regarding the person of Christ.

Personal, theological, and political factors all doubtless played a part in the controversy, which reached a climax with the Council of Ephesus in 431. Deep-seated theological differences between Antioch and Alexandria came to sharp expression in 428 when Cyril accused Nestorius, patriarch of Constantinople, of heresy because he insisted that Mary could be called Christotokos but not Theotokos. Cyril was determined to recognize the unity of Christ which, in his opinion, Nestorius had compromised by his excessive distinction between the divine and human natures.

The Roman Synod of 430 appointed Cyril as representative to ask Nestorius to recant. Ensuing correspondence between the two became increasingly intense, including reciprocal anathemas. The controversy stirred up such troubles that a general council was called by imperial order to settle the matter. When the council met at Ephesus in 431, Cyril presided over an action, prior to the arrival of Syrian delegates sympathetic to Nestorius, condemning and deposing Nestorius. In following days as other delegates arrived the action was reversed. Ultimately, however, Nestorius was exiled.

In order to resolve difficulties between the two positions represented, a Formula of Union was agreed upon. Cyril abided by it until his death. He affirmed a "hypostatic union" in which the humanity and divinity of Christ were seen as two distinct, inseparable natures. Some confusion occurred because he used physis to refer to the divine Logos but not to the humanity of Christ. He spoke of "one nature of God the Word incarnate," which was an Apollinarian phrase. Such emphasis and formulations opened the way for the monophysite position to predominate in Alexandrian theology after his death.

The relationship of the two natures of Christ has continued to be a point of contention in spite of the declaration of the ecumenical councils. Since the eighteenth century objections have found expression in the higher critical tradition, which emphasizes the humanity of Christ, reducing him to a historical man. L. G. WHITLOCK JR.

See also ADOPTIONISM; ALEXANDRIAN THEOLOGY; ANTIOCHENE THEOLOGY; EPHESUS, COUNCIL OF; HYPOSTATIC UNION; NESTORIUS, NESTORIANISM.

Bibliography. A. M. Bermejo, Indwelling of the Holy Spirit according to St. Cyril of Alexandria; J. L. González, History of Christian Thought; A. Grillmeier, Christ in Christian Tradition; A. Kerrigan, Cyril of Alexandria: Interpreter of the Old Testament; C. E. Raven, Apollinarianism: An Essay on the Christology of the Early Church; R. V. Sellers, Council of Chalcedon; Two Ancient Christologies; T. F. Torrance, Theology in Reconciliation.

Cyril of Jerusalem (ca. 310–387). Bishop of Jerusalem. Cyril was born in Jerusalem to a Christian family during the reign of Constantine. Becoming a deacon in approximately 330, he went on to be appointed around 343 as a priest in charge of instructing catechumens in preparation for baptism. The lectures he prepared for the baptismal candidates comprise his only remaining writings. About 350 he was elected to the post for which he is best known, bishop of Jerusalem. Over the next three decades, he was banished from Jerusalem three times totaling over fifteen years. He was first dismissed by Acacius, the bishop of Caesarea, for selling donated church property to feed the poor during a famine. Cyril's failure to side with supporters of Arius may have also contributed to the disfavor that led to his removal. Although for some he was slow to adopt the Nicene position that the Son was one substance with the Father (homoousios), neither did he support the position of Arius. Interwoven ecclesiastical and national politics seem to have been the prime motivations behind his second and third expulsions. By the time he returned permanently to Jerusalem in 378, he had settled his position about the nature of the Son in line with the Nicene group, and he was acknowledged as a defender of orthodox belief. He also was a significant contributor to the First Council of Constantinople in 381, where along with the bishops of Alexandria and Antioch he declared his full adherence to the Nicene Creed, which stood firmly against the Arian heresy. P. A. ERICKSEN

See also HOMOOUSIOS.

Bibliography. T. D. Barnes, Constantine and Eusebius; E. H. Gifford, Cyril of Jerusalem; J. H. Greenlee, Gospel Text of Cyril of Jerusalem; J. Quasten, Patrology; A. A. Stevenson, "St. Cyril of Jerusalem and the Alexandrian Heritage," TS 15:103–16; D. S. Wallace-Hadrill, Eusebius of Caesarea; R. M. Woolley, Instructions on the Mysteries of St. Cyril of Jerusalem.

D d

Dabney, Robert Lewis (1820–1898). One of the outstanding Presbyterian theologians of the nineteenth century and the most important and influential theologian in the Presbyterian Church, U.S.A., from 1865 to 1895. A native of Virginia, he was ordained to the ministry in 1847. In 1853 he was appointed as professor at his alma mater, the Union Theological Seminary in Farmville, now located in Richmond, Virginia. Except for a brief period of military service, he remained at Union until 1883. He concluded his career as professor of mental and moral philosophy and political economy at the newly established University of Texas, during which time he cofounded the Austin School of Theology, later renamed the Austin Presbyterian Theological Seminary.

He was recognized as an unusually effective preacher and teacher, and was also a prolific writer. The most important of his works was his Lectures in Systematic Theology, which became the standard theological textbook in Southern Presbyterian seminaries and remained so at Union in Richmond until 1930. Some of the more important articles have been preserved in a four-volume collection entitled Discussions: Evangelical and Theological, published between 1890–92 by C. R. Vaughn. As had J. H. Thornwell, Dabney championed the Calvinism of Old School Presbyterianism and was so effective that this theology and general point of view prevailed as that of the denomination during the whole Reconstruction period and at Union Seminary well into the twentieth century.

As a result of his service as chief of staff to General T. J. “Stonewall” Jackson, he wrote a biography of the noted commander. He was a vigorous, articulate defender of the South, as revealed in his volume Defense of Virginia.

L. G. WHITLOCK JR.

See also OLD SCHOOL THEOLOGY; THORNWELL, JAMES HENLEY.

Bibliography. R. L. Dabney, Social Rhetoric and Syllabus and Notes of the Course of Systematic and Polemic Theology Taught at Union Theological Seminary, Va.; T. C. Johnson, Life and Letters of Robert Lewis Dabney; D. F. Kelly, “Robert Louis Dabney” in Reformed Theology in America, D. F. Wells, ed.; D. H. Overly, Robert Lewis Dabney: Apostle of the Old South; M. H. Smith, Studies in Southern Presbyterian Theology; E. T. Thompson, Presbyterians in the South.

Daly, Mary (b. 1928). Received her education at a variety of Catholic institutions, including the Catholic University of America (M.A., 1952), St. Mary’s College, Notre Dame, Ind. (Ph.D., 1954), and the University of Fribourg (S.T.D., 1963; Ph.D., 1965).

In the fall of 1966, equipped with her three doctorates in religion, theology, and philosophy, she began her stormy association with the theology department of Boston College, a Jesuit institution that reluctantly, after mass student protests on her behalf, granted her tenure as an associate professor in 1969, a position she continues to hold (though twice denied a full professorship), supplemented by guest lectureships and numerous speaking engagements around the world.

Daly’s career as a radical feminist philosopher passed through a brief liberal Catholic phase on the way to becoming decidedly and definitively “feminist postchristian.” In Church and the Second Sex (1968) she offered as an alternative to Simon de Beauvoir’s rejection of Christianity “commitment to radical transformation of the negative, life-destroying elements of the Church,” sustained by the belief that men and women “will with God’s help mount together toward a higher order of consciousness and being.” Soon afterward, she ceased to care about such “unimaginative reform.” By 1971, when she staged the Harvard Memorial Church Exodus following her delivery of the first sermon to be preached there by a woman, her transition to radical postchristian feminism was complete.

Her reason for leaving the church she once sought to reform was her perception of sexism as “inherent in the symbol system of Christianity itself.” As she famously put it in her “Feminist Postchristian Introduction” to Church and the Second Sex (1975), “if God is male, then the male is God,” meaning that the patriarchal and androcentric images of the Bible and Christianity inevitably perpetuate sexist attitudes and behavior.

Abandonment of Christianity put her on a new course of developing a “feminist philosophy of Be-ing,” the key element of which is “the deep connection between women’s becoming and the unfolding of cosmic process.” In her later work Daly is perhaps best understood as a “rhetorical theorist.” The patriarchal structures of myth and language have “gang raped” the mind of women, so that the transformation of woman’s consciousness requires “a feminist reversal of traditional rhetorical canons” (Ratcliffe). Playing on old words, creating new words, inventing new ways of writing words, exploring metaphorical and etymological meanings, and recovering abusive terms for women from their patriarchal bias, Daly has developed an alternative rhetoric, for which a new dictionary or glossary has been “conjured.”

D. C. JONES

See also FEMINISM, CHRISTIAN; FEMINISM, FEMINIST THEOLOGY; INCLUSIVE LANGUAGE; NEW AGE MOVEMENT; WOMAN, BIBLICAL CONCEPT OF.

Bibliography. M. Daly, Beyond God the Father: Toward a Philosophy of Women’s Liberation; Church and the Second Sex; Gyn/Ecology: The Metaethics of Radical Feminism; Pure Lust: Elemental Feminist Philosophy; M. Daly and Jane Caputi, Outercourse: The Be-Dazzling Voyage; Webster’s First New Intergalactic Wickedary of the English Language; K. Ratcliffe, “De/Mystifying Her-Self and HerWor(l)ds: Mary Daly,” in Anglo-American Feminist Challenges to the Rhetorical Traditions.

Damnation. See HELL; JUDGMENT.

Darby, John Nelson (1800–1882). The most influential British leader of the separatist Plymouth Brethren movement (also known as Darbyites) and systematizer of premillennial dispensationalism. His ideas pervaded late-nineteenth-century millenarianism in England and America and became a prominent element in American fundamentalism. Although born in London, Darby was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and began his practice of law in Ireland at the age of twenty-two. Following his conversion and call to the ministry he was a zealous deacon and priest in the Established Church and led a spiritual awakening among his parishioners and their Roman Catholic neighbors. However, he became deeply disillusioned when he perceived a sharp contrast between the moral and spiritual laxness of the contemporary church and the spiritual vitality of NT believers narrated in Acts. Various accounts, including some of Darby’s, differ over how early and to what extent he became involved in the Brethren movement in Dublin. By 1829 he had joined others in private homes to “break bread,” study the Bible, and seek spiritual edification outside the Established Church.

In 1831 he joined the Brethren group at Plymouth, which he said “altered the face of Christianity for me.”

Under Darby’s forceful leadership Brethren groups grew rapidly. Darby distinguished the signs of a true church as spiritual unity and fellowship, and obedience to Scripture under a ministry guided by the Holy Spirit. Such criteria were juxtaposed against the visible, ordained ministry and worldly, manmade systems of church government in the Established Church and other dissenting denominations.

After 1840 sharp divisions between Darby and other Brethren teachers erupted over increasingly narrow theological and ecclesiastical questions. As a result Darby became the leader of the Exclusive group after a bitter controversy with B. W. Newton. In a series of lectures delivered at Lausanne, Darby synthesized his idea of the apostasy of the contemporary church with his interest in biblical prophecy and developed an elaborate philosophy of history. He divided history into separate eras or dispensations, each of which contained a different order by which God worked out his redemptive plan. The age of the church, like all preceding periods, has ended in failure due to man’s sinfulness. Darby broke not only from previous millenarian teaching but from all of church history by asserting that Christ’s second coming would occur in two stages. The first, an invisible “secret rapture” of true believers, could happen at any moment, ending the great “parenthesis” or church age which began when the Jews rejected Christ. Then literal fulfillment would resume OT prophecy concerning Israel, which had been suspended, and fulfillment of prophecy in Revelation would begin the great tribulation. Christ’s return would be completed when he established a literal thousand-year kingdom of God on earth, manifest in a restored Israel.

Darby popularized dispensationalism and attempted to win converts to Brethrenism by travels to Europe, New Zealand, and seven trips to Canada and the United States between 1862 and 1877. His views gained gradual acceptance, as his basic theological assumptions of the verbal inspiration of Scripture, human depravity, and the sovereignty of God’s grace were compatible with traditional Calvinism. His eschatological views were propagated through a series of prophecy conferences such as the Niagara Bible Conference, an evangelical fellowship which met annually from 1883 to 1897 to uphold biblical truth. Although many Baptists and Old School Presbyterians accepted Darby’s eschatology and his view that the church was often corrupt, few actually left their denominations. And many leaders criticized Brethrenism for weakening the church by its proselytizing.

Darby's eschatological views figured prominently in American fundamentalism in the 1920s as conservative Christians such as dispensationalists and Princeton Calvinists joined forces to counter liberalism's rejection of biblical teaching.

W. A. HOFFECKER

See also DISPENSATION, DISPENSATIONALISM; FUNDAMENTALISM; MILLENNIUM, VIEWS OF THE; NIAGARA CONFERENCES; RAPTURE OF THE CHURCH; TRIBULATION.

Bibliography. C. B. Bass, Backgrounds to Dispensationalism; F. R. Coad, History of the Brethren Movement; J. N. Darby, Collected Writings, W. Kelly, ed.; H. A. Ironside, Historical Sketch of the Brethren Movement; C. N. Kraus, Dispensationalism in America; G. Marsden, Fundamentalism and American Culture; H. H. Rowdon, Origins of the Brethren 1825–1850; E. R. Sandeen, Roots of Fundamentalism: British and American Millenarianism 1800–1930; W. G. Turner, John Nelson Darby.

Dark Night of the Soul. The phrase is taken from the title of a book by John of the Cross. It refers, however, to a universal experience of spiritual and mystical writers.

The contemplative life is often at first a life of great spiritual experiences. Conversion is exciting, as the works of evil are stripped away and the person experiences the power of God in a new way, in both physical provision and spiritual experience (ranging from visions to the simple perception of God's love and fellowship). Growth in spiritual knowledge and insight is perceptible.

Then comes a period when all of this experiential aspect of the faith is removed. God had seemed very close; now he seems distant or even absent. One had been experiencing great spiritual fervor; now one experiences nothing. In fact, prayer, Scripture, church, and devotion may seem boring or dull. The person keeps on, but only because he or she is disciplined and knows they should. Previously one rejoiced in freedom from sin as obvious worldliness was left behind; now the believer is deeply conscious of his or her sinful state. Sins such as lust, anger, and evil thoughts that were believed conquered rise up like so many demons from hell. Sins of which one was totally unconscious are suddenly discovered. The person feels utterly sinful, unworthy, and unfit for God's presence. On a deeper level there may for some be a fascination with death, a longing to be closer to God, and a feeling that only death will free one from the clinging sinfulness.

This period was described in the older literature as aridity, or dryness in the soul. Cloud of Unknowing describes it as a dark cloud between the person and God. John of the Cross calls it "the dark night of the soul." God's goal for the experience is the purification of the person. The intense feeling of sinfulness and the struggle with internal sins not only produce a deeper holiness but also a deeper humility as the person experiences how he or she can never be worthy. The lack of experience of God's nearness means the person must operate on faith, trusting that God is near, although not experienced. The lack of spiritual "highs" and other gifts means the person discovers whether he or she loves God or only the pleasant feelings spiritual life produces and the gifts God gives. As faith, love, and humility develop to a mature state, the person reaches a point of self-abandonment in which anything God may do is acceptable. This is the goal of aridity. When it is reached after however many weeks or even years in "the valley," the person often experiences even higher "mountaintops" of union with God than before. But he or she realizes it is all a gift, all of grace. P. H. DAVIDS

See also JOHN OF THE CROSS; MYSTICISM.

Bibliography. A. Bloom, Beginning to Pray; John of the Cross, Ascent of Mount Carmel; Cloud of Unknowing; Dark Night of the Soul; W. Meninger, Loving Search for God; M. E. Sawyer, Bibliographic Index of Five English Mystics; P. Slattery, John of the Cross: A Spirituality of Substance; D. B. Tillyer, Union with God: The Teaching of St. John of the Cross; E. Underhill, Mysticism.

Day. Natural Meanings. The greatest number of uses of day (yōm; hēmera) refer to natural time units; but in the progress of revelation its theological use increases to such an extent that in the Synoptic Gospels almost one third of all uses of hēmera is eschatological.

Hours of Daylight. Any given day between dawn and dusk (Gen. 1:5, 16, 18). The Lord Jesus spoke of a day of twelve hours, assuredly of light since man does not stumble (John 11:9). Day is used to indicate the dawn (Josh. 6:15; 2 Pet. 1:19), midday (1 Sam. 11:11; Acts 26:13), late afternoon or evening hour (Judg. 19:9; Luke 9:12). A large number of references speak of day as opposed to night (Isa. 27:3; Mark 5:5; Luke 18:7; 1 Tim. 5:5).

Legal or Civil Day. A period of twenty-four hours. The sabbath is from dusk to dusk (Lev. 23:32). There are six days and a sabbath in a week (Luke 13:14). The Lord's resurrection is after three days (Mark 8:31; Luke 24:46). The period between the resurrection and the ascension is forty legal days (Acts 1:3). The legal day is contrasted with the hour and month and year in Revelation 9:15.

A Longer Period. Although day is used in the singular to designate long periods of time, as the "day" of Christ (John 8:56), or the day of salvation (Isa. 49:8; 2 Cor. 6:2), it is more generally used in this respect in the plural in such expressions as "the days of Adam" (Gen. 5:4), "the days of Abraham" (Gen. 26:18), "the days of Noah" (Matt. 24:37), “the days of the Son of Man” (Luke 17:26). Christ’s presence is “always” (lit. “all the days”) with those who go out to preach his word (Matt. 28:20).

Theological Meanings. General. The antithesis of day and night in the literal sphere is seen in the description of believers as children of the day and unbelievers as children of the night (1 Thess. 5:5–8). The Lord Jesus indicates that the day is the time of opportunity for service that will end with the coming night (John 9:4). Paul, however, teaches that the period up to the time of eschatological salvation is the night, and this will issue in the glorious day of Christ (Rom. 13:11–13).

Eschatological. In the records of man’s earliest history the word “day” came to be associated with special days set aside as belonging to the Lord (Gen. 2:3; Exod. 12:14, 16; 20:8–11; Lev. 16:29–31). In the total OT concept they were designed for judgment of sin in nations or individuals (Isa. 2:12; 13:9, 11; Ezek. 7:6–8; Obad. 15; Zeph. 1:14–18), but they also had the purpose of salvation, vindication, or restoration of God’s chosen ones (Gen. 7:10–13, 23; Isa. 4:2–6; Mic. 7:12). The local days of the Lord visited on Israel and Judah (Ezek. 7:5–9) or upon pagan nations (Isa. 13:9) were just a foretaste of one climactic dies irae to come upon the whole world (Isa. 2:12; Jer. 25:15; Joel 2:31; Mal. 4:5). Immediately following this supernatural intervention in history, God would set up his eternal kingdom (Dan. 2:44), in which he alone would be sovereign and exalted (Isa. 2:11).

In the NT the day of the Lord, or final day of reckoning, is designated by various phrases (Matt. 10:15; John 6:39; 1 Thess. 5:4; 1 Pet. 2:12), principally in combination with the name of Jesus Christ (Acts 2:20; 1 Cor. 1:8; 5:5; Phil. 1:6, 10; 2 Pet. 3:10), but they contain the same basic concepts as in the OT, i.e., God’s judgment, salvation, sovereignty, and exaltation.

The phrase “the last days” (Acts 2:17; 2 Tim. 3:1; Heb. 1:2; 2 Pet. 3:3–4) seems to include, in its greatest extension, the whole period from the cross to the second advent. More specifically, day in its plural form is used to designate that final terrible period immediately before the parousia, including the great tribulation (Matt. 24:19–22; Luke 17:26–30; cf. Rev. 4–11). In the singular form it designates the parousia itself (Matt. 24:30–31, 36; 2 Thess. 2:1–2) and also the post-parousia period up to the creation of the new heavens and earth (2 Pet. 3:8–13).

The theological connotations of day do not rob it of its literalness when referring to the parousia. Rather, God’s choice of the term “day” only serves to emphasize its literal reality. When the Lord himself makes his second appearance on earth, then will begin what Peter calls “the day of eternity” (2 Pet. 3:18 RSV).

G. A. GAY

See also DAY OF CHRIST, GOD, THE LORD; ESCHATOLOGY; LAST DAY, DAYS.

Bibliography. O. Cullmann, Christ and Time; S. J. De Vries, Yesterday, Today, and Tomorrow; W. G. Kümmel, Promise and Fulfillment; H. W. Robinson, Inspiration and Revelation in the Old Testament; H. H. Rowley, Faith of Israel; G. von Rad and G. Delling, TDNT 2:943–953.

Day of Atonement. See ATONEMENT, DAY OF.

Day of Christ, God, the Lord. In Semitic thought it was customary to designate events of importance with the term “day.” These could be decisive events in Israel’s history (the day of Jerusalem’s destruction, Ps. 137:7) or random events which took on symbolic value (the day of trouble, Ps. 77:2). Among Israel’s prophets the term often took on an eschatological tenor describing a future climactic day of judgment (the day of the Lord of hosts, Isa. 2:12). This day of the Lord was anticipated by Israel as a future day of Yahweh’s visitation. It would inaugurate some hopeful era for God’s people. But as the earliest reference in Amos (5:18–20) makes clear, this visitation would not reaffirm Israel’s hopes. As G. Ladd writes, “Amos shattered this shallow nonreligious hope with an announcement that the future holds disaster rather than security.” Jerusalem would be destroyed (Amos 2:5) and foreign powers would raze Israel (3:9–11). Other prophets confirmed this same picture (Isa. 2:12; Zech. 14:1). Joel writes that “the day of the Lord is near; it will come like destruction from the Almighty” (1:15). Zephaniah in particular gives this theme increased attention when he describes the coming catastrophe (1:7, 14) and employs images descriptive of an impending battle (1:10–12, 16–17; 2:5–15).

Alongside this desperate outlook, however, another prophetic word is evident. The prophets not only view historical events as ushering in the day of the Lord’s visitation, but they look to an ultimate eschatological event. Even for Amos this will be a day of universal judgment (8:8–9; 9:5) when at last salvation and genuine hope will come to Israel: “In that day I will restore David’s fallen tent . . . and build it as it used to be. . . . I will bring back my exiled people Israel” (Amos 9:11–15; cf. Zeph. 3:9–20). Therefore this “day” is for Israel both near and far, both historical and eschatological. It may be a divine visitation within history as well as a final visitation that climaxes history.

The NT maintains this futurist expectation consistently but adds that the second coming of Jesus Christ (or the parousia) will hallmark the day of the Lord. It will be a day of Christ’s revealing (1 Cor. 1:8; 5:5; cf. 2 Thess. 2:2) and thus may be termed “the day of the Lord Jesus” (2 Cor.

Day of Christ, God, the Lord

1:14) or simply “the day of Christ” (Phil. 1:10; 2:16). It will be a day of surprise (1 Thess. 5:2; 2 Pet. 3:10) ushering in a climactic battle (Rev. 16:14) and universal judgment (2 Pet. 3:12). This surprising climactic denouement to history parallels the eschatological Son of Man sayings in the Gospels (“For the Son of Man in his day will be like the lightning, which flashes and lights up the sky” Luke 17:24).

The most important development in NT eschatology is the early Christian view that in some fashion the eschatological era had been inaugurated with the coming of Christ and the Spirit. Thus in Acts 2, Peter can cite Joel 2 and interpret the experiences of Pentecost in light of eschatological fulfillment. This therefore somewhat parallels the OT notion of a special divine visitation within history. But still, while the promise may be partially realized, NT writers are clear that its fulfillment is future. Thus the church experiences a religious tension. While it has already acquired some benefits of the day of the Lord, it still awaits a thoroughgoing future bestowal at the second coming of Christ.

G. M. BURGE

See also ESCHATOLOGY; LAST DAY, DAYS; REALIZED ESCHATOLOGY; SECOND COMING OF CHRIST.

Bibliography. D. C. Allison, End of the Ages Has Come: An Early Interpretation of the Passion and Resurrection of Jesus; G. Brauman and C. Brown, NIDNTT 2:887–88, 890–91; J. Bright, Kingdom of God: The Biblical Concept and Its Meaning for the Church; B. Chilton, Kingdom of God in the Teaching of Jesus; E. Jacob, “Consummation,” in Theology of the Old Testament; E. Jenni, IDB 1:784–85; G. Ladd, Presence of the Future; M. Rist, IDB 1:783; G. von Rad, “Day of Yahweh,” in Message of the Prophets; “Origin of the Concept of the Day of Yahweh,” JSS 4:97–108, G. von Rad and G. Dellling, TDNT 2:943–53; W. Willis, ed., Kingdom of God in 20th Century Interpretation.

Days, Last. See LAST DAY, DAYS.

Deacon, Deaconess. While the office of elder was adopted from the Jewish synagogue, the early church instituted something new with an order of deacons. The word group surrounding diakoneō, “to serve” (diakonia, service; diakonos, server), initially referred to a waiter at a meal (John 2:5, 9). This meaning expanded to include care for the home and finally any personal help or care. But still for Judaism religious service as a “deacon,” or server, was uncommon. In Judaism service was exercised through alms, not serving. Hence in the Greek OT diakonos refers only to professional court servants. Waiting at table was considered below the dignity of the Jewish freeman (cf. Luke 7:44–45; so Hess). In this sense diakonos often appears in the NT referring to servants and their masters (Matt. 22:13). Similarly, Christians are to be known as servants (diakonoi) of Christ (John 12:26), who not only himself served as a diakonos (Rom. 13:4; 15:8; Gal. 2:17) but directed each of us to serve in a similar fashion (Mark 9:35; 10:43; cf. 2 Cor. 3:6; 11:15, 23; Col. 1:7). Again, this language of pious service employing the term diakoneō was uncommon in the first century. The church on the other hand viewed its work on the model of Christ, who engaged in humble service. Even fellowship around a table (the Lord’s Table) would inspire the use of such language as a descriptive title for Christian service (cf. John 13:1–30).

The beginnings of a formal diaconate, or formal office of deacons, may be traced to Acts 6. A problem in distribution of aid led to the appointment of seven leaders who would free the apostles from “waiting on tables” (diakoneō, 6:2). The body elected the seven, who were ordained for service by the apostles (6:6). Luke’s intimate knowledge of Paul’s church organization and his extended interest in this passage no doubt suggest that he is here introducing what was for Paul an important office.

From Jerusalem the diaconate spread to the Gentile churches. Philippians 1:1 lists the deacons alongside the bishops in Paul’s greeting and suggests two adjacent offices. But was this office universal? A mere functional description may appear in Romans 12:6–8; 1 Corinthians 12:28–31; and 1 Thessalonians 5:12. But in the list of offices in Ephesians 4:11 deacons are absent (as are elders), and when Paul instructs Titus to appoint elders in every city of Crete (Titus 1:5), he fails to mention an order of deacons. Still, in 1 Timothy 3:8–13 there is a substantial paragraph devoted to the role of the deacon. This should be expected inasmuch as Paul here directly turns his thoughts to church organization. Deacons are to demonstrate an exemplary moral lifestyle and a firm faith. They are to be practical servants (and not necessarily teachers, cf. 5:17). In fact, the description found in 1 Timothy 3:8–13 so closely parallels the description of bishops (3:1–7; cf. Phil. 1:1) that scholars have often wondered if the offices were once one. But this seems doubtful.

A brief glance at the patristic era shows that the office was soon formalized (1 Clem. 42:4; Hermas, Visions 3, 5:1; Similitudes 9, 26:2; and Ignatius, Ephesians 2:1; Magnesians 6:1; 13:1; Trallians 2:3; 3:1; 7:2; Polycarp 6:1). Lightfoot notes how Irenaeus labeled the seven in Acts 6 as “deacons.” Eusebius even records how the Roman Church limited its diaconate to seven, preserving the memory of Stephen. By the third century Rome had forty-six elders but only seven deacons—and this tradition persisted through the fifth century. In the early fourth century the Greek Council of Neocaesarea ruled that any given city could boast only seven deacons (again viewing Acts 6 as the model).

It is certain that women served actively as deacons. This is clear not only in Romans 16:1, where the deaconess Phoebe of Cenchreae is commended by Paul, but in 1 Timothy 3:11. Here the best exegesis would view the reference to women as meaning another order of deacons (gynaikas hōsautōs), namely women deacons (see J. N. D. Kelly, Pastoral Epistles, 83–84). A parallel development is found in 1 Timothy 5:3–16, where a women's order of widows was recognized for its ready service. Nevertheless, the patristic church enjoyed the service of an independent order of women deacons, as witnessed to in the Syriac Didascalia. From the fourth century on, their common title was "deaconess" (Gk. diakonissa; Lat. diaconissa).

Archdeacon is an order of ministry of relatively recent development which began to be recognized in the medieval period. The archdeacon is a cleric with specific administrative tasks usually assigned by a bishop. It is a common order in the Anglican tradition.

G. M. BURGE

See also APOSTOLIC FATHERS; CHURCH, AUTHORITY IN THE; CHURCH OFFICERS; MAJOR ORDERS.

Bibliography. R. Banks, Paul's Idea of Community; E. Best, "Bishops and Deacons: Phil. 1:1," Studia Evangelica 4:371–76; H. W. Beyer, TDNT 2:81–93; J. G. Davies, "Deacons, Deaconesses and the Minor Orders in the Patristic Period," JEH 14:1–15; D. Guthrie, New Testament Theology; K. Hess, NIDNTT 3:544–49; C. Keener, Paul, Women & Wives: Marriage and Women's Ministry in the Letters of Paul; J. B. Lightfoot, "Christian Ministry," in Philippians; E. Schweizer, Church Order in the New Testament.

Dead, Abode of the. The concept is one which develops in Scripture. In the OT one descends at death to Sheol, which may simply mean the grave (Num. 16:30, 33), but usually means the underworld to which one "goes down" beneath the earth (Gen. 42:38; Prov. 15:24). The important theological concept is that Sheol is not just a place of darkness and forgetfulness (Job 10:21–22; Pss. 88:12; 94:17), but a place where Yahweh does not remember people (Ps. 88:5, 11; Isa. 38:18), a place of permanent decay (Job 14:21–22), whose inhabitants are permanently unclean and cut off from the cult and service of Yahweh. His praises are never sung there, and he is not remembered (Pss. 6:5; 30:9; 115:17). Because of the uncleanness and separation from the cult, worship of the dead was avoided in Israel and necromancy prohibited (Deut. 18:11; 1 Sam. 28:7–25).

On the positive side, existence in Sheol was among one's ancestors (Gen. 25:8; Ezek. 32:17–30) and it was not outside the reach of God's power (Ps. 139; Amos 9:2; Jon. 2:2;), but still it could hardly be called life, for life existed for the Hebrew only in the presence of God (Ps.

16:10). It was only in exceptional cases and toward the end of the OT period that the writers began to express hope concerning the realm of the dead or to believe in an eventual resurrection (Job 14:13–17; 19:25–27; Pss. 49; 73:23–28; Dan. 12:1–2).

It was during the intertestamental period that a clear idea of the abode of the dead emerged. The OT word Sheol was translated by the Greek word Hades. For some writers this was just a continuation of the old idea of a place of separation from God, but for others Hades was a place where the righteous were rewarded and the wicked tormented (1 Enoch 22; 51:1; 102:5; 2 Macc. 6:23). Another name for the place where the wicked were tormented was Gehenna (from the OT site of child sacrifices, 2 Kings 16:3; 1 Enoch 90:20–27), while the Persian term Paradise was applied to the place where the righteous were rewarded.

While the NT basically adopts the intertestamental picture, it has relatively little to say about the abode of the dead—about thirty-five verses. What it does say is contained in a multitude of terms that are used with more than one meaning.

Hades is a place within the earth to which all dead go down (Matt. 11:23; 12:40; Luke 10:15), a place with gates which, however, cannot hold the Christian (Matt. 16:18), for Christ holds the key (Rev. 1:18). Believers will be raised from the dead to be with their Lord.

In another use of the term, Hades is the place of torment for the wicked dead (Luke 16:23); it is also called Gehenna, a place of fire and worms (Matt. 5:22; 18:9; Mark 9:45; James 3:6); outer darkness (Matt. 8:12; 22:13; 25:30); Tartarus (2 Pet. 2:4); and the abyss, the prison of the devil and his angels (Matt. 25:41; Rev. 9:1–11; 11:7; 17:8; 20:3). In the end Gehenna or the lake of fire becomes the all-inclusive term, for it swallows Hades and Death (since by then they hold none of the righteous, who have been resurrected, Rev. 19:20; 20:10, 14–15; 21:8).

When spoken of separately, the righteous dead are said to enter a blessed state at death termed Abraham's Bosom (Luke 16:22) or Paradise (Luke 23:43; Paul and John place it in heaven, 2 Cor. 12:2–4; Rev. 2:7). Paul, after his own brush with death (2 Cor. 1:8–11), describes this as being with Christ and thus better than life (2 Cor. 5:8; Phil. 1:23). Death has no power to separate Christians from God (Rom. 8:38–39); in fact, it unites them.

The devil in no way controls the place of the dead. Jesus has the key (Rev. 1:18), and it is given only to his messengers (Rev. 9:1; 20:1). Jesus himself upon his death descended to the place of the dead (Eph. 4:9; the rabbis used "the lowest earth" to refer to Sheol/Gehenna/Hades), and he preached there to imprisoned spirits, probably meaning the fallen angels of Noah's time (1 Pet.

Dead, Abode of the

3:18–20; cf. Gen. 6:1–4). His preaching was surely an annunciation of victory. Thus for the Christian death, while sad, has lost its fearful aspect. Their leader has entered the stronghold of Hades and has reappeared victorious in resurrection. Whether thought of in terms of Paradise and Abraham's Bosom or in terms of the heavenly Jerusalem (Heb. 12:22), being under the heavenly altar (Rev. 6:9), or standing before God's throne (7:9; 14:3), the abode of the righteous dead is one of union with Christ.

P. H. DAVIDS

See also ABRAHAM'S BOSOM; DEATH; HADES; HEAVEN; HELL; INTERMEDIATE STATE; PARADISE; SHEOL.

Bibliography. H. Bietenhard, NIDNTT 2:205–10; J. S. Bonnell, Heaven and Hell; P. Cotterell, What the Bible Teaches about Death; J. Jeremias, TDNT 1:9–10, 146–49, 657–58; X. Léon-Dufour, Life and Death in the New Testament; L. Morris, Biblical Doctrine of Judgment; S. H. Travis, Christian Hope and the Future of Man.

Dead, Prayers for the. See PRAYERS FOR THE DEAD.

Deadly Sins, Seven. See SINS, SEVEN DEADLY.

Dead Sea Scrolls. The designation popularly given to manuscripts discovered since 1947 in the area west of the Dead Sea.

Qumran. The most important manuscripts are those found in eleven caves overlooking the Wadi Qumran—apparently the remnants of the library of a religious community which had its headquarters at Khirbet Qumran between ca. 145 B.C. and A.D. 68 (with a break of thirty years ca. 34–4 B.C.). This community, organized by a leader usually referred to by a phrase meaning “the Teacher of Righteousness,” regarded itself as the godly remnant of Israel. It withdrew to the wilderness of Judea to prepare for the cataclysmic events that would bring the current “epoch of wickedness” to an end and introduce the kingdom of God. By diligent study and practice of the law of God its members hoped to win his acceptance and expiate the errors of their misguided fellow Israelites; they also expected to be the executors of his judgment on the ungodly at the end of the age.

They refused to recognize the priesthood that controlled the Jerusalem temple during the “epoch of wickedness” (the Hasmonean priesthood), partly because it did not belong to the family of Zadok and partly because of its moral unfitness for the sacred office. In their own ranks they preserved the framework of worthy priests and Levites, ready to resume a pure sacrificial worship in the temple of the new Jerusalem.

The men of Qumran believed in the absolute sovereignty of God. He knew the end from the beginning and disposed all things in accordance with his eternal purpose, despite attempts by man to frustrate it.

They were also strict predestinarians: men and angels alike have been allotted by God to the realm of light or the realm of darkness, each realm governed by its appropriate “prince.” The idea of someone being redeemed from the realm of darkness to share the inheritance of the “sons of light” was scarcely contemplated; the impression is given, however, that it might be all too easy for sons of light to defect to the realm of darkness: only unremitting vigilance and divine grace could keep them true.

The schema of the realms of light and darkness may owe something to Zoroastrian influence, but there is no ultimate dualism in Qumran theology because the one God is supreme over both realms; the prince of light and the prince of darkness are alike created by him.

God has given his law to Israel. It is therefore for Israel to obey his law, but Israel as a whole has failed to do so. The faithful remnant, as a miniature Israel, set itself to render the obedience that Israel as a whole had failed to render, according to a radically strict interpretation of the law—considerably stricter than that of the Pharisees, whom the men of Qumran disparaged as “seekers after smooth things” or “givers of smooth interpretations” (cf. Isa. 30:10). The sabbath law and the marriage law were interpreted with special severity. But the members of the sect did not complain; they entered its ranks as “volunteers for holiness,” setting themselves willingly to attain a standard of righteousness higher than that of the scribes and Pharisees (cf. Matt. 5:20).

But, while they knew they could not win God's approval without unremitting devotion to his law, they were far from supposing that such devotion could establish a claim on God. When they had done all, they were not thereby justified: their justification in God's sight depended entirely on his grace. His righteousness was understood by them, as later by Paul, in a twofold sense—not only of his personal character but also of his gracious act in justifying those who would not venture to regard their own righteousness as an adequate basis for being accepted by him.

The end of the current epoch of wickedness and the inauguration of the new age of righteousness would be marked by the rise of three figures foretold by the OT prophets. One of these was the prophet like Moses foretold in Deuteronomy 18:15–19; another would be the warrior prince of the house of David; the third would be a great priest of Aaronic descent. The designation “messiah” is given to the second and the third (they are “the anointed ones of Israel and Aaron”); but when the Messiah as such is mentioned, the Davidic prince is intended. He, however, takes his orders from the great priest, who is to be the effective head of state in the new age, just as the prince in Ezekiel's new commonwealth is subordinate to the priesthood.

The Qumran library, of which over four hundred documents have been identified (most in very fragmentary condition), included biblical and nonbiblical texts. About a hundred out of the four hundred are biblical texts. All the OT books except Esther are represented, some of them several times over. These biblical manuscripts date from the closing centuries B.C. and the first century A.D. They attest at least three distinct textual traditions of Hebrew Scripture—not only the text (preserved in Babylonia) which underlies the later Masoretic recension, but also the text (of Egyptian provenance) underlying the Septuagint and a text (native to Palestine) akin to the Samaritan Pentateuch. The discovery of these manuscripts has reduced the gap separating the autographs from the oldest extant copies by about a thousand years and is of great importance for the textual history of the OT. In addition to copies of the type of Hebrew text used by the Septuagint translators, pieces of their actual Greek translation have also been identified.

The nonbiblical manuscripts, along with the archeological evidence furnished by the excavation of Khirbet Qumran, give a picture of the beliefs and practices of this community, which almost certainly was an Essene group. The members practiced ceremonial ablutions; they held fellowship meals; they followed the solar calendar of the book of Jubilees; they cherished apocalyptic hopes; they interpreted prophetic Scripture in terms of persons and events of their own days and of the days immediately to follow.

Some of the most interesting documents are commentaries (pēšārīm) on biblical texts, from which may be learned the ideas of biblical interpretation favored by the community. The prophets, it was believed, knew by revelation what God was going to do at the end time, but they were not told when the end time would come. This further revelation was reserved for the Teacher of Righteousness, who imparted it to his followers. They accordingly congratulated themselves as men whom God had specially favored by initiating them into his wonderful mysteries. Their system of interpretation presents striking points of resemblance and contrast with the interpretation of the OT found in the NT.

Their expectations, however, were not fulfilled. The community was dispersed, and its headquarters destroyed, during the Roman suppression of the Judean revolt between A.D. 66 and 70.

The Qumran community has been compared to the primitive church in its eschatological outlook and its remnant mentality, as well as in its biblical interpretation. But the decisive difference between the two lies in the person and work of Jesus. The Teacher of Righteousness was exactly what his title suggests: he was no messiah or savior. Jesus was to the early Christians all that the Teacher was to the men of Qumran, but he was more. As Messiah, he was prophet and priest and king in one; and he fulfilled his messianic mission in terms of the portrayal of the suffering servant that the Qumran community may have endeavored to fulfill corporately. If (as appears possible) refugees from Qumran after the destruction of their headquarters made common cause in Transjordan with the refugee church of Jerusalem, they would have learned at last how Jesus fulfilled the hopes which had not been realized in the way they had formerly been led to expect.

Murabba'at. In caves in the Wadi Murabba'at about eleven miles south of Qumran, manuscripts were discovered around 1952. The most significant belonged to the period when Murabba'at was occupied by a garrison of Simeon Ben Kosebah (commonly called Bar Kochba), leader of the second Jewish revolt against Rome (A.D. 132–35). From some of the documents, including two letters from the leader himself, it was discovered for the first time that his proper patronymic was Ben Kosebah. The manuscripts included many fragments of biblical texts of the period, all of them showing a “proto-Masoretic” recension. From caves in neighboring wadis further manuscripts came to light, including a fragmentary copy of the minor prophets in Greek.

Khirbet Mird. Another collection of manuscripts was unearthed at Khirbet Mird, north of the Wadi en-Nar (Kidron Valley), midway between Qumran and Murabba'at. This collection dates between the fifth and eighth centuries A.D., is of Christian origin, and contains several biblical texts in Greek (including fragments of uncial codices of Wisdom, Mark, John, and Acts) and in Palestinian Syriac (including fragments of Joshua, Luke, John, Acts, and Colossians).

Masada. During the excavations of the rock fortress of Masada between 1963 and 1965 several manuscripts were found. These had been left there since the place was stormed by the Romans early in A.D. 74. They included portions of Psalms, Leviticus, Ecclesiasticus (the Wisdom of Ben Sira), and Jubilees, as well as a liturgical text already known from the Qumran finds—all in Hebrew.

Recent Developments. In the aftermath of the 1967 Arab-Israeli war a scroll as long or longer than any previously discovered came into the hands of Israeli scholars. Although called “Temple Scroll,” because of its description of an anticipated future central sanctuary, the document deals primarily with Jewish cultic law. Hence it turned the focus of research and concern away from Christian to primarily Jewish concerns. In 1984 this was stimulated by reports of a still unpublished document, “Some of the Precepts of Torah" (MMT), which appeared to have similar contents.

Dead Sea Scrolls

The original responsibility for the publication of the scrolls was in the hands of a select group of scholars who refused access to the documents to any but their own number. This, combined with the slowness with which the material was being made available to the public, caused growing resentment, hostility, suspicion, and curiosity by excluded scholars and the public at large. Two separate unauthorized releases of unpublished materials in the fall of 1991 eventually forced the granting of access to all manuscripts to all qualified individuals and the official release of quality photographs of previously unpublished material.

Virtually all of the newly available documents came from the eleven Qumran caves. They consisted largely of small fragments. Even partial reconstruction was a laborious process. Yet, the different ethos of the "Temple Scroll" and "Some of the Precepts" documents left many wondering what other surprises might be hidden in this new cache. Reconstructing and deciphering this material, and controversies about what it says and means, continue. There appear to be no proven major surprises.

When the new material is placed alongside that previously available, it is evident that the Dead Sea documents fall into three categories with about the same number of writings in each: biblical (OT) manuscripts, Jewish writings from the Apocrypha and other literary groups not included in the Hebrew canon, and writings related strictly to the sect that collected, copied, and wrote the Scrolls. The former is of immense value in studies of the text of the OT. The second gives insights into the thought of Second Temple (Intertestamental) Judaism in general. The "Sectarian Documents" provide specialized data about one particular Jewish group.

The original article discreetly avoided identifying the Dead Sea Community with a particular known Jewish group or party. The usual position is that they were members of that general category called "Essenes." New written and archeological materials and interpretations have challenged this assumption. For an example, some have noted that the "Temple Scroll" and "Some Precepts" documents express views similar to those of the Sadducees. The dearth of knowledge about the details of Sadducean belief should suggest caution before making any such dogmatic identification.

More exaggerated and less well founded claims have identified the Dead Sea group as some form of Jewish Christianity. It is sometimes suggested that there is no connection between the remains at Qumran and the documents that just happened to have been discovered near by. It has even been proposed that the ruins were some sort of a palatial mansion or retreat.

More sober interpreters seek from the Scrolls clearer glimpses of a part of that Judaism from which emerged both Rabbinic Judaism and early Christianity. The contribution of the Scrolls to understanding the Jewish background of the New Testament is considerable. Yet, certainly it is a step in the right direction to understand that the Temple Scroll and documents which came to public view later clarify that the Dead Sea documents are to be read essentially for information about Pre-Rabbinic Judaism.

F. F. BRUCE AND J. J. SCOTT JR.

See also ESSENES.

Bibliography. F. G. Martinez, Dead Sea Scrolls Translated: The Qumran Texts in English, trans. F. G. Martinez; F. F. Bruce, Biblical Exegesis in the Qumran Texts; J. H. Charlesworth, ed., Jesus and the Dead Sea Scrolls; John and Qumran; E. M. Cook, Solving the Mysteries of the Dead Sea Scrolls: New Light on the Bible; F. M. Cross Jr., Ancient Library of Qumran and Modern Biblical Studies; R. de Vaux, Archaeology and the Dead Sea Scrolls; T. H. Gaster, Dead Sea Scriptures; J. T. Milik, Ten Years of Discovery in the Wilderness of Judaea; J. Murphy-O'Connor, ed., Paul and Qumran; L. H. Schiffman, Reclaiming the Dead Sea Scrolls: Their True Meaning for Judaism and Christianity; J. J. Scott Jr., Jewish Backgrounds of the New Testament; J. Trever, Dead Sea Scrolls: A Personal Account; J. C. VanderKam, Dead Sea Scrolls Today; G. Vermes, Dead Sea Scrolls in English; Dead Sea Scrolls: Qumran in Perspective.

Dean. See CHURCH OFFICERS.

Death. Death has preoccupied Christian thought for centuries, either in its physical aspects as the cessation of bodily life and how one ought to prepare for it or in its spiritual aspects as separation from God and how it may be overcome. These perspectives developed out of a variety of strands in the biblical literature.

OT and Intertestamental Periods. In the OT death is usually seen as a natural part of human existence: Adam was not seen as created immortal (although a type of immortality was possible through contact with the tree of life). The goal of existence was to live a long, full life and to die in peace. An early death was a great evil (2 Kings 20:1–11) and indicated God's judgment for sin (Gen. 2–3; Deut. 30:15; Jer. 21:8; Ezek. 18:21–32). As death cut one off from the people of God, worship, and God himself (only rarely and in later literature does God comfort one in the face of death or is God present to the dead, Pss. 73:23–28; 139:8), it was not a good thing. Thus suicide was rare (1 Sam. 31; 2 Sam. 17:23) and the death penalty ("he shall be cut off from his people") severe.

In the intertestamental period the idea that death itself is an evil, first seen in Ecclesiastes

3:19–29, grows under Greek influence and further reflection. Not just premature death, but all death is the result of sin (2 Bar. 54:19; 2 Esdr. 3:7). There is also the growth of the idea that the whole person does not die, but only the body. The soul lives on either to await resurrection (1 Enoch 102) or to enjoy its natural immortality free from the body (Wis. Sol. 3:4; 4:1; 4 Macc. 16:13; 17:12), which was essentially a Greek idea. There is thus an increasing acceptance of suicide being in some cases better than an ignoble life (e.g., Josephus, War 7.325–36). On the other hand, those who believed in resurrection also spoke of an eternal death which corresponded to resurrection life (2 Esdr. 7:31–44).

The NT. In the NT, which focuses on a crucified and resurrected Lord, death is a theological problem. Immortality belongs to God alone (1 Tim. 6:16), so humans live in fear of death (Matt. 4:16; Heb. 2:15). But if God is the source of all life (Rom. 4:17), death must be the result of being cut off from God, a process which Adam began (Rom. 5:15, 17–18; 1 Cor. 15:22) and in which every human being now participates (Rom. 3:23; 5:12), bringing upon themselves the inevitable result of such separation from God (Rom. 6:23; Heb. 9:27). Death, then, is a power dominating the present life of the individual, not just something that happens at the end of life. It is in separation from God, a spiritual death, that people live all their life. Death or estrangement from God is the common factor in all natural human life (life “kata sarka”—according to the sinful nature or “en sarki”—controlled by the sinful nature, Rom. 8:6, 7, 8, 9, 13), for sin with its resulting death lives within the person despite God’s law (Rom. 7:9; 1 Cor. 15:56; James 1:15). The arch-rebel Satan is the lord of death (Heb. 2:14); indeed death itself may be seen as a demonic power (1 Cor. 15:26–27; Rev. 6:8; 20:13–14).

The good news in the NT is that Christ who did not need to die (since he was sinless) entered into death (1 Cor. 5:7; Phil. 2:7; 1 Pet. 3:18), dying “for us” (Mark 10:45; Rom. 5:6; 1 Thess. 5:10; Heb. 2:9), and conquered the devil and death, ascending with power over them (Heb. 2:14–15; Rev. 1:17–18, the keys of death). Christ, then, breaks the power of death over his followers, those who are joined to him or “baptized into Christ” (Rom. 6:3–4) and thus die with him to the world and to sin (Rom. 7:6; Gal. 6:14; Col. 2:20). The Christian passes through the experience of death in Christ, and is now separated, not from God, but from the world and sin, which are “dead” in the sense of separation, for the life in the believer is the life of Christ (2 Cor. 4:10; 5:14–15; Col. 3:3). In other words, the effect of Jesus’ ministry was to give life or to raise the dead, not only in the end of the age, but immediately. Those who commit themselves to Christ pass now from death to life (John 5:24) and never see real death (John 8:51–52). In contrast to the Christian, the world as a whole is on the point of death (Rev. 3:2) and headed toward eternal separation from God, a second death (20:14).

Christians are still mortal, so they die physically, but they die “in Christ” (1 Thess. 4:16) or “fall asleep” (John 11:11–14; Acts 7:60; 1 Cor. 7:39; 15:6, 18, 20, 51; 1 Thess. 4:13–15). Physical death is an enemy potentially conquered by Christ but still undefeated in individual physical experience (Rom. 8:9–11; 1 Cor. 15:26). Yet its teeth are pulled, for it cannot separate Christians from Christ, but rather puts them even closer to Christ (Rom. 8:38–39; 2 Cor. 5:1–10; Phil. 1:20–21), who as the resurrected one will call all believers back to transformed physical life as well as continuing the spiritual life they already enjoy (1 Cor. 15:20; Col. 1:12).

The Church. The early church lived in the consciousness of both the tragedy and mortality of human physical existence and the victory of Christ over death in which Christians shared. Death for them was the door to eternity, a great step forward on the road from estrangement in sin to life in God. Thus the death of martyrs could be celebrated, and the death of the faithful, while sorrowful, could be spoken of with confidence and joy. While at times this was combined with a body-denying Greek dualism that virtually rejected the possibility of possessing God’s life before physical death, this early view was largely shared by all Christians down through the ages, including the Reformation. Death was not denied nor sorrow suppressed, but death was seen as hopeful, an event in Christ, an event for which one could prepare. This idea produced a literature on holy dying and elaborate descriptions of the deathbeds of holy persons. For the Christian death was an enemy whose sting had been pulled; thus he or she could face death with confidence and hope, since they already lived in Christ.

P. H. DAVIDS

See also ABRAHAM’S BOSOM; DEAD, ABODE OF THE; DEATH, SECOND; HADES; HELL; INTERMEDIATE STATE; PARADISE; SHEOL.

Bibliography. N. R. Anderson, “Enemy: A Biblical Case for Fighting Death throughout Our Lives,” CT 38 (Feb 7, 1994) 36–38; J. C. Beker, “Relationship between Sin and Death in Romans,” in Conversation Continues: Studies in Paul & John in Honor of J. Louis Martyn, R. T. Fortna and B. R. Gaventa, ed.; C. C. Black, “Pauline Perspectives on Death in Romans 5–8,” JBL 103: 413–433; F. F. Bruce, “Paul on Immortality,” SJT 24:457–72; R. Bultmann, TDNT 3:7–21; O. Cullmann, Immortality of the Soul or Resurrection of the Dead?; J. D. G. Dunn, “Paul’s Understanding of the Death of Jesus,” in Reconciliation and Hope, R. Banks, ed.; O. Kaiser and E. Lohse, Death and Life; L. E. Keck, “Death and Afterlife in the New Testament,” in Death and Afterlife: Perspectives of World Religions, Hiroshi Obayashi, ed.; C. E. T. Kourie, “A Biblical Approach to Sickness, Suffering and Death," in Bible and Stress, P. G. R. De Villiers, ed.; M. A. Knibb, "Life and Death in the Old Testament," in World of Ancient Israel: Sociological, Anthropological and Political Perspectives, R. E. Clements, ed.; J. H. Marks and R. M. Good, eds., Love and Death in the Ancient Near East: Essays in Honor of Marvin H. Pope; R. Martin-Achard, From Death to Life; J. D. McCaughy, "Death of Death," in Reconciliation and Hope, R. Banks, ed.; J. McManners, Death and the Enlightenment; G. E. Mendenhall, "From Witchcraft to Justice: Death and Afterlife in the Old Testament," in Death and Afterlife: Perspectives of World Religions, H. Obayashi, ed.; J. Owen, Death of Death in the Death of Christ; J. Pelikan, Shape of Death; W. Schmithals, NIDNTT 1:429-47; D. L. Smith, "Concept of Death in Job and Ecclesiastes," Didaskalia 4:2-14.

Death

Death, Second. Christian use of the phrase "second death" is based upon its occurrence in Revelation, in which it is found four times (2:11; 20:6, 14; 21:8), the only biblical instances of this expression. It is defined as the "lake of fire" into which are placed at the very end of God's judgment all those not found in God's book of life and finally, Death and Hades themselves. Those who are God's faithful people are promised that the second death has no claim on them. The expression presupposes that the first death is physical death at the end of one's life.

The identification of second death with the lake of fire may reflect the tradition within apocalyptic language identifying final judgment with fire (e.g., 2 Esdr. 7:36-38; Ezek. 38:22; Matt. 25:41; Rev. 14:10). Presumably the "second death" terminology was a common phrase in at least some circles of ancient Judaism. Although not found in any Jewish text clearly prior to Revelation, it does occur in some Targums (TgDeut. 33.6; TgIsa. 22.14; 65.6, 15; TgJer. 51.39, 57) and in Pirque de Rabbi Eliezer 34 (18a).

In Christian theology second death refers to the final condition of those outside of God's salvation. There is debate as to whether the term indicates eternal punishment, the majority view of the church, or annihilation, a view held by Adventists and others.

D. M. SCHOLER

See also FINAL STATE; HELL; LAKE OF FIRE; LAST JUDGMENT.

Bibliography. M. McNamara, New Testament and the Palestinian Targum to the Pentateuch.

Death of Christ. See ATONEMENT; ATONEMENT, THEORIES OF; CROSS, CRUCIFIXION.

Death of God Theology. Also known as radical theology, this movement flourished in the mid-1960s. As a theological movement it never attracted a large following, did not find a unified expression, and passed off the scene as quickly and dramatically as it had arisen. There is even disagreement as to who its major representatives were. Some identify two, and others three or four. Although small, the movement attracted attention because it was a spectacular symptom of the bankruptcy of modern theology and because it was a journalistic phenomenon. The very statement "God is dead" was tailor-made for journalistic exploitation. The representatives of the movement effectively used periodical articles, paperback books, and the electronic media.

History. This movement gave expression to an idea that had been incipient in Western philosophy and theology for some time—the suggestion that the reality of a transcendent God at best could not be known and at worst did not exist at all. Philosopher Immanuel Kant and theologian Albrecht Ritschl denied that one could have a theoretical knowledge of the being of God. David Hume and the empiricists for all practical purposes restricted knowledge and reality to the material world as perceived by the five senses. Since God was not empirically verifiable, the biblical worldview was said to be mythological and unacceptable to the modern mind. Such atheistic existentialist philosophers as Friedrich Nietzsche despaired even of the search for God; it was he who coined the phrase "God is dead" almost a century before the death-of-God theologians.

Mid-twentieth-century theologians not associated with the movement also contributed to the climate of opinion out of which death of God theology emerged. Rudolf Bultmann regarded all elements of the supernaturalistic, theistic worldview as mythological and proposed that Scripture be demythologized so that it could speak its message to the modern person. Paul Tillich, an avowed antisupernaturalist, said that the only nonsymbolic statement that could be made about God was that he was being itself. He is beyond essence and existence; therefore, to argue that God exists is to deny him. It is more appropriate to say God does not exist. At best Tillich was a pantheist, but his thought borders on atheism. Dietrich Bonhoeffer (whether rightly understood or not) also contributed to the climate of opinion with some fragmentary but tantalizing statements preserved in Letters and Papers from Prison. He wrote of the world and man "coming of age," of "religionless Christianity," of the "world without God," and of getting rid of the "God of the gaps" and getting along just as well as before. It is not always certain what Bonhoeffer meant, but if nothing else, he provided a vocabulary that later radical theologians could exploit.

It is clear, then, that as startling as the idea of the death of God was when proclaimed in the mid-1960s, it did not represent as radical a departure from recent philosophical and theological ideas and vocabulary as might superficially appear.

Nature. Just what was death of God theology? The answers are as varied as those who proclaimed God's demise. Since Nietzsche, theologians had occasionally used "God is dead" to express the fact that for an increasing number of people in the modern age God seems to be unreal. But the idea of God's death began to have special prominence in 1957 when Gabriel Vahanian published a book entitled God Is Dead. Vahanian did not offer a systematic expression of death of God theology. Instead, he analyzed those historical elements that contributed to the masses of people accepting atheism not so much as a theory but as a way of life. Vahanian himself did not believe that God was dead. But he urged that there be a form of Christianity that would recognize the contemporary loss of God and exert its influence through what was left. Other proponents of the death of God had the same assessment of God's status in contemporary culture but were to draw different conclusions.

Thomas J. J. Altizer believed that God had actually died. But Altizer often spoke in exaggerated and dialectic language, occasionally with heavy overtones of Eastern mysticism. Sometimes it is difficult to know exactly what Altizer meant when he spoke in dialectical opposites such as "God is dead, thank God!" But apparently the real meaning of Altizer's belief that God had died is to be found in his belief in God's immanence. To say that God has died is to say that he has ceased to exist as a transcendent, supernatural being. Rather, he has become fully immanent in the world. The result is an essential identity between the human and the divine. God died in Christ in this sense, and the process has continued time and again since then. Altizer claims the church tried to give God life again and put him back in heaven by its doctrines of resurrection and ascension. But now the traditional doctrines about God and Christ must be repudiated because man has discovered after nineteen centuries that God does not exist. Christians must even now will the death of God by which the transcendent becomes immanent.

For William Hamilton the death of God describes the event many have experienced over the last two hundred years. They no longer accept the reality of God or the meaningfulness of language about him. Nontheistic explanations have been substituted for theistic ones. This trend is irreversible, and everyone must come to terms with the historical-cultural death of God. God's death must be affirmed and the secular world embraced as normative intellectually and good ethically. Indeed, Hamilton was optimistic about the world, because he was optimistic about what humanity could do and was doing to solve its problems.

Paul van Buren is usually associated with death-of-God theology, although he himself disavowed this connection. But his disavowal seems hollow in the light of his book Secular Meaning of the Gospel and his article "Christian Education Post Mortem Dei." In the former he accepts empiricism and the position of Bultmann that the worldview of the Bible is mythological and untenable to modern people. In the latter he proposes an approach to Christian education that assumes "the death of God" and that "God is gone."

Van Buren was concerned with the linguistic aspects of God's existence and death. He accepted the premise of empirical analytic philosophy that real knowledge and meaning can be conveyed only by language that is empirically verifiable. This is the fundamental principle of modern secularists and is the only viable option in this age. If only empirically verifiable language is meaningful, ipso facto all language that refers to or assumes the reality of God is meaningless, since one cannot verify God's existence by any of the five senses. Theism, belief in God, is not only intellectually untenable, it is meaningless. In Secular Meaning of the Gospel van Buren seeks to reinterpret the Christian faith without reference to God. One searches the book in vain for even one clue that van Buren is anything but a secularist trying to translate Christian ethical values into that language game. There is a decided shift in van Buren's later book Discerning the Way, however.

A Jewish form of God is dead thought may be found in R. L. Rubenstein, After Auschwitz, who argues that the Holocaust forever destroyed any faith the Jews could have in God. In retrospect, it becomes clear that there was no single death of God theology, only death of God theologies. Their real significance was that modern theologies, by giving up the essential elements of Christian belief in God, had logically led to what were really antitheologies. When the death of God theologies passed off the scene, as they very quickly did, the commitment to secularism remained and manifested itself in other forms of secular theology in the late 1960s and into the present. S. N. GUNDRY

See also ATHEISM; BONHOEFFER, DIETRICH; BULTMANN, RUDOLF; EXISTENTIALISM; POSTMODERNISM; SECULAR HUMANISM; SECULARISM; TILlich, PAUL.

Bibliography. T. J. J. Altizer, Gospel of Christian Atheism; T. J. J. Altizer and W. Hamilton, Radical Theology and the Death of God; D. Cupitt, Taking Leave of God; S. N. Gundry and A. F. Johnson, eds., Tensions in Contemporary Theology; K. Hamilton, God Is Dead; J. Hick, ed., Myth of God Incarnate; J. Ice and J. Carey, eds., Death of God Debate; E. L. Mascall, Secularization of the Gospel; J. W. Montgomery, "Is God Dead?" Controversy; J. W. Montgomery and T. J. J. Altizer, The Altizer-Montgomery Dialogue; G. Vahanian, No Other God; P. M. van Buren, "Christian Education Post Mortem Dei," RelEd 60:4-10.

Death Penalty

Death Penalty. See CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

Decalogue. See TEN COMMANDMENTS.

Decrees of God. God's "decree" is a theological term for the comprehensive plan for the world and its history that God sovereignly established in eternity. Paul refers to "the plan of him who works out everything in conformity with the purpose of his will" (Eph. 1:11). The Westminster Shorter Catechism provides this classic definition: "The decrees of God are his eternal purpose, according to the counsel of his will, whereby, for his own glory, he hath foreordained whatsoever comes to pass" (Q.7).

There are analogies between God's decree and the decrees of human rulers, but important differences exist. Theologians distinguish God's will of decree from the will of precept; a closer parallel exists between God's will of precept and human decrees. The will of precept refers to the commands and laws that God sets for his creatures, commands which call for obedience but which are often transgressed. The will of decree, on the other hand, refers to the eternal, all-comprehensive, unchangeable, and efficacious plan of God which is carried out in history.

Some scriptural examples of human decrees are Darius's order to worship the image (Dan. 6:7–12), Cyrus's command to rebuild the temple (Ezra 5:13), and Caesar's decree for a census (Luke 2:1; cf. Acts 17:7). "Decree" (dogma in the Greek NT) is also used for the decisions of the Jerusalem Council (Acts 16:4) as well as for various Jewish legal regulations, ordinances, or rules (Eph. 2:15; Col. 2:14–15). Similar terms are used for God's decree against Nebuchadnezzar (Dan. 4:24), for his decree concerning rain and the sea (Job 28:26; Prov. 8:29), and for his laws governing human life (e.g., Ps. 119:5, 8, 12). There are also instances where God's decree refers to his regulations issued in history (Exod. 15:25; Rom. 1:32). Sometimes it is difficult to distinguish a decree that is the historical revelation of part of God's eternal plan from a regulation or order of God's in history that does not specifically refer to the eternal decree (see Ps. 2:7).

The theological discussion of God's decree is generally restricted to the eternal plan established before the creation of the world. In contrast to every human ruler, God has always existed. He existed before he created the world, and his decree or eternal plan was established before the creation; the elect were chosen "before the creation of the world" (Eph. 1:4; cf. 1 Cor. 2:7; Eph. 3:11; 2 Tim. 1:9; Heb. 4:3; 1 Pet. 1:20).

The relation of eternity and time, of divine sovereignty and human responsibility, makes human understanding of God's eternal decree very difficult. Several important distinctions are helpful.

The decree is not eternal in exactly the same sense that God is eternal. The decree results from the free, sovereign will of God; it must be distinguished therefore from the necessary acts of God within the divine Trinity. The decree of God must also be distinguished from its execution in history. The decree to create is not the actual creation of the world "in the beginning" (Gen. 1:1). The decree to send Jesus Christ is not carried out until Jesus was born of Mary in the days of Caesar Augustus (Luke 2:1–7). Another important distinction arises when human agents are used in carrying out God's decree. Some decreed events occur by God's direct agency, as creation, regeneration, and the first and second comings of Jesus Christ. Other decreed events are carried out in history through human agency; sometimes this occurs through obedient human agents who live according to God's law, the will of precept, but sometimes the decree is fulfilled through sinful, disobedient human action, as in the crucifixion of Jesus Christ. The complex issues involved in the relation between divine sovereignty and human responsibility (or irresponsibility) in carrying out the eternal decree become clearer when one examines scriptural references to the crucifixion of Jesus Christ.

The eternal, divine decree clearly lies behind the cross of Christ. Before his death Jesus indicated that "the Son of Man will go as it has been decreed" (Luke 22:22), and Peter told his Pentecost audience that Jesus of Nazareth "was handed over to you by God's set purpose [boulē] and foreknowledge [prognōsei]" (Acts 2:23). A little later a group of believers confessed in their prayer that the crucifiers "did what your power and will decided beforehand should happen" (Acts 4:27–28; "the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God," ASV). Yet the crucifixion was the most heinous crime of human history; the crucifiers transgressed God's commandments, his will of precept. Each of the three passages just mentioned also refers to the sin of those taking part in the crucifixion: Judas, Herod, Pilate, the Gentiles, and Israel. The crucifixion was part of God's eternal decree, and sinful human action was involved; but the guilt of such action is not minimized even when it functions as the means to effectuate God's decree. Reflection on this crucial event of redemptive history is helpful since so many of the complex issues involved in understanding the relations of God's decree and human history are involved.

Scriptural references to God's decree are generally set forth in direct relation to historical situations for the purpose of promoting comfort, security, assurance, and trust. In the words of the psalmist, "The LORD foils the plans of the nations" and "thwarts the purposes of the peoples"; but "the plans of the LORD stand firm forever, the purposes of his heart through all generations"

(Ps. 33:10–11). Again, “Many are the plans in a man’s heart, but it is the LORD’s purpose that prevails” (Prov. 19:21).

The eternal decree of God also provides the explanation of predictive prophecy. The decree of God is largely secret and unrevealed; the crucifiers had no awareness of God’s decree. Prophecy, however, reveals key features of God’s eternal plan. The first such prophecy was the promise of a deliverer from the seed of the woman (Gen. 3:15), which runs like a golden thread through the entire Scripture. Isaiah frequently refers to God’s decree and contrasts Yahweh with the idols; he makes “known the end from the beginning, from ancient times, what is still to come,” and his “purpose will stand” (Isa. 46:10). Part of God’s decree, not yet carried out in history but revealed by prophecy, provides the basis for the Christian’s hope for the second coming of Jesus Christ in glory, for the consummation of God’s kingdom, and for life everlasting in the new heaven and the new earth.

The doctrine of God’s eternal decree receives consideration primarily in Augustinian, Reformed theology, along with the doctrines of God’s sovereignty and predestination. Pelagian and liberal theology deny this doctrine as inconsistent with human freedom and meaningful history. Semi-Pelagian and Arminian theologies restrict God’s decree to foreknowledge of future events and compromise it by way of human initiative and cooperation.

The traditional objections to the doctrine of an eternal decree are that it is inconsistent with human responsibility, makes history meaningless, and makes God the author of sin. The distinctions referred to above and the illustration of Christ’s crucifixion provide an answer to such objections. Failure to distinguish the will of decree and the will of precept, failure to distinguish the decree and the complex ways of its execution, may lead to fatalistic or deterministic concepts of God’s decree. Then humans are considered robots and history is viewed as a programmed computer or a prerecorded sight-sound project. The meaningfulness of history is promoted, at least in part, by the secret, unrevealed nature of God’s decree and his demand that our lives be governed by his revealed commands. Even though Adam’s fall and Christ’s crucifixion were included in God’s decree, Scripture clearly indicates that the decree did not force the outcome. Humans acted freely but irresponsibly; they did precisely what God commanded them not to do.

F. H. KLOOSTER

See also ELECT, ELECTION; PREDESTINATION; REPROBATION; SOVEREIGNTY OF GOD; SUPRALAPSARIANISM.

Bibliography. L. Berkhof, Systematic Theology; A. A. Hodge, Outlines of Theology; R. A. Muller, Christ and the Decree: Christology and Predestination in Reformed Theology from Calvin to Perkins.

Defilement. See CLEANNES, UNCLEANNES.

Deism. This word is customarily used to describe an unorthodox religious view expressed among a group of English writers beginning with Lord Herbert of Cherbury in the first half of the seventeenth century. It also denotes a certain movement of rationalistic thought that was manifested chiefly in England from the mid-seventeenth to the mid-eighteenth century. Deism (Lat. deus, god) is etymologically a cognate of theism (Gr. theos, god), both words denoting belief in the existence of a god or gods and therefore the antithesis of atheism. The term deism, as distinguished from theism, polytheism, and pantheism, does not designate a well-defined doctrine. In general, it refers to what can be called natural religion or the acceptance of a certain body of religious knowledge acquired solely by the use of reason as opposed to knowledge gained either through revelation or the teaching of a church.

Deism is sometimes used loosely to define a particular viewpoint with regard to the relationship between God and the world. It would reduce God’s function in creation to that of first cause only. According to the classical comparison of God with a clockmaker, which is found as early as Nicolaus of Oresmes (d. 1382), God wound up the clock of the world once and for all at the beginning, so that it now proceeds as world history without the need for his further involvement.

The basic doctrines of deism are: (1) the belief in a supreme being; (2) the obligation to worship; (3) the obligation of ethical conduct; (4) the need for repentance from sins; and (5) divine rewards and punishments in this life and the next. These five points were stated by Lord Herbert, often called the father of deism. Deism contradicts orthodox Christianity by denying any direct intervention in the natural order by God. Although deists profess belief in personal providence, they deny the Trinity, the incarnation, the divine authority of the Bible, the atonement, miracles, any particular elect people such as Israel, and any supernatural redemptive act in history.

In England at the beginning of the seventeenth century this general religious attitude turned more militant, particularly in the works of John Toland, Lord Shaftesbury, Matthew Tindal, Thomas Woolston, and Anthony Collins. The ideal of these deists was a sober natural religion without many of the basic tenets of Christianity. Deists were agreed in denouncing any kind of religious intolerance because, in their opinion, all religions are basically the same. The deists were particularly opposed to any manifestation of religious fanaticism and enthusiasm. Here Shaftesbury's Letter concerning Enthusiasm (1708) was probably the most important document in furthering their ideas. Shaftesbury denounced all forms of religious extravagance as perversions of true religion. All descriptions of God that depicted his vengeance, vindictiveness, jealousy, and destructive cruelty were considered blasphemous. The deist conceived God to be a gentle, loving, and benevolent being, who intended that mankind behave in a kind and tolerant fashion.

Deism

English deism was transmitted to Germany primarily through translations of Shaftesbury's works. Important German deists were Gottfried Leibniz, Hermann Reimarus, and Gotthold Lessing. Immanuel Kant, the most important figure in eighteenth-century German philosophy, stressed the moral element in natural religion. Moral principles are not the result of a revelation but originate from the very structure of man's reason. Voltaire is generally considered to be the greatest of the French deists. Even though he consistently used the word "theist" in reference to himself, Voltaire was a deist in the tradition of the British deists, never attacking the existence of God but always the corruptions of the church. By the end of the eighteenth century deism had become a dominant religious attitude among intellectual and upper-class Americans. Among great Americans who considered themselves deists were Benjamin Franklin, George Washington, and Thomas Jefferson.

The late-eighteenth- and nineteenth-century interpretation of deism restricts the meaning to belief in a God or first cause, who created the world and instituted immutable, universal laws that preclude any alteration as well as any form of divine immanence.

The legacy of deism continues as a stress on mechanism. The tendency today is to seek explanation of almost everything by analogy with a machine. The so-called higher criticism of today may also be traced to the deism of earlier days. Thus, although deism is not widely held in our day, its significance historically has been great, and it still exerts influence on religious thought in our time.

M. H. MACDONALD

See also ENLIGHTENMENT, THE; KANT, IMMANUEL; LEIBNIZ, GOTTFRIED WILHELM; LESSING, GOTTHOLD EPHRAIM; TÜBINGEN SCHOOL.

Bibliography. E. Cassirer, Philosophy of the Enlightenment; O. Chadwick, Secularization of the European Mind in the 19th Century; J. Collins, God in Modern Philosophy; G. R. Cragg, Reason and Authority in the Eighteenth Century; S. Hampshire, ed., Age of Reason: The 17th Century Philosophers; D. MacKay, Clockwork Image; H. F. May, Enlightenment in America; J. Orr, English Deism: Its Roots and Its Fruits; R. E. Sullivan, John Toland and the Deist Controversy; N. Torrey, Voltaire and the English Deists; C. Webb, Studies in the History of Natural Theology; A. R. Winnett, "Were the Deists 'Deists'?", CQR 161:70-84; J. Yolton, John Locke and the Way of Ideas.

Deity of Christ. See CHRISTOLOGY.

Deliverance, Deliverer. The OT concept of deliverance embraces the themes of safety (yěšû'â, těšû'â) and escape (pělêtâ). Isaiah lamented that Israel had accomplished no deliverance in the earth (Isa. 26:18), but by contrast the psalmists attributed the nation's security to God's action (Pss. 18:50; 44:4), as did the writers of the historical books (Judg. 15:18; 2 Kings 5:1; 13:17; 1 Chron. 11:14). The prophets also expected that the future deliverance of the nation from various perils would result from God's protective power (Joel 2:32; Obad. 17). In the NT deliverance involved the idea of being released or liberated from some evil situation such as torture (Heb. 11:35) or bondage (Luke 4:18).

The personage of a deliverer in the OT drew naturally upon the root words describing deliverance, with the addition of the verb našal, appearing in a causative participial form to describe a deliverer as one "snatching away" a people from destruction (Judg. 18:28). In the NT the deliverer was one who "loosed" (lyō) the Israelites from bondage in Egypt (Acts 7:35), or who would "deliver" (rhyomai) the nation from ungodliness (Rom. 11:26, quoting Isa. 59:20).

Undoubtedly the most characteristic act of deliverance in Israel's history occurred under Moses, when God rescued his people from bondage to the Egyptians and set them free in the Sinai wilderness (Exod. 12:31-14:31). This awesome humbling of mighty Egypt and the subsequent establishing of the Sinai covenant demonstrated the character of the liberty with which God makes his people free. The deliverance from Egypt was commemorated in the annual Passover celebrations and by generations of historians and poets. The functions of such writers were combined in teaching compositions such as the "psalms of history" (e.g., Pss. 105-107), a tradition that was followed in Stephen's speech to the Jewish council (Acts 7).

The liberation of Israel from Egypt under Moses established the true nature of all such subsequent activity. It thus becomes clear in Israel's history that God does not free an individual or a group from some type of bondage merely to provide relief from an embarrassing or potentially disastrous situation. Instead, he liberates people, not to enable them to pursue their former way of life, but that they might be free to serve him and him alone. This concept was fundamental to the Sinai covenant and has been an abiding principle of spirituality ever since.

God delivers his people from a wide variety of troubles and afflictions (cf. Pss. 33:19; 34:6; 107:6, 13, 19), and promises to liberate even creation from its bondage to decay (Rom. 8:21), thereby reversing the law of entropy. In Matthew 6:13 the heavenly Father delivers the believer “from evil” (KJV), which probably means “from the evil one” (NIV). This concept of deliverance from sin and the works of the devil is emphasized by Paul more fully in passages such as Acts 16:31; Ephesians 2:8; and 1 Thessalonians 1:10.

The deliverer (Heb. mōšāʾ; mēpallēt, maššil; Gk. rhyomenos; lytrōtēs) most prominent in the OT is God, who enters into a covenant relationship with his people, and by this and the promise of a Messiah brings about the ultimate redemption of the world in Christ’s atoning death on Calvary. The deliverer thus makes for the sinner a way of escape (Ps. 40:17; cf. 1 Cor. 10:13) and also intervenes to save his people from peril (Judg. 2:16; 3:9; Isa. 43:1–2; etc.). Those who serve as human agents of deliverance for Israel receive their authority and power from God (Isa. 49:3–6).

The term “deliverer” is used only twice in the NT, in reference to Moses (Acts 7:35) and to the deliverer from Zion (Rom. 11:26). Nevertheless, the work of the divine Deliverer is paramount in the NT, and is expressed in synonyms which describe various aspects of the redemptive and saving work of God in Christ. Nowhere in the NT is Jesus described as a “deliverer.” R. K. HARRISON Bibliography. F. J. Taylor, RTWB 62–63; R. L. Harris, ZPEB 2:90.

Deluge. See FLOOD.

Demiurge. A term (from Gr. dēmiourgos) which means “craftsman” or “creator” and is used once in the NT (Heb. 11:10) to refer to God’s creative activity. Plato and Epictetus employ the term to refer to the craftsmanship of the phenomenal or visible world by the Divine. The Gnostics, however, used the term in a derogatory sense to refer to the lower deity who was responsible for the creation of the world after the “fall” or straying of Sophia in the upper realm of deity. For the Gnostics the world is a negative place formed by a negative creator from which escape is necessary.

G. L. BORCHERT

See also GNOSTICISM.

Demon, Demonization. Biblical evidence abounds for the existence of evil supernatural beings who are subservient to Satan. Their origin, however, is a matter on which Scripture does not elaborate.

Basically there are two major theories for the origin of such beings. One theory holds that a multitude of angels fell into sin prompted by Lucifer’s original rebellion against God (Matt. 25:41; 2 Pet. 2:4; Rev. 12:7–9). Another theory speculates that demons are the unnatural offspring of angels and antediluvian women (Gen. 6:2; Jude 6). These beings (nēpilim, giants), the theory states, issued forth evil spirits from their bodies once they were destroyed either in battle or in the flood. The Jewish Apocalyptic work 1 Enoch is a major source for this view (10:11–14; cf. “the watchers,” 16:1; 86:1–4). This concept was accepted by the Christian apologist Justin Martyr and is even found to have influenced the views of Thomas Aquinas.

Origen developed the concept of a precosmic rebellion, understanding all intelligent creatures (man and angels) as being created with a free will. The diversity of these creatures’ relationship to God is directly related to Lucifer’s fall (De principis 2.9.6). Thus, demons are those angelic beings who were fully carried away with Satan’s apostasy. This became the prevailing Christian view, adopted by, among others, Augustine (De genesi ad literam 3.10) and Peter Lombard (Sentences 2.6).

Rabbinic speculation concerning demonic origins varied greatly. Demons were viewed as unfortunate spirits that were left bodiless when God rested on the sabbath or as the builders of the Tower of Babel who were punished and transformed into demons.

Terminology. The Greek terms daimōn and daimonion originally held no inherently evil connotation. Although their etymology is uncertain (possibly signifying a disruption or “rending apart”), the terms appear to have been used to specify a god or a minor deity against the background of popular animistic beliefs. Homer appeared to differentiate daimōn from theos in that the former term constituted the divine power at work among people, while the latter isolated the concept of divine personality. Prior to the NT, however, daimōn was used for those personal intermediary beings who were believed to exercise supervision over the cosmos (Plato, Symposium 202e). These beings, at least in popular belief, were considered to be spirits of the departed, who were endowed with supernatural power (Lucian, De morte peregrini 27).

While the connection of demons with specifically evil practices slowly developed in Greek thought, this appears to have been consistently implied in the Hebrew use of such terms as šēdīm and šēʾrīm. Though the OT offers little speculation on the subject, the practices of idolatry, magic, and witchcraft were related to demonic forces (Deut. 32:17; Ps. 96:5). Since such practices clashed with Israel’s monotheism, they were specifically prohibited for the people of God (Deut. 18:10–14; 1 Sam. 15:23). Demonic activity in the OT, then, is to be found as an opposing force to God and his own personal intermediary beings, the mal'ākīm (angels).

Demon, Demonization

Thus, when these Hebrew terms were translated into the LXX, the concept of demon was narrowed to that of an evil spirit. However, because of the positive nature of the Greek religious usage of daimōn, the LXX and the NT prefer the term daimonion to express the restricted concept.

In the NT, along with daimonion, the presence of demons is described with the terms “unclean” (akatharton, Mark 1:24–27; 5:2–3; 7:25; 9:25; Acts 5:16; 8:7; Rev. 16:13) and “evil” (ponēra, Acts 19:12–16) spirits. The majority of references to the work of these spirits occur with regard to their exercising control over individuals. There is no speculation offered concerning their origin, however; their existence and active operation is assumed.

Similar to the OT connection between idolatry and demons, the apostle Paul states that, while the so-called gods worshiped by idolators have no existence, demonic forces exist as those who instigate and propagate such worship and those to whom worship is directed and to whom the worshipers are subject (1 Cor. 10:20–21; 12:2; cf. Rev. 9:20). It is the understanding of both Paul and the author of Revelation that the activity of demons will be on the increase in the latter days and that many will be seduced to follow after them (1 Tim. 4:1; Rev. 16:13–14). Perhaps the most comprehensive treatment of Paul's understanding of this theme occurs in Ephesians, especially 6:10–18. The Christian must be prepared to combat “rulers, . . . authorities, . . . powers of this dark world and . . . the spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly realms.”

Thus the NT seems to be consistent in its presentation of a conflict between two realms, the kingdom of Satan, the prince of this world, and the kingdom of God, which through the incarnation of Jesus Christ has broken into Satan's realm. There appears to be no recognition of a positive role for the daimonion as is found in the early Hellenists. The NT rests solely within the Hebrew understanding that these beings are of a completely evil nature and are destined to share in the destruction that God has prepared for Satan (Matt. 25:41).

Demonization. The majority of references to demonic activity in the NT occur in the Synoptic Gospels and deal with confrontations between Jesus and the demonized, that is, those under control of a demon. The common English expression “demon possession,” is a questionable translation of daimonizomai, which is better rendered “demonization.” Some scholars trace the origin of “demon possession” to Josephus (Antiquities 8.47). The common Synoptic construction is daimonion echein (“to have a demon”). The phenomenon is better characterized as “demonization,” because demons cannot, technically, possess anything.

The major characteristics of the Synoptics' recording of Jesus' encounters with demons include the following: (1) There is a statement concerning the physical or mental affliction attributable to the demonic control—nakedness, mental anguish, and masochism (Matt. 8:28–33; cf. Mark 5:1–10; Luke 8:26–39); inability to speak (Matt. 9:32; 12:22); blindness (12:22); lunacy (4:24; 17:15; cf. Mark 9:17).

(2) Often the demon is said to have recognized and feared Jesus as the Holy One of God (Matt. 8:29; cf. Mark 5:7; Luke 8:28; Mark 1:24; cf. Luke 4:34).

(3) Jesus' power over the demons is demonstrated, usually by their expulsion through the power of his word (Matt. 4:24; 8:16; 15:28; cf. Mark 7:30) or by Jesus' permission for them to depart (Matt. 8:32; cf. Mark 5:13; Luke 8:32). This power was also to be found in Jesus' disciples (Luke 10:17; Acts 5:16; 8:7; 16:18; 19:12).

Throughout the NT other noticeable characteristics of those who were demonized include superior or supernatural knowledge (James 2:19), the ability to foretell the future (Acts 16:16), and superior or uncontrollable strength (Matt. 8:28; Acts 19:16).

The ability of Jesus and his followers to exercise authority over demons is established as an eschatological sign of the kingdom's inbreaking presence (Matt. 12:22; Luke 10:17) and is a cause for some of the popularity of Jesus' mission (Luke 4:36). The activity of deliverance, however, is usually associated with Jesus' healing ministry and that of the apostles. However, a distinction between demonization and insanity (or other diseases) is implied.

Demonization and Church History. In the postapostolic church a number of commentators developed a view of demonization beyond what the teaching of Scripture would imply. Justin Martyr believed the pagan gods to be representations of demons who had fallen from a state of angelic guardianship over men (Second Apology 5). Thomas Aquinas developed Augustine's belief in demons' ability to attack people to a point where demons continued the practice, cited in 1 Enoch, of sinning with men and women sexually (Summa Theologica 1.51.3, 6; De Potentia 6.8, 57). Apparently influenced by certain apocryphal writings, Origen believed that a good and an evil angel watched over each individual, both of whom attempt to influence one's thought patterns. He also believed that “vice demons” existed—so called since one such demon would be in control of a particular vice (De principis 3.2.2–4).

A distinction was made between demonization and demonic influence, with the one being demonized called an “energumen.” Some understood the demonic influence to include the inducement of evil thoughts directly into the mind (Augustine, Athanasius, Origen, Peter Lombard, Bede, Aquinas). This form of temptation was considered to be the demon's normal mode of operation, while demonization was recognized as only an extraordinarily strong extension of a demon's control over its victim.

Methods of Deliverance. Justin Martyr records that the exorcism of demonized individuals continued to be an active ministry of the postapostolic church. The rite of exorcism took on a variety of forms such as prayer, fasting, laying on of hands, burning of roots, or the sprinkling of holy water. However, one crucial element to a successful exorcism was the invocation of the name of Jesus Christ (Second Apology 6). Tertullian also witnesses to the power of Christ's name when invoked against a demon. When properly adjured, the demon would tell the truth about himself and was made to obey the word of the exorcist (Apology 23).

Several other ecclesiastical rites incorporated an exorcistic (demon-expelling) or apotropaic (demon-repelling) dimension. Prior to baptism a candidate might endure certain rituals designed to cleanse him from demonic infestation associated either with original sin or idolatry and the eating of food offered to idols (Clementine Recognitions 21.71). The candidate might also be required to make public renunciation of Satan, his angels, and his ways, while the baptismal water itself would be exorcised and consecrated. The sign of the cross was also used as an apotropaic device.

In the Middle Ages the amount of superstition that developed around the various beliefs about demonic activity and the rites of exorcism soon led to large-scale persecutions of so-called witches and others who were deemed to be "in league" with the devil. The Protestant Reformation reacted against these abuses. The Lutheran Church first restricted and then abolished exorcism by the end of the sixteenth century. The Calvinists renounced the practice as applicable only for the first century. By 1614 Pope Paul V severely restricted the practice in the Roman Ritual (12, 13), and the rite was further defined by Pope Pius XI in this century.

Modern Views. The belief or disbelief in the existence of demons and, in some cases, in Satan himself has developed into one of the distinguishing marks between the modern liberal and fundamental/evangelical traditions in Christendom. On the liberal side of the issue, much of what was termed as demonic activity in Scripture is now considered to include many psychological maladies that were unknown to the first-century mind. Jesus' actions with regard to the supposed demonic activity, it is argued, actually amounted only to his accommodation to the contemporary beliefs of the Palestinian peasant and in no way reflected his own opinion as to the cause of individual afflictions.

However, with the increase of interest in, and practice of, occultism in more recent times the conservative acceptance of the existence of both Satan and demons appears to be confirmed.

Spiritism has developed into a widely recognized "religious" practice whereby individuals seek contact with spiritual forces in an effort to gain aid or information for their own personal use. Such psychic phenomena as levitation, apports, telekinesis, automatic writing, and materializations are associated with spiritism. These activities appear to increase in intensity in proportion to an individual's openness to the spiritual influence. There seems to be a parallel between the characteristics of those who practice spiritism and those cited in Scripture as being demonized.

Deliverance from demonic subjection involves the confession of an individual's faith in Christ as Savior, the confession and repentance of the occult involvement, and reception of the liberation that can be found in Christ. It is notable that this emphasis on the deliverance from demonization through the operative power of Jesus Christ is completely consistent with the NT and does not at all reflect the abuses or superstitions associated with the Middle Ages. S. E. McCLELLAND

See also EXORCISM; OCCULT; PRINCIPALITIES AND POWERS; SATAN; SATANISM; SPIRITUAL WARFARE; WITCHCRAFT.

Bibliography. C. Arnold, Three Crucial Questions about Spiritual Warfare; D. G. Barnhouse, Invisible War; F. Dickason, Demon Possession and the Christian; E. Gross, Miracles, Demons, and Spiritual Warfare; H. A. Kelly, Devil, Demonology, and Witchcraft; K. E. Koch, Christian Counselling and Occultism; L. Langton, Essentials of Demonology; S. V. McCausland, By the Finger of God; J. McDowell, Demons, Witches and the Occult; S. Moreau, Essentials of Spiritual Warfare; T. K. Oesterreich, Possession, Demonological and Other; S. Page, Powers of Evil; H. Schlier, Principalities and Powers in the New Testament; M. F. Unger, Demons in the World Today; W. Wink, Naming the Powers.

Demythologization. A technical term which is usually associated with the interpretive principles of Rudolf Bultmann and which dates from a pastors' conference on April 21, 1941, in Frankfurt, Germany, when Bultmann delivered his famous lecture published in English as "New Testament and Mythology" (see Kerygma and Myth, 1-44). Bultmann's thesis is that contemporary humanity, which depends upon a scientific worldview, cannot accept the mythological worldview of the Bible. Myth for him is the use of language symbols or images of this world and this life to conceptualize the divine or the otherworldly. Thus, ideas such as God's transcendence or heaven and hell are described in spatial terms that pertain to an ancient three-story Weltanschauung (concept of the universe or reality). For Bultmann ethical implications of up and down are unacceptable to the modern scientific mind.

Demythologization

While Bultmann was the great exponent of demythologization, he was indebted to a development of thought that reaches back through the history of religion school to David F. Strauss. But the process of demythologizing was begun much earlier among ancient thinkers such as the Gnostics like Ptolemaeus and Valentinus, who constructed elaborate mythologies for the purpose of expressing their philosophies of life and death.

Bultmann's concern was not the elimination of myth, as the English word "demythologize" might suggest. Rather, influenced by his colleague Martin Heidegger at the University of Marburg, Bultmann sought a reinterpretation of the mythological language of the Bible. The cosmological categories of the Bible, for Bultmann, must be reinterpreted in anthropological (man-oriented) or, better, existential (personal) categories. Thus, the fall of Adam is basically a statement of human sinfulness and finitude. The purpose of demythologization, accordingly, is the reinterpretation of the biblical images so as to provide self-understanding for the scientific mind of the twentieth century.

Bultmann's goal of reinterpreting the biblical myths was to highlight the nature of faith. In this emphasis upon faith he stood firmly in the traditions of Paul and Luther. Most of his critics, however, consistently charge that in his zeal for self-understanding and faith Bultmann abandons the kerygma or core content of the Christian message. The cross becomes to him a continuing challenge for humanity to undergo crucifixion with Christ. As such the once-for-allness and sacrificial nature of Jesus' death are regarded as untenable. The resurrection as a fact of history is to Bultmann "utterly inconceivable." Easter faith thus becomes faith in the preached word. Moreover, Bultmann finds the concepts of the preexistence of Jesus and the virgin birth to be irreconcilable attempts to express the myth of "Jesus Christ." Jesus, for Bultmann, is a man, whereas Christ is virtually the God of encounter.

Important to Bultmann's demythologizing thesis is his understanding of history. Unlike English, the German language provided Bultmann with two words for "history." The first, Historie, is used to refer to the facts of history. The second, Geschichte, is the term implying the meaning or significance of an event in history. By using these two words it is possible to differentiate between the meaning of an event and an actual fact. Thus, Easter may be a faith event (Geschichte) without the resurrection being a fact of history (Historie). A geschichtliche event is not unimportant. In fact, for Bultmann it is very important, because it is the basis of existential meaning. Statements which sound like Historie in the Bible, however, may have no reference to facticity. Some, indeed, Bultmann holds to be mere "legends," such as the empty tomb and the virgin birth, which have arisen in the Christian community to support the "myths" of the resurrection and the incarnation. Both myths are part of the church's larger mythological formula known as "Jesus Christ."

What, then, can be said of Bultmann and his demythologizing method by way of conclusion? First, his left-wing critics like Schubert Ogden and Karl Jaspers challenged him to carry his logic to its implied end and demythologize Christ. Bultmann would not go that far. His goal was to free Christ from myth. Second, Bultmann's students like Günther Bornkamm found their teacher's radical separation between Jesus and Christ to be an unnecessary bifurcation in expressing the Christian faith. Thus, they returned to the combined term. Third, the church in general should have learned from Bultmann's wrestling with faith that the abandonment of the kerygma must not be the price which is paid for a relevant message to the contemporary world.

G. L. BORCHERT

See also BULTMANN, RUDOLF; MYTH; NEW HERMENEUTIC.

Bibliography. M. Ashcraft, Rudolf Bultmann; H. W. Bartsch, ed., Kerygma and Myth; G. L. Borchert, "Is Bultmann's Theology a New Gnosticism?" EvQ 36:222-28; R. Bultmann, Jesus Christ and Mythology; E. M. Good, "Meaning of Demythologization," in Theology of Rudolf Bultmann, C. W. Kegley, ed.; K. Jaspers and R. Bultmann, Myth and Christianity; J. Macquarrie, Scope of Demythologizing; S. Ogden, Christ without Myth.

Denney, James (1856-1917). Scottish theologian. Born in Paisley, near Glasgow, he studied classics and philosophy at Glasgow University, from which he graduated with the rare distinction of a double first (highest honors in both), and divinity at the Free Church College in Glasgow (under A. B. Bruce, J. S. Candlish, and T. M. Lindsay). In 1896 he was appointed minister of the East Free Church in Broughty Ferry, a suburb of Dundee, where he achieved a reputation for his thoughtful biblical exposition, including his contributions to Expositor's Bible on 1 Thessalonians (1892) and 2 Corinthians (1894). In 1897 he became professor of systematic and pastoral theology at Glasgow Divinity College, moving to New Testament three years later, which position he occupied until his death. He served as principal from 1915 to 1917.

Denney concentrated his attention on the writings of Paul and the doctrine of the atonement, which he considered to be the touchstone of all genuine Christian theology. Chief among his writings are a commentary on Romans (Expositor's Greek Testament, 1900), Death of Christ (1902), Atonement and the Modern Mind (1903), Jesus and the Gospel (1908), and Christian Doctrine of Reconciliation (1917). His chief contribution lies in his exposition of the significance of the work of Christ and his defense of the doctrine of the substitutionary atonement. Christ's death on the cross is a revelation not merely of the love of God for us but also of his righteousness. Because of man's sin Christ's death is the necessary ground for our forgiveness: "if Christ had done less than die for us, . . . there would have been no atonement" (Death of Christ, 200). Something objective actually happened at the cross to change our status before God and to make it possible for us to enter into a new relationship with the Father.

Denney, with his colleague James Orr, was steadfast in his rejection of the subjective theology of the Ritschlians of his day, as he was of the "new" or liberal theology in general. In fact, he was hostile to speculative theology as such (see his Studies in Theology, 1894). On the other hand, he was not an obscurantist and accepted the basic approach of modern biblical criticism (minus its attendant skepticism). In Denney's ideal church the evangelists are the theologians and the theologians, evangelists. He had no use for a theology which could not be preached and did not lead men and women to commit themselves unreservedly to the God who has revealed himself in the cross of Calvary. W. W. GASQUE

Bibliography. I. H. Marshall, "James Denney" in Creative Minds in Contemporary Theology, P. E. Hughes, ed.; J. R. Taylor, God Loves Like That.

Denominationalism. Denominations are associations of congregations—though sometimes it might be said that congregations are localized subdivisions of denominations—that have a common heritage. Moreover, a true denomination does not claim to be the only legitimate expression of the church. A denominational heritage normally includes doctrinal or experiential or organizational emphases and also frequently includes common ethnicity, language, social class, and geographical origin. However, many or all of these once common features have usually evolved into considerable contemporary diversity, especially in older and larger denominations. This often results in as wide a range of differences within a denomination, despite organizational unity, as exists between denominations.

The term "denomination" in general refers to anything distinguished by a name. In religious contexts the designation has traditionally applied both to broad movements within Protestantism, such as Baptists and Methodists, and also to the numerous independent branches of such movements that have developed over the years primarily because of geographical expansion and theological controversy.

Even though denominations within Protestantism have come to be the largest expression of organized Christianity beyond the level of the congregation, there has never been much theological reflection on denominationalism. A look at theology textbooks or church creeds confirms this. Probably the simplest explanation for this omission is that the Bible in no way envisages the organization of the church into denominations. It instead assumes the opposite, that all Christians—except those being disciplined—will be in full fellowship with all others. Any tendencies to the contrary were roundly denounced (1 Cor. 1:10–13). Paul could write a letter to the Christians meeting in various places in Rome or Galatia with every assurance that all would receive its message. Today, for any city or country, he would have to place the letter as an advertisement in the secular media and hope.

Denominationalism is a comparatively recent phenomenon. The theological distinction between the church visible and invisible, made by Wycliffe and Hus and elaborated by the Protestant Reformers, underlies the practice and defense of denominationalism that emerged among seventeenth century English Puritans, who agreed on most things but not on the crucial issue of how the church should be organized. The eighteenth-century revivals associated with Wesley and Whitefield greatly encouraged the practice, especially in America, where it became dominant.

Although a true denomination never claims to be the only legitimate institutional expression of the church universal, it frequently thinks itself to be the best expression, the most faithful to the Scriptures and to the present activity of the Holy Spirit. Had it not thought so, at least when beginning, why else would it have gone through the trauma of separating from (or not joining with) an older denomination? A true denomination does not, however, make exclusive claims upon its members. It frees them to cooperate with Christians from other denominations in various specialized ministries.

In theory denominationalism is sharply contrasted with two much older approaches, catholicism and sectarianism. That catholic or sectarian groups are often called denominations reflects either an excessively loose use of the designation or historical development within the group.

Catholic or national churches at the period of their greatest growth are almost always supported, that is "established," by the civil government, whether imperial or tribal or—most commonly in recent centuries—national. Such churches usually have been able to survive even after that official support is withdrawn when the government became Muslim, Marxist, or secular.

Denominationalism

Catholic (from a Greek word for “the whole”) churches see themselves as properly embracing from infancy all Christians within their territories, in contrast with the voluntary nature of individual affiliation with a denomination. When catholic churches, of which the Armenians have the oldest, are dispersed, then the basis for association becomes ethnic rather than territorial. Over the centuries catholic churches have usually recognized each other as having jurisdiction over the Christians of their respective territories or peoples. (The largest of them, the coalition mostly of southwest Europeans and their derivative national churches known as Roman Catholicism, has been recognizing others only in this century, since its claims were universal.) This mutual recognition is facilitated by the catholic view—except in northwest Europe where the national churches became Protestant in theology—that the churches in each place are properly governed only by bishops in a supposedly traceable succession from the apostles. In recent decades, and especially in countries outside their homelands, most such churches have become in practice increasingly like denominations. That is, they have been willing to concede some legitimacy to and encourage their members to cooperate with other than catholic or national ecclesiastical bodies.

In theory denominationalism is also sharply distinguishable from sectarianism. Each Christian sect sees itself as the only legitimate institutional expression of the followers of Christ. Unlike catholic churches, the sects have never embraced more than a small percentage of any population (with the possible exception of some short-lived medieval sects). Sects are frequently distinguished not only by their exclusive organizational claims but also by their disagreement with the fourth-century understanding of the doctrine of the Trinity that is traditionally adhered to by all catholic churches and Protestant denominations. (Such professedly Christian movements as Spiritualism and New Thought may be said to be divided into denominations even as Protestantism is, but it is too confusing to blend these differing kinds of denominations, given their widely divergent theologies.) Some sects, especially when they are trinitarian, have been evolving into denominations. Conversely, some denominational branches so focus their energies on their distinctive beliefs and practices that they might as well be sects.

Besides attracting to its ranks the once clearly distinct catholic churches and some sects, denominationalism has brought forth several other institutional responses. These are related in various ways to the obvious discrepancy between denominational distinctiveness (or rivalry) and the biblical portrayal of a unity of all Christians as close as that of the Father and the Son, a unity perceived not just by faith but observable by the world (John 17:20–23).

One response has been to oppose denominations and urge all true Christians to leave them and meet simply as churches of Christ, Christian churches, churches of God, disciples, brethren, Bible churches, evangelical churches, and similar inclusive names. Despite obvious appeal in times of denominational confusion, strife, and declension, the reality is that no such movement has anywhere attracted most Christians to itself. Instead this has been just another way of increasing the number of denominations—and sects—usually with the group’s reluctance to admit it.

Another response has been for local congregations to remain organizationally independent but to engage in cooperative endeavors with other Christian organizations near and far that have a variety of denominational links. In fact many congregations that have historical and legal ties to a denomination are functioning as if they did not. (Conversely, an independent congregation that isolates itself is in effect just a small sect.)

The practicality of congregational independence has been enhanced in this century by the growing numbers and kinds of nondenominational specialized ministries such as home and foreign missions; colleges and seminaries; camp and conference grounds; publishers of magazines, books, and Sunday school curricula; evangelistic teams; youth organizations; radio and television broadcasters; occupational fellowships; and many others. Such ministries stress the doctrines and practices held in common by all or at least many denominational families, perform many functions that once were handled mostly by denominational agencies, and enable both denominational and independent congregations to experience broader fellowship. Perhaps a biblical precedent could be the evangelistic team of “Paul and his companions” (Acts 13:13). Such organizations have at least as much validity as do the denominations whose leaders frequently disparage them, but only as helpful supplements to and extensions of a vibrant congregational life rather than as a replacement for it.

Yet another response to denominationalism has been the attempt to promote more visible unity in this century through ecumenicity. The ecumenical movement has seen many denominational mergers, sometimes across family lines, as well as denominational cooperation at the higher official levels through councils of churches. Generally speaking, the nondenominational specialized ministries are unambiguously evangelical in theology, while the promoters of conciliar ecumenism are not.

Denominational identity is not nearly so accurate a predictor of theological stance, worship style, organizational preference, or social class as it once was. There is no indication that denominations will soon disappear, but neither does it appear that anyone is eager to justify them theologically. The trend seems to be toward a new kind of denominationalism, sometimes called “post-denominational.” It is no longer based primarily on associations of congregations with a common heritage and a tight official or unofficial linkage. Such associations will no doubt continue, but increasing emphasis seems likely to be placed directly on the local congregation of whatever, if any, denomination, and on the network of specialized ministries supported by and extending the outreach of congregations and their members. D. G. TINDER

See also ECUMENISM.

Bibliography. J. M. Frame, Evangelical Reunion: Denominations and the Body of Christ; R. A. Koivisto, One Lord, One Faith: A Theology for Cross-Denominational Renewal; D. O. Moberg, Church as a Social Institution; H. R. Niebuhr, Social Sources of Denominationalism; R. E. Richey, ed., Denominationalism; R. P. Scherer, ed., American Denominational Organization; R. Wuthrow, Restructuring of American Religion.

Deontological Ethics. See DUTY.

Depravity, Total. A proper definition of total depravity should not focus primarily on the questions of sinfulness vs. goodness or ability vs. inability, but on fallen man’s relation to a holy God. Because of the effects of the fall, that original relationship of fellowship with God was broken and man’s entire nature was polluted. As a result no one can do anything, even good things, that can gain soteriological merit in God’s sight. Therefore, we may concisely define total depravity as the unmeritoriousness of man before God because of the corruption of original sin.

The concept of total depravity does not mean (1) that depraved people cannot or do not perform actions that are good in either man’s or God’s sight. But no such action can gain favor with God for salvation. Neither does it mean (2) that fallen man has no conscience which judges between good and evil for him. But that conscience has been affected by the fall so that it cannot be a safe and reliable guide. Neither does it mean (3) that people indulge in every form of sin or in any sin to the greatest extent possible.

Positively, total depravity means that the corruption has extended to all aspects of man’s nature, to his entire being; and total depravity means that because of that corruption there is nothing man can do to merit saving favor with God.

The Bible teaches this concept of total depravity in many places. The Lord recognized good people (Matt. 22:10), yet he labeled his own disciples as evil men (7:11). The mind is affected (Rom. 1:28; Eph. 4:18), the conscience is unclean (Heb. 9:14), the heart is deceitful (Jer. 17:9), and by nature mankind is subject to wrath (Eph. 2:3).

God sent the flood as a judgment on mankind’s depravity (Gen. 6:5). Depravity, according to the Lord, is in the inner being and is the root of evil actions (Mark 7:20–23). With a string of OT quotations Paul also shows it is deep-seated, universal, and total (Rom. 3:9–18).

Calvinists trace depravity to an inherent corruption of man’s nature which was inherited from Adam. Augustine stressed the idea that all were seminally present in Adam when he sinned and therefore all sinned in him. The semi-Pelagian reaction to Calvinism is found today in Arminian theology, which denies total depravity, the guilt of original sin, and the loss of freedom of the will, and which affirms involvement in the sin of Adam only to the extent of giving mankind a tendency toward sin but not a sinful nature.

The implications of depravity are especially crucial in relation to salvation. Man has no ability to save himself. He can do good and make choices, but he cannot regenerate himself (John 1:13). Unless the Holy Spirit enlightens an individual he will remain in darkness (1 Cor. 2:14). Some theologians have labeled this “moral inability,” an unclear term, since it implies that depraved people are devoid of morality. C. C. RYRIE

See also SIN.

Bibliography. L. Berkhof, Reformed Dogmatics; Systematic Theology; J. Miley, Systematic Theology; W. G. T. Shedd, Dogmatic Theology; H. C. Thiessen, Lectures in Systematic Theology.

Derrida, Jacques. See POSTMODERNISM.

Descartes, René (1596–1650). French philosopher, scientist and mathematician, best known for his epistemology and mind-body dualism.

Cartesian Foundationalism. In his Meditations on First Philosophy, Descartes aims to secure an indubitable foundation upon which to erect the edifice of knowledge, thereby refuting skepticism. Toward that end, he adopts the “method of doubt”: “Anything which admits of the slightest doubt I will set aside just as if I had found it to be wholly false; and I will proceed in this way until I recognize something certain” (CSM 2:16). But he can be certain of nothing, since, for all he knows, a “malicious demon of the utmost power and cunning has employed all his energies in order to deceive [me].” There is, however, one exception: “let the demon deceive me as much as he can, he will never bring it about that I am nothing so long as I think I am something. So, I am, I exist is necessarily true whenever it is conceived in my mind” (CSM 2:17). Elsewhere, he writes, “Ego cogito, ergo sum”: I am thinking, therefore I exist (CSM 1:195).

Descartes next asks: What can be deduced from one’s conscious mental states besides one’s existence? First, the “truth-rule”: whatever I clearly and distinctly grasp or “perceive” is true (CSM 2:24; cf. CSM 1:207). But couldn’t a malicious demon deceive him even about this? Yes. So, “to remove even this slight reason for doubt,” Descartes argues that God—a perfect being—exists and that he cannot deceive. His causal argument asserts that he has the idea of a perfect being and he could not have it unless a perfect being put it in him (CSM 2:25–36), while his ontological argument asserts that a perfect being has all perfections and existence is a perfection (CSM 2:45–47). Since a perfect being would not deceive him, Descartes infers that “[he] is incapable of error in those cases where [his] understanding is transparently clear” (CSM 1:48), from which he infers that there is an external physical world.

Critical observations. (1) Descartes seems to leave us with a picture of the world unlike the one provided by common sense. According to him, he has shown that there is a physical world; but, since perception is frequently “obscure and confused,” neither the world’s nature nor particular things in it can be known by perception. We can know the world’s nature, but only through the concepts of pure mathematics. So, all qualities of bodies are quantities, expressed in terms of the division, shape, and motion of tiny material things (corpuscles) that compose bodies, and all bodies lack “secondary qualities,” e.g., color and flavor. Paradoxically, Descartes argues that matter is merely extension, and hence that there is no “real distinction” between matter and space (CSM 2:20–21; CSM 1:227). Question: if matter just is space, how can there be bodies? (2) The main argument of the Meditations seems to fail. First, the cogito begs the question. Second, Descartes’s causal and ontological arguments seem unsound. We could construct our idea of a perfect being so that idea need not have God as its cause. Moreover, “A perfect being has all perfections” is ambiguous. If it means “There is a perfect being, and it has all perfections,” his ontological argument begs the question; if it means “If there is a perfect being, it has all perfections,” it doesn’t follow that there is a perfect being. Third, we cannot be absolutely certain that a perfect being has no reason to permit widespread, systematic deception, a reason outside our ken. Fourth, Descartes uses his arguments about God to render the truth-rule certain, yet, on his principles, he is entitled to affirm the premises of those arguments only if the truth-rule is certain, which he has yet to prove when he affirms those premises. (This defect is known as the “Cartesian Circle.”) (3) Ironically, philosophers today reject Cartesian foundationalism since it leads to radical skepticism: If foundational beliefs must be indubitable and if others must be deduced from them, then we know virtually nothing. But we must not infer that, for this reason, foundationalism itself is defective. Modest foundationalisms are alive today, especially in the work of many Christian philosophers, e.g., William Alston, Alvin Plantinga, and Richard Swinburne.

Cartesian Dualism. I am not my body. I am an immaterial substance; my body is a material substance. Facts about me, like my wanting some cherries, are facts about an immaterial thing; facts about my body, like its having legs, are facts about a physical thing. My body and I interact. My desire for cherries causes my legs to move, and chewing cherries causes a familiar taste. Now, causal interaction between mind and body seems obvious; but why suppose that I—this thinking, feeling thing—am an immaterial thinking, feeling thing rather than a material thinking, feeling thing? Descartes answered with two arguments. First, since I can exist without my body (for I can be deceived by a malicious and cunning demon into thinking that I have a body when I don’t), I cannot be my body (CSM 2:54). The inference is sanctioned by the principle: if $x = y$, x cannot exist unless y does. Second, since my body can be divided but I cannot (for while I can imagine my body being split up, I cannot imagine myself being split up), I am not my body (CSM 2:59). The inference is sanctioned by the principle: if $x = y$, x and y share all the same properties. Critics say that the parenthetical comments do not support their intended premises.

Christian thinkers today disagree over whether the Bible presupposes dualism, or whether doctrines involving an afterlife logically require dualism. Critics of dualism say it can’t explain our sense that we are spatially located and, more generally, the relationship between such different substances as soul and body.

D. HOWARD-SNYDER AND M. H. MACDONALD

Bibliography. R. Descartes, Philosophical Writings of Descartes, J. Cottingham, R. Stoothoff, and D. Murdoch, trans. cited as “CSM” in the text above; L. J. Beck, Metaphysics of Descartes; J. Cottingham, Descartes; E. M. Curley, Descartes against the Skeptics; G. Dicker, Descartes: An Analytical and Historical Introduction; N. K. Smith, New Studies in the Philosophy of Descartes; R. Swinburne, Evolution of the Soul; B. Williams, Descartes: The Project of Pure Inquiry; M. D. Wilson, Descartes.

Descent into Hell (Hades). In the NT Hades indicates the abode of the dead and is roughly equivalent to Sheol in the OT. It was believed that upon death both good and bad go to Hades, though in later biblical thought the good are seen to be in a higher compartment of Hades called Paradise (cf. Luke 16:19–31). In the intertestamental and NT periods there was disagreement among the rabbis as to whether Paradise was to be included in Hades or was indeed a separate realm altogether. Paul maintained that we are closer to God in Paradise than in our earthly, bodily existence (2 Cor. 5:6–8). The Wisdom of Solomon and Maccabees spoke of the righteous as being in the very presence of God. Tertullian reflected the viewpoint of many church fathers in his contention that Paradise is not yet heaven but is higher than hell, affording an interval of rest to the souls of the righteous (Against Marcion iv.34). Hades as the intermediate state of the dead is to be distinguished from Gehenna, the future abode of the damned, the eschatological hell, as well as from Tartarus, the realm of darkness inhabited by the devil and his angels, though these distinctions were not always made in the early church.

Christ's descent into Hades after his crucifixion and death has a solid foundation in both Scripture and the early church. In the NT it is attested in Acts 2:31; Ephesians 4:9–10; and 1 Peter 3:19–20. The passages in Ephesians and 1 Peter seem to indicate the extension of the saving work of reconciliation and redemption to the souls in the nether world of Hades.

In the Gospels reference is made to the saints in the tombs (the nether world) who were raised with Jesus (Matt. 27:51–53; John 5:25–29). Jesus also spoke of forgiveness in this world and in the world to come (Matt. 12:31–32). He confidently expected that the gates of Hades could not prevail or hold out against his church (16:18). In the book of Revelation it is said that Christ possesses the keys to the underworld and can open its gates (Rev. 1:18). Similarly, an angel is given the key to the bottomless pit in order to open it (9:1–2; 20:1).

In the OT the ransoming or redemption of the dead from Hades is hinted at if not testified to in Psalm 49:15; Hosea 13:14; Jonah 2:2, 6; and Isaiah 26:19. In an apocryphon cited from Jeremiah by both Justin and Irenaeus and still found in certain synagogue copies, the idea of a descent to the underworld is quite clear: "The Lord, the Holy One of Israel, remembered his dead ones who slept in the dust of the earth, and descended to them to preach his salvation and save them." This apocryphon is similar to a Latin text of Sirach 24:32: "I [Wisdom] will penetrate all the lower parts of the earth, and will visit all that sleep, and will enlighten all that hope in the Lord."

The descent into Hades was not universally accepted as part of the Apostles' Creed until the eighth century, though it is mentioned in local forms of that creed in patristic times. The descent formula is included in the Athanasian Creed, composed about the middle of the fifth century and accepted by both East and West.

Christ's descent into Hades was almost universally affirmed by the church fathers, including Polycarp, Justin Martyr, Origen, Hermas, Irenaeus, Cyprian, Tertullian, Hippolytus, Clement of Alexandria, Athanasius, Ambrose, and Augustine. The earliest patristic references to the descend occur in the epistles of Ignatius about the beginning of the second century.

There was disagreement among the church fathers on who benefited from Christ's descent. Many restricted Christ's redemptive activity in the realm of the dead to the OT patriarchs and prophets (Ignatius of Antioch, Irenaeus, Tertullian). Others held that those who had died before the great flood were likewise redeemed (the Alexandrian theologians and Origen). Some thought that Jesus Christ redeemed all the dead with the exception of the very wicked (Melito, Gregory of Nazianzus, Marcion, Ephraem). Cyril of Alexandria spoke of Christ "spoiling all Hades," "emptying the insatiable recesses of Death," and "leaving the Devil desolate and alone."

In the theological development in medieval thought the idea of an intermediate state of Hades was supplanted by heaven, hell, purgatory, the limbo of the patriarchs, and the limbo of unbaptized children. Thomas Aquinas contended that Christ descended to the underworld not to convert unbelievers but to put them to shame for their unbelief and wickedness. The just and holy souls of the patriarchs were indeed delivered by his descent but not the souls in the limbo of children.

At one stage in his life Luther taught with Melancthon that Christ's preaching in Hades, as referred to in 1 Peter, might have effected the salvation of the nobler heathen. In a sermon at Torgau in April 1533 Luther spoke of the descent of the whole Christ into hell, where he demolished hell and bound the devil. Luther and Lutheran orthodoxy saw the descent as the first stage in Christ's exaltation. Flacius, Calovius, and many other Lutheran theologians regarded the descent as a damnatory manifestation of judgment against the rejected.

In Reformed theology the descent into Hades has generally been interpreted as a figurative expression of the unutterable sufferings of Christ in his humanity. Reformed theology, following Calvin, saw the descent as part of the humiliation of Christ, not as the first stage of his exalted state as in Lutheranism.

In liberal Protestantism the idea of an intermediate state of Hades and Paradise has generally been discarded as a relic of an outmoded mythology. Some have interpreted the descent as simply denoting an ignominious place of death for the Prince of Life. Others see it as a symbolic portrayal of the fact of death.

It is well to note that the Gnostics, with the exception of Marcion, did not envision a descent of the Savior into the underworld, the abode of the dead. Instead, they preferred to speak of a pre-mundane descent of the divine "aeon" or eternal power out of the plerōma to rescue the fallen sophia (wisdom) from the lower spheres. Those who are liberated are imperfect righteous souls in one of the lesser heavens.

Descent into Hell (Hades)

While mythologies and other religions contain visits of a divinity, hero, or saint to the nether world of spirits, there is no parallel with the NT doctrine of the offer of redemption to the dead through preaching. A case can be made that a descent doctrine existed already in NT Christianity (anticipated even in the OT) without the aid of pagan myths.

To believe in the literal descent of Christ into Hades for the purpose of offering redemption does not imply universalism. Most of those who have held to this belief admit the possibility of rejecting the offer of salvation given by Christ. Again, this is not to be confounded with the doctrine of a second chance. What the descent doctrine affirms is the universality of a first chance, an opportunity for salvation for those who have never heard the gospel in its fullness.

D. G. BLOESCH

See also DEAD, ABODE OF THE; HADES; HELL; INTERMEDIATE STATE; LIMBO; PARADISE.

Bibliography. R. H. Charles, Eschatology: Doctrine of a Future Life in Israel; G. J. Dyer, Limbo: Unsettled Question; G. Fackre, R. H. Nash, and J. Sanders, What about Those Who Have Never Heard?; T. F. Glasson, Greek Influence in Jewish Eschatology; T. A. Kantonen, Christian Hope; F. Loofs, HERE 4:654–63; J. A. MacCulloch, Harrowing of Hell; C. V. Pilcher, Hereafter in Jewish and Christian Thought; E. H. Plumptre, Spirits in Prison; G. C. Studer, After Death, What?

Design, Argument From. See GOD, ARGUMENTS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF.

Despair. The sense of utter hopelessness that characterizes those whose spirits have been so crushed by tragic events or by their own guilt that they do not see any meaning to their lives. In the Scriptures despair is described in such rich but bitter terms and images as “languish,” “wailing,” “anguish,” “terror,” “desolation,” “gloom,” “dwelling in darkness,” “cowering in ashes,” “torn to pieces,” “wormwood and gall,” “teeth grinding on gravel,” “depths of the pit,” “soul in tumult,” “gnashing of teeth,” “heavy chains” (see Lam., esp. 3:5–20). The “woe” cry, one of the more intense expressions of despair in the Bible, was often uttered by the prophets to intensify the hopelessness of those who despise God’s justice (Amos 5:18). The future woes will bring such an avalanche of despair that the earth’s inhabitants will scream for the mountains to bury them (Rev. 6:15–17; 8:13).

While hopelessness usually characterizes those who are alienated from God and experience God’s wrath, there are moments when the person of faith reaches the boundaries of despair. In the presence of the holy and glorious God, Isaiah envisions his own uncleanness and is driven to declare, “Woe is me” (Isa. 6:5). Events can strike with such devastating force that both Job and Jeremiah curse the day of their birth and wish they had died in delivery (Job 3:3–19; Jer. 20:14–18). As the saying went, Rachel in Ramah laments and weeps bitterly for her children and refuses to be comforted (Jer. 31:15). Koheleth de-spairs of the seeming vanity and injustice of human striving (Eccles. 2:20). The forsaken psalmist cries out day and night for the absent God (Ps. 22). Even Jesus experiences this same divine abandonment in bearing the total weight of human sin on the cross (Matt. 27:46). In each of these cases, however, the biblical writers counter with firm glimpses of hope and salvation. Paul describes his own life as reaching the border of despair in his helplessness before the law and the desertion, persecution, and perplexity that the life of faith brings. Yet he proclaims confidence in the power of Christ to deliver from sin, and he affirms that the Christian’s precarious walk of faith does not ultimately lead to despair and destruction but rather brings life and joy (Rom. 7:7–25; 2 Cor. 4:8–12; see also Rom. 8:35–39).

That the Christian often lives near the edges of despair was noted by Augustine and theologically developed by Martin Luther. Luther maintained that despair (Anfechtung) is a redeeming force in the salvation of the sinner. However, it also plays a significant role in the life of the believer, since the believer is simultaneously saint and sinner (simul justus et peccator). Because of sin as well as God’s determined mode of revelation, the Christian paradoxically confronts God as “hidden” in the passion of Christ; i.e., in his suffering, forsakenness, and death on the cross and in his descent into hell. Thus, the believer shudders before the crucified Christ as he or she experiences with Christ the painful withdrawal of God in the face of human sin. Luther asserted, “All honest and pious Christians are like Jonah; they are thrown into the sea, yes, into the depths of hell. . . . All saints must also descend with their Lord into the inferno.” Nevertheless, at the cross the Christian also recognizes the overwhelming love of God expressed in Christ’s sacrificial death. Thus, in the very midst of that despair caused by God’s turning away from the Son who bears the world’s sins, God’s love is most fully comprehended and experienced.

Since Luther, one of the most profound and influential theological discussions of despair is encountered in Søren Kierkegaard’s Sickness unto Death. In this classical work he analyzes in great detail the various forms or stages of despair, and argues that underlying all despair is not the felt deprivation because of earthly misfortune, but rather a desperation at the loss of the true self and thus a loss of the eternal God who constitutes the self. Nevertheless, despair is the “passageway to faith" and, as it becomes more intense, it brings one nearer to salvation.

Kierkegaard's analysis of despair has greatly influenced contemporary writers. The present crisis of faith in God and the fear of mass human destruction have enticed some dispirited persons to embrace cynicism and nihilism. These sentiments have sparked modern theologies of despair, culminating in the gloomy claim that God is dead. A few contemporary theologians have directly addressed the existential despair of this age. For example, Paul Tillich, following the lead of Luther and Kierkegaard, writes that a life of faith can be forged from the fires of despair. Simply put, the positive has meaning in recognition and acceptance of the negative. In the "courage of faith" present in despair, the Christian experiences unshakable confidence in the eternal God.

It is not unusual for Christians to be driven to the edges of darkness because of unforeseen tragic events or heinous sins they or others have committed. However, the children of God never lose hope by dwelling on the question "Why?" Rather, they ask, "What is God going to do through me now?" Thus, they humbly accept God's sovereignty and God's justifying acts with fortitude and with the expectation that they are instruments of God's redemptive change in a fragmented and misery-congested world.

D. J. MILLER

See also EVIL, PROBLEM OF.

Bibliography. C. S. Evans, Despair: A Moment or a Way of Life; D. M. Lloyd-Jones, Spiritual Depression: Its Causes and Cure; P. Tillich, Courage to Be.

Determinism. See FREEDOM, FREEWILL, AND DETERMINISM.

Devil. See SATAN.

Devil Ransom Theory. See ATONEMENT, THEORIES OF.

Devotio Moderna. A devotional movement of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries chiefly associated with the Brethren of the Common Life; their founder, Gerard Groote; and their best-known writer, Thomas à Kempis. The Brethren were a mixed lay and clerical group that founded houses especially in Germany and Holland, the best known of which was Windesheim (founded 1387). The movement was not monastic in the full sense, although it had much in common with the Franciscan Tertiaries and sought the reform of the whole church, including monasteries.

The Devotio Moderna was strongly Augustinian in tone, but without his stress on predestination. The chief marks of the movement included (1) a focus on devotion to Christ, including meditation on his passion; (2) an emphasis on obeying Christ's commands and therefore on holiness, simplicity, and community; (3) a strong involvement in individual piety and spiritual life; (4) a call to repentance and reform; and (5) elements of nominalism, Christian humanism, and Franciscan asceticism. The adherents' biblical emphasis, encouragement of lay ministry, stress on a personal relationship to Christ, and rejection of indulgences and other medieval abuses made them appear precursors of the Reformers. But their individualism and call for a disciplined piety, as well as their independence and their refusal to rely on more than the Bible alone, means that they were more similar to the Anabaptists, who may indeed have been influenced by the movement, than to Luther, Zwingli, or Calvin, who accepted a mixed church as a necessary result of their acceptance of state sponsorship. At the same time the Devotio Moderna, although controversial, was fully within the Catholic Church; its weak doctrine of the church universal and of the Spirit (due to the focus on Christ) meant it felt no need for a radical break, although its sacramental teaching moved in a Reformed direction.

The lasting value of this movement has been the literature it produced and its influence over Anabaptists and other Reformers, directly and indirectly.

P. H. DAVIDS

See also BROTHERS OF THE COMMON LIFE; GROOTE, GERARD; THOMAS À KEMPIS.

Bibliography. T. à Kempis, Imitation of Christ; K. R. Davis, Anabaptism and Asceticism; A. Hyma, Christian Renaissance; J. Van Engen, Devotio Moderna: Basic Writings.

Diadem. See CROWN.

Dialectical Theology. See NEO-ORTHODOXY.

Dichotomy. This term, which signifies a division into two parts (Greek dicha, in two; temmein, cut), is applied in theology to that view of human nature which holds that man has two fundamental parts to his being: body and soul. Usually the two are sharply contrasted, considered to have different origins and independent existence. Thus, the actual relationship between body and soul becomes the crucial question.

Plato taught that the body was perishable matter but the soul existed in the heavenly world of pure form or idea before its incarnation in the human body. The soul was therefore uncreated and immortal—a part of deity. The body is the prison house of the soul; the soul is locked in the body like an oyster in its shell. At death the soul leaves the body to return to the heavenly world or to be reincarnated in some other body.

Aristotle's adaptation of Plato by dividing the soul into its animal and rational aspects was further developed in Roman Catholic doctrine through Thomas Aquinas, who taught that the soul was created in heaven and placed in the forming body, probably at the time of “quicken- ing” in the mother’s womb. The new philosophy after Descartes affirmed the independent origin of body and soul, supposing that the apparent unity of them in the human personality is due to the coincidental correlation that occurs momentarily, as when the pendulums of separate clocks happen to swing together. Contemporary theology usually rejects this view, holding to the body- soul unity of man as set forth in Hebrew thought: “and man became a living soul” (Gen. 2:7 KJV).

Dichotomy

W. E. WARD

See also MANKIND, DOCTRINE OF; TRICHOTOMY.

Bibliography. G. C. Berkouwer, Man: The Image of God; R. Bultmann, New Testament Theology; G. P. Klumbertanz, Philosophy of Human Nature; R. Niebuhr, Nature and Destiny of Man; H. W. Robinson, Christian Doctrine of Man; E. C. Rust, Nature and Man in Biblical Thought.

Diocese. A territorial unit of the church administered by a bishop. The word was adopted from the territorial divisions of the Roman Empire (Gr. diokēsis, administrative unit) but only gradually achieved common usage in the church. Today it is the basic unit of the Roman, Anglican, Old Catholic, and some Lutheran churches. The bishop is assisted in his shepherding of the diocese by assistant or suffragan bishops and by presbyter/priests. Usually the diocese is subdivided into parishes, which may be grouped into deaneries and archdeaneries. In the Orthodox and Eastern Churches diocese can refer to a much larger area—that supervised by a patriarch.

P. TOON

See also BISHOP; CHURCH OFFICERS.

Dionysius the Pseudo-Areopagite. One of the influential streams by which the Christian Platonism of the early church was transmitted to the Middle Ages was through the writings of the “pseudo-Dionysius.” This writer had been mistakenly identified as Dionysius the Areopagite who was converted by Paul (Acts 17:34). Instead, he lived ca. 500, probably in Syria. His writings paved the way for later Christian mysticism and became standard theological authorities in the Eastern church. Their Latin translation by John Scotus Erigena made them widely known in the West. Theologians such as Hugh of St. Victor, Bonaventure, Meister Eckhart, Albertus Magnus, and Thomas Aquinas knew the writings and used them.

Major themes of the pseudo-Dionysian writings include the hierarchical pattern of the universe, the soul’s intimate union with God, and humanity’s eventual deification. These are found in the treatises Celestial Hierarchy, Ecclesiastical Hierarchy, Divine Names, and Mystical Theology. Ten letters to monks, priests, and deacons also survive.

For pseudo-Dionysius, a series of hierarchically arranged beings relate God to the world. Each being springs directly from God, with Jesus serving as both the principle of creation and the consummation of all hierarchies. On earth the celestial hierarchy is mirrored in the ecclesiastical hierarchy of bishops, priests, deacons, etc.

Pseudo-Dionysius approached the knowledge of God both positively and negatively, though he expressed a preference for the via negativa. In Divine Names he argued that God is superior to all reason, speech, being, and name. To speak of God, then, one must do so only in a special sense. God is “hyper-[super-]Being,” “hyper-Goodness,” “hyper-Life,” etc. Ultimately the name God deserves above all others with regard to creation is “the Good.” With regard to God himself, the best name is “Being.” God is “He Who Is” (Exod. 3:14).

On the other hand, in Mystical Theology pseudo-Dionysius has the mind begin by denying to God those characteristics farthest from him such as “drunkenness” or “fury.” The mind then progresses to deny God all human characteristics until one comes to God as “the Darkness of Unknowing.” God is absolutely unknowable. One is united to God through ecstatic, mystical experience which is a complete ignorance of God and also a knowledge beyond reason. God is thus beyond both affirmation and negation.

D. K. MCKIM

See also MYSTICISM; NEOPLATONISM.

Bibliography. F. Copleston, Encyclopedia of Philosophy; History of Philosophy; M. de Wulf, History of Medieval Philosophy; É. Gilson, History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages; J. L. González, History of Christian Thought; A. Louth, Origins of the Christian Mystical Tradition from Plato to Denis; J. Pelikan, Emergence of the Catholic Tradition; Growth of Medieval Theology; Spirit of Eastern Christendom; D. Rutledge, Cosmic Theology: The Ecclesiastical Hierarchy of Pseudo-Dionysius: An Introduction.

Discerning of Spirits. See SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

Disciple. See CHRISTIANS, NAMES OF.

Discipleship Movement. See SHEPHERDING MOVEMENT.

Discipline, Church. See CHURCH DISCIPLINE.

Discrimination. The practice of treating people unfairly because they are members of a group marked by certain physical, religious, or social characteristics. Discrimination is not simply limited to isolated personal actions, but may also be embodied in structural arrangements such as laws, codes, ordinances, policies, community organizations, and broader social institutions.

Discrimination is fertilized by prejudice, the patterned attitude of hostility (blatant or hidden) toward other people. Its effects are usually devastating on the physical and spiritual well-being of its victims. Like a vicious circle the after-effects of this victimization manage to reinforce further prejudice and stereotyping, which then contribute to even greater discrimination. In certain circumstances this cycle of discrimination can ultimately lead, as history itself has too often confirmed, to the most heinous of human crimes—genocide, the systematic extermination of whole groups of people. The Holocaust is the most recent brutal example of the logic of prejudice and discrimination. Because of such vicious outcomes, discrimination is seen as morally abhorrent by all people of good will.

For Christians discrimination is morally objectionable not only because of its evil consequences, but also because it violates the fundamental biblical motif of love, which assumes the equal worth of all human beings. It is not within the nature of God to show partiality against particular groups of people (Deut. 10:17; 2 Chron. 19:7; Acts 10:34; Rom. 2:11; Gal. 2:6). Because humans are created in the image of God's very nature, they are not only worthy of equal treatment themselves but are summoned to treat others accordingly. The Israelites were sternly exhorted not to pervert justice or show partiality (Deut. 16:19). All the people, including the poor and the insignificant, even strangers and enemies, were to be treated lovingly (Lev. 19:9–18; Deut. 1:17; 24:17–18). This included provisions for special compensation to the poor because of their disadvantageous circumstances, often pejoratively referred to as “reverse discrimination” (Lev. 19:10; 25:35; Deut. 15:7–11; 24:19–22). The prophets, who reflected the mind of God, so vigorously condemned discrimination that they even predicted the demise of great cities and whole nations because they practiced partiality against the poor, orphans, widows, and other vulnerable groups (Isa. 1:21–23; 3:8–15).

Jesus continued the prophetic tradition when he claimed that God's benefits are showered upon friend and foe alike (Matt. 5:45). Jesus is described even by his enemies as teaching the true way of God, which they interpreted as not showing partiality (Luke 20:21). This was not just idle flattery because he did, in fact, refuse to comply with discriminatory practices based upon common prejudices. He spoke with a Samaritan woman in public (John 4:7–9), ate with tax collectors and sinners (Matt. 9:10–13), defended a woman taken in adultery (John 8:1–11), and touched lepers (Matt. 8:3). According to Luke, Jesus' claim that God cares for a hungry “unclean” widow and even a leprous enemy general was so offensive to the “in-group” at Nazareth that they became a murderous mob (Luke 4:25–30).

The principle of impartiality gave impetus to the early church's worldwide evangelistic thrust as represented by Peter's realization that God shows no partiality against various ethnic groups (Acts 10:34; 11:12; 15:9). Nondiscrimination became such a fundamental element of the early church's ethic that in the book of James it is one of the major tests of true faith in Jesus Christ (James 2:9). Exhibiting the “royal law” of love is interpreted in the context of whether or not one makes a “dishonorable” distinction by preferring richly adorned people over shabbily dressed ones (vv. 2–9).

Today, even though great efforts have been made to eliminate discrimination through education and civil rights laws, it continues to be a most persistent and subtle reality in nearly every society. Tragically, nagging prejudice and discrimination have been perpetuated in Christian-oriented societies out of self-interest or fear. This is often then coupled with a misreading of selective biblical texts. Fortunately, some of the strongest movements against sexual, racial, religious, and cultural discrimination, as illustrated by the contemporary black civil rights struggle, have been rooted in the Judeo-Christian ethic. This ethic will help to stimulate the Christian church to maximize its efforts to uproot prejudice and abolish discrimination through transformation of the heart, conversion of the mind, and social and legal reform. D. J. MILLER

See also ANTI-SEMITISM; CIVIL LAW AND JUSTICE IN BIBLE TIMES; CIVIL RIGHTS; JUSTICE; TOLERANCE.

Bibliography. G. Allport, Nature of Prejudice; G. S. Becker, Economics of Discrimination; J. Feagin and C. Feagin, Discrimination American Style: Institutional Racism and Sexism; A. H. Goldman, Justice and Reverse Discrimination; F. Holmes, Prejudice and Discrimination; M. L. King Jr., Why We Can't Wait; W. Laqueur and B. Rubin, Human Rights Reader; V. Mollenkott, Women, Men, and the Bible; V. Mollenkott and L. Scanzoni, Is the Homosexual My Neighbor? Another Christian View; R. A. Ruether, Liberation Theology; G. E. Simpson and J. M. Yinger, Racial and Cultural Minorities: An Analysis of Prejudice and Discrimination; T. Skinner, Black and Free.

Dispensation, Dispensationalism. Dispensationalism is the name given to a form of biblical interpretation which has been very influential in late nineteenth and twentieth century evangelical thought. It is especially noted for its strong rejection of supercessionism, that is, by its rejection of the belief that the church fulfills and replaces Israel in the divine plan. Dispensationalism reads Old Testament Israel and the New Testament church as successive institutions in biblical history which reveal irreducible aspects of a multi-purpose or multidimensional divine plan—a plan which includes political, national blessings to physical descendants of Israel as well as personal and spiritual blessings without ethnic or political distinction to all who are in Christ. Dispensationalism is a form of premillennialism and is especially known for its doctrine of the pretribulational rapture as separate from the post-tribulational second advent of Christ.

Dispensation, Dispensationalism

The word dispensation, as it is used here, refers to a management order, arrangement, or administration. It translates the Greek word oikonomia which properly means “household management” but also administration, management, or stewardship generally speaking. The New Testament uses this word in describing the order or structure of God’s relationship to Jews and Gentiles in Christ which God instituted through the death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus. (It is also used for individual ministry responsibilities within that overall structure.) This “dispensation” is contrasted with the way God related to Jews and Gentiles prior to Christ, when Gentiles were excluded from privileges covenanted to Israel (Gal. 3:1–4:31; Eph. 1:9–10; 2:11–3:12 [esp. 3:2–9]; Col. 1:9–29 [esp. 25–27]). In Galatians 4:2, Paul speaks of the Law (by which he means the Mosaic or Sinaitic covenant, cf. vv. 21–31) as the oikonomos, that is, the manager or steward in charge prior to Christ. This fills out the New Testament understanding of the dispensation of God’s relationship with Jews and Gentiles prior to Christ as the arrangement of the Mosaic covenant. That dispensation has been replaced by a new covenant order (2 Cor. 3:6–18). The most striking feature in the dispensational change is seen in the status of Gentiles. Whereas in the former dispensation, Gentiles were excluded from the covenant privileges of Israel, in the latter they share equally in Christ as fellow heirs and fellow members of the body, and fellow partakers of the promise of the blessing of the Holy Spirit (Gal. 3:14, 28; 4:1–7; Eph. 2:11–3:12).

Because of these biblical texts, it has been common in Christian thought to speak of at least two divine dispensations in human history. The Jewish, Mosaic, or Old Testament dispensation on the one hand and the Christian, New Covenant, or New Testament dispensation on the other. Some early Christian writers (such as Irenaeus and Augustine) saw all of history as a series of dispensations which they identified with the major structural units of the biblical narrative. But it was especially in Protestant biblical interpretation, in the seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth centuries, that this dispensational way of reading all of history and Scripture became popular. Reformed theologians, particularly covenantalists, adopted this approach. Typically, they divided Scripture and history into three or four successive dispensations.

Dispensationalism arose in the nineteenth century as one form of this dispensations approach to biblical and world history. By the mid-twentieth century, it had become its best known representative. This was especially due to the influence of the Scofield Reference Bible, published by C. I. Scofield in 1909 and 1917. Scofield interpreted the entire Bible as presenting a series of seven dispensations which he labeled innocence, conscience, government, promise, law, grace, and kingdom.

The label “dispensationalism” was apparently used first in the 1920s to distinguish Scofield’s dispensational theology from other approaches. The issue was not the number or names of the dispensations. (Dispensationalists differ even among themselves on the number and names of dispensations.) Rather, the issue centered on what the dispensation prior to Christ revealed about the purpose of God. Dispensationalists did not believe that the dispensation with Israel was simply a “shadow” of the substance and reality revealed in the church. Rather, they maintained that Israel and the church revealed distinctly different purposes in the plan of God. The dispensation with Israel set forth an earthly, political, and ethnic purpose centered on Israel. The dispensation with the church set forth God’s spiritual, heavenly purpose in which there is no ethnic distinction. These two purposes not only account for structural differences between the two dispensations, but they also give rise to distinctly different sets of promises, each pointing to its own form of eschatological fulfillment. Consequently, dispensationalists expect a future dispensation in which these promises can be distinctly fulfilled. Since promises from the last dispensation concern Israel specifically, there must be a future for Israel in a dispensation to come.

Dispensationalism has undergone development and modification in its history. Classical dispensationalism had its beginnings in the theology of J. N. Darby, a leader in the nineteenth century Brethren movement. It gained a wider reception in Bible and prophecy conferences in the United States after the Civil War, and was later popularized in the Scofield Reference Bible and Lewis Sperry Chafer’s Systematic Theology (1947–48). Classical dispensationalism radicalized the difference between Israel and the church as two separate redemptive programs—the former earthly, political, and legalistic; and the latter heavenly, spiritual, and gracious. They saw the dispensations as utterly separate, typically describing the church dispensation as a parenthesis in God’s earthly program for Israel. They also believed that in the eschatological consummation the programs would remain separate yielding distinctly heavenly versus distinctly earthly forms of redemption. Classical dispensationalists attributed many features in the Synoptic Gospels, such as the Sermon on the Mount, the Lord's Prayer, and the (distinctly Matthean phrase) kingdom of heaven to the earthly, legal program of God and thus without relevance (except through spiritual or moral application) to the church.

Ultradispensationalism is the name given by classical dispensationalists to the system of E. W. Bullinger and Charles Welch, followed by C. R. Stam, Charles Baker, and others associated with the Grace Gospel Fellowship and Berean Bible Society. This view inserts another dispensation between Israel and the present church dispensation. They relegate water baptism (and for some, also the Lord's Supper) along with much of the book of Acts and the general epistles to the intervening dispensation rendering them not directly relevant for the church today.

Revised (sometimes called "traditional") dispensationalism refers to a modification of classical dispensationalism in the 1950s to 1970s as represented by the revision of the Scofield Reference Bible (1967) and in writings by John Walvoord, Alva J. McClain, E. Schuyler English, Charles Ryrie, and J. Dwight Pentecost. Revised dispensationalists proposed different views on the kingdom of God (no longer distinguished from the kingdom of heaven), emphasized to different degrees the applicability of Christ's teachings to the church, and rejected the idea of dual spheres of eternal salvation. They saw the two purposes as anthropological (simply a difference between Israel and the church as such) rather than cosmological (heavenly versus earthly programs). Revised dispensationalists helped popularize a rapture-centered apocalypticism in American Society as can be seen in works by Hal Lindsey (such as Late Great Planet Earth, 1970) and Tim LaHaye.

Progressive dispensationalism is a further modification of dispensational thought which began to appear in the early 1990s in the writings of Robert Saucy, Darrell Bock, Craig Blaising, and others. Progressive dispensationalism emphasizes a multidimensional holistic unity rather than a radical dualism in its understanding of the divine purpose for dispensational differences. They believe that the promissory features of different dispensations reveal different aspects of one eschatological salvation in which social, political, and ethnic promises will be fulfilled along with an equal participation in the blessings of the Holy Spirit for all the redeemed. Progressive dispensationalists stress the relatedness as well as the difference of dispensations especially as seen in the covenantal and typological structures of Scripture. They teach the relevance of the teachings of Jesus for the church today, stress a consistent historical-literary hermeneutic, and see both inaugurated and futurist eschatology in the New Testament.

C. BLAISING

See also CHAFER, LEWIS SPERRY; DARBY, JOHN NELSON; SCOFIELD, CYRUS INGERSON; ULTRADISPENSATIONALISM; WALVOORD, JOHN F.; RAPTURE OF THE CHURCH.

Bibliography. O. T. Allis, Prophecy and the Church; C. B. Bass, Backgrounds to Dispensationalism; C. Blaising and D. Bock, Progressive Dispensationalism; C. Blaising and D. Bock, eds., Dispensationalism, Israel, and the Church; L. S. Chafer, Kingdom in History and Prophecy; D. P. Fuller, Gospel and Law; C. N. Kraus, Dispensationalism in America; C. Ryrie, Dispensationalism Today; R. Saucy, Case for Progressive Dispensationalism; E. Sauer, From Eternity to Eternity.

Divine Presence. See PRESENCE, DIVINE.

Divinity of Christ. See CHRISTOLOGY.

Divorce. Although there are few references to divorce in the early centuries of the Christian era, the evidence points toward a rejection of divorce with right of remarriage by the early fathers. By the sixth century the Eastern church had developed a tradition of allowing divorce with right of remarriage for a variety of causes, and the Eastern Orthodox tradition today has introduced the concept of the "moral death" of a marriage. The Western church, however, held firmly to the view that marriage was indissoluble. Augustine, to whom we owe the development of the view of marriage as a sacrament, believed that marriage was indissoluble, but in the sense of a moral obligation of permanence: marriage should not be dissolved. The medieval schoolmen in the West, however, developed a sacramental view of marriage as indissoluble in an absolute sense: valid marriage could not be dissolved. This view prevailed in the Roman Church, and is held by Christians of Catholic traditions. In the Middle Ages, alongside the rejection of divorce, a complex set of procedures for dispensation and annulment grew up by which burdensome marriages were dissolved, thus evading or overcoming the law of indissolubility.

The continental Reformers sought to return to a more biblical understanding of the nature of marriage. They rejected the elevation of marriage to the status of sacrament, and they disagreed with the absolute indissolubility of marriage. They objected to the annulment procedures that were bringing the divine ideal of permanence into disrepute. They believed that some parts of the NT allowed divorce with right of remarriage in certain circumstances.

The Reformers in England inherited ideas both from the Western Catholic tradition and from the continental Reformers. Had Cranmer's proposals for a revised canon law ever reached the statute book, they would have included provision of divorce for adultery, malicious desertion, prolonged absence without news, attempts against the partner's life, and cruelty. Severe punishment for adultery was prescribed, but the innocent partner was allowed to remarry. Since Reformation times the Church of England has exhibited the tension of two opposing views. There has been a strong indissolubilist tradition, forbidding divorce on any grounds and so requiring the strictest discipline of any church. There has also been a significant nonindissolubilist influence. In the seventeenth century there were a number of divorces procured by special Act of Parliament, with subsequent remarriage in church. This tension still exists and underlies the Anglican reports "Marriage, Divorce and the Church" (1971) and "Marriage and the Church's Task" (1978), both of which (the second by a majority) recommended that the Church of England should relax its present strict convocation rule that no person with a former partner still living may be married in church, although divorced persons with special permission are welcome to Holy Communion.

Divorce

Both sides believe that they are upholding a long-standing Christian tradition. Furthermore, both would claim biblical backing for their case. Indissolubilists insist that Jesus affirms the indissolubility of marriage in his teaching, forbidding divorce, thus abrogating the OT law. The nonindissolubilists believe that the NT does concede permission for divorce, in line with the Mosaic ruling, as a concession to the sinfulness of the human heart.

OT Background. On the assumption that the people of preexilic ancient Israel shared the attitudes and customs of their contemporary neighbors, it would appear (from ca. eighteenth-century B.C. Mesopotamia: the laws of Hammurabi and the laws of Eshunna) that marriage was commonly arranged by parents; that financial considerations showed that marriage was intended to be lifelong; that husbands expected fidelity from their wives and could exact the death penalty for adultery. Divorce, although possible, was rare except to the very rich, because the cost was prohibitively high. In postexilic times (in comparison with fifth-century Egypt) the customs were similar to earlier practices, although the cost of divorce had fallen; the death penalty was not exacted; and women as well as men could sue for divorce.

The Pentateuchal laws governing sexual relationships appear to be framed to preserve the view that in marriage a man and a woman are united together in what is intended to be a permanent, lifelong, exclusive union. It is from this context that we must examine the central OT paragraph concerning divorce, Deuteronomy 24:1-4, which forms the background to some of the material in the Gospels.

The older translations make it appear that a man is required to divorce his wife if "some indecency" is found in her, but this is not so. The RSV agrees with modern commentators that this legislation is granting a permission, not giving a command. Indeed, the main point of the paragraph is concerned with remarriage: a woman who has been divorced by her husband because of some "indecency" (probably some serious sexual misconduct short of adultery), and who subsequently marries another who then later also divorces her, is not permitted to return to her first husband. The paragraph recognizes that divorces happen, though it does not command or encourage them. It also regulates divorce (the husband has to give the wife a bill of divorcement) to provide some protection to the wife. The curious prohibition about subsequent remarriage to the first husband may indicate a curb on male cruelty if there was some custom of "lending out" wives for a time.

It is important to note that the law is concerned with divorce and not only with separation. The word "divorce" in the phrase "bill of divorcement" is related to the word for hewing down trees, even cutting off heads. It indicates the severing of what was once a living union. Divorce, then, is a kind of amputation. It cannot happen without damage to the partners concerned. This OT legislation, therefore, affords recognition of the fact that marriages are sometimes broken, although divorce is not approved; it acknowledges the need of civil legislation for the sake of society (bill of divorcement); it serves to protect the divorced woman and to legislate against cruelty. In its own negative way, therefore, it is seeking to preserve the divine ideal for marriage as far as possible within a sinful world.

Looking briefly at postexilic practice in Israel, one finds possible hints that the practice of divorce had become easier: thus Malachi needs to reaffirm God's intention for marriage by reminding his readers that God hates divorce (2:16).

NT Teaching. Divorce is discussed in the NT in a context where both the OT law was held dear (although it was variously interpreted by different schools of Pharisees) and Greco-Roman customs were exercising some influence (thus Mark 10:12 coincides with the Roman permission for women to initiate divorce as well as men, but Matt. 19:9, written for a Jewish readership, does not say this).

In Jesus' day there was a dispute between the Pharisaic schools about the interpretation of Deuteronomy 24:1-4 and about what constituted permissible grounds for divorce. (This lies behind the way Matthew frames the question in 19:3: "Is it lawful for a man to divorce his wife for any and every reason?" cf. Mark 10:2) The Shammaite Pharisees interpreted the Deuteronomical legislation in a strict way: divorce was permitted only for serious sexual sin. The more liberal Hillelite Pharisees (with whom Jesus might have been expected to side) understood “becomes displeasing to him” (Deut. 24:1) to be permission to divorce for the most trivial of reasons (even if she spoils a dish for him). It may well be that even the Shammaites did not always practice what they preached (cf. Matt. 23:4), so that divorce on fairly trivial grounds may not have been uncommon in the time of Jesus—although rare by modern standards.

It seems very unlikely that in the time of Christ the Jewish courts were allowed to carry out the death penalty for adultery; as far back as Hosea’s day the exaction of the death penalty for adultery does not seem to have been operative. In the NT it is assumed that divorce is the only penalty for adultery. Indeed, Israelite courts could compel a Jewish husband to divorce his wife on certain grounds. It is certain, therefore, that Jesus’ hearers would have assumed that the law of divorce was relevant to the crime of adultery, and highly probable they would have assumed that divorce after adultery was mandatory. If Jesus was introducing anything radically new, we would expect this to be made clear.

The Synoptic material has given rise to considerable dispute among commentators. In the first place, Jesus responds to the Pharisees’ question about the grounds for divorce by referring back to God’s intention in creation (Matt. 19:4; Mark 10:6). In contrast to much of the church’s concentration throughout history on what we may call the externals of marriage—legalities, disciplines, ceremonies—the primary biblical emphasis is on marriage as a covenant relationship. Marriage language is used to describe God’s covenant relationship with his people. God’s relationship with his people, Christ’s with his church, is given as the pattern for marriage relationships. A covenant is a personal relationship within a publicly known structure, based on promises given and accepted. It is to this personal relationship that Genesis 2:24 (to which Jesus refers in Matt. 19:5) points when it summarizes marriage thus: “leave his father and mother” (public declaration; the social dimension to marriage); “be united” (the word of committed covenant love-faithfulness); “become one flesh” (a complete unitary partnership of persons in relation, symbolized by and deepened through sexual union). Jesus sets this verse in the theological context of Genesis 1:27: the creation of man in the image of God, male and female. In other words, marriage answers to God’s creation pattern for personal sexual relationship. A marriage is intended to be a relationship, healing and growing and maturing through time, a “harvest of the Spirit,” which is patterned on and in turn displays something of God’s covenant relationship. It thus requires predictability, continuity, reliability—that is, permanence. God’s creation ideal, Jesus affirms, is for a lifelong, exclusive union that should not be broken.

Second, Jesus brings divorce and remarriage under the heading of adultery (Matt. 19:9; cf. 5:27–32). The Pharisees had trivialized divorce by reducing their concerns to the level of grounds for divorce and to the need for a certificate. Jesus says that in the light of God’s creation intention every unfaithfulness, every breaking of the commitment of “one flesh,” every “putting away” (apoluō) of one’s partner is sin. The commandment “You shall not commit adultery” means “You shall not break the one flesh.” Divorce, therefore, is covenant unfaithfulness; it breaks this command.

Some Christians believe that Jesus is speaking here not of divorce as such but of separation. The emphasis would then be on remarriage as adultery in the physical sense. Jesus is tightening up the Mosaic concession; he is being even more strict than the Shammaites. Divorce is not permitted. Remarriage is adultery. This is the reason for the shocked reaction of the disciples to this teaching (Matt. 19:10). Other Christians believe that Jesus really is talking about divorce and not just separation. It does not appear likely that he is using apoluō in the sense of separation without right of remarriage. Such separation was unknown in Jesus’ day. If he was using the word in a new and restricted sense, particularly in a discussion of Deuteronomy 24 in which remarriage (albeit restricted) was assumed—prompted by disagreements between Shammai and Hillel (both of whom also assumed remarriage)—would Jesus have been so understood without further explanation? It seems a natural assumption that divorce in the Synoptic material includes right of remarriage and that the sin of adulterous covenant-breaking is the sin of “putting away” one’s partner.

To see divorce as covenant-breaking is thus to see it as a serious and sinful act. It is arguable that in circumstances in which sin traps us such that none of the ways open to us is good, divorce may in some circumstances be seen as a “lesser evil” choice. However, taking the divine covenant as our guide, divorce is never obligatory; even the sin of sexual unfaithfulness (Hosea’s wife) can be an occasion for forgiveness and reconciliation.

The argument thus far is that two principles need to be held together: on one hand, the divine ideal for the permanence of the marriage relationship as a covenant partnership of personal (“one flesh”) communion, growing by the grace of the Spirit to be increasingly in fact what it is initially in intention; on the other hand, a recognition that when breakdowns occur, all attempts at reconciliation having failed, in some circumstances caused by what Jesus called “hardness of heart" (Matt. 19:8) divorce as a concession may be a permitted last resort.

Divorce

These two principles are expressed in different ways in the OT and in the Synoptic Gospels. They are also to be found in Paul. In Romans 7:1–3 and 1 Corinthians 7:10 the apostle gives the divine rule: marriage is permanent. But there is a small parenthetical concession acknowledging the reality of separation in 1 Corinthians 7:11, and there seems to be a permission for divorce in the case of a Christian deserted by an unbelieving partner in 1 Corinthians 7:15 ("the brother or sister is not bound").

Grounds for Divorce. There is further disagreement among Christians concerning the grounds on which divorce, if countenanced at all, may be permitted. At this point we must consider the exceptive clause in Matthew 19:9 and 5:32 (the ground of porneia). There is considerable disagreement about the meaning of this phrase, although it seems most likely that porneia refers to serious sexual sin, including adultery. But what function is this clause serving in Matthew, and why do Mark, Luke, and Paul not refer to it? There was an earlier view among biblical specialists that the clause was not authentic, but this has largely been abandoned: it is present in the best texts. The best explanation seems to be that Matthew, with his particular concern with law and order for his Jewish readership, recognized the civil requirement on a Jewish husband to divorce his wife if she was unfaithful to him. Mark and Luke give us the rule without the exception (which may have been assumed). Matthew is careful to include the exception. The exceptive clause points to the sort of concession to which Deuteronomy 24:1–4 also referred. It recognizes that, despite being a sinful departure from God's intention for marriage, divorce may sometimes be permitted in a sinful world.

Is Jesus giving prescriptive legislation here? In other words, is divorce permitted only for porneia? The Deuteronomic law was framed largely to prevent cruelty; Matthew points us to unlawful sexual misbehavior; Paul seems to allow divorce as a consequence of desertion in some circumstances. These may well serve as paradigms in clarifying the extreme seriousness with which the question of divorce should be approached. They suggest the sort of circumstances that might allow the moral permissibility of divorce as a last resort. Recognition of the persistent "hardness of heart" in a sin-affected society requires recognition of the human impossibility of healing some broken relationships. Divorce, in some extreme circumstances, even with repentance can be allowed as a lesser evil. Such a course inevitably presses the question, "Is it lawful to divorce one's wife for any cause?" The danger is that we may lose sight of Jesus' answer.

Pastoral Implications. If it is right to suggest that the Bible allows divorce as a lesser evil in some circumstances, though it always stands under divine judgment, what are the pastoral implications of this view?

In the first place we must work toward helping one another grow characters capable of committed love-faithfulness if there are to be growing numbers of marriages that display something of the nature of God's covenant. Second, the Christian community must become known as a context in which help is available to move marriages toward being environments of healing and nurture and growth in personal and mutual fulfillment. The church must be a haven of support for those whose relationships are in difficulties and an agency of reconciliation and of ministry of forgiveness whenever possible.

When marriages are broken, however, the tasks of the church are primarily twofold. The first is acceptance. For too long the primary stance of the church toward divorced people has been one of rejection. This is not to say that church discipline is unimportant, nor is it to say that the church does not have a prophetic role in making clear God's opposition to divorce. But the Christian community is called also to display the character of God which is seen in the acceptance of sinners as persons, whatever their failure, and helping them toward a renewed experience of God's restoring grace. The second task is that of support and guidance in aiding divorced persons in their future. This will mean emotional and material care, and possibly considerable help over time with the complexities of readjustment and feelings of guilt and bereavement. It may for some involve searching out the rights and wrongs in the thorny question of remarriage. D. J. ATKINSON

See also MARRIAGE, THEOLOGY OF; REMARRIAGE; SEPARATION, MARITAL.

Bibliography. D. Atkinson, Tasks for the Church in the Marriage Debate; To Have and to Hold; L. Boettner, Divorce; D. R. Catchpole, "Synoptic Divorce Material as a Traditio-Historical Problem," BJRL 57; A. J. C. Corner, Divorce and Remarriage; H. Crouzel, "Remarriage after Divorce in the Primitive Church," ITQ 38:21; J. Dominian, Marital Breakdown and Marriage Faith and Love; F. Dulley, How Christian Is Divorce and Remarriage? R. J. Erlich, "Indissolubility of Marriage as a Theological Problem," SJT 23:291; M. Geldard, "Jesus' Teaching on Divorce," Chu 92:134; W. A. Heth and G. J. Wenham, Jesus and Divorce; C. Jones, ed., For Better, for Worse; C. S. Keener, . . . And Marries Another; K. E. Kirk, Marriage and Divorce; A. K. Mitchell, Someone to Turn to: Experiences of Help before Divorce; J. Murray, Divorce; O. M. T. O'Donovan, Marriage and Permanence; J. H. Olthuis, I Pledge You My Troth; H. Oppenheimer, Marriage Bond; D. Phipers, Christian Marriage in Crisis; J. P. Sampley, And the Two Shall Become One Flesh; E. Schillebeeckx, Marriage: Human Reality and Saving Mystery; D. W. Shaner, Christian View of Divorce; J. R. W. Stott, "Biblical Teaching on Divorce," Chu 85:165; H. Thielicke, Ethics of Sex; B. Thornes and J. Collard, Who Divorces?; W. R. Winnett, Divorce and Remarriage and Anglicanism; Divorce and the Church.

Docetism. A term used to refer to a theological perspective among some in the early church who regarded the sufferings and the human aspects of Christ as imaginary or apparent instead of being part of a real incarnation. The basic thesis of such docetics was that if Christ suffered he was not divine, and if he was God he could not suffer. The combination of the two natures, Son of David and Son of God, affirmed by Paul in Romans 1:3–4 was apparently already under attack in the Johannine community (see 1 John 4:2; 2 John 7). Docetic thinking became an integral part of the perspectives of Gnostics, who viewed Jesus as the alien messenger from outside the present evil world and one who was untouched by the evil creator. This alien Jesus came to awaken Gnostics to their destiny outside the realm of creation. While the framers of the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds were opposed to docetic teaching and clearly assumed the two natures of Jesus, the drafters of the Definition of Chalcedon (A.D. 451) made explicit the Christian teaching concerning Jesus Christ as "truly God and truly man."

G. L. BORCHERT

See also CHALCEDON, COUNCIL OF; GNOSTICISM.

Bibliography. A. Grillmeier, Christ in Christian Tradition; J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines.

Dodd, Charles Harold (1884–1973). British Congregational minister and NT scholar. A graduate of Oxford, he served as lecturer in NT at Mansfield College, Oxford (1915–30), Rylands Professor of Biblical Criticism and Exegesis at the University of Manchester (1930–36), and Norris-Hulse Professor of Divinity at Cambridge (1936–49). Following his retirement from formal academic life he served as general director of the translation committee for the New English Bible.

Dodd towered over British NT scholarship during his academic career and even in retirement. His work on the parables (1935) set the tone in the English-speaking world as Jülicher's had done in Germany. His interpretation of the teaching of Jesus in terms of "realized eschatology" and his identification of a common outline of the early church's kerygma (in Apostolic Preaching and Its Developments, 1936) focused the attention of NT theologians for several decades. In According to the Scriptures (1952) he stressed the unity of the NT writers in their handling of the OT and linked this to Jesus' teaching. In his commentary on Romans (1932) and elsewhere he argued that the biblical concept of the wrath of God should be understood as an impersonal process of retribution in human history rather than as the divine reaction to the sin of humankind. Along similar lines he rejected the idea of propitiation as essentially unbiblical. His Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel (1953) and Historical Tradition in the Fourth Gospel (1963) represent the apex of his scholarly achievement and are perhaps the most important studies of the Gospel of John ever written.

W. W. GASQUE

See also REALIZED ESCHATOLOGY.

Bibliography. F. F. Bruce, "C. H. Dodd," in Creative Minds in Contemporary Theology, P. E. Hughes, ed.; G. B. Caird, HCT 320–37; W. D. Davies and D. Daube, eds., Background of the New Testament and Its Eschatology; F. W. Dillistone, C. H. Dodd: Interpreter of the New Testament; R. N. Graham, Charles Harold Dodd: A Bibliography of His Published Writings.

Doddridge, Philip (1702–1751). English Nonconformist minister, educator, author, and hymn writer. Born in London of pious Dissenter parents, Doddridge received a typical eighteenth century education at home, in grammar school, and at a private academy. He declined an opportunity to attend Oxford or Cambridge as preparation for service in the Church of England; instead he became an unordained Nonconformist minister in Kibworth, Leicestershire, in 1723. After transferring to Market Harborough, Leicestershire, he joined with Isaac Watts and several other preachers in establishing an academy, which was modeled after the one he had attended in Kibworth and to which he was appointed head tutor. In 1729 he was ordained minister to a large Independent (Congregational) congregation in Northampton, where he also moved his academy. Here he remained until his death.

Doddridge's academy, predominantly a training school for the ministry, became one of the most prominent Dissenter academies in the eighteenth century, providing generations of preachers for Nonconformist churches. He encouraged the greatest freedom of inquiry among his students, insisting only that Scripture was the genuine standard of truth but exposing them to a wide spectrum of theological points. This liberal tradition did not stem the tide toward antitrinitarianism, and Doddridge himself did not please his strictly orthodox fellow Independents with his "sentiments on the head of the Trinity." He sought eagerly for Christian unity among his fellow Nonconformists. His friendship with John Wesley and the Countess of Huntingdon was considered unusual for his day, and his "middle way" between Calvinism and Arminianism identified him with the "Baxterian" tradition in theology.

His best-known theological work, Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul, reminiscent of Richard Baxter's works of an earlier generation, ranks with William Law's Serious Call as a remarkable display of evangelical commitment, spiritual perceptivity, and freedom from contention. He also wrote a six-volume paraphrase and commentary on the NT entitled Family Expositor, which was extremely popular and reprinted numerous times. One of his best-known hymns, "Oh Happy Day, That Fixed My Choice," carries sentiments that can properly be ascribed to its author.

Doddridge, Philip

H. P. IPPEL

Bibliography. G. F. Nuttall, Correspondence and Diary of Doddridge; Philip Doddridge.

Dogma. In the NT the Greek dogma refers to a decree, ordinance, decision, or command (Luke 2:1; Acts 16:4; 17:7; Eph. 2:15; Col. 2:14; Heb. 11:23). In late Greek philosophy legal usage was subsumed under dogma as the doctrinal propositions that expressed the official viewpoint of a particular teacher or philosophical school.

Early Christian theology eventually came to use the term in the same way. Basil the Great in the middle of the fourth century distinguished between the Christian kerygma and Christian dogmas in the sense of propositions of faith. The church's first sanctioning of "dogmatic" statements was in 325 at the Council of Nicaea, where the consubstantiality of the Son with the Father was stated as a confession of faith.

In the Middle Ages the Roman Catholic Church developed the view of the depositum fidei ("deposit of faith"), in which the church was seen as having been entrusted with a certain treasury of truths whose ramifications could be rightfully developed by the church. Eventually, through the Council of Trent (1545–63) and the First Vatican Council (1870), the church's dogmatic pronouncements came to be considered as infallible. Thus, dogma was seen in Roman Catholicism even prior to the Reformation as a truth whose objective content is revealed by God and defined by the church. This is done through a church council, by a pope, or from the dogma's general propagation in church teachings.

Since the Reformation, Protestantism has rejected the association of dogma with infallible ecclesiastical pronouncements. In Reformation thought all dogmas must be tested against the revelation of God in Holy Scripture. As Karl Barth observed, "The Word of God is above dogma as the heavens are above the earth" (Church Dogmatics, 1:306). Also, for the Reformers faith is personal trust and relationship with God through Jesus Christ, not primarily assent to what the church says must be believed. Dogma has come to mean an expression of doctrinal truth that has achieved ecclesiastical status yet without claims to infallibility.

The 1845 work by John Henry Newman, Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine, was a seminal piece in raising questions about the traditions, developments, and continuities of Christian ideas. German scholars such as Ferdinand Christian Baur and Adolf Harnack subjected the historical developments of Christian dogmas and doctrines to critical scrutiny. From different perspectives so also did three Scottish theologians: William Cunningham, Robert Rainy, and James Orr.

Karl Barth reinterpreted the old Roman Catholic usage in modern Protestantism by defining dogma as "the agreement of Church proclamation with the revelation attested in Holy Scripture" (Church Dogmatics, 1:304). Dogmas are the forms in which dogma appears. Dogma becomes ultimately an "eschatological concept" since no human formulations will ever completely agree with the Word of God prior to the final kingdom of God, according to Barth. Dogmatic inquiry can be freed, however, to work with individual dogmas and to appreciate them as attempts to express the truth of revelation.

D. K. MCKIM

See also DOGMATICS; SYSTEMATIC THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. H. Berkhof, Christian Faith; B. Lohse, Short History of Christian Doctrine; R. P. McBrien, ed., Encyclopedia of Catholicism; J. Orr, Progress of Dogma; J. Pelikan, Historical Theology; W. E. Reiser, What Are They Saying about Dogma?; R. Seeberg, Text-book of the History of Doctrines; P. Toon, Development of Doctrine in the Church; O. Weber, Foundations of Dogmatics.

Dogmatics. That branch of theology which attempts to express the beliefs and doctrines (dogmas) of the Christian faith—to set forth "the whole counsel of God" (Acts 20:27 RSV) in an organized or systematic way. Since no dogmatic theologian deals only with the "dogmas" of the church, this discipline is now more commonly called "systematic theology" or simply "theology."

The terms "dogmatics" and "systematic theology" are used in both a broad and a narrow sense. In the broad sense the terms designate one of the four branches of theology, thus distinguishing systematic theology from biblical, historical, and practical theology. In the narrow sense the terms are used within that one branch of theology to distinguish the discipline from the history of doctrine, symbolics (the study of creeds and confessions), apologetics, and ethics. This article concentrates on the narrow sense of dogmatics (systematics).

Dogmatics or systematic theology generally deals with the doctrines of revelation (prolegomena), God (theology proper), man (anthropology), the person and work of Jesus Christ (Christology), the Holy Spirit and the application of salvation (soteriology), the church and the means of grace (ecclesiology), and the intermediate state and the second coming of Christ (eschatology). Even when using different terms and organizational arrangements, all systematic or dogmatic theologians deal with these subjects.

Dogmatic or systematic theologians are generally concerned with the biblical sources and support of the doctrines of faith, with the history of the development of such doctrines, with contrasting dogmas from other faith communities, and with the views of other theologians dealing with those doctrines. Because this discipline is concerned with the whole as well as with specific doctrines, systematic theology always reflects a particular faith community—Roman Catholic, Eastern Orthodox, Lutheran, Reformed, liberal, neo-orthodox, existentialist, etc.

The term “dogmatics” arose after the middle of the seventeenth century and was probably first used in 1659 as the title of a book by L. Reinhardt. Before that, when writing theology which appealed to Scripture, theologians used such terms as “sacred page” or “sacred doctrine.” The most famous of the systematic theologians in the patristic period were Origen, Augustine, and John of Damascus, the latter representing the Greek Orthodox tradition. In the Middle Ages scholastic theology was represented by Peter Lombard and especially Thomas Aquinas. Philip Melancthon reflected Protestant Lutheranism in the Loci Communes, while John Calvin expressed Reformed theology in his Institutes of the Christian Religion. In the following two centuries dogmatic works in the Protestant tradition multiplied.

The father of theological liberalism, Friedrich Schleiermacher, called his systematic work Christian Faith (1821) to indicate his emphasis on the subjective faith of the believer rather than on church dogma or God’s revelation. Neo-orthodox theologians, partly in reaction to liberalism, again turned to the term “dogmatics.” Emil Brunner published a three-volume Dogmatics and Karl Barth a thirteen-volume Church Dogmatics. However, Paul Tillich, an existentialist, produced a three-volume Systematic Theology.

A new theology of history in the Protestant tradition is evident in the systematic monographs of Wolfhart Pannenberg and Jürgen Moltmann. Karl Rahner and Hans Küng have written from new Roman Catholic perspectives. Donald G. Bloesch and Millard J. Erickson in the United States, Hendrikus Berkhof in the Netherlands, and Otto Weber and Helmut Thielicke in Germany have published dogmatic/systematic volumes.

Reformed theologians have been especially productive in this area during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, some calling their works “dogmatics” and others “systematic theology.” The Dutch theologians Abraham Kuyper, Herman Bavinck, and G. C. Berkouwer deserve mention, as do the Americans Charles Hodge, Louis Berkhof, John Murray, Herman Hoeksema, James Oliver Buswell Jr., and Cornelius Van Til.

Francis Pieper has written from the perspective of confessional Lutheranism and Augustus Hopkins Strong from the Baptist tradition. Lewis Sperry Chafer wrote a dogmatics from the dispensationalist standpoint. F. H. KLOOSTER

See also DOGMA; SYSTEMATIC THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. L. Berkhof, History of Christian Doctrines and Systematic Theology; J. J. Davis, ed., Necessity of Systematic Theology; G. Ebeling, Study of Theology; W. Elwell, ed., HET; M. J. Erickson, Christian Theology; G. P. Fisher, History of Christian Doctrine and Systematic Theology; A. Lecerf, Introduction to Reformed Dogmatics; R. A. Muller, Post-Reformation Reformed Dogmatics; P. Schaff, Theological Propaedeutic: A General Introduction to the Study of Theology; J. D. Woodbridge and T. E. McComiskey, eds., Doing Theology in Today’s World.

Döllinger, Johann Joseph Ignaz von (1799–1890). German church historian and theologian. Ordained a Roman Catholic priest in 1822, he taught church history at Aschaffenburg (1823–26) and at the University of Munich (1826–72). Linguist and versatile scholar with a remarkable memory, Döllinger became part of a group in Munich that steadily upheld Catholic principles in society. Gradually his views, seen notably in Reformation (1845–48) and Luther (1851), took on a growing nationalism. He advocated a Catholic Church in Germany headed by a German metropolitan and encouraged the growth of a Catholic press. His protests against increasing papal absolutism and the revival of scholastic theology brought him into confrontation with the Jesuits, who tended to label opinions other than their own as heretical. His fears were confirmed when the dogma of the immaculate conception (1854) was pronounced and the Syllabus of Errors (1864) published. He was drawn into the Vatican I controversy about papal prerogatives and wrote vigorously against them, but ruined his case by overstatement. He was excommunicated (1871) soon after publication of his Pope and the Council (1869–70) and was removed from his chair but continued attendance at Mass.

Hailed as one of the organizers of the Old Catholic Church, he lost enthusiasm for it when it departed from some Roman practices (priestly celibacy, confession). Roman Catholic scholars have played down Döllinger’s originality by linking his ideas with Gallicanism and Febronianism, but even they concede the weighty contribution he made in urging a historical approach to theology. J. D. DOUGLAS

See also FEBRONIANISM; GALLICANISM.

Dominic, Dominicans. Dominic de Guzman, a contemporary of St. Francis, was born ca. 1171 in a Castillian village. As a young adult he was nurtured by the cathedral chapter of Osma in a life ordered by the Rule of St. Augustine. On a trip to Scandinavia in 1203 he encountered Christians who had defected to the heretical Cathari (Albigensians). On a later trip he joined some Cistercians in preaching to and disputing with the Cathari to convert them. At the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215 Dominic received from Pope Innocent III permission to establish the Order of Preachers (OP), subsequently dispersing his small order throughout Europe. In 1219 he founded a large community in Bologna. The Rules and Constitutions were drawn up in 1220 by the First General Chapter at Bologna, and the order spread quickly and widely. Dominic died on August 6, 1221, and was canonized in 1234.

Dominic, Dominicans

The Dominicans were one of the new order of mendicants (from the Latin for "beggar") that replaced traditional monasticism in the thirteenth century. The friars ("brothers") were forbidden to own property; instead, they traveled and worked or begged for a living, being active chiefly in the newly rising towns and, subsequently, in the universities (especially at Bologna and Paris).

The Dominicans were also called the "Friars Preachers," as well as the "black friars" in England (because of their white habit with black cloak) and "Jacobins" in France. Since the order tried to reclaim heretics and the ignorant through the teaching of doctrine, they became known as the "watchdogs of orthodoxy" (sometimes derisively called Domini canes).

They became renowned for their learning and teaching on philosophical and theological topics, supplying universities with students and professors, and staffing each priory with a house professor (lector); the idea was that study enhances preaching and contributes to sanctification. The order included many leaders of European thought in the late Middle Ages, especially Thomas Aquinas. This led to the "intellectualism" that characterized Dominican spirituality, not in the academic sense, but in the sense that the life of faith is the life which searches for the divine truth who is Jesus Christ.

They are represented today by the 1968 Constitutions, following Vatican Council II's call for a "renewal" in a "return to the spirit (charism) of the founder," which, in the Dominicans' case, meant to identify with Jesus Christ and his apostles in the mission of preaching the Gospel.

D. L. OKHOLM

Bibliography. B. M. Ashley, Dominicans; S. Tugwell, ed. and trans., Early Dominicans: Selected Writings; M. H. Vicaire, St. Dominic and His Times.

Donatism. A schismatic movement arising in the fourth century. In its first stage it was a North African expression of a doctrine of the church. In its second stage it was a popular rebellion that pitted the Berber and landless against the landed Latin Catholic elite. Donatus, schismatic bishop of Carthage (313–47), sometimes spoken of as Donatus the Great, directed the schismatic church with vigor and a shrewd use of ethnic and social factors until the Roman emperor exiled him to Gaul or Spain in 347; he died there ca. 350. Parmenian, also an able leader, succeeded him.

Donatism grew out of the teachings of Tertullian and Cyprian. Following these two, Donatists taught that a priest's part in sacraments was substantial (he had to be holy and in proper standing with the church for the sacrament to be valid) rather than simply instrumental. The latter was the view of Rome and of Augustine, bishop of Hippo and chief anti-Donatist spokesman. To Donatus the church was a visible society of the elect separate from the world, whereas Augustine developed the Catholic concept of an invisible church within the visible. Donatists also had a fierce reverence for every word of Scripture; therefore to pour a libation to the emperor or to surrender a Bible to Roman persecutors to burn was to be a heretic or a traditore. Any who had done so were forever outside the visible church unless they were rebaptized (being saved all over again). Augustine and the Catholics accepted traditores as they did any other backsliders; they were welcomed back into communion upon proper penance prescribed by their bishop. Donatists saw themselves as the only true church and Augustine and his Catholics as a mixed multitude.

The actual schism followed Diocletian's persecution (303–5), which was particularly widespread in North Africa. There priests and bishops were often permitted to escape death by surrendering Scriptures and regalia to authorities. In 311 Caecilian was elected and consecrated as bishop of Carthage. Religiously the consecration was considered invalid because Caecilian himself may have handed over Scriptures for burning and because one of his three confirming bishops, Felix of Aptonga, was a traditore. Politically the consecration of Caecilian was suspect because the primate of Numidia, Secundus of Tigisi, was not involved, and for the previous forty years Numidia had claimed the right of ordaining the bishop of Carthage. Secundus arrived in Carthage with seventy Numidian bishops, declared Caecilian's election invalid, and elected Majorinus as rival bishop of Carthage. Majorinus died within two years, and Donatus was consecrated in his place in 313.

Constantine, after trying councils and conciliation, turned to severe oppression in 317; but when that failed he granted Donatists liberty of worship in 321. In 371 Donatists joined the anti-Roman revolt of Firmus. In 388 the fanatical Donatist Bishop Optatus of Thamugadi organized bands of Donatist terrorists, called Circumcellions, and led a revolt under Geldon that lasted to the deaths of Optatus and Geldon in 398. Donatism survived until the seventh century Muslim conquest of North Africa obliterated Catholics and Donatists alike.

V. L. WALTER

See also AUGUSTINE OF HIPPO; CYPRIAN; TERTULLIAN.

Bibliography. W. H. C. Frend, Donatist Church; R. A. Markus, "Donatism: The Last Phase," in Studies in Church History; W. J. Sparrow-Simpson, St. Augustine and African Church Divisions.

Doorkeeper. See MINOR ORDERS.

Dooyeweerd, Herman (1894–1977). Dutch Reformed philosopher. A graduate of the Free University of Amsterdam, Dooyeweerd worked as a civil servant until 1922, when he was appointed assistant director of the Kuyper Institute in The Hague. In this position he was responsible for editing the antirevolutionary Staatkunde, a monthly journal of the institute that dealt with a broad range of political and economic issues. In 1926 he was appointed to the chair of legal philosophy at the Free University, a position he occupied until his retirement in 1965. Dooyeweerd is best known for his four-volume work, New Critique of Theoretical Thought (1953–58).

Dooyeweerd drew his inspiration from the Dutch Calvinist tradition as developed during the nineteenth century by Groen van Prinsterer and Abraham Kuyper. In 1935 Dooyeweerd and his brother-in-law, D. H. Th. Vollenhoven, played a major role in the establishment of the Association for the Calvinistic Philosophy and began the publication of the academic journal Philosophia Reformata. As Dooyeweerd's thought matured, he chose to replace the name Calvinistic Philosophy with the simpler title Christian Philosophy. Although in many ways his attempt to establish a Christian philosophy has been neglected by the philosophical establishment and many Christian groups, Dooyeweerd nevertheless generated a small but dedicated following. His most widely known pupils were probably Hans Rookmaaker and Cornelius Van Til, while Francis Schaeffer served as the popularizer of his ideas.

Dooyeweerd was an innovative thinker who boldly faced the intellectual challenges of his day. His writing demands concentration and a familiarity with the intellectual history of the Western world, which he boldly challenges from a Christian perspective. The best-known part of his work is his transcendental critique of Western thought, which seeks to subject the Western philosophical tradition to a thorough examination. "Why is it," Dooyeweerd asks, "if philosophy is based upon reason, the various schools of philosophy can never agree with each other?" In answer to this question he argues that religious commitments rather than unbiased reason underlie the thought of all men. Having established this point and shown, to his own satisfaction at least, the weaknesses of various philosophical schools, Dooyeweerd goes on to develop a Christian philosophy that will be able to maintain a unified view of the world. To do this he constructs a complex system of hierarchically ordered interrelated realms of spheres that he claims are foundational to all reality and that exist in an increasingly complex structural framework.

Dooyeweerd's writings are to be compared to those of Kant, with whose philosophy he is in continuous debate. He rejected the analytic/synthetic distinction some thirty years before the Harvard philosopher W. V. O. Quine did, and was discussing the importance of what Thomas Kuhn was to call paradigms long before Kuhn did so. Another contemporary issue dealt with by Dooyeweerd is the sociology of knowledge. Here again his contribution has been largely neglected.

Although many criticisms can be made of Dooyeweerd's work, he appears to be the only thinker nurtured by a conservative Christian community who has attempted to challenge the intellectual ideas of his day while remaining loyal to his religious roots. The value of his work lies not in the solutions he proposes but rather in the foundation he has laid and the example he provides of the Christian thinker who is unafraid of creatively interacting with modern thought.

I. HEXHAM

See also CALVINISM; KUYPER, ABRAHAM; REFORMED TRADITION; SCHAEFFER, FRANCIS; VAN TIL, CORNELIUS.

Bibliography. V. Brummer, Transcendental Criticism and Christian Philosophy; A. L. Conradie, "Dutch Reformed Theology," in NDT 213–14; Neo-Calvinistic Concept of Philosophy; L. Kalsbeek, Contours of a Christian Philosophy; R. Nash, Dooyeweerd and the Amsterdam Philosophy; J. M. Spier, Introduction to Christian Philosophy.

Dorner, Isaac August (1809–1884). German Lutheran theologian. Born at Neuhausen, Württemberg, Germany, the son of a Lutheran pastor, Dorner studied philosophy and theology at the University of Tübingen from 1827 to 1832. From 1832 to 1834 he acted as parish assistant to his father, and in the latter year became a teaching fellow at Tübingen, receiving promotion to an associate professorship four years later. In 1839 he accepted a full professorship at Kiel, moving in 1843 to Königsberg, in 1847 to Bonn, and in 1853 to Göttingen. In 1862 he was appointed to a chair at Berlin, where he taught till his retirement in 1883.

Dorner's importance for theology is threefold. (1) He was a cofounder of the journal Jahrbucher für deutscher Theologie in 1856 and was active in this publication until it was discontinued in 1878. (2) He wrote learned treatises on various aspects of theological history, particularly History of the Development of the Doctrine of the Person of Christ (5 vols., 1846–50), and History of Protestant Theology (2 vols., 1867). (3) He expounded his constructive theology in System of Christian Doctrine (4 vols., 1879–81).

In his theological system Dorner emphasized the central importance for Christianity of the person and work of Jesus Christ, the divine-human Savior. He interpreted the personal development of Jesus Christ during the days of his flesh in a distinctive way. Starting from the premise that God and man are not unlike but akin, he described the incarnation as the Logos, the divine principle of revelation and self-bestowal, himself entering into Jesus in his human nature, without partaking of nature's sinfulness, however, for he held Jesus to be sinless, thus creating a new humanity, destined to be the head of a redeemed human race, "the progenitor of spiritual humanity." Thus Dorner conceived of Jesus Christ's incarnation not as something completed at once but as continually increasing throughout his earthly life, inasmuch as God the Logos ever grasped and appropriated such new aspects of growth as were generated by Jesus' truly human development.

N. V. HOPE

Bibliography. C. Welch, God and Incarnation in Mid-Nineteenth Century German Theology.

Dort, Synod of (1618–1619). An international church assembly called by the States General of the Netherlands to settle certain ecclesiastical and doctrinal matters that had been troubling the Reformed Church of the Netherlands. It consisted of thirty-five pastors and a number of elders from the Dutch churches, five theological professors from the Netherlands, eighteen deputies from the States General, and twenty-seven foreign delegates.

The problems that faced the synod were complex. First, it had to deal with the ancient problem of Erastianism, the control of the church by the state. The Dutch church was by confession Calvinistic. It was Calvin's conviction that the church should be independent of the state while cooperating with it. By 1554 he had won that battle in Geneva, but until the time of Dort, and later, the Dutch church had in it a strong element, including such leaders as Oldenbarneveldt, Grotius, and Coolhaas, that favored state control over the church. Thus even the Prince of Orange in 1575 gave an order that consistories were to be appointed by local magistrates, a view which had wide support.

A second problem with which Dort had to wrestle was an anticonfessional humanism that was more Hellenistic than biblical in spirit. Erasmus and Coornheert were its heroes. Although these men lived well before the meeting of the synod, their rejection of the doctrine of human depravity and adulation of free will was accepted by the Arminian party, named after James Arminius, a professor of theology at the University of Leiden. A major issue before the synod was the status of the creeds. The Arminian party, while having to admit that the church had a confession, disliked confessional confinement and sought to have the creeds revised.

The third problem was one of fundamental Christian doctrine. Predestination was the doctrine most attacked, especially that part of it known as reprobation. The Arminian party was helped in its attack by the extreme positions of some of its opponents. Furthermore, in their Remonstrance of 1610 and afterward, the Arminian party, whose proponents then came to be called "Remonstrants," was unwilling to say that man is totally unable to save himself; it held rather that, while human nature has been impaired by sin, the will is still free and able to respond to the grace of God. It claimed that God determined to save all who believe, and it refused to accept the teaching that election is unto faith. It held that Christ died for all even though only believers benefit from his death; that grace is not irresistible; and that faith may be lost. Besides publicly challenging the doctrines of predestination, sin, grace, and the perseverance of the saints, the Remonstrants indicated that they were unsure of other doctrine as well; original sin, justification by faith, the atonement, and even the deity of Christ were called into question. That they doubted Christ's deity is not a well-known historical fact, but it contributed to the seriousness and bitterness of the controversy. It was not until after the death of Arminius in 1609 that the drift toward Socinianism, a version of Unitarianism, became noticeable. The appointment of Conrad Vorstius to the chair of theology at Leiden vacated by Arminius aroused suspicions; in 1622 he made his espousal of Socinianism public.

As a result of all this a strong party spirit developed throughout the country that threatened to split the church and provinces of the Netherlands. Arminian leaders got civil authorities to decree that no contested doctrines might be preached, and in some instances succeeded in getting pulpits closed to specific Reformed ministers. Reformed classes retaliated, and where the contra-Remonstrants, or orthodox, could not get a majority, they sometimes worshiped in houses or barns, only to be punished by civil authorities. The situation deteriorated until it appeared in 1617 that there might be civil war. On November 11 of that year the States General decreed that a synod should be called to settle the questions troubling the country and bring it to peace. There had been numerous earlier calls for a national synod by classes, by the Remonstrants when they thought they might have a majority if the States General would select delegates, and by provincial synods and civil authorities.

When the Synod of Dort met in 1618, the Remonstrants expected that they would be recognized as equals and that the synod would be a conference to discuss disputed questions. Instead, the synod summoned the Remonstrants to appear before it as defendants, and in due time their doctrines were condemned. The Canons of Dort set forth: (1) Unconditional election and faith are a gift of God. (2) While the death of Christ is abundantly sufficient to expiate the sins of the whole world, its saving efficacy is limited to the elect. (3, 4) All are so corrupted by sin that they cannot effect their salvation; in sovereign grace God calls and regenerates them to newness of life. (5) Those thus saved he preserves until the end; hence there is assurance of salvation even while believers are troubled by many infirmities.

Dort thus preserved the Augustinian, biblical doctrines of sin and grace against the claim that fallen mankind has free will, that the human condition in sin is not as desperate as the Calvinist party said it is, and that election is only God's response to man's decision to believe. It was such a prestigious gathering that it served as an example for the Westminster Assembly, which was held in Britain a generation later, and it set the course the Dutch church was to follow for centuries.

M. E. OSTERHAVEN

See also ARMINIANISM; ARMINIUS, JAMES; AUGUSTINE OF HIPPO; CALVINISM; REMONSTRANTS.

Bibliography. L. Boettner, Reformed Doctrine of Predestination; W. Cunningham, Historical Theology; P. Y. DeJong, Crisis in the Reformed Churches; H. E. Dosker, "Barneveldt, Martyr or Traitor," PRR 9:289–323, 438–71, 637–58; J. Hale, Golden Remains; M. G. Hansen, Reformed Church in the Netherlands; A. A. Hoekema, "New English Translation of the Canons of Dort," CTJ 3:133–61; R. Nicole, "Dort, Synod of," NDT 207–8; P. Schaff, Creeeds of Christendom.

Double Predestination. See ELECT, ELECTION.

Double Procession of the Holy Spirit. See FILIOQUE.

Doubt, Religious. Just as belief may be propositional or personal, so one may doubt with respect to propositions or persons and objects. In regard to propositions, doubt is called a propositional attitude, i.e., a particular intellectual stance one takes toward a proposition. Such propositions may be about religious or nonreligious entities, but the doubt in all cases is such as to express an attitude of uncertainty about the truthfulness or falsity of the proposition. It should be noted that the proposition in question may in fact be true and even verified, but doubt or uncertainty relates to whether or not the proposition has been perceived to be true—i.e., it is a subjective attitude that need not have anything to do with the objective certainty (degree to which the proposition has been verified or even its truthfulness) of the proposition.

Doubt of a person may be reducible to propositional doubt. For example, to doubt God may mean nothing more than doubting the truth of the proposition "God exists." On the other hand, doubt of a person often involves much more than questioning the truth of a proposition about the person's existence. In particular, it often involves the matter of distrust. Thus, if one doubts God, he may not indicate any disbelief in God's existence but only that he does not find God to be reliable and thus feels he cannot trust and depend on him. An example of the importance of this matter of trust is seen in Jesus' words, "Let not your heart be troubled. Ye believe in God, believe also in me" (John 14:1 κϒν). Jesus is clearly saying more than that the disciples should believe God and he exist. As they were in his presence, there would be no question that he existed, and for such monotheists as the disciples there would be no question of the existence of God. Instead, Christ's point was obviously that they should trust in him and commit themselves to him. These matters of mistrust and unwillingness to commit oneself most clearly distinguish doubting a person from doubting a proposition.

In regard to propositional doubt, there are various forms, and most can be illustrated in Scripture. First, there is philosophical doubt, and philosophers distinguish two forms of it. On the one hand, there is definitive doubt, which can be called skeptical doubt, while on the other, there is provisional doubt (exemplified in the method of Descartes), which calls items into question for the sake of reaching a more dependable conclusion, i.e., doubt in order to learn. The skeptic doubts not only because he has no answer, but because he thinks there is no answer and could be none. Examples of skeptical doubt are rare in Scripture, but the Bible is replete with cases of provisional doubt. For example, the doubt of Thomas seems to fit this category, and it is important to note that there is not one word of rebuke to Thomas from the Lord or one word of repentance by Thomas. Evidently such doubt is not sinful.

A second broad kind of doubt is equivalent to denial. The individual does not pose a question in order to learn, nor need he be a skeptic. Instead, his doubts are meant as veiled assertions of denial. Such doubt simply says no in the presence of evidence (the skeptic's point is that there is no evidence). A prime example of such doubt is Satan's reaction to Eve in the garden. In Genesis 3:1 Satan asks, "Did God really say, 'You must not eat from any tree in the garden?'" He is obviously not asking for information, for his question is a veiled assertion of denial that in vv. 4–5 becomes unveiled. Likewise, the Pharisees' continuous request for another sign from Jesus despite all the previous miracles performed provides another example. In the face of the evidence, they refused to believe and requested another sign. Jesus recognized their request as a refusal to believe the evidence, and he responded by rebuking them and refusing to give another sign (Matt. 12:38–42).

Doubt, Religious

Finally, there is a kind of doubt that may be labeled "ignorant doubt." It is doubt that seeks evidence in the face of evidence, but not because there is a rejection of evidence. Instead, the individual has enough evidence to believe, but he still doubts, because he thinks there is some further explanation that will resolve all doubt completely. In such a case he does not know what a final explanation would be, for if he did, he might realize that he already has it. Thus, such doubt is without rational ground. It is ignorant in that the person doubting is looking for something further but cannot explain what this would be. Though examples of such doubt are present in everyday life, they are not plentiful in Scripture. Perhaps the response of Agrippa to Paul in the face of the evidence (Acts 26:28) is an example of such doubt, but even that is unclear. His doubt could be an example of skepticism or even denial.

From this discussion of the various kinds of doubt it should also be evident that there are several elements involved in doubting. The most obvious element is the rational or intellectual. On the other hand, one may still doubt in the face of evidence, even evidence which he fully understands. In such a case it seems proper to argue that there are either emotional and/or volitional problems as well. That is, one may know the truth but not be comfortable with the way such a truth makes him feel, so he still withholds belief. Or it may be that one understands the implications in terms of change of lifestyle if he were to commit himself to what he knows to be true, and so he chooses to withhold such commitment (volitional problem) and as a result begins to question the truth of the item in question. For example, in view of James 2:19 it is safe to say that the doubt and disbelief of Satan and demons is not primarily an intellectual but rather a volitional and emotional problem. In such a case the individual may have propositional belief in the intellectual sense but simply refuses to add to it belief in the person (trust and commitment). On the other hand, Scripture also indicates and theologians have argued that there are several elements to saving faith—viz., an intellectual element (one must know the facts of the gospel to be saved), an emotional element (assent—agreement that what one knows in general is appropriate for oneself), and a volitional element (the element of commitment of life to what one knows to be the case).

J. S. FEINBERG

See also FAITH; GOD, ARGUMENTS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF; UNBELIEF.

Bibliography. R. Davidson, Courage to Doubt; R. Descartes, Meditations on First Philosophy; B. Gärtner, NIDNTT 1:503–5; O. Guinness, Doubt: Faith in Two Minds; N. Malcolm, Knowledge and Certainty; H. H. Price, "Belief 'in' and Belief 'That,'" in Philosophy of Religion, B. Mitchell, ed.; R. C. Sproul, ed., Doubt and Assurance; L. Wittgenstein, On Certainty.

Downgrade Controversy. See SPURGEON, CHARLES HADDON.

Doxology. The term, which is derived from the Greek doxa (glory), denotes an ascription of praise to the three persons of the Blessed Trinity. In its commonest form, known as the Gloria Patri or "Lesser Doxology," it is rendered: "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost: As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world without end. Amen." Its use at the end of the Psalms, as directed, e.g., in the Book of Common Prayer, dates from the fourth century. It is thus a symbol of the duty of Christianizing the Psalms and serves at the same time "to connect the Unity of the Godhead as known to the Jews with the Trinity as known to Christians" (Tutorial Prayer Book, p. 101).

The so-called Greater Doxology is the Gloria in Excelsis, "Glory be to God on high." On account of its opening words, taken directly from Luke 2:14, it is sometimes known as the Angelic Hymn. This doxology is of Greek origin (fourth century) and was used at first as a morning canticle. Later it became incorporated into the Latin Mass, where it occupied a place at the beginning of the service. In the English Communion Service of 1552 the Reformers transferred the hymn to the end of the office, no doubt in accordance with the usage at the first Eucharist: "When they had sung a hymn, they went out" (Matt. 26:30). In this position it forms a fitting conclusion to the Christian sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving.

It is now generally agreed that the doxology at the end of the Lord's Prayer is not part of the original text of Matthew 6:9–13. It may be regarded as an ancient liturgical addition to the prayer, which was adopted by the Greek church but not by the Latin.

F. COLOUHOON

See also WORSHIP IN THE CHURCH.

Bibliography. S. Aalen, NIDNTT 2:44–52; E. P. Heidemann, Our Song of Hope; G. Wainwright, Doxology.

Drechsel, Thomas. See ZWICKAU PROPHETS.

Drink Offering. See OFFERINGS AND SACRIFICES IN BIBLE TIMES.

Drunkennes. See ALCOHOL, DRINKING OF.

Dualism. A theory in interpretation that explains a given situation or domain in terms of two opposing factors or principles. In general, dualisms are twofold classifications that admit of no intermediate degrees. There are three major types: metaphysical, epistemological or epistemic, and ethical or ethico-religious.

Metaphysical dualism asserts that the facts of the universe are best explained in terms of mutually irreducible elements. These are often considered to be mind and matter, or, as by Descartes, thought and extension. Mind is usually conceived as conscious experience, matter as occupying space and being in motion. They are thus two qualitatively different orders of reality.

Epistemological dualism is an analysis of the knowing situation which holds that the idea or object of judgment is radically other than the real object. The "object" of knowledge is held to be known only through the mediation of "ideas." This type of thinking raises the important question of the manner in which knowledge can bridge the gap between the idea of an object and the object itself.

Ethical or ethico-religious dualism asserts that there are two mutually hostile forces or beings in the world, the one being the source of all good, the other the source of all evil. The most clear-cut type of ethico-religious dualism is that of the ancient Iranian religion, usually associated with the name of Zoroaster, in which Ahura Mazda and Ahriman represent the projection into cosmology, respectively, of the forces of good and evil. The universe becomes the battleground for these opposing beings, identified respectively with light and darkness. More moderate forms of dualism pervade most religions, expressed, for example, by the distinction between sacred and profane, or by the analysis of reality in terms of yang and yin in Chinese thought.

Christian theology generally accepts a modified moral dualism, recognizing God as supremely good and Satan as a deteriorated creature bent everywhere upon the intrusion of evil. This, however, is not dualism in the sense of its usual definition, since Christian theology does not consider Satan to be ultimate or original, and sees him ultimately excluded from the universe. H. B. KUHN

See also MANICHAISM; ZOROASTRIANISM.

Bibliography. H. D. Lewis, Elusive Self; D. Runes, Dictionary of Philosophy; P. Smith, Philosophy of Min- dye; J. R. Smythies and J. Beloff, Case for Dualism; T. S. L. Spragge, Theories of Existence.

Dulia. Both a disposition to honor those persons whose lives deserve it and the honoring act itself. The word originally could mean the honor due from a slave to his or her master. Because of this meaning dulia has been deemphasized since Vatican Council II; the council insisted upon the communality and basic equality of the people of God. T. J. GERMAN

See also HYPERDULIA; LATRIA.

Duns Scotus, John (1266–1308). Franciscan scholastic theologian, born in Scotland and educated at Oxford and the University of Paris. Details of his life are vague, but it is known that he taught at Oxford, Paris, and Cologne. His teaching is preserved in a commentary on the Sentences of Peter Lombard, glosses on Aristotelian texts, and disputations about various subjects. Although he is venerated as a saint within his order, other groups within Roman Catholicism have not accepted his status.

Scotus is a difficult thinker to interpret for several reasons. These include the fact that he never wrote a full presentation of his system, that his works are preserved in very poor condition—often being available only from students' notes—and that he coined new terms and concepts to explain his ideas. Consequently his work has been interpreted in numerous ways. Some have claimed that he represented the most complex development of scholastic reason, while others believe that he separated philosophy from theology and reason from faith to such an extent that he taught a system called the double truth, similar to Siger of Brabant. This outlook held that there are some conclusions that one accepts in philosophy but cannot accept in faith, and when such contradictions occur one must accept the conclusions of faith.

Scotus's ideas were formed in an atmosphere of opposition to the earlier philosophical position of Thomas Aquinas. Scotus felt that faith was a matter of the will rather than a process based on logical proofs. Even though he relied on some arguments for the existence of God, he taught that the most basic Christian truths such as the resurrection and immortality must be accepted by faith. Emphasizing the love of God, he used this characteristic to explain creation, grace, the incarnation, and heaven. His ideas have influenced later Franciscan thought, and his views about the immaculate conception have contributed to Catholic belief in a more general manner.

Given the title Doctor Subtilis by his admirers, Scotus has been ridiculed by others, including the humanists and the Protestant Reformers. These groups, unsympathetic to scholastic theology, have used his name as an epithet, calling someone whose ideas are obscure a “duns” or dunce. Despite this, individuals as diverse as C. S. Peirce and Gerard Manley Hopkins have regarded his insights as profound. R. G. CLOUSE

Duns Scotus, John

See also SCHOLASTICISM.

Bibliography. E. Bettoni, Duns Scotus: The Basic Principles of His Philosophy; F. Copleston, History of Philosophy; D. C. Langston, God's Willing Knowledge: The Influence of Scotus' Analysis of Omniscience; A. Maurer, Medieval Philosophy; J. K. Ryan and B. Bonansea, eds., Studies in Philosophy and the History of Philosophy; J. Weinberg, Short History of Medieval Philosophy; A. B. Wolter, Philosophical Theology of John Duns Scotus.

Duty. What is morally necessary or required; what one is morally obliged to do as distinct from what one is merely pleased or inclined to do. Duties are reasons for action. As reasons for action duties do not function like causes. One could have a duty to act in a certain way without either acting in that way or even being inclined to so act.

Generally when people speak of duties, they think in terms of deontological ethics. According to deontological ethics one ought to give primary focus to rules and principles in making moral decisions. From the deontological viewpoint the consequences of one's actions are relatively unimportant. For example, the Stoics believed that people had duties to virtue and reasonable action quite apart from any calculation or expectation of human happiness.

The most outstanding representative of the deontological approach was Immanuel Kant. According to Kant, we should not seek to acquire happiness but to be worthy of it through developing a good will, a will that acts only on the basis of duty. One's duties are defined by the basic moral law, which he called the “categorical imperative.” This basic principle is categorical because it applies to every person at every time and is unresponsive to particular prudential goals. According to one version of the categorical imperative, I should always act in such a way that I could will that the rule of my action should become a universal law. The point is not that I should legislate my rules for others, but that I should not treat myself as a special case. Whatever rules I adopt for myself, I have to be able to legislate for others. The categorical imperative is like the Golden Rule except for two qualifications. First, Kant explicitly included duties to ourselves in the categorical imperative. Second, Kant explicitly denied any moral concern for the results of our actions, whereas a person following the Golden Rule may consider results to be morally relevant.

An alternative to the deontological approach is teleological ethics—focusing primarily on the results or consequences of our actions. Moral principles become for teleologists important practical rules of thumb for acquiring valued results. The critical thing is to discover what results are the most valuable. Some seek personal happiness; others seek the greatest total happiness for a group of people; still others seek the advancement of the kingdom of God, reconciliation, the glorification of God, or the growth of love relationships. Teleologists argue that fulfilling one of these goals is our highest duty and that our commitment to any rule should depend on the effectiveness of the rule to help us achieve our highest goal. Critics argue that teleologists merely seek to justify their means by the ends they desire.

A third approach to ethics might be called the ontological approach, arguing that we have certain duties to obey rules and other duties to achieve goals because of the kinds of beings we are. Moral duties can be seen as derived from laws of nature—laws that we can discover within our own selves or in our relationships to God or the world.

However one sees his duties, whether in terms of principles or goals or nature, conflicting duties are possible. Ethics must include methods for resolving these conflicts. Also, there are duties that apply to all humanity as well as duties that apply to particular roles such as father or husband. Not everyone's duties need to be exactly the same.

It is not obvious that all our duties are contained within an ethical system. Kierkegaard argued that our duty to God involved a “teleological suspension of the ethical.” Regardless of the system of ethics that I have, I must be responsive to God's voice to do what may even seem to be unethical. Others have argued that God's way is best discerned through a system of deontological, teleological, or ontological ethics. That is, God's will is most effectively understood within a set of principles, the selection of the best goals, or the working of our best self-understanding.

To talk about duties or laws seems to imply that we have a duty or law to someone. Ethics seems to be pointless without responsibility to another being. Certainly we have duties to ourselves and duties to other humans, but the seriousness of ethical responsibility (e.g., our inability to merely negotiate ethical duty into nonexistence) may suggest an ongoing duty to Someone greater than ourselves. Kant argued that in order to understand the role of ethical duty, it is necessary to believe in the existence of a Supreme Judge who observes our actions in every circumstance. In addition, Kant believed that ethics necessarily include a belief in immortality so that beyond this life we are able to receive the rewards for our actions.

While our understanding of our duties may vary from person to person and from culture to culture, many have sought for and found duties that are broadly shared among people of many cultures. Discovering such a common core of duties, C. S. Lewis took this as evidence for a common Lawgiver to whom all humans are responsible. Moreover, Lewis argued that our professed moral beliefs make sense only if we believe that all our moral actions make a difference even if no other human is watching. The actual use of our concept of duty seems to require the existence of someone to whom we have these duties.

Ludwig Wittgenstein and some of his followers have argued that the essence of a religious commitment is a commitment to a set of moral duties. While moral duties certainly seem central, it is doubtful that this interpretation of religious commitment can account for either the importance of historic events for the Christian religion or the personal relationship with God.

P. DE VRIES

See also ETHICAL SYSTEMS, CHRISTIAN; ETHICS, BIBLICAL; SITUATION ETHICS.

Bibliography. Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics; W. Frankena, Ethics; I. Kant, Critique of Practical Reason; Foundations of the Metaphysics of Morals; S. Kierkegaard, Fear and Trembling; J. S. Mill, Utilitarianism; Plato, Republic.

Dwight, Timothy (1752–1817). Congregational minister, author, and educator, born in Northampton, Massachusetts, and educated at Yale. After graduation Dwight taught school and then became a clergyman and a chaplain in the Continental Army. Later he accepted the pastorate of the Congregational church at Greenfield Hill, Connecticut, serving from 1783 to 1795. During these years he rose to prominence because of his role in founding educational institutions, his activities as an author, and the leadership that he gave to the Congregational cause in Connecticut. In 1795 he was chosen president of Yale, a post that he held for the remainder of his life. Not only was he a successful administrator, broadening the curriculum to include scientific and medical training, but he also taught rhetoric, logic, metaphysics, ethics, and theology. He became the champion of the conservative Calvinists in New England. This led him to encourage a religious revival and to foster an antidemocratic federalism. Despite opponents who called him “Pope Dwight,” his supporters who looked on him as a second St. Paul seemed to win the victory with the advent of the Second Great Awakening.

Dwight’s literary works include Conquest of Canaan (1785) and Greenfield Hill (1794). He also left a multivolume record of Travels in New England and New York and a series of sermons that had been repeated over a regular four-year cycle at Yale and were published under the title Theology Explained and Defended (5 vols. 1818–19). Much of what he said and wrote during his years as president of Yale was meant to stem the tide of infidelity that he identified with the Enlightenment. Despite such efforts he was himself affected by the eighteenth-century rationalist movement and has been credited with furthering the Scottish philosophy in America. R. G. CLOUSE

See also GREAT AWAKENINGS; NEW ENGLAND THEOLOGY; SCOTTISH REALISM.

Bibliography. S. E. Berk, Calvinism versus Democracy: Timothy Dwight and the Origins of Evangelical Orthodoxy; C. C. Cunningham, Timothy Dwight, 1752–1817, a Biography; J. Haroutunian, Piety versus Moralism: The Passing of the New England Theology; K. Silverman, Timothy Dwight; A. S. Wenzke, Timothy Dwight.

Ee

Earth, Age of. The earth's age is of theological importance for two reasons. First, the Bible speaks about the past; second, evolutionary views of origins require an age amounting to billions of years.

Genesis has been used to estimate the age of the earth. Archbishop James Ussher suggested that the earth was created in 4004 B.C. Others, such as John Lightfoot, have gone so far as to fix the date and hour of the first day of creation. Such estimates require assumptions: the data are complete and accurate; the days of Genesis 1 were brief and consecutive; and the events described in Genesis 1 began soon after the formation of the earth.

Bible genealogies cannot legitimately be used to construct chronologies. Comparison shows names omitted (e.g., cf. 1 Chron. 3:10–12; Matt. 1:8).

Controversy surrounds the days of Genesis 1. Opinions range from holding that they were consecutive twenty-four-hour periods to supposing that they were long periods of time, not necessarily consecutive. Reasons for doubting the twenty-four-hour day theory include: the seventh day is still in progress (see John 5:10–19; Heb. 4:1–11); the sixth day, described in detail in Genesis 2, contained more events than could have happened in a twenty-four-hour period. Proponents of the last view claim that the Hebrew word usually translated as “now” in Genesis 2:23 actually indicates “at last” or “at length.”

If the days of Genesis 1 actually were long periods of time, it still appears impossible to reconcile the sequence of the events listed there with current evolutionary theory. Birds, appearing on the fifth day, could not have been descendants of reptiles appearing on the sixth day, and if the sea creatures of day five included any mammals, they could not have had land mammals from the sixth day as ancestors.

The Scofield Reference Bible (1907) popularized the concept that there is a gap of time between Genesis 1:1 and 1:2, citing Isaiah 24:1; 45:18; Jeremiah 4:23–26. This gap theory is not accepted by most Bible scholars, however, because they hold it to be inconsistent with the original language and doubt that Satan had the power to destroy God's original creation.

The earth's age, then, cannot be deduced unequivocally from biblical evidence. Most scientists, including some who hold to the verbal inspiration of the Bible, believe that the dates proposed by various kinds of geological evidence are approximately correct and that the earth is five billion years old or older. Others, questioning the conclusions of radioactive dating and historical geology, are convinced that the earth is only a few thousand years old. It seems, as Hebrews 11:3 says, that we can fully comprehend God's creative acts only by faith. M. LA BAR

See also GAP THEORY.

Bibliography. J. Block, “Origins and the Bible,” JASA 29:64–67; J. O. Buswell III, “Warfield and Creationist Anthropology,” JASA 18:117–20; U. Cassuto, Commentary on the Book of Genesis; D. J. Krause, “Apparent Age and Its Reception in the 19th Century,” JASA 32:146–50; H. M. Morris, Genesis Record; R. C. Newman and H. J. Eckelmann Jr., eds., Genesis One and the Origin of the Earth; P. H. Seeley, “Antiquity of Warfield's Paper on the Antiquity of Man,” JASA 18:28–30; J. C. Whitcomb Jr., Early Earth; J. C. Whitcomb Jr. and H. M. Morris, Genesis Flood; D. A. Young, Christianity and the Age of the Earth; Creation and the Flood.

Earth, New. See NEW HEAVENS AND NEW EARTH.

Easter. The annual day and season commemorating the resurrection of Christ. As the oldest and most important movable feast, its date determines the arrangement of the Christian liturgical year.

In Germanic languages the words used (Eng. easter; Ger. ostern) are thought to derive either from the name of an obscure Germanic goddess of spring, Eastre (a view popularized by the English monk Bede), or more likely, from an old German root for dawn or east (the time and place of the rising sun). At an early date and for obscure reasons, these Germanic words came to translate the Greek pascha (from the Heb. pesah), the biblical word for the Paschal (Passover) feast used by most of the Romance languages (Fr. pâques; Ital. pasqua).

The early development of the celebration of Easter and the attendant calendar disputes were largely a result of Christianity's attempt to emancipate itself from Judaism. Sunday had already replaced the Jewish sabbath early in the second century, and despite efforts in Asia Minor to maintain the Jewish Passover date of Nisan 14 for Easter (hence the name Quartodecimans), the Council of Nicea adopted the annual Sunday following the full moon after the vernal equinox (March 21). Unfortunately, different methods of Easter reckoning devised to reconcile the Jewish lunar and Roman solar calendars led to several disputes, such as the one in seventh-century Britain between Celtic and Roman Christianity. Even the notable calendar reform sponsored by Pope Gregory XIII in 1582 was primarily an attempt to keep Easter in the spring by correcting the drift (eleven days at the point) of the less accurate Julian calendar. Since Eastern Orthodoxy still follows the old calendar, it can be as much as five weeks at variance with the other churches in celebrating Easter. In recent years concern for Christian unity has led to proposals for a universal fixed date such as the second Sunday in April. This in turn would make possible the creation of a uniform world liturgy.

Originally Easter was a unitary night celebration (like Passover) recalling both the death and resurrection of Christ. The ceremony included the lighting of the paschal candle, prayer, readings from Scripture, and the joyful celebration of the Eucharist. This also became the ideal occasion for baptisms (with resurrection life symbolized by white robes) and led in turn to the lengthening of the brief preparatory period into the forty days of Lent (paralleling Christ's forty-day fast before his passion). Accordingly, after the fourth century the unitary feast was broken up into several parts and the resurrection came to be celebrated separately on Easter Sunday morning, with Eastertide extending another forty or fifty days. Over the centuries many popular customs have been added reflecting pagan spring folklore (Easter egg and rabbit) as well as Jewish and Christian sources.

R. K. BISHOP

See also CHRISTIAN YEAR; PASCHAL CONTROVERSIES.

Bibliography. L. Cowie and J. Gummer, Christian Year; J. G. Davies, Holy Week; G. Dix, Shape of the Liturgy; D. Jones, G. Wainwright, and E. Yarnold, Study of the Liturgy; T. J. Talley, Origins of the Liturgical Year; F. X. Weiser, Easter Book; Handbook of Christian Feasts and Customs; E. Zerubavel, "Easter and Passover: On Calendars and Group Identity," ASR (April, 1982).

Ebeling, Gerhard (b. 1912). German Lutheran theologian. He studied at Marburg under Bultmann, at Zürich under Brunner, and at Berlin. In 1936 he joined Bonhöffer at the theological seminary of Finkenwald and had a curate in the Confessing Church in Berlin. Having received his doctorate (1938), he served as pastor until 1946 when he was made professor of church history in Tübingen. In 1954 he moved to the department of systematic theology (1954–56; 1965–68). The University of Zürich appointed him professor of dogmatics, history of dogma, and symbolics (1956–65) and later of fundamental theology and hermeneutics (1968–79). He served as editor for Zeitschrift für Theologie und Kirche and the works of Luther and Schleiermacher. He founded the Institute of Hermeneutics at Zürich (1962) and was made professor emeritus in 1979.

Ebeling's theology begins by engaging with historical theology and the formative influence of Luther, Schleiermacher, Hermann, and Bultmann. He regards himself as a Lutheran but finds the character of confessional Lutheranism problematic and reinterprets it by existentialism.

The correlation of God, the word, humanity, faith, and the world, is central to his theology. This correlation is grounded in the notion that human existence is unavoidably conditioned by historical relevance (Geschichtlichkeit) and that reality is largely the product of language. Therefore, theology must begin with faith but one that does not have an object, but rather, one that has its source Christ's faith in God that his death on the cross was not in vain.

The crucial transition from objective history (Historie) to experiential history (Geschichte) takes place through one's participation in the existential attitude of Jesus. In this way the event of the cross is correlated with the word of the cross. Moreover, here the knowledge of God and humanity are correlated. Christ as the principle of authentic existence unites God and humanity and since God and humanity are known only in relation to each other, Jesus' faith is a source of the knowledge of God.

For Ebeling, faith requires one to discover the "inauthenticity" (Nichtsein) of our present existence. When one recovers Jesus' attitude, one may relate one's experience of human inauthenticity to the encounter with reality. This is what it is to know God, the encountering reality, in a genuinely personal way. One encounters this reality in the context of the church's proclamation and interpretation of the Word.

Evangelicals can appreciate Ebeling's emphasis on the importance of the historical fact of Christ for Christianity, the significance of hermeneutics, and his attempt to formulate the Christian faith in holistic and contemporary terms. Because of his heavy debt to existentialism, however, his language is sometimes ambiguous and paradoxical and thus confusing.

More troubling is his confusion of necessary and real distinctions between God, the Word, man, faith, and the world; his nonethical view of sin; his failure to spell out the moral and world-transforming implications of Christian faith; his view of Scripture varies sharply from evangelicalism. In the end, for advocates of historic Christianity, he does not offer a way forward beyond the modern impasse. S. REHNMAN

See also EXISTENTIALISM; HISTORIE, GESCHICHK; BULTMANN, RUDOLF.

Bibliography. G. Ebeling, God and Word; Introduction to a Theological Theory of Language; Luther: An Introduction to His Thought; Nature of Faith; Study of Theology; Word and Faith; J. B. Ackley, Church of the Word: A Comparative Study of Word, Church and Office in the Thought of Karl Rahner and Gerhard Ebeling; D. W. Hardy, "Gerhard Ebeling," ExpT 93:68-72; H. Krabben-dam, "New Hermeneutic" in Hermeneutics, Inerrancy, and the Bible, E. D. Radmacher and R. D. Preus, eds.; A. E. McGrath, Making of Modern German Christology 1750-1990; J. M. Robinson, New Hermeneutic; S. P. Schilling, Contemporary Continental Theologians; J. C. Staten, Conscience and the Reality of God: An Essay on the Experiential Foundations of Religious Knowledge; C. Van Til, New Hermeneutic.

Ebionites. Ascetics who chose poverty as a way of life and who may have drawn their name from this term for poor men ('ebyōnīm). Four Scripture verses seem central to the Ebionites. Matthew 5:3 mentions the poor in spirit; Luke 4:18 and 7:22 speak of the poor. Deuteronomy 18:15 was as central to their theology as the other references were to their chosen lifestyle. They accepted Jesus of Nazareth as the "prophet like me from among your own brothers." This meant that the Ebionites were to be classed among the various early Christian sects. On the whole they rejected the Pauline Epistles, clinging instead to aspects of the Jewish law; therefore, they are to be numbered among the Jewish Christian sects.

Origen knew of two groups of Ebionites, those who accepted the virgin birth and those who saw Jesus as a prophet fathered by Joseph; he states they observed Easter with the Jews. Eusebius adds that the Ebionites who did accept the virgin birth still rejected the preexistence of Christ, and he associated the Gospel of Hebrews with them. Epiphanius was the first of the church fathers to say that they originated after the destruction of the temple in A.D. 70 among the Christians who fled to Pella. Epiphanius credits their founding to Ebion, who, he says, moved to Kochaba near Karnaim and came out of a Jewish Christian group called Nazarenes. Jerome adds that they practiced circumcision and lived by the law but looked forward to the return of Christ and the millennium. Ebionites therefore seem to be a continuing reflection in the early church of the Judaizers seen in Acts and the Epistles as opponents of Paul. They came into relative prominence after A.D. 70 and waned after the fourth century.

In addition to accepting Jesus as the prophetic successor to Moses (whether virgin born or born of Joseph) and practicing asceticism, particularly poverty, Ebionites tended to deny the preexistence of the Logos, venerate Jerusalem, see Christianity as obedience to a moral code that was higher than or fulfilled the law, see Jesus as made the Anointed One at his baptism, teach that Jesus was so selected because he kept the law perfectly, stress the Epistle of James, and reject Pauline soteriology. Some may have tended toward a Gnostic dualism. Many were vegetarians and practiced various ritual ablutions culminating in baptism. Modern scholars feel Ebionites are probably responsible for portions of the Clementine Homilies and Recognitions and the Gospel of the Ebionites; but Klijn and Reinink have made a good case for disassociating them from the Gospel of the Hebrews. V. L. WALTER

See also JUDAIZERS.

Bibliography. W. Beveridge, HERE 5:139-45; A. F. J. Klijn and G. J. Reinink, Patristic Evidence for Jewish-Christian Sects; A. Neander, Christian Church; J. L. Neve, History of Christian Thought; P. Schaff, Christian Church; H. J. Schoeps, Jewish Christianity.

Ecclesia. See CHURCH.

Eck, Johann (1486-1543). Born Johann Maier at Eck (or Egg) in Swabia, Eck is little remembered except as an opponent of Luther. After studying at Heidelberg, Tübingen, and Freiburg, in 1510 he achieved a doctorate in theology and joined the faculty at Ingolstadt, later becoming prochancellor. He made a reputation as a humanist and attracted attention with his defense of a modest rate of interest (1514). At first friendly with Luther, he replied to the Ninety-five Theses with the tract Obelisks (1518), to which Luther responded with Asterisk. Speaking for the papacy at the Leipzig disputation (1519), Eck displayed a fine memory, sound learning, and a tactical mastery of debate that confused Carlstadt and forced Luther to admit some solidarity with Hus and to set infallible Scripture above fallible popes, councils, and fathers. Eck followed up his campaign by helping to secure Luther's condemnation in the bull Exsurge Domine (1520) and defending papal authority in the treatise On the Primacy of Peter (1521). He then composed a frequently republished work (1525), Manual of Commonplaces against Luther and the Other Enemies of the Church (Melanchthon and Zwingli). At the diet of Augsburg (1530) he presented 404 propositions against Luther and wrote a Confutation of the Confession. To counteract Luther's Bible he attempted his own version (1537) but with little success. His presence at Worms (1521), Hagenau (1540), and Regensburg (1541) did nothing to promote the desired restoration of unity. While perhaps surpassing Luther in pure scholarship, Eck hardly compares with him in theological perception. Justly, then, he is remembered largely for his negative function.

G. W. BROMILEY

See also LEIPZIG DISPUTATION; LUTHER, MARTIN.

Bibliography. T. Wiedemann, Dr. Johann Eck.

Eckhart, Meister. See MEISTER ECKHART.

Ecology. See NATURE, THEOLOGY OF.

Ecumenical Councils. Councils that originated from the link between the Christian church and Roman state during the fourth century. Originally summoned by emperors to promote unity, the early councils were intended to represent the whole church. Through the centuries the Roman Catholic canon law came to stipulate that an ecumenical council must be convened by the pope and be duly representative of the dioceses of the Roman Church (although decision making was subordinated to papal confirmation). Because of this switch in policy and representation, Christians have disagreed on which councils were "ecumenical." While the Roman Catholic Church accepts twenty-one, the Coptic, Syrian, and Armenian churches accept only the first three in the Roman Catholic list. Most Protestant groups and the Eastern Orthodox Church accept the first seven. To the Roman Catholic Church the ecumenical or universal council binds the whole church, while a particular council binds only one part of the church.

The first eight councils that were called by emperors and had a representation of both Eastern and Western bishops were the councils of Nicea I (325); Constantinople I (381); Ephesus (431); Chalcedon (451); Constantinople II (553); Constantinople III (680–81); Nicea II (787); and Constantinople IV (869–70).

With the First Lateran Council (1123) the papacy initiated and assumed control, continuing this policy with Lateran II (1139); Lateran III (1179); Lateran IV (1215); Lyon I (1245); Lyon II (1274); and Vienne (1311–12). During the conciliar movement, when the papacy had reached a low ebb, the Council of Constance (1414–18) and the Council of Basel (called 1431, transferred to Ferrara in 1438 and Florence in 1439) were convened. During the sixteenth century the Fifth Lateran Council (1512–17) and the Council of Trent (1545–63) were called to meet challenges to the Roman Church. In the modern period the papacy has convened two councils nearly a century apart—Vatican I (1869–70) and Vatican II (1962–65).

D. A. RAUSCH

See also CHALCEDON, COUNCIL OF; CONSTANTINOPLE, FIRST COUNCIL OF; CONSTANTINOPLE, SECOND COUNCIL OF; CONSTANTINOPLE, THIRD COUNCIL OF; COUNCILS, CHURCH; EPHESUS, COUNCIL OF; NICEA, COUNCIL OF; TRENT, COUNCIL OF; VATICAN COUNCIL I; VATICAN COUNCIL II.

Ecumenism. The organized attempt to bring about the cooperation and unity of all believers in Christ. The word "ecumenical" comes from the Greek oikoumenē, "the entire inhabited earth," or "world" (Matt. 24:14; Acts 17:6; Heb. 2:5).

Early Ecumenism. The theological basis for Christian unity is rooted in the NT. Jesus prayed that his followers "may be one, Father, just as you are in me and I am in you. May they also be in us so that the world may believe that you have sent me" (John 17:21). Likewise, Paul urged the Ephesians to "keep the unity of the Spirit through the bond of peace" because "there is one body and one Spirit. . . . one Lord, one faith, one baptism" (Eph. 4:3–5). Throughout his ministry the apostle worked to maintain the unity of the church in the face of theological deviation (Galatians and Colossians) and internal division (1 and 2 Corinthians).

In the postapostolic church the early fathers tried to maintain this unity despite the distances that separated congregations and the different cultures in which they were located. In his discussion of the regula fidei, Irenaeus claimed that the church, "although scattered throughout the whole world, yet, as if occupying but one house, carefully preserved [the faith]. . . . For, although the languages of the world are dissimilar, yet the import of the tradition is one and the same." Early Christians considered themselves united by their allegiance to the apostolic gospel as expressed in the apostolic canon and preserved by the apostolic clergy. When heresies and doctrinal disagreements threatened to destroy this catholic (universal) unity, church leaders met in ecumenical councils to settle disputes. This early ideal was clearly articulated in the Nicene Creed (325): we believe in the "one, holy, catholic, and apostolic Church."

Despite such attempts to maintain ecclesiastical unity, there arose numerous divisions over matters of faith and practice. The early ecumenical councils often failed to prevent schism and heresy. For a variety of reasons, Eastern and Western churches excommunicated each other in 1054, driving a wedge down the center of Christendom. The Western church was split by the Protestant Reformation of the sixteenth century, which in turn opened the door to a rapid and extensive proliferation of denominations and sects.

Ecumenism

Many Christians have not been satisfied with this state of affairs and have worked to at least restore some measure of cooperation between the various churches, if not bring about a more visible unity. For example, in the early nineteenth century, American Christians from a variety of Protestant denominations cooperated in the establishment of numerous evangelistic, missionary, benevolent, tract, and Bible societies. In 1846 individuals from over fifty British and American denominations formed the Evangelical Alliance to promote religious liberty and various cooperative evangelistic and educational activities. In 1908 thirty-one American Protestant denominations formed the Federal Council of Churches, which was absorbed by the larger National Council of Churches of Christ in 1950.

The Modern Ecumenical Movement. This began in Edinburgh in 1910 at the International Missionary Conference. Under the leadership of American Methodist John R. Mott, the thousand delegates who attended caught the vision for Christian unity. As a result, three organizations were established to continue the work and realize the promise of the Edinburgh Conference. The International Missionary Council (Lake Mohonk, New York, 1921) attempted to bring about cooperation between Protestant mission agencies; the Conference on Life and Work (Stockholm, 1925) sought to unify efforts to solve social, economic, and political problems; and the Conference on Faith and Order (Lausanne, 1927) addressed the theological basis of church unity. By 1937 the conferences on Life and Work and Faith and Order agreed that a new, more inclusive organization was needed and proposed the establishment of a World Council of Churches (WCC). The coming of World War II prevented speedy implementation of the proposal, but finally in 1948, 351 delegates representing 147 denominations from 44 countries gathered in Amsterdam and formed the World Council, under the leadership of W. A. Visser't Hooft. Later General Assemblies of the WCC were held at Evanston, Illinois (1954), New Delhi, India (1961), Uppsala, Sweden (1968), Nairobi, Kenya (1975), and Vancouver, British Columbia (1983). At the New Delhi assembly the Russian Orthodox Church joined the Council, the International Missionary Council was brought under WCC control, and the confessional "Basis" was adopted: "The World Council of Churches is a fellowship of Churches which confess the Lord Jesus Christ as God and Savior according to the Scriptures and therefore seek to fulfil together their common calling to the glory of one God, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit."

Conspicuously absent from most of these ecumenical endeavors has been the Roman Catholic Church. For decades disagreements over the primacy of the Roman pontiff, the meaning and practice of the Eucharist, and the like have kept Roman Catholics and Protestant ecumenists far apart. In the Second Vatican Council, Pope John XXIII opened the door to greater ecumenical dialogue. In the council's Decree on Ecumenism (1964), Rome maintained its traditional insistence that "only through the Catholic Church of Christ, the universal aid to salvation, can the means of salvation be reached in all their fullness." But for the first time it was willing to recognize that there were authentic Christians ("separated brethren") outside the Roman fold. The Eastern churches, for example, are not far from Rome in their doctrine, church order, and liturgy. The Anglican Communion has also retained much of Catholic tradition, while other churches, though more seriously defective, nevertheless have preserved some important elements of Catholic truth. The decree declared the hope that on the basis of the Christian rite of initiation, all "brothers by baptism" may work to achieve the fully integrated unity that the Roman Church already possesses.

As a reflection of this new spirit, in December 1965 the Roman pope and the patriarch of Constantinople mutually lifted the excommunication that had divided the Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox churches since 1954. Furthermore, a number of ecumenical contacts have occurred under the auspices of the Vatican's Secretariat for the Promotion of Christian Unity.

Evangelicals and Ecumenism. The conservative evangelicals are the last group to remain outside the ecumenical movement. Almost from the beginning of modern ecumenism, evangelicals have questioned the attempt to unify the churches on the "federation" model. They cite, for example, the rather nebulous doctrinal basis of the WCC and its seemingly weak commitment to evangelism. Furthermore, in more recent times most evangelicals object to what they consider to be the WCC's political support of Third World leftist movements.

This reticence to become actively involved in the ecumenical movement does not necessarily mean that evangelicals are against all collective action. Since the evangelical awakenings of the eighteenth century, evangelicals have cooperated in evangelism and foreign missions. In the 1940s American evangelicals founded two cooperative organizations, the National Association of Evangelicals (NAE) and the American Council of Christian Churches (ACCC). Both groups were historically orthodox in doctrine, though they differed in their approach to "separation." The NAE accepted into membership any group or individual that was broadly evangelical, while the ACCC demanded adherence to a much narrower doctrinal statement and rejected anyone who had any dealings with the WCC or the National Council of Churches. Both organizations clearly were more interested in fostering evangelism and mutual support than in bringing about union on the federation model.

On the international scene evangelicals have worked to encourage united efforts on a number of fronts. In 1951 the World Evangelical Fellowship (WEF) was organized. Membership in the WEF is open to national evangelical fellowships that subscribe to an orthodox statement of faith. The WEF assists in theological education around the world, undertakes humanitarian relief, and promotes Bible and evangelistic ministries.

On the whole, however, evangelicals seem to be most interested in promoting evangelism. Growing out of the ministry of Billy Graham, the World Congress on Evangelism was held in Berlin in 1966, drawing delegates from over a hundred countries. In 1974 over 2,700 participated in the International Congress on World Evangelization in Lausanne, Switzerland. The Lausanne congress marked a new maturity in evangelical unity efforts. It recognized that "the church's visible unity in truth is God's purpose." The unity of the church is a gift of God through the Spirit, made possible through Christ's redemptive work on the cross. This unity, the congress declared, is based on truth (adherence to the historic gospel) and is required by the divine mandate to declare a gospel of reconciliation to all people. How can the church declare a gospel of peace to the world while remaining fragmented and unreconciled itself? As a result of the congress, a forty-eight-member Continuation Committee for World Evangelization was established "to encourage and assist where necessary in the formation of regional and national committees to advance world evangelization in every area."

In summary, then, by the 1990s two models of "ecumenism" were evident among Christians. The federation model of the World Council of Churches tended to downplay the necessity of doctrinal agreement and evangelism while stressing concerted social and political action in Christ's name. The cooperative model of conservative evangelicals sought to restore evangelism to primary place in the church's mission in the hope that more visible kinds of unity would follow.

T. P. WEBER

See also EVANGELISM; LAUSANNE COVENANT; MOTT, JOHN RALEIGH.

Bibliography. G. K. A. Bell, ed., Documents on Christian Unity; R. M. Brown, Ecumenical Revolution; J. D. Douglas, ed., Evangelicals and Unity; Let the Earth Hear His Voice; H. Fey, ed., Ecumenical Advance, 1948–1968; W. H. Fuller, People of the Mandate: The Story of the World Evangelical Fellowship; D. Gillies, Revolt from the Church; N. Goodall, Ecumenical Movement; Ecumenical Progress: A Decade of Change in the Ecumenical Movement, 1961–1971; B. Leeming, Vatican Council and Christian Unity; J. D. Murch, Cooperation without Compromise: A History of the National Association of Evangelicals; R. Rouse and S. C. Neill, eds., History of the Ecumenical Movement, 1517–1948; A. J. van der Bent, Major Studies and Themes in the Ecumenical Movement; L. Vischer, ed., Documentary History of the Faith and Order Movement 1927–1963.

Eddy, Mary Baker (1821–1910). Founder of the Church of Christ, Scientist, and author of its famous textbook, Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures. Born Mary Morse Baker, she was reared in a devout Congregationalist home but later rejected her parents' strict Calvinism. Although her formal education was limited due to chronic ill health, she studied such subjects as natural science, moral philosophy, logic, Greek, and Hebrew under the tutelage of her brother, a Dartmouth graduate. In 1843 she married George W. Glover, who died before the birth of their first child. Her second marriage, to David Patterson (1853), ended in divorce. In 1877 at age fifty-six she married one of her first Christian Science students, Asa Gilbert Eddy.

Suffering poor health throughout most of her life, Mary was preoccupied with questions of health. In search of healing she submitted herself to the metaphysical teachings of Phineas P. Quimby and was healed. Suffering a serious fall in 1866, she was healed by reading the Bible and practicing metaphysical principles. She regarded that incident as the discovery of Christian Science. Her metaphysical system gradually evolved and was published as Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures in 1875. Although her followers consider this work as divinely inspired, her critics contend that it is deeply indebted to the works of Francis Lieber and Quimby. The following year she founded the Christian Scientist Association, which three years later became the Church of Christ, Scientist.

Eddy's theological position has little in common with historic orthodox Christianity. It is entirely built upon a metaphysical base. She uses the theological vocabulary of traditional Christianity but substitutes metaphysical meanings for the terms. For her, God is "All-in-All"; he is mind; he is the divine principle of all existence, not a person. As the only cause of existence, God is reality and nothing apart from him can be real. Since God is Spirit and is All, matter cannot exist. Since all reality is divine and God is good, all reality is good. There cannot exist evil, sin, sickness, or death. Imperfections of every sort are illusory and unreal—delusions of the carnal mind.

The Trinity is defined by Eddy as the principles of life, truth, and love. The historic view of three persons in one Godhead is labeled heathen. Christ is not considered a person but rather the true idea of God, and his death or resurrection could not have occurred since evil and sin have no existence.

Eddy's major writings include People's Idea of God (1866); her autobiography, Retrospection and Introspection (1891); Unity of Good (1891); Manual of the Mother Church (1895); and Miscellaneous Writings (1896).

P. G. CHAPPELL

See also CHURCH OF CHRIST, SCIENTIST.

Bibliography. M. F. Bednarowski, "Outside the Mainstream: Women's Religion and Women Religious Leaders," JAAR 48:207–31; W. Martin, Christian Science Myth; D. Meyer, Positive Thinkers: A Study of the American Quest for Health, Wealth and Personal Power from Mary Baker Eddy to Norman Vincent Peale and Ronald Reagan; R. Peel, Mary Baker Eddy; E. M. Ramsey, Christian Science and Its Discoverer; J. Silberger Jr., Mary Baker Eddy; C. Smith, Historical Sketches from the Life of Mary Baker Eddy; S. Wilbur, Life of Mary Baker Eddy.

Edwards, Jonathan (1703–1758). Massachusetts Congregational minister who produced one of the most thorough and compelling bodies of theological writing in the history of America. Edwards, the son of a Congregational minister, entered the ministry in 1726 after earning a bachelor's degree at Yale, further independent study, and brief service as a tutor at Yale and in the Presbyterian Church of New York City. His first charge was Northampton, Massachusetts, where he served until dismissed in 1750 after a controversy with his congregation over standards for church admission. He then labored in frontier Stockbridge, Massachusetts, as minister to congregations of Indians and whites. His death from inoculation for smallpox came on March 22, 1758, only a few weeks after he began his work as president of the College of New Jersey (later Princeton University).

Edwards is regarded as America's greatest evangelical theologian, and perhaps the greatest of any variety, based on the depth and breadth of his writing and his importance for both practical and theoretical religion. He was the theologian of the First Great Awakening and was every bit as important in explicating that movement as George Whitefield had been in promoting it. He was also the eighteenth century's most powerful exponent of experimental Calvinism. In between his active labors as a pastor and his more popular preaching and writing, he found time to compose works of rarified theological construction that challenge scholars to this day. The ongoing publication of a definitive edition of Edwards's works by Yale University Press makes clear how large his contributions were, not only in several divisions of theology defined more narrowly, but also in metaphysics, ethics, and psychology.

Theology. Edwards is most often studied for his Augustinian description of human sinfulness and divine all-sufficiency. In such early sermons as "God Glorified in Man's Dependence" (1731), "Divine and Supernatural Light" (1733), and "Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God" (1741), he anticipated in a popular way the themes that would inform his later theological treatises. The root of human sinfulness was antagonism toward God; God was justified in condemning sinners who scorned the work of Christ on their behalf; conversion meant a radical change of the heart; true Christianity involved not just an understanding of God and the facts of Scripture but a new "sense" of divine beauty, holiness, and truth.

Edwards eventually summarized many of these insights in 1754 when he published Careful and Strict Inquiry into the Modern Prevailing Notions of That Freedom of Will, Which Is Supposed to be Essential to Moral Agency, Virtue and Vice, Reward and Punishment, Praise and Blame. In this commanding treatise Edwards argued that the "will" was not an independent faculty but an expression of more basic human motivation. To "will" something was to act in accordance with the strongest motives prevailing within a person. Edwards was here arguing in traditional Augustinian and Calvinistic fashion that human action is always consistent with human character. But he bent his dialectic skill especially to show that modern versions of "free will" served merely to obviate human responsibility and reduce analysis of human choice to a nonsensical infinite regression.

Uppermost in Edwards's mind were the implications for conversion that this view of human nature entailed. It meant that a sinner by nature would never choose to glorify God unless God himself changed that person's character or—as Edwards phrased it—implanted a new "sense of the heart" to love and serve God. Regeneration, God's act, was the basis for repentance and conversion, the human actions.

In a posthumously published volume, Original Sin (1758), Edwards defended the view of human nature that underlay the argument in Freedom of Will. This volume contended that all humanity was present in Adam at the fall and that all people, as a consequence, shared the bent toward sinning that Adam had brought upon himself. Edwards felt that he could show in this way how individuals were responsible for their own sinfulness and yet also were bound to the dictates of a fallen nature until converted by God's sovereign grace. Edwards's willingness to postulate a nearly Platonic connection between Adam and the rest of humanity also provided a glimpse of the recondite philosophical reasoning with which he had been filling his private notebooks for years.

As a result of his Calvinistic convictions as well as his experiences in the Great Awakening, Edwards also propounded important ideas on the church and on eschatology. To Edwards the church was the bride of Christ, which, as such, should be made up only of the professedly regenerate. While in the last analysis God must be the judge of the heart, the church on earth had the responsibility to preserve its character, and especially its administration of the Lord's Supper, as purely as possible. It was this conviction that drove Edwards to repudiate the belief of his grandfather, Solomon Stoddard, that the Lord's Supper should be thrown open to all nonscandalous people in a community, even those without a profession of faith. And it was this conviction that ultimately cost Edwards his pulpit in Northampton.

Encouraged by the early successes of the Great Awakening, Edwards countenanced the idea that the millennial dawn was about to break in New England. A series of sermons, published eventually in 1744 as History of the Work of Redemption, expressed his fondest hopes for the beginning of the realized kingdom as a result of the Holy Spirit's work in the awakening. Later, as revival fires cooled, Edwards universalized his hopes for the eschaton and planned to write a full account of God's activity in world history. Death prevented his completion of that project, but he did complete a related work, Dissertation Concerning the End for Which God Created the World (published 1765), which set out a more general vision of God's glory as the end to which all history moved.

Psychology. Edwards's examination of religious psychology arose directly out of his experiences in the Northampton revivals and later in the colonial Great Awakening as a whole. A letter to Boston's Benjamin Colman in 1736, later published as Narrative of Surprising Conversions, was the first of a series of works examining the nature and expression of awakened religious experience. This work analyzed events occurring during a local revival in Northampton, but soon Edwards published Some Thoughts concerning the Present Revival of Religion in New England (1743) to take account of the wider movement. In particular, he responded to charges by antirevivalists that the revival was all emotion, froth, and disorder. Edwards conceded that the emotionalism of the awakening could undercut authentic Christianity, but he also defended the revival by pointing to the more intense worship and to the permanently changed lives it left in its wake.

Three years later Edwards published his most mature examination of this subject, Treatise on the Religious Affections, a book that has—on justice—been likened in its acuity to William James's Varieties of Religious Experience. This volume argued that true religion resides in the heart, or the seat of affections, emotions, and inclinations. But it also detailed with painstaking scrutiny the kinds of religious emotions that are largely irrelevant to any determination of true spirituality. The book closed with a description of twelve "marks" that indicate the presence of true religion. The first of these was a religious affection arising "from those influences and operations on the heart, which are spiritual, supernatural and divine." The last was the manifestation of true religion—genuinely gracious affections—in Christian practice. Edwards's careful analysis of genuine faith emphasized, in sum, that it was not the quantity of emotions that indicated the presence of true spirituality, but the origin of such emotions with God and their fruit in works that accord with the law of God.

Metaphysics. Edwards's metaphysical speculations also deserve consideration as part of his religious convictions, since they were so intensely theological. They have been largely ignored in the subsequent history of American evangelical theology, but they still represent a compelling effort to view reality in strictly theistic terms. Edwards recorded most of his metaphysical work in notebooks that have begun to be published only in recent years. But these more substantial reflections are consonant with modes of thought present in Freedom of Will and other works published during his life.

In broadest terms Edwards's metaphysical reflections demonstrate the truthfulness of James Ward Smith's contention that Edwards alone of eighteenth- and nineteenth-century American theologians understood the "deeper spirit" as well as the "superficial corpus" of the new science associated with Newton and Locke. Edwards read these two giants with intense interest and considerable pleasure. He also accepted important aspects of their thought, such as Newton's description of the relationship among physical entities (i.e., universal gravitational attraction) and Locke's notions of memory and, with some qualifications, sensation. Yet Edwards was not tied uncritically to these two, and he profited as well from his wide reading in other seventeenth-century philosophers, including the Cambridge Platonist Henry More.

Edwards's most important metaphysical commitment was to idealism. Physical reality and physical laws are not self-explanatory, according to Edwards, but are the result of God's constant and voluntary choices. With this conviction Edwards was still able to accept most of Newtonian science. As he put it: "To find out the reasons of things in natural philosophy is only to find out the proportion of God's acting. And the case is the same . . . whether we suppose the world [is] only mental in our sense, or no." Yet Edwards repudiated the dualism between mind and matter that Newton assumed and that was the heart of Locke's epistemology. Rather, as Edwards phrased it in his notes on "The Mind": "That which truly is the substance of all bodies is the infinitely exact and precise and perfectly stable idea in God's mind, together with his stable will that the same shall gradually be communicated to us, and to other minds, according to certain fixed and exact established methods and laws."

For Edwards this idealism was an outgrowth of his surpassingly high view of God. All reality, not just all religious occurrences, depended upon the harmony, goodness, consistency, and orderliness of God.

Ethics. Most of the major themes of Edwards's theology came together in the ethical interests that dominated the last period of his life. In particular he was concerned to argue against "the new moral philosophy" of the eighteenth-century Enlightenment. This was a tendency, traceable to the Third Earl of Shaftesbury (1671–1713), the Scottish moralist Francis Hutcheson (1694–1746), and to many other ethicists of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, who argued that human beings possessed some natural faculty or sense which, when cultivated properly, could point the way to a truly virtuous life. In response to this broad intellectual tendency, which was the ethical counterpart to the generally ameliorative views of human nature prominent in his century, Edwards reacted strongly by contending that true virtue could not be understood apart from God and his revelation. It was Edwards's argument, especially in the posthumously published Nature of True Virtue (1765), that genuine morality arises only from God's regenerating mercy.

In his ethical deliberations Edwards returned constantly to the contribution of grace to ethical behavior. His dilemma was to show how his well-developed theology of the renewed heart (an Augustinian motif shared by Puritans such as William Ames) differed from the natural sentimentalism of Shaftesbury and Hutcheson. Edwards's goal was to give seventeenth-century conceptions of Puritan piety, which tied true virtue to God's work in the heart, a respectable philosophical defense for his own culture.

Edwards's approach involved three steps. He first acknowledged a limited value in the work of the new moralists. People by nature, because of God's common grace, did possess the capacity to act ethically in a carefully qualified sense. Natural conscience did have a prudential value in regulating conduct; sentiments of symmetry and beauty did provide insights into the nature of human morality, piety and familial affection did help stabilize society, and a natural "moral sense" did reveal some truths about the ethical world.

Second, however, Edwards insisted that the socially useful benefits of natural virtue fell far short of true virtue. For him the unshakable foundation remained the regenerating grace by which God quickened the sinner. In his own words: "Nothing is of the nature of true virtue, in which God is not the first and the last." In sum, Edwards was asserting in ethics what he had previously asserted concerning the inner life in Religious Affections and concerning conversion in Freedom of Will. No truly good thing, speaking strictly, exists that is not always and everywhere dependent upon God.

Third, Edwards also tried to show that the picture of virtue presented by the new moral philosophers was merely a confusing description of prudence, self-seeking, or self-love. In these efforts Edwards was striving to preserve the particularity of grace. By so doing, he hoped to reassert the unique goodness of God as the sole legitimate source of true virtue.

Edwards's thought has been a theological landmark for many subsequent American Christians, but only a very few have seriously tried to maneuver by his coordinates. This lack of successors to continue his theological emphases may be due to the changing conditions of an increasingly democratic America; it may be due to weaknesses in his thought; or it may be due to the incapacity of those who called themselves "Edwardseans." In any event, the theology of Jonathan Edwards remains of great interest both for historians of the eighteenth century and for some modern theologians, especially those who sense a need for a renewed presentation of philosophically sophisticated Calvinistic and Augustinian theology in the modern world.

M. A. NOLL

See also GREAT AWAKENINGS; NEW ENGLAND THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. J. W. Smith and A. L. Jamison, eds.; C. Cherry, Theology of Jonathan Edwards: A Reappraisal; N. Fiering, Jonathan Edwards's Moral Thought and Its British Context; N. O. Hatch and H. S. Stout, eds., Jonathan Edwards and the American Experience; R. W. Jenson, America's Theologian: A Recommendation of Jonathan Edwards; S. H. Lee, Philosophical Theology of Jonathan Edwards; H. P. Simonson, Jonathan Edwards: Theologian of the Heart; J. E. Smith, H. S. Stout, and K. P. Minkema, Jonathan Edwards Reader; J. W. Smith, "Religion and Science in American Philosophy," in Shaping of American Religion, J. W. Smith and A. L. Jamison, eds.

Effectual Calling. In Calvinistic theology, effectual calling refers to the inward work of God that effectively summons particular individuals to receive the blessings of his redemption (Rom. 9:11–26). This unilateral activity is the prerogative of a free, wise, and holy Sovereign (Rom. 9:14–26; 11:33–36) and is grounded solely in both his eternal purpose in Christ (Eph. 1:10–11; 2 Tim. 1:9) and his elective love (Rom. 9:11, 13), and is therefore not subject to any change or frustration (Rom. 11:29). As the initial act of the Holy Spirit in applying redemption to God's elect (Rom. 8:30), this call is in itself invested with an efficacy that unconditionally secures the means and the end of their eternal salvation (Rom. 8:28–30; Eph. 1:4–5). It is therefore not ultimately dependent on any activity of the recipient (Rom. 9:11), but on God's immutable will (Rom. 11:29). Proximately, it is an act of God's grace that ushers God's elect from darkness into light (1 Peter 2:9) and into fellowship with Jesus Christ (1 Cor. 1:9). Ultimately, this lavish display of graciousness (Eph. 1:6–8) is for the praise of God's glory (Rom. 11:36; Eph. 1:6, 12, 14). J. MITCHELL JR.

See also CALL, CALLING; ELECT, ELECTION; FIVE POINTS OF CALVINISM.

Bibliography. L. Berkhof, Systematic Theology; L. Coenen, NIDNTT 1:271–72; J. Murray, Redemption: Accomplished and Applied.

Efficacious Grace. See GRACE.

Egotism. See SELF-ESTEEM, SELF-LOVE.

EI. See GOD, NAMES OF.

Elder. In the Old Testament. The “elders of the people” or “elders of Israel” are frequently associated with Moses in his dealings with the people (Exod. 3:16; 4:29; 17:5; 18:12; 24:1; Num. 11:16). They later administer local government (Josh. 20:4; Judg. 8:14; Ruth 4:2) and have a hand in national affairs (1 Sam. 4:3) even after the institution of the monarchy (1 Sam. 8:4; 30:26; 2 Sam. 3:17; 5:3; 1 Kings 21:8). They achieve fresh prominence during the exile (Jer. 29:1; Ezek. 14:1; 20:1) and after the return are associated both with the governor in his functions (Ezra 5:9–17; 6:7) and with local administration (Ezra 10:14). They have by themselves certain juridical functions (Deut. 22:15; 25:7–9) and are associated with the judges, who are probably appointed from their number, in the administration and execution of justice (Deut. 16:18; 21:2–9; Ezra 7:25; 10:14). They are also associated with Moses and Aaron in conveying the word of God to the people (Exod. 4:29; 19:7) and in representing the people before God (Exod. 17:5; 24:1; Num. 11:16) on great occasions. They see to the Passover arrangements (Exod. 12:21).

Other nations had elders (cf. Gen. 50:7; Num. 22:7), the right to the title being due to age, or to the esteem in which an individual was held, or to the holding of a definite office in the community (cf. Saxon alderman, Roman senator, Greek gerousia). The elder in Israel no doubt at first derived his authority and status as well as his name by reason of his age and experience.

In the Maccabean period the title “elders of Israel” is used of the members of the Jewish Sanhedrin, which was regarded as having been set up by Moses in his appointment of the seventy elders in Numbers 11:16–17. At the local level a community of 120 (cf. Acts 1:15) or more could appoint seven elders (Mishna, Sanhedrin 1:6). These were called the “seven of a city,” and it is possible that the seven appointed in Acts 6 were regarded as such elders (cf. D. Daube, New Testa- ment and Rabbinic Judaism, 237). In the Gospels the elders are associated with the scribes and chief priests as those at whose hands Jesus (Matt. 16:21; 27:1) and the apostles (Acts 6:12) suffered.

