The OT reveals a sexual practice that is tolerant of polygamy but values fidelity in marriage as sacrosanct. The covenant of long term fidelity is the model of relationship developed throughout the OT canon. While deviation from accepted sexual practice is treated harshly, the Song of Solomon proclaims a delight in sexuality absent from most of the Bible—though not from Jewish practice. The rape and subsequent massacre at Shechem, and the frank telling of the story of David and Bathsheba disclose how sexual passion and violence lie close to the surface of post-fallen human existence. The far-reaching historical consequences of these incidents lay bare the tragedy of this coupling. Jesus gives a mixed message: family is important enough that divorce and adultery are condemned, and are matters of heart, not just of law. But Jesus also relativizes all family ties in light of the gospel. The epistles, too, present a more austere face to human sexuality. The reasons are much debated. Early Christians were living with a pronounced eschatological horizon, to the point where human reproduction appeared irrelevant. At the same time Greek dualism, emphasizing the split between body and spirit, accommodated a framework that equated sin with the flesh—and sexuality—and godliness with the spirit. On the other hand marriage and the marriage supper of the Lamb are the transcendent metaphors for eschatological union with God and for the consummation of God's love. Hence in the early church we see ascetic eschatological communities in tension with the more conventional family unit, a pattern that continued throughout the Middle Ages.

The legacy inherited in the Western tradition from Augustine to Aquinas was almost universally negative on issues of sexuality; women are blamed for the sin of Adam, and the female's bodily reproductive capacity is equated with a lower level of spirituality than the male's. Aquinas, arguing on the basis of natural law, decreed that even in marriage the sexual act is tolerated as a necessary evil, intended only for procreation.

The Eastern Orthodox tradition, however, where priestly celibacy was never mandated, maintained a high view of sexuality within marriage, as a sacramental symbol of our eschatological union with Christ; marriage is a high pilgrimage following Christ into death and resurrection—a kind of martyrdom, in which the human union is placed in the wider context of the gathering communion of saints.

Reformers and Puritans—for whom marriage was preferable to celibacy—made partly successful efforts to develop a less negative attitude toward sexuality. But the task of reconstructing a more affirmative view of sexuality from Scripture and tradition continues within a contemporary framework that simultaneously faces the challenge of a secular, postmodern, relativist approach to sexuality. These revisionists regard sex as essentially good and potentially healing in itself; utilitarian arguments thus lead to the conclusion that intercourse is good providing there exists some level of commitment and sincerity between the partners. Feminists would also insist that the sexual act be free of inequalities in power between partners—ruling out incest and many male/female relationships. Life-long fidelity is considered unrealistic in the present climate, though there is widespread concern about single parenthood, the spread of AIDS, and issues of family. Contemporary Christian ethics must also grapple with the findings of the social sciences which have brought to light the great diversity of sexual practices in animals and humans, and which claim to have proven that homosexuality is one of these natural patterns. At the same time social theorists emphasize the power of social expectations and culture to determine our concepts of normalcy. These are views the church must continue to consider, while nevertheless emphasizing both the fallenness of all human experience and the transcendent aspects of human sexuality.

Almost completely lost from the contemporary utilitarian, rights-oriented public debate is an understanding of sexuality as subservient in part to the wider social well-being of the community. Virtue ethics and feminist emphases upon nurture, however, do provide a more hospitable context for Christian understandings.

The church is often left scrambling to show that we too affirm our sexuality and are not obsessed by sex. Richard Mouw has pointed out, however, that Christians are convinced that because sexuality and gender are so central to our being in the image of God, if something is wrong with our sexuality it will also be wrong with the rest of life.

Sexual Ethics

Hence the church has a significant and unique stance on sexual issues. Our belief in God's creation of the sexes leads us to affirm that sexuality is linked to our creativity, but in our fallen state sex is a power coupled closely with violence and delusion. Covenant and fidelity are represented in Scripture as characterizing God's love for humanity and are the models for all intimate human sexual relations. And because the ideal Christian community is represented in terms of love and trust, the church believes that marriage and family are neither arbitrary and potentially reconstructible constructions of reality, nor merely an acting out of our instinctual primate nature; rather in marriage and familial relationships love and trust are learned, and are the vehicles whereby eros and instinct may be translated—with God's help—into agape and compassion.

N. HOGGARD-CREEGAN

See also ADULTERY; BIRTH CONTROL; MARRIAGE, THEOLOGY OF; MARRIAGE, MARRIAGE CUSTOMS IN BIBLE TIMES; SEPARATION, MARITAL.

Bibliography. B. H. Andolsen et al., eds., Women's Consciousness, Women's Conscience; D. Bailey, Sexual Relation in Christian Thought; P. Brown, Body and Society; L. S. Cahill, Between the Sexes; N. Chodorow, Reproduction of Mothering; R. L. Fox, Pagans and Christians; C. Gilligan, In a Different Voice; S. Kierkegaard, Works of Love; C. S. Lewis, Four Loves; G. Meilaender, Limits of Love; R. Mouw, Uncommon Decency; J. Nelson, Embodiment; R. Niebuhr, Justice and Love; J. Plaskow, Sex, Sin and Grace; J. Stott, Issues Facing Christians Today; A. Thatcher and E. Stuart, eds., Christian Perspectives on Sexuality and Gender.

Shaddai. See GOD, NAMES OF.

Shedd, William Greenough Thayer (1820–1894). The greatest systematizer, after Charles Hodge, of American Calvinistic theology between the Civil War and World War I. His father, a Congregational minister, encouraged his education at the University of Vermont and Andover Theological Seminary. At Vermont, Shedd came under the teaching of James Marsh, who encouraged him to read Plato, Kant, and Coleridge, a trio of authors who retained an influence on his theology for the rest of his life. Shedd served briefly as a Congregational minister in Vermont; he then taught English at the University of Vermont, sacred rhetoric at Auburn Seminary, and church history at Andover, before again taking up ministerial service as an associate at Brick Presbyterian Church in New York. In 1863 he became a professor of Bible and theology at New York's Union Seminary, where he remained for over thirty years.

The best known of Shedd's many works was the Dogmatic Theology, published in three volumes from 1888 to 1894. Like Hodge's Systematic Theology (1872–73), Shedd's Dogmatics defended the "high Calvinism" of the Westminster Confession against Arminianism, Roman Catholicism, and modern rationalism. Shedd was not as comprehensive as Hodge in treating the various divisions of theology, but he did incorporate aspects of modern thought in his work more than Hodge or almost any other conservative of his generation, especially ideas of historical development. He was again unusual in his reliance upon the history of Christianity as an antidote to substandard teachings, whether ancient or modern. For him, Athanasius on the Trinity, Augustine on the nature of sin, Anselm on the existence of God, and the Reformers on salvation were more than capable of spelling out the contours of orthodoxy. He felt that the Augustino-Calvinistic tradition carried ample biblical, theological, and philosophical resources to stand the test of time.

Shedd's interests extended well beyond theology to take in literature, church history, homiletics, and biblical commentary. He published works in each of these areas. He testified to his interest in the idea of organic historical development by publishing Lectures on the Philosophy of History in 1856 and by editing the complete works of Samuel Taylor Coleridge, published in seven volumes in 1853.

M. A. NOLL

See also CALVINISM.

Bibliography. J. De Witt, "William Greenough Thayer Shedd," PRR 6:295–332; G. S. Smith, Seeds of Secularization; C. Strout, "Faith and History: The Mind of William G. T. Shedd," JHI 15:153–62.

Sheol. An intermediate state in which souls are dealt with according to their lives on earth. The noun šē'ōl occurs sixty-five times in the Hebrew OT. English translations render the word as "grave" (KJV, NIV), "hell" (KJV), or as the transliteration "Sheol" (KJV, RSV, NIV). Most lexicons relate "Sheol" etymologically to šā'al, "to ask," thus making Sheol a place of asking—continually asking for more dead from the land of the living, or where the dead are asked for either information (divining) or grace. Some linguists have argued in favor of a relation to šō'al ("hollow of the hand"), whereby Sheol is explained as a "hollow or empty place." However, it is impossible to explain "Sheol" by a root meaning or etymology.

"Sheol" is found most often in the Writings (35 times; 7 in the Law and 19 in the Prophets), and it occurs sixteen times in Psalms and seventeen in the Wisdom Literature. Because the vast majority of occurrences are in the poetic genre, our approach to its theological significance must be one of caution. Its precise meaning in any given passage depends upon the context in which it occurs. In the OT there are six ways “Sheol” is used.

1. It is predicated by various characteristics. Sheol is a place from which no one can save himself (Ps. 89:48). Once there, a person has no hope of returning to the realm of the living (Job 7:9; 17:13–16). In Sheol there is no activity of work, planning, knowledge, or wisdom (Eccles. 9:10); no one praises God from there (Pss. 6:5; 88:10–12; Isa. 38:18). Other passages do not explicitly use the word “Sheol,” but clearly describe it as a place of darkness (Job 10:21–22) and a place of silence (Pss. 94:17; 115:17).

2. The place where all people go upon death. The phrase “I will go down to Sheol in sorrow” occurs four times in Genesis (37:35; 42:38; 44:29, 31).

3. A place where the wicked go upon death (Job 21:13; 24:19; Pss. 9:17; 31:17; 49:14). David prays that his enemies will go there alive (Ps. 55:15). Proverbs teaches that “the steps” and the house of an adulteress lead to Sheol (5:5; 7:27).

4. A place from which the righteous are saved (Ps. 49:15; 86:13; Prov. 15:24). Moreover, Sheol has no lasting hold upon the righteous because God will ransom them from its power (Hos. 13:14; cf. 1 Cor. 15:55). He does not abandon the righteous to Sheol (Ps. 16:10).

5. A place over which God has absolute sovereignty. Sheol “lie[s] open [“naked”] before” God (Job 26:6; Prov. 15:11) so much so that he is there (Ps. 139:8). No one can escape from God in Sheol (Amos 9:2), because God himself brings people down to it (1 Sam. 2:6). Job asks to be hidden from God’s anger in Sheol (Job 14:13), yet Moses teaches that God’s wrath burns even there (Deut. 32:22).

6. “Sheol” is used as a metaphor or image for greed (Prov. 27:20; 30:16; Hab. 2:5), murder (Prov. 1:12), jealousy (Song 8:6), troubles of life (Ps. 88:3), near-death situations (Pss. 18:5; 30:3; 116:3; Jonah 2:2), and great sin (Isa. 28:15, 18; 57:9). In two places, the prophets use “Sheol” in connection with the mythological views of Babylonia (Isa. 14:9, 11, 15) and Egypt (Ezek. 32:21, 27).

The above usages clarify how the word Sheol has varied meanings in the OT. Contrary to some opinion, the OT saints had a hope of a life hereafter. Both the righteous and the wicked go to Sheol. When the righteous go to the grave (Sheol) they are delivered from it, whereas the wicked remain there (grave or hell). Because relevant Scriptures seem to teach a marked difference between the ultimate ends of the wicked and righteous with respect to Sheol, one can assert that the OT supports neither a general view of an underworld where all souls go nor a soul sleep of the wicked.

The word Sheol was translated into Greek as hades sixty-one times in the LXX; hades occurs ten times in the NT. In the Gospels it represents a place of punishment (Matt. 11:23) and a place whose power cannot withstand the church (16:18). In Acts 2:27–31, Peter quotes Psalm 16:8–11 in order to prove that the OT predicted Jesus’ resurrection from Hades. In the context, Hades means grave or the place of bodily decay. Hades is never found in the Epistles, but in Revelation the word is used three times, in each case followed by thanatos (“death”). The writer thus distinguishes death (“grave”) from Hades, the latter being a place of punishment for the wicked. Hence, the NT concept of Hades, which primarily involves punishment of the wicked, is much more limited than the OT idea of Sheol.

This shift is apparent even in Jewish apocalyptic writings during the intertestamental period. The apocalyptic writings begin to make a moral distinction with respect to Sheol (2 Bar. 54:15). Moreover, many apocalyptic books teach that man’s final destiny is determined in his earthly life (1 Enoch; 2 Enoch 62:2; 53:1). In other words, Sheol is a place where men experience rewards or punishments that will come to them in final judgment (2 Esd. 7:75–101). Some books even state that Sheol is the final state of punishment for wicked (Jub. 7:29; 22:22; 24:31).

W. A. VAN GEMEREN

See also DEAD, ABODE OF THE; HADES; INTERMEDIATE STATE.

Bibliography. F. Barton, Heaven, Hell and Hades; E. F. Sutcliff, The Old Testament and the Future Life; TDNT 1:146–49.

Shepherding Movement. An organized interdenominational movement that flourished primarily in charismatic circles during the 1970s and early 1980s, although its influence extended far beyond those boundaries. Its teachings continue to influence many in mainline denominations and parachurch organizations.

In 1969 itinerant preachers Don Basham, Bob Mumford, Derek Prince, and Charles Simpson met together for prayer upon learning that a colleague had fallen into immorality. The charismatic movement was growing rapidly, but was also filled with immature believers, many struggling unsuccessfully with sinful habits, and they resolved to combat this trend. As Prince related, “We made a commitment to cover one another with prayer, to submit our personal lives to one another’s scrutiny and to confer together before making any major personal decisions.”

In 1970 they founded Christian Growth Ministries in Fort Lauderdale, Florida, launched New Wine magazine, and were soon joined by Ern Baxter.

Their new movement spread quickly, but by 1975 reports of abuses were also spreading. Leaders were charged with unbiblical domination over followers, controlling employment de-decisions, choices of mates, and sexual relations with spouses. Families often relocated to remote cities in order to be near their "shepherd." Other charismatic leaders issued strong criticisms, and the founders responded with a "Statement of Concern and Regret" in March 1976. Nevertheless, the Assemblies of God denomination issued a statement against the movement later that year, and subsequent reconciliation efforts did not bring all the disputing parties together.

Shepherding Movement

The movement peaked around 1982, directly or indirectly involving about one hundred thousand people, but then went into a steep decline until its founders disbanded it in 1986.

The seeds of this demise can be found in its founding principles and their application. The founders expected a commitment from disciples similar to the one they made with each other, with one key difference: mutual submission was replaced by a hierarchical system of discipleship, based on the premise that Christians should seek out "shepherds," or "personal pastors," and by mutual consent enter into lifelong relationships with them as disciples. Shepherds required their disciples to confess their deepest personal thoughts to them and acted as their spiritual "covering," protecting them from temptations and trials. This "covering" concept generated pervasive secrecy, which was a cause of concern to outsiders.

The system rested on seven principles: fellowship, service, loyalty, authority, tithing, faithfulness in natural things, and God's order for the home. The most controversial was "authority," which was derived from Watchman Nee's concept of "delegated authority," as modified by Juan Carlos Ortiz. They taught that Christ's own authority was delegated through human shepherds, so that even the most personal life decisions required their approval, and obedience was more important than following individual conviction. The other six principles rested upon this one.

Tithes were to be paid directly to the shepherd (accounting being handled through a local church). Financial inequities frequently resulted as full-time shepherds assigned disciples to part-time shepherds, but kept collecting their tithes. The authority of the full-time shepherd often exempted him from accountability.

"Faithfulness in natural things" provided shepherds with a tool for measuring a disciple's leadership potential. As a result, productivity became a criterion for measuring spirituality, and lack of success considered a possible sign of a spiritual problem.

"God's order in the home" extended the hierarchical structure into each disciple's household, with husbands acting as family shepherds. Wives and children were to obey him as unquestioningly as he was to obey his shepherd.

The movement produced thousands of disillusioned Christians, many testifying to spiritual and psychological devastation. The lifelong covenants between shepherds and their disciples proved unrealistic, but their failure was usually blamed on the spiritual problems of disciples, who suffered from informal social ostracism as a result.

But these failures were actually due to a departure from NT teaching. The biblical basis for spiritual authority is not office, spiritual gifts, or even maturity level, but faithfulness to Scripture (2 Tim. 3:16). When spiritual authority was assigned to individuals rather than Scripture, focus inevitably turned away from the Word of God and onto people and organizational structures. Shepherds thus became mediators between God and disciples, assumed priestly functions which are invalid under the NT's priesthood of all believers, and the movement regressed into oppressive monasticlike tendencies.

R. HENZEL

Bibliography. R. and V. Burks, Damaged Disciples; R. Digitale, "Shepherding Movement: An Idea Whose Time Has Gone?" CT (March 19, 1990) 38–40, 42; R. M. Enroth, "Power Abusers," Eter (October 1979) 23–27; E. E. Plowman, "Deepening Rift in the Charismatic Movement," CT (Oct. 10, 1975) 52–54; F. R. Yeakley Jr., ed., Discipling Dilemma.

Shrove Tuesday. The name traditionally given to the day before Ash Wednesday and the beginning of Lent. On this day in the Middle Ages the faithful were expected to attend confession with a priest for the purpose of being absolved or shriven in order to begin Lent in the right spiritual state.

Because people were expected to fast during Lent the custom grew up of using up oddments of fat to make and fry pancakes, and from this pancakes on Shrove Tuesday became traditional. A number of other customs, e.g., the annual pancake race at Olney in Buckinghamshire, England, have developed from the same source.

D. H. WHEATON

See also CHRISTIAN YEAR; LENT.

Sign. See MIRACLE.

Signs and Wonders. Signs and Wonders in the Old Testament. The phrase "signs and wonders" or its equivalent is found some seventeen times in the OT. The most common reference is to the events of the exodus. God displayed his sovereignty over all human affairs through the miracles that took place beginning at Pharaoh's court and continuing on through the departure from Egypt. In preparing Israel for entry into Canaan, Moses recalls the events of the exodus as miraculous signs and wonders sent by God (Deut. 6:22; 26:8; 29:3) and notes how they were used of God to establish the nation of Israel (4:34). He explains that Pharaoh's heart was hardened even though God performed these signs and wonders (Exod. 7:3). The miracles leading up to the exodus are done uniquely through Moses (Deut. 34:10–12), and it is said that “no one has ever shown the mighty power or performed the awesome deeds that Moses did” (v. 12). Later OT references to the exodus event use the same signs and wonders terminology (Neh. 9:10; Pss. 78:43; 105:27; 135:9).

Lest the people focus in the wrong direction, Moses notes that the signs and wonders in and of themselves are not definitive proof of God's approval. False prophets may perform miracles and then call the house of faith to serve other gods (Deut. 13:1–2). In such cases, the prophets have been sent by God as a test of the people and are not to be followed (v. 3).

Signs and wonders are not limited to the time of the exodus, though in some sense they may be seen as a continuation of it. After Jeremiah purchases a field in Canaan as a symbol that Israel would return to the land after the exile, he prays and acknowledges that the signs and wonders performed by God in Egypt continue to his day (Jer. 32:20–21). The judgments of God on the people of Canaan are signs and wonders that parallel the judgments against Pharaoh displayed in the plagues (Deut. 7:19). Nebuchadnezzar recounts the miracles God has done for him as signs and wonders (Dan. 4:2–3). In the recounting of Nebuchadnezzar's dream the signs may be seen as God's judgments against him for his pride. When Isaiah walked about naked and barefoot for three years his actions served as a prophetic sign and wonder (NIV: portent) of God's coming judgment against Egypt and Cush (Isa. 20:3). King Darius declares God's rescue of Daniel from the lion's den as one of the signs and wonders performed (Dan. 6:27). In this case the implication of the “sign and wonder” includes both Daniel's rescue and the divine punishment of those who plotted against him. Finally, in terms of signs as judgments of God, the Israelites are warned that they themselves would face divine retribution through signs and wonders if they fall away from obedience to God (Deut. 28:45–48).

The last sign and wonder to mention from the OT is the statement by Isaiah that he and his children serve as a sign and wonder from God (Isa. 8:18). Many feel this is Messiah speaking rather than Isaiah (supported by Heb. 2:13, where the verse is picked up as messianic). Others note that the names of Isaiah's sons serve as prophecies against Israel, and this verse is simply another example of signs and wonders pointing towards God's judgments.

From the above discussion, it can be seen that the signs and wonders in the OT serve primarily as pointers to the ongoing redemptive work of God in the history of his people. The total of redemptive activity, including deliverance and judgment, is involved. The exemplar is the complex of the exodus events, which stand as the most significant sign and wonder in the OT. However, it is not this complex which is the ultimate focus but the revelation of Christ toward which the complex so dramatically points.

Signs and Wonders in the New Testament. The phrase signs and wonders appears some sixteen times in the NT. As with the OT, the continuing emphasis is on the redemptive activity of God. The focus switches from the exodus to the system of events surrounding the birth, life, death, and resurrection of Jesus, and the inauguration of the Kingdom of God.

In the NT there is a more clearly defined delineation between true or genuine signs and wonders, and false signs and wonders. The latter are spurious because they are performed by false people (Matt. 24:24 and Mark 13:22). Such works are said to be the work of Satan (2 Thess. 2:9). Following the idea found in Deuteronomy 13:1–3, the issue is not whether these false signs and wonders are actual miracles. Rather, they are bogus because they point people away from God. Thus, signs and wonders in and of themselves do not authenticate the message of the person or group performing them. As Jesus states in Matthew 7:15–23, in this regard spiritual fruit is more important than spiritual power (see also Luke 10:17–20).

True signs and wonders in the NT are performed by God (Acts 2:19; 4:30) through Jesus (Acts 2:22), the apostles (Acts 2:43; 5:12; Rom. 15:19; 2 Cor. 12:12), and church leaders (Stephen—Acts 6:8; Barnabas—Acts 14:3; 15:12). Such signs always carry a significance; they are never events without intention on God's part. Stated purposes seen in the NT include Jesus' accreditation by God (Acts 2:22), the confirmation of the message of God's grace (Acts 15:12) and the salvation he offers (Heb. 2:4), the full proclamation of the gospel of Christ to lead unbelievers to faith (Rom. 15:19), the generation of awe and strengthening of belief by those of the house of faith (Acts 2:43), and the marking out of an apostle (2 Cor. 12:12; as a sent one bearing God's message). Through each of these stated purposes the theme of pointing toward or involvement in the ongoing redemptive activity of God can be clearly seen: (1) The accreditation of Jesus through signs and wonders confirms not just his message but his life and death on our behalf; (2) the confirmation of that message of God's grace and offer of salvation through signs and wonders continues the affirmation of Jesus' life and death as well as establishing the universality of the gospel; and (3) together (1) and (2) facilitate the development of faith among unbelievers and confirm or strengthen the faith of believers.

Signs and Wonders

Contemporary Issues. In contemporary theological systems there are two significant positions related to the understanding of signs and wonders and their role in today's world. On one side are the traditional dispensationalists who argue that signs and wonders served solely during the life of Jesus and the transition phase of the early church, an age that is now passed. It is noted that with the close of the canon we now have a permanent testimony to the redemptive events of Christ's life, and an ongoing confirmation through signs and wonders is no longer necessary. Therefore God stopped them and we should not expect to see signs and wonders today. Joining the cessationist position, but for different reasons, are many Reformed theologians. Following B. B. Warfield's discussion in Counterfeit Miracles (1918), they generally argue that signs and wonders served to confirm Jesus' life and the apostolic proclamation of the message of salvation as a critical element in redemptive history. Since this public phase in the history of redemption is over, we should not expect miracles (or signs and wonders) until the next public phase, namely the second advent. As with the dispensationalists, this is also tied to the closing of the canon as a permanent record of the signs and wonders of Christ and the establishment of the early church.

On the other side of this issue have been the Pentecostals and charismatics. Both of these groups have argued that signs and wonders continue today as a means of displaying and manifesting the kingdom of God. To their voices more recently have been added the voice of the so-called Third Wave (or "Signs and Wonders") movement. "Third Wave" is a term coined originally by C. Peter Wagner to refer to non-Pentecostal evangelicals who are open to the continuing operation of the miraculous gifts and works of God. Though they do not identify the baptism of the Spirit as a second blessing, neither do they advocate a cessationist position concerning the miraculous (or sign) gifts of the Spirit, including tongues, interpretation, and healings. Perhaps the best known Third Wave group in contemporary Western circles is the Vineyard movement. Pentecostals, charismatics, and Third-Wavers all maintain that signs and wonders continue today. All have been heavily influenced not only by Pentecostal experiences and theologizing but also by voluminous reports of miraculous phenomena coming from missionary and indigenous work in non-Western settings. Generally they see the ongoing purposes of signs and wonders as displaying God's power so as to facilitate faith and continue the inauguration of the kingdom of God in visible form on earth. In that sense the signs and wonders are not limited to pointing to the redemptive work of God; they are themselves an ongoing part of that work.

Both sides in this debate acknowledge the intimate linkage of signs and wonders to the redemptive work of God. The primary contention is the extent to which the linkage is to be limited to the events of the cross and establishment of the church. If they are limited, then the miracles claimed today may be seen as miracles without being placed in a technical category of signs and wonders. If signs and wonders go beyond attestation to inauguration, however, then they may be expected wherever the kingdom of God is already visible or is in the process of being more fully manifested.

A. S. MOREAU

Bibliography. G. S. Greig and K. N. Springer, Kingdom and the Power; P. Hiebert and J. R. Coggins, eds., Wonders and the Word; M. S. Horton, ed., Power Religion: The Selling Out of the Evangelical Church?; V. McCasland, "Signs and Wonders" JBL 76:149-52; D. Williams, Signs, Wonders and the Kingdom of God.

Simeon the New Theologian (949-1022). A central figure in Eastern Orthodox spirituality. Simeon was born into a family belonging to the provincial nobility in Asia Minor and educated at Constantinople for imperial service. While still in his teens, he came under the influence of a monk, Symeon the Studite (ca. 917-986/7). At the age of twenty, he had a mystical experience of the divine presence that marked his life in the form of a vision of the divine and uncreated light. This was to become the theological foundation of his theme of the Christian's ability to have union with God without sharing in the divine nature. Simeon distinguishes between God uniting with us essentially in order to make us gods (theosis) while remaining superessentially God and inaccessible in himself. In this way there is no confusion of being. We do not share the being of God, per se. Three centuries later, St. Gregory Palamas would use the concept of humans being able to partake of the energies of God without sharing in God's essence to explain the same phenomenon.

"The New Theologian" is not to be understood in the sense of academic theology but in the sense of a person of prayer who shares his own spiritual experience of God. Before his disciples conferred this title on Simeon, the Orthodox Church had reserved "theologian" for only two others, St. John the Evangelist, who under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit recorded the most "mystical" of the four Gospels, and St. Gregory of Nazianzos, author of spiritual poetry and honored as one of the Three Great Hierarchs.

Simeon's career was not without difficulties as his demands on the monks for a pious and sensitive spirituality led to a revolt against his leadership. He was embroiled in controversy with the church leadership, apparently over his premature veneration of Symeon the Studite as a saint shortly after the death of his mentor and without church approval. He was exiled but later offered a bishopric, which he refused. In both the monastic communities over which he was abbot, Simeon retreated into silent meditation after he had organized the monks. He left many writings on spiritual themes, some of which have what might be termed an evangelical flavor. His emphasis on the Holy Spirit's direct inspiration of the believer has led some to consider him a "Protestant," but he is firmly in the liturgical tradition of the Eastern Orthodox Church. Scholarship is in general agreement that Method of Sacred Prayer and Attention in which the directions for the Jesus Prayer, "Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy on me a sinner" are found are not his work, but belong to a later period. There are great similarities between his work and hesychasm.

J. J. STAMOOLIS

See also GREGORY PALAMAS; HESYCHASM; ORTHODOX TRADITION; PHILOKALIA; THEOSIS.

Bibliography. Elisabeth Behr-Sigel, Place of the Heart: An Introduction to Orthodox Spirituality; E. Kadloubovsky and G. E. H. Palmer, Writings from the Philokalia on Prayer of the Heart; G. E. H. Palmer, P. Sherrard, and K. Ware, Philokalia.

Simons, Menno. See MENNO SIMONS.

Simplicity of God. See GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF.

Simul Justus et Peccator. Martin Luther's paradoxical expression for defining a Christian as both justified and a sinner at one and the same time in the judgment of God. While his usage of this term is limited, it does capture much of Luther's understanding of Christian theology.

Luther's rejection of medieval anthropology is the key to understanding this expression. Medieval scholasticism viewed persons dualistically, and their essence was conceived of in terms of having a higher and a lower nature, or as flesh and spirit. Conversely, Luther viewed persons holistically, as a "whole man" (totus homo). Thus, "flesh" (caro) and "spirit" (spiritus) were descriptions of the whole person as considered from different perspectives. "Flesh" refers to the whole person turned in upon itself in alienation from God, while "spirit" defines the entire person as open to God and his promises. A Christian is therefore not partially righteous and partially a sinner, but completely both at all times. Sin and righteousness are perpetual attributes of the entire person until death.

As this touches justification, Luther distinguished a righteousness that is "before God" (coram Deo) from that which is "before men" (coram hominibus). He understood that a partial righteousness was not adequate coram Deo; the whole person must be righteous before God. At this point he affirmed the alien righteousness of Christ that was extrinsic to a Christian and justified him. At one and same time therefore, the believer is extrinsically righteous through the alien righteousness of Christ, while intrinsically he is (and will remain) a sinner.

With regard to sanctification, simul justus et peccator describes the tension and conflict involved in the coexistence of the righteous man and the sinner in an individual. This is not to be confused with his understanding of Romans 7, however, which he saw as a conflict of the Spirit with the flesh. In the first instance simul justus et peccator characterizes the outworking of the theological and empirical togetherness of the divine verdict and a person's actual condition. Romans 7 can be distinguished as describing the anthropological conflict within the Christian man.

J. MITCHELL JR.

Bibliography. P. Althaus, Ethics of Martin Luther; Theology of Martin Luther; A. McGrath, Luther's Theology of the Cross.

Sin. The Biblical Understanding of Sin. In the biblical perspective, sin is not only an act of wrongdoing but a state of alienation from God. For the great prophets of Israel, sin is much more than the violation of a taboo or the transgression of an external ordinance. It signifies the rupture of a personal relationship with God, a betrayal of the trust he places in us. We become most aware of our sinfulness in the presence of the holy God (cf. Ps. 51:1–9; Isa. 6:5; Luke 5:8). Sinful acts have their origin in a corrupt heart (Gen. 6:5; Isa. 29:13; Jer. 17:9). For Paul, sin (hamartia) is not just a conscious transgression of the law but a debilitating ongoing state of enmity with God. In Paul's theology, sin almost becomes personalized. It can be thought of as a malignant, personal power that holds humanity in its grasp.

The biblical witness also affirms that sin is universal. "All have sinned and fall short of the glory of God," Paul declares (Rom. 3:23 RSV). "There is not a righteous man on earth who does what is right and never sins" (Eccles. 7:20). "Who can say, 'I have kept my heart pure; I am clean and without sin?'" (Prov. 20:9). "They have all gone astray," the psalmist complains, "They are all alike corrupt; there is none that does good, no, not one" (Ps. 14:3 RSV).

In Reformed theology, the core of sin is unbelief. This has firm biblical support: in Genesis 3, where Adam and Eve trust the word of the serpent over the word of God; in the Gospels where Jesus Christ is rejected by the leaders of the Jews; in Acts 7, where Stephen is martyred at the hands of an unruly crowd; and in John 20:24–25, where Thomas arrogantly dismisses the resurrection of Jesus.

Sin

Hardness of heart, which is closely related to unbelief (Mark 16:14; Rom. 2:5), likewise belongs to the essence of sin. It means refusing to repent and believe in the promises of God (Ps. 95:8; Heb. 3:8, 15; 4:7). It connotes both stubborn unwillingness to open ourselves to the love of God (2 Chron. 36:13; Eph. 4:18) and its corollary—insensitivity to the needs of our neighbor (Deut. 15:7; Eph. 4:19).

Whereas the essence of sin is unbelief or hardness of heart, the chief manifestations of sin are pride, sensuality, and fear. Other significant aspects of sin are self-pity, selfishness, jealousy, and greed.

Sin is both personal and social, individual and collective. Ezekiel declared: "Now this was the sin of your sister Sodom: She and her daughters were arrogant, overfed, and unconcerned; they did not help the poor and needy" (16:49). According to the prophets, it is not only a few individuals that are infected by sin but the whole nation (Isa. 1:4). Among the collective forms of sin that cast a blight over the world today are racism, nationalism, imperialism, ageism, and sexism.

The effects of sin are moral and spiritual bondage, guilt, death, and hell. James explained: "Each person is tempted when he is lured and enticed by his own desire. Then desire when it has conceived gives birth to sin; and sin when it is full-grown brings forth death" (1:14–15 RSV). In Paul's view, "The wages of sin is death" (Rom. 6:23; cf. 1 Cor. 15:56).

According to Pauline theology, the law is not simply a check on sin but an actual instigator of sin. So perverse is the human heart that the very prohibitions of the law that were intended to deter sin serve instead to arouse sinful desire (Rom. 7:7–8).

Biblical faith also confesses that sin is inherent in the human condition. We are not simply born into a sinful world, but we are born with a propensity toward sin. As the psalmist says, "Even from birth the wicked go astray; from the womb they are wayward and speak lies" (Ps. 58:3; cf. 51:5). Church tradition speaks of original sin, but this is intended to convey not a biological taint or physical deformity but a spiritual infection that in some mysterious way is transmitted through reproduction. Sin does not originate from human nature, but it corrupts this nature.

The origin of sin is indeed a mystery and is tied in with the problem of evil. The story of Adam and Eve does not really give us a rationally satisfactory explanation of either sin or evil (this was not its intention), but it does throw light on the universal human predicament. It tells us that prior to human sin there was demonic sin, which provided the occasion for human transgression. Orthodox theology, both Catholic and Protestant, speaks of a fall of the angels prior to the fall of humanity, and this is attributed to the misuse or abuse of the divine gift of freedom. It is the general consensus among orthodox theologians that moral evil (sin) sets the stage for physical evil (natural disaster), but exactly how the one causes the other will probably always remain a subject of human speculation.

Sin and Hubris. The biblical understanding of sin has certain parallels with the Greek tragic concept of "hubris," and yet there are also profound differences. Hubris, which is sometimes (not wholly accurately) translated as "pride," is not to be equated with the idolatrous pride that proceeds from a corrupted heart. Rather, it is the unwise self-elevation that proceeds from the vitalities of nature. Whereas hubris signifies the attempt to transcend the limitations appointed by fate, sin refers to an unwillingness to break out of our narrow limitations in obedience to the vision of faith. While hubris connotes immoderation, sin consists in misplaced allegiance. Hubris is trying to be superhuman; sin is becoming inhuman. Hubris means rising to the level of the gods; sin means trying to displace God or living as if there were no God.

In Greek tragedy, the hero has a quite different standing from the sinner portrayed in the Bible. The tragic hero is punished for authentic greatness, not for unwarranted exaltation. While the tragic hero is to be admired, the sinner, insofar as he or she persists in sin, is to be justly condemned. Both are to be pitied, but for different reasons. Tragic heroes are victims of fate and are not really responsible for their predicament. Sinners, on the other hand, know the good but do not do it. Tragic heroes are tormented by the sorrow of being blind to the forces that brought about their undoing. Sinners are troubled by the guilt of knowing that they have no one to blame but themselves. The fault of the tragic hero is inevitable; that of the sinner is inexcusable. The tragic hero is a pawn in the hands of fate, the sinner a willing accomplice in evil. In Greek tragedy, the essential flaw is ignorance; in the biblical perspective, the tragic flaw is hardness of heart.

Historical Controversy over Sin. In the fifth century, Augustine challenged the views of the British monk Pelagius, who saw sin basically as an outward act of transgressing the law and regarded the human person as free to sin or desist from sin. Appealing to the witness of Scripture, Augustine maintained that sin incapacitates humans from doing the good, and because we are born as sinners we lack the power to do the good. Yet because we willfully choose the bad over the good, we must be held accountable for our sin. Augustine gave the illustration of a man who, by abstaining from food necessary for health, so weakened himself that he could no longer eat. Though still a human being, created to maintain his health by eating, he was no longer able to do so. Similarly, by the historical event of the fall, all humanity has become incapable of that movement toward God—the very life for which it was created.

Pelagius held that one could raise oneself by one's own efforts toward God, and therefore grace is the reward for human virtue. Augustine countered that humans are helpless to do the good until grace falls upon them, and when grace is thus given they are irresistibly moved toward God and the good.

At the time of the Reformation, Luther powerfully reaffirmed the Pauline and Augustinian doctrine of the bondage of the will against Erasmus, who maintained that humans still have the capacity to do the right, though they need the aid of grace if they are to come to salvation. Luther saw humanity as totally bound to the powers of darkness—sin, death, and the devil. What we most need is to be delivered from spiritual slavery rather than inspired to heroic action.

In our own century, the debate between Karl Barth and Emil Brunner on human freedom is another example of the division in the church through the ages on this question. Though firmly convinced that we are sinners who can be saved only by the unmerited grace of God as revealed and conveyed in Jesus Christ, Emil Brunner nonetheless referred to an “addressability” in humanity, a “capacity for revelation,” that enables us to apprehend the gospel and to respond to its offer. For Barth, not even a capacity for God remains within our fallen nature; therefore, we must be given not only faith but also the condition to receive faith. In this view, there is no point of contact between the gospel and sinful humanity. Brunner vehemently disagreed, contending that there would then be no use in preaching. Barth argued that the Spirit must create this point of contact before we can believe and obey. In contrast to Brunner he affirmed the total depravity of humanity; yet he did not believe that human nature is so defaced that it no longer reflects the glory of God. In his later writings, Barth contended that sin is alien to human nature rather than belonging to this nature. Nonetheless, he continued to affirm that every part of our nature is infected by the contagion of sin, and this renders us totally unable to come to God on our own.

Modern Reappraisals of Sin. In the nineteenth century, theologians under the spell of the new world consciousness associated with the Enlightenment and romanticism began to reinterpret sin. For Friedrich Schleiermacher, sin is not so much revolt against God as the dominance of the lower nature within us. It is the resistance of our lower nature to the universal God-consciousness, which needs to be realized and cultivated in every human soul. Sin is basically a minus sign, the inertia of nature that arrests the growth of God-consciousness. Schleiermacher even saw sin in a positive light, maintaining that evil has been ordained in corporate human life as a gateway to the good. Sin has occurred as a preparation for grace rather than grace occurring to repair the damage of sin. Schleiermacher did acknowledge a corporate dimension to sin.

Albrecht Ritschl, in the same century, understood sin as the product of selfishness and ignorance. He did not see the human race in bondage to the power of sin, but instead believed that people could be effectively challenged to live ethical, heroic lives. His focus was on actual or concrete sins, not on humanity's being in sin. He even allowed for the possibility of sinless lives, though he did not deny the necessity of divine grace for attaining the ethical ideal. For Ritschl, religion is fundamentally the experience of moral freedom, a freedom that enables humans to be victorious over the world. At the same time, he acknowledged the presence of radical evil, though, as in the case of Kant, this did not significantly alter his vision of a new social order characterized by the mastery of spirit over nature. He also tried to do justice to the collective nature of evil, but this effort was never quite convincing.

In Twentieth-Century America. Reinhold Niebuhr pioneered in reinterpreting sin. Rejecting the Reformation understanding of sin for its biblical literalism and determinism, he also disputed the liberal view, which confused sin with human weakness and finitude. For Niebuhr, sin is inevitable because of the tension between human freedom and human finitude, but it is not a necessary implication of human nature. Our anxiety over our finitude provides the occasion for sin; our ability to transcend ourselves is the source of the possibility of sin. We are tempted either to deny the contingent character of our existence (in pride) or to escape from the responsibilities of our freedom (in sensuality). Niebuhr sought to preserve the paradox of the inevitability of sin and human culpability for sin.

Paul Tillich saw human sin as consisting in estrangement from one's true self and the ground of one's selfhood. Virtually making sin an invariable concomitant of human finitude, he spoke of an ontological fall in addition to an immanent fall. Tillich made generous use of psychological and sociological categories (such as “alienation” and “estrangement”) to illumine the mystery of sin. Just as sin is a fall from our ontological ground, so salvation lies in reunion with this ground. For Tillich, the universal experience of estrangement from the creative depth and ground of all being is the tie that links Christians and non-Christians.

In liberation theology, sin is redefined in terms of social oppression, exploitation, and acquiescence to injustice. It is also seen as greed for financial gain at the expense of the poor. Just as sin is that which dehumanizes and oppresses people, so salvation is that which humanizes them, that which liberates them for meaningful and creative lives.

Sin

Closely related is feminist theology, which sees the essence of sin in passivity to evil, in timidity and cowardice in the face of intimidation. Sin consists not so much in self-affirmation as in self-contempt. The need for women who have been subjugated by a patriarchal ethos is for self-assertion, and their sin lies in resignation to the social system that relegates them to an inferior status.

The understanding of sin has also undergone a profound transformation in popular culture religion, where psychology is more significant than theology. Under the influence of "New Thought" and other neotranscendentalist movements, media religion reinterprets sin as negative thinking or defeatism. In some other strands of culture religion, also showing the impact of "New Thought," sin is equated with sickness or instability. The cure lies in self- or group therapy rather than in a sacrifice for sin. The way to overcome guilt is through catharsis rather than repentance. Atonement is reinterpreted to mean atonement with the self or the world.

Overcoming Sin. Christian faith teaches that sin cannot be overcome through human ingenuity or effort. The solution to the problem lies in what God has done for us in Jesus Christ. The penalty for sin is death, judgment, and hell, but the gospel is that God has chosen to pay this penalty himself in the sacrificial life and death of his Son, Jesus Christ (cf. John 3:16–17; Acts 20:28; Rom. 3:21–26; 5:6–10; 2 Cor. 5:18, 19; Col. 2:13–15).

Through his atoning sacrifice on Calvary, Christ set humankind free by taking the retribution of sin upon himself. He suffered the agony and shame that we deserve to suffer because of our sin. He thereby satisfied the just requirements of the law of God and at the same time turned away the wrath of God from fallen humankind. His sacrifice was both an expiation of our guilt and a propitiation of the wrath of God. It also signifies the justification of sinners in the sight of God in that Christ's righteousness is imputed to those who have faith. Likewise, it represents the sanctification of sinners by virtue of their being engrafted into the body of Christ through faith. The cross and resurrection of Christ also accomplish the redemption of sinners, because they have been brought back out of the slavery of sin into the new life of freedom.

Humankind is objectively delivered through the cross and resurrection victory of Christ over the powers of sin, death, and the devil; but this deliverance does not make contact with the sinner until the gift of the Holy Spirit in the awakening to faith. The outpouring of the Spirit completes the salvific activity of Christ. His atoning work is finished, but the fruits of his redemption need to be applied to the people of God by the Spirit if they are to be saved de facto as well as de jure. It is through regeneration by the Spirit, the imparting of faith and love, that the sinner is set free from bondage to sin and enabled to achieve victory over sin in everyday life.

Reformation theology insists that Christ saves us, not only from the power of sin, but also from its dire consequence—eternal death. We are given both immortality and the remission of sins. Christians do not suffer further penalties for sins committed after baptism and conversion, for the punishment for sin has already been borne by Christ. Christians have been delivered from the guilt of sin, but they still suffer the interior pain of guilt or feelings of guilt insofar as they continue to sin while in the state of grace. The remedy lies, not in acts of penance prescribed by the church, but in the act of repentance by which we claim again the assurance of forgiveness promised in the gospel. The suffering that accompanies the sin of the Christian is to be understood not as a penalty for sin but as a sting that reminds us of our deliverance from sin and also as a spur that challenges us to persevere and overcome.

Sin in Evangelical and Legalistic Religion. The meaning of sin is quite different in a religion based on the gospel from one based on law. Sin, in the evangelical perspective, is not so much the infringement of a moral code as the breaking of a covenantal relationship. Sin is an offense not so much against law as against love. In legalistic religion, sin is the violation of a moral taboo. In evangelical religion, sin is wounding the very heart of God. The opposite of sin is not virtue, but faith.

Biblical faith acknowledges the legal dimension of sin, recognizing that the just requirements of the law have to be satisfied. Yet it also perceives that sin is basically the sundering of a personal relation between God and humanity and that the greatest need is not the payment of debt but reconciliation.

The deepest meaning of the cross is that God out of his incomparable love chose to identify himself with our plight and affliction. The suffering of Christ was the suffering of vicarious love, and not simply a penal suffering canceling human debt. Salvation means that the merits of Christ are transferred to the deficient sinner and also that the forgiveness of God is extended to the undeserving sinner. Christ not only pays the penalty for sin, but he does more than the law requires: he accepts the sinner unto himself, adopting that person into his family as a brother or sister. He gives sinners a writ of pardon and embraces them as a loving shepherd who has found the lost sheep.

Just as sin is deeper than the infringement of law, so love goes beyond the requirements of law. The answer to sin is a forgiveness that was not conditional on the sacrifice of Christ but one that was responsible for this sacrifice. God did not forgive because his law was satisfied; yet because he chose to forgive, he saw to it that the demands of his law were fulfilled. D. G. BLOESCH

See also AUGUSTINE OF HIPPO; GUILT; IDOLATRY; JUSTIFICATION; OMISSION, SINS OF; PELAGIUS, PELAGIANISM; SANCTIFICATION.

Bibliography. Augustine, On Original Sin; K. Barth, Church Dogmatics; G. C. Berkouwer, Sin; D. Bloesch, Essentials of Evangelical Theology; E. Brunner, Man in Revolt; E. Brunner and K. Barth, Natural Theology; J. Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion; E. La B. Cherbonnier, Hardness of Heart; C. Gestrich, Return of Splendor in the World: The Christian Doctrine of Sin and Forgiveness; J. Haroutunian, Lust for Power; G. P. Hutchinson, Problem of Original Sin in American Presbyterian Theology; M. Luther, Bondage of the Will; R. Niebuhr, Moral Man and Immoral Society; Nature and Destiny of Man; T. Peters, Sin: Radical Evil in Soul and Society; P. Schoonenberg, Man and Sin; W. G. T. Shedd, Dogmatic Theology; D. Smith, With Willful Intent: A Theology of Sin; F. R. Tennant, Sources of the Doctrines of the Fall and Original Sin; E. Yarnold, Theology of Original Sin.

Sin, Conviction of. The biblical teaching revolving chiefly around elenchō peri hamartias and equivalents. The concept of “conviction” does not cover all shades of meaning of elenchō. The word sometimes entails the ideas of “exposing” and “correcting” in addition to that of “proving wrong” or “showing the guilt of.”

A sinless person cannot be the object of this conviction (John 8:46; 1 Pet. 2:22). The world can, however, notably for its disbelief in Christ (John 16:8–9). A sinning member of the Christian community can be an object of conviction, too (Matt. 18:15; Eph. 5:11). Similarly a whole congregation may be reproved (1 Tim. 5:20; 2 Tim. 3:16; Titus 1:9; 13; 2:15; James 2:9; Rev. 3:19).

Conviction originates with the persons of the Godhead: the Father (Heb. 12:5), the Son (Jude 15; Rev. 3:19), and the Holy Spirit (John 16:7–11). It is mediated through Christian witnesses, especially preachers, as they spread and implement the word of God (Matt. 18:15; John 16:7, 8; Eph. 5:11, 13; 1 Tim. 5:20; 2 Tim. 4:2; Titus 1:9, 13; 2:15), as an outworking of brotherly love (Lev. 19:17–18, LXX). Their witness intensifies the convicting work already present through the Mosaic law (James 2:9) and self-revelation to the conscience resulting from illumination by Christ's first advent (John 3:20).

The outcome of this convicting work varies. In one sense, it is always effective because the object invariably receives divine illumination to see issues clearly (John 16:7–8). In another sense, it is only relatively effective because the object may respond with repentance (Matt. 18:15; 1 Cor. 14:24) or rejection (Luke 3:19–20). What conviction does is to make clear the dire results if the guilty party persists in his wrongdoing. Without conviction he remains a victim of satanic blindness (2 Cor. 4:4). Once convicted, he must respond with a choice.

Typical sins that occasion conviction include illegitimate sexual relations, ungodly deeds, and false teaching. The guilty are shown the wrongness of such activity and are pointed away from it toward repentance. Conviction of sin implies an educative discipline. The inflexible standard of divine righteousness is brought to bear on sin, and a turning in obedience to God is shown to be the desirable alternative to remaining in a sinful state. R. L. THOMAS

See also SIN.

Bibliography. C. K. Barrett, Gospel according to St. John; R. E. Brown, Gospel according to John; F. Büchsel, TDNT 2:473–76; L. S. Chafer, Systematic Theology; H.-G. Link, NIDNTT 2:140–42.

Sin, Man of. See ANTICHRIST.

Sin, Mortal. Sin causing spiritual death. The biblical teaching is clear: all sin is mortal inasmuch as its intrusion into human experience is the cause of every man's death (Rom. 5:12; 6:23). Roman Catholic moral theology sees sin as twofold: mortal and venial. Mortal sin extinguishes the life of God in the soul; venial sin weakens, but does not destroy that life. In venial sin the agent freely decides to perform a specific act; however, in doing so he does not purpose to become a certain type of person. In venial sin the individual performs an act, but deep within himself he yearns to be the type of individual who opposes that action. Thus, in venial sin there is a tension between the action and the individual performing the act. Mortal sin involves the agent totally. He determines not only to act in a specific manner, but expresses therein the type of individual he wishes to be in and through that action. The result is spiritual death.

Evangelical Christians take seriously the biblical evaluation of the grave nature of certain sins. Our Lord spoke of the sin that “will not be forgiven” (Matt. 12:31–32); Paul teaches that those who participate in certain specified sins are excluded from the kingdom (1 Cor. 6:9; Gal. 5:21; 1 Thess. 4:6); John declines to instruct believers to pray for those who have committed the “sin that lead to death” (1 John 5:16; cf. Heb. 6:4–6). These passages cannot be dismissed lightly; they impinge decidedly upon our theme and call for the closest exegetical attention. F. R. HARM

See also SIN, UNPARDONABLE; SIN UNTO DEATH.

Sin, Mortal

Bibliography. L. Berkhof, Systematic Theology; J. Greenwood, Handbook of the Catholic Faith; R. B. McBrien, Catholicism; J. T. Mueller, Christian Dogmatics; F. Pieper, Christian Dogmatics; C. C. Ryrie, Holy Spirit; A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology; H. C. Thiessen, Lectures in Systematic Theology; C. F. W. Walther, Proper Distinction between Law and Gospel.

Sin, Unpardonable. Christian teaching about the unpardonable sin stems from a saying of Jesus recorded in all three Synoptic Gospels. In Mark 3:28–29 Jesus remarks, “I tell you the truth, all the sins and blasphemies of men will be forgiven them. But whoever blasphemes against the Holy Spirit will never be forgiven; he is guilty of an eternal sin.” An added difficulty comes when we compare the saying to its parallels in Luke 12:10 (which evidences an independent Q tradition) and Matthew 12:31–32 (which no doubt reflects a synthesis of Q and Mark). Matthew and Luke refer to forgiveness of “words against the Son of Man” (namely, Jesus) while Mark mentions “blasphemies of the sons of men.” Scholars often resolve this difficulty by suggesting that the earliest saying involved the Aramaic generic idiom for “man” (bar nāšā’ = “son of man”). When the phrase gained titular importance for Jesus, Mark introduced the plural form to avoid any confusion (the plural “sons of men” is without parallel in any of the Gospels; elsewhere it is only in Eph. 3:5). Nevertheless, in Matthew and Luke the generic form is absent, and the saying claims that an offense to the Son of Man will be forgiven.

One must keep in mind that the historical setting of the saying in Mark and Matthew is the Beelzebul controversy (cf. Luke 11:14–23). Jesus’ exorcisms stirred up major discussions both during his ministry and within the apologetics of the earliest church. His opponents misrepresented his successful rulership over the demonic and implied that Jesus’ exorcisms evidenced some sort of collusion with Satan. Jesus’ response is a blunt rebuttal. His power stemmed from the Spirit of God. The saying brings a severe warning about the profound danger of attributing the good things of God to an act of Satan. “Here we see coming to clear expression Jesus’ sense of the awesomeness, the numinous quality, the eschatological power which possessed him. In him, in his action, God was present and active in a decisive and final way—to reject his ministry was to reject God and so to reject forgiveness” (J. Dunn). According to Jesus this rejection implied total rejection and spurned the divine presence (cf. a similar severe dishonoring in John 8:48–59).

But in what fashion could a sin against the Son of man be “forgivable”? In the historical setting of early Christianity, the time of Jesus’ earthly ministry was a time of ambiguity even for the disciples (Mark 9:30–31). No sin in this period fell outside the realm of forgiveness. If even the Q form of the saying incorporates the generic sense, the Evangelists may be saying that unknowing criticisms of Jesus as bar nāšā’ (a man) were pardonable. But in the post-Easter setting, the presence of the Spirit and the presence of Jesus were rarely distinguished (2 Cor. 3:18; cf. Acts 16:7). This was a time of Spirit-inspired understanding (John 12:16; 13:7; 16:12–13; cf. 1 Cor. 2:1–16); apostasy against the Son would have similarly dire consequences (Heb. 6:4–6; 10:26–31; cf. 1 John 5:10, 14–21; Gospel of Thomas, logion 44).

The meaning of this sin in Christian thought is best viewed as a total and persistent denial of the presence of God in Christ. It reflects a complete recalcitrance of the heart. Rather than a particular act, it is a disposition of the will. “This sin is committed when a man recognizes the mission of Jesus by the Holy Spirit but defies and resists and curses it. The saying shows the seriousness of the situation. It is the last time . . . in which the lordship of God breaks in” (W. Grundmann).

Having said this, however, two cautions must be sounded, especially when we recall the serious pastoral problems that derive from this teaching. First, this should in no way obscure the full implications of the grace of God in Christ. The unpardonable sin refers to complete apostasy (Calvin). Whoever seeks God’s grace can be assured that he will discover it (1 John 2:1–2). It is interesting that in Luke 12 the saying is immediately followed by another Spirit text bringing reassurance (vv. 11–12). Second, this sin does not refer to a particular act for which one may later feel regret, but instead describes a blatant hostility to God and a serious rejection of Jesus after one has been exposed to the knowledge of the truth. This corrective should help avoid many traumatic problems so frequent among Christians and give reassurance that God’s forgiveness is free and gracious to all who come to him with a contrite heart. G. M. BURGE

See also SIN UNTO DEATH.

Bibliography. G. C. Berkouwer, Sin; P. E. Davies, IDB 4:733–34; J. Denney, Christian Doctrine of Reconciliation; J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus and the Spirit; O. E. Evans, “Unforgivable Sin,” ExpT 68:240–44; W. Grundmann, TDNT 1:304; I. H. Marshall, Epistles of John; Kept by the Power of God; O. Procksch, TDNT 1:104; C. R. Smith, Bible Doctrine of Sin.

Sin, Venial (Lat. venia, “pardon, favor, kindness, forgiveness”). Sin that can be forgiven. The term does not occur in Scripture, but the basic idea does. Essentially a Roman Catholic concept, venial sin is invariably used in contrast with mortal sin. Mortal sins are those that exclude from the kingdom; venial are those sins that do not exclude from it (cf. Gal. 5:19–21; Eph. 5:5; with James 3:2; 1 John 1:8).

Thomas Aquinas expressed the difference between mortal and venial in terms of the diversity of the disorder seen in the essence of the deed. There are two types of such disorder: (1) that which violates the basic principle of order, and (2) that which does not touch the principle but introduces disorder within the soul. When the soul has become so disordered that it runs from its God, mortal sin has occurred. Aquinas likened the turning from God in mortal sin to death, in which the principle of life is gone, and the disorder of venial sin to sickness, which is repairable because the life principle remains.

Venial sin differs from mortal sin in the punishment it entails. Venial sin merits temporal punishment expiated by confession or by the fires of purgatory; mortal sin merits eternal death.

Let one become complacent, it is pointed out that venial sin can lead to mortal sin. When one becomes so engrossed in his sin that it is an obsession that leads him ultimately to turn from God, the source of his life, he has entered the domain of mortal sin—and eternal death.

F. R. HARM

See also SIN, MORTAL.

Bibliography. T. Aquinas, Summa Theologica; J. G. McKenzie, Guilt: Its Meaning and Significance; P. V. O'Brien, Emotions and Morals; W. E. Orchard, Modern Theories of Sin; P. Palazzini, Sin, Its Reality and Nature; J. Regnier, What Is Sin?; H. Rondet, Theology of Sin.

Sinlessness of Christ. The teaching that Jesus Christ was sinless (impeccable). This has been a universal conviction of the Christian church. Even heretics in the early centuries and during the later period of rationalism (1650–1920) who attacked the orthodox Christology of Nicaea and Chalcedon left this teaching alone. Based on the apostolic witness (2 Cor. 5:21; Heb. 4:15; 7:26; 1 Pet. 2:22; 3:18; 1 John 3:5), it has both a negative and a positive meaning. Negatively, it means that Christ was kept free from all transgression of the law of God. He whose “food” it was “to do the will of him who sent [him] and to finish his work” (John 4:34) could challenge his enemies to convict him of sin (John 8:46). Positively, this implies the holiness of Christ (Luke 1:35; 4:34; John 6:69; 10:36; Acts 3:14; 4:27, 30; Heb. 7:26), i.e., his wholehearted commitment to his Father (John 5:30; Heb. 10:7) and to that mission for which he had been sent into the world (John 17:19).

The question that arises, given the fact of Christ’s sinlessness, is whether his alleged temptations were real. The NT narrates a testing immediately after his baptism and before his public ministry (Matt. 4; Luke 4), and it teaches elsewhere that he is one “who in every respect has been tempted as we are” (Heb. 4:15; cf. Luke 22:28). Thus it has been felt important to maintain the reality of temptation against every effort to undermine it, while maintaining Jesus’ sinlessness. The phrases used in the ancient debates between which opinions wavered were whether the Savior was “able not to sin” (potuit non peccare) or “not able to sin” (non potuit peccare), the first emphasizing his identification with sinful humanity and consequent struggle, and the second his identification with God and God’s eternal purpose for the salvation of the world. The position taken by some, that sinlessness and ability to be tempted are mutually exclusive, has been seen as resting on a false assumption. It proceeds “on the assumption that what applies to us applies to Christ; that if there be a close connection for us between our capacity for sin and our struggles, then there must be such a connection for Christ” (Berkouwer). In Christ, however, there is not the inner propensity to sin that there is in every other member of the human race. He had the Holy Spirit without measure to sustain him in his earthly ministry. The temptation narrative in the Gospels is preceded and followed by references to the Holy Spirit: Jesus was “full of the Holy Spirit . . . and was led by the Spirit in the desert, where for forty days he was tempted by the devil” (Luke 4:1–2). Thereafter “Jesus returned to Galilee in the power of the Spirit” (v. 14). Throughout his earthly sojourn, while temptation was real, the God whose life he fully shared (Col. 1:19; 2:9) and who he was (John 1:2; 10:30) kept him from committing any sin and, as important, dedicated to his messianic mission. This latter is the context in which Christ’s temptation and sinlessness must be studied. His struggle was primarily to be a faithful high priest that he, through suffering, might bring many unto God (Luke 24:26; John 12:27; Heb. 2:17–18).

M. E. OSTERHAVEN

See also CHRISTOLOGY; JESUS CHRIST.

Bibliography. G. C. Berkouwer, Person of Christ; A. B. Bruce, Humiliation of Christ; W. Pannenberg, Jesus: God and Man; W. G. T. Shedd, Dogmatic Theology; M. Shuster, “Temptation, Sinlessness, and Sympathy of Jesus: Another Look at the Dilemma of Hebrews 4:15,” Perspectives on Christology, M. Shuster and R. A. Muller, eds.; B. B. Warfield, “Jesus’ Alleged Confession of Sin,” Christology and Criticism.

Sin Offering. See OFFERINGS AND SACRIFICES IN BIBLE TIMES.

Sins, Seven Deadly. At an early stage in the life of the church, the influence of Greek thought (with its tendency to view sin as a necessary flaw in human nature) made it necessary for the church to determine the relative seriousness of various moral faults. This ultimately gave rise to what is commonly referred to as the seven deadly sins—a concept that occupies an important place in the order and discipline of the Roman Catholic Church.

Sins, Seven Deadly

These sins are pride, covetousness, lust, envy, gluttony, anger, and sloth. K. E. Kirk stresses that they are to be understood as “capital” or “root” sins rather than “deadly” or “mortal” (viz., sins which cut one off from his true last end). They are the “sinful propensities which reveal themselves in particular sinful acts.” The list represents an attempt to enumerate the primary instincts that are most likely to give rise to sin.

Even though the original classification may have been monastic in origin (cf. Cassian, Collationes Patrium, v. 10), under the influence of Gregory the Great (who has given us the classical exposition on the subject: Moralia on Job, esp. XXXI.45) the scope was widened, and along with the seven cardinal virtues they came to constitute the moral standards and tests of the early Catholic Church. In medieval scholasticism they were the subject of considerable attention (cf. esp. Aquinas, Summa Theologica, II.ii.).

R. H. MOUNCE

See also CARDINAL VIRTUES, SEVEN; SIN; SIN, MORTAL; SIN, VENIAL.

Bibliography. Fr. Connell, New Baltimore Catechism; H. Fairlie, Seven Deadly Sins Today; K. E. Kirk, Some Principles of Moral Theology; J. Stalker, Seven Deadly Sins.

Sins of Omission. See OMISSION, SINS OF.

Sin unto Death. Unpardonable sin. The precise nature of hamartia pros thanaton in 1 John 5:16 was no longer known even in patristic times, but may be surmised in its exegetical context to mean some form of final impenitence, since every sin repented of is forgiven. Two major sins of impenitence are mentioned in the NT, one in connection with the invasion of the demonic realm by Jesus' exercise of the power of the Holy Spirit, whose presence is rejected by the Pharisees and referred to Beelzebul. This constitutes the unforgivable blasphemy against the Holy Spirit (Matt. 12:22–32). The other reference is to those who have once been enlightened by the Holy Spirit and through unbelief crucify Christ and hold him up to contempt (Heb. 6:4–6; 10:26–29). In these texts the Spirit of grace is outraged, and there is no further access to forgiveness. Behind the sin unto death is the spirit of antichrist, the source of false and counterfeit teaching in the opponents of John (1 John 2:18–23; 3:10; 4:1–3; 2 John 7–9), and of Paul (2 Cor. 11:12–15; Gal. 1:6–9). R. G. GRUENLER

See also BLASPHEMY AGAINST THE HOLY SPIRIT.

Situation Ethics. The contention that every significant moral decision has to be taken “in the light of the circumstances.”

Introduction. Consequences, cost, risk, contrary considerations—all have to be weighed to make moral decisions. There never are exact precedents; every situation is unique in some particular. Every system of moral rules, laws, and principles therefore gives rise to casuistry, formal and authoritative, like the Jesuit Summae de Poenitentia, or informal and advisory, like the Puritan Baxter's Christian Directory. These adjust general principles to particular circumstances, allow exceptions, and discuss “cases of conscience.” There can be no absolute, invariable moral rules that govern all situations; even so brief a law as “Thou shalt not kill” did not apply equally to murderers, adulterers, war, sacrifices, or food. “Circumstances alter cases,” it is said, and from this it is an easy step to pronounce all moral codes out of date in a world “come of age.”

This position is of course attractive to the modern revolt against authority of all kinds, but it accords also with two other contemporary influences. First, the shrinking of the world through communication and travel into one “global village” has emphasized the great variety and inconsistency of existing ethical systems, undermining all. Second, the increasing complexity of modern life, with multiplying moral dilemmas (nuclear war, abortion, contraception, drug addiction, genetic engineering, and the like), has exposed the inadequacy of all existing codes to answer questions posed by contemporary situations.

This lack of adequate, predetermined directions is the essential truth that situation ethics erects into the only principle in ethical theory. It builds thereon a so-called new morality, which repudiates all rules, guidelines, laws, principles, or enshrining of past experience or superior authority, and reduces morality to instant, individual, intuitive, and isolated decisions, varying with every situation.

To distinguish “moral” behavior from merely capricious, anarchic, amoral reactions to circumstances, it is necessary to presuppose some standard or “norm” of morality, by reference to which the quality of a given decision may be described. Various single norms have been proposed—self-consistency, compassion, utility, truth, pleasure—or even a scale of norms; but situation ethics has generally selected love as the sole and all-sufficient norm of moral action.

Major ethical studies had focused upon “the-will-of-God-for-community” (Brunner), “openness to the demand of love” (Barth), or “letting the love of God flow through us” (Nygren). This emphasis was consonant with the search of a divided world for social cohesiveness, a collectivist reply to excessive individualism, and a deeper understanding of man as “person in relationship.” Nygren’s summary, “Where love is, no other precepts are requisite,” enshrines the theme of situation ethics.

Popular Forms. In its popularized form, situation ethics does not, however, depend upon Christian insights. Its chief exponent, Joseph Fletcher, quotes scriptural phrases and precedents whenever convenient, and cites eight “proof texts” for his “love norm,” including the words of Jesus about the great commandment and Paul on love’s fulfilling the law, but he sees nothing particularly different or unique in a Christian’s choices. Lovingness is the motive at work with full force behind the decisions of many non-Christians.

Moreover, Fletcher rejects all revealed norms but the command to love. Nothing outside a situation, such as historical revelation, can enter into a situation to prejudge it. Jesus had no rules or system of values; revered principles, even the Ten Commandments, may be thrown aside if they conflict with love. To break the seventh commandment may be good: it depends whether love is fully served. Sexual intercourse before marriage—if the decision is made “Christianly”—could be right. There is no personal ethic, since morality rests on love-relationship; this makes the Sermon on the Mount largely superfluous. Paradoxically, by resting all upon the agent’s instant, intuitive reaction to circumstances, situation ethics precludes any generalized pattern of morality applicable to others, or to society—another distinctly un-Christian flavor.

“Faith working through love” offers a foundation for the love norm, but it is not essential; a sincere, intelligent, and wise man may reject Christ without affecting his situationist morality. The basis of the norm is our decision that it shall be love; for some, this will rest on a previous decision (not disclosure) that God is love.

Support is found in a famous saying of Augustine, “Love, and do what you like”—“six blessed monosyllables, part of the stock-in-trade of the emancipated,” which make Augustine the patron saint of the “new morality.” This well illustrates the danger of slogan-thinking, for in context (Homilies, 1 John 7:8; 10:7) Augustine is contending that it is loving to use the forces of the state to compel Donatist heretics to “come in” to the orthodox gospel feast; the argument of an uneasy conscience seeking sadly to prove that a “loving” end justifies any means used, and a principle that laid the foundation for all religious persecution thereafter. Plainly everything depends upon what is included in loving conduct.

But in situation ethics only one thing is intrinsically good—love, “a way of relating to persons and using things.” The end sought, love, is the only criterion, and alone justifies the means. There are no prescribed rules—only love. The only question to be raised in any situation is, What will produce the most love? One does not recite texts, duties, commandments, virtues, obligations, nor estimate consequences: one reacts in every situation as the free self, exercising responsible love, and does or avoids as love requires. This attitude simplifies, liberates, suffices. No other guidance is necessary or possible in so new an age. And because modern situations can be so very complex, love may well find itself sacrificing others (to preserve war secrets); telling lies; stealing; indulging homosexual, autosexual, promiscuous, or adulterous practices; dropping atomic bombs; approving abortion, prostitution, or polygamy.

Evaluation. On the surface there is much that is attractive to Christians. “The only law is Christ’s law of love”; but the master criterion remains essentially vague, because what love aims at is left undefined. It is wholly individualist, impulsive, born-of-the-situation; all obligations are dissolved in loving impulse. It may be true that such “love” is not peculiar to Christians: however, Christian love is.

If the norm is claimed to be the love taught by Jesus, then it is inconsistent to desert his concept of love as the fulfilling, not the abrogating, of divine law; to argue that Jesus was right only about love, but wrong on chastity, divorce, self-discipline, the commandments of God; and quite false to claim his authority of whatever “love” excuses—abortion, extramarital sex, lies, and the rest. Where Christ’s authority is claimed, Christ’s meaning must be retained. Fletcher nowhere reasons out what love requires; the Gospels are full of illustrations of what Jesus meant by it, while it is abundantly clear from the whole NT that Christian love positively forbids fornication, adultery, murder, falsehood, stealing, and much else. What love requires, and excludes, is not left to intuitive, uninstructed impulse.

Thus, though the apparent simplification is also attractive, the love norm, rightly paramount, is not self-sufficient. A great deal must be assumed about the Christian goal for life, and for individuals, about the Christian scale of values, about what is truly good for our neighbors, and about the will of God in each situation, before love knows what to do. The “situation,” too, is itself no accident, but an opportunity into which providence has brought the Christian, with indications of duty and divine guidance. Considerable insight, knowledge, and spiritual maturity are presupposed. Situation ethics is at best a final stage in moral growth, succeeding earlier stages that need guidelines, borrowed experience, and clear instruction. Fletcher tacitly acknowledges this, by supposing love to include intelligence, information, foresight, prudence, and much more.

Finally, the practical immediacy of situation ethics is attractive to Christians. It suggests that the individual is “open to the inspiration of the moment” as to what he ought to do. But the Christian self is not totally open to on-the-spot prompting of capricious love—just because he is Christian. He confronts every situation with mind and heart already shaped by Christian experience, inheriting (to some degree) the long Christian tradition of what is right, and committed to Christian belief and obedience. With the example of Jesus before his eyes, he enters every new situation having “the mind of Christ.” His norm of behavior, therefore, though it must certainly be applied to varied and unprecedented situations, is in fact rooted in the past, expressed in the incarnation of the ideal in Christ.

Situation Ethics

The alert modern Christian does face each novel situation afresh and looks to the inspiration of the Spirit of Jesus to know how to act in love: but the guidelines are clear. His norm for all circumstances is the imitation of Christ. Shorn of exaggeration, and focused upon Jesus, situation ethics has much to teach those who imagine quotation of ancient texts a sufficient guide to contemporary problems.

R. E. O. WHITE

See also ETHICAL SYSTEMS, CHRISTIAN; ETHICS, BIBLICAL; LOVE.

Bibliography. G. H. Clark, DCE 623–24; J. Fletcher, Situation Ethics; A. Nygren, Agape and Eros; N. H. G. Robinson, Groundwork of Christian Ethics; G. Woods, “Situation Ethics,” Christian Ethics and Contemporary Philosophy, I. T. Ramsey, ed.

Six Articles, (1539). One of a series of regulations designed to maintain unity in the Church of England under Henry VIII, during that period when the church was independent of the pope but still not officially Protestant. Henry (reigned 1509–47) had broken with the pope in 1533 over his divorce from Catherine of Aragon and over the question of who had ultimate sovereignty in England. He did not, however, have any desire to abandon Catholic theology. His counselors, however, including Thomas Cromwell and the new archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Cranmer, wished to see a doctrinal reformation in England as well as an ecclesiastical one. One of their tactics was to encourage Henry to negotiate with the Lutherans of Germany. The Ten Articles of 1536 emerged from such negotiations. They were still generally Roman Catholic, but also reflected Protestant influence—they neglected to mention Catholic teaching on transubstantiation in the Lord’s Supper; they gave a nearly Protestant definition of justification by faith; and they mentioned only three of the seven traditional sacraments.

Henry was not pleased with the unrest this and similar reforming measures stimulated. At the same time, moreover, Henry’s negotiations with Lutheran princes, which had once seemed promising, were turning sour. As a result he urged his new parliament in 1539 to pass legislation reaffirming Catholic doctrine in England. The result was the Six Articles, revised personally by the king, who also argued for them before Parliament. The articles reaffirmed transubstantiation, ordered lay people to refrain from the cup in Communion, and upheld the celibacy of the clergy. They also proclaimed the immutability of monastic vows, defended the saying of private masses, and stressed the importance of auricular confession. Protestants, understandably, called this “the bloody whip with six strings.” Hugh Latimer, who would later be burned at the stake under the Catholic Queen Mary, was forced out of his bishopric as a result of these articles, and Archbishop Cranmer felt compelled to send his wife back to her native Germany. The Six Articles were eloquent testimony to Henry’s desire to slow the pace of reform in England and to preserve order in his country.

M. A. NOLL

See also TEN ARTICLES.

Bibliography. A. G. Dickens, English Reformation; G. R. Elton, Reform and Reformation: England 1509–1558.

Slavery. A state of involuntary servitude. Slavery was an accepted fact in the ancient world and a significant factor in economic and societal life. Slaves were frequently the product of defeats in wars. Often entire populations, as well as soldiers, were enslaved. The sale of slaves became a cornerstone of business in the Greco-Roman world, reaching its peak in the pre-Christian second century. Delos, in 100 B.C., was an important slave mart where as many as ten thousand slaves were imported and sold in a day. The Emperor Titus after his Palestinian campaign sold ninety thousand Jews into bondage.

The state of the slave varied. Some were impressed into gangs that worked the fields and mines. Others were highly skilled workers and trusted administrators. Frequently slaves were far better off than free laborers. Roman laws were passed to protect slaves and to allow rights, even of private possessions, which were sometimes used to ransom the slave and his family (Acts 22:27–28). By the first century the slave population had become so large in the Roman world it created problems. Uprisings were frequent and owners were fearful and suspicious. If a slave attacked his master, every slave in the household was killed. In 136 B.C. some seventy thousand slaves in Sicily withstood Rome for four years. Until the time of Christian emperors, the penalty for rebellion was crucifixion. Due to the need for free citizens to perform civil duties, including military, between 81 and 49 B.C. five hundred thousand slaves were manumitted. The capital had a population of only eight hundred thousand at that time. Among those freed in Rome, many were Jews who took Roman names, as evidenced in catacomb inscriptions.

In the OT. In the OT slavery was a legally prescribed institution and generally more humanitarian than in the Near East. Since in Israel it was economically preferable to have work done by laborers, slavery was less extensive. Slaves generally performed household duties or labored with the family in the fields. Slaves were acquired by purchase, in payment of debt, by inheritance, by birth, and as prisoners of war. OT instances show a father selling a daughter (Exod. 21:7, Neh. 5:5), a widow selling children (2 Kings 4:1), and people selling themselves (Lev. 25:39; Deut. 15:12–17). A person might be freed by purchase (Lev. 25:48–55), sabbatical year law (Exod. 21:1–11; Deut. 15:12–18), the jubilee year (Lev. 25:8–55), or the death of the master (Gen. 15:2). Slaves were considered part of the owner's family and, if Hebrews, had the right to the sabbath rest and to participate in the religious feasts. They were allowed possessions, even slaves. Often the wife and the slave-concubine had the same privileges and were indistinguishable. The slave was protected from cruel practices, especially life-threatening acts (Exod. 21:20). Man stealing was condemned strongly (Exod. 21:16). Israel as a nation knew bondage in Egypt and thus the exodus experience plays a major role in both the OT and the NT. Likewise, it is a significant theme in the liberation theologies.

In the NT. The early church did not attack slavery as an institution. It did, however, reorder the relationship of slave and masters (Philem.), indicate that in God's sight there was neither "slave nor free" (Gal. 3:28), and state that both were accountable to God (Eph. 6:5–9). The interpersonal relationship was recast in terms of the character of Christ and his kingdom. The full impact of this did not fully appear until after the Reformation when the biblical truth of the personal dignity of man was asserted.

In Church History. In the first Christian centuries slavery was an accepted fact, as custom evidences. Slaves could not be baptized without the master's testimony if the master was a Christian. Nor could the slave be ordained unless his master was a Christian and allowed freedom to serve. Similarly the slave could not marry or enter a monastery unless the master permitted. Easter was an occasion when in celebration of the resurrection slaves were frequently freed. Despite Justinian's (527–65) effort to eliminate slavery, the number of slaves again grew, and after the empire's collapse merged into serfdom. The Crusades accentuated slavery on both sides, with Rome serving as a slave trade center and Venice selling even Christian slaves to Muslims. In the fifteenth century the modern slave trade emerged, principally under the Portuguese. The discovery of America called for black labor, causing the trade to flourish.

Some fifteen million slaves were transported to the Americas, mostly to the West Indies and South America. Among the minority elements of Christianity opposition to slavery was voiced against great odds. The Quakers (1671), Moravians, Methodists, and evangelicals in England and America raised a standard against the evil of slavery. John Wesley wrote an antislavery tract. Often, unfortunately, conservative voices in the churches opposed abolition and all too slowly came to see the light. These forces frequently united with selfish political and economic interest in support of slavery without fully realizing the implications of their actions. Under the efforts of evangelical leaders such as Granville Sharp, William Wilberforce, and Thomas Clarkson slavery was outlawed in Britain in 1807, and in 1827 in the empire. The U.S. Congress brought the slave trade to a close in January 1808, but the interstate slave trade and the breeding of slaves flourished. In the U.S. the Roman Catholic and Protestant Episcopal churches did not take a stand on slavery, but most other bodies split North and South on the issue.

W. N. KERR

See also ABOLITIONISM.

Bibliography. G. W. Barnes, Anti-Slavery Impulse; J. O. Buswell III, Slavery, Segregation and Scripture; R. Coupland, British Anti-Slave Movement; D. B. Davis, Problem of Slavery in the Age of Revolution; Problem of Slavery in Western Culture; M. I. Finley, ed., Slavery in Classical Antiquity; J. H. Franklin, From Slavery to Freedom: A History of Negro Americans; J. Mendlesohn, Slavery in the Ancient Near East; W. L. Westermann, Slave System of Greek and Roman Antiquity; T. Wiedemann, Greek and Roman Slavery.

Smalcald Articles (1537). Articles of belief named for the town in Hesse-Nassau, Germany, where they were presented to Protestant leaders; now part of the Book of Concord, the normative collection of Lutheran confessions. The Articles were occasioned by the call of Pope Paul III for a council at Mantua. Invited to attend, the German Protestants through Elector John Frederick of Saxony asked Luther to prepare a confession for them to submit. Luther wrote them during Christmas 1536. Together with his Small and Large catechisms, they comprise his contribution to the Book of Concord. Illness prevented Luther's attendance when the princes and theologians met in February 1537 at Smalcald. Luther's articles were subscribed by most of the theologians in attendance. The princes delayed action, declaring their refusal to recognize the council, which never did convene. The Smalcald Articles are grouped in three parts: (1) those concerning "the chief articles" of "the Divine Majesty," about which there was no controversy with Rome, as the Trinity; (2) those concerning “the articles which refer to the office and work of Jesus Christ or our redemption,” about which there was controversy with Rome and no compromise was possible, as justification by grace alone through faith; (3) those concerning miscellaneous matters, about which there was controversy but which were open to negotiation, as monastic vows and the marriage of priests. The articles were valued as “a bold, clear-cut testimony of the Lutheran position” and as a testimony of Luther’s personal faith, for he wrote them at a time when he felt his death was near. Published by Luther in 1538, a Latin translation appeared in 1541. By 1553 they were named the Smalcald Articles in an edition issued at Weimar. Within a generation they won wide approval in Lutheran Germany and were included in the Book of Concord. Attached to them was the “Treatise on the Power and Primacy of the Pope” (1537) by Philip Melancthon. It was officially adopted at Smalcald and, while intended to supplement the Augsburg Confession, it became associated with the articles.

Smalcald Articles

C. G. FRY

See also AUGSBURG CONFESSION; CONCORD, BOOK OF.

Bibliography. W. D. Allbeck, Studies in the Lutheran Confessions; R. D. Preus, Getting into the Theology of Concord; D. P. Scaer, Getting into the Story of Concord; T. G. Tappert et al., trans. and eds., Book of Concord.

Small Catechism, Luther’s. See LUTHER’S SMALL CATECHISM.

Smith, Hannah Whitall (1832–1911). Writer, teacher, and social reformer. Hannah Whitall Smith was one of the outstanding women in her time. Her best-known book, Christian’s Secret of a Happy Life, after appearing in her husband’s magazine Christian’s Pathway of Power (Feb. 1874–Jan. 1875) in serial form, was published by the Willard Tract Repository, Boston, and Morgan and Scott, London, in 1875. It has gone through numerous editions and been translated into most of the major languages of the world.

Born in Philadelphia in 1832, Hannah married Robert Pearsall Smith, also a Quaker. They “joined successively the Methodists, the Plymouth Brethren and the Baptists; and then they set out . . . to preach the Higher Life.”

The Smiths both preached extensively in Europe and played an important part in founding the Keswick Convention and leading the Higher Life Movement, but severed their connections with it after some years and returned to America. After an unfortunate incident between Robert and a young woman, he discontinued preaching and later abandoned his faith entirely.

Hannah, however, continued preaching and writing, and worked eagerly in the Women’s Christian Temperance Movement and in the Women’s Suffrage Movement.

She and her husband returned to England permanently in 1886, where she continued to write—and occasionally to preach.

In her widely disseminated book, the secret of a happy Christian life is explained as “a life of inward rest and outward victory.” It exists when a Christian is saved not only from sin’s “guilt” but also “from the power and dominion of sin.” She speaks of “the infiniteness of God’s power for destroying that which is contrary to Him (which is ‘sin’)” and extols “God’s power,” which “comes to help us and to redeem us out of sin.” It is an attainment the believer receives through faith, with consecration to God as a prerequisite to faith.

The Holiness Movement, stemming out of John Wesley, has claimed Smith as a popularizer of its doctrine of entire sanctification as a second definite work of grace.

J. K. GRIDER

See also HOLINESS MOVEMENT, AMERICAN; KESWICK CONVENTION.

Bibliography. H. W. Smith, Difficulties of Life; Religious Fanaticism; Unselfishness of God and How I Discovered It: A Spiritual Autobiography; M. E. Dieter, Holiness Revival in the Nineteenth Century; M. Henry, Secret Life of Hannah Whitall Smith; L. P. Smith, Religious Rebel: The Letters of “H. W. S.”; B. Strachey, Remarkable Relations; R. Strachey, Group Movements of the Past and Experiments in Guidance; Quaker Grandmother: Hannah Whitall Smith; R. J. Stewart, Being a Child in the Father’s House: The Life of Faith in the Works of Hannah Whitall Smith.

Smith, Joseph. See MORMONISM.

Social Ethics. The study of questions of good and evil, right and wrong, obligation and prohibition as these arise in a social context.

Introduction and Definition. Public policy, politics, economics, war, poverty, education, racism, ecology, and crime: these are examples of the subject matter of social ethics. The task of social ethics can best be understood in contrast to other related fields. In contrast to social history studies, what was the situation in the past, and social science, what is the situation, social ethics is concerned with what ought to be—with the values and norms against which the past and present are to be judged. While social ethics has a task distinctive from those of social history and social science, it cannot be successful in this endeavor without an ongoing interaction with these related fields.

As in the case of other subfields of ethics, social ethics may be approached descriptively (What is the character of this morality? This ethical language?) or prescriptively (I propose this set of values, these norms and principles, this way of resolving an ethical dilemma). A further distinction must be made between ethical discernment and ethical implementation. Social ethics includes reflection both on the problem of analysis and discernment of the social good and on the problem of strategy and implementation of the social good. Just as dogmatic theology exists to serve the church in its proclamation and worship, social ethics exists to serve the world by means of social reforms that will bring it into closer conformity to what is just, good, and right.

It is impossible to maintain a clear and precise distinction between social ethics and personal (individual) ethics. No individual behavior is without social implications. No social situation or problem is without individual repercussions. Nevertheless, for analytical purposes it is helpful to treat social ethics as a field in its own right and to direct primary attention to the ethical aspects of social groups, institutions, and corporate problems (racial, economic, political, etc). By contrast, then, personal ethics focuses on the individual moral agent.

As in the case of personal ethics, social ethics addresses two general sets of questions (each of which has a discernment and an implementation aspect as noted above). The first has to do with being (character) and the second with doing (specific decision and action). While the latter (reflection on specific, immediate ethical dilemmas) is an often urgent task for social ethics, the former is at least equally important. That is, behind specific acts and dilemmas exist ongoing attitudes, arrangements, and processes which may be just or unjust, good or evil. This is the problem of corporate and structured evil. For social ethics, good and evil are not located merely in individual moral agents nor in specific decisions and actions: they are also attributes of institutions, traditions, social arrangements, and processes.

Only in the last century has social ethics come into its own as an academic specialization in philosophy, theology, and religious studies departments. For Christian social ethics, however, it is essential to recognize that the subject matter of social ethics has received great attention throughout the Bible, from Genesis to Revelation. So too, most leaders and teachers of the Christian church over the past two millennia have given attention to social ethics, even if the label itself has not been employed. A contemporary Christian social ethics should be rooted in and governed by Holy Scripture as the word of God. It should be informed by the witness and experience of the church throughout history. And it should be in fruitful dialogue with social history and social science, as suggested earlier.

Analysis and Discernment. The first task of Christian social ethics is the analysis of structures and situations and the discernment of good and evil in relation to these.

Revelation and Observation. Christian social ethical analysis proceeds in a dialectic between revelation, the word of God "from above," and observation and experience "from below." A sociological realism must probe beneath surface problems to a correct discernment of the fundamental forces and problems of our society. What is the framework and what are the main currents just under the surface of current events and dilemmas? At the same time, analysis and discernment are informed by biblical revelation, by the Word of God. From the Genesis account of God's questioning of Adam, Eve, and Cain, through Jesus Christ's questioning of Peter and the disciples, social ethics is rooted in this Word of God. God not only illuminates, corrects, and deepens our observations of social reality, he also raises new issues and problems often undetected by even the most realistic sociological analysis. Thus Christian social ethics has a distinctive role to play in the broader society by giving expression to God's revealed perspectives on human affairs.

Creation. Much of traditional theological social ethics has been shaped by appeals to orders of creation (or "spheres" or "mandates"). The orders of the family and marriage, politics and the state, work and economics, and sometimes others have been understood not only by reference to biblical revelation but also by common sense, reason, and natural law. Each order or sphere has its own distinctive purpose and corresponding ethical framework. All orders are under the final sovereignty of God. Critics of this position have argued that (1) we live in a fallen world in which appeals to a lost creation are misguided, and (2) the Bible itself rarely, if ever, develops an "ethics of creation."

Whether or not social ethics is founded primarily on orders of creation, certain elements of the biblical revelation on creation have ongoing importance for Christian social ethics (cf. Gen. 1-2). The ethical "good" is defined by the will, word, and work of God. Humanity is intended to be cohumanity: a social, joyful partnership of human beings before God ("It is not good that man should dwell alone"). A positive view of politics and the state sees them as rooted in, and implied by, the social nature of created humanity. Marriage is implicitly monogamous and characterized by partnership before God. Work is fundamentally a matter of creativity (in the image of the Creator) and stewardship ("till the earth and subdue it").

Fall. As important as the doctrine of creation for Christian social ethics is the revelation concerning the fall. The fall (Gen. 3) indicates that evil originates in rebellion against God and disobedience to his command. Evil is manifested in accusation, division, and the domination of one human being over another (Adam and Eve, Cain and Abel). Cain's departure from the presence of God in favor of building his own city and society (Gen. 4) and the subsequent revelation concerning the city (Babel/Babylon, Nineveh, etc.) complete this initial description of social evil. Its essential characteristics are pride, disobedience to God, accusation, division, domination, exploitation, violence, and the will to power.

Later perspectives in Hebrew-Christian thought developed this view of the fall in terms of the enmity of cosmic "principalities and powers" against the purposes of God. Social structures and forces can have a demonic, corporate aspect. Evil is not merely an individual phenomenon but a corporate, structural matter. In this light, the state (or work, or money) is ethically ambiguous: it can be the promoter of cohumanity, the restrainer of social evil, or the habitat of the rebellious powers. Both social history and social science, using different terminology and research methods, corroborate the biblical revelation on the ambiguous, transpersonal, and structural potential of the state (and other social institutions).

Law and Justice. Christian social ethics, indeed all social ethics, often centers on the problem of justice and its institutionalization in law. The relationship between divine, revealed moral law and positive, civil law has been the subject of extensive reflection by Thomas Aquinas, John Calvin, and many other classical Christian thinkers. Christian social ethics must be informed, not only by the example of ancient Israel's theocracy (in which the connections between the Ten Commandments and the Book of the Covenant and Holiness Code are fairly direct), but also by the example of Israel in exile and captivity (where the people of the Word lived in an alien situation).

In any case, justice (righteousness, judgment) is one of the most important ethical norms for Christian social ethics. "I am the LORD, who exercises kindness, justice and righteousness on earth; for in these I delight" (Jer. 9:24). God "works righteousness and justice for all the oppressed" (Ps. 103:6). Biblical justice is more than fairness and equality. It is revealed to be a redress of grievances for the benefit of the oppressed. It is not so much in tension with love as inclusive of love and mercy. In an era in which justice and law have been reduced, in many respects, to quantitative, technical terms, Christian social ethics must give voice to the biblical concept of justice: qualitative, of divine origin and human concern.

The Kingdom of God. Even the most intransigent orders-of-creation social ethicists acknowledge that a new order of redemption takes its place in society with the coming of Jesus Christ and the founding of the church. This church is (or is supposed to be) the primary exemplar of the kingdom of God, which is in tension with the kingdom of this world. In Augustine's terms, the most important constitutive factors in social history are the city of God and the earthly city. The former is powered by caritas, love for God, and the latter by cupiditas, love for self. For Martin Luther, the two kingdoms are distinctive in that the kingdom of God is a matter of interior faith, while the civil kingdom concerns external affairs. For Augustine, Luther, and others, of course, the picture is considerably more complex than these summaries. Nevertheless, there remains a distinction to be made in Christian social ethics between the corporate reality that takes Jesus Christ as its point of departure, and everything else.

It is in Jesus Christ that the word of God is most clearly and fully revealed—for social ethics as for everything else. The social teaching of Jesus is given in his "platform" statement (Luke 4:18–21), in the temptation (Matt. 4), in his parables and discourses, in the Sermon on the Mount (chs. 5–7), in his farewell discourse (John 13–17), and in the events of the crucifixion and resurrection. The great commands to love God and love one's neighbor, the call to unqualified servanthood and sacrifice, the Golden Rule, the call to simplicity and away from worship of material things, and so on give the essential dimensions of Jesus' social ethics. Christian social ethics must reflect not only on the traditional, mainline interpretations of the meaning of Jesus Christ, the kingdom of God, and the love command, but also on the interpretation and application of this social teaching by Franciscans, Anabaptists, Quakers, and others who have developed a social ethic based on Jesus Christ.

Eschatology. Christian social ethics is fundamentally eschatological in nature. That is, it leans toward the future and complete arrival of the judgment and grace of God. More than the original creation, it is the new creation which is invoked for ethical guidance in the NT. The kingdom of God, which is truly here (in part), will be (fully) revealed at the end. Jesus Christ is the new Adam. The Holy Spirit is the down payment on the future—not merely the echo of the original creation. History moves toward the new Jerusalem, not back to a golden age in Eden. For these reasons, the Apocalypse has particular social ethical significance in revealing God's final ethical judgment on human society in terms of Babylon (Rev. 18) and the new Jerusalem (ch. 21).

It is in this final judgment that the principalities and powers are finally and totally dethroned, completing the work of Jesus Christ, who, "having disarmed the powers and authorities, . . . made a public spectacle of them, triumphing over them by the cross" (Col. 2:15). Babylon is the habitation of Satan and the principalities and powers. It is condemned for allowing the merchants of the earth to grow rich from her excessive luxuries, for her pride and power, for her mistreatment of saints, prophets, and apostles, for trafficking in the bodies and souls of human beings, for violence and bloodshed. The new Jerusalem, by contrast, is the place where God dwells, where death, mourning, and pain are eliminated, where the thirsty and hungry are satisfied, where nothing shameful or deceitful occurs, where the city gates are open to all the nations. Given the prominent eschatological thrust of biblical social ethics, Christian ethics takes seriously this final apocalyptic scenario in discerning what is good and evil socially.

Strategy and Implementation. The first task of Christian social ethics, then, is the analysis and discernment of social good and evil, drawing on social history, social science, and, above all, biblical social ethics. The second task is to reflect on the relation between Christ and culture—that is, between the ethical command of God and the social situation. It is the problem of strategy and implementation.

Traditional Perspectives. Contemporary reflection on how Christian (or religious) conviction relates to society has been influenced a great deal by social historians and social scientists. While Karl Marx, Émile Durkheim, and others have also had considerable influence, this reflection is most often indebted to pioneering studies done by Max Weber, Ernst Troeltsch, and H. Richard Niebuhr. Weber's studies of the role of prophetism and charisma, his fourfold typology of the relation of religious groups to the world (innerworldly and otherworldly asceticism, innerworldly and otherworldly mysticism), and his classic study Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism continue to be an important point of departure for reflection of problems of strategy and implementation of Christian social ethical concern.

Ernst Troeltsch's Social Teaching of the Christian Churches proposed and gave voluminous historical illustration to a threefold typology of church, sect, and mystical association. H. R. Niebuhr elaborated and modified Troeltsch's typology into five categories, which remain influential in many current discussions. "Christ against culture" is represented by the sectarian, Anabaptist approach. "The Christ of culture" is represented by Ritschl and the accommodationist approach. "Christ above culture" is represented by Thomas Aquinas and a synthetic approach. "Christ and culture in paradox" is represented by Luther and the dualist approach. "Christ the transformer of culture" is represented by Augustine and the conversionist approach.

Social scientific and historical typologies such as the above are not able to do full justice to individual traditions. Nor do they take adequate account of the "denominational" and "laicized" character of contemporary society. Sixteenth- (or even nineteenth-) century categories and divisions are not directly transferable and applicable to the late twentieth century. Nevertheless, reflection of contemporary strategy and implementation is greatly impoverished without taking into account these traditional perspectives.

Prayer and Evangelism. From the point of view of biblical social ethics, the two activities of prayer and evangelism must not be underestimated as strategies for social change. Basic to the Judeo-Christian worldview is the conviction that God participates and intervenes in human history, partly, at least, in response to the prayer of the people. Entreaties, prayers, petitions, and thanksgivings are to be made in behalf of all people, including those with political authority (1 Tim. 2:1–2). Prayer is thus, among other things, a political and social activity of great importance.

It is also basic to the Christian outlook to proclaim the gospel of Jesus Christ in the hope that men and women will come to know him as Savior, Lord, and God. While social ethics is concerned primarily with corporate and structural good and evil, it is partly by means of individual moral agents that corporate, institutional reality is affected. Evangelism, among other things, brings about social change by means of the transformation of social actors, individual moral agents.

Alternative Community. Far from being an uncaring, irresponsible withdrawal from social responsibility, the formation of alternative Christian community plays an important role in implementing social ethical change. The primary alternative community is the church (in both its local and broader senses). Intentionally Christian businesses, schools, political groups, and other associations are other means by which this strategy may be employed.

Alternative Christian communities have a fivefold significance for the implementation of social concern. First, the community is an essential context for moral deliberation and discernment. The individual gifts and abilities of members of the community combine to discern the best possible responses to the complex issues and dilemmas of contemporary society. Second, the very existence of the community (with its ultimate commitment to Jesus Christ) contributes to the health of society by "opening up" the social order. Totalitarian, monistic tendencies are held in check by the existence of alternative communities in society. Third, the Christian community furnishes society with an example of "another way" of dealing with various social problems (leadership patterns, welfare activities, and so on). Fourth, the community can function as a laboratory in which various reforms can be tested, refined, and demonstrated. Fifth, the community prepares and assists individuals who go out from the community into the various structures and situations in the broader society. It is a resource not only for discernment but for social action.

Social Ethics

Institutional Participation. As Moses, Daniel, Paul, and other biblical figures demonstrate, direct participation in the political (and other) structures and institutions of society is another strategy available for the implementation of social ethical concern. Especially in circumstances where Christians (along with others) are invited to exercise political and social responsibility, it is appropriate to regard institutional participation as a valid means of implementing ethical conviction. Electoral politics, legislative reforms, business and professional activities, and public education are examples of institutional spheres where participation might be called for. The boundaries of such participation are established by two criteria. First, no Christian is ever authorized to violate the command of God: we ought always, in cases of conflict, to “obey God rather than men” (Acts 5:29). Second, no Christian individual or group is ever authorized to unilaterally impose (coercively) the moral standards of the kingdom of God on the world. Christians are to be the salt of the earth, the light of the world, and sheep among wolves: they have presence and impact, but not by way of coercion and domination.

Means and Ends. Biblical Christian social ethics, in both discernment and implementation, defies easy categorization as deontological (doing what is right without regard to consequences) or teleological (the end justifies the means) ethics. In particular, however, a teleological approach violates the biblical message. Under no circumstances are evil means justified or permissible (Rom. 6). The Christian is called to “overcome evil with good” (12:21). Since the means chosen affect the character of the end, a good end can be achieved only by the use of good means. Justice will be achieved only with just means; peace with peaceful means; freedom or equality with means that are characterized by freedom and equality. Christian reflection on strategy and implementation of the good that is discerned will always stress this indissoluble relationship between means and ends.

D. W. GILL

See also ABORTION; ETHICAL SYSTEMS, CHRISTIAN; ETHICS, BIBLICAL; SITUATION ETHICS.

Bibliography. P. C. Cotham, ed., Christian Social Ethics; C. F. H. Henry, Aspects of Christian Social Ethics; S. C. Mott, Biblical Ethics and Social Change; H. R. Niebuhr, Christ and Culture; G. Winter, ed., Social Ethics; J. H. Yoder, Politics of Jesus.

Social Gospel. The term “social gospel,” with its present association with theologically liberal, moderately reformist Protestant social thought, came into use about 1900 to describe that Protestant effort to apply biblical principles to the growing problems of the emerging urban-industrial America during the decades between the Civil War and World War I.

Considered to be probably a uniquely American movement in theology, the social gospel also stands as part of a rich Judeo-Christian heritage of response to human need, with roots in the OT and the NT, and with antecedents in every era of church history. Its more immediate debt included the writings and program with which English and continental churchmen and theologians like Charles Kingsley and John Frederick Denison Maurice had begun responding to similar social distress. In the United States, social gospel roots included such nineteenth-century clergymen as Stephen Colwell, whose New Themes for the Protestant Clergy was published in 1851, and the revivalists whose story Timothy L. Smith has related in Revivalism and Social Reform in Mid-Nineteenth Century America.

The uniqueness of the social gospel resided, then, not in its discontinuity from the past, but in its resourcefulness in applying Christian principles to complex and massive problems during a critical transition in American social history.

A major part of the difficulty encountered in that application was the opposition by advocates of the dominant laissez-faire individualism of the nineteenth century. The intense struggle resulted in overreaction on the part of advocates of the new order; the twentieth century came to be as one-sided in its emphasis on social causes and cures as the nineteenth had been in its stress on the individual.

Equally significant in the unfolding identity of Protestant social Christianity in the progressive era were the large-scale defections from historic Christian orthodoxy that resulted from developments in the sciences and in biblical studies. Many of the clergy who led in the accommodation to the new science and the conclusions of the “higher critics” were also advocates of the social gospel, a fact that increasingly polarized conservative Christians against the movement.

Historians have tended to identify three kinds of responses within the social Christianity of that era, including conservative individualism, socialistic/radical, and progressive/moderately reformist. The latter was, of course, the track taken by the social gospel. That general analysis should be qualified by the fact that there was no direct correlation between social concern and theological stance, and that the lines were not very clearly drawn until well into the era. The Salvation Army, an organization occasionally cited as an example of conservative social Christianity, received strong support from prominent social gospelers and was itself an aggressive champion of social service and reform.

The distinctive ideas of the social gospel clustered around the prevailing social and economic crises, and the responses contained within the Bible and Christian history. Opposing the dominant laissez-faire individualism in economic life, with its sanctioning of unrestrained competition, social gospelers pressed for brotherhood that included cooperation between management and labor. They saw in the OT prophets' denunciation of injustice, in the life and teachings of Jesus, and in the immanence of a God of love in human society the sanctions for a contrasting human order. That order would be realized in the kingdom of God, a kingdom in which God's will would be done as human lives expressed his love across the range of their relationships and of society's institutions. And because man was essentially good and perfectible, marked by sin that was a quite curable selfishness, the kingdom would indeed come. To social gospel advocates the early years of the twentieth century appeared to be ushering it in with increasing rapidity.

With immediate antecedents in the midnineteenth century, social Christianity began to take its new shape during the 1870s and 1880s in response to the first of a series of industrial crises, and in the preaching, writing, and organizational activities of a growing number of Protestant clergy. One of the first was Washington Gladden, a Congregationalist minister who has been called the father of the social gospel, and whose lectures on the labor question, published in 1876 as Working People and Their Employers, were one of the first social gospel writings. During the 1880s, in addition to Gladden's ongoing contributions, Josiah Strong and Richard T. Ely published, respectively, Our Country and Social Aspects of Christianity, and Other Essays.

Joining the increasingly prominent movement after 1890 was a young German Baptist pastor, Walter Rauschenbusch, who was to become perhaps the most influential prophet of the social gospel. He and other earnest young clergymen formed the Brotherhood of the Kingdom, one of an increasing number of organizations dedicated to the cause of social Christianity. Settlement houses brought Christian workers into tenement areas. The Social Gospel novel, epitomized in Charles M. Sheldon's phenomenally popular In His Steps, carried the message of social Christianity to the laity. And The Salvation Army, Christian Herald, and other evangelical organizations formalized and expanded their social outreach programs, spearheading a growing evangelical foray into the arena of social service and reform.

The high tide of the social gospel movement occurred during the years after 1900 as individuals like Lyman Abbott, Charles Henderson, Shailer Mathews, Frances Peabody, Charles Stelzle, Graham Taylor, and a host of institutional churches and other organizations began or continued their efforts. Walter Rauschenbusch burst into national prominence with his Christianity and the Social Crisis (1907), followed a few years later by Social Principles of Jesus (1916) and Theology for the Social Gospel (1917). The major supporting denominations—Baptists, Congregationalists, Episcopalians, Methodists, and Presbyterians—established commissions, while the churches in concert in 1908 formed the federal Council of Churches, an agency that gave high priority to the social gospel as expressed in its "social creed." A new and Christian century appeared to be well under way.

The deaths of Washington Gladden and Walter Rauschenbusch in 1918 symbolized the dramatic change that came with World War I and its aftermath of political and economic chaos abroad and isolationism and reaction in the United States. While the social gospel continued into the 1930s, it was increasingly undermined by a changing national temper that included the gradual decline of liberal theology in the mainline churches.

The demise of the social gospel movement did not mean the death of its central emphasis upon applying Christian principles to social problems and to human need. In the civil rights and anti-war movements of recent decades, and in the radical social stance of the National and World Councils of Churches, some see continuity with the classical social gospel. Evangelicals have returned, meanwhile, to the social concern and action that had marked them until near the eve of World War I. In both cases the ongoing social Christianity appears to be less marked by utopianism and narrowly industrial concerns, and more by social action than was the social gospel itself.

N. A. MAGNUSON

See also GLADDEN, WASHINGTON; GOSPEL, SOCIAL IMPLICATIONS OF; LIBERALISM, THEOLOGICAL; RAUSCHENBUSCH, WALTER.

Bibliography. A. Abell, American Catholicism and Social Action: A Search for Social Justice 1865–1950; Urban Impact in American Protestantism; R. Allen, Social Passion: Religion and Social Reform in Canada, 1914–1928; P. A. Carter, Decline and Revival of the Social Gospel; Spiritual Crisis of the Gilded Age; R. T. Handy, ed., Social Gospel in America, 1870–1920; G. Harkness, Methodist Church in Social Thought and Action; S. P. Hayes, Response to Industrialism, 1885–1914; C. H. Hopkins, Rise of the Social Gospel in American Protestantism; R. D. Knudten, Systematic Thought of Washington Gladden; N. A. Magnuson, Salvation in the Slums: Evangelical Social Work, 1965–1920; H. F. May, Protestant Churches and Industrial America; R. M. Miller, American Protestantism and Social Issues, 1919–1939; R. C. White and C. H. Hopkins, Social Gospel: Religion and Reform in Changing America.

Social Gospel

Social Implications of the Gospel. See GOSPEL, SOCIAL IMPLICATIONS OF.

Socialism, Christian. A modern attempt to implement the social implications of Christianity. The concept had unconventional origins in the French social reformer Henri de Saint-Simon (1760–1825), who predicted a much more greatly industrialized age wherein social problems would be resolved by science and technology. Only later did he introduce a religious note. His Nouveau Christianisme, published in the year of his death, held that religion “should guide the community toward the great aim of improving as quickly as possible the conditions of the poorest class.” Having seen what France had suffered, first under the Revolution in all its ferocity and then under Napoleon, he urged European rulers to unite for the suppression of war and to return to that true Christianity that concerns itself with the plight of the poor. Saint-Simon’s views were often unordered and imprecise, but they were to influence an improbable combination of thinkers that included Thomas Carlyle, John Stuart Mill, Heinrich Heine, Auguste Comte, Friedrich Engels, and Walter Rauschenbusch, and were to find echoes in the work of the more recent American theologians Paul Tillich and Reinhold Niebuhr.

As well as having an impact on France, Christian socialism was a force in many other European countries, prompting the founding of groups that held that the working man had a right to social and economic justice, and that these were areas in which Christians should be active. In Germany it sadly deviated into anti-Semitism, which resulted in imperial condemnation in 1894. Five years earlier had seen the formation in the United States of the Society of Christian Socialists, but the idea had been there since Henry James Sr. had expounded similar principles in 1849.

The term “Christian socialism” was popularized in midnineteenth-century England when, after the failure of the Chartist movement, a group of Anglicans sought the application of Christian principles in the organization of industry. Its leaders were J. M. F. Ludlow (who had been educated in France), J. F. D. Maurice, and Charles Kingsley. They helped finance cooperative societies, started associations for different trades, and in 1854 founded the Working Men’s College in London, with Maurice as principal. Kingsley’s novels, notably Yeast and Alton Locke (both published in 1850), played a not inconsiderable part in a movement which, however, never really caught the imagination of ecclesiastical England and soon declined. It left a valuable legacy, nonetheless, in principles and practices that benefited a wide area of social concern, including cooperatives, workers’ educational institutes, and trade unions. J. D. DOUGLAS

See also MAURICE, JOHN FREDERICK DENISON; RAUSCHENBUSCH, WALTER; SOCIAL GOSPEL.

Bibliography. G. Baum, Catholics and Canadian Socialism; A. J. Booth, Saint-Simon and Saint Simonism; J. Cort, Christian Socialism: An Informal History; G. J. Dorrien, Reconstructing the Common Good; A. Kuyper, Problem of Poverty; G. MacEoin, Unlikely Allies: The Christian-Socialist Convergence; C. E. Raven, Christian Socialism 1848–54; M. B. Reckitt: Maurice to Temple: A Century of Social Movement in the Church of England.

Society of Friends. See FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF.

Society of Jesus (Jesuits). Monastic order founded by Ignatius of Loyola and approved as a Roman Catholic religious order in 1540. The Jesuits are classified as mendicant clerks regular. Unlike most earlier orders there is no parallel branch for women.

In 1534 Loyola and six companions, all students of theology at the University of Paris, took vows of poverty and chastity and promised to devote their lives to missionary work in Palestine if that were possible. Since war between Venice and the Ottoman Empire kept them from Palestine, they began preaching, teaching catechism, and doing various charitable works in the cities of northern Italy. Gradually they gathered new recruits, and since they wished to give permanent structure to their way of life, they sought approval from Pope Paul III as a religious order. Initially membership was restricted to sixty professed priests, but this was soon lifted, and the popes conferred many privileges on the new order and relied on it for many special tasks, including diplomatic missions to Ireland, Sweden, and Russia. Jesuit-professed fathers take a special vow of obedience to the pope.

Loyola was elected the first superior general in 1540 and spent his remaining years directing the new order and writing its Constitutions. The new order had several distinctive features. The superior general is elected for life and appoints all subordinate superiors; hence the Jesuits are highly centralized. Obedience is especially stressed. There is no distinctive religious habit or uniform, such as earlier orders had, no special fasts or bodily austerities, no common singing of the divine office. Loyola demanded that recruits be carefully selected and trained and that those who did not measure up be dismissed. Later the training normally lasted fifteen years. Two years at the beginning (novitiate) and a year at the end of the training (tertianship) were devoted to the spiritual development of the members, in contrast to a one year novitiate in the old orders. Since the Jesuits were to be active in working with outsiders, monastic discipline had to be interiorized by vigorous training. Loyola's Spiritual Exercises shaped the Jesuits' interior life, and one hour's private meditation daily has been mandatory for most of the order's history. The Jesuits were in the forefront in spreading systematic meditation, a characteristic of Counter-Reformation piety. For the Jesuit, prayer and activity were to be mutually reinforcing. Popularization of the Spiritual Exercises in the retreat movement has been a major contemporary Jesuit apostolate; as many as five million Catholics annually make retreats.

Loyola stressed quality rather than quantity, but the Society of Jesus grew rapidly. There were about a thousand Jesuits by the founder's death in 1556, mainly in Spain, Italy, and Portugal, but also in France, Germany, and Belgium, as well as missionaries in India, Africa, and Latin America. By 1626 there were 15,544 Jesuits. Growth was steady but somewhat slower until 1773, when Clement XIV, under pressure from the Bourbon monarchs of France, Spain, and Naples, suppressed the society. A few Jesuit houses survived in Prussia and Russia, where the monarchs refused to promulgate the suppression. In 1814 Pius VII restored the Jesuits worldwide. Despite being exiled from most European Catholic countries at one time or another, the Jesuits grew steadily in numbers during the next hundred years and peaked at 36,038 in 1964. Membership declined after the Second Vatican council, reaching 27,027 in 1981 with roughly one-third in Europe, one-third in the United States and Canada, and one-third in Asia, Africa, and Latin America.

Education quickly became the largest single Jesuit apostolate. Loyola supervised the founding of a dozen colleges in the order's first decade. By 1626 the Jesuits directed five hundred colleges or seminaries, a number which nearly doubled by the mideighteenth century. Most of the Jesuit colleges approximated modern prep schools, but some were full-fledged universities. During the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries a high percentage of educated Catholic males, particularly the nobility, were graduates of these schools. The basic charter of these schools was the Ratio Studiorum (the Plan of Studies) of 1599, which tried to purify and simplify Renaissance humanism. Classical languages and literatures and religion provided the core curriculum, with Aristotelian philosophy for advanced students. Attendance was compulsory and a planned curriculum carried students forward step by step, in contrast with many contemporary schools. The rod was largely replaced by friendly rivalry as a stimulus to study. The Jesuit schools used drama, often with lush pageantry, to inculcate moral and religious values. Education remains a major Jesuit emphasis today; the Jesuits run some four thousand schools worldwide, mainly in mission countries, as well as eighteen American universities.

The Jesuits adopted Thomas Aquinas as their official theologian but freely modified his system, as in the theology of Francisco Suárez (1548–1617). Generally they stressed human action in the process of salvation, in contrast to the Dominicans, who put more emphasis on the primacy of grace. Blaise Pascal attacked their casuistry as laxist. The Jesuits, however, overwhelmingly rejected the principle that the end justifies the means, which was often attributed to them. Prominent among recent Jesuit theologians are Pierre Teilhard de Chardin, Karl Rahner, and Bernard Lonergan. The Jesuits presently edit some one thousand periodicals, including NT Abstracts, Theology Digest, and Theological Studies.

Traditionally the Jesuits have reserved their highest regard for missionary work. Francis Xavier (1506–52), the first and greatest Jesuit missionary, laid the basis for Jesuit activity in India, Indonesia, and Japan. The Japanese mission particularly flourished until it was wiped out by savage persecution in the early seventeenth century. Matteo Ricci (1552–1610) founded the Jesuit mission in China, where he and his successors won the protection of the Ming emperors by introducing Western scientific and technical knowledge to court circles at Peking. They pioneered the adaptation of the gospel to Chinese traditions and thought forms, although many Catholic critics felt that they had gone too far. Their writings introduced China to the West. The goal of the Peking mission was the conversion of the emperor, but the Jesuits never found their Chinese Constantine. Ricci's idea of adapting Christianity to local culture was applied to India by Robert De Nobili (1577–1658). Jesuits such as Jacques Marquette and Isaac Joges worked among the Indians of North America. Eusebio Kino (1644–1711) established a string of mission stations which introduced the Indians of northern Mexico and the present southwestern United States to advanced agriculture. The Jesuits Christianized and civilized the Indians of Paraguay and Brazil in organized towns (reductions), which flourished for more than a century until the Jesuits were suppressed.

Although the Jesuits were not founded to combat Protestantism, they were quickly drawn into the struggle. Many Jesuits published controversial works, for instance, Peter Canisius and Robert Bellarmine, both of whom also wrote catechisms that enjoyed wide use for three centuries. Other Jesuits influenced policy as court preachers or as confessors to the emperor, the kings of France, Spain, and Poland, and the dukes of Bavaria. Well over a thousand Jesuits died as martyrs both in Europe and in the missions. The Roman Catholic Church has canonized thirty-eight Jesuits, including twenty-two martyrs.

J. P. DONNELLY

Society of Jesus (Jesuits)

See also IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA.

Bibliography. J. C. H. Aveling, Jesuits; M. Barthel, Jesuits: History and Legend of the Society of Jesus; W. Brangert, History of the Society of Jesus; J. Brodrick, Origins of the Jesuits; J. de Guibert, Jesuits: Their Spiritual Doctrine and Practice; G. Garraghan, Jesuits of the Middle United States; M. Martin, Jesuits; D. Mitchell, Jesuits.

Socinus, Faustus (1539–1604). Anti-trinitarian theologian Socinus was born in Siena, Italy, on December 5, 1539. His early education was limited until two of his uncles began tutoring him. One uncle, Laelius Socinus, was caught up in the Protestant movement and later adopted anti-trinitarian beliefs. Upon his uncle's death, Faustus took his dead uncle's papers, devoted himself to the study of theology, and also became an advocate of anti-trinitarian beliefs.

After spending time in several European countries, Socinus settled in Poland in 1578, where a strong anti-trinitarian community existed. In Poland he was initially refused membership in the Anabaptist-Unitarian sect, because he held that baptism was not a necessary act. As a result, he did not immediately exert influence among Polish Unitarians, although he joined with them in worship. Later he persuaded them to adhere to his theological beliefs and eventually was recognized as their principal leader. His stay in Poland was not altogether peaceful; from time to time he faced persecution for his beliefs from Catholics and Protestants.

Socinus believed that Scripture should be interpreted rationally. This philosophical framework led him to deny the deity of Christ. In his view Christ had a human nature and did not become God until after his resurrection, when the Father delegated some of his divine power to the risen Jesus. Socinus accepted the miracles and virgin birth of Christ, seeing them as signs given to humankind to show Jesus' unique role in becoming divine. Socinus did not believe Christ's death on the cross brought forgiveness of sins because God could forgive sins without the necessity of Jesus' atonement. Repentance and good works brought forgiveness from God. Socinus denied original sin, predestination, and the resurrection of the body (except for a select few who were particularly conscientious followers of Jesus). He also regarded the Lord's Supper as purely commemorative.

Socinus's ideas laid the foundation for later unitarian movements, although he did not go as far as future anti-trinitarians in denying the miraculous or divine role of Jesus. He was also among the first to subject Scripture to rational criticism.

P. KUBRICHT

See also RACOVIAN CATECHISM.

Bibliography. O. Chadwick, Reformation; J. H. S. Kent, "Socinian Tradition," Theol 78:131–40; H. J. McLachlan, Socinianism in Seventeenth Century England; J. A. Tedeschi, ed., Italian Reformation Studies in Honor of Laelius Socinus; E. M. Wilbur, History of Unitarianism; G. H. Williams, Polish Brethren; Radical Reformation.

Sociology of Religion. As a field of study within the discipline of sociology, the empirical and systematic study of religion focuses on the interrelation of religion and society. In general, sociologists are less interested in the consideration of beliefs and the normative claims of religions than the symbolic and functional aspects. A central consideration within the field is the secularization of religion, particularly with regard to religious thought and religious institutions. Within the evangelical community, concerns over the growth and decline of the church, beliefs and trends in society, and religious pluralism have provided a context for a growing interest in the contributions of sociologists of religion.

History. Interest in the changing role of religion in society was present from the beginning of the discipline of sociology in the writings of Comte, Durkheim, Marx, Spencer, Simmel, and Weber. Despite the general interest, the issues and parameters of the field were set by the writings of Emile Durkheim and Max Weber in the early part of the twentieth century. Durkheim's sociology is characterized by a number of central dichotomies, of which the division of the sacred and the profane is critical to his view of religion. He viewed religious beliefs as "representations which express the nature of sacred things." The sacred things he refers to may be explained as "collective ideals that have fixed themselves on material objects." According to Durkheim, religion generates a collective conscience fused from individual consciences in which divinity is no more than "society transfigured and symbolically expressed." Put simply, religion is the obligatory system of beliefs and practices originating from the collective mind and acting to consolidate the society.

Weber's view of religion was very different from that of his contemporary. For Weber the critical issues were not beliefs and values, but the influence of religious ideas on society. Weber coined the term sociology of religion (religionssoziologie) for the broad social analysis of Christianity and non-Christian religions. His studies focused on two primary considerations: the influence of religion on modern capitalism and the more comprehensive religious influences on the evolution of rationalism. Weber's interest in economic organization led him to a comparative study of religious orientations toward material factors, out of which came his thesis that ascetic Protestantism influenced the rise of capitalism.

While Weber's influence on the sociology of religion was critical, perhaps his greatest contribution was the role of religion in social change.

A number of other sociologists have influenced the sociology of religion in more limited, but significant ways. Apart from his pithy statements about religion, the influence of Karl Marx is limited to his attempts to abolish religion through social revolution. More recently, Talcott Parsons furthered the discipline by his work on the influences of religion on social action and a range of discussions including denominational pluralism, liberalism, and fundamentalism. Robert Bellah, a student of Parsons, furthered the sociological study of religion by exploring the limitations of the process of secularization. Along with his colleagues, Bellah's study on the tension between individualism and community in the formation of the American character demonstrates both the loss of the language of morality and the search for societal meaning. Peter Berger was instrumental in introducing phenomenology into the sociology of religion. Berger's work has provided both a theoretical vocabulary and a focus on the manifestation of phenomena in society (suffering, evil, and death) in relation to the way society explains them.

Contemporary Influences among Evangelicals. Emerging from the turbulent decade of the 1960s, church leaders began to search for help in understanding the broader social issues which appeared to contribute to the decline in church attendance. The practical nature of the issues facing churches provided a ready clientele for studies of the functional aspects of the sociology of religion, particularly among evangelicals. In response, a type of functional pragmatism characteristic of modern missions found its way into churches, particularly in North America. One result has been an explosion in both research and writing on subjects formerly the property of sociologists of religion.

One of the chief proponents of applied research was Donald McGavran, the founder of the Church Growth Movement. Although not a sociologist, McGavran recognized a number of sociological phenomenon which facilitated the growth of local churches. His early work on social relationships which resulted in conversions, called "the bridges of God," provided a basis for the study of other phenomenon from which he developed the church growth principles. After studying with McGavran, Peter Wagner went on to examine the nature of groups and their influence on church growth. Through the influence of McGavran and Wagner, the Church Growth Movement became a driving force in the application of the social sciences to the growth of the church.

Following the interest in the strategic use of sociological observation, statistical studies produced by George Gallup Jr. and a variety of studies by George Barna and his associates have greatly influenced churches in North America. Studies by Peter Kaldor on the religious beliefs and patterns of church attendance in Australia and Peter Brierley on the size and influence of churches in the United Kingdom have similarly influenced churches in their countries and contributed to the knowledge of Christian institutions. In addition to his research on beliefs in America, Barna adapted the use of marketing principles to assist pastors in changing their churches through visionary leadership with a focus on being "user friendly." The primary emphasis is again on the practical use of insights into the nature of social phenomena and their impact on the growth of local churches.

In contrast to the functional pragmatism of the church growth studies, the radically changing societal conditions of the late twentieth century also led to the sociological study of modernization in relation to beliefs and the church. Berger and his colleagues explored the impact of modernization on belief systems, introducing the term modernity. Os Guinness, a student of Berger, took the critique a step further by tackling the problems of the uncritical accommodation of the systems of modernity into the churches, specifically within megachurches. In his studies, Guinness has emphasized not only the opportunities of modernity but more significantly the challenges posed by modernization. One of modernity's greatest threats, according to Guinness, is that it provides an ideal climate for two generalized belief systems affecting the church: syncretism, the blending of particular beliefs into a pluralistic system, and secularism, which rejects the explanations offered by religions.

Other sociologists have dealt with the affects of pluralism on religion, notably Reginald Bibby in his studies on Canadian society. According to Bibby, the desired effects of the Canadian dream of a cultural mosaic set in motion in the decades of the 1960s and 1970s have not materialized. His analysis reveals that rather than justice and equality, society has moved toward excessive individualism and excessive relativism. Rather than embracing the riches of a multicultural society, people move toward tolerance as the desired end with the practical implication of social fragmentation. Studies such as Bibby's provide a helpful contextual analysis as a complement to theological studies of universalism and the issues of religious pluralism.

General Critique. Despite its valuable contribution to our understanding of social contexts, the sociology of religion has a number of critical limitations which must be considered. The limitations may be categorized in three broad areas: the presuppositions that control the development of sociological theory, a general lack of a coherence within the field leading to conceptual fragmentation, and the tendency toward functional pragmatism in the application of sociological research.

Sociology of Religion

As in all areas of scholarship, presuppositions held by sociologists inevitably influence the development of theory in the sociology of religion. This is illustrated by the difficulties raised by an inherent cynicism with the field of sociology toward religion in general. In an effort to reduce this problem and allow for greater breadth of discussion, Bellah and others called for a type of liberation from the natural tendency toward disbelief. Known as "symbolic realism," the move is a reassertion of a foundational view of religion posited by Durkheim that all religious belief is valid. Durkheim's view is based on his theory of the collective conscience, which reduces religion to the sum of the societies' beliefs about religion. Developed from his work on Aboriginal religions, the concept is that society determines the sacred by its collective ideals, which are then set in contrast to the profane. Whatever the social group determines to be sacred is sacred, and, logically, the divine is merely the personification of the human ideals. The presence of totems, idols, and icons in most societies serves to illustrate his theory. In essence, this is a universalist view which asserts that all religions are valid by eliminating any transcendent reality and rejecting the role of divine revelation. The net result is that an artificial reconciliation is provided in which ultimate truth is suspended from the discussion.

A second major limitation is the lack of a coherence within the field, which leads to conceptual fragmentation. For a variety of reasons, broader research that attempts to understand religious beliefs either historically or comparatively, thereby providing an integrative framework, has been avoided by all but a few scholars (e.g., Bellah and Berger). The absence of any unifying constructs seriously reduces the ability of sociologists to broaden the discussion of the role and function of religion in society. Thus it is difficult to identify the unique contribution of religious belief compared to any other social system or even to compare religious systems. In an age of cultural pluralism, the lack of integrative categories for comparison seriously encumbers the process of analysis for the purpose of cooperation and social cohesion. One result may be a further disintegration of society as noted in Bibby's research.

A third area of concern is the tendency toward functional pragmatism in the application of sociological research within the Christian community. Despite the great contribution of social research to the growth of the church in the past four decades, there must be an ongoing theological critique of the social sciences. As noted earlier, the inherent tendency toward relativism will directly affect the findings in any research. Due to the natural tendency of research to guide the development of programs and strategies (e.g., Barna's work on user-friendly churches), it is necessary to carefully assess both the presuppositions and the long-term implications (e.g., Guinness's work on modernity).

Conclusion. Studies in the field of the sociology of religion have opened a wide range of valuable insights that provide both a greater depth of understanding of the reciprocal impact of religion on society and the issues facing religious institutions. While recognizing the limitations of sociological studies of religion, a careful analysis of religious beliefs in their social contexts is a critical component of any ministry that seeks to impact society without being overwhelmed by it. Of particular interest are the contributions made by sociologists in their analysis of the impact of modernity on the structures and strategies of church growth. Additionally, the challenges of religious pluralism in modern society require a renewed commitment to theological reflection, which in turn may be greatly assisted by the current studies in multiculturalism. A critical approach to the work of sociologists is beneficial not only to thwart a move toward universalism, but also to inform our efforts with valuable insights into the interrelation of religion and society.

C. D. MCCONNELL

Bibliography. G. Barna, User Friendly Churches; R. N. Bellah, Beyond Belief: Essays on Religion in a Post-Traditional World; R. N. Bellah et al., Habits of the Heart; P. L. Berger, Sacred Canopy: Elements of a Sociological Theory of Religion; P. L. Berger, B. Berger, and H. Kellner, Homeless Mind; R. Bibby, Mosaic Madness; E. Durkheim, Elementary Forms of the Religious Life; O. Guinness, Dining with the Devil; O. Guinness and J. Seel, eds., No God but God; D. McGavran, Understanding Church Growth; T. Parsons, Action Theory and the Human Condition; M. Weber, Sociology of Religion; B. Wilson, Religion in a Sociological Perspective; R. J. Wuthnow, "Sociology of Religion" in Handbook of Sociology, N. J. Smelser, ed.

Solafidianism (Lat. sola fide "faith alone"). The doctrine that salvation is by faith only. The term emerged as a consequence of Luther's translation of Romans 3:28, in which he added the word "alone" to the phrase "man is justified by faith [alone] apart from works of the Law" (NASB). He was severely castigated for this, but Erasmus defended him. The translation is justifiable in view of the only alternative, namely justification by works, which Paul expressly repudiated. The Council of Trent (1545–63), on the other hand, vigorously opposed Luther's translation and all that it implied by declaring: "If anyone saith that justifying faith is nothing else than confidence in the divine mercy which remits sins for Christ's sake, or that this confidence alone is that whereby we are justified, let him be anathema" (Session 6, Can. 12).

Implicit in solafidianism is the doctrine of divine monergism, which declares that man's salvation is totally dependent upon God's activity and is in no way conditioned by the action of man. Man's choice of sin has rendered him incapable of spiritual action; he is spiritually dead. Unless rescued by a source outside himself, he would eternally perish in this state. God has taken the initiative by restoring mankind to himself through the death of Christ (Christ's passive obedience to the law), which removes man's guilt, and by imputing Christ's righteousness (which he achieved while on earth through his active obedience to the law) to those who believe. Saving faith is not an innate quality of fallen man but a gift of God (Eph. 2:8; Phil. 1:29) communicated through hearing the gospel (Rom. 10:17). The ordo salutis ("order of salvation") is God's activity in grace from inception to consummation. Understandably solafidianism is opposed to Pelagianism, semi-Pelagianism, and synergism, all of which attribute justification or the apprehension of it, in one way or another, to the action of man.

F. R. HARM

Bibliography. L. Berkhof, Systematic Theology; E. L. Lueker, Lutheran Cyclopedia; F. E. Mayer, Religious Bodies of America; C. S. Meyer, NIDCC 914; F. Pieper, Christian Dogmatics; A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology; H. C. Thiessen, Lectures in Systematic Theology.

Solidarity of the Race. A theological teaching that all humans are of the same species, with Adam as a common ancestor. This teaching is not so much positively affirmed as it is assumed in all of Scripture. Most of the scriptural evidence for the solidarity of the race is found in passages dealing with the imputation of Adam's sin to all his posterity. Even prior to NT teaching on the significance of Adam's sin, however, the OT established the unity of the human race. The very use of 'ādām for man presents strong evidence that the word refers to the class of men (Gen. 6:1). Therefore 'ādām can be translated by "Adam" and by "humankind," and the plural by "men" or "people."

Particular OT passages presuppose the solidarity of the race. Genesis 3:15–19 recounts God's judgment on the serpent and on Adam and Eve. The language of the judgments on Adam and Eve implies that they are to be experienced by all humankind throughout history. Sometimes the referent of 'ādām is not unambiguous. It may refer to people as a class or to the first man, and as such has a bearing on the issue of the solidarity of the human race. When Job states, "If I have concealed my sin as men do," did he intend to say "as Adam did"? When Yahweh charged the people: "Your first father sinned; your spokesmen rebelled against me" (Isa. 43:27), did he refer to Adam? The concern of the OT is with Abraham and his descendants, rather than all the nations. Therefore, it is not always clear whether the reference is to the patriarch and his descendants or to Adam and his descendants.

Whereas the OT does not deal explicitly with the solidarity of the human race, but assumes it, the NT, on the other hand, more explicitly teaches the doctrine of solidarity. In Acts 17:26 Paul, standing before the Areopagus, says, "From one man he made every nation of men, that they should inhabit the whole earth." Paul goes on to quote one of the Greek poets, "We are his offspring." These statements are, of course, in the context of the kerygma and are addressed to a Gentile audience. Paul affirms that Jews and Gentiles together need Jesus, because all have sinned in Adam. This brings us to the classic passage on the imputation of Adam's sin (Rom. 5:12–21). The apostle's use of "all men" clearly demands the doctrine of the unity of the race in order for his argument to be complete (cf. also 1 Cor. 15:21–22, 45).

The implication of the doctrine of solidarity involves more than just one's view of original sin, whether mediately or immediately imputed. If the human race has a common ancestor in Adam, then all humans have the image of God. For this reason, then, the one gospel of salvation in Christ is truly relevant to all men not only because it proclaims that God's wrath is propitiated by the sacrifice of his Son, and hence that there is hope for our "human" condition. There is also a proclamation of hope in that it calls us to be a part of the new humanity in Jesus Christ.

W. A. VAN GEMEREN

See also ADAM, THE LAST; MANKIND, DOCTRINE OF.

Bibliography. R. Shedd, Man in Community.

Son of God (huios tou theou). A title or a means of expressing a relationship—especially of Jesus to God—which can be indicated in other ways. As a title it was relatively rare, especially in Hellenistic and Jewish circles, but as a relationship indicating physical descent, numerous examples can be cited in ancient Near Eastern, Hellenistic, and Roman sources, especially with reference to kings. Its Christian uses of Jesus as God's Son, however, can be explained only in light of a Jewish background and peculiarly Christian additions.

In the Old Testament. Israel as God's Son. Whereas both celestial beings (e.g., Job 1:6; 2:1; Pss. 29:1; 89:6) and Israel (e.g., Deut. 14:1; Hos. 1:10) can collectively be called sons of God, Israel's unique relationship with God enabled it to be referred to in the singular as God's firstborn son (Exod. 4:22) or simply as his son (e.g., Exod. 4:23; Jer. 31:20; Hos. 11:1). The relationship is also indicated by God referring to himself as Israel's father (e.g., Jer. 31:9; Mal. 1:6) and Israel to God as Father (e.g., Isa. 63:16; 64:8; Jer. 3:4).

Son of God

The King as God's Son. In Psalm 2:7 God is quoted at the coronation of the king as saying "You are my son; today I have begotten you" (RSV). David's descendants in particular are given divine approval in Psalm 89:26–27, where God called the Davidic king "firstborn" and said the king would refer to God as "my Father." This special filial relationship with David's dynasty goes back ultimately to 2 Samuel 7:14, where of Solomon, the beginning of a perpetual line of Davidic kings, God says through Nathan, "I will be his father, and he will be my son."

In Intertestamental Literature. The title "son of God" occurs, though infrequently, in nonmessianic intertestamental texts. In Wisdom of Solomon 2:18 the wicked who conspire against the righteous man refer to him as "son of God" and assert that he calls God "father" (2:16). Philo used the phrase of the Logos. In a nonmessianic reference in the Dead Sea Scrolls, a figure is referred to as both "the son of God" and "the son of the Most High." The curious fact, however, in light of the OT justification for it, is that there is no undisputed example of the title in a pre-Christian messianic text. The references in 4 Ezra (7:28–29; 13:32, 37, 52; 14:9) and Enoch (105:2) that are often adduced are generally questioned by modern scholars either on linguistic grounds or as suspected Christian corruptions. Reverence for the divine name, opposition to Hasmonean regal claims, and reaction against the non-Jewish practice of regarding the king as physically descendant from a god have all been suggested as possible explanations for the absence of "son of God" as a messianic title, when the relationship is clearly ascribed to the king in OT passages.

None of this, however, proves that the connection between the Messiah and Son of God was not made in pre-Christian Judaism. In fact, two passages in John suggest that some Jews made the identification. Nathanael, who had had no prior contact with Jesus, said as his initial reaction to him, "Rabbi, you are the Son of God; you are the King of Israel" (John 1:49). Martha's confession of Jesus as "the Christ, the Son of God, who was to come into the world" (11:27) seems to reflect some type of messianic expectation. The present state of the evidence, nevertheless, renders the point moot.

In the New Testament. Jesus' Own Claims. Although Jesus preferred to refer to himself as the Son of Man, there is sufficient evidence that his identity as Son of God goes back ultimately to his own assertions. This is especially true of John, but instances of it are also found in the Synoptics. When the high priest asked Jesus, "Are you the Christ, the Son of the Blessed?" he answered, "I am," and then proceeded to refer to himself as the Son of Man (Mark 14:61–62). Earlier he had identified God as the Father of the Son of Man (Mark 8:38), and in Matthew he referred to God as "my Father" (7:21; 10:32–33; 20:23; 26:29, 53). In a passage reminiscent of John, Jesus strongly expressed his filial relationship with God (Matt. 11:25–27 = Luke 10:21–22) and implied it in his parable of the wicked tenants (Mark 12:6). Even as a boy of twelve Jesus recognized that God was his Father (Luke 2:49).

At the heart of Jesus' identity in John is his stated divine sonship. In John 10:36 he admitted saying, "I am God's Son." Frequently he referred to God as "my Father" (e.g., 5:17; 6:40; 8:54; 10:18; 15:15). Such assertions as "I and the Father are one" (10:30) and "the Father is in me, and I in the Father" (v. 38) show that Jesus conceived of his divine sonship as unique and unparalleled.

Others' Recognition of Jesus' Divine Sonship. The NT presents a remarkably large and diverse group of individuals who referred to Jesus as the Son of God. At both Jesus' baptism and transfiguration, God himself identified Jesus as his son in statements reminiscent of Psalm 2:7 (Mark 1:11; 9:35). Before Jesus' birth Gabriel appeared to Mary and identified the child as the "Son of the Most High" and "Son of God" (Luke 1:32, 35). At his temptation the devil twice challenged Jesus with the words "If you are the Son of God" (Matt. 4:3, 6 = Luke 4:3, 9). During Jesus' ministry unclean spirits or demons directly asserted his divine sonship (Mark 3:11 = Luke 4:41; Mark 5:7). At the beginning of Jesus' ministry John the Baptist testified, "This one is the Son of God" (John 1:34), and at the cross, the centurion exclaimed, "Truly, this was [the] son of God" (Mark 15:39 = Matt. 27:54).

Understandably, the assertion and development of Jesus' divine sonship in the NT came principally from his disciples. During his ministry they did this as a group (Matt. 14:33) and as individuals: Peter (16:16), Nathanael (John 1:49), and Martha (11:27). Saul of Tarsus's initial preaching in Damascus emphasized this point (Acts 9:20). Jesus' divine sonship occupies an important position in the Pauline and Johannine epistles and in Hebrews. In Paul, "Lord" and "Christ" are the more frequently used christological titles, but "his Son" or "Son of God" appears in most of his epistles, especially in contexts dealing with eschatology, Jesus' messianic rule, and salvation. The Johannine epistles represent a special case, where Jesus' divine sonship was constantly asserted as a corrective to the docetic heresy. The Hebrews writer applied OT messianic texts to Jesus as God's Son, but more importantly, Jesus' sonship is at the heart of his argument that Jesus was superior to angels, Moses, and the Levitical priests.

Associated Themes. The key to understanding what NT writers meant by the title "Son of God" is found in the contexts in which the title occurs.

Heading the list are those passages that connect Jesus' divine sonship with his royal office as Messiah. Jesus did this himself in response to the high priest's question (Mark 14:61–62), as God had earlier done at his baptism and transfiguration, using the language of Psalm 2:7. Paul (Acts 13:33) and the Hebrews writer (1:5; 5:5) also applied this verse to Jesus (2 Sam. 7:14). Gabriel told Mary that her son not only would be called God's Son but would reign on David's throne (Luke 1:32–33). Later in Luke the demons' recognition of Jesus as Son of God was associated with their knowledge that he was the Messiah (4:41). The connection of the two occurs three times in the Gospel of John (1:49; 11:27; 20:31), as it does in Paul's letters (Rom. 1:3–4; 1 Cor. 15:28; Col. 1:13). It surfaced in Peter's confession (Matt. 16:16) and in Luke's summary of Saul's initial Damascus preaching (Acts 9:20, 22).

While Son of God and Messiah are connected in the Gospel of John, the major theological point brought out by Jesus' divine sonship is his own divinity. Other themes underscored in the NT by this relationship include salvation (John and Paul) and Jesus' high priesthood (Hebrews). The question of at what point the Son actually became God's Son is not addressed in the NT so much as the points at which he was designated Son. These are at or in connection with his birth (Luke 1:32, 35), baptism (Mark 1:11), transfiguration (Mark 9:7), resurrection (Rom. 1:4; Acts 13:33), and second coming (1 Thess. 1:10). Hence, there is no formal adoption Christology implied by his divine sonship; rather, numerous passages present the son as clearly preexistent (e.g., Rom. 8:3; Gal. 4:4; Col. 1:13–17; and John throughout).

Sons of God. Just as Israelites in the OT were sons of God, so are disciples of Jesus in the NT, although Jesus is Son in a unique sense (John 3:16, 18; 1 John 4:9). Jesus himself used this phrase of his followers (Matt. 5:9, 45), but it is in Paul that the doctrine became most fully developed. Here it is a part of Paul's doctrine of adoption (Rom. 8:14–17; Gal. 4:1–7), which has a pagan, probably Roman, background, rather than Jewish, because the practice of levirate marriage in ancient Judaism neutralized the social dynamic for adoption. Faith is the vehicle for this adoption (Gal. 3:26), and the outcome is that the adopted sons of God become his heirs along with Christ and thus address him as "Abba, Father," as Jesus did in the garden (Mark 14:36).

G. T. BURKE

See also CHRISTOLOGY; JESUS CHRIST; LORD, JESUS AS; MESSIAH; SON OF MAN.

Bibliography. W. Bousset, Kyrios Christos; F. Hahn, Titles of Jesus in Christology; E. Huntress, "Son of God' in Jewish Writings Prior to the Christian Era," JBL 54:117–23; S. E. Johnson, IDB 4:408–13; W. Kramer, Christ, Lord, Son of God; C. F. D. Moule, Origin of Christology; V. Taylor, Names of Jesus; P. W. von Martitz et al., TDNT 8:334–97; B. B. Warfield, Lord of Glory.

Son of Man. Title for the Christ, Messiah (Gr., huios tou anthrōpou; Aram. bar nāšā'; Heb. ben 'ādām). This christological title appears sixty-nine times in the Synoptic Gospels and thirteen times in John, and meets the most demanding tests of authenticity because of its original use by Jesus. There is no evidence of a well-defined Son of Man Christology in Judaism before the time of Jesus. Appearances of the term in Ethiopic Enoch and 2 Esdras are inconclusive, though its presence in Daniel 7:13 seems the natural background for Jesus' creative use of the expression as an enigmatic title. Since nothing in Judaism corresponds precisely to the nuances of meaning Jesus gives to the term, and as the early church makes no use of it in its own theology, attempts by radical critics to discount Jesus' originality in applying the title to himself run counter to the fact that it satisfies especially well their own criterion of dissimilarity as the basic test of authentic sayings of Jesus. Rejection of the title in any of its three shades of meaning may thus be seen to rest on presuppositional, not exegetical, grounds, since no other title used by Jesus so clearly attests his messianic self-consciousness; while numerous contemporary schools of interpretation begin with the a priori assumption that the church, not Jesus, is responsible for a high Christology.

Son of Man as Pronoun. The first intentional use of Son of Man by Jesus functions as a substitute for his personal pronoun "I," and as such conveys extraordinary claims of authority on his part, quite different from its ordinary and simple reference to "man" in the psalms and as a form of address in Ezekiel. As Jesus uses the title in Mark 2:10, he claims the authority to forgive sins, indicating that he is consciously and creatively investing the title with deep christological meaning, tantamount to sharing the prerogatives of God. Similarly his use of the title in the grain-field episode of Mark 2:28 indicates his authority over the sacred sabbath, another claim of correlativity with God. The explicitly redemptive character of his ministry is evidenced by his personal claim that "the Son of Man did not come to be served, but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many" (Mark 10:45). Of the passages in so-called Q (Matt. 8:20; 11:19; 12:32), the first indicates his servanthood, the second sounds his familiar theme of open table fellowship with outcasts, and the third concludes a powerful passage on his binding of Satan and a warning about "the unforgivable sin" against the Holy Spirit, by whose power Jesus is invading the demonic kingdom—another personal claim to correlativity with God. Special Matthew (M) sayings are two in number (13:37; 16:13) and imply respectively that Jesus as Son of Man is the one who plants the good seed (that is, he is the Lord of the harvest), and that he knows who he is, since he asks of his disciples the leading question, "Who do people say that the Son of Man is?" Special Luke (L) sayings in the first category are also two in number (6:22; 19:10) and again reflect Jesus' awareness of his centrality in the suffering ministry of his disciples, and in the salvation of the lost. It goes without saying that the stakes are high in either accepting or discounting these sayings as authentic, for since the Christology is so high and Jesus so aware of his equality with God, radical redaction criticism must be completely reassessed as to the originality of Jesus and the creativity of the early church if these sayings are accepted as genuine.

Son of Man

Son of Man as Prophecy. This is equally true of the second group of Son of Man sayings in which Jesus prophesies of his future suffering. If the first group is accepted as authentic, the second follows coherently. If on a priori grounds the first is rejected, then the second group will be rejected as "prophecies" of the church created after the fact. On the eleven passages in this category, eight are in Mark (8:31; 9:12, 31; 10:33; 14:21, 41) and all disclose Jesus' messianic awareness that he is to suffer as a ransom for many. In considerable detail Jesus foretells his betrayal, condemnation, death, and resurrection. The temptation of the naturalistic critic, discounting the reality of biblical prophecy and the incarnation, will be to explain these prophecies as church created. On the assumption that the Evangelist is giving an authentic account of Jesus' prophecies about himself, a coherent picture of Jesus emerges which confirms his personal awareness of his redemptive mission and his authority as the true prophet (Deut. 18:15–22). Three other references complete the suffering Son of Man sayings (Matt. 26:2, M; Luke 22:48; 24:7, L).

Son of Man in Third Person. The third group appears to be more enigmatic in the sense that Jesus refers to the Son of Man in the third person. A number of more radical interpreters take this to mean that Jesus was referring to another than himself, and since the sayings, interpreted in this fashion, would not suggest his messianic self-consciousness, they are willing to allow the possibility of authenticity. There are nineteen of these sayings, all of which portray the Son of Man as a glorified divine being, whereas in the first two groupings Jesus generally speaks of himself in terms of humility and suffering. Again, however, it is likely that nonsupernaturalist assumptions lie behind the refusal to allow that these sayings are Jesus' own prophetic vision of his vindication and glorification in the coming judgment. Certainly there is no suggestion elsewhere in the Gospels that he anticipated any other figure to appear after him. In fact, among the Markan sayings in this category (8:38; 9:9; 13:26; 14:62), 9:9 clearly refers to his own rising as the Son of Man from the dead; and 14:62, the scene before the high priest, couples his "I am" confession that he is the Christ, the Son of the Blessed, with the surrogate for "I," the Son of Man, "sitting at the right hand of Power, and coming with the clouds of heaven." This further evidences Jesus' messianic self-awareness and is exegetically the proper intent of the passage.

The Q passage Matthew 12:40 also clearly refers to Jesus as Son of Man, and there is no good reason for not accepting the other Q sayings as authentic (Matt. 24:27, 37, 39, 44), as well as special M sayings (13:41; 19:28; 24:30; 25:31) and special L (12:8; 17:22; 18:8; 21:36). Matthew 19:28 is especially instructive on the matter of who the glorified Son of Man is, for Jesus promises his disciples with the authoritative "I tell you the truth" that "at the renewal of all things, when the Son of Man sits on his glorious throne, you who have followed me will also sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel." Surely Jesus, whom they have followed and in terms of whom they shall reign, will not be excluded from reigning with them. Are there then to be two enthroned central figures, the Son of Man and Jesus? The sense of the passage exegetically would imply that only one central person is assumed, namely, Jesus the Son of Man.

There remain but two sayings in the third group, and since they are difficult and have occasioned considerable controversy, they have been reserved for final comment. Both occur only in Matthew (10:23; 16:28). Since Daniel 7:13 is the likely background to Jesus' creative adaptation of Son of man terminology, it is important to note how the term is used in the larger sense of that passage. In 7:13–14 it is a single person, the Son of Man, who is given everlasting dominion and glory and kingdom by the Ancient of Days, while in verses 18, 22, and 27 it is the saints of the Most High who receive the everlasting kingdom. The difficulty is resolved if the title Son of Man is understood as both individual and corporate, like Israel (Jacob) and the people of Israel. We may suppose that Jesus selected the image to fulfill prophecy, to express his messiahship in appropriate hiddenness until the proper time of revealing, and to disclose the individual and corporate nature of his mission. Jesus consciously personifies the Son of Man, and as he draws his disciples about him and empowers them to participate in his redemptive reign, he allows them to share in the corporate Son of Man as saints of the Most High, and in his reign as he as king inaugurates the kingdom of God. Son of Man and kingdom of God appear to be nearly interchangeable in both individual and corporate senses. Hence one possible interpretation of Matthew 10:23 is that when the disciples share in the redemptive ministry of Jesus and invade the demonic realm through the power of the coming kingdom, the Son of Man has in that corporate sense and to that degree come. Jesus' prophecy is true and is fulfilled (Luke's parallel account regarding the Seventy describes their exultant return as they successfully claim power over demons in Jesus' name, whereupon Jesus sees the fall of Satan "like lightning from heaven," Luke 10:17–18).

The remaining problematic text, Matthew 16:28 ("I tell you the truth, some who are standing here will not taste death before they see the Son of Man coming in his kingdom"), is also to be exegeted as eschatology in process of realization, for Jesus is the Son of Man whose ministry, now incorporating the disciples as the saints of the Most High, invades the kingdom of Satan. That is why the denial that this is indeed occurring through the power of the Spirit of God constitutes the unpardonable sin (12:22–32); and it explains why Mark 9:1 has Jesus making a similar prophecy but using the term kingdom of God in place of the Son of Man. The terms are virtually interchangeable. While the vocabulary comes from the OT, Jesus consciously gives it deeper meaning associated with the mysterious disclosure of his own person and the corporate body he is bringing into being. The Son of Man and kingdom of God have come, personified in Jesus; but there is yet more to come as God's redemptive plan is unfolded with power in the cross and resurrection. Hence the irony and mystery of Jesus' favorite title, Son of Man, which both reveals and conceals and is penetrated only by the eyes of faith and obedient response.

At the completion of his earthly ministry, when Jesus' redemptive work was fulfilled and the Holy Spirit was poured out in power at Pentecost, the disciples were given to see that Christ was now to be preached openly without reference to the enigmatic title Son of Man or the veiled connotations of the kingdom of God. Obediently they proclaimed Christ, and true to form Son of Man and kingdom of God virtually disappear from the apostolic vocabulary.

R. G. GRUENLER

See also CHRISTOLOGY; JESUS CHRIST; LORD, JESUS AS; MESSIAH; SON OF GOD.

Bibliography. F. H. Borsch, Son of Man in Myth and History; R. Bultmann, History of the Synoptic Tradition; C. Colpe, TDNT 8:402; R. T. France, Jesus and the Old Testament; R. G. Gruenler, New Approaches to Jesus and the Gospels; F. Hahn, Titles of Jesus in Christology; M. Hooker, Son of Man in Mark; I. H. Marshall, Origins of New Testament Christology; C. F. D. Moule, Origin of Christology; N. Perrin, Modern Pilgrimage in New Testament Christology; R. H. Stein, Method and Message of Jesus' Teaching; V. Taylor, Names of Jesus; H. Tödt, Son of Man in the Synoptic Tradition.

Soteriology. See SALVATION.

Soul. Living being, life principle, person, or individual spiritual nature. It may be ascribed to animals (Gen. 1:30; Rev. 8:9) and to God (Lev. 26:11; Isa. 42:1). It is often used interchangeably with spirit, although distinctions that begin to appear in the OT are carried forward in the NT. Thus while soul in the NT normally means an individual spiritual entity with a material body so that a person is thought of as a body-soul, spirit is the special gift of God that places one in relationship to him. Scripture states that Jesus gave his spirit to his Father (Luke 23:46; John 19:30), but elsewhere it is said that he gave his soul (NIV "life") as a ransom for many (Matt. 20:28; John 10:15). In general terms then it can be said that the soul in Scripture is conceived to be an immaterial principle created by God, which is usually united to a body and gives it life; however, the soul continues to exist after death in human beings (Matt. 10:28; James 5:20; Rev. 6:9; 20:4), a condition which is ended at the close of this age (1 Cor. 15:35–55).

The Early Church. Speculation about the soul in the subapostolic church was heavily influenced by Greek philosophy. This is seen in Origen's acceptance of Plato's doctrine of the preexistence of the soul as pure mind (nous), which, by reason of its fall from God, cooled down to soul (psyche) when it lost its participation in the divine fire by looking earthward. It is also seen in Tertullian's repudiation of Greek ideas and his insistence on the biblical teaching of the union of the soul, an immaterial creation of God, with the material body which has been made for it.

Augustine's great influence was felt in the church in his teaching about the soul as in other matters. Condemning the heathen notions that the soul was originally a part of God—an idea he calls blasphemy—that it is corporeal, or that it becomes polluted through the body, he saw the soul as a rational-spiritual substance made "like God," and made by him, sustaining and directing the body (Greatness of the Soul, XIII, 22). Concerning its origin and whether it was created by God or transmitted by parents, Augustine might be unsure (On the Soul and Its Origin, I, 27), but of its "proper abode" and "homeland" he was certain, and that is God (Greatness of the Soul, I, 2).

Origin of the Soul. Augustine's reluctance to take sides in the debate on the origin of the soul was not shared by his contemporaries. Some Greek church fathers shared Origen's theory that the soul preexisted with God and that it was assigned to a body as a penalty for its sin of looking downward. Most, however, accepted the creationist view that God created each individual soul at the moment that he gave it a body, while some, like Tertullian, held the traducianist theory that each soul is derived, along with the body, from the parents.

Arguments cited in favor of creationism were (1) that Scripture distinguishes the origin of man's soul and body (Eccl. 12:7; Isa. 42:5; Zech. 12:1; Heb. 12:9); (2) that creationism preserves the idea of the soul as a simple, indivisible substance better than traducianism, which requires the idea of the division of the soul and its derivation from the parents; and (3) that it makes more credible Christ's retention of a pure soul than does traducianism.

In behalf of traducianism it was said (1) that certain Scriptures support it (Gen. 2:7; Heb. 7:10; cf. 1 Cor. 11:8); (2) that it offers the best theory for the whole race having sinned in Adam; (3) that it is supported by the analogy of lower life in which numerical increase is obtained by derivation; (4) that it teaches that parents beget the whole child, body and soul, and not just the body; and (5) that it was necessary for Christ to have received his soul from the soul of Mary in order to redeem the human soul.

Augustine carefully weighed the arguments on each side of the controversy, leaning toward traducianism for a time even while he saw the difficulty of retaining the soul's integrity with this hypothesis; later he admitted that he was perplexed and baffled by the question.

A contemporary theologian who takes essentially the same stance is G. C. Berkouwer, who calls the controversy "unfruitful," inasmuch as it wrongly assumes that the issue is one of horizontal or vertical relations. "Such a way of putting it is far too feeble an attempt to render adequately the greatness of the work of God" (Man: The Image of God, 292). The God of Israel does not create only in the distant past, but he is constantly active in human history, the Creator in horizontal relationships as well as others. To speak about a separate origin of the soul he sees as impossible biblically, inasmuch as this creationist theory sees the relationship to God as "something added to the 'essentially human,' which later is defined independently as 'soul,' and 'body.' Both soul and body can then be viewed in different 'causal' relationships without reference to some intrinsic non-causal relationship to God. If, however, it is impossible to speak of the essence of man except in this latter religious relationship, then it also becomes impossible to introduce duality into the origin of soul and of body within the unitary human individual" (303).

Contemporary Debate. Many today believe that science has "made the notion of soul redundant," i.e., unnecessary (Angela Trilby, Soul: God, Self and the New Cosmology). Trilby demonstrates new interest in the idea and reality of soul as an essential part of human nature. Further evidence is the recent appearance of a number of books on the subject (see below) and a spate of articles in theological and religious journals (such as Patrick D. Miller's "Whatever Happened to the Soul?" and articles following in Theology Today, vol. 50, no. 4). In the contemporary violent world many, who would otherwise express little interest in questions of the moral/spiritual nature of mankind, have pondered the basis on which moral judgments are made. The question is whether such judgments can be made satisfactorily apart from an adequate doctrine of humankind which includes its creation by God with a rational-moral soul.

M. E. OSTERHAVEN

See also BODY, BIBLICAL VIEW OF THE; DICHOTOMY; MANKIND, DOCTRINE OF; SPIRIT; TRICHOTOMY.

Bibliography. J. Barr, Garden of Eden and the Hope of Immortality; C. A. Beckwith, SHERK 11:12-14; L. Berkhof, Systematic Theology; G. C. Berkouwer, Man: The Image of God; J. H. Boyd, Affirming the Soul; J. W. Cooper, Body, Soul, and Life Everlasting; A. Dihle et al., TDNT 9:608-66; C. Hodge, Systematic Theology; M. G. Kline, Images of the Spirit; J. Leith, Basic Christian Doctrine; A. Trilby, Soul: God, Self and the New Cosmology.

Soul Sleep. Psychopannychy, the doctrine that the soul sleeps between death and resurrection, has been held sporadically in the church. It is not a heresy in the narrower sense, due to the paucity of Scripture teaching on the intermediate state, but it may be called a doctrinal aberration. Some Anabaptists endorsed it. In the Forty-two Articles of Edward VI, which preceded the Thirty-nine Articles, the following statement, as the Fortieth Article, was included: "They which say that the souls of those who depart hence do sleep being without all sense, feeling or perceiving till the Day of Judgment, do utterly dissent from the right belief disclosed to us in Holy Scripture."

The case for soul sleep rests principally on these considerations: (1) Human existence demands the unity of soul and body. If the body ceases to function, so must the soul. (2) The use of the term "sleep" in Scripture for death is alleged to point to the cessation of consciousness. (3) A state of consciousness between death and resurrection, characterized by bliss or woe, unwarrantably anticipates the judgment of the last day, when the basis for these experiences is provided.

On the contrary view, while the normal state of man is admittedly a union of soul and body, the possibility of disembodied conscious existence is firmly held, both on the analogy of God's existence as pure spirit (man being made in his image) and on the basis of such passages as Hebrew 12:23 and Revelation 6:9-11. As to the word "sleep," it is intended to apply to the body, even though the individual as such may be said to sleep in death. This is clear from Matthew 27:52; John 11:11; Acts 13:36, etc. On the third point it may be replied that the exclusion of the possibility of bliss or woe from the intermediate state, on the ground that the divine judgment which justifies such reactions will not yet have been pronounced, would logically rule out the joyful assurance of salvation in this life as well as the foreboding of judgment to come. But see John 5:24 and Philippians 1:28.

Continuing consciousness after death seems to be a necessary (rather than an accidental) element in Jesus' account of the rich man and Lazarus, and also in our Lord's promise to the dying thief. The clearest and strongest passages, however, are in Paul's writings (2 Cor. 5:8; Phil. 1:23). If it be contended in the case of the former passage that the sleep of the soul so effectually erases the interval between death and resurrection that the prospect of being with Christ, even though actually long delayed, could produce joyful anticipation, in any event the same thing can hardly be said for the second passage, where not only the resurrection body but the intermediate state is directly contemplated, being a less desirable alternative than the change to the resurrection body without death (v. 4). E. F. HARRISON

See also ADVENTISM; CONDITIONAL IMMORTALITY; INTERMEDIATE STATE.

Bibliography. J. Calvin, Psychopannychia; O. Cullmann, Immortality of the Soul or Resurrection of the Dead?; L. E. Froom, Conditionalist Faith of Our Fathers; E. Lewis, Christ, the First Fruits; R. Whately, View of the Scripture Revelations concerning a Future State.

Sovereignty of God. The biblical teaching that God is king, supreme ruler, and lawgiver of the entire universe.

Biblical Statements. He "has established his throne in heaven, and his kingdom rules over all" (Ps. 103:19). As the "most High," God is "sovereign over the kingdoms of men and gives them to anyone he wishes" (Dan. 4:17, 25, 34; 5:21; 7:14). Israel's King David acknowledges "the greatness and the power and the glory and the majesty and the splendor" of God "for everything in heaven and earth" is his (1 Chron. 29:11). This prayerful acknowledgment of God's sovereignty is echoed in the traditional conclusion of the Lord's prayer: "for yours is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever" (Matt. 6:13). God is indeed the "only Ruler, the King of kings and Lord of lords" (1 Tim. 6:15; cf. Rev. 19:16). The sovereignty of God thus expresses the very nature of God as all-powerful and omnipotent, able to accomplish his good pleasure, carry out his decreed will, and keep his promises.

Several divine names reflect God's sovereignty. He is called "God Most High" (elyôn, Gen. 14:18–20), "God almighty" (el šadday, 17:1; cf. Exod. 6:2), "Sovereign LORD" (ādōnāy yhw̄h, Gen. 15:2; Deut. 3:24), and "Lord God Almighty" (kyrios pantokratōr; Rev. 1:8). See also "sovereign Lord" for despota or "Master" in Luke 2:29; Acts 4:24; 2 Peter 2:1; Jude 4; and Revelation 6:10.

God's sovereignty is expressed in the comprehensive plan or decree for world history; he "works out everything in conformity with the purpose of his will" (Eph. 1:11). His sovereignty is exercised and displayed in history in the work of creation, providence, and redemption. The "Sovereign LORD" has "made the heavens and the earth" and "nothing is too hard" for him (Jer. 32:17–23), indeed, "all things are possible with God" (Mark 10:27; 14:36; Luke 1:37). God also sovereignly upholds and governs the created world in his providence. He rules the destiny of men and nations (Acts 14:15–17; 17:24–28). Adam's fall occurred within the context of his arrangement (Gen. 2:16–17), as did Christ's crucifixion (Acts 2:23; 4:27–28) and all other events. His providential rule is all-comprehensive. "I form the light and create darkness, I bring prosperity and create disaster; I, the LORD, do all these things" (Isa. 45:7; cf. Eph. 1:11).

The gracious work of redemption also manifests God's sovereignty. He promises, covenants, and works redemptive history. The Messiah is himself "Mighty God" (Isa. 9:6–7), "the Son of the Most High" whose "kingdom will never end" (Luke 1:32–33). From the beginning of his public ministry to its end, Jesus' message concerns "the kingdom of God" (Mark 1:15; Acts 1:3; more than one hundred instances in the Synoptics). After the resurrection Christ claims "all authority in heaven and earth" (Matt. 28:18), and the ascended Christ is exalted "far above all rule and authority, power and dominion" (1 Cor. 15:24–28; Eph. 1:19–21; Phil. 2:9–11; Rev. 5:9–14). Hence the earliest Christian confession was simply "Jesus is Lord" (Rom. 10:9).

The gospel itself displays God's sovereignty; it is "the power of God for the salvation of everyone who believes" (Rom. 1:16), and "to those whom God has called," Christ is "the power of God" (1 Cor. 1:24; cf. Eph. 1:18–22). The authority of Scripture is also an expression of the sovereignty of God since all Scripture is "God-breathed" (2 Tim. 3:16). That is why "the Scripture cannot be broken" (John 10:35) and why everything in it will be fulfilled and accomplished (Matt. 5:18; Luke 24:44).

Theological Considerations. Theologians generally consider "sovereignty" one of God's communicable attributes; "sovereignty" expresses an inherent characteristic of God, and a distinction is sometimes made between "sovereign will" and "sovereign power." God's sovereign will and power are not arbitrary, despotic, or deterministic; his sovereignty is characterized by his justice and holiness as well as by his other attributes.

Divine sovereignty and human responsibility are paradoxical and beyond human comprehension, but not contradictory. Divine sovereignty and human sovereignty are certainly contradictory, but divine sovereignty and human responsibility are not. God uses human means in history to accomplish his purposes, yet such means do not involve coercion. God commands us to live according to his sovereign law (Gen. 2:16–17; Exod. 20; Matt. 22:37–38). Yet God effectuates his will even through sinful, disobedient human actions (Gen. 45:5, 7–8; 50:19–20). The crucifixion of Jesus Christ, certainly the most heinous crime in history, occurred within the boundaries of “God’s set purpose and foreknowledge,” for the crucifiers did what God’s “power and will had decided beforehand should happen” (Acts 2:23; 4:27–28; cf. John 19:11).

Sovereignty of God

The doctrine of the sovereignty of God is emphasized especially in the Augustinian-Calvinistic tradition and is denied or compromised in the Pelagian, Arminian, and liberal traditions, which claim varying degrees of human autonomy. The confession of the sovereignty of God has become the hallmark of authentic Calvinism. While not being its central principle, (the term “sovereignty” is found only a few times in the Institutes of the Christian Religion and the Reformed confessions) the doctrine is a vital part of authentic Reformed thought.

Classic Calvinism, however, does not minimize the role of human responsibility in history. Only in extreme forms of supralapsarian thought and hyper-Calvinism is sovereignty emphasized in ways that compromise human responsibility and curtail the universal proclamation of the gospel. The confession of the sovereignty of God should occasion the praise and glory of God and encourage a life lived in obedient love within the kingdom of the King. As in the case of all God’s attributes, so God’s sovereignty should be reflected in the Christian’s life. The Christian who is being renewed in the image of God and progressing in sanctification should again exercise dominion over creation as God’s vicegerent in promoting the kingdom of God in human history to the glory of the sovereign Lord (cf. Gen. 1:28).

F. H. KLOOSTER

See also CALVINISM; DECREES OF GOD; ELECT, ELECTION; GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF; GOD, DOCTRINE OF; GOD, NAMES OF; PREDESTINATION; REFORMED TRADITION; REPROBATION; SUPRALAPSARIANISM.

Bibliography. L. Berkhof, Systematic Theology; L. Boettner, Reformed Doctrine of Predestination; J. Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion; H. Hoeksema, Reformed Dogmatics; J. I. Packer, Evangelism and the Sovereignty of God; A. W. Pink, Sovereignty of God; P. Toon, Hyper-Calvinism.

Special Revelation. See REVELATION, SPECIAL.

Spener, Philipp Jakob (1635–1705). Spener was born in Rappoltsweiler, Upper Alsace, and died in Berlin. He is generally regarded as the founder of German pietism, though his ideas were a combination of viewpoints acquired from his teachers and from sixteenth-century Reformers. He received a strict, pious upbringing and took his university training in Strasbourg (1651–59), where he concentrated on biblical languages and historical studies. Professors at Strasbourg stressed spiritual rebirth and ethical concerns, and these emphases became important factors in Spener’s preaching as he assumed successive pastoral positions in Strasbourg (1663), Frankfurt-on-Main (1666), Dresden (1686), and Berlin (1697). Spener was also influenced by Genevan Calvinism, for he visited Geneva in 1659 and met Jean de Labadie, the mystical Reformed preacher. Labadie strengthened Spener’s beliefs that a conversion experience (Wiedergeburt) was essential in the Christian life and that the true Christian must apply religion to all aspects of life.

Though Spener deemphasized the theological dogmatism and controversies of the Protestant scholastics, his view of conversion and its necessary implementation were controversial wherever he preached. His attacks on ignorance and moral laxness among the clergy were not welcomed by that group, and his proposed system of reform was a real threat to established Lutheran churches. These ideas were first published in 1675 in Pia Desideria (Heartfelt Desires for a God-Pleasing Reform of the True Evangelical Churches). The theology in this work stressed the unity between faith and works, a notion that was always important in Reformed theology. By contrast, seventeenth-century Lutheran theology (especially in northern Germany) stressed theological dogma, not the purified life. Equally important was the means Spener proposed for implementing change—a church within the church. Spener founded small groups (collegia pietatis) to advance the participants’ closeness to God through prayers, songs, spiritual reading, and discussion. Though all these activities were regarded as good in themselves, the small groups often challenged contemporary ecclesiastical systems and were usually viewed as hypocritical and divisive. In fact, Spener’s successors in German pietism often were quite contentious, even though Spener himself stressed cooperation and tolerance.

Spener also called for the reform of seminary education. In place of systematic theology, with its natural emphasis on dogmatic precision, Spener wanted seminarians to increase their piety by spiritual reading. Further, he emphasized going directly to the scriptural sources instead of relying on the theological formulations of scriptural commentators. The fruit of this phase of Spener’s work is seen in the theological faculty established at Halle. With direction from Spener and organization from August Hermann Francke, Halle became the intellectual center of early German pietism; and the movement spread with the founding of collegia pietatis groups throughout German Lutheranism. Though Spener's original goals were modest, German pietism influenced Protestantism throughout the Western world; spiritual revival and religious controversy became commonplace in Protestant communities. R. J. VANDERMOLEN

See also PIETISM.

Bibliography. D. W. Brown, Understanding Pietism; J. O. Duke, "Pietism versus Establishment: The Halle Phrase," CQ (Nov. 1978) 3–16; P. Grünberg, Philipp Jakob Spener; SHERK 9:53–57; M. Kohl, "Wiedergeburt as the Central Theme in Pietism," CQ (Nov. 1974) 17–20; J. T. McNeill, Modern Christian Movements; H. J. Muller, NCE 13:562; M. E. Richard, Philip Jacob Spener and His Work; K. J. Stein, Philipp Jakob Spener: Pietist Patriarch; "Philipp Jacob Spener's Hope for Better Times for the Church—Contribution in Controversy," CQ (Aug. 1979) 3–20; F. E. Stoeffler, Rise of Pietism; F. E. Stoeffler, ed., Continental Pietism and Early American Christianity.

Spinoza, Benedict de (1632–1677). Dutch philosopher. Spinoza was born in Amsterdam, Holland, to Jewish refugees who had fled from religious persecution in Portugal. As a youth he became a serious rabbinical student, but also studied Latin and classical literature privately under Francis van den Ende. Because he questioned Jewish beliefs concerning angels, the nature of God, and the soul's immortality, Spinoza was accused of heresy and expelled by the synagogue in 1656. Subsequently he supported himself as a lens polisher and received some stipends from Dutch friends; but in 1673 he declined substantial financial support by not accepting the chair of philosophy at Heidelberg. During his life Spinoza's reputation as philosopher and ethicist was established by his 1663 work on Descartes, Principles of Descartes' Philosophy Geometrically Demonstrated, and his most famous work, Tractatus Theologico-Politicus (1670). He became publicly known through a government mission to France and his attachment to the anti-Orangist Dutch political leaders Cornelius and Jan de Witt, who were assassinated in 1672. Spinoza also carried on an extensive correspondence with Henry Oldenburg, secretary of England's Royal Society. Several of Spinoza's writings were published after his death; they helped advance his reputation as a profound thinker and led many writers of the romantic movement to see Spinoza as their intellectual forefather.

As a philosopher Spinoza alienated many religious contemporaries by removing biblical ideas about God and many religious beliefs (such as acceptance of miracles) from the supernatural sphere; further, he alienated empiricists with his emphasis on geometrical order and his denial that physical facts are the basis of true generalizations about reality. Spinoza's method, contrary to that of the empiricist followers of John Locke, was to arrive at truths from axioms by using deductive logic. Also, his approach to philosophy and theology ran counter to traditional religious dependence on divine Scriptures. What resulted was a philosophy that denied supernatural occurrences as well as orthodox beliefs based on biblical revelation. In place of traditional Christian explanations came rationalistic ideas about nature and reason: nature replaced God (or "God" became "nature"); and reason replaced divine revelation.

In applying this philosophy to ethics, Spinoza saw the highest good as understanding and becoming one with nature. This was to produce conformity to natural law, which in turn meant living the ethically good life in all spheres. In this untraditional way Spinoza became something of a pantheist and determinist, two features that put him at odds with most of his contemporaries in philosophy and theology. Romanticist philosophers and writers, however, as well as modern theologians who rely on romantic philosophy, have found Spinoza's ethics and basic ideas very attractive. In spite of many attractive ethical ideas, Spinoza's philosophy is criticized by those who acknowledge a personal, transcendent God.

R. J. VANDERMOLEN

Bibliography. B. de Spinoza, Chief Works, R. H. M. Elwes, trans.; Correspondence, A. Wolf, trans.; F. Copleston, History of Philosophy; A. Donagan, Spinoza; L. S. Feuer, Spinoza; S. Kashap, ed., Studies in Spinoza; J. Ratner, Philosophy of Spinoza; R. L. Saw, Vindication of Metaphysics: A Study in the Philosophy of Spinoza.

Spiration. See HOLY SPIRIT.

Spirit (Heb. rûah, "breath of mouth," Pss. 33:6; 135:17; then "breath of air, or wind," Gen. 3:8 KJV margin). In biblical usage (in the Hebrew text), it is the breath of mankind that gives life to the body (Gen. 7:22; Job 27:3). It is the seat of rationality (Deut. 34:9; Mal. 2:15), determination (Jer. 51:1; Hag. 1:14), attitude in general (Num. 14:24), courage (Josh. 2:11; 5:1 KJV), religious understanding (Job 20:3 KJV), emotions (Pss. 77:3; 143:4; Zech. 12:10), pride (Ps. 76:12), jealousy (Num. 5:14, 30 KJV), and various other inner dispositions. As the principle of life, spirit is ascribed to beasts also (Gen. 6:17; 7:15).

The spirit of mankind fulfills its true destiny when it lives in conscious relationship to God its Creator. Himself the eternal Spirit who out of nothing made the heavens, the earth, and "their starry host by the breath [spirit] of his mouth" (Ps. 33:6), with man made in his image and likeness (Gen. 1:27–28; 2:7), God is called "spirit" and "Father of spirits" in the NT (John 4:24; Heb. 12:9). Mankind has breath, or spirit, because it has been given by God's Spirit (Job 27:3; 33:4; 34:14); when a person dies the spirit is returned to God (Eccles. 12:7). Life and death, therefore, are represented in the Bible as a giving and a withdrawing of God's breath, or spirit, for all created life, including humanity, is utterly dependent on him (Ps. 104).

Spirit

The NT carries forward the teaching of the OT on spirit with important developments. The human spirit is seen even more sharply as having been made by God and for him so that his children may live in fellowship with him through the Holy Spirit. Thus the Spirit of God witnesses to our spirits that "we are God's children. Now if we are children, then we are heirs—heirs of God and co-heirs with Christ" (Rom. 8:16–17). It is the spirit that is given back to God in death, not the soul, which seems to sustain a less intimate relationship to God, even though there are instances in the NT where the two are used synonymously (John 10:15; 19:30). The difference between spirit and soul is seen clearly in Paul's contrast of the spiritual (pneumatikos) with the unspiritual (RSV) or natural (psychikos, i.e., soulish) person (1 Cor. 2:13–15). The former knows God because that person has received the Spirit of God, not the spirit of the world, so that he may understand the things of God (v. 12). The latter knows only human wisdom and is unable to understand spiritual truth, which must be "spiritually discerned"; to him the latter is folly (v. 14). "The contrast is especially sharp because Paul recognizes no neutral ground between them. Not to have the pneuma (spirit) of God is to be controlled by the pneuma tou kosmou (spirit of the world) (Schweizer)." Spiritual things (knowledge, or other gifts) are held to be from God, effected by his Spirit. Natural (physical, unspiritual) things, while from God as a part of his creation, manifest the reality of a sinful world and do not bring one to God and his grace. Paul exhorts the Corinthians to covet the "spiritual gifts" bestowed on the church by the Holy Spirit as that which is most to be valued and lasting (1 Cor. 14:1).

As the aspect of life which lies in one's inmost being, spirit can be overwhelmed (Ps. 143:4), broken (51:17; Prov. 15:13), renewed (Ps. 51:10), and revived (Gen. 45:27). Because of sin one can have a spirit of fear (2 Tim. 1:7), error (1 John 4:6), or a dumb or foul spirit (Mark 9:17, 25; Rev. 18:2), an unclean spirit (Zech. 13:2; Matt. 12:43), or one of whoredom (Hos. 4:12). One can be hasty in spirit (Eccles. 7:9) or faithful in spirit (Prov. 11:13 KJV), patient or proud (Eccles. 7:8 KJV), poor in spirit (Matt. 5:3), or perverse (Isa. 19:14 KJV). Thus as the heights and depths of human existence are experienced mankind's spirit is drawn to either God or the devil; it receives blessing or the subtle influences of evil and ultimate condemnation. M. E. OSTERHAVEN

See also BODY, BIBLICAL VIEW OF THE; DI-CHOTOMY; GOD, DOCTRINE OF; HOLY SPIRIT; MAN-KIND, DOCTRINE OF; SOUL; TRICHOTOMY.

Bibliography. C. Brown et al., NIDNTT 3:689–709; W. P. Dickson, St. Paul's Use of the Terms Flesh and Spirit; W. Eichrodt, Theology of the Old Testament; R. Jewett, Paul's Anthropological Terms; M. G. Kline, Images of the Spirit; J. Leith, Basic Christian Doctrine; E. Schweizer, TDNT 6:332–455.

Spirit, Holy. See HOLY SPIRIT.

Spirit, Unclean. See DEMON, DEMONIZATION.

Spirits, Discernment of. See SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

Spirits in Prison. The phrase occurs in 1 Peter 3:19 and has provoked considerable discussion. Some have held that the reference is to people of Noah's time who heard preaching by the Spirit through his lips but rejected it and now, at the time Peter is writing, are disembodied spirits imprisoned and awaiting final judgment. Against this is the movement of thought in this passage, which seems to place the preaching after the death and quickening of Christ and prior to his resurrection. Further, the word "spirit" is rarely used of the dead, especially in the absolute form of statement.

Some see in the passage a preaching by Christ to the dead between his death and resurrection, whether simply to announce his victory to OT saints or to give further opportunity for people who died unrepentant. It is highly improbable that a doctrine so important as "the larger hope" would be set forth in such enigmatical language, especially when it is tacitly contradicted by statements of Scripture (e.g., Heb. 9:27).

There is much to commend the view that the spirits are the angels who sinned in the time of Noah (Gen. 6:1–5). Not only are good angels called spirits (Heb. 1:14), but demons also (Luke 10:20). Whereas the word "prison" is hardly a natural term to apply to the state of the human dead, it is appropriate to evil spirits (2 Pet. 2:4; Jude 6). To these Christ proclaimed his triumph. The context appears to support this (1 Pet. 3:22).

E. F. HARRISON

Bibliography. E. H. Plumptre, Spirits in Prison and Other Studies on the Life after Death; B. Reicke, Disobedient Spirits and Christian Baptism; E. Schweizer, TDNT 6:437; E. G. Selwyn, First Epistle of Peter.

Spiritual Body (Gr. sōma pneumatikon). The resurrected spiritual body in contrast to the physical body (sōma psychikon), which is subject to sin and death (1 Cor. 15:44). Paul's teaching, like that of Jesus, contrasts with (1) the denial of the afterlife by the Sadducees (cf. Matt. 22:23–33; Acts 23:6–8) and (2) the Greek notion of the bare immortality of the soul, separated from the tomb of the body. On analogy of God’s revelation in nature, where the sown seed dies and rises to something that bears identity with the seed but is immeasurably different, Paul describes the resurrection of the dead. For Paul, again as with Jesus in his resurrected state, the person is conceived as a gestalt unity of body-spirit, not as a soul separated from the body. The whole person is lifted to a new level of existence, from the fallen and death-prone body-soul of Adam to the imperishable body-spirit of life in Christ (1 Cor. 15:35–50). Jesus in his resurrection appearances embodies the new imperishable existence, and though not of flesh and blood of the old order nor limited by physical parameters of that order (John 20:19–20), nevertheless has identifiable characteristics of flesh and bones, hands, and side, and can eat food (Luke 24:36–43). This mysterious and “logically odd” language of the apostolic witness is not contradictory but complementary, as Jesus, John, Luke, Paul, and the other NT witnesses convey the divinely revealed fact that the new existence is like, yet different from, the old, an analogy of the identity and difference between the seed and the full grain. Sōma pneumatikon is Paul’s way of saying that the believer’s personal identity as a body-spirit unity will be raised to a new life like that of Christ himself.

R. G. GRUENLER

See also RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD.

Spiritual Exercises. See IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA.

Spiritual Gifts. Gifts of God enabling the Christian to perform his or her (sometimes specialized) service. There are several words in the NT used for spiritual gifts. Dōrea and domata are so used but are rare (Acts 11:17; Eph. 4:8). Pneumatikas and charismata are frequently found, with charismata being the most common.

The term charisma (“spiritual gift”), except for 1 Peter 4:10, is used only by Paul. Charisma signifies redemption or salvation as the gift of God’s grace (Rom. 5:15; 6:23) and a gift enabling the Christian to perform his service in the church (1 Cor. 7:7), as well as defining a special gift enabling a Christian to perform a particular ministry in the church (e.g., 12:28–31).

Paul offers instruction on spiritual gifts in Romans 12:6–8; 1 Corinthians 12:4–11, 28–30; and Ephesians 4:7–12. Spiritual gifts were unusual manifestations of God’s grace (charis) under normal and abnormal forms. Not every spiritual gift affected the moral life of the one who exercised it, but its purpose was always the edification of believers. The exercise of a spiritual gift implied service in the church. This practical approach is never lost sight of in the NT, these spiritual gifts often being divided into miraculous and non-miraculous; but since some are synonymous with specific duties, they should be classified according to their significance for preaching the Word, on the one hand, and exercising practical ministries, on the other.

The Gifts of the Spirit. There are five gifts of the Spirit.

Working of Miracles (1 Cor. 12:10, 28–29). “Miracles” is the rendering of dynameis (powers). In Acts dynameis refers to the casting out of evil spirits and the healing of bodily ailments (8:6–7, 13; 19:11–12). This may explain “working of powers,” but this gift is not synonymous with “gifts of healing.” Probably the former was much more spectacular than the latter, and may have signified raising the dead (Acts 9:36–42; 20:9–12). Paul himself exercised this gift of working of powers, and it was for him proof of his apostleship (2 Cor. 12:12) and authenticated both the good news he preached and his right to proclaim it (Rom. 15:18–21).

Gifts of Healing (1 Cor. 12:9, 28, 30). As already suggested, gifts of healing resembled “working of miracles” (powers). Witness the ministry of our Lord (Matt. 4:23–24), of the Twelve (Matt. 10:1), and of the Seventy (Luke 10:8–9). Gifts of healing were also prominent in the church after Pentecost (Acts 5:15–16; cf. also James 5:14–15). “Gifts” (plural) indicates the great variety of both the sicknesses healed and the means used in the healings. The person who exercised the gift, and the patient who was healed had one essential in common—faith in God. The writings of the church fathers show that “the gifts of the healings” were exercised in the church centuries after the apostolic period. Since then, this gift has appeared intermittently in the church. For long periods gifts of healing have been in abeyance, but today there are recognized branches of the church which believe that they are beginning to reappear. Unfortunately the manner in which some act who claim to have received the gift has brought it into disrepute. The kind of ailments that were healed in the NT period, the nature and place of faith, the significance of suffering in God’s economy, the importance of the subconscious and the nature of its influence upon the body, the relations between gifts of healings and medical science (a doctor was numbered among Paul’s traveling companions!)—these have not received the attention they require today. Gifts of healings are a permanent gift of the Spirit to the church but are properly exercised only by people of the Spirit and of humility and faith.

The Gift of Helpers (1 Cor. 12:28). What spiritual gift was signified by “helper” may be gathered from Acts 20:35, where Paul exhorts the Ephesian elders to labor “to help the weak” and constantly to remember the Lord’s own words, “It is more blessed to give than to receive.” Paul supports this exhortation from his own example. The early church seems to have had a special concern for the needy among her members, and those who helped the indigent were considered to have been endowed by the Spirit for this ministry. It is not impossible that the office of elder originated in the gift of government or rule. By the same token, the office or duty of deacon may have originated in this gift of helpers. The deacon was one who ministered to the needy (Acts 6:1–6).

Spiritual Gifts

The Gift of Governments or Administration (1 Cor. 12:28; cf. Rom. 12:8). The church's organization was still fluid. Official offices had not been established, nor were duly appointed officials yet ruling the churches. It was necessary, therefore, that certain members should receive and exercise the gift of ruling or governing the local assembly of believers. This gift would take the form of sound advice and wise judgments in directing church affairs. Gradually, of course, this gift of guiding and ruling in church affairs would come to be identified so closely with certain individuals that they would begin to assume responsibilities of a quasi-permanent nature. They would become recognized officials in the church, fulfilling well-defined duties in the administration of the Christian community. At the beginning, however, it was acknowledged that some Christians had received the gift of ruling and had liberty to exercise it. In addition to administration, practical matters in the conduct of public worship would require wisdom and foresight, and here again those who had recognizably received the gift of ruling would be expected to legislate.

The Gift of Faith (1 Cor. 12:9). The gift of faith should probably be included among the gifts closely related to the practical life and development of the church. These spiritual gifts would naturally strengthen the believers in their faith and convince the unbelievers of the authenticity of the church's message. The Spirit's gift of faith could effect mighty things (Matt. 17:19–20), and keep believers steadfast in persecution. These five spiritual gifts, then, had special reference to the practical aspects of the church's life, the physical well-being of believers, and the orderliness of their worship and conduct.

The remainder of the gifts of the Spirit concern the ministry of the Word of God. To that extent, they were more important than the foregoing; but the latter were, nevertheless, spiritual gifts. In origin and nature they were the result of special endowments of the Spirit.

Apostleship. Concerning the gifts especially meaningful for the preaching of the Word, Paul gives pride of place to the grace of apostleship: "And in the church God has appointed first of all apostles" (1 Cor. 12:28). The designation "apostle" began to be applied to NT personalities other than the Twelve, especially to Paul. So highly did he value the gift of apostleship which the Holy Spirit had conferred upon him that on occasion he was at pains to prove its validity (cf. 1 Cor. 9:1–27; Gal. 1:12). The apostles conceived that they had received this spiritual gift to enable them to fulfill the ministry of the Word of God; nothing, therefore, should be allowed to prevent their fulfilling that all-important function (Acts 6:2). We also gather from Paul that the gift of apostleship was to be exercised principally among unbelievers (1 Cor. 1:17), while other spiritual gifts were more closely related to the needs of believers. Paul's apostleship was to be fulfilled among Gentiles; Peter's ministry of the Word was to be exercised among Jews (Gal. 2:7–8). Obviously the Spirit's gift of apostleship was not confined to a strictly limited group of men whose gift of apostleship made them ipso facto special units of a divine grace or authority. Their function was doubtless conceived to be the most important so far as the ministry of the Word was concerned, but we shall see presently that theirs was only one of a number of such spiritual gifts. The church was built upon prophets as well as apostles (Eph. 2:20), the first ministering the Word to the church, the latter preaching the Word to non-Christians. Since, then, the gift of apostleship was spiritual, so also was the authority of the apostles. It remained the prerogative of the Holy Spirit and never became official in the sense that one could communicate it to others of his own volition. The authority exercised by the apostles was exercised democratically, not autocratically (Acts 15:6, 22). They were careful to include the elders and brethren when substantiating the validity of the directives they were issuing to the church. Even when Paul was asked to legislate for the churches he had founded, his authority was not his apostleship but a word from the Lord (1 Cor. 7:10).

Prophets. Prophets stand next in importance to apostles in Paul's enumeration of the spiritual gifts (1 Cor. 12:28). The gift of prophecy has already been differentiated from the grace of apostleship on the ground of the sphere in which each was exercised. In a sense Moses' desire (Num. 11:29) had been realized in the experience of the church as a whole (Acts 2:17–18; 19:6; 1 Cor. 11:4–5), but some individuals seem to have been specially endowed with this grace (Acts 11:28; 15:32; 21:9–10). These prophets in the NT church seem often to have been itinerant preachers. Moving from church to church, they built up believers in the faith by teaching the Word. Their ministry would probably be characterized by spontaneity and power, since it seems to have included speaking by revelation (1 Cor. 14:6, 26, 30–31). In these passages, however, the prophet's utterances were clearly understood, compared with the utterances in tongues. On occasion God would make his will known through the prophet (Acts 13:1–3), or a future event would be foretold (Acts 11:28; 21:10–11); but the prophet's special gift was the edification, exhortation, consolation, and instruction of the local churches (1 Cor. 14). In the subapostolic period the prophet could still take precedence over the local minister, but the day was not far off when this gift of prophecy passed to the local ministers, who preached the Word to edify the members of the Christian fellowship.

The nature of this gift of prophecy was such that the danger of false prophets must always have been present. The Spirit, therefore, communicated a gift that enabled some among those who listened to the prophets to recognize the truth or falsity of their utterances. This was not natural insight or shrewd judgment but a supernatural gift. Paul describes this spiritual gift as a "discerning of the spirits." The fact that the prophet spoke by revelation made the appearance of false prophets almost inevitable; while, therefore, Paul urged his converts not to despise prophesyings, they were, nevertheless, to prove all things (1 Thess. 5:20–21).

The Gift of Discernment of Spirits. Believers had to be able to discriminate between the false and the true spirits, when an itinerant prophet claimed to be inspired to speak by revelation (1 Cor. 14:29).

The Gift of Teaching. Clearly related to, but carefully distinguished from, the gift of prophecy is the gift of teaching (1 Cor. 12:28–29; Rom. 12:7). The prophet was a preacher of the Word; the teacher explained what the prophet proclaimed, reduced it to statements of doctrine, and applied it to the situation in which the church lived and witnessed. The teacher would offer systematic instruction (2 Tim. 2:2) to the local churches. In Ephesians 4:11 Paul adds the idea of pastor to that of teacher, because no one is able to communicate effectively (teach) without loving those who are being instructed (pastor). Likewise, to be an effective pastor, one must also be a teacher.

The Gift of Exhortation (Rom. 12:8). The possessor of the gift of exhortation would fulfill a ministry closely allied with that of the Christian prophet and teacher. The difference between them would be found in the more personal approach of the former. If his exhortations were to succeed, they would have to be given in the persuasive power of love, understanding, and sympathy. His aim would be to win Christians to a higher way of life and to a deeper dedication to Christ. The Spirit, therefore, who bestowed the gift of exhortation would with the gift communicate spiritual persuasiveness and winsomeness.

The Gift of Speaking the Word of Wisdom (1 Cor. 12:8). An important part of the Spirit's endowment so far as the Christian community was concerned was wisdom. This gift would communicate ability to receive and explain "the deep things of God." In God's dealings with men much is mysterious, and the ordinary Christian is often in need of a word that will throw light upon his situation; and the person fitted by the Spirit to fulfill this ministry is through the Spirit given the word of wisdom. Because of the strong sense of revelation or insight implied in the phrase, perhaps this gift was akin to a revelational utterance by the Christian prophet.

The Gift of Speaking the Word of Knowledge (1 Cor. 12:8). Speaking the word of knowledge suggests a word spoken only after long and careful consideration. This would be a word that the Christian teacher would ordinarily speak. Of course, this mental activity would not be entirely unaided; a point being reached when the Spirit would give knowledge, understanding, insight, that might be described as intuition. But since Paul points out that both the word of wisdom and the word of knowledge are given through or according to the Spirit, the emphasis is on the reception of the word, not on its interpretation.

The Gift of Tongues. Yet another spiritual gift is mentioned by Paul. The Spirit gives "kinds of tongues" (1 Cor. 12:10, 28). The nature of this gift is explained in 1 Corinthians 14. (1) The tongue in which the person spoke was unintelligible, and therefore unedifying to the Christian assembly (vv. 2–4); (2) the tongue (glōssa) was not a foreign language (phōnē, vv. 10–12); (3) The tongue speaker addressed himself to God to whom he probably offered prayer and praise (vv. 14–17); (4) The tongue edified the speaker (v. 4); (5) The tongue speaker lost the control of intellectual faculties (vv. 14–15), the tongue being probably a disjointed, highly pitched, ecstatic series of ejaculations, similar to the tongues spoken in times of spiritual awakening experienced intermittently by the church.

The Gift of Interpretation of Tongues (1 Cor. 12:10, 30). A necessary corollary to speaking in tongues was the interpretation of tongues. The tongue speaker might also exercise the gift of interpreting, but usually others exercised it (vv. 26–28; 12:10); though Paul's advice in 1 Corinthians 14:13 is interesting. This would imply giving meaning to unmeaningful ecstatic ejaculations as an art critic interprets a play, a symphony, or a canvas to the uninitiated; though the tongue interpreter did not depend on natural knowledge.

The Evangelist. Another gift to the church is the evangelist. Timothy is called an evangelist in 2 Timothy 4:5, as is Philip, one of the seven, in Acts 21:8. The task of preaching the gospel, although theoretically everyone's responsibility, is entrusted specifically to certain individuals by the Holy Spirit. They are to exercise their ministry in the full realization that the power comes from God, making faddish and manipulative techniques not only unnecessary but wrong. When such are present, it is a clear indication that the Spirit is absent. Converts from the evangelist's ministry are to be funneled into the church, where they are to be built up by those exercising the other gifts.

Spiritual Gifts

Service (Gk., diakonia). Service is called a gift in Romans 12:7. This term is used in a number of ways in the NT, from a generalized idea of ministry (2 Cor. 5:18, where Paul's preaching is called a ministry of reconciliation) to a specific office or task (1 Tim. 1:12). It is difficult to know exactly how Paul means it here. It is perhaps a generalized gift of power to anyone exercising a specific function in the church.

Contributing. Paul speaks of contributing as a gift (Rom. 12:8). All are to give to the needs of the church, its ministry, and the poor, but a special gift enables some to make joyous sacrifice in this area. Paul adds that this gift should be exercised "without grudging" or "in liberality."

Acts of Mercy (Rom. 12:8). Merciful acts are to be performed with cheerfulness under the guidance of the Spirit. It might be wondered why such a noble act would require charismatic endowment, but the circumstances of the time explain it. To render aid was dangerous. Such identification with other Christians in need branded one as a Christian as well, opening up the possibility of persecution for oneself.

Giving Aid (Rom. 12:8). Giving aid, also mentioned as a gift, is to be exercised with zeal. It is possible that this gift is another form of administrative gift. If so, this is not new. If not, it more closely parallels acts of mercy.

Conclusion. In instructing Christians on the exercise of these gifts, Paul is concerned to stress their practical nature. The Spirit bestows his charismata for the edification of the church, the formation of Christian character, and the service of the community. The reception of a spiritual gift, therefore, brought serious responsibility, since it was essentially an opportunity for self-giving in sacrificial service for others.

The more spectacular gifts (tongues, healings, miracles) necessitated some degree of order that would prevent their indiscriminate use (1 Cor. 14:40). The spirits of the prophets must be subjected to the prophets (v. 32). Paul clearly insists that spectacular gifts were inferior to those that instructed believers in faith and morals and evangelized non-Christians. Tongue speaking was not forbidden (v. 39), but intelligent exposition of the Word, instruction in faith and morals, and preaching the gospel were infinitely superior. The criteria used to judge the relative values of spiritual gifts were doctrinal (1 Cor. 12:3), moral (1 Cor. 13), and practical (1 Cor. 14).

The problem was where to strike the balance. The greatest peril lay in overemphasizing the gifts, which tended to exalt the offices that grew out of them. That led inevitably to institutional ecclesiasticism and the inevitable corresponding loss of the church's awareness of the Spirit's presence and experience of the Spirit's power.

J. G. S. S. THOMSON AND W. A. ELWELL

See also BAPTISM OF THE SPIRIT; CHARISMATIC MOVEMENT; HOLY SPIRIT; TONGUES, SPEAKING IN.

Bibliography. D. Bridge, Signs and Wonders Today; F. D. Bruner, Theology of the Holy Spirit; D. A. Carson, Showing the Spirit; J. A. Christopher, Gifts Believers Seek; L. Edwards, Discerning Your Spiritual Gifts; E. E. Ellis, Pauline Theology; Prophecy and Hermeneutics; M. Griffiths, Grace-Gifts; W. A. Grudem, ed., Are Miraculous Gifts for Today?: Four Views; K. S. Hemphill, Spiritual Gifts: Empowering the New Testament Church; A. A. Hoekema, Tongue and Spirit Baptism; R. Kydd, Charismatic Gifts in the Early Church; L. Morris, Spirit of the Living God; J. I. Packer, Keep in Step with the Spirit; C. Robeck, Charismatic Experiences in History; H. W. Robinson, Christian Experience of the Holy Spirit; K. Stendahl, Paul among Jews and Gentiles; J. R. Stott, Baptism and Fullness of the Holy Spirit; C. Williams, Descent of the Dove; J. R. Williams, Gift of the Holy Spirit Today.

Spiritual Healing. See HEAL, HEALING.

Spirituality. The state of deep relationship to God. The interest among evangelical Christians in spirituality is new and yet also a deeply based consciousness. It is new because the word "spirituality" is not commonly used, nor does it occur in biblical or theological dictionaries. For some Christians there has been reluctance to speak of spirituality, lest we isolate such expressions as "spiritual formation, spiritual health, spiritual discipline" from other aspects of life and living. In the past, expressions such as "holiness, holy living, godliness, walking with God, discipleship" seemed more acceptable because they emphasized a formal commitment, a deepening relationship with Christ, and a life of personal obedience to the word of God. "Spirituality" is more abstract, even misleading, when used of the asceticism of any religion, including specific traditions of Roman Catholic devotion. But the decline of the sacred even among evangelical Christians and the deep penetration of secularism into every aspect of life are causing alarm and the need to reconsider devotion to Christ is being taken much more seriously.

Spirituality in Other Religions. Modern exemplars of spiritual life, such as depicted in the film Gandhi, remind us that all mankind has the potential attributes for being spiritual in some sense of the word. In primitive religions there is no distinction between the sacred and the secular, as in animism, and when all is viewed in terms of magic, the concept of spirituality probably does not arise. But in the more advanced religions, where the distinction is made between the sacred and the secular, then human choice, personal discipline, and ascetic practice lead to advanced experiences of spirituality. Rudolf Otto in his classic study Idea of the Holy categorizes the experience of religion as the tremendous with its sense of overwhelming awe, the mysterious with its awareness of something numinous, the portentous with its fear that is qualitative, the fascinating with its motive for self-reflection, and with energy as power that elevates the worshiper. These provide the experience of the sacred that encourage the worshiper to incorporate in himself what is different from himself. Yet the gulf between the worshiper and the sacred remains. The deep, earnest, sustained desire to make the leap between the human and the sacred is characteristic of the advanced Eastern religions, although it may also be more loosely used to describe the inspiration of the poet, the vision of the philosopher, or even the idealism of youth.

Indeed, the advanced standards of asceticism in Eastern religions today are often contrasted favorably with the self-interest, materialism, and hedonism of Western life. Asian religions are often marked by a contempt for materialism and by a concept of spirituality as a sustained and consistent way of life that shames Western Christians. The endless vigil, the extreme asceticism, and the simplicity of a mullah, guru, or fakir seem to excel any standards of ascetic spirituality in the West. Indeed, Hindu people are often looked upon as the most prayerful of people, whose lives are made up of prayer. A fakir will live all his life entirely dependent on alms and in absolute contempt for all worldly goods. A sannyasi will devote himself to continual journeyings, in a life lived entirely apart. Such have chosen to devote their lives entirely to the sacred. Other great eastern religions—Buddhism, Zoroastrianism, the religions of China and Japan—have this strong ascetical character of the contemplative life. Some Western Roman Catholic contemplatives have therefore entered into dialogue with such holy men as an aid in deepening their own understanding of the spiritual life.

Spirituality in Christian Heresies. Within Christianity, the early heresies all won popularity more by their ascetic and mystical practices than by any teaching that they professed. Almost all of them were either infiltrations of Eastern thought or the result of Greek mystic thought. Gnosticism, Mithracism, Neoplatonism, and later also Manichaeism all had Eastern origins. They sought the world's regeneration in outdoing Christianity in ascetic and mystical efforts. Likewise, Islam as a heresy of Judaism has produced some of the greatest spiritual poetry, while its Arab philosophers have profoundly influenced Western thought. Its spiritual masters have been among the greatest, the most severe, and the most faithful in the history of asceticism. Thus it is not just in doctrine that such Eastern faiths have challenged the West, but in their practices of spirituality. As the East intermingles with the West today, so we can anticipate the intensification of such challenges to the postmodern consciousness of the West, disillusioned by the aridity of rationalism, technocracy, and the loss of spiritual values.

The Nature of Christian Spirituality. 1. Asceticism as such does not define Christian spirituality. There is much asceticism that is based on contempt for the material world. The biblical doctrine of creation recognizes that God has created all things "good." Thus, living in God's world, there can be no motive for detachment from this good life.

2. The biblical revelation of God as a personal God leaves no place for the deductions of human wisdom, as in Eastern thought, nor for the human reasoning, as in Greek thought. The will and purpose of God has been given to us in the Holy Scriptures. The Ten Commandments and Israel's worship of Yahweh, the God of covenant, gave its people a very different orientation from those of the surrounding peoples. Conscious intercourse with God, as Moses "spoke with God face to face," the temple, the shekinah, and the prophets all manifested the ways of God and developed an Israelite mysticism very different from anything hitherto known in the ancient world.

3. Christian spirituality is Christocentric. The apostle Paul frequently describes the life of the believer as "in Christ" to emphasize the union Christians enjoy with Jesus Christ. This is a dynamic union which the Synoptic writers describe as following Jesus, the Johannine writings as union in love, and Hebrews and 1 Peter as a pilgrimage. These and other metaphors imply the growth and dynamism of the life of Christ in the believer. For God's original purpose to create man in the image and likeness of God (Gen. 1:26–28) is reinterpreted by redemption as being "conformed to the likeness of his Son" (Rom. 8:29).

4. Christian spirituality is life in the Trinity. The Christian lives in the acceptance of sonship, knowing God as Father. He realizes this in the Sonship of Jesus Christ, his saving work of forgiveness, and his gift of eternal life. He actualizes this by the gift of the Holy Spirit who enables the believer to cry "Abba, Father" (Rom. 8:15; Gal. 4:6).

5. Christian spirituality is the outworking, then, of the grace of God in the soul of man, beginning with conversion and concluding with death or Christ's second advent. It is marked by growth and maturity in a Christlike life. It implies community and fellowship (Eph. 4:15–16), a life of prayer (Matt. 6:5–15; 1 Thess. 5:17), a sense of the eternal dimension in all one's existence (Gen. 50:19–20; Rom. 8:28), and an intense awareness of life lived in the present before God (Matt. 6:34). The Spirit-filled life is one that manifests practically the Spirit of Jesus, with the fruit of love that is joyful, peaceful, patient, kind, good, faithful, gentle, and self-controlled (Gal. 5:22–23). This is true spirituality. It is a continuous command, “Be filled with the Spirit,” who should be neither quenched (1 Thess. 5:19) nor grieved (Eph. 4:30).

Spirituality

6. Christian spirituality engenders fellowship, and the communion of saints deepens its character. As social beings, the reality of our spirituality is tested by the quality of our public worship (Acts 2:42). Godliness and spiritual friendship reinforce each other, as a horizontal and a vertical way respectively, to inspire and to embody the love of God in human hearts. For Christian worship is not primarily a matter of special practices but of lifestyle (Rom. 12:1; 14:6; 1 Cor. 10:31). Spiritual autobiography, so rich and extensive in the Bible, especially in the Psalter, inspires and integrates our own search for models of the biblical faith. Likewise, devotional writing throughout history, such as Augustine’s Confessions, Teresa of Ávila’s Life, John Bunyan’s Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners, or C. S. Lewis’s Surprised by Joy, help us develop our views of God and of ourselves, so that we keep growing in our faith in God and in our distrust of ourselves.

Orthodox Spirituality. It is often said the Gospel of John has been the prevailing scriptural influence in the Orthodox Church, for its simple faith combined with its deep intellectual character has attracted minds like Origen (185–254) John Chrysostom (347–407), Basil (ca. 330–79), Theodore the Studite, and others. One aspect of its importance has been the motif of witness and the importance of martyrdom, which has never been far from the spirit of Eastern life. The creation of a school for catechumens in Alexandria in the third century stimulated an intellectual and speculative type of spirituality. It owed much to Philo, who sought to combine Judaism and Platonism. This led to a dualistic view of matter and spirit, scriptural allegorism, the method of abstraction in apophatic attitudes, and in a tendency to think dialectically.

To this was added a Christocentric mysticism by Athanasius (296–373), completing what Irenaeus had emphasized beforehand, of the recapitulation of man’s purpose in Christ. There is also a strong asceticism, influenced by the desert fathers such as John Cassian (ca. 360–435), Evagrius (ca. 346–99), and John Climacus (ca. 570–649), who considered the monastic model of apatheia as the ideal. This is not the apathy of the Stoics, but the fiery love of God, that both burns up the passions and possessiveness of men and flames in living desire for God. Orthodox piety is also deeply liturgical in its dispensing of the sacrament and the celebration of the church calendar, which frames the whole year with its commemoration of all the stages of the Savior’s earthly life and ministry. No doubt the ceremony of the Byzantine court also added to the richness of Orthodox liturgy and iconic art. There is the strong contemplative element in the tradition of hesychasm (hesychia, “quiet”). “Prayer without ceasing” goes back to the contemplative life of the desert fathers, but it was richly developed by Symeon the New Theologian (949–1022). The Jesus Prayer, “Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy upon me,” became a repetitive spiritual practice with controlled breathing and other exercises. There has been a revived interest in the Jesus Prayer by Russian emigrants in recent decades. Finally, there is in Orthodox spirituality a strong emphasis on man’s union with God and “deification.” The latter term does not mean pantheism, but a sharing, through the grace of God, of the divine life (2 Pet. 1:4). In the Son “we are made sons of God,” declares Athanasius. It is a supernatural life that man can never achieve naturally, although as in all human traditions, this has often been lost sight of.

Today there is a growing interest in Orthodox spirituality within the West, as evidenced in the evangelical Orthodox movement. Theologians like T. F. Torrance have redirected us to their Alexandrine fathers. The heroic spirit of Russian Christians today and the recognition of nineteenth-century men of prayer like John of Kronstadt, Anthony Bloom, and Timothy Ware are exemplars of a twentieth century renaissance of Orthodoxy.

Western Medieval Spirituality. Until Augustine (354–430), Western spirituality was much influenced by the desert fathers and the more erudite monasticism of the fourth century Cappadocian fathers—Basil, his brother Gregory of Nyssa, and their friend Gregory of Nazianzus. But their mysticism was tempered in the West by Jerome, who advocated the historical study of the Scriptures, and by Tertullian, who was a Roman jurist. But the key man is Augustine, who rejected the Eastern doctrine of deification of man and emphasized the reality of a personal God to whom he addressed his Confessions in humility and trust. His emphasis on the human share in the divine life by grace is also discussed in the City of God (bks. 13–14), and in the Enarrationes, dialogues between the church as the bride and Christ as the bridegroom, he develops the theme of the communal growth of the believers.

However, it is Gregory the Great (540–604) who is the father of medieval spirituality. He systematized Western monasticism and developed the imagery of the vision of God. To experience this, he emphasized the need of purity of heart, with the associated virtue of humility. Practical service was another Western trait of Gregory’s teachings. Isidore (ca. 560–636), bishop of Seville, and the Venerable Bede (ca. 673–735) developed Gregory’s ideas further, with stress on reading (lectio), meditative memory (meditatio), prayer (oratio), and practice (intento), as guides for the spiritual life in the Dark Ages of the barbarians. Maximus the Confessor (ca. 580–662) was the first to give expression to the Catholic tradition of the three ways to God of purgation, illumination, and union. The Celtic church emphasized the need of a penitential life. John Scotus Erigena (ca. 810–77) introduced Greek mystical thought into the West, translating Dionysius, Gregory of Nyssa, and others.

The high Middle Ages (1000–1300) were primarily concerned with monastic reform, the clash between scholasticism and the contemplative life, and the laicization of the church. An intensely affective expression of spirituality was promoted by Bernard of Clairvaux (1090–1153) and his followers. The Victorines, Hugh of St. Victor (1097–1141), and especially Richard of St. Victor (d. 1173), attempted a synthesis of love and knowledge that has deeply influenced subsequent mystical thought. Popularity was aroused by the examples of the friars, notably Francis of Assisi (1181–1226) and his followers, Bonaventure (1221–74) and Raymond Lull (1235–1315). More speculative in their theology were the Dominicans. Dominic (ca. 1173–1221) saw the great need of spiritual direction for the laity, an emphasis perhaps eclipsed by the great Dominican theologian Thomas Aquinas (1224–74), who had reservations as to how far mystical theology could take one.

The late Middle Ages (1300–1500) were marked by a dramatic change of mood to one of pessimism in Western life, with famines, plagues, intellectual sterility, skepticism, and the breakup of feudal society. Individual mysticism deepens, although regional associations of mystics are discernible.

In the Rhineland, the Dominicans Meister Eckhart (1260–1328), Johannes Tauler (ca. 1300–61), and Henry Suso (ca. 1295–1366), with the Augustinian John Ruysbroeck (1293–1381), all exerted a profound influence. Tauler was related to Nicholas of Basel, a leader of the movement called Friends of God and later a significant influence on Martin Luther. In England, the Lollards and other disaffected mystics gave great impetus to lay piety. Richard Rolle (ca. 1290–1349), Julian of Norwich (late fourteenth century), Margery Kempe (ca. 1373–1433), Walter of Hilton (d. ca. 1396), and the unknown writer of Cloud of Unknowing all express the anti-intellectualism and affective needs of the period. In the Netherlands, Gerard Groote (1340–84) and his disciple Thomas à Kempis (1379–1471) gave birth to the Devotio Moderna, whose classic, Imitation of Christ, had an immense influence on subsequent generations.

Modern Catholic Spirituality. More than anywhere else, the founders of the tradition of modern Catholic spirituality are the Spanish mystics.

Ignatius of Loyola (1491–1556) was the founder of the Jesuits. Teresa of Ávila (1515–82) and John of the Cross (1542–91) were reformers of the Carmelites. A precursor was Cardinal Cisneros (1475–1516), whose Spiritual Exercises shows the influence of the Devotio Moderna. Ignatius in turn wrote his Spiritual Exercises to introduce to others what he had experienced in 1582 when he awaited God's direction for his life. Teresa's Life and Interior Castle describe her autobiographical experiences in prayer, two of the most balanced descriptions of prayer that are still deeply mystical. John of the Cross, perhaps Spain's most famous lyricist, expanded his poems into four treatises on the contemplative life. He is profoundly biblical and yet speculative in his mysticism of "darkness."

While the Renaissance, much less the Reformation, never touched Spain, Italy was in the heart of the first movement and was also affected by the second. Those persecuted for their reforming zeal were Girolamo Savonarola (1452–98); a Dominican, Aonio Palaerio, who was in touch with Calvin; and Lorenzo Scupoli (1530–1610), whose book Spiritual Combat ran into over two hundred editions in Slavic and Balkan languages. Robert Bellarmine (1542–1621), a Jesuit, was influenced by it in Western Europe.

In France there was sharp conflict between the more rationalistic views of men like Bossuet and the quietist views of Francis Fénelon (1651–1715). Before him the great influence on French spirituality was Francis of Sales (1567–1622), who followed the combined influences of Ignatius and Teresa. Sales focused on the spiritual needs of the laity in a gentle manner. A more theological emphasis on spiritual renewal of the clergy was made by Pierre de Brulle (1575–1629), who founded the Oratory for that purpose in 1611. Blaise Pascal (1623–62), with his specific attack on the intellectualism of René Descartes, is best known for his Pensées.

Caroline Spirituality. In England, the spirituality of the Anglican church is associated with the Book of Common Prayer, first issued by Archbishop Cranmer in 1549 and revised in 1552. The petitionary emphasis of Bishop Jewel, the communal liturgy of Richard Hooker (ca. 1554–1600), the confessional bias of John Donne (ca. 1572–1631), the catechetical aim of Lancelot Andrewes (1555–1626), the lyrics of George Herbert and of other metaphysical poets, and the astringent emphasis of Jeremy Taylor and William Law (1686–1761) have all contributed to a rich cultural life around the communal piety of Anglican devotion. Although "Caroline" indicates the reign of Charles I and II, it is still characteristic of much Anglicanism today. Its balance between the contemplative life of prayer and the vocal liturgy of communal prayer is the genius of its spiritual continuity in the life of the church.

Spirituality

Puritan Spirituality. While the Reformation of Martin Luther (1483–1546) and John Calvin (1509–64) developed into classical Protestantism, the subsequent reforms of Puritanism, pietism, and Methodism were distinct, and sometimes divergent. At first influenced by the mystics, notably Tauler and the unknown writer of the Theologia Germanica, Luther later became more antimystical, so that his prayer life is practical and simple. To him the essence of spiritual life could be sustained on the actualization of the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, and the Apostles' Creed. Calvin is a much more sophisticated spiritual guide, and in the third book of his Institutes of the Christian Religion he has left rich teaching on the spiritual life. He was possibly originally inspired by Jean Gerson's teachings on personal piety and by the Devotio Moderna, though very soon Calvin gave his own distinctive alternative to the Catholic model of purgation-illumination-union with the biblical themes of justification-sanctification-glorification.

It was out of Calvinist teaching that Puritan spirituality developed in England and later in New England. It focused on the centrality of the Word of God and its preaching, the preparation of heart to receive the Word, the need for a godly walk and accountability to God, and the strength and watchfulness required in pilgrimage and conflict. The heavenly hope of the believer enabled him to anticipate heaven while still on earth. The strong theological understanding of scriptural authority by John Rogers (1500–55), the prayerful life of John Bradford (1510–55), and the synthesis of Tudor Puritan theology by William Greenham established a framework for Puritan life. Later the affectivity of Richard Sibbs and Thomas Goodwin (1600–80), the theological clarity of John Owen, and the pastoral insights of Richard Baxter (1615–91) established the heyday of Puritan spirituality in the middle of the seventeenth century. Why Puritanism collapsed as a cultural force is a complex issue, but one suggestion is that prayer was vocalized, like the preaching that was central to its witness. Meditation did have a significant emphasis, as the works of Hall and Baxter attest, but the contemplative life was suspect by its association with popery. Puritanism might have engendered a richer, more sustained spirituality if the contemplative life had also been considered. The movement lasted longer in New England.

German Pietism. In reaction to the sterile theology of Lutheranism in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, pietism was somewhat anti-intellectual and reactionary. Philipp J. Spener (1635–1705) was its classical exponent, although it is agreed Johann Arndt (1555–1621) was its founder. Arndt's True Christianity was widely read as an inspiration for "a new life." His favorite phrase was "It is faith that fashions the love of Christ in the faithful heart"—faith that was an act of thinking as well as feeling. The name "pietism" was unfortunate, for the movement would be better described as "devotionalism." But the group that met in Spener's house was called the college of piety, and so the name stuck. August H. Francke (1663–1727), the organizing genius of the lay movement, became professor of Greek and Oriental languages at Halle University. Both Spener and Francke practiced their devotion in the establishment of poor schools, orphanages, farms, printing shops, and other enterprises. Count Nikolaus L. von Zinzendorf (1700–60) later constituted remnants of a pre-Reformation group into the Moravian brethren in his state in 1727. Gerard Tersteegen (1697–1769) was perhaps the last of the great Protestant spiritual theologians; his hymns have had a lasting impact on the church. The Clapham Sect and William Wilberforce's Practical View of . . . Real Christianity were to continue the echoes of the pietist movement into nineteenth-century England.

Methodism and Modern Holiness Movements. John Wesley (1703–91), who lived and died an Anglican pastor, was nevertheless founder of the Methodist movement. Eclectic in his spiritual life, he was read in William Law, Teresa of Ávila, Francis of Sales, Thomas à Kempis, Fénelon, and others. While preaching was the main emphasis of his ministry, he developed hymnody with his brother Charles as an instrument of spirituality and developed class organization as a means of instruction. But his doctrine of Christian perfection was developed carefully, leaving the possibility of Feuerbach's later teaching on religion as feeling to overwhelm liberal Methodism in a later period. While George Whitefield (1714–80) is commonly associated with the Wesleys, his teachings are closer to the Puritans and Jonathan Edwards, with whom he was also associated during his visits to New England.

The Keswick Convention was established in England in the late 1800s to promote the message of victorious Christian living. Watchman Nee's influential book Normal Christian Life, based on Romans 8, taught Christians what to expect when the power of the Holy Spirit was operative in their lives. Both have been influential movements among contemporary evangelicals.

Pentecostalism, beginning in the early part of this century out of holiness teaching, and the more interdenominational charismatic movement since World War I have been significant renewal movements. The focus on direct illumination of the Holy Spirit has been claimed by other movements in the history of the church, but none has grown so fast. The Pentecostal movement today is the fastest church-growth movement in modern times. The release of self-consciousness, the exercise of touch, the emphasis on spiritual gifts, the strong awareness of the satanic and the need of exorcisms, the ministry of all believers—these have marked the character of its spirituality. There is a felt vibrancy in the reality of the living and present God, like children rediscovering the reality of the fatherhood of God.

Conclusion. In spite of the renewal movements, there is a dearth today of spiritual leadership and direction in the evangelical world. Catholics can look to Mother Teresa in Calcutta, and the Orthodox to the unnamed martyrs of modern Russia, but evangelical Protestants are largely secularized by their politics, their obsessions with growth, and their interests in administration and parachurch activities. The loss of the practice of prayer, the ignorance of the rich traditions of spirituality, and the need to develop a cultural framework for the practice of devotion are challenges worthy of the most serious consideration at present.

J. M. HOUSTON

See also BEATIFIC VISION; BOEHME, JAKOB; BRETHERN OF THE COMMON LIFE; DEVOTIO MODERNA; FRANCIS OF ASSISI; GODLINESS; HESYCHASM; HOLINESS MOVEMENT, AMERICAN; ILLUMINATIVE WAY, THE; KESWICK CONVENTION; MYSTICISM; NUMINOUS, THE; OTTO, RUDOLF; PERFECTION, PERFECTIONISM; PIETISM; PRAYER; PURGATIVE WAY, THE; QUIETISM; REVIVAL, SPIRITUAL; REVIVALISM; SANCTIFICATION; UNITIVE WAY, THE.

Bibliography. L. Bouyer, History of Christian Spirituality; H. Davies, Worship and Theology in England; R. J. Foster, Celebration of Discipline; K. Gangel and J. C. Wilhoit, eds., Christian Educator's Handbook on Spiritual Formation; U. T. Holmes, History of Christian Spirituality; C. Jones, G. Wainwright, and E. Yarnold, eds., Study of Spirituality; E. Kodloubousky and G. E. H. Palmer, eds. and trans., Early Fathers from the Philokalia; Writings from the Philokalia; R. Lovelace, Dynamics of Spiritual Life; B. McGinn, Presence of God: A History of Western Christian Mysticism; W. Pannenberg, Christian Spirituality; R. Payne, Holy Fire: The Story of the Fathers of the Eastern Church; P. Pourrat, Christian Spirituality; F. Schaeffer, True Spirituality; F. E. Stoeffler, Rise of Evangelical Pietism; J. Tiller, Puritan, Pietist and Pentecostalist; G. S. Wakefield, Puritan Devotion: Its Place in the Development of Christian Piety; G. S. Wakefield, ed., Dictionary of Christian Spirituality; D. S. Whitney, Spiritual Disciplines for the Christian Life; D. Willard, Divine Conspiracy; Spirit of the Disciplines.

Spiritual Warfare. In biblical terms, spiritual warfare essentially encompasses Satan's rebellion against God and the manifestations of that rebellion in the created order. At the heart of this warfare, however, is the fact that God is sovereignly in control of his creation, and, as the Sovereign One, he has already decided that Satan's rebellion will fail. The threads of Satan's rebellion and God's loving response are interwoven through the Scriptures as an ongoing drama played out on the stage of human history.

The Biblical Drama of Spiritual Warfare. The first act in this drama is God's creation of the universe and everything in it. By virtue of God's nature as the Sovereign One, this entire created order, which includes living and nonliving, physical and spirit, is completely dependent on him not only for its origin but also for its continued existence. It is eternally linked to him by a debt that can never be repaid. What God asks of the created order, and especially humanity, is not repayment, but appropriate recognition of the Creator. This is the essence of glorifying God: Adam and Eve are to ascribe to him that which is rightfully his and honor him by joyfully and gratefully living according to the order that he has established in his creative act. It is on this foundation that spiritual warfare may be examined.

The second act in this drama is the fall. Adam and Eve are tempted to assert their independence from God. Satan could not physically coerce them to eat from the tree—he had to convince them to choose that path themselves. The battle, as with almost all of spiritual warfare, is for the minds and hearts of humanity. It is in the mind that Adam and Eve lose. Their fall is an act of rebellion against God and even against themselves as part of God's created order. After they fall, a battle is announced in which God's ultimate victory is foreshadowed (Gen. 3:15). The fall is not limited to Adam and Eve. As God's vicegerents over the earth, their sphere of dominion is also affected. This act closes with their banishment from the garden.

The third act is played out through the rest of the OT. In it God calls apart a people who are to receive his blessing and become a blessing to the rest of the world (Gen. 12:1–3). There are several significant spiritual encounter scenes in this act, including Moses with Pharaoh (Exod. 7–12), God with Satan over Job (Job 1–2), and Daniel's vision (Dan. 10:4–11:1). The last episode unveils a glimpse of the reality of struggles among spiritual powers. The fact that such scenes are so rare indicates that God want us to focus on his sovereignty rather than cosmic battles.

The drama intensifies in the NT. Here, the first act is played out in the birth, life, and death of Jesus. Essentially, he traverses a road filled with spiritual battles to establish our freedom on the cross. One significant scene is the temptation of Christ. He refuses to turn his back on God's expressed purpose in his life, though Satan's failure here only spurs him to wait for a better time to try again. Through this victory Jesus earns the right to exercise God's authority over Satan throughout his earthly ministry.

Interwoven throughout this act is Jesus' ministry of releasing captives of the strong man (Matt. 12:22–29), seen in healings and release from demonic oppression. He teaches that true freedom is found not in doing whatever we want to do, but in obedience to God (John 8:31–36). The most overt instances of spiritual warfare are the demonic encounters sprinkled throughout the Synoptics. In the episode of the Gerasene demoniac (Matt. 8:28–34; Mark 5:1–20; and Luke 8:26–37) we see both the desire of demons and the authority of Christ. The man is controlled by a legion of demons who drive him to commit acts in denial of his humanity (e.g., living among the tombs, crying out, cutting himself). They recognize Jesus at a distance and drive the man to him. While acknowledging his lordship, they defiantly scream at him for mercy, even imploring him by God for it! Jesus repeatedly commands the demons to come out (the imperfect tense in Mark). Once they are gone from the man, they destroy the pigs, another reminder of their malicious intentions. The man, set free and restored, becomes a powerful witness to Christ.

Spiritual Warfare

God's victory in spiritual warfare is enacted on the cross. Christ's work is finished (John 19:30), Satan's power is broken (Col. 2:15), and those who were his captives are offered reconciliation with God and the chance to participate in the work of reconciling others (2 Cor. 5:18–19).

The next major act in the drama is seen in the first Christians working out their freedom in Christ. Though there are numerous instances of power encounters in Acts, there are relatively few overt instances of spirit confrontations. One example is Paul and the pagan fortune-teller (Acts 16:16–18). With a simple command, Paul casts out the fortune-telling spirit. We have no idea what happens to the woman after this incident. Another encounter is the use of Jesus' name by the sons of Sceva, Jewish exorcists trying out a new formula (Acts 19:13–17). The result is a disaster which reminds us that dealing with demons is serious business.

The final act in the biblical drama is Satan's demise and the full manifestation of God's eternal kingdom. Of note in Satan's binding in Revelation 20:1–4 is the fact that an unnamed angel is given the honor of doing the work. This reminds us that ultimately spiritual warfare is not Satan vs. angels or humans, but Satan vs. God, and the creature will never prevail against the omnipotent Creator.

Selected Critical Themes in Spiritual Warfare. Within the biblical drama of spiritual warfare, several significant themes may be noted. The foundation is God's sovereignty. He is the owner and governor of the earth who does whatever pleases him. As the Creator and Sustainer, God infinitely deserves that we glorify him. This is not some cosmic ego trip; it is simply giving God that which is rightfully his. Every part of the created order must acknowledge something as the sovereign ruler; this is an intrinsic part of our nature as creatures. As people, our choice is not whether we glorify, but whom we glorify. We glorify God when we live our lives in accordance with his guidelines as a love response to his wonderful works. The first commandment embodies the essence: we are to love God with all our heart, soul, mind, and strength. Living this out in daily life is spiritual warfare at its most basic level.

A second theme concerns Satan. He is the tempter, the inciter, and accuser. He has a murderous and lying nature. Being a creature, he falls under God's sovereignty. In imitation of God, Satan has established a temporary counterfeit kingdom in which he receives glory (recognition as lord) from his subjects when they follow in his rebellious footsteps. In the popular literature on spiritual warfare, many use Isaiah 14:12–20 and Ezekiel 28:11–19 as depictions of Satan's fall. The hyperbolic language is thought to go beyond the human realm to that which is driving the leaders, but the most we can say is that the possibility exists that these passages shadow Satan's original fall.

The third thematic area is really a cluster of themes involving humanity. All people share the image of God. Those without Christ, though sharing the image of God, are dead in their sins, and, though they can choose to say no to individual sins, they are powerless against Satan's overall control of their lives. In spite of that control, they retain the ability to choose Christ and escape captivity.

Though no single method of demonic confrontation is given in the epistles, there is a rich variety of teaching with spiritual warfare implications for Christians. At the foundation is their identity in Christ, which involves a citizenship transfer from Satan's dominion to residency in God's kingdom (Col. 1:13). Further, they are now seated with Christ in the heavenly places, far above (not literally, but in authority) any type of spiritual power (Eph. 1:15–2:6). Their new citizenship comes with responsibility. They are called to discipline themselves through the process of allowing God to renew their minds, break down ungodly thought patterns (strongholds; 2 Cor. 10:1–4), and conform them to the image of Christ. Being identified with Christ, they participate in his victory over Satan on three grounds (Rev. 12:10–12). First is the blood of the Lamb, which refers not to a ritual phrase but to a genuine expression of faith in Christ. Second is their testimony, which is not just the story of how they came to Christ, but the way they live for him and testify to the operation of his grace in their lives. Last is a lack of fear in the face of death. Threats against Christ's followers should not sway them, because such threats hold no power in the eternal perspective. God's children are commanded to stand up to Satan's attacks, wearing God's armor (Eph. 6:10–19), humbling themselves before God, and resisting Satan (James 4:7–10; 1 Pet. 5:6–9).

Modern Discussion. Recent scholarly discussion in the Western cultural context acknowledges Satan and demons as personifications of human evil but stops short of admitting their ontological reality. For example, Walter Wink (Engaging the Powers) presents demons as the interiority of systems that have fallen from their divinely ordained purpose; they are not beings having existence independent of the structures they inhabit. While the language of the powers in the NT is freely used, the worldview of the NT is left behind for a more modern (sociological) picture.

Even the evangelical church functionally built its practical theology on a largely materialistic view of the universe. With few exceptions, writings in which demons were treated as actual beings were generally limited to charismatic/Pentecostal (J. Penn-Lewis, War on the Saints), nonacademic evangelical (H. Lindsey, Satan Is Alive and Well), and missionary contexts (J. L. Nevius, Demon Possession). Among evangelical scholars who acknowledged demons, there was discussion over the extent to which such entities could influence genuine Christians and what the appropriate vocabulary was for describing such influence (M. Unger, Biblical Demonology). However, for many the reality of demons and demonic influence was generally limited to missionary work in foreign lands. Demons were thought to be less active in Christian cultures, with the unstated implication that (at least in the West) they could be safely ignored.

More recently, however, a resurgence of discussion on spiritual warfare has been evidenced in evangelical circles, including academia. Beginning in the late 1970s, several leading evangelical seminaries and graduate schools initiated courses in spiritual warfare, though such courses were usually offered through the Missions or Intercultural Studies departments rather than Bible or Theology. In the 1980s recognized evangelical publishers began to offer more titles on the topic, ranging from Frank Peretti's popular novel This Present Darkness to scholarly dissertations such as Clinton Arnold's Ephesians: Power and Magic. Peretti's book sold well not just in evangelical circles; it also penetrated the broader market. His approach, however, denigrates God's sovereignty (angels are powerless unless we pray) and is dangerously close to a form of Christian animism in which spirit beings are the cause behind every bad event that takes place.

The rise in spiritual warfare discussion in evangelical circles may be attributed to several factors. White North American culture has evidenced a resurgence in spiritistic beliefs and activities. These are clearly seen in the rise and promotion of New Age thinking and the plethora of successful occultic movies. The significant growth of the charismatic movement and its influence on popular evangelical thinking has also been an important factor. Additionally, the impact of the explosive growth of the church in the non-Western world, combined with more significant anthropological discussion of worldview, helped open the door in evangelical academic circles to a more careful examination of presuppositions about the spirit realm. Evangelical missiologists have occasionally engaged in denouncing the materialistic Western worldview and calling for a return to a more biblical cosmology. Some, however, seem to have gone so far as to espouse a form of Christian animism in which all of our problems are attributed to spirits.

The recent trend of spiritual warfare prayer against territorial spirits has displayed the tendency of promoting a type of spiritual warfare that is more magical and ritualistic in orientation than genuinely biblical. The very fact of the paucity of biblical evidence about demonic hierarchies should serve as a warning against the desire to develop organizational charts of demons that must be confronted in reaching cities or countries for Christ.

Conspiracy theories also abound in the spiritual warfare literature. Most intriguing on the popular level in this regard are the proposals (generally presented as fact) of a wide-ranging satanic cult that purportedly interpenetrates every level of every society in the world. The recent rise in claims of satanic ritual abuse and geometric increase in reported cases of multiple personality disorder in the United States (recognized in the 1980s as a diagnosable disorder in Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders) have fueled the flames for conspiracy theorists. There is wide-ranging literature on both sides of the topic. Whether any of the theories proposed will be borne out remains to be seen. However, as noted in the biblical discussion above, the foundation of spiritual warfare is not Satan's schemes but God's sovereignty and control.

Summary and Conclusion. As the Sovereign One, God does not have to fight Satan to prove his greater power. He simply declares his sovereignty in the face of Satan's rebellious claims. Thus, on the cosmic level, spiritual warfare is not a dualistic fight between equals or a chess game in which the better strategist wins. Further, as the Creator, God infinitely deserves our glory, which is simply recognizing what he has done. For whatever reason, Satan desires that glory and uses a false claim of sovereignty to get those in his bondage to glorify him through living lives contrary to God's ordained order. Even though Satan has authority on earth, a balanced view of spiritual warfare must be built on God's overarching universal sovereignty. Only in this way can we avoid the reductionistic tendency of linking all hindering or blocking circumstances of life to demons, of placing all blame or responsibility for our bad choices or actions on Satan, or demanding that we cast out demons to rid ourselves of every bad habit we have.

Spiritual Warfare

Spiritual warfare for Christians is most simply our conscious participation in the continued outworking of Christ's victory over Satan on the cross. This warfare is not limited to foreign non-Christian lands or places where the gospel has not yet been made known. Rather, it involves all Christians as they seek to live out the reality of being children of God in the midst of a world rebelling against his sovereignty. On the personal level, spiritual warfare is the daily struggle to live our lives at the level to which God calls us in Christ. On the interpersonal level, spiritual warfare is our service in God's mission of freeing those still in bondage so that they can also live out the consequences of Jesus' defeat of Satan. On the corporate level, spiritual warfare involves the local expressions of the church seeking to live as manifestations of the kingdom community in the midst of a rebellious world. On the systemic level, spiritual warfare is the continuing revealing of God's kingdom in opposition to the domination systems of the world. Finally, on the cosmic level, spiritual warfare includes encounters between God's angels and Satan and his hosts but ultimately rests on God's exercise of his sovereignty over the created order. A. S. MOREAU Bibliography. N. T. Anderson, Bondage Breaker; C. E. Arnold, Powers of Darkness; G. B. Caird, Principalities and Powers; C. F. Dickason, Demon Possession and the Christian; N. Wright, Satan Syndrome.

Sprinkle, Sprinkling. See BAPTISM, MODES OF.

Spurgeon, Charles Haddon (1834–1892). Influential Baptist minister in England. Spurgeon was born at Kelvedon, Essex, on June 19, 1834, and became a part of the Nonconformist tradition from his early childhood. His grandfather, James, and his father, John, were both ministers of Independent congregations. He spent his early years at his grandfather's home, but attended schools at Colchester and Newmarket.

Although he had been reared as an Independent and converted in a primitive Methodist chapel, he was baptized and joined a Baptist church in 1849. In 1850 he enrolled in a school near Cambridge and became an active member of a Baptist church. At the age of sixteen he preached his first sermon in a cottage at Teversham, near Cambridge. By 1851 he was preaching regularly to a Baptist congregation at Waterbeach, a village near Cambridge.

In April 1854 he accepted a call to the Baptist chapel at New Park Street in London and began a ministry that lasted thirty-eight years. He received some unfavorable publicity at first because of his lack of a formal education and his rural origins. The congregation began to grow, however, and soon he was preaching at Exeter Hall while the church building was being enlarged. Then some members of the church rented the Surrey Gardens Music Hall, and at age twenty-two Spurgeon was perhaps the most popular preacher of his day.

In 1861 the Metropolitan Tabernacle at Elephant and Castle Streets was built, a church that would seat six thousand people. The building was completely paid for when the congregation occupied the site, and Spurgeon ministered there continually until his death. The tabernacle became a center for the religious life of the area, housing a pastor's college and a colportage society that emphasized the distribution of religious literature. The congregation grew yearly, and it has been estimated that fourteen thousand members were added during Spurgeon's ministry.

Spurgeon was married to Susannah Thompson in 1856, and they had two sons, Charles and Thomas. A liberal in politics, he supported the Liberal-Unionist party and their opposition to home rule in Ireland. He refused the title of "reverend" as a matter of principle, and he refused to be ordained. He lived well, but was generous to those in need, and was responsible for founding an orphanage in 1867. He died at Mentone in France after a lengthy illness.

Spurgeon was a product of his Calvinist upbringing, and the Metropolitan Tabernacle was the center of Nonconformist activity during the 1870s and 1880s. He took pride in the fact that his Calvinist theology did not change during his years of ministry, and he claimed roots from Paul, Augustine, Calvin, and John Knox. One of his many biographers described him as an heir of the Puritans.

He was involved in doctrinal controversies on at least two occasions. In 1864 he preached a sermon against infant baptism and offended a large group of Evangelicals who had been his supporters. A pamphlet war ensued and subsequently Spurgeon withdrew from the Evangelical Alliance, a group supported by the low-church party of the Anglican Church. On October 26, 1887, he withdrew from the Baptist Union, pointing to what he considered to be doctrinal aberrations. He was particularly concerned about the development in modern biblical criticism and the lack of stress on the deity of Christ. This so-called downgrade controversy came near the close of his ministry and led to a great deal of pamphlet writing, a host of news articles, and the writing of a great many letters.

A prolific writer, he published some 2,241 of his weekly sermons during his lifetime, and some 3,800 in all were published. From 1865 on he edited a monthly magazine entitled Sword and the Trowel. His primary emphasis was always evangelism. Often criticized for not having received formal college training, his sermons revealed that he did a great deal of reading, and his personal library contained more than ten thousand volumes.

J. E. JOHNSON

Bibliography. J. C. Carlile, C. H. Spurgeon, An Interpretative Biography; I. H. Murray, Forgotten Spurgeon; G. H. Pike, Life and Work of Charles Haddon Spurgeon; W. Smith, Best of C. H. Spurgeon; C. H. Spurgeon's Autobiography; H. Thielicke, ed., Encounter with Spurgeon.

State. See GOVERNMENT.

States of Jesus Christ. The different relationships Jesus Christ had to God's law for mankind, to the possession of authority, and to receiving honor for himself. Generally two states (humiliation and exaltation) are distinguished. Thus, the doctrine of the twofold state of Christ is the teaching that Christ experienced first the state of humiliation, then the state of exaltation. Within each of these states four aspects may be distinguished.

The Humiliation of Christ. The four aspects of Christ's humiliation are (1) incarnation, (2) suffering, (3) death, and (4) burial. Sometimes a fifth aspect (descent into hell) is included.

Incarnation. The incarnation, or Christ's taking to himself a human nature, was itself a step of humiliation. He gave up the honor and glory that belonged to him in heaven (John 17:5). He also gave up his right to exercise divine authority for his own benefit and the right to enjoy his lordship over all things in heaven and on earth (2 Cor. 8:9; Phil. 2:6–7; Heb. 2:9). Thus he gave up the status of ruler and took on the status of a servant. Furthermore, he subjected himself to the demands of living under the law (Gal. 4:4), thus making it necessary for him to obey perfectly the OT laws that God had commanded of his people (Matt. 3:15; John 8:46). He took on himself the obligation to obey God perfectly as a man, as our representative, in order to earn salvation for us through a record of perfect lifelong obedience (Rom. 5:18–19). This he had to do in the strength of his human nature, without miraculous assistance from his divine powers (cf. Matt. 4:3–4).

It was a true human nature that the Son of God took to himself. It was not merely a human body, but also a human mind (which learned as we learn, Luke 2:52), and a human soul (which could be troubled as we are troubled, John 12:27; 13:21). Thus, Jesus was fully man, made like us "in every way" (Heb. 2:17). He had to be fully man in order to become the sacrifice who was offered for man's sins: if he was not fully man, we could not have been saved. Nevertheless, the human nature of Christ was not subject to sin (Rom. 8:3; Heb. 4:15; 1 John 3:5). Thus, his human nature was like Adam's human nature before the fall.

Yet Jesus did not give up any of his divine attributes or become less fully God when he took on a human nature. He remained fully God (John 1:2, 14; Col. 1:19; 2:9), omnipotent (Isa. 9:6; Matt. 8:26–27), omniscient (John 2:25; 6:64; 16:30; 21:17), eternal (8:58), and incapable of being conquered by death (2:19; 10:17–18). However, these attributes were veiled, not generally manifested during Jesus' earthly ministry (Matt. 13:55–56), and never used for his own benefit or to make the path of obedience easier for him (4:1–11).

Thus, Jesus remained fully God and became fully man as well. It is sometimes said that "while remaining what he was, he became what he was not." (It should be remembered that it is God's Son, the second person of the Trinity, who became man. God the Father did not become man, nor did the Holy Spirit: Matt. 3:16–17; John 1:1; 3:16; Gal. 4:4). It is the most amazing fact in all history that one who was eternal and infinite God should take to himself the lowly nature of a man and should then continue to exist for all eternity as fully God and fully man as well, united in one person.

It is important to insist that even while existing in these two natures, Jesus Christ remained one person. His human nature was not an independent person by itself (capable, e.g., of talking to the divine nature or acting in opposition to it). In a manner that surpasses our understanding, the human and divine natures of Christ were integrated into one person, and he remains as both God and man, and yet one person, forever.

Suffering. Jesus' sufferings lasted throughout his whole life, though they culminated in his trial and death on the cross. He experienced the ordinary sufferings of living in a fallen world. He was weary (John 4:6), thirsty (19:28), hungry (Matt. 4:2), sorrowful (John 11:35), and lonely (Matt. 26:56). He felt great grief at human sin and its terrible effects (Matt. 23:37; Mark 3:5; 8:12; John 11:33–35, 38). He endured human opposition and intense hatred against himself (Luke 11:53–54; John 15:18, 24–25). He was "a man of sorrows, and familiar with suffering" (Isa. 53:3).

Moreover, he "learned obedience from what he suffered" (Heb. 5:8); that is, his moral strength and ability to resist temptation increased with the successful meeting of each more difficult temptation, especially those connected with hardship and suffering. He experienced the sufferings of enduring great temptations without yielding (Matt. 4:1–11; Luke 11:53–54; 22:28; Heb. 2:18; 4:15; 1 Pet. 2:21–23), especially in the Garden of Gethsemane just prior to his death (Matt. 26:37–38; Heb. 5:7; 12:3–4). Here it must be remembered that one who does not yield to temptation most fully feels its force, just as someone who successfully holds a heavy weight overhead feels its force much more than someone who drops it at once.

States of Jesus Christ

Jesus' humiliation increased in intensity at the time of his trial and death. Physical sufferings connected with crucifixion were terrible, as were the mocking and shame connected with such a death, but even worse were the sufferings in spirit that Jesus experienced when God the Father put on him the guilt of our sins (Isa. 53:6; 2 Cor. 5:21; Gal. 3:13; 1 Pet. 2:22). The Father turned away his face, so that Jesus was left alone with the blackness of sin and guilt upon him (Hab. 1:13; Matt. 27:46). Then, as Jesus fulfilled the role of propitiatory sacrifice (Rom. 3:25; 1 John 2:2; 4:10), he bore the fury of the intense wrath of God against sin, and bore it to the end.

Death. Since the penalty for sin was death (Gen. 2:17; Rom. 6:23), it was necessary that Jesus himself die to bear our penalty. His death was similar to ours, and is the pattern for us. Jesus' physical body died (Matt. 27:50), and his human spirit (or soul) was separated from his body and passed into the presence of the Father in heaven (Luke 23:43, 46). Thus, he experienced a death that is like the one we as believers will experience if we die in this present age. The knowledge that Jesus has gone through death before us should remove from us the fear of death (1 Cor. 15:55–57; Heb. 2:14–15).

It is not correct to say that Jesus' divine nature died, or could die, if "die" implies a cessation of activity, a cessation of consciousness, or a diminution of power (John 2:19; 10:17–18). Yet by virtue of union with Jesus' human nature, his divine nature experienced what it was like to go through death. Whether the divine nature was ever itself the object of divine wrath against sin is not explicitly stated in Scripture. (For the idea that Jesus "descended into hell" after his death on the cross, see below.)

Burial. Jesus' body was laid in a tomb (Matt. 27:59–60), and he continued in the state of death for a time. Thus, Jesus' humiliation was complete in that he suffered all the punishment and shame due to fallen mankind as a result of sin.

"Descent into Hell." It does not seem correct to say that Jesus descended into hell, at least not according to any sense in which that phrase can be understood today, apart from specialized meanings which may be assigned to the word "hell." He did not experience further conscious suffering after he died on the cross, for he cried, "It is finished" (John 19:30). The statement from Psalm 16:10, "You will not abandon me to the grave," quoted of Christ in the NT (Acts 2:27; cf. 13:35) is best understood to mean that God did not abandon him in the grave or in the state of death, for the Hebrew word šə'ôl can certainly have those meanings.

Nor did Christ proclaim a second chance for salvation for those who were dead. First Peter 4:6, "this is the reason the gospel was preached even to those who are now dead," is best understood to mean that the gospel was preached to believers who had died before the time Peter was writing, and that the reason it was preached to them during their lifetime was not to save them from physical death, but to save them from final judgment.

It is also unlikely that any NT text can be understood to teach that Jesus after his death and before his resurrection went to proclaim his triumph to rebellious spirits in prison (a common Lutheran view) or to bring OT believers into the presence of God in heaven (a Roman Catholic view). In Ephesians 4:9, where Paul literally says that Christ descended into "the lower parts of the earth," it is best understood as a genitive of apposition, meaning "the lower parts, namely, the earth" (compare NIV: "the lower, earthly regions"). Thus, the text refers to the incarnation. First Peter 3:18–20, admittedly a difficult text, says that Christ "went and preached to the spirits in prison who disobeyed long ago when God waited patiently in the days of Noah while the ark was being built." When it is realized that Peter saw the spirit of Christ as active in the OT prophets (1 Pet. 1:10–11), and saw Noah as a "preacher of righteousness" (2 Pet. 2:5), this text is probably best understood to mean that Christ in spirit was preaching through Noah while the ark was being built. Thus, no "descent into hell" is contemplated here either.

In the Apostles' Creed, the phrase "descended into hell" is a late addition, appearing only around A.D. 390, and probably originally having the meaning, "descended into the grave."

The Exaltation of Christ. The four aspects of Christ's exaltation are (1) resurrection, (2), ascension, (3) session, and (4) return in glory.

Resurrection. The resurrection was the transition point into Jesus' state of exaltation. It was the person of Christ that was exalted, not just his human nature, but the focus of this activity of exaltation was the change in his human nature to a new, much more glorious state.

The resurrection was not just a restoration to life, but the beginning of a new, better kind of life, a "resurrection life" (Rom. 6:9–10). After the resurrection, Jesus still had a physical body that could be touched and held (Matt. 28:9; John 20:17, 27), could break bread (Luke 24:30), prepare breakfast (John 21:12–13), and eat (Luke 24:42–43). It was a body of "flesh and bones," for Jesus said, "A spirit has not flesh and bones as you see that I have" (v. 39).

Yet this physical body of Jesus was no longer subject to weakness, sickness, aging, or death. It was imperishable and glorious and powerful (1 Cor. 15:42–44; the term "spiritual" here means not "nonmaterial" but "conformed to the character of the Holy Spirit"). It is possible that John 20:19 implies that Jesus had the ability to enter a locked room miraculously. It is clear, however, that since Jesus was the “firstfruits” of the resurrection, we will be like him when we are raised from the dead (1 Cor. 15:20, 23, 49; Phil. 3:21; 1 John 3:2).

The resurrection demonstrated the approval of God the Father and his satisfaction with Christ’s work of redemption (Isa. 53:11; Phil. 2:8–9). Now Christ was exalted to a new status with respect to the law as well: he was no longer under the law in the sense of being obligated to obey the OT law as our representative, for his work of obedience in our place was complete (Rom. 5:18–19).

The resurrection also was the initiation of a new relationship with God the Father, for Jesus was exalted to the role of messianic “Son” with new power and authority which were not his before as God-man (Matt. 28:18; Acts 13:33; Rom. 1:4; Heb. 1:5).

Ascension. Forty days after his resurrection (Acts 1:3), Jesus ascended to heaven and entered more fully into the privileges of his state of exaltation. The NT clearly presents Jesus’ ascension as a bodily ascension and therefore as ascension to a place (Luke 24:51; John 14:1–3; 16:28; 17:11; Acts 1:9–11), though it is a place ordinarily hidden from our physical eyes (Acts 7:55–56; cf. 2 Kings 6:17). Thus, Jesus retained his human nature when he returned to heaven and will retain it forever (cf. Heb. 13:8). However, Jesus’ human nature is now worthy of worship by all creation, unlike our human nature.

When Jesus ascended into heaven he received glory, honor, and authority which were not his before as God-man (Acts 2:33, 36; Phil. 2:9–11; 1 Tim. 3:16; Heb. 1:3–4; 2:9), especially the authority to pour out the Holy Spirit on the church in greater fullness and power than before (Acts 1:8; 2:33).

After Jesus ascended into heaven he also began his high priestly work of representing us before God the Father (Heb. 9:24) and of interceding for us before God (7:25; Rom. 8:34). (Lutherans have also taught that Jesus’ human nature became omnipresent upon his ascension to heaven, but this teaching does not receive clear support from Scripture and appears largely to be affirmed in order to support a particular view of the presence of Christ’s body in the Lord’s Supper.)

Sitting (Session) at the Father’s Right Hand. A further stage in the exaltation of Christ was his sitting down at the right hand of the Father in heaven (Acts 2:33; Eph. 1:20–22; Heb. 1:3). This action shows both the completion of Christ’s work of redemption and his reception of new authority as God-man to reign over the universe. Christians presently share in this session of Jesus at God’s right hand (Eph. 2:6) largely in terms of sharing in spiritual authority over demonic forces (6:10–18; 2 Cor. 10:3–4) and power to gain increasing victory over sin (Rom. 6:11–14).

In this exalted state at God’s right hand, Christ will reign until the end of the age, when all his enemies will be conquered (1 Cor. 15:24–25).

Return in Glory. When Jesus Christ returns to the earth in glory, his exaltation will be complete, and he will receive all the glory that is due to him as the God-man who has purchased our redemption and is worthy of eternal and infinite honor. Whether this future culmination of Christ’s exaltation occurs in only one stage (as amillennialists hold) or two stages separated by a millennium (as post- and premillennialists hold), all agree that Jesus Christ will some day return to the earth to reign in triumph (Acts 1:11; Rev. 1:7), publicly and finally to defeat all his enemies (2 Thess. 1:7–8; Rev. 19:11–21), and to sit as judge of all the earth (Matt. 25:31–46; Rev. 22:12). Then his kingdom will be established forever, and, exalted with the Father and the Holy Spirit, “he will reign for ever and ever” (Rev. 11:15; 22:3–5).

W. A. GRUDEM

See also ASCENSION OF CHRIST; DESCENT INTO HELL (HADES); JESUS CHRIST; OFFICES OF CHRIST; RESURRECTION OF CHRIST; SECOND COMING OF CHRIST.

Bibliography. L. Berkhof, Systematic Theology; C. Hodge, Systematic Theology; E. A. Litton, Introduction to Dogmatic Theology.

Stealing. See CRIMINAL LAW AND PUNISHMENT IN BIBLE TIMES.

Steiner, Rudolf (1861–1925). See ANTHROPOLOGY.

Stewardship (Gr. oikonomia, “management of a household”). Administration of duties or goods in one’s care. The person who administers the household is called a steward (oikonomos, “law of the house”) or an overseer (epitropos). The idea has its roots in the institution of slavery. The master appointed a slave to administer his household, which might include the teaching and discipling of the members of the house, especially other slaves and the children. A classic example is the position of Joseph in Potiphar’s house (Gen. 39:4–6). The ordinary idea of stewardship is found in several passages in the NT, notably the story of the unjust steward (Luke 16:1–8; cf. Matt. 20:8; Luke 12:42). The guardian of a minor child could also be called a steward (Gal. 4:3). This is a most common use in the papyri. A public official could be called a steward (oikonomos, Rom. 16:23) or an overseer (epitropos, Luke 8:3).

The idea that man is a steward of God in his relation to the world and his own life is inherent in the creation story (Gen. 1–3), in which he is appointed lord of all things except God himself.

Stewardship

In the NT, the word, when not used in its ordinary sense, refers to the administration of the gifts of God, especially preaching the gospel. By metonymy, stewardship may refer to God's provision for the Christian age (Eph. 1:10; 3:9), the context implying that this plan includes the entrustment of the gospel message to man. This idea is explicit in 1 Corinthians 4:1–2; 9:17; Ephesians 3:2; Colossians 1:25; Titus 1:7. Stewardship is broadened to include all Christians and all the gracious gifts of God in 1 Peter 4:10. An unusual use of the word is found in 1 Timothy 1:4, where it seems to refer to the discipline and training of the Christian in the realm of faith. The requirement of stewards of God, as well as of stewards of men, is faithfulness, i.e., administration of trust according to directions.

The modern emphasis on the stewardship of possessions, while true, may tend to obscure the fact that the Christian's primary stewardship is that of the gospel and includes the use of his whole life as well as his money.

F. L. FISHER

Bibliography. P. DeVos et al., Earthkeeping: Christian Stewardship of Natural Resources; G. Getz, Real Prosperity; J. Goetzmann, NIDNTT 2:247–56; D. Hull, Steward: A Biblical Symbol Come of Age; J. H. P. Reumann, "Oikonomia—Terms in Paul in Comparison with Lucan Heilsgeschichte," NTS 13:147–67; Stewardship and the Economy of God; E. F. Roop, Let the Rivers Run; M. L. Stackhouse, Public Theology and Political Economy.

Stoddard, Solomon (1643–1729). One of the most influential leaders in American Protestantism from the settlement of Massachusetts (1630) to the colonial Great Awakening (ca. 1740). From his pulpit in Northampton, Massachusetts, where he served from 1672 to 1729, Stoddard's ideas exerted a powerful influence, not only in the Connecticut River valley, but in Boston and in New England as a whole.

"Pope" Stoddard, as his opponents called him, was best known for his innovations in church discipline. By his day many New England Congregational churches had adopted the Halfway Covenant. This allowed baptized members who had not made a personal profession of faith to bring their infants for baptism even as it kept all except those who could personally confess their faith from participating in the Lord's Supper. Stoddard proposed that all who lived outwardly decent lives should be allowed to take Communion. At the same time he also urged the churches of Massachusetts to develop a "connectional" or "Presbyterian" plan of oversight in order to ensure the orthodoxy of local churches and ministers. These different aspects of Stoddard's thought have led some historians to praise him for his democratic principles (in opening up the Lord's Supper) and others to condemn him as autocratic (for proposing tighter outside control of local churches).

In fact, Stoddard was most interested in revivals and the conversion of the lost. He regarded the Lord's Supper distributed at an open Communion as a converting ordinance. He claimed that participation in Communion was an excellent way for people to "learn the necessity and sufficiency of the Death of Christ in order to [find] Pardon." Likewise, Stoddard intended tighter control over the churches to preserve the purity of the gospel. For his labors, Stoddard experienced five "harvests" of souls in Northampton. In general, however, those who followed his teachings on church discipline were not as eager as he was to promote evangelism. Stoddard's concern for revival was shared by his grandson, Jonathan Edwards, who became his associate minister in 1724 and his successor in 1729. Edwards did eventually repudiate his grandfather's ideas on church membership, for which he lost the pulpit in Northampton. But his efforts in the 1730s and 1740s to promote the revival that came to be known as the Great Awakening would have earned Stoddard's warm commendation.

M. A. NOLL

Bibliography. P. R. Lucas, Valley of Discord: Church and Society along the Connecticut River, 1636–1725; P. Miller, "Solomon Stoddard, 1643–1729," HTR 34:277–320; T. Schafer, "Solomon Stoddard and the Theology of Revival," in Miscellany of American Christianity, S. C. Henry, ed.; H. S. Stout, New England Soul.

Stoics, Stoicism. Stoicism was a major school of Hellenistic thought. The Stoics derived their name from the Painted Porch (stoa) in Athens where their founder taught. Though the school, begun by Zeno of Citium (335–263 B.C.), continued to maintain its headquarters in Athens throughout the more than half a millennium of its existence, its major thinkers and practitioners were not drawn from the Greek mainland. After Zeno's death, Cleanthes of Assos (331–232) assumed leadership of the school, but he seems to have done little more than pass on the teachings of his master. The real systematizer of the Early Stoa was the school's next head, Chrysippus of Soli (ca. 280–207), who also expanded Zeno's thought.

The Middle Stoa, which continued the Stoic mainstream during the last two centuries before Christ, introduced some Platonic elements, but its most far-reaching contribution was made by Panaetius of Rhodes (ca. 185–110 B.C.), who extended the teachings so they could be appropriated by those in public life, not just philosophers. Hence the Late Stoa of the two centuries after Christ could become predominantly Roman and could concentrate almost entirely on ethics. From this period Seneca (ca. 4 B.C.–A.D. 65), Epictetus (ca. 55–ca. 135) and Marcus Aurelius (A.D. 121–80) stand out. After Marcus Aurelius, Stoicism as a distinct school gradually declined into extinction, but some of its features continued to be assimilated into the predominantly Platonic philosophies of both pagans and Christians.

The tripartite division of Stoic thought into logic, physics, and ethics is said to derive from Zeno himself. Logic was the framework that supported the other two branches, and its principles of deduction have only recently regained appreciation, having long been overshadowed by those of Aristotle. Stoic physics, which included theology, has been variously described as either monism or pantheism. God is totally immanent in the world, and this leads to a strong belief in providence (pronoia). Fate (heimarmenē) also plays a key role and underlies the belief in the cyclical character of the natural order, in which each cycle is identical to all the others. Stoic ethics gained its chief prominence during the Late Stoa, both in theoretical developments and in practice. Man becomes virtuous through knowledge, which enables him to live in harmony with nature and thereby achieve a profound sense of happiness (eudaimonia) and freedom from emotion (apatheia), which insulates him from the vicissitudes of life.

Stoic influence on Jewish writers is seen principally in Philo, who, like other middle-Platonists, borrowed both Stoic terminology and concepts. Of principal interest in the NT is Paul's sensitivity to his Stoic auditors' belief in divine immanence, as he in his Areopagus speech quoted from Zeno's friend Aratus to support the doctrine (Acts 17:28).

While some Stoic influence on later Christian theologians is detectable, it is Christian middle-Platonists of the second century like Justin and Clement of Alexandria and Western theologians like Minucius Felix and Tertullian who exhibit the greatest debt to the Stoa. In some of their writings the doctrines of providence and natural law are to be found in Stoic-like formulations. Christians also probably derived some of the terminology in their Logos theology from the Stoics but appear to have used it in their own middle-Platonic manner. Christians also found the Stoic view of a unified world compatible with their own, but it is in the area of ethics that the strongest affinities are found. Galen, the second-century physician-philosopher, provided ample testimony to this when he classed Christians with philosophers on the basis of their ethics, in spite of the fact that they could not follow a demonstrative argument. Christians, however, differed with Stoics on suicide and found certain other Stoic teachings objectionable, including their materialism, fatalism, doctrine of endless world cycles, and belief in total divine immanence.

G. T. BURKE

Bibliography. H. Chadwick, Early Christian Thought and the Classical Tradition; F. J. Copleston, History of Philosophy; L. Edelstein, Meaning of Stoicism; R. H. Epp, Recovering the Stoics; P. P. Hallie, Encyclopedia of Philosophy; B. Inwood, Ethics and Human Action in Early Stoicism; W. J. Oates, ed., Stoic and Epicurean Philosophers; R. M. Rist, Stoic Philosophy; F. H. Sandbach, Stoics; J. N. Svanter, Paul and Seneca; H. E. W. Turner, Pattern of Christian Truth; K. von Fritz, Oxford Classical Dictionary; R. M. Wenley, Stoicism and Its Influence.

Storch, Nicholas. See ZWICKAU PROPHETS.

Stott, John R. W. (b. 1921). Anglican clergyman, author of numerous theological, exegetical, and missiological texts and biblical commentaries, regarded as one of the most influential evangelicals of this century. During his career of more than fifty years at All Souls, Langham Place, London, Stott has served as both a local pastor and a worldwide statesman of evangelical unity and mission.

Stott has been instrumental in reforming the role of evangelicals within the Anglican communion, as well as in evangelicalism's engagement with, rather than separation from, theological liberalism (illustrated in his exchange with liberal David Edwards in Evangelical Essentials). But his stand against separating from the theological liberal churches, criticism of the charismatic movement, and tentative views regarding annihilation and the fate of those who die outside of Christ have strained broader evangelicalism's opinions of Stott's theology.

Two principle themes of Stott's ministry are the centrality of Christ's cross and the gospel's confrontation of culture. Stott's Cross of Christ maintained the commitment to a substitutionary model of the atonement as central to evangelical faith. His Christ the Controversialist argued that Christianity should be defined evangelically through Jesus' confrontations with his religious culture.

Stott was principle framer of the Lausanne Covenant (from the 1974 International Conference on World Evangelization in Lausanne, Switzerland), which emphasized the responsibility of evangelical witness to the whole human person (social as well as spiritual). The Covenant combined evangelical theology, worldwide evangelism, and social responsibility, grounding their interrelationship in the nature of God as revealed in Jesus Christ.

His ministry is distinguished by his emphasis on evangelism, which is addressed in his most widely read work, Basic Christianity. Stott's emphasis on the cruciality of preaching is evident in Between Two Worlds, where he argues that preaching is indispensable to Christianity. Stott's Christian Mission in the Modern World called evangelicals to consider the relationship of Christian witness and social responsibility: evangelism is a major instrument of social reform and in turn is meant to produce socially responsible Christians.

J. P. CALLAHAN

Bibliography. J. Stott, Baptism and Fullness; Basic Christianity; Between Two Worlds: The Art of Preaching in the Twentieth Century; Christ the Controversialist: A Study in Some Essentials of Evangelical Religion; Cross of Christ; Epistles of John; Fundamentalism and Evangelism; Lausanne Covenant: An Exposition and Commentary; Our Guilty Silence: The Church, the Gospel and the World; What Christ Thinks of the Church; J. Stott and D. L. Edwards, Evangelical Essentials: A Liberal-Evangelical Dialog; M. Eden and D. F. Wells, Gospel in the Modern World: A Tribute to John Stott.

Strauss, David Friedrich (1808–1874). German theologian. Born in Ludwigsburg near Stuttgart, he studied under F. C. Bauer at Tübingen and spent a brief time in Berlin, where he became an enthusiast for Hegelian speculative philosophy. In 1832–35 he served as a tutor at the Tübingen Stift (seminary), but the controversy over his Life of Jesus resulted in his dismissal. He obtained an appointment at the University of Zurich in 1839, which was blocked by clerical opposition, and he spent the remainder of his life as a free-lance writer.

Strauss's most influential work was the Life of Jesus, Critically Examined (2 vols. 1835–36). Refusing to accept either the historical accuracy of miracle accounts in the Gospels or that the narratives were pure fabrications, he introduced the idea of "myth," a concept from Hegel's philosophy of religion, and applied it to the supernatural elements. The Gospel accounts of the life of Jesus had been embellished by the pious reflections of his followers so as to make it repeat and fulfill the legends and predictions of the OT. These "myths," although historically inaccurate, were in harmony with their religious feelings and ideas. They were not falsehoods, as such, but truths about Jesus indirectly stated. In a Hegelian sense they expressed the awareness of the writers that Jesus as the founder of Christianity had discovered that God and man are one. Thus the true God-man is not an individual but humanity as a whole. Jesus must be understood symbolically as the realization of the Absolute Idea or Spirit in the human race. Man is the union of the finite and infinite, of spirit and nature, and mankind is destined for perfection in its onward and upward march, symbolized in the NT in terms of death, resurrection, and ascension.

A heated debate over the book followed, and Strauss essentially repudiated any commitment to theism in its sequel Die christliche Glaubenslehre (1840–41), which maintained that biblical teaching could not be harmonized with modern knowledge. For the next twenty years he turned from theology, dabbled briefly in politics, and published a number of biographies, the best known being Ulrich von Hutten (1861). He issued a new version of the Life of Jesus in 1864 in which he backed away from some of the more extreme Hegelianism of the 1835 work and called for the restoration of the picture of the historical Jesus in his simple, human features as much as possible. However, neither it nor his attack on Schleiermacher (1865) bridged the chasm between the Jesus of history and the Christ of faith. In his last work, Old and the New Faith (1872), Strauss set forth a Darwinian theory of faith in natural science which rejected religious belief in a personal God and immortality, insisting that all that remains is the feeling of absolute dependence on the universe.

R. V. PIERARD

See also HEGEL, GEORG WILHELM FRIEDRICH; TÜBINGEN SCHOOL.

Bibliography. W. Baird, History of New Testament Research: From Deism to Tübingen; K. Barth, Protestant Thought from Rousseau to Ritschl; C. Brown, NIDCC 934; O. Chadwick, Secularization of the European Mind in the Nineteenth Century; H. Harris, David Friedrich Strauss and His Theology; Tübingen School; R. Harrisville and W. Sundberg, Bible in Modern Culture; L. E. Keck, ed., Christ of Faith and the Jesus of History; A. Schweitzer, Quest of the Historical Jesus; N. Smart et al., eds., Nineteenth Century Religion Thought in the West.

Strong, Augustus Hopkins (1836–1921). Theologian, educator, and author. Strong was born at Rochester, New York. His father, a devout layman, was the publisher of the Rochester Democrat. Early in life the son learned from his father the value of consistent church attendance but was not converted until after he had entered college. Graduating from Yale in 1857 and Rochester Theological Seminary in 1859, he spent a year at the University of Berlin.

On his twenty-fifth birthday he was ordained to the gospel ministry, having been called to the pastorate of the First Baptist Church of Haverhill, Massachusetts, which he served from 1861 to 1865. From 1865 to 1872 he was pastor of the First Baptist Church of Cleveland, Ohio, which numbered John D. Rockefeller among its members. In 1872 Strong was elected president of the Rochester Theological Seminary and professor of theology. In these dual roles he served for forty years, retiring in 1912 as president emeritus. He embarked on a world tour in 1916–17, which resulted in a book, Tour of Missions, Observations, and Conclusions.

Strong's great influence was due to his personal contact with students and prominent laymen and to his writings. Apparently he was the catalyst that moved Rockefeller to found the University of Chicago. Through the various editions of his books, Systematic Theology (1886, 1907–46), Philosophy and Religion (1888), Christ in Creation and Ethical Monism (1899), and What Shall I Believe? (1922), one can trace the development of Strong's theology. By 1894, according to C. F. H. Henry, Strong abandoned federal theology for what he termed ethical monism. It is also referred to as qualitative monism, metaphysical monism, and personalistic idealism. In his theology, which was a synthesis of historic Christian faith with personal idealism, Strong was attempting to undergird a biblical theology with a modified form of Platonism. The center of his system was Christ. "The person of Christ was the clue I had followed; his deity and atonement were the two foci of the great ellipse." He considered his most original contribution to theology his explanation of the imputation of the sins of the race to Christ. "The atonement then is not only possible but necessary, because Christ is from the beginning the life of humanity." Strong also rejected all forms of determinism. "The author has come progressively to the conviction that a monism which makes room for the transcendence of God and the separate personality of man—a monism which recognizes the great ethical facts of freedom, responsibility, sin, and guilt—affirms the only key to the great problems of philosophy and theology." Strong was apparently indebted to Ezekiel Robinson, Herman Lotze, and Borden P. Bowne, among others, for some aspects of his theology. In turn, two Southern Baptist theologians, E. Y. Mullins and W. T. Conner, reflect a reliance upon Strong. Therefore, it is not without reason that Strong has been ranked among the foremost Baptist theologians of his day.

W. R. ESTEP JR.

Bibliography. C. Douglas, ed., Autobiography of A. H. Strong; C. F. H. Henry, Personal Idealism and Strong's Theology; S. R. Pointer, HET 1–11; G. Wacker, Augustus H. Strong and the Dilemma of Historical Consciousness.

Stübner, Markus. See ZWICKAU PROPHETS.

Subdiaconate. An order of ministry found in the church from the third century. In the hierarchy of ordained clergy the subdeacon followed the bishop, priest, and deacon. His duty was primarily liturgical, especially at High Mass, when he chanted the epistle reading, presented the bread (paten) and wine (chalice) to the presiding priest, and cleaned the holy vessels afterward.

The churches of the Reformation in the sixteenth century abolished this order, but it was retained by the Roman Church until 1972, when it went as part of the reforms following the Second Vatican Council. It is still found, however, in the Orthodox and Eastern churches, where it functions within the liturgy. Sometimes the word is used today to describe the role of laity who assist in the Eucharist, but this usage is nontechnical.

P. TOON

See also CHURCH OFFICERS; MAJOR ORDERS.

Sublapsarianism. See INFRALAPSARIANISM.

Subordinationism. A doctrine that assigns an inferiority of being, status, or role to the Son or Holy Spirit within the Trinity. Condemned by numerous church councils, this doctrine has continued in one form or another throughout the history of the church. In the early centuries, the struggle to understand the human and divine natures of Christ often led to placing the Son in a secondary position to the Father. Justin Martyr, Origen, and Tertullian all evidence a certain amount of subordinationism in their writings. This incipient subordinationism, especially that of Origen, eventually led to Arianism and other systems such as Sabellianism, monarchianism, and Macedonianism. Arius, who would allow no intermediary being between the supremacy of the One God and his creatures, denied the full deity of Christ. From this it followed that Christ the Word was less than God incarnate and was instead a subordinate image of the Father. In subordinationism lay the roots from which modern unitarianism and related theologies were to spring.

The Nicene fathers ascribed to the Son and Spirit an equality of being or essence, but a subordination of order, with both deriving their existence from the Father as primal source. Athanasius insisted upon the coequality of the status of the three Persons of the Trinity, and Augustine that these Persons are coequal and coeternal. Ancient and modern theologians have argued for a subordination in the role of Son and Spirit to the Father and cite in support such passages as Matthew 11:27; John 5:26–27; 6:38; 8:28; 14:28. Some apply a doctrine of subordination of woman to man on the basis of a similar relationship within the Trinity (1 Cor. 11:3). Others argue that passages that seem to teach a subordination of Son to the Father speak of Christ's voluntary humiliation when he assumed human form (Phil. 2:5–8). In his exaltation, however, he returned to the equality of the eternal relationship expressed in such passages as John 1:2; 5:17–23; 10:15, 30; Romans 9:5; Titus 2:13; 1 John 5:7. The Athanasian Creed declared that in the Trinity "none is before or after another: none is greater or less than another," and the second Helvetic Confession, the second most influential confession in Reformed tradition, condemns as heretics any who teach a subordination of Son or Holy Spirit (III, v).

R. C. KROEGER AND C. C. KROEGER

Subordinationism

See also ARIUS, ARIANISM; HEAD, HEADSHIP; MONARCHIANISM; NICEA, COUNCIL OF.

Bibliography. E. H. Bickersteth, Trinity; H. M. Gwatkin, Studies in Arianism; T. C. Hammond, In Understanding Be Men; P. Schaff, History of the Christian Church; W. W. Stevens, Doctrines of the Christian Religion.

Substance (Lat. substantia, Gr. hypostasis, "standing under"). Essential nature, essence. The key Greek word for substance from Aristotle on, which was also rendered in Latin as substantia, is ousia. Although ousia was brought into philosophy by Plato, it has been the Aristotelian criteria for substance that have shaped the Christian development of the concept. In much of modern philosophy, substance is no longer seen as a meaningful category.

The matter of substance played an important role in Christian theology in both the patristic and medieval periods. During the former it was a central issue in the interrelated trinitarian and christological controversies.

In defining the nature of the Godhead, the East generally emphasized its threefold nature, while in the West the stress was on its unified substance. This and translation problems between Greek and Latin made it difficult to realize that an actual consensus was being reached. In Greek, hypostasis and ousia were synonyms, as can be seen in the Creed at Nicaea (325). The Cappadocian fathers found them too ambiguous. Hence, they arrived at a trinitarian formula that distinguished them, as Origen had already done and as John of Damascus would later do: three hypostaseis (individuals), one ousia (substance). In the West, where in the fourth century the formula was expressed as one substantia (substance), three personae (persons), this caused difficulties. Augustine regarded essentia (essence) and substantia (substance), which usually translated ousia and hypostasis respectively, as synonyms, so when the Eastern fathers talked of three hypostaseis, it sounded as if they meant three substances. The difference, however, was merely semantic. The meaning was the same: three persons of the Godhead share a common substance.

Of Aristotle's several definitions of substance, the one rather uniformly followed during the patristic period was substratum. Augustine, however, differed from his predecessors on the precise application to the Godhead. For Tertullian, Basil, and the Creed at Nicaea, for example, the Father was the common substratum of the Son and Holy Spirit. This avoided the problem of having this substance exist separately from the Trinity as a fourth divine entity. Augustine solved this problem by having the substance of the Godhead derived from neither the Father nor an external source, but from the eternal constitution of the Trinity itself.

It was a compound form of ousia around which much of the christological controversy of the fourth century East revolved. The Creed at Nicaea, in opposition to Arian Christology, asserted that Jesus Christ was "of the same substance (homoousios) with the Father." In the ensuing decades, this formula came under increasing attack, because its ambiguity made it susceptible to heretical interpretation and the key word, homoousios, was nonbiblical. Other formulas were suggested, such as that Jesus Christ was "of like substance (homoiousios) with the Father," but by the time of the Council of Constantinople (381), homoousios was firmly fixed in the East, and Arianism was effectively defeated. With Christ's consubstantiality with the Father now established, the Creed at Chalcedon (451) added the final chapter by affirming his complete humanness: He is "of the same substance (homoousios) with us."

Since the patristic period, substance has been an important component in theological discussions of the doctrine of Christ's incarnation, but it has appeared most extensively in connection with the eucharistic doctrine of transubstantiation. Thomas Aquinas has given the doctrine its most extensive theoretical development, beginning from, but not limited to, Aristotle's distinction between substance and accident. According to the doctrine, which received formulation before Aquinas at the Fourth Lateran Council (1215) and after him at the Council of Trent, in the Eucharist the substance of the bread and wine are changed into the substance of the body and blood of Christ. At the level of accidents or species, however, no change takes place, because such accidents as color, shape, taste, and the like remain. Hence, it is only at the level of faith that one can know that this actual change in substance has taken place.

G. T. BURKE

See also HOMOOUSIOS.

Bibliography. J. L. González, History of Christian Thought; E. L. Mascall, Openness of Being; R. E. McCall, NCE 13:766–70; A. Plantinga, Does God Have a Nature?; G. C. Stead, Divine Substance; M. Wiles, "Homoousios Hēmin," JTS n.s. 16:454–61; H. A. Wolfson, Philosophy of the Church Fathers.

Substitutionary Atonement of Christ. See ATONEMENT; PROPITIATION.

Suffering. See EVIL, PROBLEM OF; PAIN.

Suffering Servant. See SERVANT OF THE LORD.

Sufficient Grace. See GRACE.

Suffragan Bishop. See CHURCH OFFICERS; BISHOP.

Sunday. See LORD'S DAY.

Supererogation, Works of. Voluntary works over and above what God commands. Supererogare means "to pay out more than is necessary." In Roman Catholic ecclesiastical matters supererogatio means doing more than God requires. The term goes back to the Vulgate of Luke 10:35 (quodcumque supererogaveris) but was not used in its present technical sense until the Middle Ages. The conception is based upon a distinction between works which are necessary and those which are voluntary. In doing the latter (such as accepting vows of poverty, celibacy, and obedience), we can do more than God requires. Such works of supererogation are meritorious and can avail for the benefit of others, hence the so-called treasury of merit and the possibility of indulgences.

R. J. COATES

Superintendent. See CHURCH OFFICERS.

Supper, Lord's. See LORD'S SUPPER.

Supplication. See PRAYER.

Supralapsarianism. The doctrine that God decreed both election and reprobation before the fall. Supralapsarianism differs from infralapsarianism on the relation of God's decree to human sin. The differences go back to the conflict between Augustine and Pelagius. Before the Reformation, the main difference was whether Adam's fall was included in God's eternal decree; supralapsarians held that it was, but infralapsarians acknowledged only God's foreknowledge of sin. Luther, Zwingli, and Calvin were agreed that Adam's fall was somehow included in God's decree; it came to be referred to as a "permissive decree," and all insisted that God was in no way the author of sin. As a result of the Reformers' agreement, after the Reformation the distinction between infra- and supralapsarianism shifted to differences on the logical order of God's decrees.

Theodore Beza, Calvin's successor at Geneva, was the first to develop supralapsarianism in this new sense. By the time of the Synod of Dort in 1618–19, a heated intraconfessional controversy developed between infra- and supralapsarians; both positions were represented at the synod. Francis Gomarus, the chief opponent of James Arminius, was a supralapsarian.

The question of the logical, not the temporal, order of the eternal decrees reflected differences on God's ultimate goal in predestination and on the specific objects of predestination. Supralapsarians considered God's ultimate goal to be his own glory in election and reprobation, while infralapsarians considered predestination subordinate to other goals. The object of predestination, according to supralapsarians, was uncreated and unfallen humanity, while infralapsarians viewed the object as created and fallen humanity.

The term "supralapsarianism" comes from the Latin words supra and lapsus; the decree of predestination was considered to be "above" (supra) or logically "before" the decree concerning the fall (lapsus), while the infralapsarians viewed it as "below" (infra) or logically "after" the decree concerning the fall. The contrast of the two views is evident from the following summaries. The logical order of the decrees in the supralapsarian scheme is: (1) God's decree to glorify himself through the election of some and the reprobation of others; (2) as a means to that goal, the decree to create those elected and reprobated; (3) the decree to permit the fall; and (4) the decree to provide salvation for the elect through Jesus Christ.

The logical order of the decrees according to infralapsarians is: (1) God's decree to glorify himself through the creation of the human race; (2) the decree to permit the fall; (3) the decree to elect some of the fallen race to salvation and to pass by the others and condemn them for their sin; and (4) the decree to provide salvation for the elect through Jesus Christ. Infralapsarians were in the majority at the Synod of Dort. The Arminians tried to depict all the Calvinists as representatives of the "repulsive" supralapsarian doctrine. Four attempts were made at Dort to condemn the supralapsarian view, but the efforts were unsuccessful. Although the Canons of Dort do not deal with the order of the divine decrees, they are infralapsarian in the sense that the elect are "chosen from the whole human race, which had fallen through their own fault from their primitive state of rectitude into sin and destruction" (I, 7; cf. I, 1). The reprobate "are passed by in the eternal decree" and God "decreed to leave [them] in the common misery into which they have willfully plunged themselves" and "to condemn and punish them forever . . . for all their sins" (I, 15).

Defenders of supralapsarianism continued after Dort. The chairman of the Westminster Assembly, William Twisse, was a supralapsarian, but the Westminster standards do not favor either position. Although supralapsarianism never received confessional endorsement within the Reformed churches, it has been tolerated within the confessional boundaries. In 1905 the Reformed churches of the Netherlands and the Christian Reformed Church in 1908 adopted the Conclusions of Utrecht, which stated that "our Confessional Standards admittedly follow the infralapsarian presentation in respect to the doctrine of election, but that it is evident . . . that this is no wise intended to exclude or condemn the supralapsarian presentation." Recent defenders of the supralapsarian position have been Gerhardus Vos, Herman Hoeksema, and G. H. Kersten.

F. H. KLOOSTER

Supralapsarianism

See also CALVINISM; DECREES OF GOD; ELECT, ELECTION; INFRALAPSARIANISM; PREDESTINATION; REPROBATION; SOVEREIGNTY OF GOD.

Bibliography. L. Berkhof, Systematic Theology; H. Heppe, Reformed Dogmatics; H. Hoeksema, Reformed Dogmatics; G. H. Kersten, Reformed Dogmatics; B. B. Warfield, "Predestination in the Reformed Confessions," in Studies in Theology.

Swedenborg, Emanuel (1688–1772). Swedish scientist and religious teacher. Swedenborg was the son of a devout bishop of the Lutheran Church in Sweden. He studied first at Uppsala and then in England, France, and Holland in pursuit of a scientific career. For much of his adult life he was an assessor of the Royal Board of Mines in his homeland and wrote works on science and philosophy. In his fifties his interest shifted to religion and theology as he claimed to have special communication with angels and spirits. Holding that he had been granted by God a special knowledge in the interpretation of the Bible, he wrote several works unfolding a system of thought that rejects or alters many traditional Christian beliefs.

Swedenborg's theological views include the following:

1. Neoplatonic view of the God-world relationship. Creation out of nothing is rejected; God is the one and only true substance, the ultimate love and wisdom from which all things proceed. Yet the world is not God (pantheism being disavowed); the world derives its being from God by "contiguity," not continuity.

2. Theory of correspondence. Animals and physical things reflect or correspond to moral and spiritual qualities or ideas.

3. Literal and spiritual interpretation of the Bible. Based on the theory of correspondence, every Scripture has a literal meaning and a spiritual meaning. Swedenborg claimed that his special mission was to reveal the true spiritual meaning of Scripture.

4. Monopersonal Trinity. The Godhead consists, not of three persons, but of three essential principles. The Father is the inmost principle, the "ineffable Love" of God, the Son is the divine Wisdom, and the Holy Spirit is the divine Power. All three principles are the same divine person, Jesus Christ himself.

5. Example theory of atonement. Christ's saving work is not a sacrifice to make satisfaction for divine justice, but a triumph over temptation and spiritual evil as the example, and reconciling power, of God by which all people can overcome evil.

6. Freedom of the will in spiritual matters.

7. Salvation by faith plus works. Though God is the ultimate source of all merit and good works, man must choose to cooperate with God's power of love and seek self-reformation and spiritual health through a life of doing good.

8. Choice of all between heaven and hell in the intermediate state.

9. The continuance of true marital love in heaven.

10. The spiritual realization of the Second Advent and Last Judgment in 1757 (from which doctrine the Church of the New Jerusalem was formed).

D. W. DIEHL

Bibliography. S. M. Warren, ed., Compendium of the Theological Writings of Emanuel Swedenborg; J. H. Spalding, Introduction to Swedenborg's Religious Thought; S. Toksvig, Emanuel Swedenborg: Scientist and Mystic; G. Trobridge, Swedenborg, Life and Teaching.

Swete, Henry Barclay (1835–1917). Anglican scholar. Theological professor in London (1882–90) and Cambridge (1890–1915), he published works on the OT and NT, and on Christian doctrine. Though he espoused modern critical methods in biblical studies, he respected those who reached different conclusions from his own. He himself was oddly conservative on occasion: on some of the Johannine discourses, for example, and on miracles. He edited various Greek texts, including the LXX, stimulated his students to undertake serious research, and founded the prestigious Journal of Theological Studies (1899). His work in Holy Spirit in the Ancient Church (1912) was long used as a standard textbook. He was the chief architect of the work known popularly as Cambridge Theological Questions (1905), a symposium written by leading scholars of the day. In it Swete commented on what he saw as the most important work of the twentieth century church: to assimilate new truth without sacrificing the primitive message, and "to state in terms adapted to the needs of a new century the truths which the ancient Church expressed in those which were appropriate for its own times." A sequel, Cambridge Biblical Questions, followed in 1909. In it Swete rejected the suggestion that the spread of knowledge would shake the credit of the Bible in the public estimation.

J. D. DOUGLAS

Swinburne, Richard Granville (b. 1934). Christian philosopher educated at Oxford University in philosophy and theology, and later a research fellow at the Universities of Oxford and Leeds in the history and philosophy of science. He has held university appointments in England at Hull (1963) and Keele (1972). In 1985 he was appointed to the Nolloth Professorship of the philosophy of the Christian religion at Oxford University.

Swinburne is best known for his systematic work in the philosophy of religion and philosophical theology. But his early work, coinciding with his years at the University of Hull, was in the philosophy of science. During this period he published Space and Time (1968; 2nd ed., 1981) and Introduction to Confirmation Theory (1973). Concept of Miracle (1971), his first book in philosophy of religion, dates to this period as well.

It is significant that Swinburne's sophisticated and influential contribution to the philosophy of religion was preceded by rigorous work in the philosophy of science. His approach to natural theology bears the stamp of deep familiarity with confirmation theory and modern cosmology. His trilogy in the philosophy of religion includes Coherence of Theism (1977); Existence of God, based on his Wilde Lectures at Oxford University in 1976–77 (1979; 2nd ed., 1991); and Faith and Reason (1981). These works seek to clarify and defend the thesis that God exists. (Swinburne has also written Is There a God? [1966], a popular text covering much of the same ground as Existence of God.)

His next two books, Evolution of the Soul (1986), and, with Sydney Shoemaker, Personal Identity (1986), challenge the widely accepted materialist conception of human nature. While these works defend a view of the human person that is vital to Christian theology, it is in his subsequent tetralogy that he trains his philosophical acumen on such Christian doctrines as original sin, atonement, punishment and reward, divine revelation, the resurrection, the Incarnation and the Trinity, and divine providence. The four volumes include Responsibility and Atonement (1989); Revelation (1992); Christian God (1994); and Providence and the Problem of Evil (1998), in which Swinburne develops an elaborate Christian theodicy.

Swinburne's work is thoroughly systematic and highly appreciative of the bearing of modern theoretical science on theological issues. It is also optimistic about the possibility of grounding belief in propositional evidence. According to Swinburne, this evidence makes it significantly more probable than not that God exists. Following the pattern of inference to the best explanation, his own program of natural theology appeals especially to the evidence of cosmology and design in the physical universe and the free will and consciousness of human persons to establish that there is some probability that God exists. This cumulative-case argument, however, discounts the value of a moral argument for the existence of God. Relying on the principle of credulity, which states that in the absence of evidence to the contrary one should believe that things are the way they appear, Swinburne argues that religious experience tips the scale of evidence decisively in favor of the existence of God. Within the framework of a carefully articulated and properly supported theism, he considers the production of a divine revelation, accompanied by miracles, to be antecedently likely and independently confirmed by historical evidence, such as the evidence for the resurrection of Jesus Christ. R. D. GEIVETT

Bibliography. R. Swinburne, "Vocation of a Natural Theologian," in Philosophers Who Believe, K. J. Clark, ed.; R. Messer, Does God's Existence Need Proof?; A. Padgett, ed., Reason and the Christian Religion: Essays in Honour of Richard Swinburne.

Synagogue. The Jewish house of assembly, study, and prayer. Its origins are shrouded in mystery. While some have suggested that it dates back to Moses and others have identified the "meeting places" in Psalms 74:8 as synagogues, it has been traditionally traced to the period of the Babylonian exile when the Jewish people were deprived of the temple and assembled together for worship in a strange land. Jewish tradition has maintained that the reference to "little sanctuary" in Ezekiel 11:16 is a direct reference to the synagogues of these exiles and that Ezekiel's repeated allusion to the assembly of the elders (8:1; 14:1; 20:1) also indicates synagogue worship. Ezekiel appears to be answering those who taunted the exiles because they were far away from the Jerusalem temple, and he explains to them that God had provided sanctuaries of worship among the nations. When the exiles returned and rebuilt the temple, it is believed that the synagogue continued as an institution of Palestinian Judaism. The Talmud ascribes to Ezra and his successors, the men of the Great Synagogue, the formulation of the earliest liturgical prayers such as the Amidah.

By the first Christian century the synagogue was a well-established institution, giving every indication of centuries of growth as a center of religious and social life of the Jewish community. Before the destruction of the temple by the Romans in A.D. 70, the synagogue maintained an important functioning relationship with the temple. After the destruction, the synagogue emerged as the central institution. The NT documents both Jesus' use of the synagogue and that of the disciples and early Christians. Missionaries, such as the apostle Paul, made great use of the first-century synagogues as well. The synagogue service, in turn, had a significant impact on Christian worship and church government (cf. the office of "elder").

The reading of both the Law and the Prophets was a central element in the synagogue service. The scrolls of Scripture were kept in a receptacle called an ark, which was generally raised above the floor level and located on the wall facing the Temple Mount. In the center of the synagogue was an elevated platform (bîmâ) upon which stood a reading desk. Worshipers sat on wooden seats surrounding the bîmâ. The Scripture was read from a standing position but explained from a sitting position. Luke 4:16–27 indicates that Jesus followed this pattern.

Synagogue

In addition to the reading and explanation of Scripture during the synagogue service, the basic structure included the recitation of the Shema (“Hear O Israel, the Lord Our God, the Lord is One”) and the Amidah. The Shema included the reading of Deuteronomy 6:4–9, which the rabbis maintained was the acceptance of the yoke of God’s rulership; 11:13–21, which the rabbis maintained was the acceptance of the yoke of commandments; and Numbers 15:37–41, which the rabbis called the exodus from Egypt (because of the last verse). The Amidah was a central silent prayer contemplating God and thanking him for the sabbath and human blessings (such as the opportunity to worship). The synagogue liturgy developed from two talmudic principles that worked side by side, i.e., qeba’ (fixed times and fixed liturgy) and kawwānā (inwardness and spontaneity). Through a synthesis of qeba’ and kawwānā, one generation’s expression of kawwānā became the next generation’s heritage of qeba’.

The earliest remains of a synagogue have been discovered at Shedia near Alexandria, Egypt. A marble slab states that the Jewish community dedicated this synagogue to Ptolemy III Euergetes (246–221 B.C.) and his queen Berenice. One of the popular synagogues found in Israel is that discovered at the ancient site of Capernaum, which dates back to the third Christian century. The oldest remains of a synagogue in Israel are those discovered on the royal citadel of Masada, built by Herod the Great and used by the Zealots against Rome during the Jewish War.

D. A. RAUSCH

Bibliography. C. W. Dugmore, Influence of the Synagogue upon the Divine Office; A. Eisenberg, Synagogue through the Ages; J. Gutmann, Synagogue: Studies in Origins, Archeology and Architecture; R. Hachlili, ABD 6:251–63; L. A. Hoffmann, Canonization of the Synagogue Service; M. Kadushin, Worship and Ethics: A Study in Rabbinic Judaism; L. I. Levine, ed., Ancient Synagogues Revealed; W. O. E. Oesterley and G. H. Box, Religion and Worship of the Synagogue; J. L. Trafton, EDBT 752–54.

Syncretism. The first known use of the term syncretism is in the area of political pragmatism. Plutarch (ca. A.D. 46–120), the Greek biographer and moralist, referred to the banding together of the normally divided peoples of Crete to face a common external enemy as sunkrētismos (Moralia 490b). Much later Erasmus (1466–1536), the Renaissance humanist and scholar, used it to speak positively of the coming together of disparate points of view. George Calixtus (1586–1656) developed a school of thought based on a system of principles known as syncretism in which he attempted to harmonize the sects of the Protestants and ultimately the whole church. From the early 1600s, however, the term in Christian writings has generally referred to the replacement or dilution of the essential truths of the gospel through the incorporation of non-Christian elements. Examples of syncretism in this sense range from the worship of materialism in modern Western churches to the use of spiritualistic power and protection in African churches, from the rituals of the Night of the Dead in Latin America to the continuance of untransformed ancestral practices in Asian Christian households. The fact that syncretism can be found in every culture and epoch where the church had existed serves as a caution against naively thinking that its eradication will be easily accomplished or that our own church will never include syncretistic ideas or practices.

The study of syncretism involves at least three levels. First is the uncovering of the actual practices, phenomena, or idea(s) under consideration. The primary concern is to discover what is actually happening or being taught. On the second level, we seek to understand and interpret the practice, phenomenon, or idea. At this level we seek understanding by asking questions concerning the causes, purposes, and directions of the phenomena being examined. What is the cause? Why is this particular form of syncretism taking place? What function is it serving? What are the signs and symbols of it, and what significance do these carry in the context? What direction is the syncretistic flow going, and what impact on the local expression of the Christian faith may we anticipate coming out of it? The final level of analysis, built on the first two levels, is to determine the appropriateness or inappropriateness of the practice or idea under consideration. The foundation for this analysis is the set of standards by which an evaluation is made, an issue of increasing complexity in the modern world which disparages any normative system, let alone one based on biblical absolutes. If, as we have proposed, syncretism is defined as a replacement or a dilution of essential elements of the gospel, then it must be stopped or reversed, and the method by which this is to be accomplished is almost as important as the accomplishment itself.

Biblical Discussion. Though the term itself is not found anywhere in the Bible, examples of religious syncretism are found in both Old and New Testaments. The theological foundation is found in the first commandment: we are to love God alone and serve him with all that we are (Deut. 5:1–6:5). Expanding on the significance of this, God gave Israel basic guidelines against religious intermingling, including strong warnings against borrowing practices from the Canaanites whose gods would become a snare (Exod. 23:23–33; Deut. 18:10–14). Indeed, the Canaanites were cast out of the land by God because they defiled themselves through their actions (Lev. 18:24–25; 20:23). The Israelites were warned of similar judgment if they followed Canaan's example (Lev. 18:26–30; 20:22). The practices that were condemned were not simple cultural acts (such as trading practices; Gen. 23). Rather, they were defiant acts invested with religious significance because they did not honor God as the Sovereign King of the world.

Sadly, the Israelites did not heed God's warnings. As early as the time of the judges, they "returned to ways even more corrupt than those of their fathers, following other gods and serving and worshiping them" (Judg. 2:19). Things were no different after the establishment of the monarchy, when king after king brought in condemned religious practices. The kings set the pace, and the people all too freely followed them into shrine prostitution (1 Kings 14:24), intermarriage (Ezra 9:1–2), idolatry (Ps. 106:35–39), human sacrifice, and witchcraft (2 Kings 17:16–17). No other statement in the OT so concisely summarizes both the nature of syncretism and Israel's participation in it than that of 2 Kings 17:41: "Even while these people were worshiping the LORD, they were serving their idols." Though their actions were condemned by the prophets (2 Kings 17:7–14; Isa. 2:6; Jer. 25:5; Ezek. 5:11), they still did not listen, and God eventually brought the judgment promised through Moses (Deut. 31:14–21; 2 Kings 17:7–41).

The OT story, however, is not one of complete failure. David, Hezekiah, Josiah, Nehemiah, and Ezra stand out as leaders who closely followed God's law. The prophets continually stood against the prevailing attitude of religious compromise. For example, Elijah confronted the Hebrew followers of Baal on Mount Carmel (1 Kings 18:16–40). Jeremiah condemned idolatrous practices in spite of being repeatedly punished for it (Jer. 19:1–20:6; 26:1–16; 37:1–21; 38:1–13). Daniel ignored the decree prohibiting prayer to anyone but King Darius (Dan. 6). God's deliverance through the ordeal and the demise of Daniel's enemies proved that Daniel had chosen the correct course.

In NT times the danger of syncretism intensified. The Roman Empire was filled with religious interpenetration, and in numerous instances the early church faced religious imports into the faith. The church itself was not completely free of these ideas, seen in the disciples' declaration that Peter's spirit was knocking at the door (possibly a type of spirit guardian double; Acts 12:15) and the leadership of the young church debating the extent to which Gentile converts had to adopt Jewish customs in order to come to saving faith (Acts 15). This issue was so critical that Paul was forced to rebuke Peter publicly for separating himself from Gentile believers when Judaizers arrived on the scene (Gal. 2:11–21). Hebrews was written to a group that struggled with the temptation to return to the law, which would be a denial of the reality of the gospel (Heb. 5:11–6:12; 10:19–39). Warnings against teachers, doctrines, and practices with syncretistic tendencies are sprinkled throughout the epistles (e.g., 1 Cor. 10:20; 2 Cor. 11:13–15; Gal. 1:6–9; 3:1–6; Col. 2:8–23; 1 Tim. 1:3; 6:3; 2 Pet. 2:1; and 1 John 4:1–6).

In missionary outreach, the church faced the issue of local audiences trying to understand displays of the power of Christ within their own religious framework, a foundation for a syncretistic approach to the gospel. Simon, coming out of a magical background, asked for power to lay hands on people so that the Holy Spirit would descend (Acts 8:9–24). The Lystrans thought that Paul and Barnabas were Zeus and Hermes after they healed a lame man. It was only with great difficulty that the apostles were able to restrain the Lystrans from offering sacrifices. Once their denial of divinity was understood, the crowd was easily stirred to turn and stone those they had so recently proclaimed gods (Acts 14:8–20)! The citizens of Malta considered Paul a god after he survived a snake-bite without any apparent harm (Acts 28:1–7), though Paul's reaction to this is not recorded. He was constrained to establish principles for handling food that has been offered to idols (1 Cor. 8) and dealing with special days (Rom. 14). He chided the Colossians for paying inappropriate attention to angels (Col. 2:13–19). John wrote to a church that was tempted to deny critical truths of the gospel (e.g., the existence of sin, 1 John 1:8–10; that Jesus was the Christ, 2:22–27; that Christ was flesh and blood, 4:1–6). In Revelation, the church at Ephesus is commended for hating the practices of the Nicolaitans (Rev. 2:6), while the church at Pergamum is chastised for allowing some to hold the teaching of Balaam, "who kept teaching Balak to put a stumbling block before the sons of Israel, to eat things sacrificed to idols, and to commit acts of immorality" (2:14).

The struggle of dealing with religious syncretism did not stop with the close of the canon. From its inception until the present, the church has faced questions of culture and religious practice that stand in contrast to the faith revealed in the Bible (see Visser't Hooft's No Other Name for a brief historical synopsis).

Modern Discussion. In more recent discussion scholars involved in ecumenical circles have questioned the need for continuing to use syncretism in its traditional sense. Some feel that a successful reinterpretation is not worth the effort (P. Schineller, "Inculturation and Syncretism: What Is the Real Issue?"). Others have difficulties with the traditional meaning, but prefer redefinition to abandonment lest it continue in its confined conservative sense (Schreiter, "Defining Syncretism: An Interim Report"; Droogers in Dialogue and Syncretism). Some have already attempted to recast it more positively by broadening the definition (e.g., M. M. Thomas, "Absoluteness of Jesus Christ and Christ-centred Syncretism"). Three significant issues arising out of the modern discussion deserve comment.

Syncretism

First, as a result of borrowing from outside of theological fields, the use of syncretism has been greatly expanded over the past twenty-five years. In its broadest and most neutral sense, it is used to refer to the intermixing or interpenetration of two (or more) paradigms, traditions, or world-views. Thus it is not limited to religious mixing; it can be used in relation to the mixing of cultures, religions, scientific outlooks, and ideologies. Basing their discussion on this definition, some missiologists note that virtually every expression of the Christian church around the world is permeated with syncretistic elements. An obvious problem with such a broad definition is that syncretism becomes an umbrella term that covers every cultural aspect of the church and loses all useful meaning in the process. In effect, the term traditionally used as one end of a spectrum has been transposed to be the entire spectrum and has become so all-encompassing that it has lost any analytic value.

The second issue involves power. Recent discussions have challenged the assumption that it should be the missionary or theologian who has the sole power to declare a practice or idea syncretistic. It has been proposed that all too often new movements (or practices or theologies) which threaten the old power structure are labeled as syncretistic simply because of the threat they represent to those in power. The overgeneralized labeling of the African-initiated churches as syncretistic by the mainline churches in Africa may be cited as a case in point. This trend in modern discussion is helpful in noting the reality of power issues in the analysis of syncretism but tends to downplay the importance of content more than is biblically appropriate. If we are to continue to develop a genuinely international intercultural partnership in the universal church, the evaluation of syncretistic practices cannot be left exclusively in the hands of those foreign to the culture and issues related to power can no longer be conveniently ignored by those in power. At the same time, however, the evaluative framework cannot be cast adrift from its biblical moorings.

A third issue is that of objectivity and how we define the "other." Third World theologians have noted how syncretistic the Western church appears to them. They ask who the judge is, and whether objectivity is possible. None of us think of ourselves as syncretistic—it is always the "other" whose thinking incorporates inappropriate religious elements in the gospel! The recent challenge involves the way in which we define ourselves by attaching labels to others (if "they" are syncretistic, it implies that "I" am not). The challenge leveled is whether any of us can claim to have God's perspective, when we as human beings are culturally bound? This question is currently shaking the foundations of Western social sciences (which were built on the concept of the scientist being purely objective) and is spilling over into the whole intercultural arena, of which the current discussion on syncretism is but a small part. Such reflection on objectivity serves to remind us that we are not as objective as we would like to think we are, but it is typically built on an overtly relativistic foundation. It is true that we as human beings are cultural creatures, but it is also true that the church has objective divine resources on which to draw, including the supracultural truths of Scripture and the indwelling Holy Spirit.

Suggested Guidelines. How, then, are we to think of syncretism? Though we cannot avoid the issue of definition, this cannot be settled by an examination of biblical uses, since the term is not used in the Bible. That, however, does not mean that the concept is not biblical (e.g., Trinity is a thoroughly biblical concept, though it is not a biblical term). Scholarly discussion outside of evangelicalism has already moved in the direction of a broad-based definition (similar to the broadening of mission and evangelism), at least in part because there is a fear of retaining any negative or judgmental connotations of terms in the modern debate. However, in being broadened the term has become so diffused that it has lost all sense of descriptive power in a Christian context because every expression of every church (and even the Bible itself) is syncretistic, and will continue to be syncretistic by definition. Such a definition robs the term of analytic use and makes it meaningless, just as "mission" becomes meaningless when it refers to everything the church does. Because syncretism conveys a significant biblical concept, and because this concept is of such critical importance to the integrity of the church, it is imperative to retain the traditional meaning while acknowledging the shift that has taken place outside of evangelical circles.

Biblical revelation clearly indicates that syncretistic ideas and practices, as traditionally defined, are wrong. The foundation for their negative evaluation is the violation of the first commandment. This is a message that may be lost in the midst of the modern cries for abandoning absolutes through pluralistic tolerance. In claiming allegiance to Christ, the only standard on which the Christian can rely is the normative framework of the Scriptures. In saying this we are not ignoring the complexities raised by recent hermeneutical discussions. There are significant and thorny issues tied up in interpreting the Scriptures, but we cannot escape the normative nature of the Bible as a foundation for Christian discussion and debate if we are to claim that we have surrendered to Christ's lordship. While the Scriptures are the only normative source, we cannot overlook the vast array of Christian thinking available to us. The reservoir available is spread out over two millennia and is the reflection of Christians from literally hundreds of cultures. We dare not neglect the rich resources of Christian history.

In addition to the historical wealth of the church, we have the contemporary body of Christ, which is richer in geographic and ethnic representation than ever before in history. The determination of syncretism in a particular local context cannot be simply left in the hands of powerful outside interests; the local community must be empowered to take their role in keeping watch over themselves and their doctrines. Christians from the West must learn how to trust indigenous peoples to be able to follow God's leading and trust that the Spirit is fully capable of working through "others" to maintain the purity of the church in a local context. At the same time, Christians of all cultures must open themselves up to partnership with Christians of other cultures, for often the insider's perspective is blinded by familiarity to that which might not be pleasing to God.

Finally, we must exercise great caution in using the label syncretism for practices or theological expressions that we do not understand. We must recognize that all Christians are in some sense a product of their desires, drives, backgrounds, and personal faith pilgrimages. None of us can escape the subjectivity of human existence, and humble recognition of this fact will facilitate greater sensitivity and a greater ability to faithfully discern syncretism in light of the normative standards of biblical revelation.

A. S. MOREAU

Bibliography. J. D. Gort et al., Dialogue and Syncretism: An Interdisciplinary Approach; H. Kraemer, Religion and the Christian Faith; R. J. Schreiter, "Defining Syncretism: An Interim Report," International Bulletin of Missionary Research 17:2:50-3; W. A. Visser't Hooft, No Other Name.

Synergism (Gr. synergos, "working together"). Reference to the doctrine of divine and human cooperation in conversion. Synergism seeks to reconcile two paradoxical truths: the sovereignty of God and man's moral responsibility. Nowhere do these two truths so intersect as in the theology of conversion. One tradition within Christianity, the Augustinian, emphasizes the sovereignty of God in conversion (monergism or divine monergism). Calvin and Luther stood within this heritage. In the Small Catechism Martin Luther wrote: "I believe that by my own reason or strength I cannot believe in Jesus Christ, my Lord, or come to him. But the Holy Spirit has called me through the Gospel, enlightened me with his gifts, and sanctified and preserved me in true faith." The other tradition, the Pelagian, emphasizes man's moral responsibility. Modified by such Roman Catholics as Erasmus of Rotterdam and such Protestants as James Arminius and John Wesley, this position stresses the freedom of the will. Erasmus said, "Free will is the power of applying oneself to grace." During the Lutheran Reformation the synergistic controversy occurred. Scholars debate whether or not Philip Melancthon was a synergist. Certainly he wrote that "man is wholly incapable of doing good" and that in "external things" (secular matters) there is free will, but not in "internal things" (spiritual matters). In the second edition of his Loci, however (published in 1535), Melancthon wrote that in conversion "Three causes are conjoined: The Word, the Holy Spirit and the Will not wholly inactive, but resisting its own weakness. . . . God draws, but draws him who is willing . . . and the will is not a statue, and that spiritual emotion is not impressed upon it as though it were a statue." His followers were called Philippists. His opponents were called Gnesio- or Genuine Lutherans. Melancthon's position was embodied in the Leipzig Interim (1548). John Pfeffinger (1493-1573), the first Lutheran superintendent of Leipzig, sought to expound the Philippist position in De libertate voluntaris humanae and De libero arbitrio in 1555, ascribing conversion's active concurrent causes to "the Holy Spirit moving through the Word of God, the mind in the act of thinking, and the will not resisting, but complying whenever moved by the Holy Spirit." Nicholas von Amsdorf, friend of Luther, called the "Secret Bishop of the Lutheran Church," attacked Pfeffinger in 1558 for teaching synergism. Victorinus Strigel (1524-69), professor at Jena, and John Stoltz (ca. 1514-56), court preacher at Weimar, became involved. Matthias Flacius, professor at Jena, became the major adversary of the Philippists. He taught that the "natural man" is comparable to a block of wood or a piece of stone and is hostile toward the work of God. Due to his influence John Frederick II drafted the Weimar Book of Confutations (1558-59), causing Strigel to be imprisoned for opposing it. Enforced strictly by the clergy, John Frederick in 1561 deprived ministers the right to uphold it, vesting that power in the consistory at Weimar. Flacius opposed this change and was expelled from Jena in 1561, while Strigel was reinstated in his professorship, signing an ambiguous document. John Stössel (1524-78), striving to justify Strigel's position, merely fueled the controversy. John William succeeded John Frederick in 1567. Desiring to resolve the controversy, he issued an edict on January 16, 1568, causing the Philippists to leave Jena, and the Flacianists (but not Flacius) to return. An Altenburg Colloquy (1568-

Synergism

69) failed to solve the controversy. By 1571, however, the Final Report and Declaration of the Theologians of Both Universities—Leipzig and Wittenberg—affirmed “consideration and reception of God’s Word and voluntary beginning of obedience in the heart arises out of that which God has begun graciously to work in us.” The Formula of Concord (1577) rejected synergism, endorsed Augustinianism, avoided the rhetoric of Flacianism and the tendencies of Philippianism, teaching “through . . . the preaching and the hearing of his Word, God is active, breaks our hearts, and draws man, so that through the preaching of the law man learns to know his sins . . . and experiences genuine terror, contrition and sorrow . . . and through the preaching of . . . the holy Gospel . . . there is kindled in him a spark of faith which accepts the forgiveness of sins for Christ’s sake.” C. G. FRY

See also CONCORD, FORMULA OF; FLACIUS, MATTHIAS; MELANCHTHON, PHILIP; MONERGISM.

Bibliography. C. Manschreck, Melanchthon: The Quiet Reformer; G. F. Schott, Encyclopedia of the Lutheran Church 3:2313–14; T. G. Tappert, ed., Book of Concord.

Synod (Gr. synodos, “a group of people traveling together”). The coming together of Christians for the purpose of discussing the church’s business (the coming together for worship was known as the synaxis). The word is technically used of a local church meeting for this purpose: general meetings attended by representatives of the church throughout the world were in the early days known as ecumenical (from the Gr. for “inhabited”) councils. It is believed that the first official synod (calling together the clergy of a diocese) was held by Bishop Siricius in Rome in 387. Subsequently Pope Benedict XIV ruled that a synod was a convocation of the diocese, while the gathering of all the bishops of the catholic world was to be called a council.

Different denominations use the word in different ways today. Episcopalians have varying systems of synodical government in their various provinces, while since Vatican II the Church of Rome has had biennial synods (starting in 1969) of representative bishops. Presbyterians use the synod, composed of ministers and elders from the presbyteries, as the next stage up in their chain of church government. Lutheran churches also organized themselves originally in regional synods. D. H. WHEATON

Systematic Theology. The attempt to reduce religious truth to a coherent and relevant whole for the church.

Definition and Relations. The word “theology” does not occur in Scripture, although the idea is very much present there. In the Greek world theologia signified the discussions of the philosophers about divine matters. Plato referred to the poets’ stories about the gods as “theologies,” and Aristotle taught a threefold division of the sciences into physics, the study of nature; mathematics, the study of number and quantity; and theology, the study of God. Aristotle regarded theology as the greatest of the sciences since its subject, God, is the highest reality.

Etymologically, theology derives from the Greek words theos (God) and logos (reason or speech) and strictly means rational reflection on God. B. B. Warfield advanced the classic short definition: “Theology is the science of God and his relationship to man and the world.” Theology might be more fully defined as the discipline that (1) presents a unified formulation of truth concerning God and his relationship to humanity as set forth primarily in divine revelation and secondarily in classical church teaching and the field of human knowledge and that (2) applies such truths to the entire range of human life and thought. Systematic theology thus begins with the totality of biblical revelation and extra-biblical truth, provisionally respects the development of doctrine in the church’s history, draws out the teachings of Scripture via sound grammatical, historical, and cultural exegesis, orders the result into a coherent whole where the inter-relatedness of its parts is evidenced, and relates the results to the life and witness of the Christian community. Traditionally the church employed systematic theology for purposes of catechesis, polemic against heresy, and the spiritual formation of its members. In that systematic theology formulates a world-and-life view for Christ-centered living, it is an intellectual and spiritual task appropriate for every mature Christian.

The discipline has sometimes been designated dogmatic theology (Shedd, Bavinck, Barth)—the leading idea being beliefs established by competent authority, which has been variously identified as Scripture, creedal standards, or the church’s magisterium. Other common designations are Christian theology (Headlam, Wiley, Erickson), Christian faith (Rahner, H. Berkhof), and constructive theology (Hodgson, Meland).

Some mistakenly view systematic theology as a deposit of divine truths that is timeless and unalterable. Although Scripture is inviolable, fresh theological understanding and reformulation are required in every generation and for every culture, first, because the corpus of Christian truth must be clad in every distinctive cultural form and context, and second, because new issues and problems arise to challenge the church. Theology, in other words, needs to be continually re-contextualized.

What is the relation of systematic theology to other disciplines? Since theology and philosophy both engage in critical analysis of the meaning of terms, follow a strict process of observation and reasoning to reach conclusions, and traditionally sought to formulate a consistent worldview, philosophy and theology are overlapping disciplines. Religion, on the other hand, is a set of beliefs, attitudes, and practices that receives a particular institutionalized expression. Every religion, whether simple or sophisticated, has a theology. Hence religion is larger in scope than theology. Ethics assumes the results of systematic theology to define the character of personal and community conduct. Apologetics develops a reasoned defense of basic Christian presuppositions concerning God, Christ, and the Bible against assumptions held by conflicting worldviews (metaphysics) and ways of knowing (epistemology).

The Possibility and Necessity of Systematic Theology. Contrary to claims that human knowledge of metaphysical realities is not possible, Christians assert that knowledge of God is eminently feasible for several reasons: (1) the God who exists has revealed himself in meaningful disclosures to his creatures (1 Cor. 2:10); (2) humans as created in the divine image are rational beings endowed with the ability to comprehend God's communication (James 3:9); (3) believers enjoy the restoration of epistemic and spiritual powers by the grace of regeneration (Col. 3:10), and (4) Christians are enabled to perceive divine truth through the gift of Spirit illumination (Ps. 119:18; 1 Cor. 2:14–15). It follows that only Spirit-guided believers can do theology in a way pleasing to God.

Working with the full range of revelation, systematic theology concerns itself with God's saving history with his people, the utterances of divinely ordained prophets and apostles, and supremely the life, teachings, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ. Systematic theology also utilizes data mediated by secondary modes of revelation, such as the created order (Ps. 19:1–6), the flow of providential history (Acts 17:26), the moral dictates of the conscience (Rom. 2:14–15), and truth wherever found.

Although persons, especially believers, acquire valid knowledge about God, such knowledge is not identical to God's knowledge of himself and the universe. Rather, the partial knowledge that finite persons gain of the infinite God is a knowledge mediated by images and symbols (analogical knowledge), as well as by propositional assertions (cognitive, univocal truth). Even "picture language" about God (e.g., God as "father," "shepherd," or "rock") is valid since each analogy includes a core of univocal truth. Systematic theology thus claims that God can be known personally and in true assertions made in meaningful language, even though such knowledge is partial and incomplete (1 Cor. 13:12). Mystery and a modicum of ambiguity are an inescapable part of a humanly formulated theology.

The church undertakes the task of systematic theology for the following reasons: (1) That the believing community might be edified. The people of God are spiritually enriched by foundational truths (2 Tim. 3:16) and the faith experience of the believing community (Heb. 11). (2) That the gospel in its fulness might be proclaimed. Without the foundation of sound theology effective gospel proclamation, evangelism, and missionary outreach are impossible. (3) That the truth content and lived experience of the faith might be preserved. Where systematic theology is devalued, cults and false sects abound.

The Method of Systematic Theology. One way of doing systematic theology is the so-called confessional method. Roman Catholic, Lutheran, Reformed, and neoorthodox confessional theologies reproduce the doctrinal system of the host system. The problem with confessionalism is that few reasons are given why one confessional position should be accepted as normative vis-à-vis the others. Preferable is the verificational method that respects confessional views as hypotheses to be tested by the criteria of logical consistency, coherence with revelation, and existential viability. Theologians must show that the body of truth as formulated from revelation data fits the facts with fewest problems and satisfies human needs to a greater degree than the alternatives. The virtues of this method are that (1) a higher degree of openness and communication are maintained with others inside and outside the church and (2) a rationale is given why one should accept the Christian faith in the face of competing claims. By this verificational or scientific method both the content of revelation is expounded in orderly fashion for the church and a convincing case is made for the validity of the gospel.

The church traditionally regarded systematic theology as the queen of the sciences. Kant, however, argued that the science of God is impossible since objective knowledge of noumenal realities is unattainable. Modern logical positivism and theological liberalism deny that systematic theology properly is a science. The fact is that systematic theology follows a reliable method, namely, the method of research that, beginning with certain presuppositions, observes, records data, formulates hypotheses, tests the hypotheses, and relates the resultant field of knowledge to life. Systematic theology also deals with a product, namely, an integrated field of reliable knowledge. Thus theology is no less a science than any of the social sciences. Systematic theology is not a spurious discipline that deals with fables and private opinions, but one that operates with accurate information secured by reliable means.

In pursuing its task, systematic theology utilizes the results of other branches of theology. Exexegetical theology unfolds the meaning of specific biblical texts and so provides systematic theology with its most important building block. Biblical theology sets forth the message of biblical books by author or other scheme of grouping. Historical theology traces the church's faith topically through the various eras of its history. Systematic theology incorporates the data of exegetical, biblical, and historical theology to construct a coherent representation of the Christian faith. As Origen put it, "God gives the truth in single threads which we must weave into a finished texture." Finally, practical theology applies the results of systematic theology to preaching, teaching, counseling, and formation of the spiritual life.

Systematic Theology

Theologians have undertaken the task of theology in two major ways. Some (Schleiermacher, Tillich, Macquarrie) have begun with the human existential situation and constructed a "theology from below." Others (most orthodox and Reformed) posit God as the primary datum and construct a "theology from above." The latter approach is preferred, if only for the reason that "man only knows who he is in the light of God" (Bonhoeffer). Theologians such as Aquinas and Calvin have ordered the material of theology ac-ording to the trinitarian pattern. Others, such as Barth, follow a christological model and relate the data to God's self-disclosure through the incarnate Word. Traditionally, Christian theologians have ordered the topics of theology as the sources of revelation (prolegomena), the triune nature of God (theology proper), human existence and the fall (anthropology), Christ's person and work (Christology), salvation applied (soteriology), the society of the redeemed (ecclesiology), and the consummation and eternal state (eschatology).

B. DEMAREST

See also DOGMA; DOGMATICS.

Bibliography. L. Berkhof, Introduction to Systematic Theology; H. Blamires, Defence of Dogmatism; K. Bockmuehl, "Task of Systematic Theology," in Perspectives on Evangelical Theology; J. J. Davis, Necessity of Systematic Theology; S. J. Grenz, Revisioning Evangelical Theology; F. G. Healey, ed., What Theologians Do; B. Hebblethwaite, Problems of Theology; T. W. Jennings Jr., ed., Vocation of the Theologian; G. R. Lewis and B. A. Demarest, Integrative Theology; J. Macquarrie, Principles of Systematic Theology; B. B. Warfield, "Idea of Systematic Theology," in Studies in Theology; J. D. Woodbridge and T. E. McComisky, eds., Doing Theology in Today's World.

Tt

Tabernacle, Temple. Structures built for the worship of gods. The use of temples is both ancient and widespread in human culture. In Mesopotamia the “house” or “palace” of the gods was placed on a massive artificial platform (zigurat) where the gods were thought to reside on their journeys from the heavens to the lower world (cf. Gen. 11:4). The Canaanites also constructed local shrines on loose stone platforms, as is clear from the striking excavations at Hazor. Altars (but not necessarily temples) crowned these “high places” (bāmôt). The high places existed concurrently and competitively with Israelite sanctuaries in the preexilic period and were only systematically suppressed by King Josiah (2 Kings 23).

Tabernacle and Temple in History. The patriarchs worshiped at various cultic places in Canaan, such as Shechem, Bethel, Hebron, and Beersheba. These unenclosed sites would usually contain a sacred tree or stone (maṣṣēbâ) and an altar. Each site commemorated an appearance of God to the patriarchs (see Gen. 18:1; 28:10–22; 33:18–20).

The essential elements of biblical temple worship derive from the Sinai covenant. The Bible attributes to this period the central features of the later Jerusalem temple—the tent of meeting (’ōhel mō’ēd), or tabernacle (miškān), and the ark of the covenant—although scholars debate the exact provenance of and relationship between these institutions.

As described in Exodus 25–31, the wilderness tabernacle was the prototype of the later temple in Jerusalem with certain unique features. It was half the size of the temple and was portable. Its walls consisted of a framework of boards; from these, linen curtains were suspended, and skins covered the whole structure. The courtyard was likewise enclosed with a linen screen upheld by wooden pillars.

During the period of the judges, Israelite temples were established throughout the land at Gilgal, Shiloh, Bethel, Dan, Mizpah of Benjamin, Ophrah, Hebron, Bethlehem, Nob, and several lesser sites. The ark is primarily associated with Shiloh, although it also resided for a time at Gilgal and Bethel. The Philistines destroyed Shiloh and captured the ark; however, they soon returned it, and it probably remained at Kiriath-jearim (Baalath) until David determined to install it in a new temple in Jerusalem (1 Sam. 4–7; 2 Sam. 6; cf. 1 Chron. 16:37). Solomon’s temple (or the first temple) became preeminent as a symbol of national and religious unity. However, the rival temples died hard: King Jeroboam I reestablished Dan and Bethel as shrines for the northern tribes. Surprisingly, a small temple complex has been found in Solomon’s own border fortress at Arad. During and after the exile, Jewish temples were built in Egypt at Elephantine (sixth to fifth centuries B.C.) and Leontopolis (second century B.C.), and the Samaritans also built a temple on Mount Gerizim (fourth to second century B.C.).

The first temple in Jerusalem was destroyed by the Babylonians in 587 B.C., and the second temple was completed on the same site in 515 B.C. The second temple was understandably modest in comparison with Solomon’s temple—until King Herod’s total remodeling along grand Hellenistic lines in 20 B.C. Control of the temple continued to have strong political overtones; both Antiochus IV of Syria and the Roman general Pompey set up pagan insignia within it as signs of their authority over the Jews. The second temple itself was destroyed in A.D. 70 by the Romans, who erected their own temple on the spot. Today the site is occupied by the Muslim shrine, Dome of the Rock.

The basic shape of the temple was that of a “long house” subdivided into two rooms, the Holy Place and the Holy of Holies, separated by doors in Solomon’s day and later by a curtain. Inside the Holy Place stood the incense altar, the table(s) for showbread, and the golden lampstand(s). In Solomon’s temple the inner sanctum contained the ark, the cherubim, and perhaps the mercy seat (kappōret); in the postexilic second temple the Holy of Holies was presumably bare. Once a year on the Day of Atonement the high priest entered and cleansed the Holy of Holies. The temple was flanked by various out-buildings for priests and by one or two courtyards. To the east of the temple porch with its twin pillars stood the sacrifice altar and bronze laver. Here worshipers and priests performed the prescribed sacrifices according to the Torah.

Tabernacle, Temple

Theological Significance. The institution of the tabernacle is set within the context of the giving of the covenant on Mount Sinai. The tabernacle signifies to Israel crucial aspects of this covenant. First, it is a sign of election—God has graciously chosen Israel; they have not chosen him. Likewise, God personally prescribes the form, furnishings, clergy, and ceremonial of the tabernacle; he also promises to choose the future site of his dwelling (Deut. 12:5). Any deviation from these exact prescriptions is a breach of the covenant and leads to death (Exod. 32).

The tabernacle also is a sign of unity: as God is one, so God's people, gathered in diverse tribes and ranks, are united around the tabernacle (Num. 1–10). Conversely, those temples erected outside Jerusalem indicate both the disunity of the nation and its idolatry; and the prophets look toward the day when worship will be unified in Jerusalem and purified (Ezek. 28:25–26). Indeed, the temple on Mount Zion even points to the eventual reconciliation of the human race (Isa. 2:1–5).

God is holy and calls Israel to be a holy nation. The temple and its priesthood remind them of their vocation to holiness. The sacrificial system provides atonement for the sins of the people and for the sanctuary (Lev. 16). The holy God reveals his name, his glory, and his presence to Israel at Mount Sinai. However, the tabernacle is to be the ongoing locus of God's presence throughout Israel's history. God is seen as permanently dwelling (šākan) in the tabernacle or temple (Exod. 29:42–46; 1 Kings 6:13); but he also manifests his glory, in blessing or wrath, at critical moments in Israel's life (Exod. 40:34–38; Num. 14:10–24; 16:19–35; Ezek. 1, 10; 43:1–5; Mal. 3:1). The rebuilding of the temple is an indispensable token of God's continuing will to bless Israel (Hag. 2:18–19; Zech. 4:9–10).

God is cosmic King, and the temple is the sign of his kingship. The enthronement psalms and the Zion psalms acclaim God as reigning from his abode in Zion over the whole earth (Pss. 29; 46–48; 76; cf. Isa. 6:1–3). The messianic king is God's delegate in his kingdom (Ps. 2); sometimes a messianic figure is pictured as serving before God in his sanctuary (2 Sam. 6; Ps. 110; Dan. 9:24–26; Zech. 4).

The temple is also seen as the earthly pattern of the heavenly kingdom (Exod. 25:8–9; 1 Chron. 28:19; Isa. 6:1–3). During the exile, Ezekiel is given a visionary tour of the New Jerusalem and its temple (Ezek. 40–48). Ezekiel's temple does not conform to the reality of the first and second temples. Many scholars likewise see the priestly prescriptions in the Pentateuch as idealizations of the temple and its appurtenances. Along with such spiritualization of the temple idea goes the expectation of an eschatological temple (Isa. 2:1–5; Ezek. 37:27; Hag. 2:9). Both these tendencies to look for a final, glorious temple are extended in the apocalyptic literature (1 Enoch 14; 90:28–29; T. Levi 2–3). The Qumran sectarians, for instance, collected visions of the New Jerusalem, including the lengthy Temple Scroll. They also described their own community in exile as “the house of holiness for Israel . . . a most holy dwelling for Aaron” (1QS 8:5–9).

The true Israelite continually longed to be in the “house of the LORD” (see Pss. 27; 122); at the same time the people of Israel were continually tempted to respond to God's institution of the temple with a false confidence in the unconditional character of his grace. The prophets repeatedly warned the people that trust in the temple could derive only from trust in God and obedience to the terms of his covenant. Otherwise, God would destroy the temple (cf. Jer. 7:1–15; Ezek. 9; Amos 9:1). But when the temple was devastated in 587 B.C. and A.D. 70, it then became the object of hope for future restoration (Ps. 137; Seventeenth Benediction of the synagogue liturgy).

Tabernacle and Temple in the New Testament. The NT reflects the same devotion toward the temple—not to mention the same ambivalence and apocalyptic expectation—expressed by Jews of the time; however, the NT writers, convinced that the kingdom of God has come and that Jesus has fulfilled the messianic prophecies of the OT, heighten and deepen the meaning of the temple idea.

Jesus himself assumed the divine institution of the temple and called it “my Father's house” (John 2:16). At the same time, he saw God's judgment impending upon it, and he predicted its imminent destruction (Mark 13:1–2). In a manner reminiscent of the prophets, Jesus “cleansed” the temple, recalling its holiness (“a house of prayer”—Matt. 21:13). He also claimed that were the temple to be destroyed, he would raise it up again (John 2:19). While Jesus intended this claim parabolically, it was used against him at his trial (Matt. 26:61; cf. 27:40). Ironically, the trial and crucifixion of Jesus seal the fate of the temple and open the way to a new Gentile community confessing Jesus as the Son of God (Mark 15:37–39).

The Gospel of John employs the OT imagery of the tabernacle to emphasize that God himself, the Word, is present in human form (John 1:14). The new temple, Christ's exalted body, will become the focus of true worship for those who receive the Spirit (John 2:18–22; 4:19–24; 7:37–38).

The book of Acts illustrates the movement of the church from the first Jerusalem community—still worshipping at the temple—outward to Samaria, and at last to Rome, the capital of the Gentile world.

While it is possible that the book of Acts refers to the church as a new temple (15:13–18), it is Paul who develops this image fully. Paul calls his converts to a holiness of life intended for the true Israel, because “we are the temple of the living God” (2 Cor. 6:16–7:1; cf. 1 Cor. 6:19–20). Sometimes he likens the church to a building founded on Christ within which the Holy Spirit dwells and gives unity (1 Cor. 3:10–17; Eph. 2:20–22). Similarly, Peter calls believers to appropriate the OT promises to Israel by coming to Christ, the cornerstone, and being built into a spiritual edifice (1 Pet. 2:4–10).

The epistle to the Hebrews is a thoroughgoing representation of OT types with strong emphasis on the heavenly realities underlying them. Thus, the regulations for worship in the OT were earthly and transient; Christ as the true High Priest entered into the heavenly sanctuary and offered once for all the perfect sacrifice of his blood. For this reason Christians can draw near to God with confidence (Heb. 9–10). While we remain, in one sense, on pilgrimage in the world, through our forerunner we have come already by faith to the eschatological feast in heaven (Heb. 11–12).

The author of the book of Revelation elaborates on this eschatological fulfillment in vivid imagery. John assures the beleaguered churches that Christ the Lamb has already entered the heavenly tabernacle and received authority over the future (Rev. 4–5). They are already a royal and priestly temple, and by martyrdom they will enter preleptically into heaven (Rev. 7:1–17; 11:1–13).

The ultimate fulfillment of all God’s promises in space and time is to come in the New Jerusalem (Rev. 21–22). It is a new world order, a new creation for all eternity. God Almighty and the Lamb are its temple, and all the elect will see him face to face.

S. F. NOLL

See also ALTAR; OFFERINGS AND SACRIFICES IN BIBLE TIMES; PRIESTS AND LEVITES.

Bibliography. M. Avi-Yonah and Z. Baras, eds., Herodian Period; J. R. Brown, Temple and Sacrifice in Rabbinic Judaism; R. E. Clements, God and Temple; J. Comay, Temple of Jerusalem; R. deVaux, Ancient Israel; D. W. Gooding, Account of the Tabernacle; M. Haran, Temples and Temple-Service in Ancient Israel; J. Jeremias, Jerusalem in the Time of Jesus; H.-J. Kraus, Worship in Israel; E. Lohmeyer, Lord of the Temple; R. J. McKelvey, New Temple; A. Parrot, Temple of Jerusalem; D. A. Renwick, Paul, the Temple and the Presence of God; S. Safrai and M. Stern, eds., Jewish People in the First Century.

Tauler, Johannes (ca. 1300–1361). Medieval preacher and mystic. Born in a well-to-do family in Strasbourg, Tauler entered the Dominican Order in that city about 1315. His pastoral education was taken at Strasbourg; contrary to frequent assertion, he did not study scholastic theology in Cologne. Unlike Meister Eckhart, he never taught theology but spent his life as a Dominican preacher and spiritual counselor, primarily in Strasbourg, but also in Basel and Cologne. Tauler left no Latin writings, and none of the German treatises once ascribed to him are genuine; his literary legacy consists of German sermons. Tauler’s nineteenth-century reputation as a “Reformer before the Reformation” was based in large part on the spurious treatises.

Tauler can scarcely be considered a disciple of Eckhart. He learned much from Eckhart’s writings but probably did not know this fellow Dominican personally. Although they share the common goal of union with God that is made possible by the existence of a divine Grund (“ground, center, fundament”) or “spark” of divineness in the human soul, Tauler’s approach may with caution be described as that of a pastoral Lebemeister (“master of living”) rather than that of a pastoral Lese- or Lehrmeister (“lector or scholastic-mystical master of teaching”). Tauler’s mystical theology is based less explicitly on a metaphysical system than on the existence of the image of God in humans. Whereas Eckhart speaks of the eternal birth of the Word in the soul, Tauler focuses on a transforming or “hyperforming” (Überformung) of the human being in the divine image. Thus, Tauler’s mystical theology is more personalistic and anthropological, stressing the affective resources of the soul (the Gemüt or “basic will”) to a greater degree than the intellectual faculties of the soul. Tauler also pays greater attention to the preparation for union, to the purgative path of growth in love and in freedom from selfness and creatureliness: one cannot run before walking.

Untainted by the stigma of heresy that Eckhart’s writings carried, Tauler’s sermons were widely transmitted and frequently printed. Thus, they were read and recommended by subsequent spiritual writers, including Martin Luther and various pietists. The assumption that Tauler limited the mystical union to a conformity of divine and human wills by grace alone has made Protestant authors sympathetic to Tauler; but this interpretation, even when based on genuine Taulerian sermons, must be understood in the context of his assumption that an innate likeness to God within the human soul makes possible a union of essence or being, and also in view of his emphasis on human cooperation with divine grace in the path toward union.

D. D. MARTIN

See also MEISTER ECKHART; MYSTICISM.

Bibliography. J. M. Clark, Great German Mystics; G. Hofmann, trans., Johannes Tauler, Predigten; R. M. Jones, Flowering of Mysticism.

Taylor, Nathaniel William (1786–1858). Most significant proponent of the New Haven Theology, he contributed to the rise of evangelical theology by modifying Calvinism, rendering it compatible with revivalism in the opening decades of the nineteenth century. He was born in 1786 in New Milford, Connecticut, into a family rich in both material things and religious heritage. Taylor entered Yale in 1800, but an eye ailment deferred his graduation until 1807.

Taylor was profoundly influenced while a student of revivalist Timothy Dwight, the president of Yale. Taylor lived with the Dwight family for two years after his graduation, serving as the president's secretary and studying theology. In 1812 Taylor was ordained and installed at First Church in New Haven, the most prestigious pulpit in the state, where he commanded admiration for ten years as a preacher and defender of revivalism. He worked closely with Lyman Beecher, who preached throughout New England to promulgate the Second Great Awakening, not only to win souls, but to launch a moral crusade against such social ills as sabbath breaking and drunkenness. Taylor contributed by publishing his sermons as doctrinal tracts against Old Calvinists, Episcopalians, and the growing Unitarian movement, all opposed to the revival.

In 1822 Taylor was appointed Dwight Professor of Didactic Theology at Yale, where he taught until his death in 1858. Taylor was prompted to revise Calvinism by the increasing charges from Unitarians that Calvinistic determinism actually promoted immorality by denying human freedom. In response to these attacks, he altered the Reformed doctrines of revelation, human depravity, God's sovereignty, Christ's atonement, and regeneration in order to harmonize Calvinist theology with actual revival practices. He accepted the humanistic teaching of commonsense realism that reason provides not only proof of God's existence but also the first principles of morality that make humans free moral agents. He insisted that people are lost but denied that Adam's sin was imputed to all people and that everyone inherits a sinful nature that causes one to sin. Even though a person sins, that person has power to do otherwise, thus remaining morally responsible. God made humans with a proper self-love, a natural desire for happiness, which motivates all choices.

Taylor also reinterpreted Calvin's teaching on God's sovereignty by calling God a moral governor who rules, not by determining the destiny of all people through election, but rather by establishing a moral universe and judging its inhabitants. God promotes moral action by a system of means and ends in which people can respond to ethical appeals for repentance. He opposed the legal view of the atonement that stressed Christ's substitutionary death on the cross in the place of sinners to satisfy God's justice. Instead, God as benevolent moral governor sent Christ to die so that his death could be preached as a means to urge sinners to turn freely from their sin out of self-love and be converted. Taylor blurred the distinction between the Holy Spirit's sovereign work of regeneration and human repentance that Jonathan Edwards maintained in his defense of the First Great Awakening in the 1740s.

Taylorism was popularized by revivalists such as Charles G. Finney, who demonstrated wide appeal to New School Presbyterians and Congregationalists eager for revivals in their parishes. However, Old School opponents such as Charles Hodge at Princeton Theological Seminary accused Taylor of Pelagianism and Arminianism and defended traditional Calvinism.

W. A. HOFFECKER

See also NEW HAVEN THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. N. W. Taylor, Concio ad Clerum: On Human Nature, Sin, and Freedom; Lectures on the Moral Government of God; S. E. Ahlstrom, "Scottish Philosophy and American Theology," CH 24:257–72; J. Haroutunian, Piety versus Moralism: The Passing of the New England Theology; G. M. Marsden, Evangelical Mind and the New School Presbyterian Experience; S. E. Mead, Nathaniel William Taylor.

Teaching, Gift of. See SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

Teilhard de Chardin, Pierre (1881–1955). Controversial Jesuit paleogeologist who absorbed Catholic theology into a scheme of cosmic evolution. Teilhard was born in Sarant, France. At the Jesuit boarding school he attended from the age of ten, he developed an early interest in geology, leading eventually to a doctorate in that field at the Sorbonne in 1922. In the meantime he had taken the Jesuit vow and served as stretcher bearer in World War I. In 1926 he was relieved of his teaching duties at the Catholic Institute in Paris due to his unorthodox views. The next twenty years saw his major activities in Asia, where his work included participation in the discoveries of Sinanthropus (Peking Man) and Pithecanthropus. During the last decade of his life he lectured widely in Europe and America to acclaim from outside the church; ecclesiastical authorities, however, continued to forbid publication of his ideas. Most of Teilhard's works published in his lifetime are scientific in nature; his major theological writings saw print only posthumously.

Teilhard's central work is Phenomenon of Man, written in 1938. The focus of the book is on the human person as the unique culmination of the evolution of the universe.

Phenomenon of Man is divided into three parts corresponding to Teilhard's tripartite conception of evolution: prelife (matter), life (biosphere), and thought (noosphere). For him, the evolutionary process, rather than being merely the result of chance adaptation, proceeds along a predetermined line that the universe is compelled to follow. Thus, the material realm already anticipates consciousness because physical matter is enveloped by the "biosphere," the manifestation of all the various forms of life beginning with the simplest and concluding with the most complex: the human being.

In the area of human development, Teilhard accented the most remarkable features of evolution. All along evolution has defied the second law of thermodynamics by increasing complexity in the system and by raising similarity in forms. But now in the human person complexity is highly intensified, and all of human evolution converges into the development of culture and thought. Thereby the third layer beyond matter and the biosphere, the "noosphere," is created. The noosphere is the ever-increasing collectivity of human knowledge and of humanistic attitudes, especially love. It too develops, and it also has a goal: the unification of all humankind under the commitment of love. Teilhard refers to this certain destiny as "omega point." When omega point is reached, humanity has merged with Jesus Christ.

Teilhard has few true disciples, but his thought has been very influential. Many of his ideas are reflected in the Vatican II documents. Scientists have found inspiration in his transmaterial view of the world.

Nonetheless, in many specifics, Teilhard stands scathed by strong critiques. Evolutionary biology is leery of the idea that life has developed along a predetermined line. On the other side, conservative theologians would find fault with the facile way in which he subsumes Christian concepts under evolutionary categories. In sum, Teilhard de Chardin epitomizes the twentieth-century myth: a combination of science and theology that does justice to neither.

W. CORDUAN

See also EVOLUTION.

Bibliography. P. Teilhard de Chardin, Divine Milieu; Future of Man; Hymn of the Universe; Phenomenon of Man; H. de Lubac, Religion of Teilhard de Chardin; M. Kessler and B. Brown, eds., Dimensions of the Future: The Spirituality of Teilhard de Chardin; R. G. North, Teilhard and the Creation of the Soul; R. Speaight, Life of Teilhard de Chardin.

Teleological Argument for God. See GOD, ARGUMENTS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF.

Temperance. See CARDINAL VIRTUES, SEVEN.

Temple. See TABERNACLE, TEMPLE.

Temple, William (1881–1944). Commonly adjudged one of the greatest church leaders of the twentieth century and possibly the most gifted teacher ever to fill the See of Canterbury. Son of Frederick Temple, archbishop of Canterbury, William was educated at Rugby School (1894–1900) and Balliol College, Oxford (1900–1904), graduating B.A. with first class honors in literae humaniores. He was ordained priest in 1909. His appointments included fellow of Queen's College, Oxford (1904–10); headmaster of Repton (1910–14); rector of St. James's, Piccadilly (1914–17), where his preaching through the Gospel of John laid the foundation for his most popular devotional work, Readings in St. John's Gospel (1939); canon of Westminster (1919–20); bishop of Manchester (1921–29); archbishop of York (1929–42); and archbishop of Canterbury (1942–44).

Of massive intellectual and spiritual power, Temple's most important writings are on philosophical theology (Mens Creatrix, 1917; Christus Veritas, 1924; Nature, Man and God, 1934) and social theology (Christianity and Social Order, 1942). Influenced by the neo-Hegelian idealism of T. H. Green and Edward Caird, Temple sought a unifying spiritual principle by which apparently contradictory or independent intellectual and social movements might be reconciled or related. This principle, he believed, was the Christian doctrine of the Logos. Indeed, the starting point of his philosophical theology was faith in God, which, he maintained, cannot be demonstrated by philosophical argument but makes the best sense of human experience. He agreed with Augustine that the motto of theology is "I believe in order to understand." A corollary was Temple's optimism about the meaningfulness of human life, including the experience of evil and suffering. The fall, he suggested, was a "fall upwards," since through it humans acquired self-will, and only through the conquest of self-will could humans make progress from innocence to self-sacrifice, which is virtue. In the incarnation of the Logos, God offers humans no explanation, but salvation, which is the divine summons to loving, self-sacrificial action to eradicate evil in the lives of individuals and in the structures of society. So, particularly in his later thinking, the unifying principle of the Logos was understood, not as a static concept, but as a dynamic process in which individuals and institutions cooperate with God in the renovation of the world. Temple's christocentric metaphysic and his stress on the theology of incarnation have placed him outside the mainstream of twentieth-century theological thought with its emphasis on a dogmatic theology of redemption.

Temple, William

Consistent with his position, Temple was committed to a large number of social, political, and economic, as well as ecclesiastical, movements: (1) Educational reform: Temple was president of the Workers' Educational Association from 1908 to 1924, and he was instrumental in the passage of the influential Education Act of 1943. (2) Student work: Temple had a long association with the Student Christian Movement, which he promoted in Australia in 1910 on the invitation of John R. Mott. In his many university missions, he demonstrated the intellectual respectability of Christianity and helped stem the drift away from the churches that had become fashionable after World War I. (3) Christian renewal: Temple traveled for the Life and Liberty Movement in 1918–19 advocating a reformed establishment. The consequent Enabling Act of 1919 created a new Church Assembly made up of bishops, clergy, and laity. (4) Social justice and reform: Temple was attracted to socialism, was a lifelong friend of R. H. Tawney and a short-term member of the Labor Party. He was an ardent champion of the church's right to intervene in social and economic matters and was chairman of the interdenominational Conference on Politics, Economics, and Citizenship (COPEC) in Birmingham in 1924. (5) The ecumenical movement: Temple's involvement dated from the 1910 Edinburgh Conference until his death. He was first president of both the World Council of Churches "in process of formation" (1938) and of the British Council of Churches (1943).

In spite of his brilliance, Temple's was a serene and simple faith, grounded in a life of prayer. His profound humanity may be attributed partly to a lifelong affliction with gout. He was a popular evangelist with the capacity to express deep truths in simple words and was known as the people's archbishop.

F. S. PIGGIN

Bibliography. R. Craig, Social Concern in the Thought of William Temple; F. A. Iremonger, William Temple, Archbishop of Canterbury; J. F. Padgett, Christian Philosophy of William Temple; A. M. Ramsay, From Gore to Temple; A. M. Suggate, William Temple and Christian Social Ethics Today; O. C. Thomas, William Temple's Philosophy of Religion.

Temptation. The act of tempting or the state of being tempted. In the OT the specific verb indicating the act of tempting is the Piel form nissâ. In 1 Samuel 17:39 the word is used of proving or testing armor. In Genesis 22:2 nissâ characterizes God's command to Abraham to offer Isaac as a burnt offering in the land of Moriah. A similar use of the term in application to God's testing of people is found in Exodus 16:4; 20:20; Deuteronomy 8:2, 16; 13:3; 2 Chronicles 32:31; Psalm 26:2; et al. Related to this sense of the term is that which is given to it when it is applied to the terrible and wonderful acts of God against Egypt (Deut. 4:34).

The same technical term is applied to those acts of humans that challenge God to demonstrate his veracity and justice.

The term nissâ is rarely, if ever, applied in the OT to Satan's act of enticing people to sin. Nevertheless, the essence of temptation in this sense is clearly revealed in the account of the fall and in the record of Satan's role in the affliction of Job (Gen. 3:1–13; Job 1:1–2:10). Eve tells God, "The serpent deceived me (hiššī'anî), and I ate" (Gen. 3:13; cf. exapataō in 2 Cor. 11:3; 1 Tim. 2:14). Deception plays an important part in satanic temptation. Satan avoids making a frontal attack immediately on God's probationary command and its threatened penalties. Instead, he sows the seeds of doubt, unbelief, and rebellion. The temptation of Eve is typical. She is made to feel that God has unwisely and unfairly withheld a legitimate objective good. In Job's trials the strategy is different, but the end sought is the same—the rejection of God's will and way as just and good.

The NT reflects the translation of nissâ with ekpeirazō, etc., in the LXX (Matt. 4:7; 1 Cor. 10:9; Heb. 3:8–9). In these passages the sinful tempting of God is referred to by way of the OT. The same sense, however, is employed by Peter in connection with the sin of Ananias and Sapphira (Acts 5:9) and the prescriptions to be given to Gentile Christians (Acts 15:10).

The additional use of peirazō and related forms is complex. The words may refer to exterior circumstances that try the believer's faith and are designed to strengthen that faith (James 1:2; 1 Pet. 1:6). Although these circumstances are held to be under the absolute control of God, the explicit causal ascription of them to God is not prominent. Perhaps some reasoning by analogy is permissible here. Paul, e.g., recognizes that his "thorn in [the] flesh" is under God's sovereign control (2 Cor. 12:8–9). But the "thorn" is "a messenger of Satan" (v. 7). The same phenomenon may be viewed from two aspects. The peirasmon is a trial of one's faith controlled and, even in some sense, sent by God. But God is not the author of the prompting to sin that such trial seems to bring with it. The believer may rejoice in trial because he or she detects God's good purpose in it (James 1:2–4, 12). But the subjective use of trying situations, the internal incitement to sin in connection with trials and testings, is not and cannot be the work of God. Enticement to sin and to impatient rebellion is the work of Satan. (1 Pet. 5:8–9; Rev. 2:9; cf. 1 Thess. 3:5). In this he is immensely aided by the deceptive power of epithymia, lust, in the old nature (James 1:14–15). While Satan's role in temptation is usually assumed rather than stated, in 1 Corinthians 7:5 Paul explicitly warns Christians to observe his charge with respect to marital relationships, “so that Satan will not tempt you because of your lack of self-control” (cf. Matt. 4:1; Mark 1:13; Luke 4:2).

Jesus teaches the disciples to pray, “And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from the evil one” (Matt. 6:13), and the Bible is replete with warnings to be watchful because of the ever-present danger of falling into temptation (Luke 22:40; Gal. 6:1; 1 Pet. 5:8–9). But the Bible assures the believer that God will make a way of escape from temptation (1 Cor. 10:13), and that “the Lord knows how to rescue godly men from trials” (2 Pet. 2:9).

Jesus was repeatedly tempted, or tested, by the Jewish leaders (Mark 8:11 et al.). But these temptations were designed either to force Jesus to prove his messiahship in terms of the preconceptions of his enemies, to compel him to show himself incapable of being a true rabbi (Luke 10:25), or to cause him to make self-incriminating statements (Mark 12:15; cf. Luke 23:2).

Very likely Jesus was subject to temptation throughout his ministry (cf. Luke 4:13; 22:28). But the great temptation is the crucial temptation in redemptive history (Matt. 4:1 and parallels). This temptation confronts one with the question, How could the sinless Son of God really be tempted? Granted that appeal could be made to legitimate desires in his human nature, what force could temptation have on a divine person who cannot be tempted? Efforts to solve the problem run the risk either of impairing the “without sin” of Hebrews 4:15 or of making the temptation unreal. Our understanding of the matter is beclouded by the fact that our awareness of being tempted immediately involves us in at least a momentary inclination to yield to the temptation. This was not true of Jesus, and yet the temptation was real, so that “he is able to help those who are being tempted” (Heb. 2:18).

The necessity of the temptation in view of Adam’s fall is evident. Jesus triumphed over Satan with his immediate and obedient use of the Word of God. He thereby proved that he was qualified to be the “last Adam.” For “the reason the Son of God appeared was to destroy the devil’s work” (1 John 3:8). C. G. KROMMINGA

Bibliography. L. Berkhof, Systematic Theology; E. Best, Temptation and the Passion; D. Bonhoeffer, Temptation; W. J. Foxell, Temptation of Jesus; C. S. Lewis, Screwtape Letters; W. Schneider et al., NIDNTT 3:798–811; H. Seesemann, TDNT 6:23–36; R. C. Trench, Synonyms of the New Testament; C. Ullmann, Sinlessness of Jesus.

Tempter. See SATAN.

Ten Articles. (1536). A doctrinal statement resulting from the religious revolution of King Henry VIII of England. After declaring himself supreme head of the English Church in 1534, Henry strove for a middle way between Roman Catholicism and Lutheranism: the English Church would still be catholic but without the pope. This was acceptable to most Englishmen because Henry did not interfere with their traditional Catholic beliefs. There was, however, a small but growing group of insistent Protestant Reformers who were determined to bring Lutheranism into the English Church. Henry did not want to suppress these Reformers, because they were militant defenders of his break with the pope. Unless Henry pronounced ex cathedra on their Protestant notions, however, he risked growing theological ferment in England. Thus, the Ten Articles were issued in 1536.

In deference to his Protestant supporters, Henry’s Ten Articles reduced the number of sacraments from seven to three; denied the efficacy of prayers for souls in purgatory; and condemned religious images, prayers to the saints, and the use of holy water and ashes.

Protestants increasingly demanded more reforms; so in 1539 Henry was forced to issue the Six Articles to restrain them. These essentially prohibited any Protestant reforms beyond the Ten Articles. As a result, Henry was able to maintain a precarious balance between the two theologies for the rest of his reign. J. E. MENNELL

See also SIX ARTICLES.

Bibliography. A. G. Dickens, English Reformation; P. Hughes, Reformation in England.

Ten Commandments. The basic law of the covenant formed between God and Israel at Mount Sinai; though the date of the event is uncertain, the commandments may be dated provisionally in the early part of the thirteenth century B.C. In Hebrew, the commandments are called the “Ten Words,” which (via Greek) is the origin of the alternative English title of the commandments, namely the Decalogue. The commandments are recorded twice in the OT; they appear first in the description of the formation of the Sinai Covenant (Exod. 20:2–17) and are repeated in the description of the renewal of the covenant on the plains of Moab (Deut. 5:6–21).

The commandments are described as having been written on two tablets. Each tablet contained the full text; one tablet belonged to Israel and the other to God, so that both parties to the covenant had a copy of the legislation. The first five commandments pertain basically to the relationship between Israel and God; the last five are concerned primarily with the forms of relationships between human beings.

The commandments must be interpreted initially within the context of the Sinai Covenant, which was in effect the constitution of the state in process of formation during the time of Moses and his successor, Joshua. Because God was the one who enabled Israel to move toward statehood, as a consequence of his liberating the chosen people from slavery in Egypt, he was also to be Israel's true king. As such, he had the authority to establish Israel's law, as is made clear in the preface to the commandments. Thus, the commandments were initially part of a constitution and served as state law of the emerging nation of Israel.

Ten Commandments

The fundamental principle upon which the constitution was established was love. God had chosen his people and freed them from slavery only because he loved them. In turn, he had one fundamental requirement of Israel, that they love God with the totality of their being (Deut. 6:5). This commandment to love is provided with a commentary and explanation. As to how the commandment to love might be fulfilled, the first five commandments indicated the nature of the relationship with God, which would be an expression of love for God. The second five commandments go further and indicate that love for God also has implications for one's relationships with fellow human beings.

The interpretation of the commandments in their initial context is the source of debate; the following comments indicate in broad outline their primary thrust.

1. The Prohibition of Gods Other Than the Lord (Exod. 20:3; Deut. 5:7). The first commandment is in negative form and expressly prohibits the Israelites' engaging in the worship of foreign deities. The significance of the commandment lies in the nature of the covenant. The essence of the covenant was a relationship, and the essence of relationship was to be faithfulness. God's faithfulness to his people had already been demonstrated in the exodus, as is indicated in the preface to the commandments. In turn, God required more than anything else a faithfulness in the relationship of his people with him. Thus, though the commandment is stated negatively, it is full of positive implications. And its position as first of the ten is significant, for this commandment establishes a principle that is particularly prominent in the social commandments. The contemporary significance of the commandment can thus be seen in the context of faithfulness in relationship. At the heart of human life there must be a relationship with God. Anything in life that disrupts the primary relationship breaks the commandment. Foreign "gods" are thus persons, or even things, that would disrupt the primacy of the relationship with God.

2. The Prohibition of Images (Exod. 20:4-6; Deut. 5:8-10). The possibility of worshiping gods other than the Lord has been eliminated in the first commandment. The second commandment prohibits the Israelites from making images of the Lord. To make an image of God in the shape or form of anything in this world, is to reduce the Creator to something less than his creation, and to worship such an image would be false. The temptation for Israel to worship God in the form of an image must have been enormous, for images and idols occurred in all the religions of the ancient Near East. But the God of Israel was a transcendent and infinite being, and could not be reduced to the limitations of an image or form within creation. Any such reduction of God would be so radical a misunderstanding that the "God" so worshiped would no longer be the God of the universe. In the modern world the shape of the temptation has changed. Few are tempted to take tools and shape from wood an image of God, but the commandment is still applicable. One can construct an image of God with words. If we use words about God and say, "This is exactly what God is like, no less" (and, we imply, no more), and if we work out the minute details of our understanding of God, then we are in danger of creating an image of God no less fixed or rigid than the image of wood or stone. Of course, we are not prohibited from using words about God, or religion would become impossible. But if the words become set firmly, like cement, and our understanding of God sets with those words, an image has been constructed. To worship God in the form of a word image is to break the commandment. God is transcendent and infinite, and always greater than any words a creature can use of him. The second commandment thus guards the ultimate greatness and mystery of God.

3. The Prohibition Against the Improper Use of God's Name (Exod. 20:7; Deut. 5:11). There is a popular understanding that the third commandment prohibits bad language or blasphemy; however, it is concerned with a more grave matter—the use of God's name. God had granted to Israel an extraordinary privilege; he had revealed to them his personal name. The name is represented in Hebrew by four letters, yhwh, variously rendered in English Bibles as LORD, Yahweh, or Jehovah. The knowledge of the divine name was a privilege, for it meant that Israel did not worship an anonymous and distant deity, but a being whose personal name was known. Yet the privilege was accompanied by a danger, namely, that the knowledge of God's personal name could be abused. In the ancient Near Eastern religions, magic was a common practice, involving the use of a god's name, which was believed to control the god's power, in certain kinds of activity designed to harness divine power for human purposes. Thus, the kind of activity prohibited by the third commandment is magic, attempting to control God's power through his name for a personal and worthless purpose. God may give but must not be manipulated or controlled. Within Christianity the name of God is equally important. It is in the name of God, e.g., that the privilege of access to God in prayer is granted. The abuse of the privilege of prayer, involving calling upon the name of God for some selfish or worthless purpose, is tantamount to the magic of the ancient world. In both God's name is abused and the third commandment broken. The third commandment is a positive reminder of the enormous privilege given to us in the knowledge of God's name; it is a privilege not to be taken lightly or abused.

4. The Observation of the Sabbath (Exod. 20:8–11; Deut. 5:12–15). This commandment also has no parallels in ancient Near Eastern religions, and it is the first of the commandments to be expressed in a positive form. While most of life in Israel was characterized by work, the seventh day was to be set aside. Work was to cease and the day was to be kept holy. The holiness of the day is related to the reason for its establishment; two reasons are given, and though at first they appear different, there is a common theme linking them. In the first version (Exod. 20:11) the sabbath is to be kept in commemoration of creation; God created the world in six days and rested on the seventh day. In the second version (Deut. 5:15) the sabbath is to be observed in commemoration of the exodus from Egypt. The theme linking the two versions is creation; God created not only the world, he also “created” his people, Israel, in redeeming them from Egyptian slavery. Thus, on every seventh day throughout the passage of time, the Hebrew people were to reflect upon creation; in so doing, they were reflecting upon the meaning of their existence. For most of Christianity the concept of “sabbath” has been moved from the seventh to the first day of the week, Sunday. The move is related to a change in Christian thought, identified in the resurrection of Jesus Christ on Sunday. The change is appropriate, for Christians now reflect each Sunday, or sabbath, on a third act of divine creation, the “new creation” established in the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead.

5. The Honor Due to Parents (Exod. 20:12; Deut. 5:16). The fifth commandment forms a bridge between the first four, concerned primarily with God, and the last five, concerned primarily with interhuman relationships. On first reading it appears to be concerned with family relationships only; children were to honor their parents. Although the commandment establishes a principle of honor, or respect, in family relationships, it is probably also related to a specific concern. It was the responsibility of parents to instruct their children in the faith of the covenant (Deut. 6:7) so that the religion could be passed on from one generation to another. But instruction in the faith required an attitude of honor and respect from those who were being instructed.

Thus, the fifth commandment is not concerned only with family harmony, but also with transmission of faith in God throughout subsequent generations. There is little need to convert the meaning of the fifth commandment into contemporary relevance. In a century, however, in which so much education is undertaken beyond the confines of the family unit, the commandment serves a solemn reminder, not only of the need for harmonious family life, but also of the responsibilities with respect to religious education that rest upon both parents and children.

6. The Prohibition of Murder (Exod. 20:13; Deut. 5:17). The wording of this commandment simply prohibits “killing”; the meaning of the word, however, implies the prohibition of murder. The word used in the commandment is not related primarily to killing in warfare or to capital punishment; both those matters are dealt with in other portions of the Mosaic law. The word could be used to designate both murder and manslaughter. Since manslaughter involves accidental killing, it cannot be sensibly prohibited; it, too, is dealt with in another kind of legislation (Deut. 19:1–13). Thus, the sixth commandment prohibits murder, the taking of another person's life for personal and selfish gain. Stated positively, this preserves for each member of the covenant community the right to live. In the modern world, a similar statute, prohibiting murder, exists in almost all legal codes; it has become a part of state law, rather than purely religious or moral law. Jesus, however, pointed to the deeper meaning implicit in the commandment; it is not only the act but also the sentiment underlying the act that is evil (Matt. 5:21–22).

7. The Prohibition of Adultery (Exod. 20:14; Deut. 5:18). The act of adultery is fundamentally an act of unfaithfulness. One or both persons in an adulterous act are being unfaithful to other persons. It is for this reason that adultery is included in the Ten Commandments, while other sins or crimes pertaining to sexuality are not included. Of all such crimes, the worst signifies unfaithfulness. Thus, the seventh commandment is the social parallel to the first. Just as the first commandment requires absolute faithfulness in the relationship with the one God, so the seventh requires a similar relationship of faithfulness within the covenant of marriage. The relevance is apparent, but again, Jesus points to the implications of the commandment for the mental life (Matt. 5:27–28).

8. The Prohibition of Theft (Exod. 20:15; Deut. 5:19). This commandment establishes a principle within the covenant community concerning possessions and property; a person had a right to certain things, which could not be violated by a fellow citizen for his or her personal advantage. But while the commandment is concerned with property, its most fundamental concern cern is human liberty. The worst form of theft is "manstealing" (somewhat equivalent to modern kidnapping); i.e., taking a person (presumably by force) and selling him or her into slavery. The crime and the related law are stated more fully in Deuteronomy 24:7. The commandment is thus not only concerned with the preservation of private property, but is more fundamentally concerned with the preservation of human liberty and freedom from such things as slavery and exile. It prohibits a person from manipulating or exploiting the lives of others for personal gain. Just as the sixth commandment prohibits murder, so the eighth prohibits what might be called social murder, the cutting off of a man or a woman from a life of freedom within the community of God's people.

Ten Commandments

9. The Prohibition of False Witnessing (Exod. 20:16; Deut. 5:20). The commandment is not a general prohibition against lies or mistruths. The wording of the original commandment sets it firmly in the context of Israel's legal system. It prohibits perjury, the giving of false testimony within the proceedings of the law court. Thus, it establishes a principle of truthfulness and carries implications with respect to false statements in any context.

Within any nation, it is essential that the courts of law operate on the basis of true information; if law is not based on truth and righteousness, then the very foundations of life and liberty are undermined. If legal testimony is true, there can be no miscarriage of justice; if it is false, the most fundamental of human liberties are lost. Thus, the commandment sought to preserve the integrity of Israel's legal system, and it was, at the same time, a guard against encroachments on a person's liberties. The principle is maintained in most modern legal systems; it is evident, e.g., in the taking of an oath before giving evidence in court. But, in the last resort, the commandment points to the essential nature of truthfulness in all interhuman relationships.

10. The Prohibition of Coveting (Exod. 20:17; Deut. 5:21). The tenth commandment is curious in its initial context. It prohibits coveting, or desiring, persons or things belonging to a neighbor (i.e., a fellow Israelite). It is unusual to find such a commandment in a code of criminal law. The first nine commandments prohibited acts, and a criminal act can be followed by prosecution and legal process (if the act is detected). But the tenth commandment, in contrast, prohibits desires, or covetous feelings. Under human law, it is not possible to prosecute on the basis of desire (proof would be impossible!). And yet Hebrew law was more than a human system. There were indeed courts, police officers, judges, and attorneys. But there was also a chief judge, God. The crime involved in the tenth commandment could not be prosecuted within the limitations of the Hebrew system; it was known, nevertheless, by God. The genius of the commandment lies in its therapeutic nature. It is not enough merely to deal with crime once it has been committed; the law must also attempt to attack the roots of crime. The root of almost all evil and crime lies within the self; it lies in the desires of the individual. Therefore, evil desires are prohibited. If the tenth commandment is fully and profoundly understood, then the significance of the first nine is much better understood. If covetous desires are gradually eliminated, then that natural desire that is rooted within each person may be directed more and more toward God.

The Ten Commandments functioned first as a part of the constitutional law of a nation; in Jesus' teaching they became the ethic of the kingdom of God, adding substance and direction to the "first and greatest commandment," that we love God with the totality of our being (Matt. 22:37-38). The commandments as such are not the basis of salvation; rather, to those who have found salvation in the gospel of Jesus Christ, they are a guide toward that fulness of life in which love for God is given rich expression.

P. C. CRAIGIE

See also CIVIL LAW AND JUSTICE IN BIBLE TIMES; LAW, BIBLICAL CONCEPT OF.

Bibliography. R. Brooks, Spirit of the Ten Commandments: Shattering Rabbinic Legalism; W. Harrelson, Ten Commandments and Human Rights; E. Nielsen, Ten Commandments in New Perspective; A. Phillips, Ancient Israel's Criminal Law; New Approach to the Decalogue; J. J. Stamm and M. E. Andrew, Ten Commandments in Recent Research.

Tennant, Frederick Robert (1866-1957). One of the major figures in British theology during the first half of the twentieth century. He began his career as a scientist but was drawn into the issue of the verification of Christianity through the attacks on the faith by Thomas Henry Huxley (1825-95) and others. Tennant was educated at Cambridge and spent his academic career as a fellow of Trinity College and university lecturer in the philosophy of religion from 1913 until his retirement in 1938.

Tennant contributed works in theology in the areas of sin and miracles. During the first third of the twentieth century when the prevailing liberal theology did not treat the doctrine of sin in a major way, Tennant produced three works on the subject: Origin and Propagation of Sin (1902), Sources of the Doctrine of the Fall and Original Sin (1903), and Concept of Sin (1912). In 1925 his Miracle and Its Philosophical Presuppositions was published. Tennant's Philosophy of the Sciences (1932) arose from his Tarnier Lectures at Cambridge, a lectureship usually reserved for experts in the philosophy of science. His greatest work was his two-volume Philosophical Theology (1928/1930) in which he argued that there is a theistic worldview that can be shown to be more reasonable than other interpretations of reality and more congruent with the knowledge by which life and science is guided. His Nature of Belief was published in 1943.

Tennant's philosophical and apologetic works were based solidly in the British empirical tradition. He rejected the efforts of rationalism, religious a priorism, and revelation to provide the groundwork for belief in God and religious faith. Instead, belief should be constructed in the same general way as are the laws of science. Tennant began with religious experience at its most basic level and then examined psychologically how this experience develops and the new elements added to it. The two most basic notions on which all religion rests are the soul and God. Tennant's argument for God's existence, dependent heavily on natural theology, stemmed from what he called the wider or cosmic teleology. He advanced upon views of the "argument from design" as formulated by William Paley by maintaining that the complexity of life is so great that the appearance of life in itself points one beyond the thought that mere chance or blind force alone is at work in the universe. For Tennant, theology is the final link in a chain of belief that begins with interpretations of empirical data. Theistic belief is a continuation of the curve of knowledge constructed by natural science and is built upon the hypotheses of these sciences. Metaphysics and science should not be separated according to Tennant, for "science and theism spring from a common root."

Tennant's writings on the doctrine of sin exhibit an attack on the traditional Christian view of original sin as the source of sin and the cause of its universality. He stressed the concept of responsibility. His argument was that any inherited bias toward sin as being prior to one's own volitional choices cannot be sin since one cannot rightly be held responsible for it and thus is not guilty. Sin should be seen only as disobedience to the moral law that the sinner understands at the moment of sinning. For this one can properly be held morally accountable. Tennant rejected as too harsh and unbalanced the description of sin as enmity toward God as well as the Augustinian view of humanity's corrupt moral condition. Rather, sin for Tennant was imperfect compliance with the moral ideal. It occurs when one has made a choice for something of lower ethical worth when one could have chosen for something of higher ethical worth. D. K. McKIM

Bibliography. P. A. Bertocci, Empirical Argument for God in Late British Theology; C. D. Broad, "Frederick Robert Tennant, 1866–1957," PBA 44; J. O. Buswell, Philosophies of F. R. Tennant and John Dewey; B. Ramm, Varieties of Christian Apologetics; D. L. Scudder, Tennant's Philosophical Theology; N. Smart, "F. R. Tennant and the Problem of Evil," in Philosophers and Religious Truth.

Teresa of Ávila (1515–1582). Spanish mystic, born Teresa de Cepeda y Ahumada at Ávila on March 28, 1515. Teresa's stepmother died when Teresa was thirteen years of age. Three years later, upon the marriage of her oldest sister, she was sent to the Augustinian convent in Ávila, but illness forced her to leave. After a prolonged spiritual struggle, accompanied by poor health, she entered the Carmelite Convent of the Incarnation at Ávila on November 2, 1535. Here she was treated with deference because of her personality and family status. In 1555, however, her spiritual pilgrimage took a more serious turn. This second conversion, as it is sometimes called, was marked by "mental prayer" and ecstatic visions. Some of her spiritual advisors thought her visions were diabolical, but others reassured her that they were, indeed, from the Lord. She found support from the Jesuits, particularly her father confessor, Baltsasar Álvarez. In 1559 Teresa reported a remarkable vision known as the "transverberation of her heart," in which an angel with a fire-tipped lance pierced her heart. Growing increasingly disillusioned with her own Carmelite order, Teresa felt compelled to launch a reform movement with Carmelite nuns who would follow an austere rule. Her plans met with stiff resistance from a number of sources, including the city of Ávila. Wealthy friends, however, offered their support. In spite of stout opposition, Teresa sought and found approval from Pope Paul IV. Her convent was to be small, numbering no more than thirteen, following the rule prepared by Fray Hugo in 1248. Thus, on August 24, 1562, the resolute nun founded the convent of Discalced ("barefoot") Carmelite Nuns of the Primitive Rule of St. Joseph. After a visit by the General of the Carmelites, she was encouraged in her work and given permission to form other houses of the Discalced Carmelites, not only for nuns, but for monks also. With the backing of Philip II, she managed to escape the Inquisition and spent the remainder of her life establishing new convents all over Spain.

Teresa was a remarkable person, combining mystic contemplation and a fervent activism with a literary career. She wrote two autobiographical works, the Life and the Book of Foundations, and two other books for her nuns, Way of Perfection and Interior Castle. Her conviction was that contemplation should lead to action, not lethargy. In spite of a frail body, beset by continuing bouts of illness, she became the personification of this conviction. Teresa was canonized by Gregory XV in 1622. W. R. ESTEP JR.

See also MYSTICISM.

Teresa of Ávila

Bibliography. S. Clissold, St. Teresa of Ávila; J. M. Cohen, Life of Saint Teresa; E. W. T. Dicken, Crucible of Love: A Study of the Mysticism of St. Teresa of Jesus and St. John of the Cross; E. A. Peers, Handbook to the Life and Times of St. Teresa and St. John of the Cross; Mother of Carmel: A Portrait of St. Teresa of Jesus; St. Teresa of Jesus and Other Essays and Addresses; "Teresa of Jesus, Saint," Catholic Encyclopedia.

Terminism. The doctrine that God has eternally determined a time limit (terminus) in the life of the individual after which he no longer wills the conversion and salvation of that person. After that time the individual may no longer repent and come to faith. Terminism was a doctrine of some pietists and therefore went along with the idea of human free will in spiritual matters.

The difference between strict terminism and other doctrines is that the time limit is set by God, not by the individual's hardening his or her own heart. Terminism is also not a matter of the sin against the Holy Spirit. Different theologians may have combined these elements with terminism in varying ways. Pietism in general was not characterized by a high degree of doctrinal unanimity.

As expressed by the pietist J. C. Boese (d. 1700), terminism led to a controversy between the pietists and the orthodox Lutherans in the late seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries. Terminism is best considered a peculiar point of historic pietism, though a similar idea has been held by some Quakers.

In the history of philosophy, terminism is sometimes used to refer to nominalism.

J. M. DRICKAMER

See also PIETISM.

Territorialism. The claim that the ruler of a country has a natural right to fix the type of state church and to control the ecclesiastical affairs of his or her people. It is based on the theories of Hugo Grotius (1583–1645) and Christian Thomasius (1655–1725), and rests on the idea that the state has its origins in the natural right of the people to form a society and then to form a church in that society. Thus, the state being primary in idea and time has power over the church, a power usually exercised through its ruler.

In practice territorialism means much the same as the earlier principle of cuius regio, eius religio ("in the prince's country, the prince's religion"), which was adopted as the formula of the Peace of Augsburg in 1555. It is best to compare and contrast it with collegialism, however, with which it shares common ideas. The differences lie in the degree of power of the state over the church; territorialism draws the lines wider than does collegialism. This kind of thinking was important in Europe from the seventeenth to the nineteenth centuries.

P. TOON

See also COLLEGIALISM; GROTIUS, HUGO.

Tertullian (ca. 155–220). An early Latin father of the church. He was born Quintus Septimus Florens Tertullianus at Carthage in modern Tunisia. The son of pagan parents, he was sent to Rome to study law. There he was converted to Christianity and rejected his licentious mode of life. Returning to Carthage, he gave himself passionately to the propagation and defense of the gospel. Ultimately disenchanted with the laxity of the Roman Church, he broke away and espoused the rigorous asceticism and enthusiasm of Montanism.

A man of vast erudition, he employed the classical rhetorical arts and freely cited Greek and Latin authors, although he disclaimed a reliance on Greek philosophy. Increasingly, he wrote in the Latin vernacular and became the first great Latin church father. He set the concepts of Scripture in new language, and much of his terminology became normative in the theological discussions of the Western church. He was peculiarly apt at pithy sayings, the most famous of which is, "The blood of Christians is the seed of the church." It was Tertullian who coined the term "Trinity." His postulation that the Godhead was "one substance consisting in three persons" helped spare the West much of the bitter christological controversy that raged in the Eastern church.

Tertullian's view of original sin was also to influence Western theology profoundly. Probably because of his early Stoic training, Tertullian held that the soul was actually material and that both body and soul were procreated simultaneously by an individual's parents. The inclination to sin was thus transmitted from Adam to successive generations of progeny.

There are thirty-odd extant treatises by Tertullian. His Apology, addressed to Roman magistrates, defends Christians against slanderous charges and demands for them the same due process of law afforded to other citizens of the empire. Other works deal with practical aspects of Christian living, vindications of Montanism, the failings of early Catholicism, and polemic arguments against the heathen and heretics. These latter writings contained powerful and innovative expressions of Christian dogma that came to be regarded as definitive for orthodoxy. His Against Praxeas was famed in particular for its affirmation that Jesus Christ had two natures joined in one person.

R. C. KROEGER AND C. C. KROEGER

See also MONTANISM.

Bibliography. T. D. Barnes, Tertullian: A Historical and Literary Study; G. L. Bray, Holiness and the Will of God: Perspectives on the Theology of Tertullian; J. Morgan, Importance of Tertullian in the Development of Christian Dogma; R. A. Norris Jr., God and World in Early Christian Thought; T. P. O'Malley, Tertullian and the Bible; J. Quasten, Patrology; R. E. Roberts, Theology of Tertullian; C. de L. Shoritt, Influence of Philosophy on the Mind of Tertullian; R. D. Sider, Ancient Rhetoric and the Art of Tertullian; B. B. Warfield, Studies in Tertullian and Augustine.

Testament. The biblical term derived from the Latin testamentum. It was used in Jerome's Vulgate to render the Hebrew bērit, "covenant," in a few instances, as in Numbers 14:44, and the Greek diathēkē, as in 2 Corinthians 3:14. Since Tertullian's time it has been used to designate the two main divisions of Holy Scripture—the Old Testament and the New. This represents the literary use of the word.

As used in biblical theology, the term may denote the era from the arrangement given through Moses (Exod. 19:5–8; Jer. 31:32; Heb. 8:9) to the death of Christ. This is the old testament, or covenant, in contrast to the new, which began legally with the death of Christ, as may be inferred from Luke 22:20 and 1 Corinthians 11:25.

The KJV uses the term "testament" as well as "covenant" for the Hebrew and Greek originals bērit and diathēkē. The Roman testament, in order to go into effect, required "the death of the testator" (see above), but this was not necessarily so in Semitic practice, as is illustrated in the parable of the prodigal son and elsewhere.

The old testament or covenant had its tabernacle or temple and its ceremonial and civil laws, but when the death of Jesus introduced the new testament or covenant, these provisions of the old order became antiquated and were "nigh unto vanishing away." In fact, in A.D. 70 the temple did vanish away with the destruction of Jerusalem. Meanwhile, the moral law of the Ten Commandments, written in the old testament "on tablets of stone" but in the new testament "on tablets of human hearts" (2 Cor. 3:3; cf. v. 6), still stands and abides. M. J. WYNGAARDEN

See also COVENANT.

Bibliography. L. Berkhof, Systematic Theology; L. S. Chafer, Systematic Theology; G. Vos, Biblical Theology; M. J. Wyngaarden, Future of the Kingdom.

Testimonium Spiritus Sancti Internum. See INTERNAL TESTIMONY OF THE HOLY SPIRIT.

Testimony. See WITNESS, WITNESSING.

Tetragrammaton. The designation for the four (tetra) letters (grammata) in the Hebrew Bible for the name of the God of Israel, yhwh. The name was God's particular revelation to Moses and the Israelites (Exod. 6:2–3). It signifies that the God of Israel, unlike pagan deities, is present with his people to deliver them, to fulfill his promises to them, and to grant them his blessings. The pronunciation of the tetragrammaton yhwh was lost when the Jews avoided its usage for fear of desecrating the holy name (cf. Exod. 20:7). In OT times the name was pronounced and was at times used in theophoric names, which can be recognized in our Bibles by the prefixes Jo- or Jeho- (cf. Jonathan and Jehoiada) and the suffix -jah (Adonijah). The pronunciation fell into disuse after the exile, when the Jews began to pay careful attention to the practice of the law. The translators of the Septuagint consistently avoided the name and substituted the title Kyrios ("Lord"). This reflects the Jewish practice of reading Adonai (Heb. 'ādōnāy) "Lord" for yhwh or reading Elohim (Heb. 'ēlōhīm) in place of the Hebrew compound yhwh 'ādōnāy to avoid the duplication of 'ādōnāy. The vowels of 'ādōnāy (ā-ō-ā) were placed under the tetragrammaton to remind readers that they were not to pronounce yhwh but instead were to read the word as 'ādōnāy. Christians who were unaware of this substitution read the vowels as if they actually belonged to yhwh, which resulted in the English form "YeHoWaH" or "JeHoVaH" (the ā of 'ādōnāy having been reduced to ē under the y of yhwh). The ASV of 1901 adopted the practice of using the name "Jehovah," whereas most English versions continued the established practice of translating the tetragrammaton by LORD (capital letters) to distinguish it from "Lord" (Adonai). Many scholars accept the widely held opinion that the tetragrammaton is a form of the root hyh ("be") and should be pronounced as "Yahweh" ("He who brings into being"; cf. Exod. 3:12, "I will be with you" and "I AM WHO I AM," v. 14). Regardless of the editorial decision of substituting LORD for yhwh or of using the divine name "Yahweh," the reader must keep in mind that LORD, Yahweh, or yhwh is the name of God that he revealed to his ancient people. In reading the text of the OT, one should develop a feeling for the usage of the name itself over against such usages as "God" or "Lord" (Exod. 3:15; 6:3; Pss. 102:16, 22; 113:1; 135:1–6; 148:5, 13). The Messiah has a name, Jesus, so the God of the OT has revealed himself by a name, yhwh; and a blessing is lost when no attention is paid to the difference in usage of a title and the actual name of the God of Israel.

Let them praise the name of the LORD, for his name alone is exalted;
his splendor is above the earth and the heavens.

Psalms 148:13

W. A. VAN GEMEREN

See also GOD, NAMES OF.

Bibliography. M. Reisel, Mysterious Name of Y.H.W.H.

Tetrapolitan Confession (1530). A conciliatory gesture, the confession was composed during the Diet of Augsburg by Martin Bucer and Wolfgang Capito. Both men sought to effect a conclusion to the bitter animosities between Lutheranism and Zwinglianism. Bucer, originally drawn powerfully to Luther's teachings, later moved toward Zwingli's position emphasizing the crucial work of the Holy Spirit to guide the believer into truth; also, he came to embrace a more symbolic interpretation of the Lord's Supper: the humanity of Christ is in heaven, but the sacrament remains nonetheless a means of grace. At the Diet of Augsburg (1530), Capito, who shared a tolerance toward the left-wing Reformers, joined Bucer in penning the confession on behalf of the four southern German cities, Strasbourg, Constance, Memmingen, and Lindau (i.e., four cities = tetrapolitan), not represented at the Diet of Augsburg.

The confession's structure parallels the twenty-three chapters of the Augsburg Confession, but it attempts to provide a compromise treatment of the Lord's Supper (ch. 18) that might hold the Lutheran and Reformed sacramental theories in working tension. As a theological formula it failed in its attempts to gain a Protestant and evangelical union.

P. A. MICKEY

See also BUCER, MARTIN; CAPITO, WOLFGANG FABRICIUS; CONFESSIONS OF FAITH.

Bibliography. A. C. Cochrane, ed., Reformed Confessions of the 16th Century; P. Schaff, Creeks of Christendom; D. Steinmetz, Reformers in the Wings.

Textual Criticism and Theology. The task of textual criticism is to determine which variant readings in the ancient manuscripts most likely preserve the original wording and then reconstruct a text that best represents the autographs. Since textual criticism has generally been the work of paleographers, lexicographers, and specialized text critics, it is generally considered a nontheological discipline. There are, however, three areas of textual criticism that pertain to theology and/or have been affected by theology. The first involves one's view on the sovereignty of God with respect to preserving the integrity of the NT text and/or the sovereignty of God in recovering the text. Another issue emerges from this: it pertains to one's view concerning which text of the Greek NT can be trusted as best representing the original word of God. The third issue pertains to scribal alterations of the text that were motivated by theological concerns.

The Sovereignty of God in Preserving the Text or Recovering the Text. This is a debate that has not been labeled but is nonetheless real. Some Christians believe the Textus Receptus (TR) must be the best representation of the original text because they can't believe that God would have allowed the Christian church to use a textually corrupt version for hundreds of years (see article). Other Christians recognize that the original text did become marred throughout the process of textual transmission but has been undergoing a process of recovery through the discovery of earlier and better manuscripts. These Christians view this recovery as being that which God has prompted and directed. Of course, there are others who believe neither in an original text nor the recovery of it, but such people are usually those who also don't believe in God's involvement with the Word—either in its inception or preservation.

In recent years those who argue for the superiority of the TR call it by a different name—"the Majority Text"—because the majority of manuscripts, being Byzantine, usually support the TR, which was based on a few Byzantine manuscripts. These scholars contend that since the majority of manuscripts support the TR, this is the text that was affirmed by the church throughout the ages and therefore must be the right one. But most textual scholars today recognize that this is an erroneous view because the early church fathers (second to third century) did not quote a text anything like the TR and because most of the early manuscripts are vastly different from the TR in significant ways. Thus, most contemporary scholars contend that a minority of manuscripts—primarily the earliest ones—preserve the earliest, most authentic wording of the text. These same scholars attribute this preservation to a recovery.

The Alexandrian Christians were probably the first ones to attempt a recovery of the original wording of the Greek NT. From the second century to the fourth century, the Alexandrian scribes worked to purify the text from textual corruption. This is best exemplified in manuscripts such as -66 (corrected) and -75. The Alexandrian type of text was perpetuated century after century in a few manuscripts, such as $\hat{\text{O}}$ and B (fourth century), T (fifth century), L (eighth century), 33 (ninth century), 1739 (a tenth-century manuscript copied from a fourth-century Alexandrian manuscript much like B) and 579 (thirteenth century). Unfortunately, most of the Alexandrian type manuscripts disappeared for centuries—awaiting discovery fourteen centuries later.

Beginning in the fourth and fifth centuries, most Christians read Latin versions or other translations of the NT; very few read Greek. But those in the Greek-speaking churches in Greece and Byzantium continued to make copies of the Greek text, which were based on the recension produced by Lucian of Antioch. For century after century—from the sixth to the fourteenth—the great majority of NT manuscripts were produced in Byzantium, all bearing the same kind of text. This text, found in the majority of manuscripts as well as in the TR, doesn't preserve the original text; it preserves Lucian's recension. The copies that preserve a purer form of the original text are the early Alexandrian manuscripts, such as $\mathfrak{P}1$, $\mathfrak{P}4/64/67$, $\mathfrak{P}13$, $\mathfrak{P}39$, $\mathfrak{P}46$, $\mathfrak{P}66$, $\mathfrak{P}75$, $\mathfrak{P}77$, Aleph, and B—all of which have been discovered in the past 150 years. Thus, a Christian can still believe that God preserved the original text but that it took a recovery of various ancient manuscripts to manifest his sovereignty over the situation.

Which Greek Text Can Be Trusted as Being God's Word? Since the original compositions of the various NT books are not extant, we must rely on copies for recovering the original text. NT scholars have a great advantage over classical scholars in the number of manuscripts available to them. According to a current tabulation, there are 98 papyrus manuscripts, 257 uncial manuscripts, and 2,795 minuscule manuscripts (see Aland 1988:96–101, 105, 128—with an update on papyrus count). Metzger (1982:54) adds 2,209 Greek lectionaries to this list. Therefore, we have over 5,350 manuscript copies of the Greek NT or portions thereof. Homer's Iliad, the greatest of all Greek classical works, is extant in about 650 manuscripts; and Euripides' tragedies exist in about 330 manuscripts. The numbers on all the other works of Greek literature are far less. Furthermore, it must be said that the gap in time between the original composition and the next surviving manuscript is far less for the NT than for any other work in Greek literature. The lapse for most classical Greek works is about eight hundred to a thousand years, whereas the lapse for many books in the NT is around one hundred years.

Therefore, NT textual critics have been able to use these manuscripts to reconstruct a text of the NT. This work began in the early eighteenth century, spurred on by the labors of such men as Mill and Bengel, and was intensified in the nineteenth by the work of such men as Tischendorf, Tregelles, Westcott, and Hort. In the beginning of the twentieth century, Eberhard Nestle used the best editions of the Greek NT produced in the nineteenth century to compile a text that represented the majority consensus. The work of making new editions was carried on by his son for several years, and then by Kurt and Barbara Aland. After the United Bible Societies had published two editions of the Greek New Testament, they decided to unite with the work being done on a new edition of the Nestle-Aland text—and so produce two volumes containing virtually the same text: the United Bible Societies' third edition of the Greek New Testament and the Nestle-Aland twenty-sixth edition of Novum Testamentum Graece. In 1993 a fourth edition of the Greek New Testament was printed, and in 1994 the twenty-seventh edition of Novum Testamentum Graece was released. The text was not changed in either volume, but the critical apparatus was greatly revised.

In their book, Text of the New Testament, Kurt and Barbara Aland argue for the position that the Nestle-Aland text "comes closer to the original text of the New Testament than did Tischendorf or Westcott and Hort" (32). Very few scholars will argue with this, though many will contend that the Nestle-Aland text could come even closer to representing the original text if it had been produced by a more consistent documentary approach. Nonetheless, the Nestle-Aland edition is a far better representation of the original text than is the TR or the Majority Text. This does not mean, however, that those who read the TR are receiving a "different gospel" or a different theology than what is found in the Nestle-Aland text. What it does mean is that they are reading a text that—for the most part—was not read in the first three centuries of the church. They are reading a text that is heavily edited with interpolations and harmonizations (few of which alter Christian doctrine), and they are reading a text that is somewhat misrepresentative in Christology (see below).

Theological Changes in the Greek Text. Most of the significant theological differences between the TR and modern critical editions of the Greek text pertain to issues of Christology, especially as reflected in titles or descriptions of Christ. Several significant examples demonstrate this, as the following chart shows. (The first reading is that found in the TR; the second in the Nestle-Aland text.)

Textus Receptus

Matthew 24:36
of that day and hour, no one knows, not even the angels of heaven, but my Father only (The TR doesn't include "the Son" to avoid indicating that he didn't know the timing of the eschaton.)

Luke 4:41
You are the Christ, the Son of God

Nestle-Aland

of that day and hour, no one knows, not even the angels of heaven nor the Son, but my Father only

You are the Son of God

Continued

Textual Criticism and Theology

Textus Receptus	Nestle-Aland
Luke 9:35 This is my beloved Son	This is my Son, the Chosen One
John 1:18 the only begotten Son	and only begotten, God
John 6:69 You are the Christ, the Son of the living God	You are the Holy One of God
Acts 3:20 Jesus Christ, who was preached to you before	Christ Jesus, who was ordained for you before
Acts 16:7 the Spirit did not permit them (The TR misses out on a unique title that unites Jesus and the Spirit: “the Spirit of Jesus.”)	the Spirit of Jesus did not permit them
Colossians 2:2 the mystery of God, both of the Father and of Christ (The TR obscures the fact that Christ is God’s mystery revealed.)	the mystery of God, Christ
1 Timothy 3:16 Great is the mystery of godliness: God was manifest in the flesh (The TR obscures the fact that the incarnate Christ is the mystery of godliness.)	Great is the mystery of godliness: who [referring to Christ] was manifest in the flesh
1 Peter 3:15 Sanctify the Lord God in your hearts	Sanctify Christ in your hearts
Jude 4 deny the only Lord God and our Lord Jesus Christ	deny our only Master and [or, even] our Lord Jesus Christ

Readers of the TR miss out on some significant statements about Christ: he is “the Chosen One”; “the only begotten, God”; “the Holy One of God”; the one “ordained for us”; “the mystery of God”; “the mystery of godliness”; the sanctifier of our hearts; and “our only Master and Lord.” There are far more examples than these, but these are enough to show that the difference between the two texts is theologically significant.

The other primary difference between the TR and modern critical editions is that the TR includes several passages that are considered spurious by most contemporary scholars. These additions in the TR are found in the following verses: Matthew 5:44; 6:13; 16:2b–3; 20:16; 20:22–23; 25:13; 27:35; Mark 9:49; 10:7, 21, 24; 14:68; Luke 4:4; 8:43; 9:54–56; 11:2–4, 11; 22:19–20, 43–44; 24:42; Acts 28:16; Romans 16:24, 25–27; 1 Corinthians 11:24. And then there are entire verses that are excluded in the Nestle-Aland text but included in the TR: Matthew 17:21; 18:11; 23:14; Mark 7:16; 9:44, 46; 11:26; 15:28; Luke 17:36; 23:17; John 5:3b–4; Acts 8:37; 15:34; 24:6b–8a; 28:29. Two other longer passages are also considered spurious by many contemporary scholars: the longer ending to Mark (16:9–20) and the story of the woman caught in adultery (John 7:53–8:11). These are included in the TR and in the Nestle-Aland text but are set off with double brackets to signal spuriousness.

The key theological issue pertaining to these passages concerns their right to be considered “Scripture.” If they are clearly scribal additions, then they cannot be considered part of the original text and therefore must not be treated on the same par as divinely inspired Scripture. As such, we must beware of forming doctrines based on any of these passages.

P. W. COMFORT

See also TEXTUS RECEPTUS; WESTCOTT, BROOKE FOSS.

Bibliography. B. Aland, K. Aland, J. Karavidopoulos, C. Martini, and B. Metzger, Greek New Testament; K. Aland and B. Aland, Text of the New Testament; K. Aland, M. Black, C. Martini, B. Metzger, and A. Wikgren, Novum Testamentum Graece; P. Comfort, Early Manuscripts and Modern Translations of the New Testament; B. Ehrman, Orthodox Corruption of Scripture; B. Metzger, Text of the New Testament; J. R. White, King James Only Controversy.

Textus Receptus. The Textus Receptus (TR) has its roots in the early fourth century. According to Jerome (see his introduction to his Latin translation of the Gospels), Lucian of Antioch produced an edited version of the Greek NT. Lucian’s text was a definite recension (i.e., a purposely created edition)—as opposed to the Alexandrian text-type that came about as the result of a process wherein the Alexandrian scribes, upon comparing many manuscripts, attempted to preserve the best text—thereby serving more as textual critics than editors. The Lucianic text is characterized by smoothness of language, which is achieved by the removal of obscurities and awkward grammatical constructions, by harmonization, and by the conflation of variant readings.

Lucian's text was produced prior to the Diocletian persecution (ca. 303), during which time many copies of the NT were confiscated and destroyed. Not long after this period of devastation, Constantine came to power and then recognized Christianity as the state religion. There was, of course, a great need for copies of the NT to be made and distributed to churches throughout the Mediterranean world. It was at this time that Lucian's text began to be propagated by bishops going out from the Antiochan school to churches throughout the East taking the text with them. Lucian's text soon became the standard text of the Eastern church and formed the basis for the Byzantine text. For century after century—from the sixth to the fourteenth—the great majority of NT manuscripts were produced in Byzantium, all bearing the same kind of text. When the first Greek NT was printed (ca. 1525), it was based on a Greek text that Erasmus had compiled, using a few late Byzantine manuscripts. This text then went through a few more revisions by Robert Stephanus and then Theodore Beza. Beza's text was then published by the Elzevir brothers in 1624, with a second edition in 1633. They announced in this edition that it contained "the text which is now received by all, in which we give nothing changed or corrupted." As such, the name "textus receptus" became a descriptor of this form of the Greek NT text.

Both Luther and Tyndale used the same Greek text (the one compiled by Erasmus in 1516) in making their translations. Luther completed his work in the 1520s. Tyndale completed his translation of the NT in 1525. The translators of the King James Version (1611) also used the TR in their work on the NT. The KJV became the most popular English translation in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. But after the King James Version was published, earlier manuscripts were discovered, which began to show deficiencies with the TR. Around 1630, Codex Alexandrinus (dated ca. 400) was brought to England. Two hundred years later, a German scholar named Constantin von Tischendorf discovered Codex Sinaiticus in St. Catherine's Monastery located near Mount Sinai. The manuscript, dated 350, is one of the two oldest vellum manuscripts of the Greek NT. The earliest vellum manuscript, Codex Vaticanus, had been in the Vatican's library since at least 1481, but it was not made available to scholars until the middle of the nineteenth century. This manuscript, dated slightly earlier (ca. 325) than Codex Sinaiticus, has both the Old and New Testaments in Greek.

As the various manuscripts were discovered and made public, certain scholars labored to compile a Greek text that would more closely represent the original text than did the TR. Around 1700 John Mill produced an improved TR, and in the 1730s Johannes Albrecht Bengel published a text of the TR with appended notes displaying superior readings. In the 1800s certain scholars began to abandon the TR. Karl Lachman, a classical philologist, produced a fresh text in 1831 that represented the fourth-century manuscripts. Samuel Tregelles published a Greek text (1852–72), in which he sought "to exhibit the text of the New Testament in the very words in which it has been transmitted on the evidence of ancient authority" (prolegomena to Tregelles' Greek New Testament). During this same era, Constantine von Tischendorf discovered Codex Sinaiticus, deciphered the palimpsest Codex Ephraemi Rescriptus, collated countless manuscripts, and produced several editions of the Greek NT (the eighth edition is the best).

All these men worked to produce a text that was much closer to the original than what was printed in the TR. Of course, some scholars strongly resisted this movement to return to earlier manuscripts because they considered it an attack on a text that had become "the standard" in the Christian church. Dean Burgon launched vehement assaults on Codex Vaticanus and Codex Sinaiticus and on those who upheld their value. Scrivener (a scholar who published the transcription of twenty manuscripts, produced a list of all extant manuscripts, and created a system for classifying manuscripts) was an enthusiastic supporter of the Textus Receptus. He opposed the text produced by Westcott and Hort but did not gain a following among biblical scholars.

The unfavorable opinion toward the TR was solidified by the work of two British scholars, B. F. Westcott and F. J. A. Hort, who produced a volume entitled New Testament in the Original Greek (1881). Along with this publication, they made known their theory that Codex Vaticanus and Codex Sinaiticus, along with a few other early manuscripts, represented a text that most closely replicates the original writing. They called this text the Neutral Text. (The Neutral Text described certain manuscripts that had the least amount of textual corruption.)

Since Westcott and Hort, very few scholars have upheld the value of the Textus Receptus. Those who have done so in recent years call it by a different name—"the Majority Text"—insofar as the majority of manuscripts usually support the TR. These scholars typically argue that, since the majority of manuscripts support the TR, this is the text that was affirmed by the church throughout the ages and therefore must be the right one.

Textus Receptus

However, most textual critics agree that manuscripts must be weighed (as to their intrinsic value) and not counted.

P. W. COMFORT

See also TEXTUAL CRITICISM AND THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. K. Aland, "The Text of the Church?" TJ 8:131–44; P. Comfort, Quest for the Original Text of the New Testament; A. Farstad and Z. Hodges, Greek New Testament according to the Majority Text; B. Metzger, Text of the New Testament; S. P. Tregelles, Greek New Testament; B. F. Westcott and F. J. A. Hort, New Testament in the Original Greek.

Thank Offering. See OFFERINGS AND SACRIFICES IN BIBLE TIMES.

Theism. Literally, belief in the existence of God. Though the concept seems to be as old as philosophy, the term itself appears to be of relatively recent origin. Some have suggested that it appeared in the seventeenth century in England to take the place of such words as "deism" and "deistic" when referring to belief in God. "Theism" is often used as the opposite of "atheism," the term for denial of the existence of God, and distinguishes a theist from an atheist or agnostic without attempting any technical philosophical or theological connection. The term is also used as a label for religious believers, though again, there is no attempt to imply a particular theological or philosophical position. Finally, the term is used to denote certain philosophical or theological positions, regardless of whether this involves a religious relationship to the God of whom individuals speak.

God as Ultimate Reference Point. In its broadest sense theism denotes a belief in some ultimate reference point that gives meaning and unity to everything. However, the God postulated in this sense is totally depersonalized and thoroughly transcendent, almost an abstract concept. Certain philosophical and theological positions seem to use "God" and "theism" in this way.

1. Paul Tillich's concept of theism is that God is whatever becomes a matter of ultimate concern, something that determines our being or nonbeing. Consequently, God is identified by Tillich as the ground of all being, or being-itself. While being-itself is certainly objective and not a mere creation of the mind, Tillich's God is totally depersonalized and abstract. This is demonstrated by Tillich's claim that the only nonsymbolic statement one can make about God is that he is being-itself or the ground of being. All words traditionally used to denote the attributes of God are entirely symbolic.

2. This broad sense of theism is also found in Hegel, who actually has several concepts of God, but at least one that fits this category. In Hegel's thought, one concept is that God is equivalent to the infinite. Philosophy, he says, rises to divinity or a divine viewpoint. Here "God" seems to be equivalent to transcendent, all-encompassing thought, but is not a personal God.

God as Immanent. A narrower concept of theism sees God also as depersonalized and as the ultimate reference point, but gives God some kind of concrete manifestation. Nevertheless, the God of such theistic views is entirely immanent.

One example is pantheism, the view that everything is God. The most famous philosophical form is that of Spinoza, who held there is only one substance in the universe—God. Consequently, everything is merely a mode of that one substance. Such a God is not abstract but immanent.

By contrast, the biblical concept speaks of God as infinite, meaning, among other things, that God has being to an infinite degree, but not to an infinite amount, a view that is qualitative but not quantitative being. Scripture further teaches that God is everywhere simultaneously (immensity) and is present at every spatial location in the totality of his being (omnipresence), i.e., God is present at but not as every point in space.

The broad difference between the pantheistic and biblical concepts on these matters is that the pantheist thinks God is present not only at every point in space but as every point. Furthermore, pantheism denies omnipresence, since the totality of God's being is present in no one place.

Another example of this concept is process theism, based on the process metaphysics of Alfred North Whitehead (Process and Reality), sometimes known as bipolar or dipolar theism. Some of the better-known process theologians are Charles Hartshorne, Schubert Ogden, John Cobb, and David Griffin. According to this school, there are in God two poles: a primordial, eternal, potential pole, and a temporal, consequent, actual pole. In addition, there are certain eternal objects that may ingress into the world to become actual entities. Such eternal objects are pure potentials and, as such, cannot order and relate themselves as actual entities can. To order these eternal entities some nontemporal actual entity is needed, and this is God in his primordial nature. Here God is like a backstage director who lines up the forms, getting them ready to ingress onto the stage of the temporal world. However, God's primordial nature should not be seen as distinct from the order of eternal objects, which means the order is his primordial nature. Consequently, God is not a creator before creation, but with it in its concrescence at its very beginning. In his primordial pole, God is the principle of concreteness, and this entirely depersonalizes God and makes him finite.

The same is true for God in his actual pole. According to bipolar theism, every actual entity (and God is perceived as such) needs a physical pole to complete the "vision" of its potential pole.

The consequent nature of God, then, refers to all the entities in being in the temporal order. Given such a view, God can change and develop as his temporal pole does, and he is clearly finite. Moreover, God in his actual pole can perish, since all actual things can perish. In such a concept God is not the creator of the world, but rather the director of a world process. He is interdependent in the sense of being mutually dependent. Moreover, he does not have all perfections eternally and concurrently, but attains them successively and endlessly.

A final example of this form of theism is found in Hegel's conception of God as Spirit. This notion of Spirit does not allow God to be a person in the Judeo-Christian sense, but sees him as a force, or general consciousness, uniting all finite consciousness. In other words, he is not just all finite consciousnesses taken together, but rather the force that underlies and unites all intersubjectivity. Such a God is clearly immanent and not personal.

God as Personal. A third sense of theism is that God is not an abstract concept nor even a concrete manifestation of some depersonalized idea. In this sense, the concept of God does take on personhood, though this is not to suggest that in all forms of this view God has interactions with persons. Despite the fact that such a God is an individual object (rather than a compilation of objects), he is not the equivalent of the Judeo-Christian concept. Normally, such a concept of God sees him in some way as finite. Two examples will illustrate this sense of theism.

1. Polytheism, of which the best known is perhaps the Greco-Roman pantheon of gods. Here there is a multiplicity of gods, each representing and personifying some aspect of life or of the created universe. In spite of the fact that each god may represent only one quality of life (love, war, etc.), each is perceived as a person. As such, the gods are perceived as separate from, but participating in, the world and interacting with humans and with one another. In fact, the gods are perceived as having many of the foibles and failings of human beings. Such polytheistic perceptions of God view him as personal, but definitely finite. Such concepts are not equivalent to the Judeo-Christian notion of God.

2. According to deism, God is an individual being (personal in that sense) but one who does not interact with the world. He initially created the world but since then has withdrawn himself from it (impersonal in that sense). He does not act in the world or sustain it but remains thoroughly transcendent over it. There is a sense in which such a view renders God's existence inconsequential and certainly not equivalent to the Judeo-Christian conception.

God as Personal Creator and Sustainer. A final perception is of God as creator and sustainer of the universe. He is infinite in attributes, and he is the only God. This monotheistic concept of God is held within the Judeo-Christian tradition. Three ways in particular have appeared.

1. Theonomy. According to his view, God is the law in the universe, and in particular, his will is law. Whatever rules of ethics, epistemology, etc., there are result from what God wills and could be otherwise if he so chose. No action in the universe is intrinsically good or evil or better or worse, but has its value in regard to the value God places upon it. The necessary rules are known through divine revelation rather than reason.

2. Rationalism. This school of thought is represented by the work of Leibniz. According to his system, all the laws of logic, ethics, and the like are necessary laws in the universe and are so in virtue of the principle of sufficient reason in accord with which everything must happen. In such a system God must create a world, and he must create the best of all possible worlds (for Leibniz, the best world is intelligible). The circumstances in such a universe are discernible by the light of pure reason unaided by revelation. If in theonomy the concept of God is prior to logic, in rationalism logic is prior to theology.

3. Modified Rationalism. There is a mediating position that, like theonomy, does not claim that everything is discernible by reason alone, nor that what is discernible is an expression of some necessary law. Modified rationalism does not demand that God create a world, but asserts that creating a world is something fitting for God to do. For a modified rationalist, there is no best possible world, only good and evil worlds. Modified rationalism differs from theonomy in that it claims that certain things are intrinsically good and intrinsically evil, apart from what God says about them. In such a universe, things are as they are according to reason, and in many cases one can discern why something is the case and what the case is by means of reason, though some things can be known only by revelation, a view historically typical of Judeo-Christian theologies.

Conclusion. More needs to be said about theism as a philosophy, especially about certain questions traditionally attached to the philosophy of theism. For example, in speculating on theism, one of the questions that arises is about the relation of human language to God, i.e., How is human language (with its reference to finite beings) predicable of an infinite being? Another question deals with whether it is possible to demonstrate rationally, or at least to justify rationally, belief in God's existence. Philosophers of religion also ask whether a particular mode of experience is specifically religious. Likewise, they ask about the relation of the providence and sovereignty of God to the freedom and responsibility of humans. Finally, there is the question about the internal consistency of theological systems that hold to the existence of an all-powerful, all-loving God along with the presence of evil in the world. Though many philosophers and theologians (Barthians, existentialists, logical empiricists, e.g.) have argued that it is impossible to give a rational justification of theism, nonetheless, many are ready to answer to the contrary.

Theism

J. S. FEINBERG

See also DEISM; GOD, ARGUMENTS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF; GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF; GOD, DOCTRINE OF; PANENTHEISM; PANTHEISM; POLYTHEISM.

Bibliography. A. M. Farrar, Finite and Infinite; É. Gilson, God and Philosophy; J. Maritain, Range of Reason; E. L. Mascall, Existence and Analogy; B. Mitchell, Justification of Religious Belief; S. Ogden, Reality of God and Other Essays; W. Reese and E. Freeman, Process and Divinity; T. V. Smith, Our Idea of God; T. V. Smith, ed., Concept of God; B. Spinoza, Ethics; R. Swinburne, Christian God; Coherence of Theism; Existence of God; P. Tillich, Systematic Theology.

Theistic Evolution. See EVOLUTION.

Theocracy. Derived from the Greek theos, "God," and from kratein, "to rule," the word denotes the rule of God. Josephus apparently coined the word, according to Thackeray, and gave it a political connotation (Against Apion ii. 165). But the idea goes back to the OT (Exod. 19:4–9; Deut. 33:4–5). The law of the king (Deut. 17:14–20) recognizes the ultimate control of the Lord God. Saul's trend was antitheocratic, but David's was theocratic, and to him was given the promise of the great Son of David (2 Sam. 7:13–16).

Although the political sense is essential to the word theocracy, as coined by Josephus, a broader meaning is usually implied, to include every sphere and relationship of life as governed in OT times by the contemporaneous and continuing special revelation of God. The human agencies provided to enable Israel to carry out Jehovah's will included not only kings, but also a succession of prophets, culminating in the great prophet like Moses (Deut. 18:14–15). Priests and Levites were also included, to whom God gave the duties of presenting the typically redemptive sacrificial blood to the Lord, pointing forward to the blood of Christ, and the duty of teaching the people the moral law, the statutes, the judgments, the sacred history, prophecy, and poetry of the OT (Lev. 10:8–11; Deut. 31:9–11).

M. J. WYNGAARDEN

Bibliography. M. G. Kyle, Problem of the Pentateuch; M. J. Wyngaarden, Future of the Kingdom.

Theodicy. From theos, "God," and dikē, "justice"; a term used to refer to attempts to justify the ways of God to man. A successful theodicy resolves the problem of evil for a theological system and demonstrates that God is all-powerful, all-loving, and just despite evil's existence.

Nature of Theodicies. Six basic points are relevant to the nature of a theodicy.

1. A theodicy is a response to a problem of the logical consistency of a theological position. Most attacks on theistic systems charge that their key theological claims, e.g., God is omnipotent, God is all-loving, and evil exists in a world created by God, taken together are self-contradictory. The theodicy's task is to structure an answer that demonstrates that these propositions taken together are logically consistent. It should be noted that the theodicy is required to demonstrate only that there is no contradiction in one's own theological position given one's own views of God and evil. It is irrelevant if the critic objects on the grounds that the theodicy incorporates intellectual commitments about God and evil that one does not accept, for the theodicy needs only to demonstrate that the theology squares with itself. This means also that the theodicy must not structure a defense of God incorporating propositions that produce internal inconsistency.

2. A successful theodicy must be relevant to the problem of evil it addresses, and there are many variations: moral, evil, physical evil, the problem of an individual's relation to God in view of experiencing specific evil, as well as problems of the degree and intensity of evil. The theodicy must construct a system relevant to the problem of evil confronting him or her. One cannot, e.g., answer the problem of natural evil by an appeal to the free will of human beings. Free human action is irrelevant to the occurrence of earthquakes and droughts. On the other hand, free human action is relevant to the problem of moral evil, a problem about evil produced at the hands of moral agents.

3. A theodicy must be relevant to the specific theology it addresses, and not all theologies, even within the sphere of orthodox Christian theism, hold identical positions concerning God and evil. Each theological position incorporates a particular concept of divine benevolence, divine power, the nature of evil, and the nature of free human action. The theodicy must construct a defense of God's ways as they are portrayed in his theological system. The free will defense, e.g., is an inappropriate answer to the problem of moral evil that faces a Calvinistic theology, since the notion of freedom involved in the free will defense (incompatibilism) contradicts the notion of freedom involved in a Calvinistic system (compatibilism).

4. The problem of evil in its various forms is always a problem of logical consistency, and as such is intellectually interesting only for theologies that incorporate a notion of God's omnipotence according to which he may do any logically consistent thing. If one holds, e.g., that God can do anything whatsoever, even actualize contradictions, then there is no sense in talking about the logical consistency. Most, if not all, theodicies are structured for theological positions that interpret God's omnipotence as the ability to do the logically consistent.

5. Most theodicies (and systems of ethics in general) adopt a particular axiom with regard to moral agency and moral blameworthiness; viz., that a person is not morally responsible for that which he cannot do or which he does under constraint or compulsion.

6. The pattern of most theodicies is indicated by the preceding principles. They attempt to resolve the apparent contradiction by arguing that God, in spite of his omnipotence, cannot remove evil. Since he cannot remove evil, he is not morally responsible for its presence in the world. Such an argument rests on the concept of God's omnipotence according to which God can do only the logically consistent. The strategy is to specify something that God does accomplish—a value of the first order—which he could not do if he were to remove evil. The free will defender argues, e.g., that God cannot accomplish two ends simultaneously—give humans free will and remove evil—without contradicting his intentions to do one or the other. Since God cannot do both simultaneously, he is not guilty of the evil present in the world, for no moral agent is guilty for failing to do that which he could not do.

Views of Theodicy. Several interesting theodicies have been offered by well-known thinkers for the moral problem of evil.

Gottfried Leibniz's theodicy was structured for his extreme rationalistic theological system. Accordingly, there are not only reasons that God does whatever he does, but such reasons are necessary laws. These reasons are discernible by the light of pure reason unaided by revelation. Moreover, for Leibniz, God is the only metaphysically necessary being. There are an infinite number of contingent finite possible worlds God could actualize, but there is only one that is the best possible world. God is obligated to create the best. In addition to this metaphysic, Leibniz's system has its own concept of ethics: "good" and "evil" are pros hen equivocal terms whose primary sense is a metaphysical one. All other senses of "good" and "evil" relate to this primary one. Metaphysical evil is finitude or lack of being, and metaphysical good is plenitude of being. Moral goodness in God consists therefore in willing the best, metaphysically speaking. For such a theological system the problem of evil arises as follows: If it can be shown that God has willed less than the best world, metaphysically speaking, then God is shown not to be a good God. However, if it can be shown that God has willed the best metaphysically, then he is morally praiseworthy, despite the presence of moral and physical evil in the world. In response, Leibniz argues that God always operates on the basis of sufficient reason, i.e., God will not do something without a sufficient reason (discernible by pure reason). In the case of actualizing a world, the reason for choosing one over another is that it is best. Leibniz's system demands that there be a best possible world. Moreover, God, the supremely rational being, knows what that world is, and being all-powerful, he can actualize it. Since he is all-good, he is inclined to do so, and in fact has actualized the best of all possible worlds. Of course, the metaphysically richest world must contain the greatest number and variety of beings, but that means that a world with moral and physical good and evil is richer metaphysically than a world with only moral and physical good. Thus, since God is obligated to create the best, and since Leibniz explains that he has, we can see that the best of all possible worlds, metaphysically speaking, must contain moral and physical evil. If God had refused to create such a world, however, he would be morally reprehensible, for his supreme moral obligation is to create the best world. The existence of moral and physical evil in the world God actualized is justified then, and God is shown to be just, omnipotent, and omnibenevolent.

Given the basic tenets of this system, Leibniz does not contradict himself with his theodicy. Consequently, he has solved his problem of evil, a problem of internal consistency. One may reject his theodicy and his theology, but not on grounds that it fails to remove the alleged contradiction.

Other well-known theodicies rest upon a modified rationalistic theology. Such a metaphysic lies behind the free-will defense, the basic theodicy in the Augustinian tradition of theodicy; and also behind the soul-building theodicy, the basic theodicy in the Irenaean tradition. There are four basic points here. (1) In a modified rationalists' universe, God is not obligated to create any world, for his own existence is the supreme good. (2) Creating a world is a fitting thing for God to do but not the only fitting thing for him to do. Whatever he chooses to do is done on the basis of reason, but such reasons are not necessary laws in this universe. (3) There is an infinite number of finite contingent possible worlds. Some by their very nature are inherently evil, so God could not create them. However, there is more than one good possible world that God could have created. There is no such thing as a best possible world. (4) God was free with respect to whether or not he should create and with respect to which of the good possible worlds he would create if he chose to create. For such a theological position, the problem of evil arises as follows: Is the contingent possible world that God created one of the good possible worlds (despite the evil in it)? The modified rationalist theologian must specify a reason that this world is one of those good possible worlds.

Theodicy

There is a basic ethic behind modified rationalistic theologies. The notion of evil and good presupposed by a free-will defense is some form of nonconsequentialism; i.e., good and evil are not determined on the basis of the consequences of the act. In regard to the problem of evil, this means that the world as created from the hand of God must not contain any evil and that evil in the world has been introduced by the actions of agents whom God created. Soul-building theodicies follow a consequentialist account of ethics in which the good or evil of an act is determined by its results. The world as created from the hand of God did contain evil, but that causes no stain on God, since he will ultimately use evil to bring good.

The theodicist using the free-will defense begins by pointing out that God is not the cause of evil in the world; the abuse of human free will is. Then the question is whether God is not guilty for giving humans free will when he knew that they could abuse it to commit evil. The answer is no. Free will is a value of the highest order, which God should have given. However, God is not the one who uses such free will to commit evil; humans do, so humans are responsible for evil. Moreover, God is still good for giving humans something which they could, and in fact did, abuse, because a world in which there are significantly free beings (even though they produce evil) is a far better world than one that contains no evil but is populated by automatons. In other words, God cannot both create significantly free beings and make it the case that they always freely do good. On the free-will defender's account of free human action, if God makes it the case that humans do anything, humans cannot do it freely. Genuine free will, then, involves evil, but God is justified in what he did, for free will is a good that far overbalances any evil produced by the use of such a will.

Note that (1) if the free-will defenders are granted their concepts of God, evil, and free human action (and they must be, given the nature of a problem of evil), they can answer their problem of evil. Their system is internally consistent. They have proved that this world is one of those good possible worlds God could have created. (2) The theodicy follows the basic strategy outlined previously. The free-will defender holds to divine omnipotence but argues that it means God can do whatever is logically consistent. The free-will defender then argues that God was faced with two choices, neither of which could be actualized simultaneously with the other. God had the choice of either making humans free or removing evil. He chose the former, and the good produced by such a choice far overbalances the evil humans can and do produce with free will. However, God is not guilty for evil that remains in the world, for, having given humans free will, God cannot remove that evil, and no one is guilty for failing to do what he or she could not do.

Soul-building theodicy also rests on a modified rationalist theology, but it incorporates a consequentialist ethic. The most noteworthy form of this view in recent years is that of John Hick, who begins by suggesting that God's intent in creating man was not to create a perfect creature, but rather to create a being in need of moral development. God intended for man's time on earth to be spent in building moral and spiritual character in preparation for participation in the kingdom of God. Hick asks, What sort of environment would be most conducive to soul-building? Would a world in which no evil ever confronts man be better for developing character, or would man be more likely to develop spiritually if he lived in a world where he would be confronted by problems and evil? Hick argues that the answer is obviously the latter. If God wants to use the world to build souls, he cannot place humans in an Edenic paradise where nothing ever goes wrong. Consequently, there is evil in the world, but God is not to be blamed for it, since he intends to use it to build souls and ultimately develop people to a point where they are ready for the kingdom of God. Hick recognizes that if God's purpose with the world is to build souls, many will argue he has severely failed. Evil in the world often turns people away from God rather than encouraging them to grow spiritually. Therefore, it does not seem that the evil in the world accomplishes its purpose, and God must be guilty for creating such a world. Hick answers that though it seems the souls are not being built, God will nonetheless see to it that everyone ultimately makes it to the kingdom of God. No soul will finally go unbuilt; no evil will prove to be unjustified or unjustifiable.

Note first that if we allow—as we must—Hick's concepts of God and evil, he can answer the problem of evil that confronts his theology. Some may not accept his theology as a whole, but he has shown a way to render it internally consistent. He has proved that this is one of the good possible worlds God could have created. Second, as in the preceding examples, Hick's theodicy follows the basic strategy outlined. God was faced with two choices, neither of which could be actualized simultaneously with the other. God could remove evil from the world, but then he would not be able to build the souls of his creatures; or he could build the souls of his creatures, but then he would have to include evil in the world, for that is the way to build souls. Building souls and preparing them for the kingdom of God is a value of the first order that makes it worth the evil present in the world. However, God cannot be guilty for not removing evil, for he could not both build souls and remove evil, and no one is guilty for failing to do that which he could not.

Value of Theodicy. Apologetics. An initial value of theodicies is that many answer the problems of evil that face the theologies for which they are constructed. Most rejections of theodicies tend to be on grounds external to the theological system, i.e., the critic refuses to adopt the intellectual commitments of the system. Such a rejection is not made on the grounds of a problem of evil, for that is always a problem of the internal consistency of a system. The theodicies presented above render their theologies internally consistent and thereby solve their problem of evil. As a result, atheists are mistaken who claim that all theistic positions are hopelessly irrational because self-contradictory on this matter. Moreover, their claims that no theist can solve his problem of evil are contradicted by the fact that many theists can do so. The ways of God are defensible, and they are defensible in such a way that no theist should have to give in to the charge of irrationality due to a problem of evil.

Intellectual Clarity. The one who structures a theodicy must be clear about the intellectual commitments his theology entails. Each theology incorporates particular views on God, evil, and free human action. It is valuable for the theologian to understand that he works within the broad stream of Christian theism, even though his views are not necessarily identical to every other Christian theist's.

Human Creativity. The former benefit leads to another. Obviously, there is only one God, but there are many theologies and theodicies about that God. One of the values of theodicy making is that it helps the theologian recognize that his system is just one way of perceiving the nature of God and the world. Insofar as his views square with reality, his theology is correct; nonetheless, it is still a human construct. Consequently, when someone rejects a theology or theodicy, he is not actually rejecting God (unless the theology and theodicy accurately portray God), but rather a human construction about the nature of God and the world.

Internal Consistency. Since the intent in writing a theodicy is to avoid self-contradiction, the theist strives to remove any potential or actual contradictions in his system. Many theologians, nonetheless, seem to do only fragments of theology, and they wind up holding views in one area that contradict views in another. Theodicy making reminds the theologian that he must think holistically and synthetically as well as analytically; and he must seek to avoid creating a theological position that contains contradiction.

J. S. FEINBERG

See also APOLOGETICS; EVIL, PROBLEM OF; GOD, ARGUMENTS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF; PAIN.

Bibliography. M. B. Ahern, Problem of Evil; S. T. Davis, ed., Encountering Evil: Five Options on Theodicy; A. Farrer, Love Almighty and Justification Unlimited; J. S. Feinberg, Theologies and Evil; P. T. Forsyth, Justification of God; P. T. Geach, Providence and Evil; J. Hick, Evil and the God of Love; G. W. Leibniz, Theodicy, E. M. Huggard, trans.; J. L. Mackie, "Evil and Omnipotence," in Philosophy of Religion, B. Mitchell, ed.; E. Madden and P. Hare, Evil and the Concept of God; M. Peterson, Evil and the Christian God; A. Plantinga, God, Freedom, and Evil; J. W. Wenham, Goodness of God; J. S. Whale, Christian Answer to the Problem of Evil.

Theodore of Mopsuestia. See ANTIOCHENE THEOLOGY.

Theologia Crucis (Lat. for "theology of the cross"). Martin Luther's most profound contribution to theological thought. Five months after he nailed the ninety-five theses to the door of the Castle Church at Wittenberg, Luther formulated the theologia crucis. Standing in opposition to the theology of glory, the theology of the cross is best understood in concert with the Deus Absconditus ("the hidden God") and the Deus Revelatus ("the revealed God").

Before the fall (lapsus) man was capable of knowing God directly or immediately. God was the Deus Revelatus who communed with man in the cool of Eden's garden. The consequence of man's fall into sin included much more than personal death and moral deterioration; it also changed man's ability to know and commune with the Creator. The revealed God became the hidden God (Deus Absconditus). The only way the shattered fellowship could be restored was by means of redemption. Throughout the OT period, in spite of miraculous interventions, military conquests, magnificent temples, and elaborate palaces, the only place God met with his people was at the mercy seat ("There . . . I will meet with you," Exod. 25:22), the place of sacrifice and redemption. God's consummate meeting place was unveiled at the cross of Christ. God is known and understood not in strength but in weakness, not in an awesome display of majesty and power but in the exhibition of a love willing to suffer in order to win man back to itself.

Unfortunately, modern man is determined to know God as the Revealed One. The heathen sees God's power in the created cosmos but is led from one degree of idolatry to another. The civilized religionist thinks he finds God in displays of pageantry and expressions of personal moral accomplishment. All are tragically in error. God is ever and only known to man at the cross. With great insight Luther expostulated: Solus praedica

Theologia Crucis

Sapientium crucis. “The one thing preach, the wisdom of the Cross.”
F. R. HARM

See also LUTHER, MARTIN; THEOLOGIA GLORIAE.

Bibliography. P. Althaus, Theology of Martin Luther; A. McGrath, Luther's Theology of the Cross; W. von Loewenich, Luther's Theology of the Cross.

Theologia Gloriam (Lat. for “theology of glory”). One of Martin Luther’s many theological insights, the theology of glory is the antithesis of the theology of the cross. So strongly did Luther feel about the distinction between these theologies that he stated unequivocally that only those who hold to and teach the theology of the cross deserve to be called theologians.

The theology of glory comes to know God by means of his works. Natural theology and speculative metaphysics fit into this category, as does the triumphalistic view expressed by some modern-day charismatics who see God revealing himself in dramatic interventions (visions, miracles, healings, etc.), and the Christian life as one that is lived on a constant spiritual “high.” With this view, proponents of the theology of the cross resoundingly disagree. God wishes to be known and revered on the basis of another principle. The theology of glory feels that it knows God immediately through his expressions of divine power, wisdom, and glory; whereas the theology of the cross recognizes him in the very place at which he has hidden himself—the cross and its suffering, all of which is esteemed to be weakness and foolishness by the theology of glory.

The potential danger that the theology of the cross sees in its antithesis is that the theology of glory will lead to a form of moralistic works righteousness, a propensity to strike a bargain with God on the basis of personal achievement. The theology of the cross repudiates humanity’s own accomplishments and permits God to do everything to effect and preserve his salvation. Such theology redirects from moralistic activism to genuine receptivity.
F. R. HARM

See also LUTHER, MARTIN; THEOLOGIA CRUCIS.

Bibliography. P. Althaus, Theology of Martin Luther; M. Luther, Works; L. Pinomaa, Faith Victorious; R. Prenter, Luther's Theology of the Cross; H. Preus, Theology to Live By; W. von Loewenich, Luther's Theology of the Cross.

Theological Virtues. See CARDINAL VIRTUES, SEVEN.

Theology, Integrative. The specialization of diverse departments in modern education has fragmented many universities and seminaries. With the information explosion, the mastery of one field can require a lifetime achievement. But to develop a well rounded Christian world- and life-view, the method and content of one field must be related to others. During the last half of the twentieth century, several evangelicals have sought to integrate such fields as philosophy, science, psychology, and sociology with theology.

From these efforts to relate various disciplines to theology one might assume that all the departments of a seminary are well integrated in the biblical studies program of Christian colleges and seminaries (or the Evangelical Theological Society). One of the difficulties in relating other fields to theology is the lack of coherence in theological studies themselves. But some encouraging contributions are being made. For example, the combined exegetical and homiletical course at Dallas Seminary now incorporates theological principles.

The Final Aim of Theology. Granting what is being done, more seems necessary to develop what Gerhard Hasel called a “multi-track” or multiplex theology. Hasel wisely urges that scholars avoid artificial and forced unilinear approaches (so typical of systematic theologies). And he warns of the difficulty of discovering an inner unity that authentically binds together the various theologies and longitudinal themes, concepts, and motifs. The difficulty of integrating biblical teachings ought not to be attempted hastily, but it must not be minimized. As Hasel concludes, “integration is the final aim and ultimate object of theology.”

Given theology’s integrative objective, it is not enough for professors to expect students to integrate their diverse courses. Professors themselves need to be desegregated and to exhibit ways and means of bringing into harmony the often disparate results of biblical, historical, philosophical, and theological modes of operation.

One Endeavor to Integrate Five Fields. An attempt to move toward the integration of theologically related realms has been proposed by G. R. Lewis, with historical and exegetical contributions by B. A. Demarest, in their three-volume Integrative Theology (IT). Each chapter requires historical, biblical, systematic, apologetic, and practical contributions. Lewis heard the criticisms of systematic theologies for not incorporating more of the four other fields and educating by indoctrination. So IT makes more information in each of those fields available to readers on each major theological problem.

The section “Alternative Interpretations in the Church” incorporates influential historical views from many sources as hypotheses deserving assessment. “The Biblical Teaching” segment tests the alternatives by their coherence with the primary biblical data of progressively revealed Scripture. The “Systematic Formulation” suggests a coherent account of the several facets of revealed truth, incorporating elements of the historical options that have biblical support. An “Apologetic Interaction” part responds to live options that are not confirmed by the evidence. The concluding division of each chapter, “Relevance for Life and Ministry,” identifies theologically worthy objectives to guide the passionate devotion and commitment of persons, families, and churches.

A participatory philosophy of education minimally requires a methodological paradigm that makes available the essentials of five departments on each major doctrine. Several other recent theologies announce in their introductions that they seek to do justice to historical, biblical, and practical aspects, but readers may not regularly be given sufficient information to evaluate it. Furthermore, the growing intensity of culture wars requires that theologians give up their reticence openly to engage in apologetics. Ability to refute opponents of the faith is not optional, but a requirement for anyone in Christian ministry (Titus 1:9).

Toward Several Other Syntheses. IT moves toward integrating more than departments. It integrates two different ways of doing theology. (1) It helps readers establish well-founded, well-formulated Christian convictions. (2) It also indicates some of the viable objectives that follow for principled living and serving in the church and the world. Frequently the concern for establishing principles ignores their applications or vice versa.

IT integrates objective and the subjective factors. Each chapter seeks, not only to exhibit a coherent view of both the publicly observable data of special and general revelation, but also how that truth gives people internal moral and spiritual purpose. A doctrine that is true can be verified by both objective data and subjective authenticity.

IT integrates both traditional and contemporary categories. Classical entities (spirits and bodies) with their essential attributes are considered in terms of their functions and personal relationships. Scriptural data enables us to know who God is as well as what God does (providentially and miraculously) and how God relates to trusting sinners (redemptive relationships). Similarly, it relates scriptural data regarding who humans are to how they act and relate.

IT integrates some of God’s personal and social purposes for his people. It does not become anti-individualistic to support the church or anti-institutional to enhance the lives of individual persons. God works redemptively through distinct persons, such as the OT heroes of faith (Heb. 11), and God works with his people collectively in three great God-ordained social institutions for redemptive purposes: the family, Israel, and the church. In a church as God intended it to exist, individuals regenerate and gifted members are mutually fulfilled, strengthened, and enabled. In turn these members strengthen the institutional church and enable it to bring blessing to the whole world.

IT integrates elements of truth from different systems of theology. Scriptural data supports both Arminianism’s condemnation by foreseen works and Calvinism’s salvation by unconditional grace. The proposed multiplex “spiritual and institutional theology” incorporates: (1) the one covenant of grace or plan of salvation (emphasized by covenant theology), (2) the one people of God in Israel and the church spiritually (as featured in kingdom theology), and (3) the institutional differences between the church and Israel (a differently defined dispensationalism).

IT Uses an Integrative Method. With the increased consciousness of multicultural and gender issues, a method with criteria capable of achieving some coherence seems crucial. According to methodological specialist Bernard Lonergan, “only with the appropriate method used conscientiously can we have any confidence in our own or others’ conclusions. For instance, we are now aware that method structures our entire knowing and creative processes, from what we focus on in the first place, to how we move from there to our understandings and our results.”

Lonergan realized “that method is not something obscure and extrinsic to ourselves. Rather, method is precisely ourselves at our spontaneous, inquiring, and choosing best as we sift the data and the meanings of the past in order to face the issues of the present so that we may create the future.”

The IT method of research, reasoning, and decision making integrates logic, fact, and values. The epistemological framework was developed by Edward John Carnell, a pioneer in the resurgence of evangelicalism in the middle of the twentieth century. Unfortunately, he did not get to apply it in a major theological work. (See my chapter on Carnell in the Handbook of Evangelical Theologians and my comparison of his epistemology with five other evangelical philosopher/theologians in my Testing Christianity’s Truth Claims.)

The verificational method in IT is neither inductive nor deductive; it is abductive. The initial hypothesis proposes the existence of the God revealed in the historical Jesus and the teaching of Scripture. Other religious, philosophical, or theological alternatives from any source: past or present, masculine or feminine, East or West, are also examined. For a condensed form of the method applied to theological issues, see my Decide for Yourself: A Theological Workbook.

To be considered true, conflicting religious claims are tested by an integrated threefold criterion. Proposals must (1) not contradict themselves or previously revealed divine purposes in God’s providential or redemptive kingdoms, (2) fit relevant facts (such as fulfilled signs or predictions), and (3) be viable without hypocrisy. By this threefold biblically and philosophically based criterion, readers obey exhortations to examine, test, and try the plethora of prophets, messiahs, apostles, and biblical interpreters who claim to speak for God (Deut. 13:1–5; 18:20–22; Acts 17:11; 1 Thess. 5:21; 1 Tim. 3:10; 1 John 4:1; Rev. 2:2).

Theology, Integrative

The abductive method is illustrated when Christians present the three hypotheses concerning Jesus: liar, lunatic, or Lord of all. The latter hypothesis is true because it fits the relevant evidence with the greatest coherence and viability. IT does not defend the truth of trinitarianism because of an alleged inherent authority of church councils. Rather, like the leaders of the church councils, they find trinitarianism to provide the most coherent and viable account of biblical teaching about God's oneness and threeness. Existentially, the doctrine furnishes the ultimate base for explaining the "uni-" in this diverse universe, the enduring worth of persons, the importance of fellowship, and the virtue of self-giving love in missions.

How does a verificational use of reason relate to faith? Although the object of faith (the Triune God) is unseen, the evidence for believing in the incarnate Logos and the Trinity is verifiable. Belief of the gospel and trust in Christ is not a matter of wishful thinking, gullibility, or naive acceptance of an ancient tradition. The historicity of the events can be tested by an application of the verificational method and its criteria. Their revealed meaning, "for our sins," is verified by testing the credentials of prophetic and apostolic spokesmen for God. For more general confirmation, IT tests hypotheses concerning the Bible's role as the divinely inspired special revelation in writing. Objectively valid gospel truths direct the personal trust of those who can humble their pride and admit their sin to the living Person of the risen Messiah. He alone bore the guilt and met the consequence of their sin and can justly forgive it. Objective truths are requisite to direct loving personal commitment away from false messiahs and to the one who lives and saves.

After verifying the claims of Christ as Savior and personally committing one's life to him as Lord, Christ's discerning followers verify each new belief. They test proposed doctrines by their coherence, not just with one verse but with as much of the revealed data as space allowed. A worthy goal of growth in grace and knowledge is a verified, integrative theology.

Disclaimer and Challenge. Lewis and Demarest have no illusions that their three-volume work fully attained an integrated world- and life-view. They did not expect that the brief sections in each area would satisfy specialists but thought they might help them move out of their comfort zones and relate to other fields. Hopefully this impetus toward an integrated big picture may help until further progress can be made.

In the future the enormous integrative task requires, as Bernard Lonergan has sought, "a collaborative endeavor." Specialists in each field who are willing to look at the holistic world picture are hereby challenged to develop more adequately a historically discerning, biblically based, coherent theology/philosophy (apologetic) with its ethical import for individuals, nations, and churches in this divided world.

Ideally, a collaborative endeavor would be made up of a committee of specialists from each department of a seminary curriculum who could agree on a general methodology. Each group would contribute to every major doctrinal issue in interaction with the input of all the others. Resources would need to be discovered for support of such a crucial project (comparable to NIV Bible translation committees). And who will accept the challenge of gaining the cooperation of a much larger team of evangelicals to respond to the challenges of a more extensive integrative theology?

G. R. LEWIS

See also CARNELL, EDWARD JOHN; GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF; RELATIVISM.

Bibliography. V. Gregson, ed., Desires of the Human Heart: An Introduction to the Theology of Bernard Lonergan; G. Hasel, New Testament Theology: Basic Issues in the Current Debate; Old Testament Theology: Basic Issues in the Current Debate; G. R. Lewis, Decide for Yourself: A Theological Workbook; G. R. Lewis and B. A. Demarest, Integrative Theology; T. Warren, "Paradigm for Preaching" BC (October–December 1991).

Theophany. A theological term used to refer to either a visible or auditory manifestation of God. Visible manifestations include an angel appearing in human form (Judg. 13); a flame in the burning bush (Exod. 3:2–6); and fire, smoke, and thunder on Mount Sinai (Exod. 19:18–20). Auditory manifestations include the voice of God in the garden (Gen. 3:8), the still small voice to Elijah (1 Kings 19:12–18), and the voice from heaven at the baptism of Jesus (Matt. 3:17). Normally the physical aspects are not described with any detail because it is the message of God that is emphasized. However, the physical aspects are there to impress the recipients and authenticate the revelation. This is not to imply that everything is immediately obvious to the recipients. Samson's father does not know he is speaking to the angel of the Lord until after the angel disappears in the flames of the sacrifice (Judg. 13:15–22). In many cases the one seen seems to the recipient as a normal human being, and only what is said and done indicates otherwise.

God takes the initiative in theophany, never revealing himself completely, and usually only in a temporary rather than permanent way. A perma-ment manifestation like the incarnation of Christ made theophanies less necessary and accounts for their diminished importance in the NT. In the OT theophanies are concentrated in Genesis, in the exodus and conquest events, in Judges, and in the prophets, often in relation to their initial call.

The literary description of theophany varies somewhat from one occasion to another. However, Kuntz has been able to show that there is often a definite literary form. Genesis 26:23–25 would be a typical example. It includes an introductory description (Yahweh appeared), divine self-asseveration (“I am the God of your father Abraham”), quelling of human fear (“Do not be afraid”), assertion of gracious divine presence (“I am with you”), hieros logos (“holy word”; “I will bless you”), and concluding description (Isaac built an altar there).

Some label the expressions “angel of the Lord” or “angel of God” as a theophanic angel. These expressions occur more than fifty times in the OT; some of the most important passages include Exodus 23:20–23; 32:34; and Isaiah 63:9. Various interpretations have been suggested, including an appearance of God himself, an appearance of a messenger or one of God’s many angels, and an appearance of the preincarnate Christ. Each interpretation has difficulties, and there is no consensus.

J. C. MOYER

See also ANGEL OF THE LORD.

Bibliography. J. A. Borland, Christ in the Old Testament; J. K. Kuntz, Self-Revelation of God; W. G. MacDonald, “Christology and ‘The Angel of the Lord,’” in Current Issues in Biblical and Patristic Interpretation, G. F. Hawthorne, ed.

Theosis (Lat. for “deification”). A term used by the Eastern Orthodox Church to describe the desired end result of the salvation process. Some scholars prefer to retain the Greek, theosis, rather than use the Latin translation because of the pantheistic overtones of the latter. At its root meaning theosis encompasses what in the Western ordo salutis are the doctrines of justification and sanctification. The combination of the two stages of Christian experience means that assurance of salvation takes on a different form than it does in a Calvinist framework. Wesleyan soteriology has more in common with the Eastern Orthodox Church on this point. A theologically astute Orthodox would answer the question: “Are you saved?” with the response: “I was saved, I am being saved, I will be saved.”

Salvation in Orthodox theology is dependent on God’s grace. Theosis is the prime example of God’s grace in operation. Only by the substitutionary death of Christ can we have our sins forgiven and the way to heaven opened. Only by his Resurrection is our resurrection guaranteed.

Theosis has patristic roots with the first appearance found in Irenaeus, “If the Word is made man, it is that men might become gods.” A similar phrase is found in Athanasius. The chief biblical text that is used to support the doctrine is found in 2 Peter 1:4 where those who believe are to “participate in the divine nature.” Theosis is closely connected to the creation of humankind in God’s image. In attaining salvation in this fuller sense of being recreated in the image of God is a fulfillment of the Trinity’s original purpose in creating humans. This completion of the image finds biblical support in texts like Romans 8:29 and 1 John 3:2. While the concept of theosis does not necessarily have a synergistic emphasis, the focus on sanctification insures that some will adopt a theology that has a focus on human responsibility.

In the Orthodox spiritual tradition theosis is a central doctrine in the hesychast movement. Key monastic writers like Simeon the New Theologian, Maximos the Confessor, and Gregory Palamas relate their present experience of God to the doctrine of theosis.

J. J. STAMOOLIS

See also GREGORY PALAMAS; HESYCHASM; ORTHODOX TRADITION; SIMEON THE NEW THEOLOGIAN.

Bibliography. D. B. Clendenin, Eastern Orthodox Christianity: A Western Perspective; V. Lossky, Orthodox Theology: An Introduction; G. I. Mantzaridis, Deification of Man; J. Meyendorff and R. Robias, Salvation in Christ: A Lutheran-Orthodox Dialogue; J. Pelikan, The Spirit of Eastern Christendom.

Theosophy. The term may be applied broadly to describe intuitive knowledge of divine and hidden mysteries, primarily in the range of pantheism and natural mysticism, including belief in reincarnation, karma, and the use of occult powers. Rather than a creating personality, God is an impersonal consciousness. Theosophy in this broader sense is considered a part of esotericism and is best known through the work of Jakob Boehme. The term theosophy is used, however, more specifically to refer to the movement begun in New York City in 1875 by Russian mystic Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, along with founding president Henry Steel Olcott and William Q. Judge. Blavatsky was experienced in the occult and influenced by the Hinduism and Buddhism she was exposed to during a period when she and Olcott lived in India, where theosophy headquarters was then established and continues to be its international center.

Theosophy rejects as narrow a belief system of absolutes, viewing Christianity as only one of many sources of truth. Widely syncretistic, it instead affirms the beliefs of various religious and philosophical sources. Nonetheless, it has little room for the Christian view of sin, divine revelation through the Bible, the atonement, or the su-premac and uniqueness of Jesus Christ. Despite its alleged breadth, Hinduism, particularly through Indian sacred writings, and the occult are prominent contributors to its system of beliefs and hierarchical cosmology. Transcendent consciousness, human evolution, and ultimate oneness of all things are all attributed to an impersonal "divine principle." Theosophy emphasizes universal tolerance and respect, promotes the study of comparative religion and philosophy, and encourages the harnessing of the spiritual powers it attributes to human beings. Theosophy played an instrumental role in elevating the East, especially India and Tibet, to be viewed as a source of wisdom, and bringing into the popular realm concepts like karma and reincarnation. The Theosophical Society has been located in Wheaton, Illinois, since 1926. P. A. ERICKSEN

Theosophy

Bibliography. H. P. Blavatsky, Isis Unveiled; Key to Theosophy; Secret Doctrine; S. L. Cranston, HPB: The Extraordinary Life and Influence of Helena Blavatsky, Founder of the Modern Theosophical Movement; M. Gomes, Theosophy in the Nineteenth Century: An Annotated Bibliography; K. P. Johnson, Masters Revealed: Madam Blavatsky and the Myth of the Great White Lodge; H. Murphet, When Daylight Comes: Biography of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky; H. S. Olcott, Old Diary Leaves: The True Story of the Theosophical Society; P. Washington, Madame Blavatsky's Baboon: A History of the Mystics, Mediums and Misfits Who Brought Spiritualism to America.

Theotokos. See MOTHER OF GOD.

Thérèse of Lisieux (1873–1897). French Carmelite nun and devotional writer, known also as Thérèse of the Child Jesus. Born Maria Françoise Thérèse Martin, daughter of a watchmaker in Alençon, Normandy, she entered the convent at Lisieux at fifteen, was acting novice mistress from 1893, and remained in the convent till her early death from tuberculosis. Impressed by her purity of life, her superior instructed her to write the autobiographical Histoire d'une Ame (History of a Soul), which at once gained widespread popularity and was to be translated into all major languages, including Hebrew. What Thérèse called her "little way" advocated complete self-surrender and a childlike love for God through which persons in any walk of life could attain sainthood. She herself declared that she did not want to be "a saint by halves," and that "the good God would not inspire unattainable desires."

Her writings were hailed by Pope Benedict XV as containing "the secret of sanctity for the entire world." She was canonized unusually quickly by Pius IX (1925), made patroness (with Francis Xavier) of foreign missions in 1929, and in 1947 was associated with Joan of Arc as patron saint of France.

Controversy surrounded publication of an official eight-volume edition of her collected works to mark the centenary of her death (1997). Eminent priest-historian Jean-François Six calls three of the volumes "inauthentic" because of heavy editing, which sought to perpetuate the idea of Thérèse's simple faith and suppress some questionings that arose during the final part of her life.

Several volumes of her autobiography are available in English, notably one by R. A. Knox (1958), as are biographies by H. Petitot (1927), H. Gheon (1934), H. U. von Balthasar (1953), V. Johnson (1953), and Brother Bernard (1979). See also J. F. Six, Thérèse in Her Own Words (1996). J. D. DOUGLAS

See also MYSTICISM.

Thielicke, Helmut (1908–1986). Lutheran theologian and preacher. Thielicke was born December 4, 1908, in Wuppertal-Barmen, Germany, the son of the local rector. He grew up in the faith and always had a sense of the nearness of God and of his work in his life.

Thielicke studied at Greifswald, Marburg, Bonn, receiving a Ph.D. from Erlangen in 1932 and a Th.D. in 1934. He taught theology at Heidelberg from 1936 to 1940, when he was removed by the Nazi authorities. He was ordained in the state Lutheran church and was allowed to pastor a small church in Ravensburg but was forbidden by the Gestapo from traveling and publishing. From 1943 to 1945 he was head of the theological office of the church of Württemberg and allowed to lecture once a week in the Stuttgart Cathedral. During those awful years of Nazi oppression and allied bombing raids (that eventually destroyed the cathedral), Thielicke observed that "Evening after evening some three thousand persons gathered together: workers and businessmen, students and professors, soldiers and generals, Nazi functionaries (naturally in civilian clothes!) and Jews, Dutch compulsory laborers . . . and sometimes whole classes from the schools. It was an overwhelming time for me. Never since have I experienced such intense listening."

From the end of the war in 1945 to 1954 Thielicke was professor of Systematic Theology at Tübingen. In 1954 he became the dean of the faculty of Theology at Hamburg and in 1960 the rector of that university, as well as preacher at St. Michael's Church. Thielicke became one of the great preachers of Germany and, to his mind, the key to understanding his theology was that the Word of God needed to be proclaimed in clear, forceful language that called people to repentance and faith.

Thielicke's theological interests were wide-ranging. He was the author of over three dozen books and numerous articles that covered everything from ethics to theological reflections on the church in Africa. Much of his serious theological work is available only in German, but his two-volume Theological Ethics, three-volume Evangelical Faith, and, at a popular level, I Believe: The Christian's Creed have been translated into English. Many of his sermons and popular works have as well, such as, Between Heaven and Earth, Waiting Father, and Christ and the Meaning of Life.

Thielicke was a theologian of the Word, siding with Althaus and Barth on the question of natural revelation. He distrusted human thought, human reason, or any attempt to reach God from the bottom up. To him nature, history, or philosophical speculation is indirect, ambivalent, inscrutable. It is only the Word of God that gives us unambiguous, direct, and clear revelation. There one finds "absolute directness . . . God is His Word." In true Lutheran fashion, however, Thielicke said: "I am not primarily interested in the Bible at all. I am interested only in the Lord Jesus Christ. The Holy Scripture is only the ship in which he sleeps. And because he is sleeping in it, I am then also interested in the ship." Christ is the Word of God who makes himself known through the Word of God, which is Scripture. Thielicke rejected the concept of verbal inspiration, but he also rejected radical biblical criticism, such as Bultmann's. Bultmann had given up the concept of miracle and "without miracles our prayers [and the Christian faith] would simply become meaningless."

The true center of Christian revelation is the cross of Christ. There a substitutionary atonement was made. God's holiness was in conflict with his grace, and God threw himself into the balance by giving his only begotten Son. "Golgotha is a pain in God's heart . . . this is a God overcoming himself, this is a struggle of God with himself."

Salvation is by Christ alone and through faith alone. Justification is when we are declared righteous for Christ's sake. Sanctification is our growth in grace, in our state of simul justus et peccator. As an "ethical realist" Thielicke did not look for the kingdom of God to be realized by human action or evolutionary process, but to arrive only with the second coming of Christ when God will consummate history and create a new heaven and a new earth.

Thielicke was very much a man for his times, speaking the apocalyptic word of saving grace in Germany's darkest days, holding, as Geoffrey Bromiley says, "a basic orthodoxy in lively and thoughtful interaction with contemporary theological discussion" (Evangelical Faith 2:v). He died on March 6, 1986.

W. A. ELWELL

Bibliography. "Helmut Thielicke, 1908–1986" in Contemporary Authors—New Revision Series, A. Evory and L. Metzger, eds.; C. G. Fry, HCT 543–60; HET 219–33.

Thiessen, Henry Clarence (1883–1947). Evangelical educator and theologian. Thiessen was born in Henderson, Nebraska, on October 20, 1883, and grew up in a German-speaking, conservative, Mennonite home. He graduated from the Fort Wayne Bible School in 1909, and after pastoring a church in Pandora, Ohio (1909–16), he returned to FWBS to become an instructor in Bible (1916–19) and later president (1919–23). While there, he edited the journal Botschafter des Heils and wrote a pretribulationist treatise, Kurze Studien uber das Zweite Kommen des Herrn. Realizing his need for further education, Thiessen went on to Northern Baptist Theological Seminary (Th.B., 1925; B.D., 1928); Northwestern University (A.B., 1927); and Southern Baptist Theological Seminary (Ph.D., 1929), where he studied with A. T. Robertson and E. Y. Mullins. After serving as dean of Evangel University College of Theology (New Jersey) for two years (1929–31), he was appointed professor of New Testament Literature and Exegesis at Evangelical Theological College, Dallas, Texas (later, Dallas Theological Seminary), where he taught from 1931 to 1935, and served as sub-editor of Bibliotheca Sacra. From 1935 to 1946 Thiessen was at Wheaton College, where from 1938 to 1947 he was the director (then dean) of the newly founded Wheaton College Graduate School (called then, the John Dickey Jr. Memorial Theological Seminary Training Course). Failing health sent Thiessen to California, where he became the head of the theology department at the Los Angeles Baptist Theological Seminary, but the pressures of work were too much for him, and he died on July 25, 1947.

Thiessen wrote several books, among them Concordant Version of the Sacred Scriptures: How Should We Regard It? (n.d.), Will the Church Pass Through the Tribulation? (1940), and Why Do the Righteous Suffer? (1942); but he is best remembered for Introduction to the New Testament (1943), which is being used extensively to date, and Introductory Lectures in Systematic Theology (1949, revised by V. D. Doerksen, 1979) which is available in Portuguese, Indonesian, Korean, and French.

Thiessen felt that, academically, his task was not to be an orator, but a communicator of historic evangelical orthodoxy. Theologically, his point of view was eclectic, being moderately reformed, moderately dispensational, baptistic, and of a practical, pastoral sort. He was a strong believer in the personality of God and the doctrine of the Trinity, direct creation ex nihilo, a historical Adam and Eve, a literal fall, and total depravity. He defended G. H. Pember's curious "gap theory" (see Pember, Earth's Earliest Ages) but allowed for an old earth, suggesting that the age-day theory may well be correct, but he steadfastly rejected theistic evolution. He believed in plenary, verbal inspiration, adopting L. Gaussen's definition, and a literal incarnation, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus, along with Jesus' vicarious, substitutionary death. At the end of the age the church will not go through the tribulation and will reign with Christ on earth for a literal one thousand years.

Thiessen, Henry Clarence

Thiessen had no particular interest in the fine points of dispensationalism but was firm on its basics, namely that Israel and the church are separate and the church is not appointed to wrath, but to obtain salvation.

The strength of Thiessen's position lay in its profoundly biblical orientation, unflinching orthodoxy, and practical value. He never taught theology for its own sake as a merely academic subject. Theology was meant to change our lives because it speaks of God, salvation, and the truth. On this foundation human life must be built, and without that, all is ultimately chaotic and futile. His lifelong poor health had taught him that in life's extremities we have a Bible that is true, a God whom we can trust, a salvation that is secure, and a blessed future that is eternal. That to Thiessen was the essence of theology.

W. A. ELWELL

Bibliography. W. A. Elwell, HET 144–55.

Third Wave. See SIGNS AND WONDERS.

Thirteen Articles, The (1538). A doctrinal statement by a committee of German Lutheran and English theologians, written in Latin at London in the summer of 1538. The product of negotiations that had been carried on since 1535, they were based on the Augsburg Confession (1530) and on a set of articles drawn up in Wittenberg in 1536 at an earlier stage in the discussions. The Thirteen Articles were never accepted by the civil or ecclesiastical authorities in England, but Thomas Cranmer preserved them, and they became in part the basis for the Forty-two Articles approved in the reign of Edward VI.

The influence of the Augsburg Confession is clear throughout the Thirteen Articles. Some statements were taken almost verbatim from the earlier document. The material was organized in a similar way, and most of the topics of the Augsburg Confession's twenty-one doctrinal articles found their way into the Thirteen Articles. The latter document did not deal with the abuses rejected in the confession's other articles because Henry VIII was about to express himself on some of them.

There is a large measure of doctrinal agreement between the Augsburg Confession and the Thirteen Articles. This agreement even includes the real presence of the body and blood of Jesus in the Lord's Supper. But there are important differences too. For instance, the Thirteen Articles say that good works are necessary for salvation (article IV, on justification). J. M. DRICKAMER

See also AUGSBURG CONFESSION.

Bibliography. P. Schaff, Creeeds of Christendom; N. Tjernagel, Henry VIII and the Lutherans.

Thirty-nine Articles (1563). The historical doctrinal standard of the Church of England and the worldwide network of Episcopal churches in communion with the archbishop of Canterbury. The articles arose as one of the manifestations of the sixteenth-century English Reformation, and more specifically from the liturgical genius of Thomas Cranmer, who served as archbishop of Canterbury from 1533 to 1556. Cranmer and like-minded colleagues prepared several statements of more or less evangelical faith during the reign of Henry VIII, whose divorce from Catherine of Aragon provided the political impetus for the English Reformation. But it was not until the reign of Edward VI that England's reformers were able to proceed with more thorough efforts. Shortly before Edward's death, Cranmer presented a doctrinal statement consisting of forty-two topics, or articles, as the last of his major contributions to the development of Anglicanism. These Forty-two Articles were suppressed during the Catholic reign of Edward's successor, Mary Tudor, but became the source of the Thirty-nine Articles Elizabeth the Great and her Parliament established as the doctrinal position of the Church of England. The 1563 Latin and 1571 English editions of the articles, which benefited from the consultation of the queen herself, are the definitive statements. Elizabeth promoted the articles as an instrument of national policy (to solidify her kingdom religiously) and as a theological via media (to encompass as wide a spectrum of English Christians as possible). Since her day much controversy has swirled over their theological significance. In more recent years they have been of greatest interest to the evangelical and Catholic wings of the Anglican-Episcopal community who, though they differ between themselves over the meaning of the articles, still consider them valid, in contrast to the more liberal, or "broad," groupings within Anglicanism for whom the articles are little more than a venerated historical document.

The Thirty-nine Articles have been justly praised as a moderate, winsome, biblical, and inclusive statement of Reformation theology. The articles repudiate teachings and practices that Protestants in general condemned in the Catholic Church—they deny, e.g., supererogation of merit (XIV), transubstantiation (XXVIII), the sacrifice of the Mass (XXXI), and implicitly the sinlessness of Mary (XV). On the other hand, they affirm with the continental reformers that Scripture is the final authority on salvation (VI), that Adam's fall compromised human free will (X), that justification is by faith in Christ's merit (XI), that both bread and wine should be served to all in the Lord's Supper (XXX), and that ministers may marry (XXXII). The articles borrow some wording from Lutheran confessions, especially on the Trinity (I), the church (XIX), and the sacraments (XXV). But on baptism (XXVII, "a sign of Regeneration") and on the Lord's Supper (XXVIII, "The Body of Christ is given, taken, and eaten, in the Supper, only after an heavenly and spiritual manner"), the articles resemble Reformed and Calvinistic beliefs more than Lutheran. Article XVII on predestination and election is much debated, for it pictures election unto life in terms very similar to those used by Reformed confessions, and yet—like the Lutherans—is silent on the question of reprobation to damnation. The Thirty-nine Articles mute considerably the attack on extreme views from the radical reformation that is present in the Forty-two Articles of 1553. Thus, the Thirty-nine Articles do not contain the repudiations of antinomianism, soul sleep, chiliasm, and universalism that the early statement did. But they do retain affirmations concerning the propriety of creeds (VIII), the necessity of clerical ordination (XXIII), the right of the sovereign to influence religion (XXXVII), the right of private property (XXXVIII), and the legitimacy of official oaths (XXXIX), which had been challenged by some radical reformers.

The articles take on a more expressly English cast when they address matters of special relevance to the sixteenth century. Articles VI and XX allow the monarch considerable space for regulating the external church life of England. Article XX also sides more with Luther than with Zwingli in treating the authority of Scripture as the final and last word on religious matters rather than as the only word. Article XXXIV upholds the value of traditions that "be not repugnant to the word of God." And Article XXXVII maintains the sovereign's right to "chief government" over the whole realm, including the church, even as it restricts the monarch from exercising strictly clerical functions of preaching or administering the sacraments (in 1801 the American Episcopal Church exchanged this article for one more in keeping with New World views on the separation of church and state).

The Thirty-nine Articles remain a forthright statement of sixteenth-century reform. They are Protestant in affirming the final authority of Scripture. They are at one with common Reformation convictions on justification by grace through faith in Christ. They lean toward Lutheranism in permitting beliefs and practices that do not contradict Scripture. They contain statements that, like Zwingli in Zurich, give the state authority to regulate the church. They are "catholic" in their respect for tradition and in their belief that religious ceremonies should be everywhere the same within a realm. They are ambiguous enough to have provided controversy for a thousand theologians but compelling enough to have grounded the faith of millions.

M. A. NOLL

See also ANGLICAN COMMUNION; CONFESSIONS OF FAITH.

Bibliography. E. J. Bicknell, Theological Introduction to the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England; E. C. S. Gibson, Thirty-nine Articles; W. H. Griffith Thomas, Principles of Theology: An Introduction to the Thirty-nine Articles; B. J. Kidd, Thirty-nine Articles; J. H. Newman, Tract 90; O. O'Donovan, On the Thirty-Nine Articles: A Conversation with Tudor Christianity; P. Schaff, Creeds of Christendom.

This Age, The Age to Come. Terms characterizing the biblical concept of time. Biblical thought views time as linear (or horizontal) and contrasts the present age with a future age to come. Greek thought, on the other hand, finds a vertical dualism in the order of the world: this world is contrasted with another superior world coexisting with the present one. The use of the terms kosmos ("world") and aiōn ("aeon, age") bears this out. Hellenistic and Gnostic thought found the kosmos divided into two spheres: this present world order and that of God and eternity. Aiōn described the mediating powers bridging this absolute distinction. Biblical thought looks for the transformation of the present age in a future time. Both this age and the age to come will appear in the same historical plane; their distinction for the most part is chronological.

Among the evangelists, Matthew brings out clearly this horizontal dualism (12:32). In the climax to the parable of the wheat and tares (13:36–43), "the end of the age" is viewed in terms of apocalyptic. There will be a climactic conclusion to the present historical order: the Son of man, Jesus Christ, will return, initiate judgment, and establish his kingdom (cf. Matt. 24:3; Luke 20:34–35). Paul similarly emphasizes this two-age structure (Eph. 1:21) and affirms that the two ages are interlocked; Jesus Christ is the turning point in eschatology.

This Age, The Age to Come

And yet an aspect of the future age is already present. Especially in the Fourth Gospel, a vertical eschatology is evident that claims a present reality for elements of the age to come (e.g., eternal life, judgment; 3:18–19; 5:24). Even spatial language (e.g., above/below) is common (3:3, 31; 8:23). According to Paul, because the new creation has begun (2 Cor. 5:17), Christ can deliver us already from the present evil age (2 Cor. 6:2; Gal. 1:4). Therefore, the ages also overlap (cf. Luke 17:20–21). Christ's reign (to use Ladd's expression) is here in the present world, but his rule is incomplete; his realm is still coming in the future. In the interim, the "powers of the coming age" are with us (Heb. 6:5). In the present age, Christ has given the believer the Spirit to sustain him until the promises of the future age are fully realized (Eph. 1:13–14; 4:30; cf. 2 Cor. 1:22).

In brief, the present age is characterized by the rulership of Satan (2 Cor. 4:4; Eph. 6:12), the sin of men, and death (Eph. 2:1–2). Followers of Christ are called to not be conformed to this age (Rom. 12:2), but to be renewed by the Spirit in anticipation of the age to come. Once this age is consummated, the coming age will be hallmarked by the rulership of Christ and eternal life.

G. M. BURGE

See also AGE, AGES.

Bibliography. J. W. Bowman, IDB 2:135–40; O. Cullmann, Christ and Time; J. Guhrt, NIDNTT 1:521–26; 3:826–33; W. G. Kümmel, Promise and Fulfillment; G. E. Ladd, Presence of the Future; H. Ridderbos, Coming of the Kingdom; H. Sasse, TDNT 1:197–209.

Tholuck, Friedrich August Gottreu (1799–1877). German Protestant theologian. Of humble origins, he showed great proficiency in languages and took oriental studies at Breslau and Berlin. At the age of twenty Tholuck was converted from skepticism and pantheism after coming under the influence of such pietists as Neander and Baron von Kottwitz, and he switched to theology. In 1820 he began lecturing at Berlin while at the same time holding positions in Jänicke's missionary training school, a mission to Jews, and the Prussian Bible Society. His first theological work, Doctrine of Sin and the Propitiator (1823), helped check the spread of rationalism in Germany. In 1826 he was appointed professor of theology at Halle over the strenuous objections of the rationalists who predominated there, and in a few years he succeeded in turning the faculty around. Except for a stint as chaplain of the Prussian embassy in Rome (1827–29), he spent the remainder of his academic career at Halle.

Among Tholuck's most influential writings were commentaries on Romans (1824), John (1827), the Sermon on the Mount (1833), Hebrews (1836), and the Psalms (1843); the republication of Calvin's Institutes of the Christian Religion and commentaries on the Gospels and Epistles, together with an essay on his hermeneutics (Merits of Calvin as an Interpreter of the Holy Scriptures); and numerous collections of sermons, the best-known in English being Hours of Christian Devotion, Light from the Cross, and Festal Chimes and Sabbath Musings. His later works dealt with German church history since the Reformation.

A champion of conservative biblical scholarship, Tholuck sharply attacked D. F. Strauss in 1837. As both a teacher and preacher, he concentrated more on spiritual edification than on the scientific side of theology. His close ties with the German revival movement (Erweckung), the vital pastoral ministry among his students (the most famous being Martin Kähler), and his propagation of Vermittlungstheologie (a system that stressed personal piety and downplayed confessionalist dogma) made him without doubt the leading pietist theologian of the nineteenth century. His works were well received in the Anglo-Saxon world and are still read today in pietist circles in Germany.

R. V. PIERARD

See also MEDIATING THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. W. W. Gasque, NIDCC 970; D. S. Schaff, SHERK 11:420–21; ODCC 1369; P. Scharpff, History of Evangelism.

Thomas, William Henry Griffith See GRIFFITH THOMAS, WILLIAM HENRY.

Thomas à Kempis (ca. 1379–1471). A German monk and spiritual writer. Thomas Hemerken (Hämmerlein or "little hammer") left Kempen near Krefeld on the Lower Rhine ca. 1392 to attend school in Deventer in the Netherlands. There he came into contact with Florent Radewijns (ca. 1350–1400), one of the founders of the Brethren of the Common Life. In 1399 Thomas entered the monastery at Agnietenberg (Mount Saint Agnes near Zwolle), which was affiliated with the Windesheim Congregation of Augustinian regular (monastic) canons. He spent most of his life at Mount Saint Agnes, where he was ordained priest (1413–14) and served as subprior and director of novices. He was a prolific copyist.

Thomas wrote or compiled more than thirty works, which may be arranged in the following categories: (1) several volumes of monastic sermons; (2) biographies of the founders of the Devotio Moderna (Gerard Groote, Florent Radewijns, and others) intended for the edification of novices; (3) a chronicle of his monastery that includes much historical and biographical information on the Devotio Moderna; and (4) numerous works on the spiritual life (e.g., On the Exaltation of the Spirit [De elevatione mentis]; Soul's Soliloquy; various Prayers and Meditations on the Life and Passion of the Lord; On True, Heartfelt Remorse; Valley of Lilies; Garden of Roses; On the Training of Monks [De disciplina claustralium]). Like other leaders in the Windesheim monastic reform, Thomas's concern was for practical methods to achieve genuine devotion and a true observance of the monastic rule.

Thomas à Kempis is best known, however, for the compilation of the four books of the Imitation of Christ. Although long disputed, general scholarly consensus since the late 1950s ascribes it to Thomas. Widely transmitted, translated, and read by Catholics and Protestants alike, the Imitation expresses a contemplative and monastic emphasis on the interior life and its disciplines. Thus, unlike the semimonastic spirituality of the Brethren of the Common Life, who sought to live devout lives in the middle of bustling cities, the spiritual teaching of the Imitation emphasizes withdrawal from the distractions and dangers of the world. It warns against placing confidence in one's own prudence and calls for knowledge of oneself, continual self-judgment, and other traditional monastic virtues. It is also critical of speculative theologizing, preferring study that inflames the heart with love for God. The first book is a collection (raparium) of spiritual meditations; the second and third books, the heart of the Imitation, offer counsel on growth in virtues such as humility, patience, and obedience and on the fluctuations of the interior life. The fourth book is devoted to eucharistic piety. D. D. MARTIN

See also BRETHREN OF THE COMMON LIFE; DEVOTIO MODERNA; SPIRITUALITY.

Bibliography. J. P. Arthur et al., Works of Thomas à Kempis; D. Butler, Thomas à Kempis: A Religious Study; J. E. G. de Montmorency, Thomas à Kempis: His Age and Book; A. Hyma, Christian Renaissance; S. Kettlewell, Thomas à Kempis and the Brothers of the Common Life; R. R. Post, Modern Devotion: Confrontation with Reformation and Humanism; V. Scully, Life of the Venerable Thomas à Kempis; F. Vandebroucke, Spirituality of the Middle Ages; J. van Ginneken, Following of Christ or the Spiritual Diary of Gerard Groot.

Thomas Aquinas (1225–1274). Italian theologian and doctor of the church, born at Roccasecca near Aquino, Italy. He was inducted into a Benedictine monastery at age five but later was forcibly removed by his family and enrolled at the new secular University at Naples (1239), where he joined the Dominicans. Sometime after 1245 he began studies under Albert the Great at the Convent of St. James, Paris. In 1248 Aquinas and Albert started a school in Cologne. Aquinas returned to Paris in 1252 to teach at the university. From 1259 to 1268 he taught at the papal Curiae in Italy, where he met the translator

William Moerbeke. The Latin Averroist controversy called him back to Paris (1268–72). His final years were spent in Naples teaching in a Dominican house. He died at Fossanova on the way to the Council of Lyons, March 7, 1274.

Aquinas was canonized in 1326, made a doctor of the church in 1567, commended for study by Pope Leo XIII (Aeterni Patris) in 1879, and declared patron of Catholic schools in 1880.

Major Writings. Thomas is credited with some ninety-eight works, though nine are of doubtful authenticity. His writings were produced steadily from 1252 until the year of his death. The greatest and most influential of his works was Summa Theologica, a systematic presentation of Christian doctrine in philosophical terms. His system was declared the official teaching of the Catholic Church by Leo XIII.

Thought. The views of Aquinas cover most philosophical and theological categories.

Faith and Reason. Like Augustine, Aquinas believed faith was based in God's revelation in Scripture. Support for faith was found in miracles and probable arguments. Although God's existence is provable by reason, sin obscures human ability to know, and so belief (not proof) that God exists is necessary for most. Reason, however, is never the basis for faith in God. Demanding reasons for belief in God actually lessens the merit of one's faith. Believers, nonetheless, should reason about and for their faith. There are five ways to demonstrate God's existence by reason. (1) From motion to an Unmoved Mover, (2) from effects to a First Cause, (3) from contingent being to a Necessary Being, (4) from degrees of perfection to a Most Perfect Being, and (5) from design in nature to a Designer. There are, however, mysteries (e.g., Trinity, Incarnation) that cannot be known by human reason but only by faith.

Epistemology. Aquinas held that all knowledge begins in experience. We are, however, born with an a priori, innate capacity to know. Certainty about reality is possible by means of first principles: (1) identity—being is being, (2) noncontradiction—being is not nonbeing, (3) the excluded middle—either being or nonbeing, (4) causality—nonbeing cannot cause being, and (5) finality—every being acts toward an end. So nothing is in the mind that was not first in the senses—except the mind itself with its capacity to know by means of first principles. These first principles are self-evident once they are understood.

Metaphysics. Like Aristotle, Aquinas believed it was the function of the wise man to know order. The order reason produces in its own acts is logic. That which it produces through acts of will is ethics. The order produced by reason in external things is art. But the order reason contemplates (but does not produce) is nature. When nature is contemplated insofar as it is sensible, one is studying the physical sciences. Nature studied insofar as it is quantifiable is mathematics. But nature studied insofar as it is being is metaphysics.

The heart of Aquinas's metaphysics is the real distinction between essence and existence in all finite beings. Aristotle had distinguished between actuality and potentiality, but he applied this only to form and matter, not to the order of being. Aquinas argued that only God is pure being, pure actuality, with no potentiality whatsoever. Hence, the central premise of Thomistic thought is "act in the order in which it is act is unlimited and unique, unless it is cojoined with passive potency." God alone is pure act(uality) without form. Angels are completely actualized potentialities (pure forms), and man is a composition of form (soul) and matter (body) with progressive actualization.

God. God alone is being (I Am-ness). Everything else has being. God's essence is identical to his existence, it is of his essence to exist. God is a necessary being. He cannot not exist. Neither can God change, since he is without potentiality to be anything other than he is. Likewise, God is eternal, since time implies a change from a before to an after. But as the I AM (Exod. 3:14), God has no before and afters. God is also simple (indivisible), since he has no potential for division. And he is infinite, since pure act as such is unlimited, having no potentiality to limit it. Besides these metaphysical attributes, God is also morally perfect and infinitely wise.

Analogy. God is known by analogy. Univocal (totally the same) knowledge of God is impossible, since our knowledge is limited and God is unlimited. Equivocal (totally different) knowledge of God is impossible, since creation resembles the Creator (Ps. 19:1; Rom. 1:19–20); the effect resembles its efficient cause. Because there are great differences between God and creatures, the way of negation (via negativa) is necessary. We must take only the perfection signified (goodness, truth, etc.), without the finite mode of signification, when we apply it to God. So the attribute will have the same definition for creatures and Creator, but it will have a different application or extension, since creatures are finitely good, while God is infinitely good. So before we can appropriately apply the term good to God, we must negate the finite mode (how) in which we find good among creatures and apply the meaning (what) to God in an unlimited way.

Creation. God created the world out of nothing (ex nihilo). Although Aquinas believed that an eternal creation was logically possible, since there is no logical reason and eternal cause cannot be causing eternally; nevertheless, he believed that Scripture teaches a beginning of the universe. Time did not exist before God created—only eternity. God did not create in time; rather, with the world there was the creation of time. So there was no time before time began.

Humanity. Humans are a hylomorphic unity of soul and body. Adam was directly created by God at the beginning, and God directly creates each new soul in the womb of its mother. Despite this unity of soul and body, there is no identity between them. The soul survives death and awaits the reunion with the body at the resurrection.

Ethics. Just as there are first principles of thought, so there are first principles of action called laws. Aquinas distinguishes four kinds. Eternal law is the plan by which God governs creation. Natural law is the participation of rational creatures in this eternal law. Human law is a particular application of natural law to a local community. And divine law is the revelation of God's law through Scripture and the church.

Virtues are in two classes: natural and supernatural. The former include prudence, justice, courage, and temperance. These are part of the natural law. Supernatural virtues are faith, hope, and love.

N. L. GEISLER

See also ANALOGY; FIVE WAYS; METAPHYSICS; NEO-THOMISM; PHILOSOPHY, CHRISTIAN VIEW OF; REALISM; REASON; THOMISM; VIA NEGATIVA.

Bibliography. V. J. Bourke, Aquinas' Search for Wisdom and Thomistic Bibliography: 1920–1940; M. D. Chenu, Toward Understanding St. Thomas; G. K. Chesterton, St. Thomas Aquinas; R. J. Deferrari, Complete Index of the Summa Theologica of St. Thomas Aquinas; Latin-English Dictionary of Thomas Aquinas, etc.; Lexicon of St. Thomas Aquinas Based on Summa Theologica and Select Passages of His Other Work; K. Foster, Life of St. Thomas Aquinas; É. Gilson, Christian Philosophy of St. Thomas Aquinas; M. Grabmann, Interior Life of St. Thomas Aquinas; J. Maritain, St. Thomas Aquinas, Angel of the Schools; A. Vos, Aquinas, Calvin and Contemporary Protestant Thought; A. Walz, Saint Thomas Aquinas: A Biographical Study.

Thomism. The school of philosophy and theology following the thought of Thomas Aquinas (1225–74). It developed in various phases and has experienced periods of support and neglect.

When Aquinas died he left no direct successor, but his system was adopted by various individuals, most notably by many of his confreres in the Dominican order and by his own original teacher, the eclectic Albertus Magnus. Nonetheless, there was still much opposition to his Aristotelianism on the part of church authorities, and in 1277 in Paris and Oxford several propositions derived from Thomas's teachings were condemned. It was primarily due to Dominican efforts that the system of Aquinas was not only eventually rehabilitated, but that he himself was canonized in 1323.

From this time period on, Thomism became one of the several competing schools of medieval philosophy, e.g., Augustinianism, the Franciscan followers of Duns Scotus, and the nominalist disciples of William of Occam. Thomism distinguished itself with its Aristotelian doctrines of the unity of the human person (composed of the soul as the form of the body), the analogy of being, the reality of forms within particular entities, and the real distinction between a being and its essence. At the same time, the followers of St. Thomas did not remain uniform, but particular commentators took on individual traits.

A central figure of developing Thomism was Thomas de Vio Cardinal Cajetan (1469–1534) who is also known as the debating opponent of Martin Luther. His high ecclesiastical standing contributed to the authoritativeness of his expositions of Aquinas. Cajetan thought more in terms of abstract essences than his predecessors, who emphasized existing substances. He raised doubt concerning the provability of both God's existence and the immortality of the soul.

Thomism became the leading school of Catholic thought in the sixteenth century. Several factors contributed to its ascendancy. The Jesuit order (approved in 1540), known for its aggressive teaching, aligned itself with Aquinas; also, the Council of Trent (first convened in 1545) self-consciously styled many of its pronouncements in Thomistic phraseology.

Thomism entered the seventeenth century triumphantly but exited void of power and originality. John of St. Thomas (1589–1644) is a good representative of the early century. He was a creative teacher and interpreter of Aquinas's thought; he was a careful and passionate official of the Spanish Inquisition; and he was an intimate advisor to King Philip IV. Thus, in him the intellectual, theological, and political machinations of Thomism are brought to a focus. But Thomism's primacy bore the seeds of its own demise. Due to lack of competition, Thomism became too self-contained to cope with the rise of rationalism and empirical science on their own ground. Thomism would not adapt itself; and so the alternatives left were obscurantism or non-Thomistic philosophy. Consequently, though Thomism was still alive, primarily in Dominican circles, in the eighteenth century it was essentially a spent force.

But the early nineteenth century saw another abrupt change in the fortunes of Thomism. Catholic thinkers increasingly began to see that in Thomas's works there were viable responses to topical questions not answered elsewhere. Particularly the questions of human dignity in the face of rising industrialism revived Thomism. Dramatically the schools returned to the authority of Aquinas. By the time of Vatican I (1869/70), Thomistic principles were again in vogue. And Thomism triumphed in 1879 when Pope Leo XIII in Aeterni Patris recalled the church to St. Thomas. The result was the movement known as neo-Thomism, which has persisted well past the middle of the twentieth century. W. CORDUAN

See also CAJETAN, THOMAS DE VIO; NEO-THOMISM; SCHOLASTICISM; THOMAS AQUINAS.

Bibliography. V. J. Bourke, Thomistic Bibliography: 1920–1940; N. L. Geisler, Thomas Aquinas: An Evangelical Appraisal; E. Gilson, Christian Philosophy of St. Thomas Aquinas; H. John, Thomist Spectrum; R. M. McInerney, First Glance at St. Thomas; T. L. Miethe and V. J. Bourke, Thomistic Bibliography: 1940–1978.

Thornwell, James Henley (1812–1862). Distinguished Southern Presbyterian theologian and educator, born in Marlborough District, South Carolina. He was educated at South Carolina College (now University of South Carolina), then attended Andover Seminary, Harvard University, and Columbia (S.C.) Seminary. Converted to Calvinism through reading the Westminster Confession of Faith, he was later described by Charles Hodge of Princeton, during the heat of ecclesiastical debate, as “hyper-hyper-hyper Calvinist.” He served as pastor of the influential First Presbyterian Church in Columbia, and eventually became president of South Carolina College, which he purged of strong deist and unitarian influences. Afterward, Thornwell became professor in Columbia Theological Seminary.

His theology, which was traditional, evangelical Calvinism, displays a vast erudition in classical and modern philosophy, as well as in the history of thought. Thornwell, according to Thornton Whaling, endeavored to bring reason and faith, theology and philosophy, dogma and ethics, into a systematic unity. Like Calvin, he held that the major theme of religious thought is the relationship between God and man. Whaling shows that Thornwell summarized theological science in terms of “The Moral Government of God in Its Essential Principles; as Modified by the Covenant of Works; and as Modified by the Covenant of Grace.” Although Thornwell died too early to compose a systematic theology, he was a prolific theological writer and also edited the Southern Quarterly Review.

Thornwell's ecclesiology has perhaps attracted more interest than his theology. He held to a pure spirituality of the church, entailing an absolute separation of church and state, and thus opposed church sanction of movements of social reform. In opposition to Charles Hodge, he did not favor the introduction of boards into church government. He was a vigorous defender of slavery as scriptural and of state's rights, and was a founder of the Southern Presbyterian Church (P.C.U.S.), which separated from the national body in 1861 over the Civil War. D. F. KELLY

Bibliography. J. B. Adger and J. L. Girardeau, eds., Collected Writings of James Henley Thornwell; J. O. Farmer Jr., Metaphysical Confederacy: James Henley

Thornwell, James Henley

Thornwell and the Synthesis of Southern Values; E. B. Hollifield, Gentlemen Theologians: American Theology in Southern Culture, 1795–1860; B. M. Palmer, Life and Letters of James Henley Thornwell; T. W. Rogers, "James Henley Thornwell," JCR 7:175–205; M. H. Smith, Studies in Southern Presbyterian Theology; T. Whaling, "Dr. Thornwell as a Theologian," in Centennial Address Commemorating the Birth of the Rev. James Henley Thornwell.

Tillich, Paul (1886–1965). One of the most widely read and influential liberal Protestant theologians of the twentieth century. Tillich was born in the village of Starzeddel near Guben in Prussia. According to his own account, his early years had a great influence on both his theological interest and development. His father was a Lutheran minister who was of a conservative temperament and nurtured in his son a respect for traditional beliefs and values. His mother, on the other hand, encouraged openness of mind and a spirit of intellectual adventure. As he put it, therefore, he was brought up "on the boundary" between these two temperaments. He formed a deep attachment to the country life of his childhood, with its stable rural pace and closeness to nature. When, however, the family moved to Berlin when Tillich was fourteen, he was equally fascinated by the excitement and vitality of the big city. These early experiences of conservatism and openness, of the quiet life of a rural area and the pressing human environment of a large and busy world capital, placed a permanent stamp on his life and thought. Throughout his long career he retained a deep respect for nature while being actively involved in the human affairs of his time. And while he appreciated traditional beliefs and values, he constantly strained to move beyond them. He studied philosophy and theology and took his Ph.D. degree at Breslau, writing a dissertation on Schelling. He was ordained to the Lutheran ministry in 1912.

World War I, in which he served as a chaplain in the German forces, also had an important influence on his development. The war provided the newly ordained Tillich with a vivid experience of the destructive underside of human nature, as well as the conviction that Christians must be involved in the affairs of life around them. His war experience also drove him to seek relief from its cruelty, and he found this in art. His openness to art and the larger cultural context in which it had its genesis was an important aspect of his mature thought. If it is fair to attach any label at all to Tillich's thought, it is a theology of culture.

He spent his professional life teaching theology and philosophy. In the troubled late 1920s he became interested in the religious-socialist movement, and his open opposition to Hitler and the political-cultural views he represented led to Tillich's dismissal from the philosophy faculty at the University of Frankfurt in 1933. Not long after leaving Frankfurt he came to the United States. His academic career in America spanned thirty-three years, during which he authored several books and taught at Union Theological Seminary (New York), Columbia University, Harvard University, and the University of Chicago. He became an American citizen in 1940.

His interests and research were wide-ranging, and the influences on his thought were correspondingly diverse. They include Platonism, medieval mysticism, German idealism, and existentialism. The latter philosophical perspective, which he encountered in-depth while teaching at Marburg, was perhaps the greatest single influence on his work. Tillich's theological methodology has been called the "method of correlation," and proposes that philosophy and theology should play a complementary role to each other. Philosophy's task is to pose problems and ask questions, while the challenge of theology is to enter into dialogue with philosophy, understand its questions, and struggle to come up with answers.

Perhaps the most important work of his career was the three-volume Systematic Theology (1963). Here it is argued that God should be viewed as the ground of being, known to us as ultimate concern. It is by participation in this ground of being that one receives one's own being. One must face nonbeing. When one does so and courageously affirms one's self in the face of nonbeing, he or she is expressing ultimate concern. The "New Being" is Jesus Christ. When Jesus gave himself on the cross, he became "transparent" to the ground of being, i.e., the Christ, the New Being. Jesus the Christ is therefore the answer to one's existential need.

The structure and meaning of reality can be grasped only by myths or symbols, which are signs that actually participate in the reality to which they point. How they participate in this reality is not as clear as it should be. This leaves one with the impression that Tillich's philosophy of religious language is not only difficult to understand—it may indeed be impossible to understand. This perhaps derives from the fact that he is attempting to use traditional Christian vocabulary to express essentially alien philosophical concepts, whereas in reality the two are fundamentally incompatible.

Tillich was a prolific writer in both German and English. His published works include Interpretation of History (1936); Protestant Era (1936); Courage to Be (1952); New Being (1955); Theology of Culture (1959); and Morality and Beyond (1963). On the Boundary (1966) is a revision of part 1 of Interpretation of History. It is a brief and very readable autobiographical sketch offered by Tillich to the public.

J. D. SPICELAND

Bibliography. R. C. Crossman, Paul Tillich: A Comprehensive Bibliography; C. W. Kegley and R. W. Bretall, eds.,

Theology of Paul Tillich; W. Leibrecht, HCT 485–500; J. R. Lyons, ed., Intellectual Legacy of Paul Tillich; W. and M. Pauck, Paul Tillich: His Life and Thought; R. P. Scharlemann, Reflection and Doubt in the Thought of Paul Tillich; H. Tillich, From Time to Time.

Time (Gr. chronos). One of the most vexing problems of philosophy. The Bible presents a distinctive conception of time, reflected especially by its peculiar use of the terms kairos and aiōn. Instead of viewing time abstractly as a problem, it regards time as a created sphere in which God's redemptive plan is actualized.

In the usual secular sense, kairos refers to a definite point of time especially appropriate for a given undertaking (Acts 24:25), aiōn to an extent of time (stipulated or unstipulated). The NT builds on this usage with a special eye to redemptive history (John 7:6), in which divine determination (Acts 1:7), not human deliberation, constitutes a given moment or age the appropriate time of God's working. "Because . . . the divine plan of salvation is bound to such time points or kairoi chosen by God, . . . it is . . . redemptive history. Not all fragments of ongoing time constitute redemptive history in the narrower sense, but rather . . . these kairoi singled out from time as a whole" (Cullmann, 40–41).

While the NT gives prominent scope to the future kairoi associated with the eschatological drama, its central kairos is the life and death and resurrection of the incarnate Christ, which is decisively significant for the kingdom of God. The terms "day [of the Lord]" and "hour," "now," and "today" likewise gain dramatic significance in the NT context whenever the eternal order and redemptive history impinges upon the sweep of ordinary events. The interconnected redemptive kairoi supply the threadline of salvation history. Yet the divine kairoi at the same time secretly enfold the entire secular movement of time (Acts 17:26) for the fulfillment, often unwittingly, of God's ultimate purposes.

As the kairos is a decisive momentary unveiling of the eternal, so the aiōn discloses the Lord of ages who divides the long sweep of time according to his own purposes. The kairoi are decisive turning points within the larger aiōna. The Bible brackets history with an eye on the age of promise, the age of fulfillment, and the age to come.

One's transition to the eternal order will not involve him or her in the supersession of temporal experience since, although redeemed, he or she remains a creature (Rev. 10:6, "There will be no more delay!").

Modern philosophy characteristically affirms that it takes time more seriously than did ancient or medieval philosophy. Classic Greek thought dissolved the significance of the temporal world, depicting it as illusory shadow alongside the eternal ideas and forms. The influence of Platonic and Aristotelian thought upon medieval scholars served to divert attention from the unique biblical view of history to the revealed truths of Judeo-Christian religion, although the importance of historical revelation and redemption remained central in the great creeds. Modern idealistic philosophy shunned the historical and temporal as bearing eternal meaning and significance at any point, and therefore was hostile, even if often in a concealed manner, to the doctrines of Christ's unique incarnation and atonement. Led by Hegel, however, modern idealism placed time and history in the very nature of the Absolute. Thus it simultaneously minimized the uniqueness of biblical history and exaggerated the spirituality of history in general by viewing all as divine process. In two ways this profoundly unbiblical speculation retained nonetheless a debt to the biblical view. Against the depreciation of the temporal by classic ancient philosophy, it stressed God's aggressive interest in history; and against cyclical views of history as a process of recurring ages, it emphasized that the time process moves toward a perfect goal.

Equally significant, evolutionary naturalism, returning to the Greek cosmocentric outlook at the expense of theistic interpretations of reality, appealed to modern evolutionary views as lifting time to decisive importance. Its notion that time itself actualizes new forms of life was more popularly held in the first half century after Darwin than today, when speculative interest in emergent evolution is enlarging. Both approaches usually retain the expectation of a higher goal to which the temporal process moves, thus reflecting a secret indebtedness of modern theories of progress to the biblical doctrine of the kingdom of God, which speculative expositions strip of its supernatural features.

Outside the stream of biblical theology, virtually the whole movement of ancient religion and philosophy depreciated the significance of the temporal order. Not all religions of the Orient indeed shared the notion of nirvana, peculiar to Buddhism, with its emphasis on history and personal existence as evil and its expectation of bliss through annihilation or by absorption into the divine rather than through historical redemption; but none of them rose to the biblical emphasis that history displays a purposive movement to an intelligent, moral goal. The nonbiblical religions and speculation of antiquity did not escape the cycle theory of history as a series of recurring ages; in fact, this conception was sometimes spiritualized by designating the process "God" along pantheistic lines. While Zoroastrianism made more room for ethical teleology through its insistence on two eternal principles, good and evil, its unrelieved dualism excluded an abiding significance for history. In fact, while shunning the notion of eternal recurrence, Zoroastrianism nonetheless divided the world movement into four ages.

Time

Nowhere does the importance of time come into view as in biblical teaching. While time is not ultimate, it is the divinely created sphere of God's preserving and redemptive work, and the arena of one's decision on his or her way to an eternal destiny. History moves toward a divine goal involving the redemption of the elect by the Creator and Lord of the universe. Within this historical matrix, every thought, word, and deed has repercussions in the eternal moral order. Richard Kroner aptly summarizes the biblical philosophy: "History has a beginning in God, it has its center in Christ and its end in the final consummation and the Last Judgment" (ER, 582). Oscar Cullmann emphasizes that, as against the Jewish conception of a linear history still awaiting its climax (the Christ event coinciding with the parousia), in the Christian view the center of history lies in a past event rather than in the eschatological future (the death and resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth decisively controls the timeline thereafter).

Cullmann properly warns against excessive disjunctions of time and eternity by Kierkegaard, Barth, Brunner, and Bultmann. But his own alternative impairs the unique eternity of God. Moreover, Cullmann's biblical realism is threatened by concessions to the notion of "temporal, non-historical myth," to which he reduces much in the biblical narratives of the beginning and the end. If such myth actually preserves the continuity of the temporal line, why may not all biblical events be reduced to this status and the second Adam be dismissed on the same pattern as the first Adam?
C. F. H. HENRY

See also AGE, AGES; THIS AGE, THE AGE TO COME.

Bibliography. J. Barr, Biblical Words for Time; D. Buckwalter, EDBT 774–75; O. Cullmann, Christ and Time; G. Dellling, TDNT 3:455–64; 9:581–93; J. Guhr et al., NIDNTT 3:826–50; H. Sasse, TDNT 1:197–209; T. F. Torrance, Space, Time and Incarnation.

Tindal, Matthew (ca. 1655–1733). English deist, a native of Devonshire. He was educated at Oxford University and in 1678 became a law fellow in All Souls College. Tindal advocated High-Church Anglicanism but was associated with the small group of deists in that movement. He developed a reputation as an expert in international law and published a controversial work, Rights of the Christian Church Asserted (1706). To this work he added several political tracts, which gradually came to support the Whig faction in politics.

Tindal's greatest fame, however, came as a deist leader, and he labeled himself a Christian deist. His reputation on this score was secured by his 1730 publication Christianity as Old as the Creation, or the Gospel a Republication of the Religion of Nature. This work especially criticized alliances between church and state, alliances that, according to Tindal, corrupted Christianity. He argued that earliest Christianity was pure but that politics subverted its original natural principles, which were understandable to any rational man. Such ideas were common among deists, and Tindal had supported them often, though unpopularly, at Oxford; but he went farther by adding skeptical critiques of the Bible. He attacked traditional ideas of biblical inspiration and asserted that the rational person need not rely on special revelation.

Tindal's writings were very important in summarizing English deism's development from the late seventeenth century to the 1730s. The movement was very attractive to critics of all contemporary forms of Christianity and spurred many responses (Tindal's major work is said to have drawn one hundred fifty published replies). Also, Tindal's combination of deist and whiggish views influenced Voltaire's religious outlook and his descriptions of English life as well. Tindal's work, however, also marked the exhaustion of the English deist movement, for virtually all elements of historic Christianity had been subjected to negative critique. Few positive religious ideas remained in deism in spite of deists' claims that the basics of Christianity were as valid as "natural religion" and that any "right-thinking" person could believe those basic notions. Critics of deism continued to insist on a supernatural God, on belief in divine revelation, and on many doctrines derived from biblical writings.

R. J. VANDERMOLEN

See also DEISM; ENLIGHTENMENT, THE; TOLAND, JOHN.

Bibliography. O. Chadwick, Secularization of the European Mind in the 19th Century; G. R. Cragg, Church in the Age of Reason, 1648–1789; Reason and Authority in the Eighteenth Century; P. Gay, Enlightenment: An Interpretation; J. Orr, English Deism: Its Roots and Fruits; L. Stephen, History of English Thought in the Eighteenth Century; R. Stromberg, Religious Liberalism in Eighteenth-Century England; N. L. Torrey, Voltaire and the English Deists.

Tithe. See OFFERINGS AND SACRIFICES IN BIBLE TIMES.

Tithing. The practice of giving a tenth of one's property or produce to support religious institutions or the priesthood. It is an ancient practice, widespread in antiquity and found in Judaism as well as in surrounding cultures of the ancient Near East.

Commandments to tithe in the OT emphasize the quantity (one-tenth) of the gift. In this is the belief that God is entitled to share directly in the grain, wine, and oil that humans are permitted to produce. At different times in Israel's history, varying regulations governed the tithe. Before the time of the Deuteronomic code, tithes were used to celebrate a cultic festival at the local holy place, as when Amos mentions the tithes brought to Bethel (4:4), probably because of the vow made by Jacob (Gen. 28:22). The firstborn of flocks and a tithe of the fruits of the field provided for the festive meal. The priest of the holy place, strangers, widows, and orphans shared in the meal with those who brought the provisions. The remainders from the meal were given to the priests and their assistants as well as to the needy (Deut. 14:22–29).

In the book of Deuteronomy, the firstborn of the flocks and the tithes are to be brought to the central holy place in Jerusalem (“the place he will choose as a dwelling for his Name,” 14:23). Families and the Levites of the towns were to travel to Jerusalem for the festive meal. If the journey was too long and carrying the tithe too difficult, one could sell the tithe and buy what was needed in Jerusalem (vv. 24–26). Yet this system did not adequately provide for the needs of the poor, so the code stipulated that every third year the tithe should be kept in the local town (vv. 28–29; 26:12–15). It would be distributed to Levites, sojourners, the fatherless, and widows who could not produce food for themselves.

The trip and tithe in Jerusalem changed the nature of the tithe from a harvest sacrifice to more of a cultic tax. The concentration of worship in Jerusalem also meant that temple priests required a somewhat regular income. During the exilic period the tithe became a type of tax paid to the priests. In postexilic texts, the cultic meal is no longer mentioned. At this time tithes were stored in warehouses (Neh. 10:38; Mal. 3:10). Then too, tithes no longer were required to be brought to Jerusalem, but rather were collected by local Levites (Neh. 10:37–38). This in effect made the tithe a tax.

References to the tithe are few in the NT. Jesus attacked the Pharisees for paying the tithe (Gr. apodekatoō) exactly while neglecting the more important parts of the law: justice, mercy, and faithfulness (Matt. 23:23; cf. Luke 11:42). The Pharisee is shown praying in the temple, “I . . . give a tenth of all I get” (Luke 18:12). There are three references to Genesis 14:17–20 in Hebrews 7:6, 8–9.

The early church prescribed a tithe for its members. Yet this differed from OT regulations in that the tithe was seen as an absolute minimum, and it was to be given from one’s total income. The Didache prescribed that firstfruits be given of “money, clothes, and of all your possessions” (13:7).

In the later history of the church, the obligation to tithe was always held in tension with Christ’s command to sell all and renounce possessions (Matt. 19:21) along with Paul’s teaching that Christ brings freedom from legal prescriptions (Gal. 5:1). By the fifth and sixth centuries, the practice of tithing was well established in old areas of Christianity in the West. In the eighth century, Carolingian rulers made the ecclesiastical tithe part of secular law.

By the twelfth century, monks who previously had been forbidden to receive tithes and required to pay them obtained a measure of freedom in being able to receive tithes while being freed from the obligation of payment. Controversies over tithes often arose when people sought to evade payment while others sought to appropriate tithe revenues for themselves.

Medieval tithes were divided into predial, due from the fruits of the earth; personal, due from labor; and mixed, due from the produce of livestock. These were further divided into great, derived from corn, hay, and wood to go to the rector or incumbent priest of the parish; and small, from all other predial tithes, plus mixed and personal tithes to go to the vicar.

In England, particularly by the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, the issue of tithes was a source of intense conflict since a state church depended on tithes for its livelihood. Social, political, and economic implications were considerable in Archbishop Laud’s attempts to increase tithe payments prior to 1640. English Puritans and others wanted the abolition of tithes in favor of voluntary contributions to support clergy. But the question of the tithe aroused some of the fiercest passions and bitterness of all issues associated with the English Civil War. After the war, the legislative tithe survived in England until the twentieth century.

Contemporary churches emphasize tithing in different ways and to various degrees. Some call for giving ten percent of one’s income in accord with the biblical standard. Others stress proportional financial giving in relation to available income. Still others expand the concept of “tithing” to include not only monetary giving, but also the giving of time and talents for God’s work through the church.

D. K. McKIM

Bibliography. G. Constable, Monastic Tithes from Their Origins to the Twelfth Century; C. Hill, Economic Problems of the Church from Archbishop Whitgift to the Long Parliament; L. Vischer, Tithing in the Early Church.

Toland, John (1670–1722). English deist, born near Londonderry, Ireland; educated in a dissenter school at Redcastle and in the Enlightenment centers at Glasgow, Edinburgh (M.A. 1690), and Leiden. He concluded his formal education at Oxford University. Toland’s reputation as a controversial thinker commenced in 1696, when he published Christianity Not Mysterious. This work was attacked by English clerics and by members of the House of Commons as well.

Toland, John

Toland returned to Ireland and was publicly defended by William Molyneux and John Locke. Toland supported himself by editing the works of others (Milton, Harrington), by publishing political tracts supporting Whig policies, and by gaining the support of wealthy patrons.

Because of the controversy stirred by his work, Toland had a precarious existence. He visited Hanover, Holland, Prussia, and Austria in search of patrons but had little success. Of greater value to him were his political tracts against English Jacobites and high churchmen, for he was given financial support by Harley, Earl of Oxford. Toland's fortunes improved with the Whig ascendancy under King George I, to the extent that he speculated in the South Sea Company. He died at Putney after a brief illness.

Toland became one of the best-known English deists and was quite popular among continental writers. His writings gave English deism a new, controversial direction in that he rejected Christian mysteries and miracles that lacked rational proofs. Such a rejection meant criticism of orthodox ideas about the Trinity and the incarnation, and also opened the Scriptures to rationalistic criticisms. In Toland's view it was necessary to purge from Christianity what had been introduced by converted Jews and "superstitious" Gentiles. The resultant religion would be the original, simple, pure Christianity that conformed to modern rationalism. Toland did not deny the existence of revelation but did reduce its role to a supplementary one. This was not what John Locke and English churchmen advocated, but it did become characteristic of deist thought. Toland popularized deist ideas, but he also created widespread opposition in the English church. Ultimately, John Locke's rejection of skepticism and his reliance on revelation prevailed, while Toland's deism remained the possession of a few intellectuals. R. J. VANDERMOLEN

See also DEISM; ENLIGHTENMENT, THE; TINDAL, MATTHEW.

Bibliography. J. C. Biddle, "Locke's Critique of Innate Principles and Toland's Deism," JHI 37:411-23; G. R. Cragg, Reason and Authority in the Eighteenth Century; P. Gay, Enlightenment: An Interpretation; J. Orr, English Deism: Its Roots and Fruits; L. Stephen, History of English Thought in the Eighteenth Century; R. Stromberg, Religious Liberalism in Eighteenth-Century England; R. E. Sullivan, John Toland and the Deist Controversy.

Tolerance. Indulgence of belief or conduct other than one's own. The term is variously defined from being an attitude of forbearance in judging the beliefs and behavior of others to one of respect for the opinions and practices of others when they are in conflict with one's own. The problem of tolerance is deeply rooted in the history of religions, in which coercion, intolerance, and persecution have played a prominent role. Religious intolerance, generally born out of the denial of the right of dissent in faith or practice, is as old as religious diversity.

Throughout human history, religion and tolerance have not been natural allies. Intolerance, not tolerance; conformity, not nonconformity; and assent, not dissent; have been hallmarks in the history of religions. More wars have been fought, more persecutions have been carried out, and more lives have been lost in the name of religion than probably for any other single cause. Religious intolerance has, in turn, been made the basis of racial prejudice and acts of political and social discrimination against nonadherents or nonconformists to established religious faith. Among the causes of religious intolerance are the following: (1) a religion that is viewed as false and/or dangerous to the prevailing religious community; (2) a religion perceived to be in conflict with the mores and moral values of a particular society; (3) a religion judged to be subversive because its teachings threaten the pattern of political authority or the political policy being advanced; and (4) a religion believed to be alien to the culture in which it is being promulgated or one identified with a foreign power.

Tolerance in History. The ultimate concerns of religious traditions have in a sense precluded the tolerance of opposing views of faith and practice. Because of the will to demand conformity to unify the empire or nation, religious differences or expressions of dissent were treated with intolerance, which became the basis of persecution. Generally speaking, diversity was abhorred because it represented a threat to the unity and solidarity of the tribe, the state, the empire, or the nation. The denial of tolerance is usually characterized by the following: (1) the absolutizing of the formulations of a particular faith and the necessity of defending it; (2) fear of the consequences of tolerating moral and religious error; (3) abhorrence of unorthodox views and practices; and (4) intense hostility toward those who are nonconformists with respect to the legally and socially accepted norms of religious faith and practice.

These characteristics, deeply embedded in interfaith and international relations throughout the history of religions, have been manifestly present in the waves of intense persecution carried on throughout the centuries in Christianity's relations with Jews and Judaism, in the confrontations between Islam and Christianity, and in the encounters between Catholicism and Protestantism.

For several thousand years the history of religion has been marked by intolerance, which has clearly not been restricted to any one era or to any one religion. Examples include persecution of the adherents of Amon by Ikhnaton (Ahmenhotep IV), of the Canaanites by the Israelites, of Jesus and the early Christians by the Romans, of Buddhists by Shintoists, of Sufis by Islamic orthodoxy, of heretics and Jews by Christians, of Protestants by Catholics and of Catholics by Protestants, of Anabaptists by Martin Luther, of religious sectarians by Protestant established churches (in the Old World and New), of “witches” and Quakers by the Puritans in early Massachusetts, and, when fused with political power, of religious dissenters by religious fundamentalists.

As long as religions were tribal or national in character, tolerance of another religion within the tribe or nation could not be countenanced, since another religion threatened the unity of the group, which had to be preserved in order to maintain the state’s solidarity. While an outward tolerance, i.e., acknowledgment of other gods and religions identified with other people, constituted no problem in the ancient world, veneration of foreign gods or criticism or dissent with respect to the religion of one’s own tribe or nation was not tolerated. Even in ancient Greece, a relatively liberal and syncretistic culture, Socrates had to drink the cup of poison for having undermined belief in the Greek gods and the state religion, thereby endangering the unity of the Greek state. For this reason, Plato wrote, “If a person be proven guilty of impiety, not merely from childish levity, but such as grown-up men may be guilty of, . . . let him be punished with death.”

The Romans persecuted Christians, not because the Christian faith lacked religious truths or good ethical and moral teachings, but because Christians refused to worship the emperor of Rome. Christianity was thereby a threat to Roman unity, to the sacred institution of Imperium Romanum. Thus, later in the alliance of Christianity with Rome, following the espousal of Christianity by Constantine in the Edict of Milan of A.D. 313, Christianity became the persecutor of rival faiths within the Roman Empire, since once again rival faiths threatened the unity of the empire. Non-Christian temples were destroyed, and a death penalty was imposed upon those who continued to offer sacrifices to pagan gods.

The concept of the Christian state prevailed throughout the Middle Ages. With the establishment of the Holy Roman Empire by Charlemagne in 800, the concept attained ultimate application. To be a citizen of the empire was to be a member of the church, and to be a member of the church was the foundation of one’s citizenship in the empire. Enemies of the church, such as heretics and sectarians, were regarded as enemies of the empire. Non-Christians, such as Jews, were therefore aliens without any real citizenship and were treated as outcasts without human status or civil rights.

Augustine, bishop of Hippo, had provided a theological rationale for intolerance. Indeed, for more than a millennium, Augustine’s text, “Compel them to come in” (Luke 14:23 KJV), was used to authorize the use of force by the church against heretics and infidels, since liberty of error is the ultimate destroyer of the soul. Augustine furnished theological justification for the right of the state to suppress heresy and schism. Where persuasion failed, persecution could be used, as in the case of the Donatists, “to accomplish by the help of the terror of judges and laws,” Augustine wrote, “whereby they may be preserved from falling under the penalty of eternal judgment.” While Augustine was opposed to the death penalty, he saw persecution as a duty of the church in its defense of truth against error. “I persecute openly,” he declared, “because I am a son of the Church.”

Because of its acceptance of the Christian state, the Protestant Reformation brought neither religious toleration nor church-state separation. In Protestant countries, those who did not accept the authority of the established church were excluded also from the political community with which the church was identified. Protestantism was not tolerated in Catholic countries, and Catholicism was not tolerated in Protestant countries. The right of religious dissent was politically prohibited. Nonconformists were persecuted as heretics of the church and traitors of the state. The notion of the Christian state, including the European pattern of an established church, was transplanted to the New World, where in New England the Puritans and in Virginia the Anglicans denied the right of religious dissent.

Tolerance in Modern Times. The concept of tolerance, rooted in the concept of “liberty of conscience,” a phrase of modern origin, emerged slowly. The major advances toward tolerance came not from church confessions of faith, councils, or synods, but from constitutions, legislatures, and courts of law. While the Protestant Reformation did not espouse tolerance as such, it did represent a revolt against authority in the final dismemberment of a united Christendom or mundus Christianus, and it fostered the emergence of new nation-states and a new national spirit throughout Europe and Great Britain. Ecclesiastical or religious authority was weakened to a degree beyond which it could never recover. Religious liberty came to be proclaimed as both a natural and a divine right. The spirit of tolerance was greatly accelerated in principle and in practice by international relations that resulted in the ratification of treaties between states, and by the emergence of pluralistic societies resulting from constitutional governments and the shifting of many large and ethnic communities.

Since the adoption in 1948 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, religious tolerance has been recognized as a part of international law. J. E. WOOD JR.

Tolerance

See also ANTI-SEMITISM; CHURCH AND STATE; CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE; CIVIL LAW AND JUSTICE IN BIBLE TIMES; CIVIL RIGHTS; DISCRIMINATION; JUSTICE.

Bibliography. J. E. E. D. Acton, History of Freedom and Other Essays; R. Bainton, Travail of Religious Liberty; M. S. Bates, Religious Liberty: An Inquiry; S. W. Cobb, Rise of Religious Liberty in America; W. K. Jordan, Development of Religious Toleration in England; H. Kamen, Rise of Toleration; J. Lecler, Toleration and the Reformation; J. Locke, Epistola de Tolerantia: A Letter on Toleration; G. Mensching, Tolerance and Truth in Religion; J. C. Murray, Problem of Religious Freedom; F. Ruffini, Religious Liberty; W. J. Sheils, ed., Persecution and Toleration; P. J. Wogoman, Protestant Faith and Religious Liberty.

Tongues, Gift of. See SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

Tongues, Speaking in (Gr. glossolalia). One of the nine charisma, or “grace-gifts,” of the Spirit in 1 Corinthians 12:4–11. It has two functions: in the Acts of the Apostles, it is an initiation or authentication gift meant as a divine affirmation of a new group entering the church; and in 1 Corinthians 12–14 or Romans 12 it is a “spiritual gift” bestowed upon sovereignly chosen individuals within the church. It is vigorously debated whether the NT favors unknown or known languages, with a slight majority favoring the former. Many others opt for a both/and rather than an either/or.

The Biblical Data. Old Testament Evidence. Two specific OT passages are utilized as proof texts in the NT, Joel 2:28–30 (Acts 2:15–21) and Isaiah 28:11 (1 Cor. 14:21). Scholars debate the extent to which the two passages prophesy a future outpouring of the Spirit as the sign of the new age, with the consensus favorable in terms of the Joel passage and doubtful in terms of the Isaiah passage, which originally prophesied foreign rule during the exile. Further, the Joel passage was only partially fulfilled at Pentecost, and many believe that it refers to the eschaton as its final denouement. The latter part (vv. 30–31) contains the cosmic signs associated in the NT with the return of Christ. This relates to the NT belief that in salvation history the events of the first advent inaugurated the last days and that believers now live in a state of tension between the ages.

Other OT precursors are Numbers 11:24–29; 1 Samuel 19:18–24; and 1 Kings 18:28–29. In Numbers 11 the seventy elders upon whom the Spirit rested “prophesied,” which many take to be an ecstatic experience since the action is an external manifestation of the Spirit’s descent upon them. However, it is difficult to draw too much out of the passage because the text does not clearly indicate the outward results. In light of extrabiblical parallels, some sociologically oriented commentators believe that ecstatic utterances were one of the chief characteristics of the prophetic office. Again, however, this reads too much into the biblical data. In 1 Samuel 19 such behavior may be read into the actions of the group of prophets and of Saul and his men (vv. 20–24). Clearly this is the major OT passage that may relate to ecstatic experiences as a prophetic attribute (note that Saul “lay [prophesying] all that day and night,” v. 24). Samuel, however, does not exhibit this conduct, and neither do the other oral prophets (e.g., Elijah and Elisha). In 1 Kings 18 the prophets of Baal cut themselves with knives and continue “frantic prophesying.” While there is no explicit statement of glossolalia, most recognize it in their behavior. Yet again, this is clearly not associated with the prophetic office. Therefore, we would conclude that his phenomenon, although perhaps present at times, was in no way a primary characteristic of the true prophet.

Extrabiblical Evidence. In the ancient world, ecstatic utterances, trances, and frenzied behavior were commonly associated with pagan prophets. Eleventh-century B.C. documents record occurrences of ecstatic speech and the like in Egypt. In the Hellenistic world the prophetess of Delphi and the Sibylline priestess spoke in unknown or unintelligible speech. Moreover, the Dionysian rites contained a trancelike state as well as glossolalia. Many of the magicians and sorcerers of the first-century world exhibited similar phenomena, as in the case of the “spirit of divination” (or possibly ventriloquism) at Philippi in Acts 16:16–18.

New Testament Evidence. In Matthew 3:11 John the Baptist prophesies that the Messiah “will baptize you with the Holy Spirit and with fire.” Pentecostals often see in this a precursor of their doctrine of “baptism in the Holy Spirit,” but the passage more likely looks forward to Pentecost. James Dunn argues that this is a metaphorical expression for that “baptism” into the kingdom that was an extension of John’s own ministry of baptism. Neither Jesus nor his disciples speak in tongues in the Gospels, and there is no hint there of a connection between tongues and the activity of the Holy Spirit. The only passage that may do so is Mark 16:17, which makes “new tongues” one of the “signs” that will accompany the Christian. Most scholars agree, however, that this “longer ending” of Mark was added in the second century and so refers back to the apostolic gifts. Nevertheless, as such it is evidence that the second-century church still accepted the validity of these supernatural gifts.

The Acts of the Apostles is naturally a key portion of Scripture on this issue. Pentecost (Acts 2) has been the focus of much debate. First, there is the “Johannine Pentecost” (John 20:22), which some say contradicts the Acts account and others say is proleptic, promising the later event. Neither fits the evidence. Most likely, when Jesus breathed on them and said, "Receive the Holy Spirit," he was providing a private infusing of the Spirit, while Acts 2 was the public empowering that inaugurated the new age of the Spirit. Second, others argue that the miracle was one of hearing rather than speaking and that this ecstatic utterance was meant as the obverse to the Babel incident regarding the confusion of tongues (Gen. 11:1–9). This too is unlikely, for the tenor of the passage favors a miracle of speaking. While the Bible theme may be present, the major theological emphasis deals with the universal mission. The catalogue of nations in Acts 2:9–11 sweeps from east to west, stressing the future redemptive mission of the church (cf. 1:8).

The rest of Acts builds upon this, as we have the Samaritan Pentecost (8:14–19), the Gentile Pentecost (10:44–46), and the Ephesian Pentecost (19:6). Two misconceptions need to be explained. First, some say that Acts presents the Pentecost-type of encounter as the necessary initial experience for one who is filled or baptized with the Spirit. The problem is twofold: (1) the historical passages cannot be used to establish dogma unless they are corroborated by teaching material, since historical narratives tell what happened rather than what always must be. (2) There are too many episodes in Acts where tongues are not the necessary initiatory experience (e.g., 4:31; 8:17; 9:17–18). While the Samaritan Pentecost probably included tongues (Simon's reaction shows that something spectacular had occurred), it is not the main stress of the passage and does not support the weight placed upon it by proponents of the thesis above.

Second, others argue that tongues were sign gifts intended to authenticate the apostolic message, and so this gift ceased at the end of the apostolic age. This too goes beyond the evidence of Acts. In actuality, they authenticated the addition of new groups to the church, not for the sake of non-Christians but rather for the sake of the Jewish Christians in Jerusalem. There is no hint that the supernatural gifts had so narrow a purpose. Therefore, both of these theories must await further data from the NT.

The next major source is 1 Corinthians 12–14. The purpose of the gift has obviously changed drastically. It is no longer apologetic proof but has now become part of the cultic worship of the church. The problem at Corinth was the tendency of the enthusiasts there to elevate glossolalia to the greatest of the gifts. Paul in these chapters corrects this error and puts the gift in its proper place. The gifts are given, not to everyone, but only to those sovereignly chosen by the Spirit (12:11). Moreover, in any hierarchical order, tongues is the least of the gifts; the use of "first ... second ... third" in verse 28 reflects just such a pattern. In verses 29–30 it is clear that Paul denies the contention of the enthusiasts that everyone truly spiritual should speak in tongues: "Are all apostles? ... Do all speak in tongues?"

Chapter 13 explores the basic problem of this group, the lack of love, and chapter 14 stresses the problematic value of this gift for the church. Without "interpretation" it is incomprehensible and will not "edify" like the gift of prophecy. Moreover, as a "sign" it seems to the outsider to typify madness (vv. 21–23). Paul at the same time recognizes the validity of glossolalia as a spiritual gift and rejoices that he has been chosen to excel in it (v. 18). Nevertheless, tongues are often best relegated to private devotions (v. 28) and must be utilized in corporate worship with dignity and order (vv. 26–33). Finally, Paul commands that in spite of the problems enumerated above, the church dare not "forbid" glossolalia, so long as it is expressed in a "fitting and orderly way" (vv. 39–40).

In other NT epistles, there are perhaps references to tongues. Ephesian 5:19 and Colossians 3:16 speak of "psalms, hymns and spiritual songs," which some take to be charismatic singing. While most remain dubious regarding this, it is a possibility. Also, many interpret Romans 8:26, which describes the Spirit praying "with groans that words cannot express," in terms of "Spirit-filled prayer." While this is growing in popularity, it must remain more conjecture than likelihood, since the context speaks of the Spirit's intercession rather than the believer's charismatic prayer. Finally, Hebrews 2:4 asserts that "God also testified to [salvation] by signs, wonders and various miracles, and gifts of the Holy Spirit distributed according to his will." This is a crucial verse for those who wish to see the supernatural charisms as sign gifts meant only for the apostolic age. It does not state, however, that the purpose of the gifts was authentication, only that a purpose is to affirm the apostles' message. Building a doctrine on a single statement from Scripture without recognizing other passages is a misuse of biblical data.

Church History. The supernatural gifts like glossolalia gradually declined during the patristic period. Several fathers, e.g., Irenaeus and Tertullian, speak favorably of it, and groups like the Montanists make it central to their worship experience. This group followed Montanus of Phrygia, who said he was the chosen instrument of the Spirit to prepare the church for the second coming. He taught a strict asceticism, which soon developed into legalism. The antiestablishment attitude of the Montanists led to denunciation and then rejection, and the movement disappeared. By the middle of the fourth century the practice seemed to be a thing of the past. Chrysostom was quite negative, and Augustine declared that it had been given only for the NT times. It appears that in the pressures of the dogmatic controversies and the debates with pagan Hellenism, interest in such suprarational gifts as tongues or prophecy gradually diminished.

The Eastern church, with a more mystical and enthusiastic religious experience, continued to be open to tongues, and many believe that it was practiced unabated in Greek Orthodox monasteries throughout the Middle Ages. It was quite a different case in the Western church. Such experiences were viewed with suspicion, perhaps even taken as evidence of the demonic. Several possible examples of tongues may be adduced: the abbess Hildegard, whose use of unknown tongues is recorded in the Lingua Ignota, or missionaries like Vincent Ferrer or Francis Xavier, who described their miraculous ability to communicate with various groups as glossolalia.

Luther and Calvin both spoke positively of the gift, and some believe Luther actually had such experiences. The passages that discuss the gift primarily think of it in terms of missionary preaching, and it is difficult to connect the Reformers to any actual experience. The best one can say is that they accepted the continuing validity of tongues. The next widespread outbreak occurred among a group of persecuted Huguenots in southern France at the end of the seventeenth century. This lasted a little over a decade, and in the 1730s a similar occurrence took place among the Jansenists, a group of Catholic pietists.

Two eighteenth-century movements, the early Quakers and the Methodists, are often placed among those who have exhibited glossolalic traits. Both claims, however, are disputed, and the evidence is inconclusive. Wesley does appear positive toward tongues and certainly believed that such gifts were valid, but we cannot be certain whether he himself participated. The Irvingites from the 1830s to the end of the century made such expressions the hallmark of their church life. The example of the Huguenots and the Irvingites led to similar occurrences among the Shakers and the Mormons in America, and in Russia a Pentecostal-type movement began in the 1850s and apparently continued throughout the century.

Modern Pentecostalism developed out of the revivalist movement, within which several such experiences were recorded in the nineteenth century. In 1901, in a small Bible school in Topeka, Kansas, a group made up of several Baptist ministers and students in a Bible study came to the conclusion that tongues always accompanied Spirit baptism in Acts. After much prayer they apparently received the gift. For the first few years, in spite of much publicity, only sporadic outbreaks occurred. The "breakthrough" came in Los Angeles in 1906, and the resulting Azusa Street Mission became the center for Pente-costalism. Meanwhile, glossolalia arose in the 1904 Welsh revival and in Pentecostal meetings throughout both Europe and America in ensuing years.

In the first half of this century Pentecostals were rejected by the other denominations. The normal result of such an occurrence was a church split. In the 1960s, however, the phenomenon simultaneously developed within both mainline Protestant and Roman Catholic groups, and what has become known as the charismatic movement began. Today there are movements within both Pentecostalism and the charismatic groups toward a mediating position on tongues.

The Current Issue. We may delineate three basic positions today with respect to the tongues controversy, and there are two issues within the positions. (1) Are tongues for every age? (2) Are tongues the necessary sign of baptism in the Holy Spirit?

The Positive School. Pentecostals and most charismatics answer yes to both questions. They make clear distinction between baptism (in Acts) and the gift of tongues (1 Corinthians). The former is for everyone, while the latter is given to those whom the Spirit chooses. Even in the latter instance, however, the common belief is that all the gifts are open to everyone, and it is only a matter of the faith to claim it. Since glossolalia is the only initial evidence of Spirit baptism, everyone must seek the gift in that sense. It is the key to greater spiritual power in one's life and so must be sought. For this reason "tarrying" meetings developed within Pentecostalism, as groups of people would "tarry" and open themselves to the baptism of the Spirit.

The Negative School. This group answers no to both questions above. Some believe that the supernatural gifts ceased at the end of the apostolic age, others that they gradually diminished and ended in the fourth century. There are two basic approaches. (1) The Reformed scholar Benjamin B. Warfield at the turn of the century argued that glossolalia was among the sign gifts intended to authenticate the message of the apostles. Therefore, when the NT message was complete, they no longer were necessary. (2) The dispensational scholar Merrill F. Unger asserted that the "perfect" in 1 Corinthians 13:10 (KJV) meant the canon, and therefore at the close of the canon tongues "ceased in and of themselves" (the middle voice). There are quite a few differences among proponents of this position. Some state that God allows tongues as an emotional release, and so we should not be too negative toward adherents. Others say that God never allows them, and some go so far as to declare them demonic.

The Middle Position. A growing number take a position similar to that of A. B. Simpson, founder of the Christian and Missionary Alliance: "This gift is one of many gifts and is given to some for the benefit of all. The attitude toward the gift of tongues held by pastor and people should be, "Seek not, forbid not." Those of this persuasion would answer yes to the first question, no to the second. They would be leery of developing a system that would involve the violation of 1 Corinthians 14:39, "Do not forbid speaking in tongues." They would also be afraid to disregard 12:30, "Do all speak in tongues?" Therefore, while speaking in tongues is not the initial sign of Spirit baptism, it can be experienced as a gift, if the Spirit so determines. Moreover, scholars of this school are leery of utilizing 13:9–10 against glossolalia, since the verb itself simply means "cease" in the middle voice and since "perfect" (KJV) as "canon" is doubtful in this context. Rather, "perfect" refers to the "perfect age" when we will see Christ "face to face" (v. 12).

Conclusion. The key, of course, is Scripture itself more than experience, even from church history. Many Pentecostals go so far as to accept the demise of the gift down through the ages but believe that the outbreak of glossolalia in this century is the "autumn rains" (Joel 2:23) prophesied for the last days in Acts 2:16–21. Therefore, one must consider all the passages that deal with tongues and see which position best interprets the data.

G. R. OSBORNE

See also CHARISMATIC MOVEMENT; HOLY SPIRIT; PENTECOSTALISM; SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

Bibliography. G. W. Bromiley, "Holy Spirit," in Fundamentals of the Faith, C. F. H. Henry, ed.; L. Christensen, Speaking in Tongues; J. D. G. Dunn, Baptism in the Holy Spirit; H. M. Ervin, These Are Not Drunken, As Ye Suppose; W. Grudem, ed., Are Miraculous Gifts for Today?: Four Views; A. A. Hoekema, What about Tongue-Speaking?; W. H. Horton, ed., Glossolalia Phenomenon; M. T. Kelsey, Tongue Speaking: An Experiment in Spiritual Experience; R. P. Martin, Spirit and the Congregation; W. E. Mills, Speaking in Tongues; Theological/Exegetical Approach to Glossolalia; J. I. Packer, Keep in Step with the Spirit; C. Pinnock and G. R. Osborne, "Truce Proposal for the Tongues Controversy," CT (October 8, 1971); S. Schatzmann, Pauline Theology of Charismata; J. L. Sherrill, They Speak with Other Tongues; C. R. Smith, Tongues in Biblical Perspective; M. F. Unger, New Testament Teaching on Tongues; B. B. Warfield, Miracles: Yesterday and Today.

Torgau Articles, The. Three documents composed by Lutheran theologians in the sixteenth century. They are named for a town on the Elbe River in Germany.

1. The Torgau Articles of 1530 were prepared by Martin Luther, Philip Melancthon, and Justus Jonas and presented to Elector John the Constant in anticipation of the Diet at Augsburg. They contained an introduction and ten articles, dealing primarily with abuses in Roman Catholic practice (e.g., the invocation of saints, prohibition of clerical marriage, communion in one kind) and defending worship in the vernacular. Melancthon incorporated these (along with the Schwabach Articles) into the Augsburg Confession.

2. The Torgau Articles or Confession of 1574 were prepared by various Lutheran theologians and subscribed by the Wittenberg faculty. They dealt with the Lord's Supper and contained both positive and negative articles. A high Lutheran view of the Eucharist is affirmed, for "by the sacramental union the bread is the body of Christ, and the wine is the blood of Christ." Alternative interpretations, especially those of the Swiss, are said to be "dangerous errors" that "ought to be refuted and condemned in our churches."

3. The Torgau Articles or Book of Torgau of 1576 were occasioned by controversies within the Lutheran churches and composed by a convention held at Torgau between May 28 and June 7, 1576, which included Jacob Andreae, Andreas Musculus, Martin Chemnitz, David Chytraeus, and Nicholas Selnecker. It drew heavily on previous documents, especially the Maulbronn Formula and the Swabian-Saxon Concord, and was submitted to Elector Augustus, who circulated the document widely among the Lutheran states. After receiving many suggestions from the territorial churches, the Book of Torgau was thoroughly revised in 1577 at Bergen, Germany, and called the Bergen Book. It was incorporated into the Formula of Concord, the statement of 1577, which provided a consensus of doctrinal views and ecclesiastical unity for the Lutherans.

C. G. FRY

See also CONCORD, FORMULA OF.

Bibliography. W. D. Allbeck, Studies in the Lutheran Confessions.

Torrance, Thomas Forsyth (b. 1913). Born in 1913 to Scottish missionary parents in China, Torrance completed his education in Britain and at Basel, where he studied under Karl Barth, whose theology he championed throughout his career. From 1950 to 1979 Torrance taught church history and dogmatics at New College, Edinburgh. These two interests were displayed in his editorial efforts as founding editor of Scottish Journal of Theology and as co-editor of English translations of both Barth's Church Dogmatics and Calvin's New Testament Commentaries.

Torrance's own writings primarily seek to integrate classical and neo-orthodox Reformed theology with insights from contemporary philosophy of science. He argues that theology is just as much a science as physics: each works from an objective foundation, the latter from the natural world, and the former from God's self-revelation in Jesus Christ, the incarnate Word of God. Thus, theology has a legitimate place within the field of rational knowledge. The seeming differences between theology and natural science stem from the differences between their respective objects. However, even these differences point to a similarity between their basic methodologies. Like science, theology legitimately adapts and modifies language, shapes and forms its own concepts, and delimits or expands its use of terms. Because theology's object, God, is unique, its use of language and thought-forms are correspondingly unique. One of the main differences between the scientist and the theologian is that the former contributes to the knowing process as a knowing subject, while the latter, though involved in the knowing process, makes no contribution to it, because theology's divine object totally controls this process. Therefore, knowledge of God absolutely depends on grace.

Torrance's efforts to integrate such diverse spheres of inquiry have attracted widespread interest in his work. However, the inherent internal instability of his approach opens it to criticism on a variety of fronts. His stress upon the subjective relationship of faith in Christ to generate an objective theology seems at odds with his denial that the subject makes any contribution to this relationship, as does his claim that theology is a rational science, yet with a unique logic. Moreover, limiting God's objective self-revelation to Christ undermines general revelation as a basis for natural science and devalues the OT.

D. A. CURRIE

Bibliography. T. Torrance, Space, Time, and Resurrection; Theological Science; Trinitarian Faith; M. Bauman, Roundtable: Conversations with European Theologians; C. F. H. Henry, God, Revelation, and Authority; T. A. Langford, "T. F. Torrance's Theological Science: A Reaction," SJT 25:155-70; R. J. Palma, "T. F. Torrance's Reformed Theology," RR 38:1.

Total Depravity. See DEPRIVITY, TOTAL.

Tractarianism. See OXFORD MOVEMENT.

Tracy, David (b. 1939). Ordained as a Roman Catholic priest in 1963. Further educated at the Gregorian University, Rome: licentiate (1964) and doctorate in Sacred Theology (1969) under the tutelage of Bernard Lonergan. Tracy taught briefly at the Catholic University of America (1967-69) and was the first Catholic priest to hold a faculty post at the Divinity School of the University of Chicago in 1969. He received numerous honors from the University of Chicago including being the first theologian appointed to the university's prestigious Committee on the Analysis of Ideas and Methods in 1981.

Proclaimed by one enthusiastic reviewer as "the Schleiermacher of our time," Tracy's work on a theological method of mutual, critical correlations between an interpretation of the Christian tradition and an interpretation of the contemporary situation has gained widespread attention in later twentieth-century North American theology. Although embracing large parts of process theology, Tracy can rightly be understood as a revival of the Chicago School of theology by virtue of his critical reworking and eventual transcendence of Paul Tillich's correlational method of theology, by his appropriation of post-Gadamerian hermeneutical theory as developed by Paul Ricoeur (both of whom taught at the University of Chicago), and by his vigorous discussion and disagreements with the narrativists of the Yale School, principally George Lindbeck and Hans Frei.

Tracy's most definitive statements on theological method can be found in Blessed Rage for Order (1975), in which he articulates a model for a "fundamental theology" that attempts to fuse the gains of the liberal theological tradition, the progress made in the natural and human sciences, and the Christian tradition. Because mutual and critical correlations are necessary to accomplish this, at times common human experience and language have to take precedence over the Christian tradition and thus necessitate a revision of that tradition. Because of this, Tracy has sometimes been titled a "correlationist" and "revisionist" theologian. Tracy's own proposal for what a theology of mutual, critical correlations would look like is seen in Analogical Imagination (1981), which also marked the beginning of Tracy's reliance on interpretation and hermeneutical theory. Here Tracy proposes his theory of "the classics" (i.e., works that disclose a truth event to the interpreter) that allows the Christian tradition and its classics to be correlated with more general cultural classics. Via analogical language, Tracy attempts to identify the "similarities-in-difference" of his interpretation of the Christian classics and his interpretation of cultural classics in constructive proposals.

The "hermeneutical turn" begun earlier comes to fruition in Plurality and Ambiguity (1986), in which Tracy explores the challenges of postmodernity for religion. Tracy contends that the best way to neither ignore the criticisms of postmodernity nor succumb to them is through a recovery of the categories of dialogue and interpretation for all human understanding. Such a recovery in Tracy's own work occasioned Dialogue with the Other (1989), a rethinking of Christian conceptions of God based on Tracy's own participation in an interreligious dialogue with Buddhist theologians. Much of Tracy's later work has taken up this theme, centering around the way in which postmodernity both allows and demands a rethinking of how to “name God” appropriately.

P. J. KNAAK

Bibliography. G. Comstock, “Two Types of Narrative Theology,” JAAR 55:687–717; W. Jeanroun and J. Rike, eds., “Introduction,” in Radical Pluralism and Truth; W. Placher, Unapologetic Theology; T. H. Sanks, “David Tracy’s Theological Project,” TS 54:698–727.

Tradition. The entire process by which normative religious truths are passed on from one generation to another. As such, tradition is found in all religious communities, whether its form be oral or written, its contents embodied in a closed canon or a living organism. Even evangelical Protestants, inclined though they may still be to overlook it, must recognize that oral tradition preceded and shaped the canon of written Scripture and that their own understanding of Scripture and consequently their own community life have been molded, consciously or unconsciously, by particular traditions. This article will treat the meaning of tradition in Scripture and then examine the way in which tradition has been understood and employed in the early Christian, Orthodox, Roman Catholic, and Protestant communities.

Most scholars see recorded in the OT numerous traditions regarding persons, places, events, and cults crucial to the full story of God’s dealings with his chosen people. The act of handing these on is specifically enjoined or mentioned only rarely (Deut. 6:20–25; 26:5–9; Josh. 24:2–13), but the very text entirely presupposes it. How these traditions were passed on, how and when written texts came into being, and how the canon was finally formed remains in part a matter of speculation, though conservative Christians and Jews continue to look first of all for God’s word faithfully delivered to his people over generations. The Qumran texts have proven the existence of differing Hebrew text traditions, including one closer to that used for the Greek LXX. The Jewish canon was not closed until very late (A.D. 90), resulting as well in two different versions, one originating in Palestine and the other in the Diaspora, the first accepted eventually by Protestants and the second (with the deuterocanonical or apocryphal books) by Catholics. The standard Hebrew Bible comes from the early tenth century when Jews in Babylon set the readings and pointed the vowels in a text known as the Masoretic, which means literally “traditional.”

By the third century B.C., at least, Jewish rabbis had produced a “traditional” interpretation of the scriptural text known as the Mishnah, of which scribes and Pharisees became the keepers and teachers. This continued to grow until it was codified in the fourth and sixth centuries as the Talmud, which provided until modern times the traditional (and therefore binding) Jewish interpretation of the OT.

In the NT the word for tradition (paradoxos) is used, in the main, negatively by Christ and positively by the apostles. Christ repudiated human traditions (Matt. 15:3; Mark 7:9, 13), doubtless parts of the Mishnah, as distortions or even contradictions of God’s law. But the apostles, sometimes in the style of rabbis, passed on and explicated the gospel tradition they had received from the Lord. Often in formulaic utterances taken up into his text (Rom. 1:1–4; 6:7; Phil. 2:5–11; 1 Thess. 4:14–17; 1 Tim. 3:16), Paul repeats this tradition and enjoins his flock to receive and keep it (1 Cor. 11:2; Col. 2:6–8; 2 Thess. 2:15). Sometimes this tradition is the very heart of the gospel (esp. 1 Cor. 15:1–9), while elsewhere it concerns cultic matters such as the Lord’s Supper (11:23) or ethical matters such as divorce (7:10). In writings that some critics consider later this tradition comes to be called the received “good deposit” (2 Tim. 1:14; cf. 1 Tim. 1:10; 6:20; 2 Tim. 1:12; Titus 1:9). The power of the apostolic witness, as Cullmann and Bruce have argued, is that what they were called to pass on was not of men but of God (Gal. 1:1).

The question of how the apostolic witness came to be written down and the canon of inspired texts formed is very complicated and controversial. Form critics have tended to dissolve the text into several contradictory or even unreliable sources, while redaction critics sometimes make the texts reflect more of the late first-century church (which they call “early Catholicism”) than of the earlier and original events. But more conservative scholars have scored considerable advances recently by pointing up the relatively short time lapse involved and the NT’s concern with maintaining the true tradition (Luke 1:1–4). This is not to deny that traditions concerning Jesus, especially his sayings, soon varied in Christian communities and that a text like the Gospel of Thomas, though essentially Gnostic, might not contain the echo of some authentic sayings. Well into the second century, the OT remained the early Christians’ only authorized text, but the needs of churches and the assaults of heretics led to a relatively rapid formation of the canon of the NT by the late second century and its fixation by the mid-fourth. The essential criterion was that these writings contain authentic apostolic tradition.

Even before the NT canon was fixed, early church fathers appealed to its individual books and to sayings of Christ (a lost exegesis of them by Papias). But they likewise saw the original apostolic tradition preserved in other ways. They often appealed to an orthodox “rule of faith,” a kind of summary of the gospel possibly related to early baptismal creeds and later issuing in full-fledged creedal documents; this rule was not originally fixed in writing or anything contrary to or wholly outside of Scripture. They also appealed to “apostolic succession,” the public teaching (as distinguished from the Gnostics’ secret wisdom) in those churches where bishops stood in a direct line with their apostolic founders, especially the see of Rome “founded” by Peter and Paul. And they prepared, between the first and fourth centuries, a whole series of anonymous manuals (Didache) that claimed to contain the apostles’ teachings, especially on cultic and ethical matters. These were not set over against Scripture, but they rather constituted the means by which the living church carried forward its witness.

Tradition

Once the NT canon was fixed and the whole Bible complete, the great church fathers of the fourth and fifth centuries distinguished tradition and Scripture more clearly but not antithetically. Tradition was understood as the church’s enriching and interpretative reflection on the original deposit of faith contained in Scripture. This pertained preeminently to christological interpretation of the OT. But it included as well the writings of earlier “fathers,” considered a product of the Spirit’s guidance and used to buttress the true faith; the decisions of bishops met in council under the Spirit’s aegis; and various rites that had become central to the practice of the faith. A few fathers (notably Basil) recognized that certain matters were not clearly, or even remotely, prescribed in Scripture and ascribed these separately to apostolic tradition: e.g., to pray facing East, to baptize infants, to immerse three times, to fast on certain days, and the like. To count as authentic apostolic tradition, the fathers (Augustine and Vincent of Lerins in the West, e.g.) required that these be recognized and practiced throughout the whole church. What constituted authoritative tradition nevertheless became something on which the East and West eventually parted ways.

The Eastern Orthodox came to define tradition as the whole of the church’s witness, based on Scripture but expressed chiefly in the seven ecumenical councils, the writings of the fathers, and liturgical worship. In principle, Scripture remained fundamental and the church alive with its witness; in practice, the weight of tradition became preponderant and the church tended to stagnate in its fixation on what had been wrought between the fourth and seventh centuries. Outside Scripture, ecumenical councils represented the highest authority in defining tradition.

During most of the Middle Ages, the Western view differed only slightly, placing somewhat greater emphasis on written Scripture as fundamental and an ever-increasing emphasis on the papacy (rather than councils) as the normative spokesman for apostolic tradition. But in the fourteenth century the realization that certain doctrines (Christ’s absolute poverty, e.g., or Mary’s immaculate conception) could not be proved even remotely from Scripture, together with theologians’ increased sophistication about their sources, inspired several of them to posit tradition as a separate, unwritten source handed down by apostolic succession, especially through an infallible papacy. The Protestant revolt against all tradition transformed this view, despite protest, into the church’s official position at the Council of Trent: The truths and discipline of the gospel are contained in written Scripture and in unwritten traditions given to the church by Christ or the Spirit through the apostles, and both deserve equal respect. Vatican Council I completed this line of thought when it declared the church’s teaching office to be centered in an infallible papacy.

Ever since the sixteenth century there has been dissent among Catholics, and that has received much attention in the last century and a half. A romantic school, associated with Möhler in Germany and Newman in England, preferred to speak of “living tradition” in which understanding and fullness grew over centuries, rather than of a distinctly separate source. Geiselman, noting that Trent rejected a preliminary “partly . . . partly” formulation, argued for the “material sufficiency” of Scripture, meaning it contained the entire deposit of faith in whole or in germ; and in various forms this has been very influential among contemporary Catholics. Still others (Congar) refer to a single apostolic tradition being handed down in the church through written Scripture as well as teaching, discipline, and rites. Vatican Council II, while not rejecting earlier pronouncements on tradition as a source, gave much more emphasis to Scripture, and described Scripture and tradition as forming a unity through which the faithful are brought to a full knowledge of God’s truth.

Protestants have nearly always rejected tradition in principle, while necessarily allowing it to reappear in practice in some other form. Luther rejected ecclesiastical traditions as distortions of the true gospel found in Scripture alone, and he thus, and for nearly all Protestants ever since, radically sundered apostolic authority from ecclesiastical tradition, now rendered merely human. Calvin confronted the question of interpretation squarely and insisted that the Spirit interacts with the Word to illuminate believers—this was recognized by Catholics too, but placed under the strict supervision of the church. The Word, all Reformers asserted, brought forth the church, not the other way around, and that Word was “perspicuous,” requiring no apostolic traditions to interpret it correctly. While Anglicans and Lutherans retained many rites and customs “not contrary to Scripture” (the Swedish Lutherans even claiming to stand still in the apostolic succession), Calvinists and later free churches attempted to ground all ecclesiastical and devotional practices in biblical teaching.

In practice most Protestant groups formed traditions nearly as binding as the Catholics and established similar sets of authorities: ecumenical councils, confessional creeds, synodical legislation, church orders, and theologians (esp. founders) of a particular church. Those free churches, particularly in America, that claim to stand on Scripture alone and to recognize no traditional authorities are in some sense the least free because they are not even conscious of what traditions have molded their understanding of Scripture. Yet there is a decided difference between Protestants and Catholics. All Protestants insist that these traditions must ever be tested against Scripture and can never possess an independent apostolic authority over or alongside of Scripture. In recent years scholarly research into the formation of Scripture and the course of church history has inspired greater thoughtfulness and honesty among Protestants on the subject of tradition. The Word of God does not and cannot operate in a vacuum, as an isolated text; it comes alive through the Spirit in the context of gathered believers who make up Christ's church. Preaching is in fact the chief Protestant form of perpetuating tradition, i.e., authoritative interpretations and applications of the Word. Protestants should, therefore, at the very least, come to some understanding of how particular traditions of preaching were formed and then proceed to consider devotional practices, church polities, and forms of worship. Protestants will never grant these apostolic authority, which resides alone in the written and inspired apostolic witness, but they can greatly enrich their own understanding and continuation of that witness by examining how the church has done it down through the ages.

J. VAN ENGEN

See also ORTHODOX TRADITION; REFORMATION, PROTESTANT; ROMAN CATHOLICISM; TRENT, COUNCIL OF.

Bibliography. H. Berkhof, Christian Faith; F. F. Bruce, Tradition Old and New; Y. Congar, Tradition and Traditions; J. A. Fichtner, NCE 14:223–28; R. P. C. Hanson, Tradition in the Early Church; A. McGrath, Christian Theology: An Introduction; H. E. W. Turner, Pattern of Christian Truth.

Traducianism. From Latin traductio (also tradux), “transmission, transfer”; verb “to propagate, transmit to posterity”; a theory of the perpetuation of the soul. The traducian view of the origin of the soul, as opposed to the preexistence, the reincarnation, and the creation theories, contends that the entire person, material (body) and immaterial, is brought into existence at conception, from parents to children. Thus, all souls derive from Adam's soul, which derives from God.

Support for this view is indirect. The first four reasons are objections to the alternative theories; the last four invite us to infer that traducianism best fits biblical and theological criteria: (1) preexistence is a platonic, not a biblical, view; (2) reincarnation is unbiblical (Heb. 9:27); (3) God is no longer actively creating souls ex nihilo (Gen. 2:2–3); (4) further, the creationist view seems to require that God would create and infuse sinful souls; (5) Levi paid tithes “in Abraham” to Melchizedek (Heb. 7:9–10); (6) the solidarity of the race is quite literally “in Adam” (Rom. 5:12–21); (7) Adam's son was in his own “image” and “likeness” (Gen. 5:3; the entire person from the father); (8) traducianism most easily explains the spread of original sin (which affects the entire person) to the human race.

Objections to traducianism include: (1) the Greek of Hebrews 7:9, lit. “so to say,” does not require pressing the traducian interpretation of Levi's presence “in” Abraham; (2) traducianism invites a material understanding of the soul (e.g., Tertullian was influenced by Stoicism); (3) one's view regarding the perpetuation of the soul is not necessarily entwined with the transmission of sin; (4) some say traducianism violates the incarnation of Christ's sinless person; (5) God does continue actively to “create” the human person (Job 10:8–12; Ps. 139:13–16), which may include individual souls.

Some observations from current medical research apply to this debate. (1) If the “tissue” of the fetus is inseparable from its soul, then traducianism suggests that all abortions destroy human persons (the creationism view arguably may be more permissive here). (2) “Conception” covers roughly a twenty-four-hour period (human life begins at fertilization, but the individual human person does not begin until syngamy, by genetic definition). At what point would a traducianist say there is a soul? (3) Trillions of zygotes are not implanted; what is the destiny of these “souls”? (The problems of “twinning” and “mosaics” raise further questions.)

Traducianism was held by Tertullian, Gregory of Nyssa, the Apollonarians, the Eastern church, Lutherans, and some Reformed scholars (Shedd, Strong). By contrast, the Roman Catholic Church and most Reformed theologians (Calvin, Beza, Turretin) favored creationism. W. G. PHILLIPS

See also SOUL.

Bibliography. G. C. Berkouwer, Man: The Image of God; C. Hodge, Systematic Theology; A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology.

Transcendence of God. See GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF; GOD, DOCTRINE OF.

Transcendentalism

Transcendentalism. An idealistic philosophy that in general emphasizes the spiritual over the material. By its very nature, the movement is hard to describe and its body of beliefs hard to define. Its most important practitioner and spokesman in the New England manifestation, Ralph Waldo Emerson, called it “the Saturnalia or excess of Faith.” That which is “popularly called Transcendentalism among us,” he wrote, “is Idealism; Idealism as it appears in 1842.” That description mentions two of the very elements—an emphasis upon heightened spiritual awareness and an interest in various types of philosophical idealism—that make transcendentalism so difficult to describe.

In actuality, we cannot speak of a well-organized and clearly delineated transcendentalist movement as such. Instead, we find a loosely knit group of authors, preachers, and lecturers bound together by a mutual disdain for Unitarian orthodoxy, a mutual desire to see American cultural and spiritual life freed from bondage to the past, and a mutual faith in the unbounded potential of American democratic life. Located in the Concord, Massachusetts, area in the years between 1835 and 1860, the transcendentalists formed not a tight group but, rather, a loose federation.

Though a movement such as transcendentalism cannot be said to have had one distinct leader, Emerson (1803–82) was clearly its central figure. The publication of his Nature in 1836 is generally considered to mark the beginning of an identifiable movement. The next two decades were to see numerous new works from Emerson and poems, essays, and books from other transcendentalist figures, such as Henry David Thoreau (1817–62), Orestes Brownson (1803–76), Amos Bronson Alcott (1799–1888), Margaret Fuller (1810–50), George Ripley (1802–80), and Theodore Parker (1810–60). Never forming an official affiliation, these figures and others associated with them banded together for the formation of an informal discussion group called the Transcendental Club; the publication of the transcendentalist literary and philosophical journal, The Dial; and the establishment of an experiment in utopian communal living, Brook Farm.

One thing almost all those associated with the movement did share, however, was a common heritage of Unitarianism. The transcendentalists broke with Unitarianism for two reasons. First, they objected to the Unitarian desire to cling to certain particulars of Christian history and dogma. Emerson called this clinging a “noxious” exaggeration of “the personal, the positive, the ritual,” and he asked instead for a direct access to God, unmediated by any elements of Scripture and tradition. And second, the transcendentalists lamented the sterility of belief and practice they found in the Unitarian faith. According to Thoreau, it is not man’s sin but his boredom and weariness that are “as old as Adam.” The American Adam needs to exchange his bondage to tradition for a freedom to experiment: “old deeds for old people, and new deeds for new.”

In some ways transcendentalism attempted to recapture for the American spirit the fervor of the original Puritan enterprise. That zeal, with its attendant bliss and agony, had been suppressed or exiled to the wilderness of the American religious experience by the end of the eighteenth century. Transcendentalism was one of the first and most dramatic protests against civil religion in America. Though it did not live up to the expectations of its adherents—many of them expected nothing less than a total regeneration of social and spiritual life through the exercise of idealism in America—transcendentalism has had a lasting impact. In the years immediately preceding the Civil War, several of the transcendentalists were important participants in the abolitionist movement, and in the decades to follow, widely divergent individuals and movements would find inspiration in the transcendental protest against society. For example, Henry Ford, who once said “history is bunk” and declared Emerson’s essays to be his favorite reading, dwelt upon the transcendentalists’ disdain from convention and their exaltation of self-reliant power, while both Mahatma Gandhi and Martin Luther King Jr. drew deeply upon the resources of Thoreau’s famous essay, “Civil Disobedience.”

Perhaps even more significantly, transcendentalism marked the first substantial attempt in American history to retain the spiritual experience and potential of the Christian faith without any of the substance of its belief. By claiming an essential innocence for humankind, by substituting a direct intuition of God or truth for any form of revelation, and by foreseeing a future of ill-defined but certain glory for humankind, transcendentalism paved the way for the many romantic notions about human nature and destiny that have become a central part of the American experience in the last hundred years. R. LUNDIN

See also EMERSON, RALPH WALDO.

Bibliography. L. Buell, Literary Transcendentalism: Style and Vision in the American Renaissance; New England Literary Culture: From Revolution through Renaissance; O. B. Frothingham, Transcendentalism in New England: A History; F. O. Matthiessen, American Renaissance: Art and Expression in the Age of Emerson and Whitman; P. Miller, “From Edwards to Emerson,” NEQ 13:587–617; P. Miller, ed., Transcendentalists: An Anthology; J. Myerson, New England Transcendentalists and The Dial; A. Rose, Transcendentalism as a Social Movement.

Transcendental Meditation (TM). An Eastern meditative practice popularized in the West by Maharishi Mahesh Yogi. Born in India in 1918, Maharishi (which means “great sage”) was a disciple of Swami Brahmananda Saraswati (or “Guru Dev”) before he began teaching in the West as a Hindu holy man. As part of a series of world tours, Maharishi first came to the United States in 1959. The TM movement has become one of the largest and fastest growing of the various Eastern spiritual disciplines that have taken root in the West.

The simplified and Westernized set of yoga techniques that Maharishi has introduced and marketed in the West is presented to the public as a nonreligious practice designed to enable a person to make use of his or her full mental potential while at the same time achieving deep rest and relaxation. TM claims to offer people absolute happiness, perfect bliss, and “restful alertness” through a technique that requires a minimum of meditation—twenty minutes twice a day.

The claim that TM is not religious, that it is merely a scientific technique, has been questioned by Christian and secular observers alike. Maharishi and his carefully trained instructors assert that the benefits of TM can be enjoyed without compromising one’s religion. Critics of the TM movement argue that transcendental meditation is essentially Hindu religious practice in disguise.

An initiation ceremony is required of all novice meditators. TM instructors contend that this is merely a secular ceremony of gratitude. The religious nature of this ceremony (called the puja), however, is quite clear. The participant is asked to bring flowers, fruit, and a white cloth and to bow before the image of Maharishi’s late teacher, Guru Dev. The puja is a Sanskrit hymn of adoration and worship, although its meaning is not revealed to the novice. The initiation ceremony, therefore, is by Christian definition the worship of false gods. From the perspective of TM, the puja is intended to alter the consciousness of both instructor and novice so that the mind is opened to the influence of the “great masters.”

At the time of initiation, the candidate is given a supposedly secret mantra, a Sanskrit word or syllable, which is claimed to have special vibrational qualities and which is regularly used by the meditator thereafter. TM instructors state that the mantras are merely “meaningless sounds.” However, an examination of the source of the mantras, the Hindu religion, reveals that these sounds are the code names of deities. Therefore, the repetition of a mantra constitutes an act of worship.

The use of a mantra is one of the standard means of inducing the classical mystical experience of God consciousness or unity. The twice-daily routine of TM is said to enable a person to achieve an altered or “transcendental” state of consciousness with the goal of ultimately reaching “enlightenment.” Its objective is the elimination of all consciously directed thought, an emptying of the mind. Like all Eastern mysticism, TM involves the negation of the mind and an increased reliance on subjective feelings.

Transcendental Meditation is in reality a form of pantheism. It does not teach the existence of one eternal, personal God, the Creator of the universe. It is part of the monist tradition in that it teaches belief in the essential oneness of all reality and therefore the possibility of unity with the divine. The practice of TM itself leads the meditator toward the idolatry of self-worship because of the identification of the self with the higher “Self” of the creation. In short, TM promotes an experience involving the loss of one’s distinctive identity under the false pretense of a scientific technique.

R. ENROTH

See also NEW AGE MOVEMENT; PANTHEISM.

Bibliography. H. J. Berry, What They Believe?; R. L. Carlson, Transcendental Meditation: Relaxation or Religion?; R. M. Enroth, ed., Guide to Cults and New Religions; L. J. Gesy, Today’s Destructive Cults and Movements; D. Haddon, Transcendental Meditation: A Christian View; D. Haddon and V. Hamilton, TM Wants You! A Christian Response to Transcendental Meditation; G. R. Lewis, What Everyone Should Know about Transcendental Meditation; D. Sneed, Hidden Agenda.

Transgression. See SIN.

Transmigration of Souls. See REINCARNATION.

Transubstantiation. See LORD’S SUPPER, VIEWS OF.

Trent, Council of (1545–1563). Official Roman Catholic response to the Lutheran Reformation. The Council of Trent did not begin until twenty-five years after Martin Luther’s symbolic rejection of papal authority when he publicly burned Exsurge Domine (1520), the papal bull condemning his teachings. This fateful delay in the history of Christianity permitted the consolidation of Protestantism and ensured that, when the council did eventually meet to define doctrines, it would do so in conscious reaction to Protestant doctrines. Though some Protestants attended the council, the majority of those attending were motivated by a desire to counter, rather than conciliate, the Protestants. Hence, even Catholic historians who emphasize the continuity of Trent’s doctrinal definitions with traditional Catholic theology concede that Trent did not restore the medieval equilibrium so much as evolve a new system synthesizing Catholic tradition and the altered historical situation. The new system was rigid and exclusive, but also rich and energetic, drawing on the spiritual and theological revival that characterized the Counter-Reformation.

Trent, Council of Reasons for the repeated delays in convening the council were chiefly, but not solely, political. Even Pope Paul III (1534–49), who was elected on the understanding that he would call a council and who acknowledged that it was desperately needed, was forced into repeated postponements by a growing appreciation of the complexity of the issues at stake. So complex and voluminous was its agenda that the council took eighteen years, spanning the reigns of five popes, to complete. Its sittings alone took over four years, and it produced a greater volume of legislation than the combined output of all the previous eighteen general councils recognized by the Roman Catholic Church.

The council's history has three periods:

1. Sessions 1–10 (December 13, 1545, to June 2, 1547), during the pontificate of Paul III.
2. Sessions 11–16 (May 1, 1551, to April 28, 1552), under Julius III.
3. Sessions 17–25 (January 17, 1562, to December 4, 1563), under Pius IV.

It was decided at the outset to deal with both disciplinary reforms (which Holy Roman emperor, Charles V, saw as the first priority) and the definition of dogma (the primary concern of Paul III). A repentant episcopate acknowledged that the Lutheran revolt was occasioned by the "ambition, avarice and cupidity" of bishops. The council accordingly condemned pluralism and absenteeism by bishops and priests. Clergy were to "avoid even the smallest faults, which in them would be considerable." Bishops were to establish seminaries for the training of clergy in every diocese. In nothing was the Roman Catholic Church more indelibly scarred by its fear of Protestantism than in the council's decision to make the curriculum in the new seminaries scholastic rather than biblical. On indulgences, the issue that ignited the Lutheran explosion, the council abolished indulgence sellers and decreed that the giving of alms was never to be the necessary condition for gaining an indulgence.

The article on justification was perceived as the most difficult of the doctrinal issues, partly because it had not been dealt with in previous councils. Thirty-three canons condemned Protestant errors concerning justification. Most were errors held by Protestant extremists, but the bishops certainly understood that they had condemned Luther's doctrine that Christ's righteousness is extrinsic to the justified person and only imputed to him. The Tridentine doctrine on justification was expressed in sixteen chapters. Chapters 1–9 stress man's incapacity to save himself but confirm the necessity for the cooperation of his free will, including his resolve to receive baptism and begin a new life. Justification results not only in the remission of sin but also in "sanctification and renewal of the whole man." Chapters 10–13 affirm the increase of justifying grace through obedience to the commandments and deny that predestination to salvation can be known with certainty. Chapters 14–16 declare that grace is forfeited by any grievous sin (not just faithlessness) and must be recovered through the sacrament of penance. Salvation is given to the justified as a reward as well as a gift, since, on the basis of his union with Christ, he has meritoriously fulfilled God's law by good works performed in a state of grace.

In the belief that Lutheran heresy was based on a misunderstanding of the sacraments, the council devoted more time to them than any other doctrinal issue. The council confirmed that there are seven sacraments instituted by Christ (baptism, confirmation, Communion, penance, unction, orders, and marriage) and condemned those who said that sacraments are not necessary for salvation or that through faith alone, and without any sacrament, people can be justified. Sacraments contain the grace they signify and confer it ex opere operato, irrespective of the qualities or merits of the persons administering or receiving them. The council confirmed transubstantiation, that the substance of bread and wine is changed into the body and blood of Christ while the appearance of bread and wine remains. Luther's real presence doctrine; the symbolist doctrine of Zwingli, Carlstadt, and Oecolampadius; and Calvin's medial position (presence is real but spiritual) were all condemned; as were those who denied that the whole of Christ is received when the bread alone is taken at Communion. The council also affirmed that in the Mass, which must be said in Latin, the Son is offered anew to the Father, a sacrifice by which God is appeased and which is efficacious for the living and the dead.

In its article on Scripture the council again rejected Lutheran teaching. Tradition was said to be equally authoritative with Scripture; the correct interpretation of the Bible was the preserve of the Catholic Church; the Vulgate was to be used exclusively in public readings and doctrinal commentaries.

The Tridentine decrees enjoyed great prestige and determined Catholic belief and practice for four centuries.

F. S. PIGGIN

See also CARLSTADT, ANDREAS BODENSTEIN VON; COUNTER-REFORMATION; PAPACY.

Bibliography. G. Alberigo, "Council of Trent: New Views on the Occasion of Its Fourth Centenary," Con 7.1:28–48; J. Delumeau, Catholicism between Luther and Voltaire: A New View of the Counter Reformation; P. Hughes, Church in Crisis: A History of the General Councils; H. Jedin, History of the Council of Trent; B. J. Kidd, Counter-Reformation 1550–1600; H. J. Schroeder, Canons and Decrees of the Council of Trent; A. D. Wright, Counter-Reformation.

Trespass. See SIN.

Trespass Offering. See OFFERINGS AND SACRIFICES IN BIBLE TIMES.

Tribulation. General Biblical Meaning. “Tribulation” is the general term in the Bible to denote the suffering of God’s people. In the OT the words ṣārâ and ṣar (“straits” or “distress”) pertain variously to intense inner turmoil (Job 7:11; Pss. 25:17; 120:1), the pain of childbirth (Jer. 4:31; 49:24), anguish (Job 15:24; Jer. 6:24), and punishment (1 Sam. 2:32; Jer. 30:7). The Greek thlipsis from thlibō (“to press” or “to hem in”) often serves to translate ṣārâ in the LXX, and refers generally to the oppression and affliction of the people of Israel or the righteous (Deut. 4:30; Ps. 37:39), while in the NT thlipsis is usually translated “tribulation” or “affliction.”

Varieties of Tribulation. In the NT tribulation is the experience of all believers and includes persecution (1 Thess. 1:6), imprisonment (Acts 20:23), derision (Heb. 10:33), poverty (2 Cor. 8:13), sickness (Rev. 2:22), and inner distress and sorrow (2 Cor. 2:4; Phil. 1:17). Frequently, tribulation is connected with deliverance, which implies that it is a necessary experience through which God glorifies himself in bringing his people to rest and salvation.

Tribulation in the Purpose of God. Tribulation may be a means by which God disciplines his people for their unfaithfulness (Deut. 4:30). More often, especially in the NT, tribulation occurs in the form of persecution of believers because of their faithfulness (John 16:33; Acts 14:22; Rev. 1:9).

The sufferings of Christ provide the model for the believer’s experience (1 Pet. 2:21–25), and in some sense they participate thus in the sufferings of Christ (Col. 1:24). Tribulations are viewed by Scripture as entirely within the will of God, serving to promote moral purity and godly character (Rom. 5:3–4). As such, they must be endured with faith in the goodness and justice of God (see James 1:2–4, where “trials” or “testing” labels what appears to be the same experience), thus serving as a test of the believer’s faith and leading to greater stability and maturity.

Jesus promised tribulation as the inevitable consequence of his followers’ presence in the evil kosmos (John 16:33), something they could expect as a way of life. The apostle Paul echoes this viewpoint when he warns that godly believers will certainly suffer persecution (2 Tim. 3:12–13). Jesus nevertheless encouraged his followers through his overcoming of the world to seek their victory through the application of his victory.

The Great Tribulation. The Teaching of Jesus. The precise expression, “great tribulation” (Rev. 7:24; cf. Matt. 24:21; Rev. 2:22 κῆν—Gr. thlipsis megalē), serves to identify the eschatological form of tribulation. These words are Jesus’ caption for a worldwide, unprecedented time of trouble that will usher in the parousia, Jesus’ return to earth in great glory (see parallels Mark 13:19, “distress,” and Luke 21:23, “great distress”; also Rev. 3:10, “hour of trial”).

This period of time will be initiated by the “abomination that causes desolation” (Matt. 24:15) predicted in Daniel 9:27, a desecration of the Holy Place by one whom many scholars believe is the same as the “man of lawlessness” of 2 Thessalonians 2:3–4. Jesus gives specific instructions to inhabitants of Judea for their escape and warns that the intensity of its calamities would almost decimate all life (Matt. 24:15–22).

Views of the Great Tribulation. Though some modern interpreters, along with many ancient commentators and early fathers, are inclined to regard Jesus’ predictions as totally fulfilled during the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, the words of Matthew 24:29, “Immediately after the distress of those days,” seem to connect them with the parousia. Jesus’ words in verse 21 are probably an allusion to Daniel 12:1 because of the reference there to unparalleled trouble (LXX, thlipsis). The Daniel passage strengthens the case for the eschatological view of the great tribulation because it places this period prior to the resurrection of Daniel’s people.

Since Jesus made this prophecy, major wars, catastrophes, and cosmic phenomena have stimulated belief in the presence of the great tribulation. Such a tendency is typified by Hesychius of Jerusalem in some correspondence with Augustine. Augustine disagreed, preferring to interpret such things instead as characteristics of history as a whole with no particular eschatological significance. In modern times some premillennialists have speculated on the trend of current events as possible precursors of the great tribulation, some even attempting to identify the Antichrist with such candidates as Kaiser Wilhelm II and Mussolini.

Adherents of the major millennial views place the great tribulation at different points in relation to the millennium. Both postmillennialists and amillennialists regard it as a brief, indefinite period of time at the end of the millennium, usually identifying it with the revolt of Gog and Magog of Revelation 20:8–9. Postmillennialists view history as moving toward the Christianization of the world by the church and a future millennium of undetermined length on earth culminating in the great tribulation and final return of Christ. In contrast, amillennialists consider the millennium to be a purely spiritual reality from the first advent to the second, a period lasting already two thousand years and to culminate in the great tribulation, a somewhat less optimistic view of history and the progress of the gospel witness.

Tribulation

To premillennialists the millennium is a future, literal thousand years on earth, and the great tribulation a chaotic period toward which history is even now moving, a decline, i.e., to be terminated by the return of Christ before the millennium. One group, which describes itself as "historic" premillennialists, understands the great tribulation to be a brief but undetermined period of trouble. Another group, dispensational premillennialists, connects it with the seventieth week of Daniel 9:27, a period of seven years whose latter half pertains strictly to the great tribulation.

Within the premillennial movement another issue, the time of the rapture of the church, has given rise to three views. Pretribulationists (rapture prior to the seventieth week) and midtribulationists (rapture at the middle of the seventieth week) perceive the great tribulation as characterized by the wrath of God upon an unbelieving world from which the church is necessarily exempt (1 Thess. 5:9).

Posttribulationists believe that the great tribulation is merely an intensification of the kind of tribulation the church has suffered throughout history, through which the church logically must pass. A more recent, novel view in the posttribulation camp seeks to maintain the imminence of the rapture despite the fact that notable tribulation events would necessarily intervene. In order to do so, the events of the great tribulation would be "potential" but uncertain in their fulfillment. Jesus could come at any moment, and one could look back into recent history to see events that fulfilled the great tribulation.

W. H. BAKER

See also ANTICHRIST; LAST JUDGMENT; MILLENNIUM, VIEWS OF THE; RAPTURE OF THE CHURCH; SECOND COMING OF CHRIST.

Bibliography. D. C. Allison, End of the Ages Has Come; R. Anderson, Coming Prince; L. Boettner, Millennium; M. J. Erickson, Contemporary Options in Eschatology; R. N. Gundry, Church and the Tribulation; S. N. Gundry, "Hermeneutics or Zeitgeist as the Determining Factor in the History of Eschatology," JETS 20:45-55; J. E. Hartley, TWOT 2:778-79; A. A. Hoekema, Bible and the Future; R. Schippers, NIDNTT 2:807-9; H. Schlier, TDNT 3:140-48; J. Walvoord, Rapture Question; T. Weber, Living in the Shadow of the Second Coming; D. Wilson, Armageddon Now! The Premillennialian Response to Russia and Israel Since 1917.

Trichotomy. The term, signifying a division into three parts (Gr. tricha, "in three parts"; temnein, "cut"), is applied in theology to the tripartite division of human nature into body, soul, and spirit. This view developed from Plato's twofold division, body and soul, through Aristotle's further division of the soul into an (1) animal soul, the breathing, organic aspect of man's being, and a (2) rational soul, the intellectual aspect.

Early Christian writers, influenced by this Greek philosophy, found confirmation of their view in 1 Thessalonians 5:23: "May God himself, the God of peace, sanctify you through and through. May your whole spirit, soul and body be kept blameless at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ." Origen even took the words sōma ("body"), psychē ("soul"), and pneuma ("spirit") as clues to the proper method of interpreting all Scripture, suggesting that each Scripture should be interpreted (1) in its natural or somatic meaning, (2) its symbolic or psychological meaning, and finally (3) in its spiritual or pneumatic meaning. Such piecemeal interpretation of Scripture or of human nature is likely to miss the tremendous biblical emphasis on wholeness and unity, where even in the Thessalonian proof text Paul prays that they may be sanctified wholly and that their whole spirit, soul, and body may be preserved blameless.

Both Tertullian and Augustine held to the dichotomy of body and soul but leaned almost to the threefold analysis of man by making the Aristotelian distinction between the animal and rational soul. Present theological and psychological emphasis is almost altogether upon the fundamental wholeness or unity of one's being as against all philosophical attempts to divide it.

W. E. WARD

See also BODY, BIBLICAL VIEW OF THE; DICHO TOMY; MANKIND, DOCTRINE OF; SOUL; SPIRIT.

Bibliography. R. E. Brennan, History of Psychology, from the Standpoint of a Thomist; J. B. Heard, Tripartite Nature of Man; W. M. Horton, Psychological Approach to Theology; D. E. Roberts, Psychotherapy and a Christian View of Man.

Trinity. See GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF; GOD, DOCTRINE OF.

Troeltsch, Ernst (1865-1923). German theologian, philosopher of history, and social theorist. Son of an Augsburg physician, he studied theology at Erlangen, Berlin, and Göttingen (under Ritschl), served as a curate in Munich briefly, and took an appointment at Göttingen in 1890. He then went to Bonn and in 1894 to Heidelberg, where he was named a full professor at age twenty-nine. In 1915 he became professor of philosophy at Berlin. A liberal, he was active in politics as a state legislator and held a post in the Prussian ministry of cultural affairs.

Closely linked with the history of religion school (a movement that questioned the distinctiveness of Christianity and stressed gaining insights from the comparative study of other religions) and profoundly influenced by the historicism of Dilthey, Troeltsch grappled with problems raised by the scientific historical method. He saw the modern awareness of history as the key to understanding our culture, yet a conflict existed between the ceaseless flux and manifold contradictions within history and the demand of the religious consciousness for certainty, unity, and peace. He concluded that all the world religions were unique and relative to a given historical situation, and conscience is valid for each individual who subscribes to a faith. Although no religion can be shown historically to be absolute or final, Troeltsch functioned as a Christian theologian because he held to a Hegelian perspective of history as movement of the spirit that is on the way back to its home in God. He saw all religion as a reflection and intimation of the ultimate reality of God, and from a rational standpoint Christianity is valid since its ethical values are shaped by living decisions made by its adherents in the historical setting of Western culture.

Troeltsch's concern with social and political questions led to a sociological treatment of the history of Christianity in his best-known work, Social Teaching of the Christian Churches (1912). It examined the areas of family, economics, politics, and learning and revealed Christianity as exhibiting two contradictory but complementary tendencies—compromise and rejection of compromise. This rhythm of accommodation and protest was expressed in three forms of religious institution—the church, which compromises with society and culture; the sect, which rejects all compromise with the world, and individual religious spontaneity, which expresses itself in mysticism. Each type in turn was conditioned by social and cultural variables.

R. V. PIERARD

See also HISTORY OF RELIGION SCHOOL; SOCIAL GOSPEL.

Bibliography. E. Troeltsch, Absoluteness of Christianity and the History of Religions; Protestantism and Progress: A Historical Study of the Relation of Protestantism to the Modern World; Social Teaching of the Christian Churches; J. P. Clayton, ed., Ernst Troeltsch and the Future of Theology; R. Morgan and M. Pye, eds., Ernst Troeltsch: Writings on Theology and Religion; T. F. O'Dea, "Ernst Troeltsch," International Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences 16:151–55; T. Ogletree, Christian Faith and History: A Critical Comparison of Ernst Troeltsch and Karl Barth; W. Pauck, Harnack and Troeltsch: Two Historical Theologians; B. A. Reist, Toward a Theology of Involvement: The Thought of Ernst Troeltsch; T. Yasukata, Ernst Troeltsch: Systematic Theology of Radical Historicity.

Trueblood, David Elton (1900–1995). Born in Pleasantville, Iowa, he graduated from William Penn College (1922), Harvard University (1926), and Johns Hopkins University (Ph.D., 1934). He taught at Guilford College (1927–30), Haverford College (1933–36), and Stanford University (1936–45), where he served also as chaplain, before appointment as professor of philosophy at Earlham College (1946–70). He was executive secretary of the Baltimore Yearly Meeting of Friends (1930–33) and editor of Friend (1935–47).

He also headed the religious department of the United States Information Agency (1954–55). American Heritage made him its Churchman of the Year in 1960.

Trueblood was much influenced by the writings of William Temple and C. S. Lewis. Like Lewis he was a popular lecturer, and he spent much of his later life traveling and speaking as a professor-at-large. He was a warm ecumenist, as is readily seen in his "Yokefellow" movement, which stretched beyond denominational barriers. Disparaging Christian individualism, the movement promoted small group unity, accountability, and voluntary discipline. Trueblood was also a supporter of the church renewal movement (cf. his Company of the Committed).

Among Trueblood's many publications are Trustworthiness of Religious Experience (1939), Alternative to Futility (1948), Life We Prize (1951), Company of the Committed (1961), Incendiary Fellowship (1967), and the autobiographical While It Is Day (1974).

J. D. DOUGLAS

See also FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF; MYSTICISM.

Bibliography. J. R. Newby, ed., Basic Christianity: Addresses of D. Elton Trueblood; Best of Elton Trueblood, An Anthology; Elton Trueblood: Believer, Teacher, and Friend; Philosopher's Way: Essays and Addresses of D. Elton Trueblood; S. Coakley, Christ without Absolutes.

Trust. See FAITH.

Truth. The word truth denotes something that conforms to actuality, is faithful to a standard, or involves sincerity or integrity. The ground for truth is reality itself. Truth can describe two distinct but related things. First, Aristotle taught that truth describes statements or propositions. (Statement and proposition here denote declarative or factual sentences like "John eats a lot of ice cream.") If a statement says something is true, and it actually is, then the statement is true. In this sense, "John Kennedy died in 1963" is true because that is actually when he died. In what philosophers call the correspondence theory of truth, true propositions are those that actually coincide with reality. Second, truth describes the quality of persons who are genuine, loyal, or filled with integrity. This is its meaning in the sentence, "Sandy is my true friend."

The two senses of truth are both important. The Bible often uses truth in the personal sense. God is the true God (Jer. 10:10; John 17:3). When Christ claims, "I am the . . . truth" (John 14:6), he describes himself as the reliable path to God. Jesus is genuine and not counterfeit; knowing him leads one to God. So truth in Scripture does represent faithfulness, reliability, integrity, and consistency—all attributes of persons. But the concept of truthful propositions is also important. Scripture condemns false prophets and teachers because what they say does not conform to reality. A traditional concept of biblical authority includes the idea that what Scripture teaches corresponds to the real state of affairs. It is important both to believe the truth (2 Thess. 2:9) and speak the truth (Eph. 4:15).

Truth

Those influenced by neo-orthodoxy sometimes set the two uses of truth against each other, rejecting propositional truth in favor of personal truth. This is a false dichotomy. The statement, "Jesus is the only way to God," is a true proposition if and only if Jesus is the Truth—if, in other words, he is in reality the genuine, noncounterfeit path to God. Conversely, holding a correspondence theory of truth does not rule out saying, "John is a true blue friend." The two senses of truth logically depend on each other.

Responding to those who limit biblical truth to the personal kind of truth, evangelicals defend propositional revelation. Contrary to neo-orthodoxy, propositional revelation affirms that biblical statements do not merely point toward revelation but actually are revelation. This point is well-taken. But it does not mean that the only kind of sentence in the Bible is the declarative sentence, that is, that every sentence in the Bible is a proposition. Along with descriptive sentences, the Bible also contains material such as parables that are not straightforward descriptions of events or objects.

Truth is not identical to knowledge. Knowledge is some person's warranted grasp or awareness of truth. Contemporary thought and society are marked by perspectivism, the pervasive postmodern assumption that all truth is relative to a person's cultural and linguistic perspective. This belief undergirds the moral truism that people should tolerate all viewpoints in a pluralistic society. Tolerance makes it possible to enjoy the high value of unlimited personal freedom. But according to postmoderns, a person or group that claims to understand absolute truth is dangerous because absolutism leads to tyranny. The postmodern response is to thwart unjustified restrictions of personal freedom by demolishing all overarching viewpoints that could justify oppression and by replacing them with many local perspectives.

But perspectivism is flawed. First, it is self-defeating. Generally, perspectivists hold their theory of perspectivism to be universally true, that is, they hold it in a way that transcends perspectivism. Second, perspectivism overstates its case. Although some things are unknown, it does not follow that all things are unknowable. Third, local perspectives, no less than comprehensive worldviews, can lead to tyranny.

Traditional Christians say that truth is absolute. By this they mean that what is ultimately true—the truth that is identical with God's knowing—is not finally relative to or limited by finite perspectives. But human knowledge is limited. Human persons see the world from particular locations within a culture or specific spots within space/time history (1 Cor. 13:12). Human knowing also suffers the serious negative effects of sin (Rom. 1:24–28). But these limits do not entail that all human knowing is illegitimate, untrue, irrational, or unwarranted. Using a variety of strategies, humans test for truth, gradually sorting out better ideas and eliminating false ones. Think of the way science has radically improved our understanding of the world. Thus, human knowing is genuine to the degree it approximates God's knowledge of truth. D. K. CLARK

Bibliography. A. Holmes, All Truth Is God's Truth; A. C. Thiselton, NIDNTT 874–902.

Tübingen School. In the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries a conservative school of theology existed at Tübingen fostered by G. C. Storr (1746–1805) that stressed the supernatural character of revelation and biblical authority. Also, a Catholic "Tübingen school" attempted in the late nineteenth century to reconcile the church's teaching with modern philosophy and biblical studies. By far the best known, however, is the one headed by Ferdinand Christian Baur (1792–1860), which opened up new avenues in NT study and was the most controversial movement in biblical criticism in the midnineteenth century. Its major contribution was calling attention to the distinct strands and theologies within the NT itself and establishing the principle of a purely historical understanding of the Bible. The contrasts between the Synoptic Gospels and John, the various letters attributed to Paul, and Paul and the other early church leaders were carefully examined. Baur, much influenced by idealist philosophy, rejected supernaturalism and applied Hegelian dialectic to the NT. He found that it reflected not a homogeneous development but a fundamental tension between the Jewish church of Peter and the Hellenistic Gentile church of Paul. The NT documents attempted to reconcile the conflict between an earlier Petrine and a later Pauline theology by formulating a new synthesis. Baur believed that the authenticity of the various books could be determined by the degree to which they revealed "tendencies" of this conflict. He also traced out a similar kind of dialectical movement in the history of the church.

Although Baur began teaching at Tübingen in 1826, the school's founding is properly dated from the appearance of his pupil D. F. Strauss's Life of Jesus in 1835. This marked the formal break between the old conservative school and the new radical antisupernaturalism. Bauer himself viewed Jesus in Hegelian terms as the exemplary embodiment of an idea that had greater universal significance than the concrete person of Jesus himself. Soon a circle of young lecturers formed under the leadership of Eduard Zeller and in 1842 founded the principal mouthpiece of the school, the Tübinger theologische Jahrbücher. (It went under in 1857 but was revived as the Zeitschrift für wissenschaftliche Theologie [1858–1914] under the auspices of Adolf Hilgenfeld, one of Baur's most extreme followers.)

By the late 1840s the Tübingen School came under severe attack and the various members gradually drifted away. Baur himself became isolated within the Tübingen faculty as well as the German academic community, and spent his last years defending his views and producing a multivolume history of the church from a naturalistic standpoint, which explained all events by a combination of political, social, cultural, and intellectual causes but without any consideration of divine influence. Although relatively short-lived, the school with its emphasis on dialectical conflict within the early church, rejection of Pauline authorship of most of his epistles, and completely antisupernaturalistic outlook contributed significantly to the development of a historical-critical approach to the Bible that completely ignored the divine element in it.

R. V. PIERARD

See also BAUR, FERDINAND CHRISTIAN; LIBERALISM, THEOLOGICAL; SCHWEITZER, ALBERT; STRAUSS, DAVID FRIEDRICH.

Bibliography. W. Baird, History of New Testament Research: From Deism to Tübingen; K. Barth, Protestant Theology in the Nineteenth Century; G. Bray, Biblical Interpretation: Past and Present; C. Brown, NIDCC 987–88; O. Chadwick, Secularization of the European Mind in the 19th Century; H. Harris, Tübingen School; R. A. Harrisville and W. Sundberg, Bible in Modern Culture: Theology and Historical-Critical Method from Spinoza to Käsemann; A. Heron, Century of Protestant Theology; P. C. Hodgson, Formation of Historical Theology: A Study of F. C. Baur.

T.U.L.I.P. See CALVINISM; FIVE POINTS OF CALVINISM.

Turretin, Francis (1623–1687). Calvinist theologian. Turretin was the grandson of an Italian Protestant who emigrated to Geneva and the son of a leading Swiss theologian in the early seventeenth century. Benedict Turretin was a proponent of the orthodox Calvinism formulated at the Synod of Dort (1618–19), and he promoted the Canons of Dort in Switzerland and France. Francis advocated the same sort of Calvinism as his father and is most widely known for presenting orthodox Calvinism in a scholastic manner.

Francis was born and died in Geneva but was educated in a variety of theological centers: Geneva, Leiden, Utrecht, Paris, Saumer, Montauban, Nimes. In 1647 he became pastor to the Italian congregation in Geneva, and in 1653 he was named a professor of theology as well. He was known for his mild and friendly personality as well as for his unbending interpretation of Calvinism. In 1675 he published the Formula Consensus Helvetica, and in 1688 his famous four-volume work, the Institutio, one of the fullest expressions of Calvinist scholasticism. Francis died in Geneva and was succeeded in his pastoral and teaching positions by his son, Jean Alphonse (1671–1737). Jean Alphonse, contrary to his father, worked to remove the scholastic Calvinist standards.

Francis Turretin's theology is generally what became known as Calvinist orthodoxy in the tradition of Theodore Beza and the Dutch theologians who opposed Arminius. In addition, it reflected the idea of verbal biblical inspiration as written into the Helvetic Consensus Formula of 1675. Turretin's contribution to this theology was to create precise and complete doctrinal positions. Calvin's theology provided the framework, and Turretin developed carefully worded dogmas based on scripturally derived principles. Though Calvin, using a more humanist scholarship, allowed contradictions and problems to stand, Turretin sought to present the most complete set of logical deductions possible in order to reject unorthodox interpretations and to present a biblical and complete theology. Doctrines deduced from the "decrees of God" provided Turretin with his basic approach to all theology; thus, Calvinist orthodoxy concentrated for the most part on ideas about predestination, reprobation, and salvation by unmediated grace.

This orthodoxy was not maintained in the eighteenth century. Questions about biblical texts were raised by theologians who continued to use humanist exegesis and by others who questioned orthodox ideas of verbal inspiration (Helvetic Consensus) and infallibility (Belgic Confession). Also, theologians such as Turretin's son played down the use of precise doctrines that tended to divide Protestants; instead, they identified basic beliefs (as the Apostles' Creed) in order to promote unity. Francis's theology was revived, however, in the nineteenth century by the American Presbyterians of the Princeton school of theology, most notably Charles Hodge. Turretin's Institutio was reprinted in 1847 and became a standard textbook for orthodox training in American Presbyterianism.

R. J. VANDERMOLEN

See also PRINCETON THEOLOGY, OLD; SCHOLASTICISM, PROTESTANT.

Bibliography. J. W. Beardslee III, ed. and trans., Reformed Dogmatics; J. Good, History of the Swiss Reformed Churches since the Reformation; H. Heppe, Reformed Dogmatics; J. H. Leith, Introduction to the Reformed Tradition; G. Marsden, Fundamentalism and American Culture; R. A. Muller, Post-Reformation Reformed Dogmatics.

Twelve Articles of the Peasants

Twelve Articles of the Peasants (1525). Produced in South Germany, the articles are a demand for religious, social, and economic rights in the face of continuation of the manorial system under which the peasant was virtually a slave. Europe had seen peasant uprisings from 1381 on. John Ball, an English priest, rejected the medieval theological justification of serfdom and made a social application of Wycliffe's Dominion. Similarly, in Germany the uprisings of 1524–25 drew from Luther, but gave also a secular interpretation of Liberty of the Christian Man.

In a period of unrest among the towns and the upper level of peasants, the Twelve Articles were published by Sabastian Lotzer of Memminge on March 1, 1525. They may have been revised by Balthasar Hubmaier, who approved the peasants' goals. Among his papers was found an annotated copy with NT support for each article.

The articles open with a petition for the right of "the entire community" to choose and dismiss pastors. The purpose was to guarantee the teaching of "the Holy Gospel pure and simple" to the end that "His grace may increase within us and be confirmed in us." The second article agrees to a tithe but insists it be gathered and controlled by the elders and used to support the minister and his family. The third article asks for personal freedom. It begins, "It has been the custom, hitherto for men to hold us as their own property." But because Christ died for all, all are free though under authority in an ordered state. The fourth and fifth ask the right to fish, hunt, and gather wood. Numbers six, seven, and eight ask deliverance from excessive service, personal oppression, and rents. Nine asks for cessation of "the great evil in the constant making of new laws." Ten requests the return of "common lands" that have been confiscated. Eleven wants the abolishing of the law of heriot, the nobles' right to choose any item from an estate, thus robbing widows and orphans.

The articles emerged as the Christian Union of peasants attempted to establish an evangelical state in which special privileges were to be abolished and all persons equal. The peasants took the NT quite literally, applying the teaching to the Christian community to society at large. Unfortunately, radical elements under Thomas Müntzer became violent, causing a crusade by the princes who crushed the peasant forces. In the end, towns and peasants suffered and the Reformation lost face. Only the princes profited.

The witness of the peasants to the civil rights implicit in the gospel was at least a hundred years ahead of its time. The Twelve Articles stand with Hubmaier's Heretics and Their Burners as a call for religious liberty and social justice.

W. N. KERR

See also HUBMAIER, BALTHASAR; RADICAL REFORMATION; ZWICKAU PROPHETS.

Bibliography. H. J. Hillerbrand, Reformation in Its Own Words; B. J. Kidd, Documents Illustrative of the Continental Reformation; R. W. Scribner, "German Peasants War," in Reformation Europe: A Guide to Research, S. Ozment, ed.

Twofold State of Jesus. See STATES OF JESUS CHRIST.

Two Swords Theory. See CHURCH AND STATE.

Type, Typology. From the Greek word for form or pattern, which in biblical times denoted both the original model or prototype and the copy that resulted. In the NT the latter was labeled the anti-type, and this was especially used in two directions: (1) the correspondence between two historical situations like the flood and baptism (1 Pet. 3:21) or two figures like Adam and Christ (Rom. 5:14); (2) the correspondence between the heavenly pattern and its earthly counterpart, e.g., the divine original behind the earthly tent/tabernacle (Acts 7:44; Heb. 8:5; 9:24). There are several categories—persons (Adam, Melchizedek), events (flood, brazen serpent), institutions (feast), places (Jerusalem, Zion), objects (altar of burnt offering, incense), offices (prophet, priest, king).

In addition we might note the parallel use of image along with type to denote a moral example to be followed. This latter is an important part of the NT stress on imitation of the divinely ordained pattern exemplified first in Christ (John 13:15; 1 Pet. 2:21), then in the apostolic band (Phil. 3:17; 2 Thess. 3:9), the leaders (1 Tim. 4:12; Titus 2:7; 1 Pet. 5:3), and the community itself (1 Thess. 1:7). As such all believers are to consider themselves models or patterns of the Christ-like life.

It is important to distinguish types from symbol and allegory. A symbol has a meaning apart from its normal semantic field and goes beyond it to stand for an abstract concept, e.g., cross = life, fire = judgment. Allegory is a series of metaphors in which each one adds an element to form a composite picture of the message; e.g., in the good shepherd allegory (John 10) each part carries meaning. Typology, however, deals with the principle of analogical fulfillment. A symbol is an abstract correspondence, while a type is an actual historical event or person. An allegory compares two distinct entities and involves a story or extended development of figurative expressions while a type is a specific parallel between two historical entities; the former is indirect and implicit, the latter direct and explicit. Therefore, biblical typology involves an analogical correspondence in which earlier events, persons, and places in salvation history become pat-terms by which later events and the like are interpreted.

Hermeneutical Significance. It has increasingly been recognized that typology expresses the basic hermeneutic, indeed the attitude or perspective, by which both OT and NT writers understood themselves and their predecessors. Each new community in the ongoing development of salvation history viewed itself analogously in terms of the past. This is true within the OT as well as in the NT use of the OT. The two major sources, of course, were creation and the Exodus. Creation typology is especially seen in Romans 5 and the Adam-Christ parallel, while exodus or covenant typology predominates in both testaments. Positively, the exodus was behind the redemptive imagery in Isaiah 51–52 as well as NT salvific concepts (e.g., 1 Cor. 10:1–6). Negatively, the wilderness wanderings became the model for future admonition (e.g., Ps. 95:7–8; Heb. 4:3–11).

The church fathers combined typology and allegory, linking the former with general religious truths expressed in terms of Greek philosophical concepts. This continued until the Reformation (with periodic opposition such as the Antiochene School of the fourth century or the Victorines of the twelfth); the Reformers espoused a system that viewed the OT literally with a christological hermeneutic, i.e., as pointing forward messianically to Christ. During the critical period after the seventeenth century, the whole concept of promise-fulfillment was played down and the OT became religious experience rather than history. In recent decades, however, typology properly conceived has become again a valid tool, based on the biblical perspective regarding the recurring pattern in God's acts within history, thereby establishing continuity between the stages of redemptive history.

Current Debate. The debate today concerns the possible distinction between innate and inferred types. An innate type is explicitly stated as such in the NT; an inferred type is not explicit but is established by the general tone of NT teaching, e.g., the Epistle to the Hebrews, which uses typology as its basic hermeneutic. Many deny the latter because of the danger of fanciful eisegesis, which subjectively twists the text.

Both type and antitype should be based on genuine historical parallels rather than timeless mythological parallels. Typology should not redefine the meaning of the text or suggest superficial rather than genuine correspondence. Both OT and NT passages should be exegeted before parallels are drawn.

Further, one should study the specific correspondences as well as the differences between type and antitype. Here typology is similar to parable research, necessitating a consideration of exegetical details in both OT and NT passages. In what way, e.g., was the brazen serpent a type of Jesus' death in John 3:14–15? Were the peripheral details of Numbers 21:4–9 part of the typology? There will always be a single central point, and secondary details must be noted with care before they are applied to the analogy. Noting the dissimilarities provides a control against an overly imaginative, allegorical rendering of the type.

It is well to avoid dogmatizing types. It is difficult and extremely subjective to establish doctrine on the basis of typology. Even in Hebrews, typology is utilized for illustrative effect rather than for dogmatic considerations. Therefore, only when typology has a direct doctrinal purpose may we affirm such.

Finally, one must not seek types where the context does not warrant them. As in all exegetical study, we want to arrive at the author's intended meaning rather than a generalized subjective interpretation. As stated above, while the NT writers undoubtedly used typology that is not recorded in canon, we do not have the revelatory stance necessary to extend that approach beyond the text itself. The allegorical, subjective results seen in many modern sermons testify eloquently to the dangers.

G. R. OSBORNE

See also INTERPRETATION OF THE BIBLE.

Bibliography. E. Achtemeier, IDBSup 926–27; D. L. Baker, "Typology and the Christian Use of the OT," SJT 29:137–57; G. K. Beale, ed., Right Doctrine from the Wrong Texts?; E. C. Blackman, "Return to Typology," CongQ 32:53–59; J. W. Drane, "Typology," EvQ 50:195–210; E. E. Ellis, "How the New Testament Uses the Old," in New Testament Interpretation, I. H. Marshall, ed.; P. Fairbairn, Typology of Scripture; F. Foulkes, Acts of God: A Study of the Basis of Typology in the Old Testament; L. Goppelt, Typos: The Typology Interpretation of the New Testament; TDNT 8:246–59; S. Gundry, "Typology as a Means of Interpretation," JETS 12:233–40; H. Hammel, "Old Testament Basis of Typological Interpretation," BR 9:38–50; G. H. Lampe and K. J. Woolcombe, Essays on Typology; R. B. Laurin, "Typological Interpretation of the OT," in Baker's Dictionary of Practical Theology, R. Turnbull, ed.; G. Maier, Biblical Hermeneutics; H. Müller, NIDNTT 3:903–7; N. H. Ridderbos, "Typology," VoxT 31:149–50; J. Stek, "Biblical Typology: Yesterday and Today," CTJ 5:133–62.

Tyrrell, George (1861–1909). A Roman Catholic modernist, Tyrrell was born in Dublin. He forsook his early Anglicanism and entered the Jesuit Order in 1880. Ordained priest in 1891, he taught philosophy at Stonyhurst College, where his superiors disapproved of his emphasis on Aquinas, and where he began to question whether his order was speaking to the condition and needs of the modern church. He was transferred to Jesuit headquarters in London, and in 1899 provoked censure with a published article that challenged traditional doctrine on everlasting punishment.

Tyrrell, George

Removed to Yorkshire (1900–1905), he attacked his church's view of authority and suggested that Roman Catholicism, like Judaism, might "have to die in order that it may live again in a greater and grander form." Rather than recant and submit, Tyrrell chose dismissal from the Jesuits and complained that "mendacity seems to have eaten into the whole heart of the system."

In 1907 he was deprived of the sacraments. He rejected papal infallibility and defended modernism in his Medievalism (1908). To him, modernism meant "the acknowledgment on the part of religion of the rights of modern thought: of the need of effecting a synthesis . . . between what . . . is found to be valid in the old and in the new." Tyrrell held that the most subtle and dangerous form of atheism was his church's rejection of the world as God-forsaken. To him, this was a denial of God's working and self-revelation in human history. He developed his thought in Christianity at the Cross-Roads (1909) but refused to join Roman Catholic priests who were received into the Church of England. He died at forty-eight, was refused a Roman Catholic burial, and lies in an Anglican churchyard in Sussex.

J. D. DOUGLAS

See also CATHOLICISM, LIBERAL; VON HÜGEL, FRIEDRICH.

Bibliography. C. J. Healey, Invisible Church and the Visible Church in the Writings of George Tyrrell; J. L. May, Father Tyrrell and the Modernist Movement; M. D. Petre, Autobiography and Life of George Tyrrell; Von Hügel and Tyrrell; J. Ratté, Three Modernists; D. G. Schultenover, George Tyrrell in Search of Catholicism.

Uu

Ubiquity of God. See GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF.

Ultradispensationalism. Dispensationalists distinguish Israel from the church and so look for a point in history at which God's redemptive program changed from the one form of administration to the other. The most common form of dispensationalism finds the beginning of the church in Acts 2 with the Spirit's coming at Pentecost. From the standpoint of Acts 2 dispensationalism two other views seem extreme, or "ultra." According to Acts 13 dispensationalism the church began when Paul started his mission to Jews and Gentiles (Acts 13:2). According to Acts 28 dispensationalism the church began toward the end of Paul's ministry with his reference to Israel's rejection of the kingdom of God and the sending of God's salvation to the Gentiles (Acts 28:26–28).

Acts 28 dispensationalism is sometimes called Bullingerism after its leading proponent, Ethelbert William Bullinger (1837–1913). Other writers holding this position include Charles H. Welch, A. E. Knoch, Vladimir M. Gelesnoff, and Otis R. Sellers. Bullinger's analysis of the NT led to three dispensations where Acts 2 dispensationalism has two (Israel before Pentecost and the church after Pentecost). Bullinger's first administration encompassed the time of the Gospels when Christ offered the kingdom to Jews only and entrance was signified by water baptism. Second was the transitional period in Acts and the earlier NT epistles when the apostles offered the Jews participation in the "bride church" and practiced two baptisms, in water and in the Spirit. Third was the oneness of Jew and Gentile in the body of Christ addressed in Paul's prison epistles (Ephesians, Colossians, Philippians, 1 Timothy, Titus, and 2 Timothy) and entered by Spirit baptism alone.

Bullinger based some of his arguments upon dichotomies of words that did not refer to incompatible realities. For example, he taught that the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's Supper had to do with the flesh only and so had no place in the body of Christ, alleged to be of the Spirit only. Bullinger failed to understand that just as the inner and outer man can be one man, so the inner Spirit baptism and outer water baptism can constitute one baptism. Thus the church is made up of tangible people in bodies meeting together in visible gatherings for the purposes of ministering to the whole person, both spirit and body. Christ's reference to baptism in the Great Commission need not exclude it from application to today's church.

Spokesmen for the Acts 13 dispensationalism are J. C. O'Hair, C. R. Stam, and Charles F. Baker, author of a major textbook, Dispensational Theology. Baker's name is associated with the Grand Rapids Grace Bible College, which prepares people for ministry in Grace Gospel Fellowship and the Worldwide Grace Testimony.

Answering the Acts 28 dispensationalism, Baker notes that Paul's statement (Acts 28:28) does not mark the beginning of the body of Christ but should be understood in the past tense, the gospel had been sent to the Gentiles (RSV, NIV, and others). Baker also argues effectively for the unity of all the Pauline epistles in their teaching about the church. In Paul's letters he finds support for the practice of the Lord's Supper (1 Cor. 11) but not water baptism. Paul's transitional use of water baptism for Jews (he assumes) is not regarded as normative for Gentiles (1 Cor. 1:13–17). Baker interprets baptism in Romans 6:3–4 as mere Spirit baptism, but it may best be understood as both inner Spirit baptism and outer water baptism.

In defense of Acts 2 dispensationalism Charles C. Ryrie argues that the question is when God initially formed the church, not when it was first understood. Baker replies that God plainly stated what he was doing earlier—bringing in the consummation of all prophecy and offering the kingdom to Israel (Acts 2:16; 3:24). As late as Acts 11:16, he writes, the apostles preached only to Jews. However, Baker failed to quote Acts 3:25, which explains that through the Jews all people on earth will be blessed. Is the message in the early chapters of Acts to the Jews exclusively, or to the Jews first, in order that Samaritans and Gentiles also may be added to the church? Baker's attempt to divorce the Pentecostal reception of power from the Spirit's baptism cannot stand in the light of the total development in Acts. The church began when believers in the crucified and risen Christ were baptized by the Spirit into one body (Acts 2:38, 41, 44, 47; cf. 1 Cor. 12:13) to which the Spirit added Samaritans (Acts 8:17) and Gentiles (Acts 9:26–38; 10:28, 34–35, 45–48; 11:18).

Ultradispensationalism

Baker's chief reason for objecting to Acts 2 dispensationalism is that what happened prior to Paul had been prophesied by the prophets, but nothing about the body of Christ was revealed before Paul. Such all or nothing reasoning is imposed upon Scripture, not drawn from it. The fact that Paul most fully understood, explained, and received the mystery of uniting Jew and Gentile in one body need not imply that Peter, Cornelius, and the Jerusalem church had grasped nothing of this truth (Acts 10:30–38; 11:1–18). Did not Jesus Christ lay the one foundation for the church and prepare the disciples to establish it? The progressive dispensationalist Robert L. Saucy shows that the church is built upon the entire work of Christ's first coming and is sustained through his present leadership. But he also finds that the actual historical formation of the church occurred in Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost.

G. R. LEWIS

See also DISPENSATION, DISPENSATIONALISM.

Bibliography. C. F. Baker, Dispensational Theology; E. W. Bullinger, How to Enjoy the Bible; L. S. Chafer, "Bullingerism," BS 104:257–58; A. H. Freundt Jr., Encyclopedia of Christianity; C. N. Kraus, Dispensationalism in America; C. C. Rylie, Dispensationalism Today; R. L. Saucy, Church in God's Program.

Ultramontaniam. Literally "beyond the mountains" (Alps), the term usually refers to a movement within the Roman Catholic Church in the nineteenth century that opposed conciliar and nationalist decentralization and advocated centralization of power in the papacy in order to restore the spiritual vigor of the church. The concept itself actually dates from the Middle Ages, when the papacy sought increased power in order to free itself from secular control, as in the investiture controversy of the eleventh century—a movement which some call "old ultramontaniam." Coined as a term of derision in the seventeenth century, "ultramontaniam" was resurrected in the post-Napoleonic era to refer to an attempt spearheaded by French Catholic romantics to terminate the influence of Enlightenment rationalism and secular governments in church affairs and to restore papal power—a movement which some call "new ultramontaniam."

However, it was in Germany that the movement became political and eventually touched off the Kulturkampf—literally the "struggle for civilization"—between the papacy and the German government led by Chancellor Otto von Bismarck. The conflict was brief but bitter, beginning in the 1860s and ending by 1890. Diplomatic relations between Germany and the Vatican were restored in 1880, and most of the laws passed against Catholics during the period were repealed by 1886.

The movement aided and abetted the growing administrative authority of the popes and the tightening of the hierarchical structure of the church under their direction. Ultramontaniam everywhere applauded such unilateral papal acts as the declaration of the immaculate conception in 1854 and the promulgation of the Syllabus of Errors in 1864. The movement culminated with Vatican I in 1869–70 and its decree of papal infallibility.

Even though Vatican II (1962–65) reaffirmed papal infallibility, it also weakened ultramontaniam with its approval of an increased role in ecclesiastical affairs for the college of bishops and a greater voice for the laity in congregational life. On the other hand, the tone of the papacy since John Paul II took office in 1978 has been one of reassertion of the ultramontaniam principles of centralization of power and strong papal leadership. It remains to be seen if a revitalized ultramontaniam will emerge in Catholicism at large.

R. D. LINDER

See also KULTURKAMPF; PAPACY; VATICAN COUNCIL I; VATICAN COUNCIL II.

Bibliography. J. B. Bury, History of the Papacy in the Nineteenth Century; E. E. Y. Hales, Papacy and Revolution, 1769–1846; Pio Nono: A Study in European Politics and Religion in the Nineteenth Century; P. Hebblethwaite, New Inquisition?; D. J. Holmes, Triumph of the Holy See; A. M. J. Kloosterman, Contemporary Catholicism; A. R. Vidler, Church in an Age of Revolution.

Unbaptized Infants. See INFANT SALVATION.

Unbelief. Within the context of Christianity and of Western culture, "unbelief" refers to the turning away of individuals and groups from the traditional Christian faith and worldview. Unbelief can be understood from a broad cultural perspective as the secularization of Western society and a defection from belief in the theistic, personal God of the Judeo-Christian heritage. We may also speak of a relative unbelief within the church that is in evidence when certain cardinal doctrines of the faith are denied and attacked from within Christendom. In this sense theological liberalism in at least its extreme forms represents a sort of unbelief.

By the time of the close of the Roman period in Western history, Europe had become Christianized to the extent that the theistic worldview had become dominant. This consensus continued without significant challenge throughout the medieval period, and even the Reformation with its powerful affront to the domination of the Roman Church did little directly to shake the basic consensus. Differences between the Reformers and Rome were primarily ecclesiological, soteriological, and regarding authority.

Unbelief in Western culture began to constitute a serious challenge during the Renaissance with the rise of science and in the Enlightenment. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, thinkers began to express militant religious skepticism, anticlericalism, and scientism, and rejected the influence of the medieval synthesis of Christian doctrine and Aristotelian science. It can properly be said that Christianity had been tied so tightly to this antiquated cosmology that as it began to lose its grip over the intellectual life of the West, Christianity declined in spiritual and cultural influence. Leading secularists such as Denis Diderot, Voltaire, and Baron d'Holbach persuasively challenged the Christian worldview.

Still, Christians were inclined to support the faith with a broad appeal to reason, especially to natural theology, and to Christianity's positive moral impact. William Paley was typical of many, believing that there was ample evidence for a designer in the marvelous order of the universe. Then skeptic David Hume began to mount the first concentrated opposition to natural theology, undercutting the traditional program of grounding religious beliefs in reason. Hume subjected to rigorous criticism Paley's design argument and also the cosmological, or first-cause, argument for God's existence in its popular form, derived ultimately from Thomas Aquinas in the medieval period. In Germany, Immanuel Kant attacked arguments that attempted to rest faith on reason as part of his general attack on metaphysical reasoning. In particular, he opposed the ontological argument, the attempt to prove God's existence a priori based upon the concept of God, as used by Anselm of Canterbury, René Descartes, and Gottfried Leibniz. While today philosophers consider the validity of the arguments as still open to question, the historical effect of such critiques was to convince Western thinkers to reject the rational attempt to base belief on reason.

While eighteenth-century unbelief challenged the intellectual grounds of faith, nineteenth-century unbelief moved beyond this and assumed the falsehood of theism. While John Stuart Mill could still argue against the reasons for Christianity, Ludwig Feuerbach, Sigmund Freud, and Friedrich Nietzsche took for granted Christianity's falsehood and rational groundlessness and so turned to speculation as to the nonra-tional causes for the belief. Freud argued that man, in need of a "father figure" to enable him to feel at home in the world, projected the concept of God to meet this need, while Nietzsche criticized Christianity at its point of pride, its moral impact on society. For Nietzsche the ethical doctrines of Christianity were a "slave morality" responsible for inhibiting the development of human excellence.

The spread of unbelief in the twentieth century has continued apace. Atheists, among others, turned to existentialism in Europe, as advocated by atheist Jean-Paul Sartre, while Anglo-American thinkers entertained logical positivism as represented by A. J. Ayer. Sartre argued that God's existence was to be denied because it was incompatible with human freedom, while Ayer and Anthony Flew urged that it was linguistically meaningless even to refer to God in language. Varieties of Marxism have risen to power in major areas of the world, invariably antagonistic to religious belief. In Western society the powerful established churches of the nineteenth century have seen in the twentieth a drastic decline in attendance and influence, as Søren Kierkegaard had predicted. A secularized outlook dominates the major intellectual centers and communications media of Western societies, and naturalistic humanism has asserted itself in The Humanist Manifestoes I and II and the Secular Humanist Declaration. Within Christianity itself relative unbelief has made significant inroads into theology as some have attempted to reinterpret traditional theology to accord with the modern secularistic outlook—none perhaps so clearly as John A. T. Robinson in Honest to God.

Even as unbelief has made significant advances in the past several centuries, there is also a vital resurgence of Christianity around the world. Large numbers are being added to the church in many areas, and evangelical activism and scholarship have borne fruit in a new, greater influence in the American cultural and religious scene.

D. B. FLETCHER

See also AGNOSTICISM; ATHEISM; DEATH OF GOD THEOLOGY; DOUBT, RELIGIOUS; ENLIGHTENMENT, THE; EXISTENTIALISM; HUME, DAVID; ROBINSON, JOHN ARTHUR THOMAS; SECULARISM, SECULAR HUMANISM.

Bibliography. P. Angles, Critiques of God; C. Brown, Philosophy and Christian Faith; R. Caporale and A. Grumelli, Symposium on the Culture of Unbelief; C. W. Colson, Presenting Belief in an Age of Unbelief; O. Guinness, Dust of Death; I. Hamnett, Religious Pluralism and Unbelief: Studies Critical and Comparative; J. Hick, ed., Myth of God Incarnate; P. Kurtz, ed., Humanist Manifestoes I and II; Secular Humanist Declaration; B. V. Lightman, Origins of Agnosticism: Victorian Unbelief and the Limits of Knowledge; M. Marty, Varieties of Unbelief; J. Reid, Man without God: An Introduction to Unbelief; J. Sire, Universe Next Door;

Unbelief

J. Thrower, Short History of Western Atheism; J. Turner, Without God, without Creed: The Origins of Unbelief; P. van Buren, Secular Meaning of the Gospel.

Unchangeability of God. See GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF.

Unclean. See CLEANNES, UNCLEANNES.

Uction, Extreme. See EXTREME UNCTION; SACRAMENT.

Underhill, Evelyn (1875–1941). British spiritual writer. The product of a middle-class and nominally Anglican upbringing, she experienced a gradual conversion from self-styled “agnosticism” (through a fascination with Neoplatonic philosophy and “occult” and mystical theism) to religious devotion that led her, shortly before her marriage in 1907, seriously to consider becoming a Roman Catholic.

By 1909 she had written a number of short stories and three highly symbolic novels. The appearance of Mysticism (1911) marked the beginning of her life’s work of explaining the mystical traditions. Initially she intentionally avoided an explicitly Christian viewpoint in order to reach a broader readership. Mystic Way (1913) attempted what Mysticism had not: to establish the mystical character of NT Christianity. Her romantic, empirical, and psychological approach both contrasted with and built upon previous historical, theoretical, and philosophical introductions to mysticism and, coupled with her contemporaries’ fascination with psychology and the vitalistic philosophies of Henri Bergson and Rudolf Eucken, helped stimulate a wave of interest in mysticism before and during the First World War. Underhill’s Practical Mysticism (1920) appeared at the same time as several translations and studies of medieval mystical writings. Underhill translated or edited a few of these; for most of them she provided encouragement for other translators and introductions to their translations. She also published two volumes of mystical verse (Immanence, 1912; Theophanies, 1916).

After World War I Underhill became active in the Church of England, while placing herself (1922–25) under the spiritual direction of the Roman Catholic Friedrich von Hügel. Called upon to give numerous retreats, she shifted her focus increasingly toward the liturgical life of the church; this culminated in her second main work, Worship (1936).

Underhill’s spiritual insight and learning were remarkable, but these gained their impact from her literary gifts. She had limited academic training, especially in regard to the German mystics, and relied on the help of others more skilled than she in the early vernacular literatures. Although she understood her purpose as a practical one and was content to leave theologizing and philosophizing to others, her work is far from superficial.

D. D. MARTIN

See also MYSTICISM; SPIRITUALITY; VON HÜGEL, FRIEDRICH.

Bibliography. L. Menzies, ed., Collected Papers of Evelyn Underhill; C. Williams, ed., Letters of Evelyn Underhill; C. J. R. Armstrong, Evelyn Underhill; L. Barkway and L. Menzies, eds., Anthology of the Love of God from the Writings of Evelyn Underhill; A. Callahan, Spiritual Guides for Today; M. Cropper, Life of Evelyn Underhill; D. Greene, Evelyn Underhill, Artist of the Infinite Life; T. S. Kepler, ed., Evelyn Underhill Reader; O. Wyon, Desire for God.

Understanding. Understanding is cognitive activity that is richer and deeper than scientific knowledge because it is connected to personal experience and choices. This distinction is associated with Wilhelm Dilthey (1833–1911), who contrasted the natural sciences with the human sciences. Dilthey said that natural science involves grasping information about objects through explanations of causal relationships between those objects. But the human sciences deal with the inner life of persons. Understanding lies in the domain of the human sciences and involves grasping the meaning of phenomena as they relate in important ways to peoples’ lives.

In the contemporary context, the concept of understanding is most important in its application to hermeneutical theory. It first gained importance for hermeneutics due in large part to the work of Friedrich Schleiermacher (1768–1834). Prior to Schleiermacher, hermeneutics meant formulating principles for accurately identifying the meaning of a literary text. But Schleiermacher sought something more than a rational grasp of some ancient writer’s assertions. He argued that interpretation involves not only a linguistic aspect, but also a psychological one. The latter includes experiencing an imaginative communion, an empathic connection, with a text’s author. Interpreting must involve attending not only to the outer grammatical and literary aspects of the text, but also to the inner mind of the author. This includes the thoughts and, in the end, the whole existence of the author.

Consider this illustration of the importance of the inner life of an author. When a child hears a new word, he or she connects it to what he or she already knows based on experience. So the child’s sense of the word involves the child’s own experience. Given this, understanding the child’s use of the word requires an inner connection with that experience. Similarly, when seeking to understand an author, a reader must grasp something of that author’s experience. So while hermeneutics previously stressed identifying an author’s unchanging cognitive meaning, interpretation came to include connecting with the soul of the author. Attention to the psychological aspect of learning leads to the richer, more personal form of knowing called understanding.

The later stages of Martin Heidegger's (1889–1976) thought influenced the development of the concept of understanding in its application to hermeneutics. Heidegger taught that language does not produce understanding by speaking directly about objects. That is, language does not function by referring to external things. Instead, the ultimate reality—Heidegger calls this being (sein)—discloses or reveals itself in a primal or basic sort of language that is characteristic of poets or mystics. In this analysis, Heidegger almost personalizes language as the “custodian” of being, as the magical place where being actually resides. Hermeneutics requires one to enter into such language. Understanding emerges from encounters with primal forms of language that speak to the individual.

Contemporary hermeneutics in the tradition of Rudolf Bultmann (1895–1965) stresses the importance of pre-understanding to interpretation. Bultmann believed that this pre-understanding required an analysis of human existence as such. Building on Heidegger, Bultmann insisted that his analysis of existence is existential. (But he claimed it is not the philosophy called existentialism, for to adopt existentialism as a particular philosophy would impose alien thinking on the text.) Bultmann insisted that his existential analysis of humanness is the necessary prerequisite of all understanding.

Bultmann's disciples developed this tradition into what is called the New Hermeneutic. Leading proponents of the New Hermeneutic see all theology as essentially hermeneutical. Theology is a description of surprising word-events that lead to new forms of self-understanding. God is disclosed when the biblical text (especially those stories with surprise endings like the story that Nathan told to King David) somehow sparks a sudden self-understanding and leads to a new way of relating to the world.

It also challenges evangelical belief. Schleiermacher's approach to hermeneutics emerged from his romantic interest in aesthetics, as against the cognitive orientation of philosophy or law. Schleiermacher's God can help us experience religious feelings, but he does not speak meaningfully to us. In the New Hermeneutic, the text's function is to elicit new self-understanding. Again, this means that the Bible does not speak an intelligible divine message. Indeed, hoping to free the text to elicit new self-understanding so it can criticize its critics, defenders of the New Hermeneutic cut biblical interpretation free of objective restraints. Evangelicals argue that this strategy sets the interpretation of the Bible off on an uncontrollable course. As valuable as the insights regarding understanding are, evangelicals usually argue that one should appreciate this wisdom in a context which also recognizes that in the Bible, God teaches us meaningfully about himself.

D. K. CLARK

Bibliography. J. I. Packer, “Infallible Scripture and the Role of Hermeneutics,” in Scripture and Truth, D. A. Carson and J. D. Woodbridge, eds.; R. E. Palmer, Hermeneutics; F. D. E. Schleiermacher, Hermeneutik; A. C. Thistleton, Two Horizons.

Unforgiveable Sin. See SIN, UNPARDONABLE.

Unification Church. The original and official name of this new religious movement founded by the Rev. Sun Myung Moon is the Holy Spirit Association for the Unification of World Christianity. Despite its relatively small size (less than 500,000 members worldwide), it has received considerable publicity and media attention because of its controversial beliefs and practices.

Moon was born to Presbyterian parents in Korea on January 6, 1920. He claims that on Easter Sunday, 1936, while in prayer on a Korean hillside, Jesus appeared to him and revealed that he had been chosen to complete the work which Jesus had begun. This experience was the first in a series of revelatory encounters with God in which Moon states that he received new truth for a new age. The new revelations and teachings of Rev. Moon were subsequently set forth in the Divine Principle, first published in 1957. Moon officially established his new church in 1954 with the avowed purpose of bringing salvation to the world and initiating a truly international family.

The doctrine of the Unification Church is highly eclectic and spiritistic in nature. It reflects the peculiarities of Korea's religiously fertile soil and Moon's lifelong interest in spiritualistic phenomena. The presence of much biblical and Christian terminology in Unification theology has led casual observers to conclude that Moon's church is just another variant of Christianity. However, Moon himself has admitted that his teachings are heretical from the standpoint of traditional, orthodox Christianity. He maintains that because of sectarian divisions and the inability of conventional churches to meet the needs of today's complex world, God desires to communicate a new revelation of truth which, assisted by the spirit world and the movement's loyal followers (popularly known as “Moonies”), will bring about a spiritual revolution. Such a movement will result in the true, lasting unification of the family of man and the world.

At the core of Unification theology is Moon's teaching on the fall of Adam and Eve. According to the Divine Principle, the primary theological document of the Unification Church, no one has truly understood the fall until Moon's revelation, which brought illumination and clarification to the existing biblical account. Moonies believe that Lucifer seduced Eve and that this sexual union caused the spiritual fall of mankind as well as the fall of Lucifer. Eve then entered into a sexual relationship with Adam, which resulted in the physical fall of man.

Unification Church

This dual aspect of the fall—spiritual and physical—requires a restoration to God (salvation) that is likewise both spiritual and physical in nature. Unificationists teach that God's original intention for humankind at the time of creation was for men and women to mature to perfection in God, to be united by God in a marriage centered on God's love, and to produce perfect children, thereby establishing a sinless family and ultimately a sinless world. God's plans were thwarted by the fall, however, and it then became God's desire to restore all things in order to bring about the earthly and heavenly kingdom of God.

In order to accomplish this, Unificationists teach that a Messiah, a Christ, is required. According to the Divine Principle, God finally found an obedient man—Jesus—who came in Adam's place to restore mankind. Moonies teach that Jesus was not God, but a perfect man without original sin. God's intention was for Jesus to take a perfected bride in Eve's place, marry, and produce sinless children. Ultimately, other perfect families would be formed and God's plan for the restoration of the whole of society would be accomplished. This is the essence of the Divine Principle—God's plan for the restoration of humanity—which once was hidden but, Unificationists believe, now has been made plain.

A central teaching of the Unification Church is that God's will was thwarted by the crucifixion of Jesus. Moonies teach that it was not God's original intention that Jesus die. In this sense Jesus failed to complete his mission: he did not marry; he did not achieve physical redemption. Because Jesus saved mankind spiritually but not physically, it is necessary, according to Unification thought, for another Messiah, the Lord of the Second Advent, to bring about physical redemption. This will occur during the messianic age (also referred to as the completed testament age or the new age), which is now upon the earth.

The Divine Principle implies that the Lord of the Second Advent will be born in Korea and that all religions will unite under him. Unification Church members feel that the Messiah is already on earth, although many are reticent about publicly declaring that Sun Myung Moon is that Messiah. Moon himself is evasive on the topic, claiming that his mission is to proclaim the coming of the messianic age and that God will reveal the identity of the Messiah, the "central figure," to the hearts of sincere seekers.

R. ENROTH

Bibliography. J. T. Biermans, Odyssey of New Religious Movements; J. Bjornstad, Moon Is Not the Son;

R. N. Enroth, Lure of the Cults; Youth, Brainwashing and the Extremist Cults; F. Sontag, Sun Myung Moon and the Unification Church; J. I. Yamamoto, Puppet Master; "Unification Church," in Guide to Cults and New Religions, R. M. Enroth, ed.

Uniformity, Acts of. Four parliamentary enactments designed to ensure uniformity of theology and worship in the church in England on the basis of required use of the Book of Common Prayer.

The Act of 1549 (Edward VI) established the first Book of Common Prayer, prepared by Thomas Cranmer and others, for exclusive use in the Mass and all public services. Enacted on January 21, 1549, to take effect the following Whitsunday (June 9), it provided penalties for non-compliance and for speaking against the Prayer Book that ranged up to life imprisonment for a third offense. Public services were to be held in English, with the exception that at the universities services other than the Mass could employ Latin, Greek, or Hebrew.

The Act of 1552 (Edward VI) reflected a shift in Cranmer's position, as the Prayer Book was revised in a Zwinglian direction. Passed on March 9 to take effect the following All Saints Day, this act extended regulations and penalties to the laity, requiring attendance at all public services and prohibiting attendance at unauthorized gatherings. It eliminated the requirement for ministers to wear ecclesiastical vestments in services of worship.

The Act of 1559 (Elizabeth I) reestablished the Prayer Book of 1552 as of June 24, 1559, repealing the legislation of Mary's reign which had restored Roman practice in worship. Modifications of the Act of 1552 included intensified penalties as well as reinstatement of the use of clergy vestments as they had been during the second year of the reign of Edward VI. This act regulated the worship and discipline of the English church for more than a century.

The Act of 1662 (Charles II) reestablished Anglicanism as part of the Restoration settlement after the collapse of the Puritan revolution. It required universal adoption of a somewhat revised version of the Elizabethan Prayer Book of 1559, including a public declaration of support as well as episcopal ordination for those not already so ordained, before the ensuing St. Bartholomew's Day (August 24). It thereby effected the "Great Ejection" of approximately two thousand non-complying Presbyterian, Independent, and Baptist clergymen, marking the beginning of English Nonconformity. The first of several acts of repression known as the Clarendon Code, the Act of 1662 was rendered largely inoperative for Dissenters by the Toleration Act of William and Mary, passed in 1689. It remained in force for Anglican ministers, although it was modified by later legislation.

N. A. MAGNUSON

See also ANGLICAN COMMUNION; NONCONFORMITY.

Bibliography. H. Davies, Worship and Theology in England from Cranmer to Hooker, 1534–1603; Worship and Theology in England from Andrewes to Fox, 1603–1690; A. G. Dickens, English Reformation; H. Gee, comp., Documents Illustrative of English Church History; J. R. H. Moorman, History of the Church in England; C. E. Whiting, Studies in English Puritanism from the Restoration to the Revolution, 1660–1688.

Unio Mystica. Although a doctrine of union with God or Christ is not limited to mystical theologies, the term “mystical union” refers to a direct union or communion with God that is quite different from the general union in Christ that is the privilege of all believers. Students of Christian mysticism have assembled various categories for the mystical unions described by mystics. One set of categories distinguishes between a habitual or frequently recurring union and an ecstatic, transient union. Some authors also speak of a unitive life, a more or less permanent state of living in bliss in God’s presence that is granted in the present life on earth to a very few as a sort of extension of habitual union.

Another distinction is that between abstractive union that removes the human spirit from consciousness of the ordinary world of sense phenomenon and a nonabstractive union that is fully compatible with ordinary consciousness. Some writers have also distinguished between an ontological union or union of essence, on the one hand, and a conformity of wills, on the other hand. Most Christian mystics, however, take care to deny a monistic annihilation of the human soul or personality, even in the ontological or essentialist union. One might also distinguish between a union that results in a clear, affirmative vision of God and a union of negativity wherein God is seen through a cloud of darkness or enigmatically, as in a clouded mirror. Virtually all Christian mystics reserve the clear vision of God, a vision of God as he is, to the beatified saints in heaven. Emphasis on the priority of the speculative or cognitive aspect of the human spirit in comparison to the affective or loving aspect, or vice versa, varies from mystic to mystic and is not necessarily related to a particular view of union, although the affective aspect is often stressed by those describing a voluntaristic rather than an essentialist union or by those experiencing a nonabstractive, transient union. Many mystics offer combinations of the above categories—the distinctions serve the scholar-taxonomist far better than the practitioner.

D. D. MARTIN

See also MEISTER ECKHART; MYSTICISM; TAULER, JOHANNES; UNITIVE WAY, THE.

Bibliography. R. Kieckhefer, “Meister Eckhart’s Conception of Union with God,” HTR 71:203–25; W. A. Mueller, “Basic Christian Doctrines, 31: The Mystical Union,” CT 6:22–23; S. E. Ozment, Homo Spiritualis: A Comparative Study of the Anthropology of Johannes Tauler, Jean Gerson, and Martin Luther (1508–16) in the Context of Their Theological Thought.

Union, Hypostatic. See HYPOSTATIC UNION.

Union with Christ. See IDENTIFICATION WITH CHRIST.

Union with God. See UNIO MYSTICA.

Unitarianism. This term can be applied both to a doctrine and to a denomination that grew out of the specific Enlightenment development of this belief. The doctrine is simply the belief that God is one (a unity) in both nature and person, in contrast to trinitarianism, which views God as having one nature with three persons: Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.

Unitarian belief typically emerged as a consequence of denying the full deity of Christ, and to a lesser degree the Holy Spirit. Holders of this belief came to it for different reasons. Some, such as a few of the most radical Anabaptist groups during the Reformation or the Jehovah’s Witnesses today, adopted it as a result of an overly wooden interpretation of the Bible. Since the Scriptures repeatedly state that there is only one God and since the word “Trinity” is not in the Bible, they believed that it was unbiblical to affirm trinitarianism.

However, the majority of unitarian views arose as a result of seeking to reinterpret Scripture according to various extrabiblical philosophical positions. In the fourth century, Arius, influenced by the Gnosticism of his native Alexandria, developed a unitarian understanding of God, according to Christ only semidivine status: he did not share the same substance with God the Father, but was still worthy of worship. The councils of Nicea (325) and Constantinople (381) rejected Arian unitarianism, codifying orthodox trinitarianism in what is usually called the Nicene Creed. A unitarian theology similar to Arianism reappeared in the late sixteenth and early seventeenth century in the teaching of Socinus. A much less supernaturalistic form of unitarian belief emerged with the Enlightenment, specifically among deists, those seeking to understand God on what they viewed as purely rational grounds, apart from Biblical revelation.

Joseph Priestley championed this unitarian view of God, first in England and later in Philadelphia, leading to the formation in 1796 of the first permanent church to call itself “Unitarian” in America. However, elements of unitarian belief had been espoused in New England since the early eighteenth century, providing the seedbed of Unitarianism as an organized denomination.

Unitarianism

This movement began within Congregationalism, particularly among those reacting against the resurgence of orthodox Calvinism following the Great Awakening. The conflict between those holding unitarian and those holding orthodox beliefs became public with the election of Henry Ware, an antitrinitarian, as Professor of Divinity at Harvard in 1805. The debate intensified over the next decade and a half, culminating in William Ellery Channing's highly controversial and influential sermon, "Unitarian Christianity," in 1819. Despite the title, the sermon argued that the root of the conflict was not so much trinitarianism itself, but the doctrines of original sin and election, which seemed to demand such a complicated understanding of God. Channing believed that these core Calvinist beliefs undermined morality and were contrary to reason.

The publication of this sermon coalesced anti-Calvinists into a new liberal theological movement embracing the term "unitarian." Although denominational reorganization was not part of Channing's vision, this movement gained institutional identity as many New England churches split into separate orthodox and unitarian congregations, with the latter forming the American Unitarian Association in 1825. Unitarianism continued to grow into the first half of the twentieth century under leaders such as Ralph Waldo Emerson, Henry Belows, and Samuel and Frederick Eliot. Membership peaked in 1961 when the Unitarian Association and the Universalist Church of America merged to form the Unitarian Universalist Association. Since then the movement has struggled to find unity in the midst of so much diversity, lacking a scriptural or creedal foundation to anchor any institutional identification. D. A. CURRIE

See also UNIVERSALISM

Bibliography. S. E. Ahlstrom and J. S. Carey, eds., American Reformation: A Documentary History of Unitarian Christianity; J. H. Allen and R. Eddy, History of the Unitarians and the Universalists in the United States; W. E. Channing, Unitarian Christianity and Other Essays; D. M. Robinson, Unitarians and the Universalists; E. M. Wilbur, History of Unitarianism; Liberal Christians; G. H. Williams, American Universalism; C. Wright, Beginnings of Unitarianism in America; C. E. Wright, ed., American Unitarianism, 1805-1865.

Unitas Fratrum. See BOHEMIAN BRETHREN; HUS, JAN.

Unitive Way, The. The last and highest stage of the three ways of the spiritual life in classical mystical theology, following on the purgative and illuminative ways. While the basis of these categories is found in the NT (e.g., 1 Cor. 2:1-3; Heb.

5:12-14; 1 John 2:12-14), they developed in the later fathers, especially Evagrius Ponticus and Augustine. The classic expression of the unitive ways is in John of the Cross's Dark Night of the Soul.

The unitive way, or via unitiva, is pictured as being pursued either along with or subsequent to the other two ways. While the purgative way deals with the outer life (the removal of sins) and the illuminative way with the inner life (in terms of prayer and love), the unitive way goes beyond them to the direct contemplation of God, usually thought of in terms of love (although in Eastern thought ceaseless prayer or the prayer of the heart are the normal terms). On this journey one passes through the dark night of the soul in which all spiritual rewards or blessings are withdrawn. As one continues in contemplation all that is left is pure love of God, for one does not "get anything" experiential. God rewards this disinterested, wordless, contemplative love at his will and in his time with a deep spiritual communion with him, sometimes spoken of as the beatific vision. But since this cannot be produced, it is not a motive. The only goal is to present oneself in love before the only worthy object of love and in that union of love to rest content in peace. Out of this union one can then act in the world, but again the union in love with God, not the resulting action, is the goal. P. H. DAVIDS

See also ASCETIC THEOLOGY; ILLUMINATIVE WAY, THE; MYSTICISM; PURGATIVE WAY, THE; VIA AFFIRMATIVA, VIA AFFIRMATIONIS; VIA NEGATIVA.

Bibliography. Bonaventure, "Triple Way, or Love Enkindled," Works, J. de Vinck, ed.; W. H. Capps and W. M. Wright, Silent Fire; R. Garrigou-Lagrange, Three Ages of the Interior Life.

Universalism. Universalism is that doctrine which asserts that all men will eventually be reconciled to God. A universalist believes that the efficiency of the Atonement is not limited and therefore extends to all. The arguments for universalism generally center on the following: (1) The character of God is incompatible with the idea of the eternal suffering of anyone, therefore his grace extends to all eventually (1 John 2:2). (2) The power of God is sufficient to restore lost humanity (Origen, in what has come to be known as the doctrine of apokatastasis speculated that even the fallen angels and perhaps Satan himself, could possibly be restored), "every knee shall bow and every tongue confess Jesus is Lord" (Phil. 2:10-13). (3) God's sovereign will and purpose will be fulfilled when all are finally saved (2 Pet. 3:9). (4) Perfected souls in heaven could never experience eternal bliss knowing the souls were suffering forever. (5) Advocates of Universalism suggest that this doctrine prevents Christians from becoming arrogant and condescending towards those outside the faith. It is a position of tolerance. (6) It is the only way to make sense of worldwide suffering, suggests John Hick, because this view sees eventual terminus to all suffering.

There are about as many varieties of universalists as there are people writing about it; no two appear to be exactly alike. This makes it difficult to say all universalists believe one thing. Criticism of the doctrine, therefore, must take into account the complexities. Still, some general categorizing may be attempted. (1) There are those, like Origen, who believe that God will restore all eventually. In fairness, it must be added that though Origen is identified with this position, it is important to note that he was speculating the possibilities rather than advocating doctrines. His speculations are not without reservations. The view was condemned at the Council of Constantinople in 553 when Origen was Anathematized. (2) There are those, like George MacDonald, who believe that restoration will eventually come to all after a necessary period of purgation. (3) There are others who could be called "Ultra-Universalists." These fall into three categories: (a) Those who trust that the extent of the Atonement will be applied broadly to all. This group seeks to develop their position with respect to the Scriptures, thus enlisting biblical support for their view. (b) Those who justify their position based on the changed nature of the soul after death. Post-death conditions may allow for factors not readily discernible prior to death. Advocates of this view may, or may not, seek justification for their view in Scripture. Though their position is not clearly delineated by the text; the rationale for their arguments look beyond the pages of Scripture for support. (c) Those whose antecedent assumptions are so strong that their view is held irrespective of the Scriptures. They either reject the text, or reinterpret it, so as to make Scripture compatible with a universalist position.

Those universalists who have respect for Scripture, look for support in such places (besides those texts listed above) as (1) Romans 11:32, "God has consigned all men to disobedience, that he may have mercy on all." (2) 1 Timothy 2:4, which speaks of God's desire that all should be saved and urges the church to pray to this end. While Augustine appears to have drawn hard lines against universalist's hopes, this text, according to some (cf. Aquinas, Summa Theologica, II.II. q. 17a. 3) challenges Augustine's position, wondering if it is possible to hope for the eternal life of all if, in fact, it is not possible for all to be saved in the end. If hope is possible, could that hope be extended beyond the grave? (3) John 12:32, "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men to Myself." Here lifted up refers to the death Christ was to die. Does the mere fact that he died and rose again, ensure that all have a guarantee of eternal life? (4) Colossians 1:18 which says that in Christ God will reconcile all things to himself.

The advocates against Universalism have tended to cite passages which appear, at least on first glance, to underscore the intense risks involved in failing to believe in the Atonement of Christ (see Dan. 12:2; Matt. 18:8; 25:41, 46; John 5:29; 2 Thess. 1:8–9; Jude 7; Rev. 14:11). They suggest that, if the texts pointing to eternal perdition cannot be taken literally, why should the texts that point to eternal life be taken literally? Those who oppose Universalism also point out that if all eventually make it into heaven regardless of a faith commitment to Christ, why should it be necessary to believe in the first place? Why should it be necessary to follow the word of Christ in obedience? Why is it necessary to "make disciples" as is prescribed in Matthew 28:18–20?

The eschatological constructs developed by Christians have tended, with some variation, to come down to one of these two camps. While some might suggest that one's view at this point is a test of orthodoxy, others might offer that speculation in these matters is necessary in an attempt to reconcile a wide variety of Scriptural texts. These texts while not contradictory, are certainly filled with paradoxes and complexities.

J. R. ROOT

See also APOKATASTASIS; UNITARIANISM.

Bibliography. Aquinas, Summa Theologica; Augustine, Enchiridion; H. Ballow, Ancient History of Universalism; N. M. Cameron, ed., Universalism and the Doctrine of Hell; J. Hick, Evil and the God of Love; J. L. Kvangig, Problem of Hell; G. MacDonald, Letters from Hell; R. E. Miller, Larger Hope; Origen, De Principis; J. A. T. Robinson, In the End God; H. U. von Balthasar, Dare We Hope "That All Men Be Saved"?; J. L. Walls, Hell: The Logic of Damnation; T. Whittmore, Modern History of Universalism; G. H. Williams, American Universalism.

Universalism, Hypothetical. See ATONEMENT, EXTENT OF.

Universe, Origin of. See ORIGIN OF THE UNIVERSE.

Unpardonable Sin. See SIN, UNPARDONABLE.

Ursinus, Zacharias (1534–1583). One of the authors of the Heidelberg Catechism. Ursinus was born in the Lutheran town of Breslau and studied in Wittenberg under Melancthon and with Calvin in Geneva. In 1558 he returned to his hometown to teach, but after a year was dismissed from his post for espousing Calvinist views on the Lord's Supper.

In 1561 as Frederick III the Pious embarked upon church reform in Heidelberg and the Palatinate, he sought Reformed faculty for the Collegium Sapientiae, the main theological school in Heidelberg. Upon the recommendation of Peter Martyr Vermigli, Ursinus was employed. Ursinus became head of Collegium Sapientiae, holding the main theology chair there. He also preached, and was charged by Frederick to develop a new Reformed church liturgy. Ursinus wrote a Summa Theologica and a Catechismus Minor in preparation for this task.

Ursinus, Zacharias

In the meantime Frederick came under attack for his Reformed position. He called upon his new faculty at the Collegium Sapientiae plus the preachers in Heidelberg to help in his defense. As head of the school Ursinus worked closely with one of the leading preachers of the city, Caspar Olevianus, and others, including Frederick, in writing what came to be called the Heidelberg Catechism. From this point on, Ursinus was drawn into controversies with the Lutherans, something he did not enjoy. With the death of Frederick in 1576, he was dismissed from the school, and Lutheran theology again held sway in Heidelberg. Frederick's younger son, Casimir, hired Ursinus to teach at Neustadt-on-Hardt, and here Ursinus wrote a Calvinist critique of the Formula of Concord and the Book of Concord. By this time his health had weakened, and shortly after completing the critique, he died.

R. V. SCHNUCKER

See also HEIDELBERG CATECHISM.

Ussher, James (1581–1656). Irish Protestant churchman and scholar. Born in Dublin, he was one of the earliest graduates of the newly founded Trinity College and gained appointment there as professor of theological controversies in 1607. Strongly in favor of a national church, he drafted the articles approved by the first convocation of the Irish Episcopal Church in 1615—an adaptation and amplification of the Anglican Thirty-nine Articles with an emphasis upon the Calvinist and Puritan elements of the English tradition. In 1621 he was appointed bishop of Meath and in 1626 archbishop of Armagh (primate of Ireland). His authority declined after 1633, however, when Thomas Wentworth became deputy and pursued Archbishop Laud's policy of enforcing conformity with England. He nonetheless remained on good terms with both men, even while opposing their efforts.

Rebellion broke out in Ireland shortly after Ussher left for England in 1640. Most of his personal property was lost and, given the tense situation there, he never returned. In England he declined an offer to participate in the work of the Westminster Assembly but contributed a scheme for a modified episcopacy combining bishops and advisory clerical symbols. Although a strong proponent of divine-right monarchy, he counseled Charles I not to approve the execution of Wentworth (now Lord Strafford) in 1641. When Ussher died in 1656, Oliver Cromwell honored his memory with a state funeral in Westminster Abbey.

Wentworth echoes most of his contemporaries in speaking of “so learned a prelate and so good a man.” Ussher was a vehement opponent of Roman Catholicism and denounced toleration as a “grievous sin,” yet he was respected by all parties for his sweet temper and the astonishing range of his scholarship. In patristic studies he distinguished the genuine parts of the epistles of Ignatius from the spurious and also argued the case for the continuity of British Protestantism with the church of the fathers. Undoubtedly he is best known for his scriptural chronology (with the creation of the world dated in 4004 B.C.) since it was eventually inserted in the marginal notes of the King James Version.

Ussher was regarded as an outstanding preacher in the “plain” style. He also collected a magnificent library of books and manuscripts (including the famous Book of Kells), now housed at Trinity College, Dublin. He was much sought after by contemporaries for his knowledge and beauty of character, and his personal impact was probably even greater than his scholarly legacy.

R. K. BISHOP

See also IRISH ARTICLES.

Bibliography. C. R. Elrington and J. H. Todd, eds., Whole Works; J. A. Carr, Life and Times of James Ussher, Archbishop of Armagh; R. B. Knox, James Ussher, Archbishop of Armagh; T. W. Moody, F. X. Martin, and F. J. Byrne, New History of Ireland.

Utilitarianism. The ethical theory according to which the rightness of actions is determined by the net balance of benefits produced. The principle of utility is seen by utilitarians as the sole moral criterion by which to judge actions, this principle being that we should always produce the greatest possible balance of good over evil.

Utilitarianism is a teleological or consequentialist moral theory, holding that rightness of actions is a function of the consequences, “the greatest good for the greatest number.” Consequences are to be distributed as widely as possible; the moral agent is not to look only to his own welfare nor to that of those he especially cares for, but to all persons. In some versions the class of beneficiaries is extended to include nonhuman sentient beings as well.

As a consequentialist theory, utilitarianism proper is not necessarily tied to any specific view about “the good” that is to be produced. One prominent type of utilitarianism is hedonistic, advocating the maximization of pleasure and avoidance of pain. Other types include G. E. Moore's agathistic utilitarianism, promoting but refusing to analyze “the good,” and eudaimonistic utilitarianism, maximizing happiness.

Utilitarianism is traced historically to Jeremy Bentham (1748–1832), although David Hume was a significant precursor of the theory. Bentham advanced utilitarianism as an ethic primarily for social reform. Christian utilitarians such as John Austin (1790–1859) attempted to see God's law as pointing the way to utility. In John Stuart Mill (1806–73) utilitarianism emerged as a specifically personal ethic. Mill believed, incidentally, that the theory accorded well with Christian morality, directing our efforts toward the welfare of all. Utilitarianism's most careful and articulate spokesman was Henry Sidgwick (1873–1958), who saw utilitarianism as capable of reconciling the various "methods of ethics" (intuitionism or deontology, egoism, and utilitarianism itself) and thus of philosophically justifying "common sense morality."

Utilitarianism has recently dominated ethics in the English-speaking world, claiming under its banner many prominent ethicists as well as making a deep impression in public policy decision making. The theory has, however, been heartily criticized. Early versions of the theory held that the specific case, the selection of alternatives in the situation, was properly the realm for application of the principle of utility. Strictly speaking, then, we are incapable of morally evaluating a type of action, such as lying or keeping promises, until we understand the situation in which the action is to be performed so that we could calculate outcomes. W. D. Ross objected that this would lead to highly counterintuitive moral judgments. If two alternatives produced the same net balance of good over evil, but one involved lying and the other truth-telling, the utilitarian would be unable to prefer one to another, since their consequences were equivalent. In response to such objections, rule utilitarianism proposed that certain moral rules should be followed because those rules promote utility. This sort of utilitarianism is widely supported, although R. M. Hare argues that the distinction is unclear and J. J. C. Smart contends that rule utilitarianism is a form of "rule worship."

Utilitarianism is very much in the midst of philosophical debate at the present time. Detractors argue that it fails to provide an adequate protection for the claims of justice, since it would seem that on utilitarian principles the rights of the few could be violated to realize a gain in utility for the greater number. Its defenders argue that utilitarianism fares far better than any deontological system in commanding one's allegiance and in providing a reason to do as morality requires. Contemporary Christian ethicists are generally disinclined to see utilitarianism as an adequate Christian moral theory. D. B. FLETCHER

See also ETHICAL SYSTEMS, CHRISTIAN; ETHICS, BIBLICAL; HUME, DAVID; SOCIAL ETHICS.

Bibliography. M. D. Bayles, ed., Contemporary Utilitarianism; J. Bentham, Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislation; W. K. Frankena, Ethics; J. S. Mill, Utilitarianism; G. E. Moore, Ethics; H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics; J. J. C. Smart and B. Williams, Utilitarianism: For and Against.

Utopianism. The ideal of a perfect, present, earthly society—organic, harmonious, virtuous, satisfying—has a lengthy history. As far as Christianity is concerned, where it has been conceived of as realizable at all, it has been only in the microcosm. Where these tiny minorities have been sanctioned, it has stemmed from the conviction that the Holy Spirit can so bring the life of the heavenly community into this age that, with the response of a few heroic souls, something more approaching the society of the eternal state can be realized than the church has hitherto exhibited. These are eschatological communities, with special realization of their hope. Morally the Spirit gives particular grace to forget self and share both possessions and one's inmost spirit. The Spirit present in such measure also bestows his gifts, so that a charismatic community emerges. In the dynamic phase of these communities there is frequently also an apocalyptic element. Such pouring out of the Spirit is the brief latter-rain manifestation indicating the imminence of the return of Jesus Christ and the ushering in of the supramundane community, either celestial or millennial. Abilities and skills are also given. In its totality the Christian utopian community is filled with worship, and with joy that it is the dwelling place of God by the Spirit.

In the Early and Medieval Church. Monasticism has been the supreme form of Christian utopianism. In the cloister the graces of poverty, confession, obedience, and peace are implemented. Charismatic activity has varied greatly over the centuries, but even at its most minimal the abbot or abbess occupied a quasi-prophetic role. And there have always been those like Joachim of Fiore, in his twelfth-century Sicilian cloister, who have regarded monasticism as a sign of that soon-coming age when the whole world would be a monastery. So monasteries have been a window into and a preparation for heaven. As Roman Catholic monasteries have been in relationship with ecclesiastical authority, a balance has been given that has allowed this form of utopianism to survive and thrive through the centuries. In the Middle Ages there were many utopian groups influenced by monasticism, but their apocalypticism frequently drove them to dissent, which tended to mark the end of the road in a closed society.

In the Reformation. At the time of the Reformation the magisterial Protestants, in their reaction, often possessed only a moderate expectation of what the Spirit could accomplish in believers individually or corporately. The keynote of "O wretched man that I am," even if it should continually impel to Christ, did not radiate great anticipation, while the whole matter of the charismatic was virtually banished. As a result it was quite consistent that monasticism should be dissolved, along with any other form of utopianism.

Utopianism

Anabaptists, on the other hand, gave more indication of that continuing emphasis on piety which comported well with monasticism. This was particularly true of the Hutterites, whose communitarian structures in Moravia exhibited a family-oriented Protestant monasticism, and have continued to do so to this day on the American plains and the Canadian prairies.

As the Reformation proceeded, Calvinism embodied some of the Anabaptist concern for a disciplined life, and this came to particular expression in the English Puritans. Their intense concern with sanctification began to create a desire in some quarters for a life akin to perfection. Not finding these aspirations met in mainstream Protestantism, the left wing of Puritanism, during the Cromwellian interregnum, displayed a lush spiritual vegetation of utopianism. Perhaps the Quakers were the most moderate, believing only that means of grace and official ecclesiastical ministries were no longer necessary for those who possessed the Spirit in such immediacy and fullness. There were also primitivists who believed that in their age of the Spirit the restrictions of private property could no longer apply, and in addition to apocalyptic Fifth Monarchy men there were antinomian Ranters, who interpreted their lack of conscience over sexual irregularities as a certain sign that they had been lifted far beyond mundane restriction into a new realm of liberty in the Spirit. The antics in these purported vestibules of heaven did little to convince other Englishmen that utopianism was a desirable option. Yet in spite of this reaction the longing for heaven on earth could not be entirely quenched.

In Modern Times. The search for utopias in the late eighteenth and nineteenth centuries had many stimuli. The eighteenth century was an age of optimism; among the figures of the Enlightenment there were advocates of human perfection, and John Wesley reached back behind the Reformation and sought to rehabilitate moral perfection in his teaching on perfect love. And of course he had Holiness descendants who believed in the ontological eradication of evil in those redeemed and sanctified. In such a setting the Shakers and the Oneida community were only the tip of the utopian iceberg.

The Shakers, remembered best for their artifacts and tranquility, believed that being filled with the Spirit meant that they should renounce marriage and practice open confession of sin, community of possessions, pacifism, equality of the sexes, and consecrated work. Their utopianism was also charismatic, with dancing in the Spirit, and the founder, Ann Lee, was believed to be a unique prophet of God, the incarnation of the feminine side of deity. In upstate New York was the Oneida community, directed by the Andover Seminary graduate John Humphrey Noyes.

Led by the apparent success of revivalism and Christian social reform, Noyes founded a community in which the Spirit's gift of love was so all-encompassing that it had to be expressed among all, even sexually. Though this expression was restricted and regimented, it did not require many such instances to bring utopianism into disrepute, where it languished for many years.

During the first two thirds of the twentieth century one of the few new and viable Christian utopian communities was the Bruderhof, which patterned much of its life after the Hutterites. Then came the social upheaval of the late 1960s and early 70s and the emergence of the Jesus Movement. Communitarian experiments multiplied. Some simply existed as centers of nurture, but others shared something of the dreams of Christian utopianism. A few, picking up the ideology of Latter Rain Pentecostalism, believed that this was the age of the manifestation of the sons of God, and that they were uniquely in the forefront of the new and glorious end-time humanity. Most of these communities lacked a counterbalance and quickly vanished from the scene.

But the utopian Christian continues to express his challenge: there is more, much more, of the life of God that is to be unleashed on earth.

I. S. RENNIE

See also BRUDERHOF; FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF; PERFECTION, PERFECTIONISM.

Bibliography. L. Bouyer et al., History of Christian Spirituality; N. Cohn, Pursuit of the Millennium; W. Cross, Burned-Over District; D. Hayden, Seven American Utopias; E. L. Tuveson, Millennium and Utopia; C. Wiesbrod, Boundaries of Utopia; B. Zablocki, Joyful Community.

Utrecht, Declaration of (1889). A policy statement made by the five Old Catholic bishops, which in 1897 was adopted as the doctrinal basis of the Old Catholic Churches. It affirmed loyalty to Catholicism rightly understood—that is, as found in the beliefs of the primitive church and the decrees of the ecumenical councils up to the Great Schism between Rome and Constantinople in 1054. Made at a time soon after Vatican Council I controversies had augmented the ranks of dissidents, the declaration condemned what it regarded as Roman deviations from orthodoxy. Prominent among these were the decrees on immaculate conception (1854) and papal infallibility (1870), and the Syllabus of Errors (1864), which had condemned liberal doctrines. The Declaration of Utrecht was in large part the work of those who had earlier unsuccessfully tried to persuade Roman Catholicism to subject its history and traditions to modern criticism.

J. D. DOUGLAS

V V

Van Til, Cornelius (1895–1987). Reformed theologian and philosopher. Van Til was born in Grootegast, Holland, on May 3, 1895, and moved with his family to Highland, Indiana, in 1905. He attended Calvin Preparatory School, Calvin College and Calvin Theological Seminary (all in Grand Rapids, Michigan), from which seminary he transferred to Princeton Seminary, graduating with a Th.M. in 1925. In 1927 he received a Ph.D. in Philosophy from Princeton University. After a year in the pastorate (a Christian Reformed church in Spring Lake, Michigan) he returned to Princeton Seminary in 1928 to teach apologetics, but he turned down the chair to return to the pastorate in Spring Lake in 1929. Although reluctant to leave the pastorate, he was prevailed upon by Oswald Allis, Ned Stonehouse, and J. G. Machen to join the faculty of the fledgling Westminster Theological Seminary when it opened in Philadelphia in 1929. He remained there until his retirement in 1972. When the Orthodox Presbyterian Church was founded in 1936, Van Til transferred his membership from the CRC, and he remained in the OPC until his death in 1987.

Van Til was a prolific writer of unpublished (but widely used) syllabi, articles, and books, a bibliography of which can be found in E. R. Geehan (ed.), Jerusalem and Athens (1971). Among his best-known works are New Modernism (1946), Common Grace (1947), Defense of the Faith (1955), Christianity and Barthianism (1964), and Christian Theory of Knowledge (1969).

Van Til's affinities are with high Dutch Calvinism, and his views are similar to those of Herman Bavinck, Abraham Kuyper, Herman Dooyeweerd, and, to a certain extent, J. Gresham Machen. He vigorously maintains that Christian thought has no parallel in secular thought and that our fundamental presuppositions govern the whole of our system, whether we know it or not. The Christian begins with the presuppositions of an ontological Trinity, the doctrine of creation, and the infallibility of Scripture. The secular (or non-Christian) mind begins with a false view of God, a vague sort of pantheism, and the autonomy of human reason. Van Til rigorously worked out the systematic differences that he felt must exist between these two worldviews, often to an extreme. He sometimes appears to say that non-Christians (and that can mean those who do not agree with him) are incapable of truly knowing anything. His views stirred up enormous controversy, partly because he used such heavy, turgid jargon, but partly because his writings seemed to be self-contradictory.

Van Til's significance lies in his ability to penetrate the falsity of secular thinking and force the believer to go back to the beginning, by affirming the fundamental postulates of the Christian faith. His insistence that we think Christianly and consistently should never be forgotten. W. A. ELWELL

See also BAVINCK, HERMAN; CALVINISM; DOOYEWEERD, HERMAN; KUYPER, ABRAHAM; MACHEN, JOHN GRESHAM; REFORMED TRADITION.

Bibliography. J. M. Frame, HET 156–67; Doctrine of the Knowledge of God; Van Til the Theologian; E. R. Geehan, ed., Jerusalem and Athens; R. C. Sproul, J. Gerstner, and A. Lindsley, Classical Apologetics; D. Vickers, Cornelius Van Til and the Theologian's Theological Stance; W. White Jr., Van Til: Defender of the Faith.

Vatican Council I (1869–1870). The First Vatican Council, convened by Pope Pius IX in Rome, is reckoned by Roman Catholics to be the twentieth ecumenical church council. It was the first to meet since the Council of Trent (1545–63), which had responded to the sixteenth-century Protestant movement. Vatican I sought to define authoritatively the church's doctrine concerning the faith and the church, especially in response to new challenges from secular philosophical and political movements and theological liberalism. However, its work was cut short by the Franco-Prussian War and the invasion and capture of Rome by the army of the Italian government in September 1870. The council completed only two major doctrinal statements, leaving another fifty-one unfinished. Vatican I is remembered almost exclusively for its doctrinal definition of papal infallibility.

Vatican Council I

Context and Structure. The council befitted Pius IX's devout spirituality and expressed the aspirations of the papal-oriented revival of Catholic faith and practice in progress since the 1840s. It also reflected the wide-felt need of the hour to counteract the religious, philosophical, and political beliefs identified by the Syllabus of Errors (1864). Closest to home, the council sought to undergird the authority of the papacy, which appeared to be damaged by the loss of the pope's temporal power, except for Rome and its surrounding region, to the kingdom of Italy (1859–61). The need was to regather the church and reaffirm its faith, its authority, and in particular its head, the papacy.

Pius first mentioned the possibility of a council in 1864, and he set some cardinals to work on it in 1865. He formally announced it in 1867 and issued a bill convening it in 1868. When it met in 1869, the council included 737 archbishops, bishops, and other clerical members. The council considered drafts of documents prepared in advance, debated them, and changed them. The results were undoubtedly the work of the council assembled, although what degree of freedom the council members enjoyed was questioned then as it continues to be today.

Constitution "De Fide Catholica." The first doctrinal definition, "On the Catholic faith" (approved April 1870; also called "Dei Filius"), expressed a consensus of the Catholic revival concerning God, faith, and reason. In its four chapters it defined as a doctrine of divine revelation the existence of a free, personal, creator God who is absolutely independent of the universe he created. The religious truth concerning the existence of this God, it affirmed, could be known by human reason, so that all people had no excuse for unbelieving. Nevertheless, other truths about God and this creation could only be known by faith through divine revelation via Scripture and the tradition of the church. Properly understood, faith and reason were not in conflict. The errors that were specifically mentioned in an appendix—notably atheism, pantheism, rationalism, fideism, biblicism, traditionalism—were either utterly wrong (atheism) or wrong in emphasizing merely the element of the whole truth (rationalism). This definition provided the basis for Catholic theology and philosophy for the next several generations.

Constitution "On Papal Primacy and Infallibility." The proposal of this second definition (also called Pastor aeternus) divided the council into a majority and a minority (140 at its fullest) and began a controversy that has troubled the Roman Catholic Church to this day. Originally the council was to discuss a well-rounded statement of fifteen chapters "On the Church of Christ"—as body of Christ, as a true, perfect, supernatural society, as united under the primacy of the pope, as related to civil society, etc. But when a new section on papal infallibility was introduced later, the majority considered it urgent to treat immediately the sections on papal primacy and papal infallibility as a separate unit. The result was a statement of four chapters that defined both papal primacy and papal infallibility as doctrines of divine revelation.

The passage on papal infallibility, after crucial amendments, carefully circumscribed in what sense the magisterium (doctrinal authority) of the pope was infallible: "The Roman Pontiff when he speaks ex cathedra, i.e. when, exercising the office of pastor and teacher of all Christians, according to his supreme Apostolic authority, through the divine assistance promised to him in St. Peter, he defines doctrine concerning faith and morals to be held by the universal Church, then under those circumstances he is empowered with that infallibility with which the divine Redeemer willed his Church to be equipped in defining doctrine concerning faith and morals." The statement concluded, against Gallicanism and conciliarism, that "such definitions by the Roman Pontiff were in themselves, and not by virtue of the consensus of the Church, not subject to being changed."

Eighty-eight bishops voted against the definition in the first round and fifty-five bishops formally absented themselves at the final vote (July 18, 1870). Eventually, after the council, every bishop submitted to the definition, and the debate transmuted into differences over its interpretation. The definition encouraged Catholic revival, gave Protestants new evidence of papal superstition, and convinced secularists that the papacy was indeed utterly incompatible with modern civilization. To this day the doctrine of papal infallibility continues to trouble many Catholics and to complicate Roman Catholic consultations with Anglicans, Lutherans, and others.

C. T. McINTIRE

See also EX CATHEDRA; INFALLIBILITY; PAPACY; ROMAN CATHOLICISM; TRENT, COUNCIL OF; VATICAN COUNCIL II.

Bibliography. R. Aubert, Vatican I; C. Butler, Vatican Council; F. J. Cwiekowski, English Bishops and the First Vatican Council; A. B. Hasler, How the Pope Became Infallible: Pius IX and the Politics of Persuasion; J. Hennessey, First Vatican Council: The American Experience; P. Hughes, Christian Crisis: A History of the Twenty Great Councils; H. Jedin, Ecumenical Councils of the Catholic Church; H. Küng, Infallible?: An Enquiry.

Vatican Council II (1962–1965). Regarded by Roman Catholics as the twenty-first ecumenical church council, Vatican II was a deliberate attempt to renew and bring up to date (aggiornamento) all facets of church faith and life. It was convened in October of 1962 by Pope John XXIII and reconvened in September 1963 by his successor, Pope Paul VI. Altogether the council held four annual fall sessions, finally adjourning after approving sixteen major texts that were promulgated by the pope. At the opening session 2,540 bishops and other clerical members of council attended, and an average of 2,300 members were present for most major votes. The council took on a profound and electrifying life of its own. Before the eyes of the world it succeeded in initiating an extraordinary transformation of the Roman Catholic Church.

Occasion and Characteristics. In January 1959, Pope John XXIII announced his intention to convene an ecumenical council. After one full year of gathering suggestions throughout the church he established ten commissions to prepare draft documents for the council to consider. He formally called the council in December 1961 and opened it in St. Peter's Basilica, Rome, on October 11, 1962.

In various communications, including his opening speech, Pope John indicated the needs of the hour. The Western world had experienced during the 1950s stupefying technical, scientific, and economic expansion that had given countless people occasion to put their trust in material goods even while other millions of people lived in devastating poverty and suffering. Militant atheism abounded, and the world was undergoing grave spiritual crisis. But, proclaimed Pope John—and herewith he set the character of the entire council—the world needs not the condemnation of its errors but the full supply of “the medicine of mercy.” The church, via the council, aimed to help the world by rejuvenating its own faith and life in Christ, by updating itself, by promoting the unity of all Christians, and by directing Christian presence in the world to the works of peace, justice, and well-being.

Chief among the council's characteristics was a pastoral spirit, which dominated throughout. There was also a biblical spirit. From the very beginning the bishops indicated that they would not accept the rather abstract and theologically exact drafts prepared for them. Instead, they desired to express themselves in direct biblical language. Moreover, there was an evident awareness of history—the history of salvation, the pilgrim church, the ongoing tradition, the development of doctrine, and openness to the future. The council was ecumenical in its outreach to non-Catholic Christians (represented by observers from twenty-eight denominations) and humble in relation to non-Christian religions. It was remarkably open to the whole world, especially through massive global press coverage and by directly addressing the world in an opening “Message to Humanity,” and in a series of closing messages to political rulers, intellectuals and scientists, artists, women, the poor, workers, and youth. Yet the council kept the church thoroughly consistent with its Roman Catholic identity and tradition.

On the Church. Undoubtedly the central theme of the promulgated documents was the church. The “Dogmatic Constitution on the Church” (Nov. 1964) was the pivotal doctrinal statement of the entire council. A second dogmatic constitution was “On Divine Revelation.” A third, called simply a constitution, was “On Liturgy,” and a fourth, called a pastoral constitution, was “On the Church in the Modern World.” In addition, nine practical decrees and three declarations of principle were promulgated. Of these, five concerned the vocations of the church as fulfilled by bishops, priests (two), members of religious orders, and the laity. Three treated education, missions, and the media. Four covered the church's relations with Eastern Catholics, ecumenism, non-Christian religions, and civil governments (religious liberty).

The constitution “On the Church,” in eight chapters (also called Lumen gentium), was the first ever issued on the subject by a council. In a direct way it explicitly continued and completed the work of Vatican I. In particular it incorporated (ch. 3) almost verbatim the controversial statement on papal infallibility, with the addition that infallibility also resided in the body of bishops when exercising the magisterium (doctrinal authority) in conjunction with the pope. The primacy of the Roman pontiff was again affirmed, but, significantly, the centrality of the bishops was also affirmed. This was the principle of collegiality—that the bishops as a whole were the continuation of the body of the apostles of which Peter was head. By placing episcopal collegiality in union with papal primacy and by shared infallibility the council resolved the ancient tension of pope versus councils.

The same document (ch. 4) introduced the biblical teaching that the church as a whole was the people of God, including both clergy and laity. This reversed centuries of virtually explicit assertion that the clergy alone were the church. Both laity and clergy, the document affirmed, shared in the priestly, prophetic, and kingly functions of Christ. The decree “On the Laity” and the constitution “On the Church in the Modern World” (also called Gaudium et spes) charged lay people to undertake their work in the world in all walks of life as Christian vocations, as a lay apostolate that shared directly in the continuation of the work of the apostles of Christ. This too undid centuries of emphasis on the clergy, monks, and nuns as virtually the sole possessors of Christian calling.

Vatican Council II

On Divine Revelation. This second dogmatic constitution continued the work of Vatican I but profoundly modified it. As continuation, it stressed the necessity of the magisterium of the church functioning within the ongoing sacred tradition “which comes from the apostles [and] develops in the Church with the help of the Holy Spirit.” The profound modification was the new de facto primacy given to sacred Scripture. Four of the six chapters define the Scriptures of the OT and the NT as the sacred communication by God, under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, of “those things which he wanted.” While use of critical methods is appropriate, “serious attention must be given to the content and unity of the whole of Scripture.” Sacred Scripture is properly interpreted within the context of the sacred tradition and of the magisterium of the church; all three together and each differently are due to the action of the same Holy Spirit. The biblical emphasis is made explicit here and in other decrees by the centrality given to Scripture in the revised liturgy, in the education of clergy, in the exposition of the council’s teachings, and in the insistence that all persons be given full and easy access to Scripture. The results were immediately experienced most dramatically in the transformation of parish worship into the vernacular languages, instead of Latin only, throughout the world.

On Ecumenism. The decree “On Ecumenism” likewise continued traditional teaching but adapted it dramatically. The council reaffirmed that “it is through Christ’s Catholic Church alone, which is the all-embracing means of salvation, that the fullness of the means of salvation can be obtained.” Yet for the first time Protestants and Anglicans are explicitly regarded as Christians (“separated brethren”), and Eastern Orthodox believers are treated as directly descendant from the apostles. Most significantly, the Catholic Church, for the first time, did not claim that the solution to these divisions lies in a “return” of these churches to Rome, but in an open future in which all may be “tending toward that fullness with which our Lord wants His body to be endowed in the course of time.” Pope Paul made the point concrete by creating a permanent Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity, and by issuing (Dec. 1965) with Patriarch Athenagoras, head of Eastern Orthodoxy, a declaration committing the mutual excommunications of A.D. 1054 to oblivion and hoping for restoration of full communion of faith and sacramental life.

Vatican II has had a profound effect on the whole of Roman Catholic church life and it is difficult to assess still what the long-term effects will be. The dramatic changes in the Church have brought several negative results. First has been the weakening of the Church’s authority for the nominally committed and a frightening of the traditionalists who had perceived the Church to be unchanging and unified in its teaching. Vatican II exposed the great diversity that existed and appeared to introduce change merely for expediency’s sake. Second, the openness encouraged by the Council allowed for new movements to arise within the Church—some that were hard to assimilate into the mainstream, such as radical feminism (as decried by Donna Steichen in Ungodly Rage: The Hidden Face of Catholic Feminism), liberal views of Scripture that are no different from liberal protestantism, and Marxist theologies that encouraged armed revolution in the name of the Church and revised theologies that challenged the very essence of the Roman Catholic Church itself. Concurrent with this has been the catastrophic decline in the number of priests and nuns entering the ministry, forcing the wholesale closing of Catholic institutions. Third, and on the other hand, has been a new interest in Bible study, charismatic experiences, contact with evangelicals that has brought about an “evangelical Catholic” movement within the church and Catholic dialogue with Lutherans, evangelicals, Episcopalians, and others. Much of this has forced Pope John Paul II to attempt damage control by reemphasizing traditional Catholic values and tightening up Catholic practice. Whether this can reverse the trend of the last forty years remains to be seen.

C. T. MCINTIRE

See also INFALLIBILITY; PAPACY; VATICAN COUNCIL I.

Bibliography. W. M. Abbott, ed., Documents of Vatican II; G. C. Berkouwer, Reflections on the Vatican Council; E. E. Y. Hales, Pope John and His Revolution; H. Küng, Living Church: Reflections on the Second Vatican Council; J. H. Miller, ed., Vatican II: An Interfaith Appraisal; A. C. Outler, Methodist Observer at Vatican II; B. Pawley, ed., Second Vatican Council; E. Schillebeeckx, Real Achievement of Vatican II.

Veneration of Relics. See RELICS.

Veneration of Saints. Celebration of the virtuous life or heroic death of persons whose souls reside in heaven with Christ. Such honor includes the respectful memory and imitation of the virtues of departed believers as well as verbal communion with them. It includes both private and public devotion.

Veneration of saints began as recognition of early martyrs, at whose graves Christians conducted memorial services of worship of God. By the fourth century Christians inaugurated similar honor of other deceased, called “confessors,” whose piety they esteemed as a sacrifice equivalent to that of martyrs. Subsequently use of images and relics as conveyers of personal presence multiplied the places where this form of the communion of saints was practiced by Orthodox and Catholic faithful.

Evangelical critics of veneration, from as early as the twelfth century Waldensians, have argued that it is unbiblical, pagan, and potentially blasphemous. Defenders generally concede the lack of direct scriptural warrant, although they claim it follows logically from the doctrines of immortality and the unity of the body of Christ (Eph. 2:19). They deny similarity to pagan practice because veneration does not imply divinity in saints. Saints are humans who, by grace, enjoy God's special love and friendship. In veneration the pious glorify God's grace displayed in both the earthly and the heavenly works of saints.

To differentiate between worship of God and veneration of saints Augustine proposed the distinction, elaborated by later writers, between latria and dulia. Latria ("worship") belongs to deity alone (Matt. 4:10); dulia ("honor") may be merited by human beings by virtue of their office or deeds (Rom. 13:7).

Three historical stages in defining who are the venerable may be identified. Initially ordinary believers honored the dead on general repute. After the third century bishops supervised the public cult of saints. From the later Middle Ages centralized authority (papacy in Catholicism; synod in Orthodoxy) assumed sole power to designate saints. Currently an elaborate judicial procedure is required to determine sainthood, entailing two degrees: "beatification" confirms that the deceased reigns with Christ and merits local devotion; subsequent "canonization" prescribes veneration by all faithful. In such determination, miracles in response to prayers to the individual constitute primary evidence. P. D. STEEVES

See also BEATIFICATION; CANONIZATION; COMMUNION OF SAINTS; DULIA; INVOCATION OF SAINTS; LATRIA.

Bibliography. T. Aquinas, Summa Theologica; Augustine, City of God; P. Brown, Cult of the Saints; J. Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion; P. Molinari, NCE 3:55-59; J. Pelikan, Growth of Medieval Theology.

Vengeance. In the Genesis story Cain assumed that vengeance would pursue him (Gen. 4:14); the pagan citizens of Malta thought the same concerning Paul (Acts 28:4 KJV), as would most of the Greek world, for whom Nemesis or the fates ensured that wrongdoing met its due reward.

In Jewish-Christian thought this impersonal vengeance is seen as the deliberate act of God: "God of vengeance, . . . God of vengeance, . . . Rise up, O judge of the earth. . . . How long shall the wicked exult?" (Ps. 94:1-3 NRSV). So even the sensitive Jeremiad: "O Lord . . . who judgest righteously, who triest the heart and the mind, let me see thy vengeance; . . . to thee have I committed my cause" (Jer. 11:20 RSV). In Deuteronomy 32:35, 36, 43 God is praised precisely because vengeance is his, and recompense, "for the LORD will vindicate his people. . . . He avenges the blood of his servants" (RSV). Thus Jesus, too: "Will not God bring about justice for his chosen ones . . . ? I tell you, he will see that they get justice, and quickly" (Luke 18:7-8; literally "make vengeance for them"). Throughout Scripture a final "day of vengeance" is foreseen, associated with avenging God's people, with requital, recompense, anger, wrath (Mic. 5:15), not clearing the guilty (Nah. 1:3), repayment of wrong (Rom. 12:19), and punishment (2 Thess. 1:8-9).

These explicative words and phrases illumine a complex idea. (1) Vengeance may include anger, fury (Prov. 6:34), vindictiveness, hatred, and reacting passionately to injury suffered. This is revenge, demanding "satisfying" reprisal, exhausting emotion in violence or cunning. (2) But "taking vengeance" is nearer to avenging, fulfilling a duty owed to the injured in assertion of loyalty or affection; it seeks to vindicate a friend, brother, or colleague for injury inflicted or dishonor done. To this extent vengeance may be selfless, even self-sacrificing, the recognition of a moral bond. For such divine vindication, or recompense, the godly wait and pray, when their cause will be shown to be right and victorious; hence the day of vengeance is for some a day of comfort (Isa. 61:2). (3) This will, however, involve punishment of the evildoer, requital, "do[ing] to [Babylon] as she has done" (Jer. 50:15), and repayment. Such is retribution, or retaliation, returning evil upon the head of the evildoer. (4) In God's vengeance, this is no mere expression of personal antipathy or spitefulness, no vestige of revenge; rather it is the reaction of positive holiness, of active righteousness, asserting the moral order of the world, vindicating truth, right, and goodness against all that is corrupt, false, and evil. For this divine justice, because in time words change their nuances, "vengeance" is probably no longer the appropriate term.

Among men, instinctive personal revenge aims at relief of anger, self-defense, and deterrence. Usually unrestrained in primitive societies, it was limited by the ancient lex talionis (as in the legal codes of Hammurabi and Moses) to equal, or proportionate, reprisal—only "an eye for an eye," where once any insult might bring death.

But Christian teaching outlawed revenge entirely; the Christian reaction to injury is forgiveness, love, turning the other cheek, and overcoming evil with good. Incentives to this total repudiation of private vengeance are four: (1) feelings of anger, hatred, and malice being forbidden (Sermon on the Mount), no action for emotional release is contemplated; (2) retaliation changes nothing in the situation, producing only a vicious circle, injury breeding further injury; (3) Christ's superb example (Luke 9:51-56; 19:41; 23:34); (4) our own dependence as sinners on God's forgiving love—only the merciful obtain mercy, only the forgiving are forgiven (Matt. 5:7; 6:14–15).

Vengeance

Nevertheless, protection and vindication of others oppressed, out of love toward them and indignation against wrong, remain a Christian duty. This is implemented wherever possible through the community's judicial system, as God's agency of vengeance (Rom. 13:1–4; 1 Pet. 2:13–14), helping to insure impartiality, equity, punishment without malice, examination of circumstances, motive, and background of the offender. Ultimate vindication of the moral order of the world is best left in more competent hands (Rom. 12:19; 1 Thess. 4:6).

By such careful distinctions Christianity effectively eschews all personal vengeance, without sentimentally destroying the moral basis of social order.

R. E. O. WHITE

See also CAPITAL PUNISHMENT; CIVIL LAW AND JUSTICE IN BIBLE TIMES; CRIMINAL LAW AND PUNISHMENT IN BIBLE TIMES; SOCIAL ETHICS; VIOLENCE; WAR; WRATH OF GOD.

Venial Sin. See SIN, VENIAL.

Verbal Inspiration. From the early church until the Reformation, Christians expressed themselves on the inspiration of the Bible in what might be called pretheological fashion. What they stated was not necessarily in conflict with the later and well-developed theory of verbal inspiration—in fact, their statements contained most essential constituents of the theory—but in the matter of inspiration their reflection had not evidenced the intensity that made necessary the construction of self-consistent theories.

Even in the early Reformation period detailed theories of inspiration were not broached, but by 1580 the situation was changing. Orthodox Christianity, both Protestant and Roman Catholic, sensed that it was being forced to face certain new questions and that these related especially to the Bible and its inspiration. The spirit of the Renaissance, developments in philology and textual criticism, the emergence of ideas of the partial inspiration of the Bible in some quarters, and the initial expression of philosophical views that would find their culmination in the Enlightenment—all helped to stimulate theological reflection. And the refinement of plenary and then verbal inspiration were among the consequences.

The Nature of Verbal Inspiration. The exponents of verbal inspiration usually shared in the Aristotelian philosophical orientation that was once again sweeping Europe, while in most cases they also shared Augustinian theological propensities. Both continental Protestants and Roman Catholics were involved, although, as has frequently happened, the English Channel provided a barrier; and the British at the time were not as heavily involved in these new developments.

There are a number of entities comprising the theory of verbal inspiration. (1) God is the author of the Bible in the sense of being the formal cause. (2) The focus of inspiration is the words of the Bible; it is text rather than author oriented. (3) All the words and all the verbal relationships are inspired by God. This includes all seemingly peripheral statements as well as those more obviously germane to the matter under consideration. All are of significance in the totality of inspired Scripture. Even accounts known beforehand by the writers from other sources are inspired in the same verbal way for inclusion in the Bible. Thus the totality of Scripture partakes of uniform verbal inspiration. (4) The data of the Bible are claimed as the source of the theory—not the data in the sense of the phenomena, but the teaching of the Bible about its own nature. In this way it is affirmed as inductive, although deduction is then operative to spell out the assumption of what should be the consequences of a God-breathed and Spirit-borne inspiration. (5) Dictation is not involved; there is no violation of the personality of the writer. God had sovereignly and concursively been preparing the writers for the instrumental task so that they willingly and naturally recorded God's revelation in the way he required. Thus the Bible may be described as all of God and all of man. (6) Conscious accommodation on God's part accounts for any lapse, infelicity, or inexactitude. (7) The autographs of the biblical books are solely thus inspired. (8) Inerrancy is the quality of such a Bible; it speaks with exactitude on all matters, save where accommodation has obviously taken place. (9) Authority flows from such a Bible on all matters which it touches, thus guaranteeing that divine teaching is communicated on all matters concerning what a Christian is to believe and how he is to live.

Verbal inspiration has usually been accompanied by certain corollaries. It has tended to encourage a relatively literalistic hermeneutic and to be very cautious on the subject of biblical criticism. Its literalism has sometimes encouraged the view that societal hierarchicalism was divinely established, and thus it has frequently been a buttress to social conservatism. It has often been staunch in its defense of Christian orthodoxy in difficult days, and its supporters have usually been convinced that it was the only view of the Bible which could properly maintain the faith.

Verbal Inspiration in History. The forces which drove Christians to formulate theories of inspiration by reaction continued in such strength that during the eighteenth century they virtually engulfed verbal inspiration except in certain restricted quarters. Partial inspiration became a common view during this century among those who made significant accommodation to the Enlightenment, whereas the Christians of the dynamic first and second evangelical awakenings, from 1735 to 1825, almost invariably held to plenary inspiration. During their two finest generations the evangelicals, although they adhered to the full inspiration of the Bible, did not emphasize the verbal theory.

Renewed emphasis on verbal inspiration began after the close of the Napoleonic Wars in 1815, particularly in the movement known as Protestant confessionalism. Its supporters were increasingly unhappy with the way in which much of evangelicalism appeared to be disregarding the divine initiative. At the same time liberal theology appeared to be advancing with new vigor. A return to the Reformation confessions and their theology appeared to be the necessary strategy, and in this endeavor verbal inspiration was rediscovered.

In the English-speaking world, where verbal inspiration was to find a significant welcome, a prominent nineteenth century Protestant advocate was Robert Haldane, the wealthy Scottish lay evangelist, who after his exposure to the rationalism of Genevan Protestantism in 1817 determined that a new line of biblical defense was necessary. His views were particularly expressed in his frequently reprinted Books of the Old and New Testaments Proved to Be Canonical and Their Verbal Inspiration Maintained and Established. His outlook on inspiration was embraced by his friend Andrew Thomson, the leading evangelical in the Church of Scotland, and was regularly expressed in the Christian Instructor, becoming the accepted view in the Free Church of Scotland among the generation following the disruption of 1843. Henry Cooke, another close friend of Haldane's and the powerful champion of orthodoxy in Irish Presbyterianism, espoused and promulgated similar views. In the United States, Charles Hodge articulated the verbal theory—while holding the plenary view of his venerated predecessor at Princeton Seminary, Archibald Alexander—making it the accepted view among Old School Presbyterians in the middle Atlantic and southeastern states and a position of long continuance among northern and southern Presbyterians of Old School lineage. In fact, Hodge goes so far as to identify verbal and plenary inspiration. In his Systematic Theology (1872), he concludes the sections "Inspiration extends to all parts of Scripture" and "The Inspiration of the Scriptures extends to the words" with a section entitled "Plenary Inspiration" that begins "The view presented above is known as the doctrine of plenary inspiration" (1:165).

Robert Haldane's influence ran in other directions as well. His nephew, Alexander, became a power among the English evangelical Anglicans and helped to stamp verbal inspiration on an important section of the party. From these evangelical Anglicans came the founders of the Plymouth Brethren, who though they transmuted Protestant Anglican confessionalism into what was assumed to be first-century restorationism, nonetheless remained strong advocates of the verbal theory. When Robert Haldane's peripatetic evangelism proved unacceptable to the preevangelical leadership of the Church of Scotland, he became a Baptist, as did his Irish ghostwriter Alexander Carson, and both promulgated verbal inspiration through their Baptist links. Perhaps the most important individual in the popular spread of verbal inspiration was Haldane's Genevan convert, Louis Gaussen, whose Theopneustia is still reprinted. And while this was happening in the English-speaking world, Lutheran confessionalism was resuscitating verbal inspiration in the Germanic lands.

The second wave of reaction to liberalism was fundamentalism, which emerged in the late nineteenth and carried on into the twentieth century. Although it differed from confessionalism in certain important aspects, they were at one in championing verbal inspiration and worked together for the dissemination of this concept. One of the ablest upholders of verbal inspiration appeared at this time in the person of B. B. Warfield of Princeton Seminary. Although he added nothing particularly new to the theory, his numerous articles and book reviews shed the light of his brilliant mind upon his specially chosen theme. As the modernist-fundamentalist controversy developed in intensity and polarization, particularly in North America, many conservatives found themselves sharpening their views of biblical inspiration. In many quarters the phrase "plenary verbal inspiration" began to be used, but this was only a matter of wording, implying no change in the content of verbal inspiration. However, an interesting contrast occurred in the United Kingdom, where it was almost impossible to find a recognized conservative evangelical spokesman who in the first half of the twentieth century taught verbal inspiration.

In Roman Catholicism the late nineteenth century saw a new form of verbal inspiration advocated by the famous French exegete M. J. Lagrange, but it was too open to the recognition of literary forms in the Bible to escape the extremely conservative reaction precipitated by Catholic modernism in the pontificate of Pius X. Henceforth, for more than a generation, official Catholic teaching on the subject of inspiration assumed an almost pretheological posture.

Since World War II evangelical Protestants and Roman Catholics, until very recently, have been almost the only Christians interested in the subject of biblical inspiration. While Roman Catholics have been shifting away from any view akin to verbal inspiration, among evangelicals the concept received new strength following J. I. Packer's "Fundamentalism" and the Word of God (1958) and the evangelical revivals of the mid-1960s. Conflicts arose, however, over the precise nature of verbal inspiration, leading to Harold Lindsell's Battle for the Bible (1976), which threatened to tear evangelicalism apart. The International Council on Biblical Inerrancy called a conference in October 1978 in Chicago, which was attended by 268 evangelical scholars of all positions, to mediate the differences. Peace was reached in the Chicago Statement on Biblical Inerrancy, and the fourteen position papers were published as Inerrancy, edited by Norman Geisler. More recently, with the rise of liberal evangelicalism, that consensus is being questioned and newer, more open theories of inspiration are being broached within the broadly evangelical camp, causing disturbances within the Evangelical Theological Society (over a hermeneutical question of Midrash in Matthew) and the Institute for Biblical Research (over "openness"). So even among scholars who profess to wish to maintain verbal inspiration and inerrancy, many appear to be adopting a more liberal posture in relation to the language and literary forms of Scripture reminiscent of Lagrange, which may point to yet more conflicts in the future.

Verbal Inspiration

I. S. RENNIE

See also BIBLE, AUTHORITY OF; BIBLE, INERRANCY AND INFALLIBILITY OF; BIBLE, INSPIRATION OF; CHICAGO STATEMENT ON BIBLICAL INERRANCY; ENLIGHTENMENT, THE; EVANGELICALISM; FUNDAMENTALISM; LIBERAL EVANGELICALISM; LIBERALISM, THEOLOGICAL; PLENARY INSPIRATION.

Bibliography. J. T. Burtchaell, Catholic Theories of Biblical Inspiration since 1810; D. A. Carson and John Woodbridge, eds., Hermeneutics, Authority, and Canon; Scripture and Truth; N. Geisler, Inerrancy; G. T. Ladd, Doctrine of Sacred Scripture; J. W. Montgomery, ed., God's Inerrant Word; R. Preus, Inspiration of Scripture; J. B. Rogers and D. K. McKim, Authority and Interpretation of the Bible; E. R. Sandeen, Roots of Fundamentalism; B. Vawter, Biblical Inspiration; J. F. Walvoord, ed., Inspiration and Interpretation; B. B. Warfield, Inspiration and Authority of the Bible; J. Woodbridge, "Biblical Authority," TJ 2:165-236; D. F. Wright, "Soundings in the Doctrine of Scripture in British Evangelicalism in the First Half of the Twentieth Century," TB 31:87-106.

Vermigli, Peter Martyr. See PETER MARTYR VERMIGLI.

Vermittlungstheologie. See MEDIATING THEOLOGY.

Vespers. See EVENING PRAYER, EVENSONG; OFFICE, DAILY (DIVINE).

Via Affirmativa, Via Affirmationis. These concepts represent a mystical approach to knowing God. This approach utilizes language as a means of expressing one's love for God in terms that describe God's character as a reflection of the mystic's observation of the world as a divine creation. The epistemology of this tradition tends to be somewhat Neoplatonic in that the mystic locates within creation qualities such as beauty, goodness, and love, attributes these qualities to God, and then seeks to transcend the createdness of these qualities by contemplating their original source as found in the character of God. Ultimately, the goal of the mystic is to be united with God through this contemplative process.

This mystical tradition is also referred to as the via positiva, via eminentia, and/or the cataphatic approach to theology. These mystical forms are linked by their optimistic use of language as a constructive attempt to understand and communicate substantive ideas about the nature of God. In this sense, they are more akin to the practice of theology as a rational attempt to communicate the divine attributes and activities of God. The cataphatic involves the naming of God, giving language to observations based upon both general revelation and special revelation and thereby extending the concept of knowing through the use of symbols, metaphors, and analogies about God. Thus cataphatic theology, as a means of via affirmativa, operates on the level of reason; however, the nonverbal is also a part of this tradition as found in the use of religious music, art, and architecture as nonverbal means of communicating God's nature.

M. BURCH

See also MYSTICISM; VIA ANALOGIA.

Bibliography. M. Cox, Handbook of Christian Spirituality, B. McGinn, Foundations of Mysticism; Presence of God: A History of Western Christian Mysticism.

Via Analogia. An approach to the human conceptualization about God that uses analogy. It seeks to escape the limitations imposed by the via negativa, which denies all positive attribution of God. The direct opposite of the via negativa is the via eminentia or via affirmativa, according to which all positive qualities in the world have their origin in God, who thus possesses them pre-eminently, thereby allowing us to predicate properties directly of God, knowing that they are first of all his as creator.

However, the via eminentia by itself does not take into account the limitations of finitude in contrast to divine infinity. Hence it must be said that God possesses properties in compliance with his essence, viz., infinitely in both quality and quantity, whereas creatures possess them finitely and only as derived from God. Thus analogy seeks to steer a middle course between univocity (where the properties are all alike) and equivocation (where the properties are entirely dissimilar).

Refinement of the doctrine of analogy has led to many divergent points of view. Some thinkers hold that there is a fundamental analogy of being, whereas others say that analogy extends only to concepts while being remains univocal. Still others maintain that concepts are univocal; only the predication of a concept is analogical. Finally, the literature abounds with attempts by advocates of all the above versions of analogy to make analogy logically plausible in the face of philosophical and theological critique.

Analogy has been widely criticized among Protestants for its apparent reliance on natural theology, particularly since analogy is devised by Aristotle and adapted by Thomas Aquinas. Karl Barth in particular claims that analogy denies God's free self-expression in his revelation. Barth sought to replace the via analogia with a christological analogy in which Christ is the midpoint between God and creation. In defense of analogy it can be pointed out that all attempts to avoid univocation and equivocation are in fact analogies, regardless of whether they are based on natural or revealed theology.

W. CORDUAN

See also VIA NEGATIVA.

Bibliography. E. Bevan, Symbolism and Belief; D. Emmett, Nature of Metaphysical Thinking; A. Farrer, Finite and Infinite; G. E. Hughes, Glass of Vision; N. L. Geisler, Philosophy of Religion; E. L. Mascall, Existence and Analogy; Words and Images; B. Mitchell, Faith and Criticism; B. Mondin, Principle of Analogy in Protestant and Catholic Theology; N. C. Niesen Jr., "Analogy and the Knowledge of God: An Ecumenical Appraisal," RUS 60:21–102; E. Przywara, Analogia Entis; R. Swinburne, Revelation: From Metaphor to Analogy; T. F. Tracy, God, Action, and Embodiment.

Via Eminentia. See VIA AFFIRMATIVA, VIA AFFIRMATIONIS.

Via Illuminativa. See ILLUMINATIVE WAY, THE; MYSTICISM.

Via Media. Doctrinal justification for the Anglican Church as representing a middle way between the Roman Catholic Church and dissenting Protestantism. Though the term first appears in the seventeenth century, it was made most popular by John Henry Newman during his career as tractarian with the Oxford Movement, 1833 to 1841. The tractates were written by Newman and others as a series of polemics against incipient modernization in the Church of England. Thus the Oxford Movement attempted to reestablish a high-church view of Anglicanism in the face of possible disestablishment of the church as a whole. The concept of the via media served to provide the theological underpinning for this ecclesiology.

As Newman himself tells it in Apologia pro Vita Sua, the via media was based on three ideas: dogma, sacrament, and anti-Romanism. The first is directed against liberalism, and the second against evangelicalism, and here Newman often sided with Roman ideas. But throughout this phase he also maintained the third notion, opposition to the Roman Church.

Newman describes the via media's attitude toward Rome with two concepts: apostolicity and antiquity. He had no doubt that the Roman Church was apostolic, though he did not deny Anglican apostolicity either. However, he felt that the Church of England had the advantage when it came to antiquity, i.e., faithfulness to biblical and patristic doctrine. In particular, Newman objected to the Roman practice of worshiping Mary and the saints.

However, the via media, which was after all only a theoretical notion, was to die at Newman's own hands. He became increasingly convinced that his own arguments were working against him. Any arguments for the apostolicity of the Anglican Church could be made a fortiori for Romanism. And doctrinal rectitude has historically been found on the side of Rome as well. Newman discovered to his great chagrin that an attempt at a via media in the fifth century would have left him as a monophysitist heretic. With his Essay on Doctrinal Development, Newman overcame his last objections to Roman dogma, and he converted to Rome. The via media had died.

The leading issue concerning the via media was always ecclesiological: Which church is the right one? Evangelical theologians may rightly ask if a greater commitment to doctrinal truth wherever it may be found might not have left Newman a Protestant and allowed him to serve Christendom better in the long run.

W. CORDUAN

See also ANGLO-CATHOLICISM; NEWMAN, JOHN HENRY; OXFORD MOVEMENT.

Bibliography. C. F. Harrold, ed., Newman Treasury; P. Misnar, Papacy and Development: Newman and the Primacy of the Pope; J. H. Newman, Apologia pro Vita Sua; Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine; Via Media of the Anglican Church; L. H. Yearly, Ideas of Newman.

Via Negativa. The "way of negation," sometimes called Apophatic Theology—an approach to the knowledge of God that denies the strict applicability of any human concepts to God. Originating in the Neoplatonic tradition, it became an important consideration in the Christian theology of the Middle Ages.

Although Plato never drew up an explicit system on this point, it is clear from his writings that he considered the forms to be ordered hierarchically, with such mundane ones as tallness and heat toward the bottom and the good at the apex. All the forms specify modes or characteristics of reality. One of the innovations of Neoplatonism, that of Plotinus, consisted in the addition of the source for all the forms, the "One." Since it is from the One that all the forms originate (frequently envisioned in a sequence of emanations, e.g., by Proclus), the One itself is not subject to any of the restrictions or specifications imposed by the forms. Hence no attributes can be applied to the One.

Via Negativa

In medieval theology the role of the One was taken over by God, who was thus thought to be beyond conceptualization. A leading advocate of the via negativa was Dionysius the Pseudo-Areopagite. He summarized his views in his short work Mystical Theology. Dionysius recognized a way of affirmation in which it is realized that God possesses all attributes as First Cause; he explicated this notion in On Divine Names. This way of affirmation begins with God and sees all creaturely attributes as derived from him. But if we attempt to reverse this process and try to reapply those attributes to God, we find that he is beyond such predication, and all we have left is the darkness of skepticism concerning his attributes.

Aquinas and other later medieval scholars retained the idea of the via negativa, but only insofar as it reveals to us the uniqueness of God. Rather than leading to skepticism, they saw the remoteness of God as necessitating analogical predication. A revival of the via negativa can be seen in the skepticism engendered by the extreme nominalists of the fifteen century. W. CORDUAN

See also DIONYSIUS THE PSEUDO-AREOPAGITE; NEOPLATONISM; VIA ANALOGIA.

Bibliography. Dionysius Areopagus, Collected Writings; Patrologia Graeca; A. Farrer, Finite and Infinite: A Philosophical Essay; F. C. Harrold, Mysticism; E. O'Brien, ed., Essential Plotinus; T. Whittaker, Neoplatonists.

Via Positiva. See VIA AFFIRMATIVA, VIA AFFIRMATIONIS.

Via Purgativa. See MYSTICISM; PURGATIVE WAY, THE.

Via Unitiva. See MYSTICISM; UNIO MYSTICA; UNITIVE WAY, THE.

Vicar. See CHURCH OFFICERS.

Vicarious Atonement. See ATONEMENT.

Vines, Richard (1600–1656). Known as "the Luther of England," Vines was born in Leicestershire and educated at Magdalene College, Cambridge, receiving his B.A. in 1622 and an M.A. in 1627. He served as schoolmaster at Hinckley, Leicestershire, from 1624 to 1642 and also ministered in the parishes of Caldecote and Nuneaton. He supported the parliamentary cause against the king and during the English Civil War took refuge in Coventry.

He was appointed by Parliament to the Westminster Assembly and was one of the original nine members of the drafting committee for the Confession of Faith. Responding to concerns raised by the Scottish Commissioners, he made the motion on January 16, 1646, that the Committee for the Catechism prepare two Catechisms, one large and another more brief (known as the Larger and Shorter Catechism).

He became rector of St. Clement Danes, London, in 1643 and Master of Pembroke College, Cambridge, in 1644. However, Vines felt Parliament went too far with the execution of Charles I in 1649, and his criticism led to his being ejected from both positions. He then became minister of St. Lawrence Jewry in London. He continued to preach despite declining health until his death.

In his theology he was a moderate Calvinist. He held an Amyraldian viewpoint of the atonement ("hypothetical universalism"), and argued for this view (along with Calamy and others) during discussions on the Confession of Faith. Though a Presbyterian, he would have supported a modified episcopacy in the English Church.

T. K. BEOUGHER

Bibliography. B. Brook, Lives of the Puritans; A. F. Mitchell and J. Struthers, eds., Minutes of the Sessions of the Westminster Assembly of Divines; R. Vines, Treatise on the Institution of the Lord's Supper.

Violence. That "the earth was corrupt in God's sight, and was full of violence" is the reason given in Genesis 6:11 for the punitive flood. Repeatedly the charge recurs in the OT that the city is full of violence (Ezek. 7:23), princes do violence (Ezek. 45:9), and men of violence have their way in society. The rich seize by violence houses and fields of the impoverished "because it is in their power," thereby becoming "full of violence" (see Mic. 2:2; 6:12), while great houses are stored with treasures taken by violence (Amos 3:10). Ecclesiastes 5:8 expresses the realistic view of the candid observer of society: "If you see . . . the poor oppressed and justice and right violently taken away, do not be amazed. . . . The high official is watched by a higher" (RSV). Violence is often coupled with plunder, often with deceit, as two ways of stealing. Habakkuk 2:8 extends the thought significantly, warning those guilty of the blood of men, doing "violence to the earth, to cities, and all who dwell therein" (RSV). It is declared that the Lord hates him who loves violence (Ps. 11:5); that the servant of the Lord will do no violence (Isa. 53:9; cf. 42:2); eventually, in God's time, the land shall be purged of violence (Isa. 60:18). At the opening of the NT, with its announcement of the divine reign, armed soldiers of the occupying power are warned to "rob no one by violence" (Luke 3:14 RSV).

Scripture thus consistently identifies violence with ruthless exercise of power, by actions involving physical force or unlawful intimidation, resulting in loss, injury, or constraint to the unprotected. Its condemnation as evil and retrograde is assumed to follow, both because of its irrationality and because of its injustice.

But violence may also be both rational and just—e.g., in duly authorized, impartial, and controlled law enforcement, in restraint of unlawful violence such as rioting, and in benevolent constraint of the insane. Society cannot always wait upon assent to secure order: "The passions of men must be restrained by fear until they can be disciplined by love." It is false, therefore, to equate the violence socially authorized to agents of justice and control with that of the antisocial individual and the anarchic terrorist cell.

A refinement of violence is expressed in moral blackmail, in the coercion of threats, in play upon imaginary fears, or social ostracism; and still more subtly in intellectual dogmatism, brainwashing, withholding information, dictatorial pronouncements coupled with threats (the so-called violence of principle), and all denial of freedom of thought, speech, expression, and persuasion.

Violence may be defended (1) psychologically, as the only form of protest available to the inarticulate, untrained in more intellectual forms of self-expression and persuasion; (2) sociologically, as the only weapon within reach of the unprivileged, the only avenue of protest open to political groups suppressed by dictatorship or smothered by insensitive democratic majorities. It can be defended (3) morally, as necessary to any progressive movement in order to assert its independence of conventional standards, to define its distinctive position, and to eliminate lukewarm supporters. Thus, early Christianity welcomed deliberate confrontation with paganism, rejecting all compromise; it embraced persecution in preference to toleration on the state's terms. In time the church itself adopted inquisition, physical torture, and persecution "to save the souls of unbelievers"; and later still, it imposed severer intellectual demands on the faithful (the bodily assumption of Mary, papal infallibility) in "violent" opposition to the rational teaching of science and the "reasonable compromises" of modernism.

Violence has always been present in society, in law enforcement and in war, and may always be so until all humankind share identical intellectual convictions. Christian moralists will therefore distinguish the springs, grounds, and aims of violence before condemning all violent actions for reasons of academic superiority, cultural taste, or fear. Christians will sympathize with (but not approve) the violence that expresses the personal frustration of the physically or mentally handicapped, but will still insist that for a rational and moral creature like man, violence will always be subnormal. For society, violence will ever breed insecurity, never arriving at truth, justice, or equilibrium, but always reproducing endless counter violence.

Christian wisdom will condemn the exploitation of violence for entertainment, rejecting the claim that theater and literature may "reflect society" without incurring responsibility for portraying the intolerable as "normal," and so lowering social standards. Most of all, the Christian must condemn the manipulation, by the social and intellectual activist, of the frustrated and envious passion of the mob for his own selfish or political ends.

R. E. O. WHITE

Bibliography. J. Ellul, Violence: Reflections from a Christian Perspective; M. Hengel, Victory over Violence; T. Merton, Faith and Violence; G. Sorel, Reflections on Violence.

Virgin, Assumption of the. See MARY, ASSUMPTION OF.

Virgin Birth of Jesus. Matthew 1:18, 22–25 and Luke 1:26–38 teach that the birth of Jesus resulted from a miraculous conception. He was conceived in the womb of the Virgin Mary by the power of the Holy Spirit without male seed. This is the doctrine of the virgin birth, which must be distinguished from other doctrines concerning Mary, such as perpetual virginity, her immaculate conception, and her assumption, which are rejected by most Protestants, and from views in which the phrase "virgin birth" is taken to indicate some sort of divine involvement in the incarnation without affirming the biological virginity of Jesus' mother. Views of the latter sort are common enough in modern liberal theology, but it is an abuse of language to call them affirmations of the virgin birth; they are denials of the virgin birth, though they may indeed be affirmations of something else.

Possibility and Probability. If one rejects the possibility of miracle in general, as did, e.g., Bultmann, then one must reject the virgin birth as well. But such a generalized rejection of miracle is arbitrary and indefensible on any ground, and it is contrary to the most fundamental presuppositions of Christian thought. The virgin birth is no more miraculous than the atonement or the resurrection or the regeneration of sinners. If miracle is rejected, then nothing important to Christianity can be retained.

Virgin Birth of Jesus

If one accepts the general possibility of miracle, one must still ask about the possibility and probability of the virgin birth in particular. For an evangelical Christian the fact that this doctrine is taught in God's inerrant Word settles such questions. Yet this fact does not make historical investigation superfluous. If indeed Scripture is inerrant, it is consistent with all historical discovery. To illustrate this consistency can only be helpful—not only to convince those who doubt the authority of Scripture, but also to confirm the faith of those who accept it. But such investigation must be carried out on principles compatible with the Christian revelation, not (as with Bultmann) on principles antagonistic to it from the outset.

The NT Accounts. On that basis, then, let us examine the credibility of the NT witnesses, Matthew and Luke. Both Gospels are often dated from A.D. 70–100, but if we grant the assumption that Jesus was able to predict the fall of Jerusalem (A.D. 70; and why would a Christian deny this?), there is ample evidence for dating these Gospels in the 60s or earlier. In any case, the two accounts are generally thought to be independent of each other and thus to be based on a tradition antedating both.

Confirming the antiquity of this tradition is the remarkably "Hebraic" character of both birth accounts: the theology and language of these chapters seem more characteristic of the OT than the NT, as many scholars have noted. This fact renders very unlikely the hypothesis that the virgin birth is a theologoumenon—a story invented by the early church to buttress its christological dogma. There is here no mention of Jesus' preexistence. His title "Son of God" is seen to be future, as is his inheritance of the Davidic throne (Luke 1:32, 35). In the birth narratives Jesus is the OT Messiah—the son of David, the fulfillment of prophecy, the one who will rescue God's people through right deeds, exalting the humble and crushing the proud (Luke 1:46–55). The writers draw no inference from the virgin birth concerning Jesus' deity or ontological sonship to God; rather, they simply record the event as a historical fact and (for Matthew) as a fulfillment of Isaiah 7:14.

Not much is known about the author of Matthew, but there is much reason to ascribe the third Gospel to Luke the physician (Col. 4:14), a companion of Paul (2 Tim. 4:11; cf. the "we" passages in Acts, such as ch. 27) who also wrote the Acts of the Apostles (cf. Luke 1:1–4; Acts 1:1–5). Luke claims to have made a careful study of the historical data (Luke 1:1–4), and that claim has been repeatedly vindicated in many details even by modern skeptical scholars such as Harnack. Both his vocations—historian and physician—would have prevented him from responding glibly to reports of a virgin birth. The two birth narratives have been attacked as inconsistent and/or erroneous at several points: the genealogies, the massacre of the children (Matt. 2:16), the census during the time of Quirinius (Luke 2:1–2); but plausible explanations of these difficulties have also been advanced. Jesus' Davidic ancestry (emphasized in both accounts) has been under suspicion also; but as Raymond Brown argues, the presence of Mary and Jesus' brothers, especially James (Acts 1:14; 15:13–21; Gal. 1:19; 2:9), in the early church would probably have prevented the development of legendary material concerning Jesus' origin. All in all, we have good reason, even apart from belief in their inspiration, to trust Luke and Matthew, even where they differ from the verdicts of secular historians ancient and modern.

The Rest of Scripture. Much has been said concerning the "silence" of Scripture about the virgin birth outside of the passages mentioned. This silence is real, but it need not be explained by any ignorance or denial of the virgin birth by other NT writers. It is significant that even the Gospels of Matthew and Luke are "silent" about the virgin birth through fifty of their combined fifty-two chapters. The silence of the rest of the NT can be explained in essentially the same ways as one would explain the partial silence of Matthew and Luke. The NT deals chiefly with (1) Jesus' preaching, life, death, resurrection (the Gospels and to some extent the epistles); (2) the preaching and missionary work in the early church (Acts especially); (3) teaching concerning the theological and practical problems of the church (Acts, epistles); (4) assurances of the triumph of God's purposes and visions of the end times (Revelation, other NT books). The virgin birth was not part of Jesus' preaching or that of the early church. It was not a controversial matter such as might have been addressed in the epistles (Christology in general was not a particularly controversial matter among the Christians, and even if it had been, the virgin birth most likely was not seen as a means of supporting christological dogma). The main function of the virgin birth in the NT, to show the fulfillment of prophecy and to describe the events surrounding Jesus' birth, is appropriate only to birth narratives, and only two birth narratives have been preserved in the canon. We must also assume that the early church maintained a certain reserve about public discussion of these matters out of respect for the privacy of Jesus' family, especially Mary.

Is there anything in the NT that contradicts the virgin birth accounts? There are passages where Jesus is described as the son of Joseph: John 1:45; 6:42; Luke 2:27, 33, 41, 43, 48; Matthew 13:55. Clearly, though, Luke and Matthew had no intention of denying the virgin birth of Christ, unless the birth narratives are later additions to the books, and there is no evidence of that. These references clearly refer to Joseph as the legal father of Jesus without reference to the question of biological fatherhood. The same is true in the Johannean references, with the additional fact that the words in question were spoken by those who were not well acquainted with Jesus and/or his family. (The textual variant of Matt. 1:16 which says that Joseph begat Jesus is certainly not original.)

It is interesting that the Markan variant of Matthew 13:55 (Mark 6:3) eliminates reference to Joseph and speaks of Jesus as "Mary's son," an unusual way of describing parentage in Jewish culture. Some have thought that this indicates some knowledge of the virgin birth by Mark, or even some public knowledge of an irregularity in Jesus' origin, even though Mark has no birth narrative as such. Cf. John 8:41, where Jesus' opponents hint at his illegitimacy, a charge which apparently continued to be made into the second century. Brown remarks that such a charge would not have been fabricated by Christians, nor probably would it have been fabricated by non-Christians, unless Jesus' origin were known to be somehow unusual. Thus it is possible that these incidental references to Jesus' birth actually confirm the virgin birth, though this evidence is not of great weight.

Is Isaiah 7:14 a prediction of the virgin birth? Matthew 1:22 asserts that the virgin birth "fulfills" that passage, but much controversy has surrounded that assertion, turning on the meaning of the Isaiah passage in context, its LXX translation, and Matthew's use of both. The arguments are too complicated for full treatment here. E. J. Young has mounted one of the few recent scholarly defenses of the traditional position. I would only suggest that for Matthew the concept of "fulfillment" sometimes takes on aesthetic dimensions that go beyond the normal relation between "prediction" and "predicted event" (cf. his use of Zech. 9:9 in 21:1-4). For Matthew, the "fulfillment" may draw the attention of people to the prophecy in startling, even bizarre ways that the prophet himself might never have anticipated. It "corresponds" to the prophecy in unpredictable but exciting ways, as a variation in music corresponds to a theme. It may be that some element of this takes place in Matthew 1:23, though Young's argument may prevail in the long run.

Postbiblical Attestation. Belief in the virgin birth is widely attested in literature from the second century. Ignatius defended the doctrine strongly against the docetists, who held that Jesus only "appeared" to have become man. Some have thought that Ignatius shows acquaintance with a tradition independent of the Gospels affirming the virgin birth. The virgin birth was denied only by Gnostic docetists and by Ebionites, who held Jesus to be a mere human prophet. The silence of some church fathers, like the silence of Scripture, has been cited as evidence of a tradition contrary to this doctrine, but there is no clear evidence of any such things, and the argument from silence can easily be countered as above.

Pagan or Jewish Background? Occasionally someone will suggest that the virgin birth narratives are based not on fact but on pagan or Jewish stories of supernatural births. Such a hypothesis is most unlikely. There is no clear parallel to the notion of a virgin birth in pagan literature, only of births resulting from intercourse between a god and a woman (of which there is no suggestion in Matthew and Luke), resulting in a being half-divine, half-human (which is far different from the biblical Christology). Further, none of the pagan stories locates the event in datable history as the biblical account does. Nor is there any precise parallel in Jewish literature. The closest parallels would be the supernatural births of Isaac, Samson, and Samuel in the OT, but these were not virgin births. Isaiah 7:14 was not considered a messianic passage in the Jewish literature of the time. It is more likely that the event of the virgin birth influenced Matthew's understanding of Isaiah 7:14 than the reverse.

Doctrinal Importance. The consistency of this doctrine with other Christian truth is important to its usefulness and, indeed, to its credibility. For Matthew and Luke the chief importance of the event seems to be that it calls to mind (as a "sign," Isa. 7:14) the great OT promises of salvation through supernaturally born deliverers, while going far beyond them, showing that God's final deliverance has come. But one can also go beyond the specific concerns of Matthew and Luke and see that the virgin birth is fully consistent with the whole range of biblical doctrine.

The virgin birth is doctrinally important because of: (1) The doctrine of Scripture. If Scripture errs here, then why should we trust its claims about other supernatural events, such as the resurrection? (2) The deity of Christ. While we cannot say dogmatically that God could enter the world only through a virgin birth, surely the incarnation is a supernatural event if it is anything. To eliminate the supernatural from this event is inevitably to compromise the divine dimension of it. (3) The humanity of Christ. This was the important thing to Ignatius and the second century fathers. Jesus was really born; he really became one of us. (4) The sinlessness of Christ. If he were born of two human parents, it is very difficult to conceive how he could have been exempted from the guilt of Adam's sin and become a new head to the human race. And it would seem only an arbitrary act of God that Jesus could be born without a sinful nature. Yet Jesus' sinlessness as the new head of the human race and as the atoning lamb of God is absolutely vital to our salvation (Rom. 5:18-19; 2 Cor. 5:21; Heb. 4:15; 7:26; 1 Pet. 2:22–24). (5) The nature of grace. The birth of Christ, in which the initiative and power are all of God, is an apt picture of God's saving grace in general of which it is a part. It teaches us that salvation is by God's act, not our human effort. The birth of Jesus is like our new birth, which is also by the Holy Spirit; it is a new creation (2 Cor. 5:17).

Virgin Birth of Jesus

Is belief in the virgin birth "necessary"? It is possible to be saved without believing it; saved people aren't perfect people. But to reject the virgin birth is to reject God's Word, and disobedience is always serious. Further, disbelief in the virgin birth may lead to compromise in those other areas of doctrine with which it is vitally connected.

J. M. FRAME

See also CHRISTOLOGY; JESUS CHRIST.

Bibliography. T. Boslooper, Virgin Birth; R. E. Brown, Birth of the Messiah; Virginal Conception and Bodily Resurrection of Jesus; F. F. Bruce, Are the New Testament Documents Reliable?; D. Edwards, Virgin Birth in History and Faith; R. G. Gromacki, Virgin Birth: Doctrine of Deity; J. G. Machen, Virgin Birth of Christ; J. Murray, Collected Writings; H. von Campenhausen, Virgin Birth in the Theology of the Ancient Church; B. B. Warfield, "Supernatural Birth of Jesus," in Biblical and Theological Studies; E. J. Young, Commentary on Isaiah.

Virtues, Seven Cardinal. See CARDINAL VIRTUES, SEVEN.

Visible Church. See CHURCH.

Vision of God, Visio Dei. See BEATIFIC VISION.

Vocation. See CALL, CALLING; WORK.

Voluntarism. Stemming from the Latin word voluntas, meaning will, voluntarism is a general name for a variety of philosophical positions united in their emphasis on will. In contrast to the dominant rationalistic, intellectualist stream of Western thought reaching back to Plato and beyond, voluntarism boldly asserts the superiority or importance of the exercise of will to the deliberations of reason. Voluntarism is expressed in the work of David Hume, who argued that the conflict traditional since Plato between reason and will was strictly impossible; reason is capable of selecting only means toward ends, not the ends themselves. Will alone by affirming them can choose ends, and reason is to be the "slave" of the will in helping to achieve those willed ends. Nietzsche and Schopenhauer placed will at the center of their philosophies. For Nietzsche, human reality is a scene of conflicting forces, of the will-to-power of each individual as the sole driving force which leads each of us to assert ourselves over others, either overtly or subtly.

Schopenhauer saw will as a blind force permeating all living things, impelling them to struggle to survive and reproduce. The extent to which he emphasized will is evidence by the title of his major work, World as Will and Idea.

In theology and religious philosophy voluntarism is significant in several contexts. Some have claimed that logic and the laws of reason hold only because God wills them so; God could assert his will and change them were he so to choose. This position, held by the medieval Peter Damien and others, was discussed by Descartes, and has been soundly opposed by contemporary evangelical Gordon Clark in his Reason, Religion, and Revelation. Other voluntarists hold that we need not have rational grounds for religious belief but may justifiably assert our wills to make a religious commitment, a view titled fideism. Such a doctrine in various forms has a long history in Christian thought and finds expression in Pascal, Kierkegaard, William James, and many contemporary evangelicals of a pietistic leaning.

Theological voluntarism with respect to ethics is generally called the "divine will" or "divine command" theory. This view was held by William of Ockham, Carl F. H. Henry, Emil Brunner, and many others, and was criticized as early as Plato's Euthyphro. Theological voluntarists argue that God's mere assertion of a command to do or refrain from doing an action or type of action renders these either right or wrong. Theological voluntarists in ethics explicitly deny that God commands actions because they are good, believing that this would compromise God's sovereignty by binding him to an independent moral standard. Critics of this view within and without the Christian community argue that it makes ethics arbitrary. They suggest that if it were true, then God could by his mere act of willing render an evil action good or obligatory. Most Christian ethicists have been ill at ease with ethical voluntarism and have sought rational grounds for ethics.

D. B. FLETCHER

See also ETHICAL SYSTEMS, CHRISTIAN; EXISTENTIALISM; HENRY, CARL FERDINAND HOWARD, KIERKEGAARD, SØREN; PASCHAL, BLAISE; PHILOSOPHY, CHRISTIAN VIEW OF; WILLIAM OF OCKHAM.

Bibliography. V. J. Bourke, Will in Western Thought; É. Gilson, Reason and Religion in the Middle Ages; P. Helm, ed., Divine Commands and Morality; C. F. H. Henry, Christian Personal Ethics; D. Hume, Treatise on Human Nature; W. James, Will to Believe; S. Kierkegaard, Purity of Heart; G. R. Lewis, Testing Christianity's Truth Claims; A. Schopenhauer, Will to Live; R. Taylor, "Voluntarism," Encyclopedia of Philosophy.

Von Hügel, Friedrich (1852–1925). Roman Catholic philosopher and writer. The child of an Austrian-Scottish marriage, he lived in England from 1867 and inherited the title of Baron of the Holy Roman Empire. Multilingual and biblical and patristics scholar, he lamented his church's modern retreat from intellectual culture and rich mental training and its reluctance to wrestle with contemporary problems (a view shared by his friend George Tyrrell and later by Teilhard de Chardin). He greatly admired Augustine, wrote a definitive study of Catherine of Genoa (1908), and often referred to the saintliness of the Middle Ages. He followed Aquinas in seeking to interpret traditional faith according to "what appears the best and the most abiding elements in the philosophy and the scholarship and science of the later and latest times," a policy developed in his Essays and Addresses (1921) and Reality of God (1931).

This gifted layman was a leader of the modernist movement within his church and gave to it generously of his money, learning, and advice. Ecclesiastical authorities who disliked his tendencies recognized that his preoccupation with contemporary science and philosophy deepened his devotional life. He ministered through correspondence with the highly placed, as his Selected Letters (1928) shows, and he is chiefly remembered as a wise counselor of souls. The man for whom God was both "other" and near acknowledged his childlike dependence by words inscribed on his tombstone: "Whom have I in heaven but Thee?"

J. D. DOUGLAS

See also CATHOLICISM, LIBERAL; TYRRELL, GEORGE; UNDERHILL, EVELYN.

Bibliography. B. Holland, ed., Selected Letters of B. von Hügel, 1896–1924; L. F. Barmann, Baron Friedrich von Hügel and the Modernist Crisis; L. F. Barmann, ed., Letters of Baron F. von Hügel and N. K. Smith; M. de la Bedoyère, Life of Baron von Hügel; G. Greene, Letters of Baron von Hügel to a Niece; L. V. Lester-Garland, Religious Philosophy of Baron F. von Hügel; M. D. Petre, Von Hügel and Tyrrel; J. P. Whelan, Spirituality of Friedrich von Hügel.

W w

Waldenses, Waldensians. A movement that began in the city of Lyons in the decade 1170–80. During these years a wealthy merchant of the city, Waldo, underwent a deeply felt personal religious experience. Following this, he gave away his property and adopted a life of strict gospel simplicity and poverty. Touched by his example, many men and women became his followers. Thus, the most perfect example of reformist dissent in the twelfth century was composed of simple laypeople, many of whom were illiterate.

These “Poor Men of Lyons” did not intend to challenge the authority of the church, but the hostility, first, of the local clergy and, finally, of the papacy, drove them into opposition. Their condemnation by the archbishop of Lyons in 1181 was formalized in 1184 when Pope Lucius III declared the movement heretical and called for its destruction. Thereafter, although they were subject to periodic persecutions of great violence, the Waldenses developed quickly in Languedoc and the Piedmont. From there they spread throughout central and eastern Europe.

In common with most popular religious movements of the period, the Waldensian ethic was personal and anticlerical. In search of an authentic gospel ethic, they had the NT, the Prophets, and selections from the fathers translated into the vernacular. They believed that the Bible should be the supreme authority in their lives, and insofar as the established clergy did not conform to the teaching of the Gospels, it was condemned. Ultimately the Waldenses declared themselves a counter church, the “true church,” in contrast to the Roman Church. They believed that the authentic Christian church had been driven underground during the era of Constantine the Great when the rest of the Christian community had been subsumed into the worldly tradition of empire. This secret church was brought into public activity by Waldo who then became the second “Peter,” and his followers were its true heirs.

Waldensian thought evolved throughout the Middle Ages. In 1207 a significant number of the membership were brought back into the Roman Church following a debate with Catholic clergy.

Those who returned were given special dispensations to practice their rigorous lifestyle as the “Catholic poor.” In addition, disagreements erupted within the brotherhood over articles of faith. Nevertheless, the general requirements of Waldensian belief emerge clearly from the source materials of the period.

Waldo believed that he and his followers must abandon all worldly activities in order to spend their time as evangelists in the apostolic mold. Therefore, he required the leaders of the movement, the “perfect,” to give up traditional jobs and to live by begging. Waldo recommended celibacy to the leadership, following the injunctions of St. Paul, and also because he believed it would free men and women to evangelize.

The Waldenses believed in the divinity of Jesus Christ and salvation by Christ. They accepted that believers, both men and women, who undertook a life of apostolic poverty, were a new priesthood, entitled both to preach and to give the sacraments. They celebrated the Eucharist, though at one point it was reduced to an annual (Holy Thursday) occasion. An initiation ceremony or baptism, which seems to have resembled the Cathar sacrament, was also common. Their reading of the NT convinced the Waldenses that purgatory was a myth. From this they concluded that prayers for the dead and indulgences were worthless. They banned the taking of oaths, despised lies, and condemned the death penalty.

In some beliefs and practices, the Waldenses resembled the Cathari. Both dissenting groups rejected the Roman Church, believed in evangelism and poverty and abstained from killing and oaths. However, the Waldenses were not dualists; they did not reject creation and engaged in many debates with the Cathari concerning this issue. Still the two groups were often confused. The division of Waldensian society into the “perfect” and the “believers,” in the Cathari tradition, may reflect this.

In spite of persecution by the revived and militant medieval papacy, whose incarnation was Innocent III (1198–1216), Waldensianism survived to stimulate and challenge the atmosphere in which the Protestant Reformation began. Many of its beliefs entered the mainstream of the Protestant tradition, and a few traditional Waldensian communities survive today.

C. T. MARSHALL

See also CATHARI.

Bibliography. E. Cameron, Reformation of the Heretics: The Waldenses of the Alps 1480–1580; E. Comba, History of the Waldenses of Italy; M. D. Lambert, Medieval Heresy: Popular Movements from Bozomil to Hus; G. Tourn, Waldensians; W. L. Wakefield, Heresy, Crusade and Inquisition in Southern France; G. B. Watts, Waldenses in the New World.

Waldenström, Peter Paul (1838–1917). Swedish theologian, preacher, and writer who was a key leader in the organization of the pietist revivals into the permanent Swedish Mission Covenant. He was also a major figure in the establishment and early life of two American denominations with Swedish roots—the Evangelical Covenant Church and the Evangelical Free Church. The Covenant has retained significant continuity with Waldenström's pietism and modified Lutheranism.

Born in Lulea, Waldenström studied theology and classical languages at Uppsala University. His ordination as a priest in the Lutheran state church took place in 1863. Later he resigned his clerical standing as theological and practical differences with the Lutheran hierarchy increased.

From the beginning Waldenström opposed the liturgism of the state church, which too often replaced rather than enhanced a genuine, personal faith in Jesus Christ. In the pietist tradition of Spener, Francke, Zinzendorf, and Wesley, he approved the gathering of devout Christians and serious seekers into small conventicles for mutual prayer, Bible study, and conversation. From this starting point Waldenström's journey illustrates the worst fears of the orthodox critics of pietism. While retaining a fully Lutheran understanding of the sacraments, he approved—and occasionally presided at—celebrations of the Lord's Supper in these small gatherings of the devout, which meant celebrating the Eucharist outside the regular parish structure of the state church. This in turn led to the demand for a regenerate church in which only believers would be admitted, where one's status as a believer was determined by one's conversion to Jesus Christ and not by the affirmation of a creed or by participation in certain sacraments. In short, the mark of the true church, in Waldenström's opinion, was neither a proper creed nor the preaching of a doctrinally correct gospel nor the celebration of the sacraments; rather, living faith was the central mark of the church. Waldenström emphasized, in consistency with this position, the primacy of the local congregation, and he rejected the authority of the great Lutheran and ecumenical creeds on which the Swedish state church was based. In place of the creeds he substituted a simple biblicism. The status of any doctrine could be determined, according to him, by asking, "Where in the Bible is it written?" Any form of higher criticism would threaten such a biblicism, and Waldenström, even after his study in Germany, rejected it furiously.

Waldenström is best remembered for his doctrine of the atonement, which foreshadowed many of the emphases of twentieth-century Scandinavian work on this doctrine, especially Gustaf Aulén's Christus Victor.

S. T. FRANKLIN

See also AULÉN, GUSTAF EMANUEL HILDEBRAND.

Bibliography. K. A. Olsson, By One Spirit.

Waldo, Peter. See WALDENSES, WALDENSANS.

Walloon Confession. See BELGIC CONFESSION.

Walther, Carl Ferdinand Wilhelm (1811–1887). Lutheran clergyman and theologian. Born at Langenschursdorf in Saxony, where his father served as the local pastor, Walther as a young man decided that he was "born for nothing but music." But his father had other plans for him, and in 1829 he entered the University of Leipzig to study theology. During his student days Walther experienced serious doubts about his salvation and received help from Martin Stephan, the popular though erratic preacher of St. Johannes Church, near Dresden. Following his graduation in 1833 Walther spent four years as a private tutor. In 1837 he was ordained as pastor at Baünsdorf, but he was frustrated by the indifferent and rationalistic atmosphere of the Saxon state church. Consequently, in 1838 he joined a group of approximately seven hundred Lutherans emigrating to the United States under the leadership of Martin Stephan.

Most of this group eventually settled in Perry County, Missouri. Shortly after their arrival Stephan's fanaticism led to his expulsion from the community, and Walther succeeded him as their spiritual leader. Under his direction several churches were built, including two at Dresden and Johannesburg, which he served as pastor. With others Walther also founded in December of 1839 a log college, which was moved to St. Louis in 1850 and named Concordia Theological Seminary. Before Walther's death Concordia had become the largest Protestant theological seminary in the United States.

In 1841 Walther moved to St. Louis, where he served as pastor of the Trinity congregation and as professor of theology at Concordia Seminary. In connection with the seminary Walther also established Concordia Publishing House. In 1844 he founded a biweekly publication, Der Lutheraner, as the voice of a strict confessional Lutheranism. The publication became the rallying point for Lutherans of similar convictions and soon led to the organization of the German Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Missouri, Ohio, and Other States, familiarly known as the Missouri Synod. Walther served as its president from 1847 to 1850 and from 1864 to 1878. When the Missouri Synod joined with several other midwestern synods in 1872, he became the first president of the expanded Evangelical Lutheran Synodical Conference of North America, the largest body of Lutherans in the United States. As a prolific author, a powerful preacher and debater, and a masterful organizer and leader, Walther emerged as the most influential Lutheran clergyman of the nineteenth century.

Walther, Carl Ferdinand Wilhelm

R. L. TROUTMAN

See also LUTHERAN TRADITION.

Bibliography. C. S. Meyer, ed., Letters of C. F. W. Walther; A. R. Suelflow, ed., Selected Writings of C. F. W. Walther; L. W. Spitz, Life of Dr. C. F. W. Walther.

Walvoord, John F. (b. 1910). American evangelical theologian, author, Presbyterian pastor (1934–50), professor (1936–86), and President of Dallas Theological Seminary (1953–1986), Walvoord contributed to the popularization and enrichment of dispensational theology. His scholarly approach to prophecy, eschatology, and the political turmoil of the later twentieth century greatly contributed to his fame as one of the foremost theologians within North American evangelicalism.

He entered the Evangelical Theological College (now Dallas Theological Seminary) in 1931 after graduating from the Wheaton College (Illinois). Walvoord was soon involved in the registrars office of the struggling seminary, graduated and returned as a theology professor, and, under the tutelage of its founder Lewis Sperry Chafer, was groomed for the Seminary's presidency. Under his direction Dallas Theological Seminary became one of the largest and most famous evangelical institutions. This growing prominence of Dallas Theological Seminary as a center for evangelical biblical and theological studies is itself a commentary on the Chafer-Walvoord vision of theology inasmuch as dispensational theology enjoyed a widespread grass-roots popularity in America. Walvoord became possibly the most respected and prolific authors of this movement.

Walvoord's dispensational theology brings together several significant evangelical influences: customarily Reformed views of salvation; Keswick characterizations of progressive sanctification; a firm conviction regarding the inerrancy of Scripture and a correspondingly strong commitment to its literal interpretation (especially biblical prophecy); and a dispensational approach to biblical interpretation. Dispensationalism, to Walvoord, is a successive but unified understanding of biblical history which extends (prophetically) into the contemporary world to the second coming of Christ. While there are distinctions to be drawn between law and grace, the earthly and heavenly, Israel and the church, and between prophecies already fulfilled and those to be fulfilled in the millennium, there is a unified view of salvation (Prophecy Knowledge Handbook, 1990).

He has published numerous volumes concerning theology and biblical commentary; his more influential works include: Millennial Kingdom (1959); Rapture Question (1957); and edited with Roy B. Zuck, Bible Knowledge Commentary (1983, 1985). As editor of the Seminary's theological journal, Bibliotheca Sacra (from 1952 to 1985), Walvoord contributed over one hundred articles highlighting the influence of dispensationalism in his theology. During the troubling global circumstances of the twentieth century, Walvoord articulated a conservatively evangelical approach to Scripture and, in turn, toward contemporary culture. He was once referred to as "the king of prophecy," and with good reason as his volume Armageddon, Oil, and the Middle East Crisis (co-authored with his son John E. Walvoord) sold over three quarters of a million copies. He revised this volume as the global circumstances developed, thus demonstrating his conviction that while the Bible offers literal depictions of the conclusion of our world (seemingly confirmed in the tumultuous circumstances of the twentieth century), just when that end transpires is unknown. Fitting his firm conviction regarding biblical inerrancy and literal interpretation, Walvoord reminds his readers that only the Bible can tell us of the future without mistake.

Walvoord's theological influence among dispensationalists is significant, and he gained the respect of many other evangelicals through his scholarship and ministry, but his fame as a proponent of literal interpretation of biblical prophecy is what he is best known for. The distinctiveness of dispensationalism in relation to central theological themes, something championed by Walvoord, is currently being questioned and sometimes revised in dispensational circles. Above all, it is his legacy as a Bible teacher and spokesperson for evangelical theology that distinguishes Walvoord.

J. P. CALLAHAN

See also DISPENSATION, DISPENSATIONALISM.

Bibliography. P. Boyer, When Time Shall Be No More; D. K. Campbell, Walvoord: A Tribute; J. D. Hannah, HET 234–44.

War. A term referring to a struggle between rival groups, carried on by arms, which can be recognized as a legal conflict. According to this definition riots or individual acts of violence are not considered wars, but armed rebellion within particular sovereignties and violent struggles between nations would be included.

Scriptural Background. The OT contains many statements that support armed conflict, including Deuteronomy 7 and 20 and the war narratives of Joshua, Judges, and Samuel. These passages have been cited by some Christians to justify war, but other Christians have cautioned that many laws given to ancient Israel are not meant to be applied to later times. In the teaching of Jesus the kingdom is no longer confined to a single state but exists in an international body, the Christian church. The change in the form of God's kingdom means that many passages that applied to Israel cannot be used in the new situation. It is also evident that the OT contains many passages such as Isaiah 2:4 that emphasize peace.

The NT has very few specific statements about war, but from its pages one can draw some general statements about armed conflict. In the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus encouraged his followers to live in a nonviolent manner: "If someone strikes you on the right cheek, turn to him the other also" (Matt. 5:39); "Love your enemies and pray for those who persecute you" (Matt. 5:44). Yet Jesus seemed to accept war as part of the world system (Matt. 24:6), and his followers who were soldiers were not condemned (Acts 10). The first disciples included Zealots, although Jesus tried to channel their energies into nonpolitical tasks. Soldiers were recognized as some of the heroes of the faith (Heb. 11:32), but Jesus clearly explained that the cause of God was not to be advanced through the use of physical force (John 18:36), and he criticized Peter for violently defending him at his arrest (Matt. 26:52–54). The Epistles use military terms and metaphors to describe the Christian life, and the believer is called a soldier who must struggle against evil with spiritual weapons that are analogous to those used by the Roman army (Eph. 6:10–20; 2 Tim. 2:3; 1 Pet. 2:11). Victory will come for the Christian cause at the return of Christ, when evil will be defeated in a series of battles described in the book of Revelation.

Early Church Pacifism. Because of the difficulty in applying the biblical statements about war, the example of the early church has been extremely important in subsequent discussions on the matter among Christians. Those who favor nonresistance find strong support from the fact that there is no evidence of a single Christian soldier in the Roman army from NT times until ca. A.D. 170. It would be helpful if statements about war had been preserved from this early period, but because the Romans did not have universal conscription, there was no pressure on Christians to serve; thus, they did not seem to comment on the subject. The closing years of the second century brought changes in the situation, and there is evidence of Christians in the imperial service despite the protests of church leaders. Many members of the military forces were converted, and others joined the army because they felt that a person should support the empire.

Others opposed the blurring of distinctions between the church and the world. They called attention to the idolatrous oath of allegiance to the emperor, which was required of those who joined the army, and they pointed out the incompatibility between the quality of love taught by Jesus and the need for a soldier to kill the enemy. Yet the Canons of Hippolytus, a guide for church discipline written in the third century, indicate that military life is acceptable if one does not kill. The apparent contradiction between serving as a soldier and not killing is resolved when it is understood that during the Pax Romana the army performed services provided by the police and fire departments in modern times. During that era it was possible to be in the Roman legions and never take life. But because most of them refused to serve in the military and the government, Christians were charged with disloyalty. In response to these accusations Origen wrote in Against Celsus that believers performed alternative service for the state by improving the moral fiber of society and by praying for the government. Prayer would combat the spiritual forces of evil that were responsible for violence and conflict.

The Just War. Roman society was Christianized during the fourth and fifth centuries through the work begun by the Emperor Constantine. This made the pacifist position difficult to maintain. In earlier times believers had benefited from Rome but had largely ignored imperial claims upon them. As long as the church was a minority in the state, its attitudes could be overlooked; but when believers became more numerous, there was increasing pressure for them to serve in the army. Augustine gave expression to a new attitude toward conflict on the part of Christians by formulating the just war theory. He adapted the rules of warfare developed by classical thinkers such as Plato and Cicero to the Christian position. War, he taught, should be fought to secure justice and to reestablish peace. It must be conducted under the direction of the ruler and be characterized by an attitude of love for the enemy. Promises to the opposition should be honored, noncombatants respected, and there was to be no massacre, looting, and burning. Those engaged in God's service, including monks and priests, were not to take part in warfare. In spite of Augustine's argument for war, he continued to be influenced by the nonviolent approach of the early church. There is a mood of gloom and resignation about much of his teaching regarding the state and its coercive powers.

The Crusades and Medieval Christianity. It was not until the eleventh century that the pacifism of the early church died out and the glorification of the fighting man, the knight, took its place. The explanation for this change can be found in the influx of Germanic people with their martial spirit. The clearest example of the outlook that resulted from the fusion of the barbarian religion of war and the Christian belief in peace was the crusade. In 1095 Pope Urban II urged his listeners to undertake a holy war under the auspices of the church to free the Holy Land from pagan control. The appeal succeeded, and the First Crusade was launched. This campaign resulted in the conquest of Jerusalem (1099) and the establishment of European states in the Middle East. There were more crusades to bolster these outposts, but by 1291 the last of them had fallen to the Muslims.

The crusades were the most obvious example of the merger between violence and holiness in the medieval church. The liturgy was expanded to include the blessing of battle standards and weapons. Knights were consecrated in a sacral fashion through ceremonies based on old pagan customs. New religious orders, such as the Templars, were founded for the purpose of fighting the enemies of God. Western peoples came to look upon groups that professed another faith as enemies of the kingdom of God who should be destroyed or converted. It was considered wrong to show mercy to these people, and the code of the just war could be suspended when fighting them. A favorite text of the crusaders summed up this attitude: "Cursed is he who keeps back his sword from bloodshed" (Jer. 48:10).

The acceptance of violence by medieval Christians is demonstrated by the theologians of the time, who tended to believe that war was a necessary condition of society. Aside from minor sects, there was little consideration of nonresistance. Scholars such as Gratian and Thomas Aquinas expressed the just war teaching in a manner that made it useful for aggressive action. Perhaps their greatest weakness was not what they wrote but what they did not write. They composed reams of material on the doctrine of angels but few lines on the problem of violence. Consequently, the discussion of war was left to those who looked on it favorably as an aspect of chivalry. The "heroic" knight of the time became the basis of later glorification of war. Geoffrey Chaucer illustrates this point of view in the Canterbury Tales, where the knight is the natural leader of the pilgrims and is endowed with all that is graceful and noble in an individual.

Renaissance and Reformation Developments. The technological and political changes of fifteenth- and sixteenth-century Europe created the conditions in which many Christians were forced to reconsider their attitudes toward war. The major technological change was the development of cannons. These were able to destroy medieval fortresses and, when adapted for field use, made the knight obsolete. The Middle Ages saw not only new methods of warfare but also the rise of larger dynastic monarchies. The territorial ambition of these states led to large-scale warfare.

Christian humanists such as Thomas More and Erasmus condemned the new violence. They pointed out that Christ did not advance his kingdom by force but through love and kindness. Erasmus reminded his readers that once wars are accepted as just, they tend to become glorious. The humanists accused the church of missing the true meaning of Scripture and instead becoming the obedient servant of ambitious, bloodthirsty princes. The early Protestant Reformers (Luther, Zwingli, and Calvin) did not add their voices to this protest, however. In fact, when religious fanaticism was added to the new munitions, the religious wars that followed the Reformation were some of the most violent in all of European history. Only one group of Reformers, the Anabaptists, practiced nonresistance. They advocated a literal return to the Sermon the Mount and an imitation of the peacefulness of Christ.

Total War and the Modern World. The Peace of Westphalia (1648) settled the last major European religious war and ushered in a period when dynastic monarchs on the pattern of Louis XIV gained great power. The states led by these kings suppressed local war bands and organized standing armies. These actions threatened the nobles because their traditional position was based on military service and now they were losing this function. In an effort to preserve their status, they became the officers of the new forces and thus became an interest group that encouraged a larger military establishment. The most famous of these nobles were the Junkers in Prussia. Such individuals continued the medieval notions of chivalry, honor, and martial virtues.

During the eighteenth century there was much criticism of war, but, with the coming of the French Revolution, a new wave of violence swept over Europe. Napoleon diverted the revolution into a campaign to build a vast empire. He formed an alliance between nationalism and democratic idealism. His idea of organizing the entire nation for the purpose of warfare was ominous for later times. Although defeated, he wielded great influence through his example and the humiliation he created among those he defeated. Challenged by the Napoleonic victories, a Prussian military instructor, Karl von Clausewitz, articulated the theory of "total war." He believed that it is necessary to push conflict to its "utmost bounds" in order to win. At the time he expressed these ideas the industrial revolution began increasing the power of armaments so that an enemy could be totally defeated in a manner never before possible.

Christians in the nineteenth century responded to the danger caused by new armaments by encouraging international cooperation and humanitarian endeavors. Despite a strong current of nationalism, these attempts led to international gatherings including the Hague Conferences of 1899 and 1907. These meetings produced a series of recommendations protecting the rights of prisoners of war, insisting on care for the sick and wounded, ensuring the rights of neutrals, and attempting in other ways to limit the cruelty of war.

The forces that worked toward harmony and peace failed, however, and with World War I Clausewitz's view moved closer to reality. The two sides used mines, machine guns, poison gas, submarines, and aerial bombardment, thus taking the conflict to land, sea, and air. The churches supported the war. The rhetoric of leaders such as Woodrow Wilson made them feel that they were involved in a crusade to help humankind. But reality came home to these church people when, after the Peace of Versailles, which ended the conflict, nothing seemed to go as planned. Totalitarian regimes came to power in many countries, and the Great Depression spread among the liberal democracies of the West. The years between the global conflicts were characterized by a spirit of weariness and pacifism in the United States and western Europe. The League of Nations, organized for the purpose of keeping peace, was unable to prevent another crisis, and the world was plunged into the maelstrom of another war.

The attitude of Christians toward World War II was closer to the just war theory. The struggle differed from the First World War because it was a clash between antagonistic social and political systems. Fascism with its bizarre biological racism led many former Christian pacifists, including Reinhold Niebuhr, to urge believers to participate in the conflict. New technology produced weapons that made war more destructive than ever before. The atomic bomb seemed to represent the ultimate in destructive capability. When the war ended, the rivalry between the United States and the Soviet Union continued to threaten world peace. The United Nations has tried to keep peace, but the arms race has become a fact of life and the production of weapons has been woven into the texture of modern technological society. The situation is made even more difficult because of a decline in Christian influence in a more secular society.

Christian Responses to War. As history demonstrates, it is difficult to formulate the Christian position on war. The early church, certain Christian humanists, and the majority of Anabaptists have taken a nonresistant or pacifist stance. The majority, however, have followed Augustine and claimed that certain wars are just. Denominations including the Church of the Brethren, Quakers, and Mennonites maintain a nonresistant position, but the larger groups, such as Lutherans, Presbyterians, Baptists, Roman Catholics, Methodists, and Reformed adhere to the just war interpretation. In certain rare instances Christians have even supported crusades. The medieval popes urged such action against the Turks, and in the twentieth century some fundamentalist Protestants in the United States have supported such an attitude toward the Soviet Union.

One of the more interesting developments in recent times is the effect that the threat of global conflagration is having on Christian attitudes toward war. Leaders in many denominations have come to realize that the use of nuclear bombs makes a mockery of the just war position because they automatically result in the slaughter of noncombatants. In the minds of these "nuclear pacifists," such weapons invalidate war as a rational policy.

R. G. CLOUSE

See also PACIFISM.

Bibliography. R. H. Bainton, Christian Attitudes toward War and Peace; L. Boettner, Christian Attitude toward War; P. Brock, Pacifism in Europe to 1914; Pacifism in the United States from the Colonial Period to the First World War; Twentieth Century Pacifism; D. W. Brown, Brethren and Pacifism; C. J. Cadoux, Early Christian Attitude toward War; R. G. Clouse, ed., War: Four Christian Views; P. C. Craigie, Problem of War in the Old Testament; G. F. Hershberger, War, Peace and Nonresistance; A. F. Holmes, ed., War and Christian Ethics; R. Niebuhr, Christianity and Power Politics; Moral Man and Immoral Society; G. Nuttall, Christian Pacifism in History; R. B. Potter, War and Moral Discourse; P. Ramsey, Just War; War and the Christian Conscience; R. J. Sider and R. K. Taylor, Nuclear Holocaust and Christian Hope; G. von Rad, Holy War in Ancient Israel; M. Walzer, Just and Unjust Wars; R. Wells, ed., Wars of America: A Christian View; O. Wright, Study of War; J. Yoder, Nevertheless: The Varieties of Religious Pacifism; Original Revolution: Essays on Christian Pacifism; G. C. Zahn, Alternative to War; War, Conscience and Dissent.

Warfield, Benjamin Breckinridge (1851–1921). The last of the great conservative theologians who defended Calvinistic orthodoxy from the chair of theology at Princeton Seminary. After his education at Princeton College and Princeton Seminary, Warfield traveled in Europe and taught NT at Western Seminary in Allegheny, Pennsylvania. He succeeded Archibald Alexander

Warfield, Benjamin Breckinridge

Hodge as professor of didactic and polemic theology at Princeton in 1887. Warfield wrote a vast number of articles, reviews, and monographs for the popular press and learned journals. His scholarship was precise, wide-ranging, and well grounded in scientific literature. He was one of the great academic theologians at the turn of the century, and his work remains alive today among theologically conservative Protestants who share particularly his attitudes toward Scripture.

Like his Princeton predecessors, Archibald Alexander and the Hodges, Warfield was a strict Calvinist. He wrote numerous studies on Calvin, Augustinian theology, and the Westminster Confession, both to illuminate the theological history and to advocate the positions thus illuminated. He set his Calvinism against the tides of liberalism, which he faulted for subverting God's activity in salvation and divine authority in revelation. He was heartened by the spiritual zeal of the fundamentalists but felt that they were forfeiting rich theological resources by drifting toward anti-intellectualism. He was especially antagonistic toward the defenders of revelational religious experience, whether the rationalistic piety of Albrecht Ritschl and A. C. McGiffert, the perfectionism of the "Higher Life" and Keswick movements, or the insistence on special spiritual gifts in modern Pentecostalism. To him these substituted subjective religiosity for the completeness of Scripture. Warfield found himself increasingly isolated in his later years. He shared with the modernists a commitment to learned theological inquiry but rejected their conclusions. He shared with the fundamentalists a commitment to supernatural faith yet questioned their methods.

Warfield is best known today for his painstakingly careful efforts to defend the inerrancy of the Bible. In 1881 with A. A. Hodge he wrote a famous essay, "Inspiration," which set out a carefully stated reassertion of traditional Protestant belief in the full infallibility and truthfulness of Scripture. In countless essays and reviews thereafter Warfield labored to clarify the Bible's own testimony to its inspiration and to oppose those who detracted from Scripture's infallible authority. This work on the Bible has made Warfield an important guide for conservative evangelicals in the twentieth century, even for those who do not share his Calvinism (he never wavered in rejecting the pretensions of "free will"), his eschatology (he regarded premillennialism and dispensationalism as aberrations), or his views on science (he believed evolution could be reconciled with the inerrancy of early Genesis).

M. A. NOLL

See also HODGE, ARCHIBALD ALEXANDER; HODGE, CHARLES; PRINCETON THEOLOGY, OLD.

Bibliography. J. E. Meeter, ed., Selected Shorter Writings of Benjamin B. Warfield; Works of Benjamin B.

Warfield; J. H. Gerstner, "Warfield's Case for Biblical Inerrancy," in God's Inerrant Word, J. W. Montgomery, ed.; J. E. Meeter and R. Nicole, Bibliography of Benjamin Breckinridge Warfield 1851–1921; M. A. Noll, ed., Princeton Theology 1812–1921; D. Wells, ed., Reformed Theology in America.

Warneck, Gustav Adolf (1834–1910). German Protestant missiologist. Trained at the Francke School and the University of Halle, Warneck entered the pastorate in 1862. As he spent his free time studying missionary theory and practice, he was soon attracted to an administrative post in the Rhenish Missionary Society in Barman. Health problems necessitated a return to parish work in 1875, and he accepted a charge in the Saxon village of Rothenschirmbach, which allowed him to continue his scholarly endeavors. In 1874 he founded the Allgemeine Missionszeitschrift, the main missiological journal in Germany, and in 1879 he started sponsoring annual missions conferences that brought pastors and laymen together. In 1885 he helped form the German Protestant Missions Committee to promote cooperation among the various societies and served as its secretary from 1885 to 1901. Upon retiring from the ministry he was given an honorary lectureship in missions at Halle. His major works include Modern Missions and Culture: Their Mutual Relations (1879), Outline of a History of Protestant Missions from the Reformation to the Present Times (1882), and the untranslated Evangelical Mission Doctrine (1892–1903). He made contributions in popularizing missions among church leaders and laity alike and fostering cooperation in overseas efforts.

Theologically Warneck was a conservative and was strongly influenced by pietist thought. He saw Christianity as the "life" that penetrates into all the "orders of life." Through the new birth in Christ a principle of life flows into all aspects of human existence. He divided reality into two spheres, the realms of nature and spirit. To the latter belong problems of Christ, salvation, the church, and the kingdom of God; to the former are the questions of nature, history, man, and the world. In nature occurs the organic growth of a people (Volk) that has its own character and uniqueness. Effective missionary work involves the penetration of a people with the gospel and the establishment of a church that reflects its organic character and development. Forming such Volkskirchen (people's churches) should lead to the Christianization of whole nations and the ultimate victory of Christianity over paganism. The church stands on the Word of God and must therefore be incorporated into the lives of the peoples if the world is to be won. Unlike Anglo-Saxon missiology, which emphasized individual conversion, Warneck saw church planting as crucial because the object of missions is "all the nations" as nations. They are to be Christianized in their organic structures through a gradual process with the reborn taking the leading role. When self-supporting and self-governing native churches are established, the leaven of Christianity will spread through the nation until all are won to Christ and the second coming takes place.

R. V. PIERARD

See also MISSIOLOGY.

Bibliography. R. V. Pierard, NIDCC 1030; M. Schlunk, "Gustav Warneck," IRM 23:395-404; SHERK 12:273-74.

Washing of Feet. See FOOT WASHING.

Watchman Nee (1903-1972). Chinese evangelist, theologian, and founder of the Local Church Movement. Nee was born to a dedicated Christian mother and educated in mission schools sponsored by the Church Missionary Society. His early evangelistic activities led him to edit the Revival, designed to nurture new believers. By 1925 Nee had commenced a preaching ministry that would reach from China to Singapore, Malaysia, Europe, and America. The only book Nee authored, Spiritual Man, was written during a period of confinement with tuberculosis. The remaining fifty works were transcriptions of his sermons. One of the greatest outcomes of Nee's ministry was a strategy of "evangelism by migration," in which Christian families would move to unreached areas of China and beyond, establishing local churches. Sometimes known as "The Little Flock," a name taken from their hymnal, the Local Church Movement followed Nee's teaching on the nature of the church and spiritual authority. Nee's tireless activity continued until his arrest by the communists in 1952. He died twenty years later, a prisoner for his faith.

Nee's theology developed through constant interaction with new believers. His first major work, Spiritual Man, deals with his views of the three parts of man: body, soul, and spirit. Nee believed that the three parts are dealt with separately by the Spirit of God beginning with the quickening of the spirit at regeneration and the breaking of the soul, whereby the Spirit of God has control over the whole being (1965). Brokenness to Nee was the essential quality of a truly spiritual person and a prerequisite for effective ministry (1965). Nee's view of the church, published in Further Talks on Church Life, included receptivity to all whom the Lord received, the exercise of the discipline to exclude those the Lord excludes, preaching the complete will of God, providing work for every believer, not claiming ownership of the truth and gospel, and establishing a church for all the believers in a particular locality (Ling). The controversial nature of his view of locality is based on the belief that all Christians should belong to one church in a given locality (1969). The most powerful contribution of Nee may be "his unforgettable teaching on the Christian's walk" (Kinneary). C. D. MCCONNELL

Bibliography. W. Nee, Further Talks on Church Life; Normal Christian Life; Release of the Spirit; Spiritual Authority; Spiritual Man; A. Kinneary, Against the Tide: The Story of Watchman Nee; S. D. Ling, Watchman Nee.

Watson, Richard (1781-1833). Early Wesleyan theologian and missions secretary. Born at Barton-upon-Hunter, in Lincolnshire, Watson was converted under the preaching of William Dodwell, and preached his first sermon one day after his fifteenth birthday. His extemporaneous preaching style endeared him to congregations, and in 1796 he became a Methodist traveling preacher. He enjoyed taking the role of devil's advocate in doctrinal matters to sharpen his debater's skills and to deepen his understanding of Wesleyan orthodoxy. This action was misunderstood, however, and Watson was charged with heterodoxy and accused of being an Arian. He resigned as itinerant preacher in spring of 1801 and was admitted into the Methodist New Connexion in 1803. Appointed secretary of the New Connexion conference, he held the position until a chronic respiratory ailment forced his resignation in 1809.

In 1810 he again took appointment and in 1811 became conference secretary. He collaborated with Jabez Bunting to defeat a bill before Parliament that would radically curtail the freedom of ministers except those who were "substantial" (financially and politically). As English Wesleyan missions secretary, he gave staunch support to the abolition of slavery.

Watson's theological commitment to Wesleyan orthodoxy and the Arminian position pitted him against a doctrine of predestination and special election: "Our Lord Jesus Christ did so die for all men, as to make salvation attainable by all men." A major argument in his Theological Institutes (1823) was that Christ died for all men, that his death was for those who obtain salvation as well as for those who reject Christ by "their own opposing wills" and thereby fail to obtain salvation.

Of such importance was Watson's Institutes as the first systematic treatment of the theological motifs of Wesley's thought that it was required as a core text in the Course of Study School in both the Methodist Episcopal Church and the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, from the 1870s until the turn of the century. Watson's theological orthodoxy and social activism stand as a significant influence in British and American Wesleyan thought. P. A. MICKEY

See also ARMINIANISM; METHODISM; WESLEYAN TRADITION.

Watson, Richard

Bibliography. R. Watson, Anecdotes of the Life of Richard Watson; Works of the Reverend Richard Watson in Thirteen Volumes, A. Gordon, DNB 60:24–27.

Watson, Thomas (d. ca. 1686). Puritan minister and writer. Educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge (called by C. H. Spurgeon “the nursing mother of gigantic evangelical divines”), he was known there as a most diligent student. In 1646 he became rector of St. Stephen’s, Walbrook, London, where he combined considerable learning with popular preaching. An Anglican bishop who heard him there once asked for a copy of a prayer Watson had offered and was incredulous when told it was extempore. His incumbency of St. Stephen’s came to an end by ejection for non-conformity under the 1662 Act of Uniformity. It was an ironic development, for Watson had continued to be a Royalist under Cromwell and his son, was briefly imprisoned for this, and had been active in supporting the restoration of the monarchy in 1660.

For several years Watson ministered secretly until the easing of repressive legislation permitted Nonconformists to conduct public worship in their own meeting places, in one of which Watson was for a time copastor with Stephen Charnock. Details of Watson’s life are generally sparse; it seems that he retired to Essex about 1680. A prolific writer, he is remembered chiefly for his Body of Practical Divinity, published posthumously in 1692. Comprising 176 sermons, this work was still highly regarded, especially among ordinary people in the nineteenth century, probably because of its lucid and succinct presentation of material. Spurgeon, though taking issue with Watson on infant baptism, describes his work as “a happy union of sound doctrine, heart-searching experience and practical wisdom.”

J. D. DOUGLAS

See also CALVINISM; NONCONFORMITY; UNIFORMITY, ACTS OF.

Watts, Isaac (1674–1748). English hymnwriter. Born in Southampton and educated at the famous Nonconformist academy in Stoke Newington, he ministered in a London church (1699–1712), during which time he wrote Horae Lyricae (1706), a book of religious poetry that ensured his inclusion in Johnson’s Lives of the Poets. His hymns first appeared in Hymns and Spiritual Songs (1707) and ran through numerous editions in his lifetime. He was a pioneer in writing for the young. His Divine Songs Attempted in Easy Language for the Use of Children (1715) aimed to be “a constant furniture for the minds of children, that . . . may sometimes give their thoughts a divine turn, and raise a young meditation.”

In Psalms of David Imitated in the New Testament (1719) Watts aimed to make David a Christian. This work included “O God, Our Help in Ages Past” (from Ps. 90), still used on great national occasions, and “Jesus Shall Reign” (Ps. 72). Among his other hymns is “When I Survey the Wondrous Cross,” called by Matthew Arnold the finest hymn in the English language.

Though Edinburgh University gave him an honorary D.D. (1728), Watts was an uneasy Calvinist, unhappy with the doctrines of total depravity and reprobation. Some saw Arian tendencies in his published works. At a conference in 1719 he voted with the minority who refused to impose acceptance of the doctrine of the Trinity on independent ministers. He did not believe this necessary to salvation. He sought to heal the breach between Arianism and orthodoxy in a number of theological works. In views expounded also by others including Henry More, he argued that the human soul of Christ had been created before the creation of the world and united with the divine principle in the Godhead known as the Sophia or Logos, and that the personality of the Holy Spirit was metaphorical rather than literal.

It was reported that Watts became Unitarian in his last years, but this has never been substantiated. What is certain is that many of his compositions have an austere OT quality, notably in their contemplation of God’s glory in nature as well as in his revelation in Christ.

Watts, who broke the stern embargo on the use of hymns in Nonconformist churches, also published works on philosophy, astronomy, and social concerns. His educational handbooks, notably Catechisms (1730) and Scripture History (1732), were still used long after his death. His Collected Works was published in 1810.

J. D. DOUGLAS

See also NONCONFORMITY.

Bibliography. S. L. Bishop, Isaac Watt’s Hymns and Spiritual Songs; Publishing History and a Bibliography; A. P. Davis, Isaac Watts; H. Escott, Isaac Watts, Hymnographer; T. Gibbons, Memoirs of the Rev. Isaac Watts; B. L. Manning, Hymns of Wesley and Watts; T. Milner, Life, Times and Correspondence of the Rev. Isaac Watts.

Wave Offering. See OFFERINGS AND SACRIFICES IN BIBLE TIMES.

Way, Follower of the. See CHRISTIANS, NAMES OF.

Way International, The. A cultic organization founded in the mid-1950s by a former Evangelical and Reformed minister, Victor Paul Wierwille. The Way claims it is not a church or a denomination but merely a “biblical research and teaching organization.”

Like most cultic groups, The Way’s history and theology revolve around its founder and longtime president. A graduate of Princeton Theological Seminary, Wierwille holds a doctorate from a reputed degree mill, Pike's Peak Seminary. He first taught his "Power for Abundant Living" class in 1953 and began to attract attention and followers during the Jesus Movement of the late 1960s and 1970s. The class (PFAL) continues to be the primary means by which potential converts are introduced to the unorthodox teachings of the movement and has become the cornerstone of The Way's doctrinal position.

In 1958 Wierwille resigned from the ministry, disillusioned with the institutional church, and continued his spiritual search as an ecclesiastical loner. He claims to have had a life-changing experience during which God spoke to him audibly and promised that he would teach Wierwille the Word as it had not been known since the first century.

After this "revelation" encounter with God, Wierwille pursued a career of writing, preaching, and teaching that included the denial of the Trinity, the deity of Jesus Christ, and other major doctrines of orthodox Christianity. He is revered as a prophet by his followers and views himself as an apostle, "one who brings new light to his generation."

Wierwille's theology is a strange admixture of Unitarianism, dispensationalism, Pentecostalism, and Calvinism. While he claims to teach the "rightly divided" Word in a manner that was lost to Christianity until he rediscovered it, Wierwille's preconceived theology is essentially an accumulation of ancient heresies in modern dress combined with some biblical truth. The Way, in reality, is an organization that is built around one man's interpretation of the Bible.

Critics claim that Wierwille misdefines Greek words, employs inferior study tools, promotes false principles of textual criticism, and routinely distorts biblical teaching. A presupposition underlying much of Wierwille's questionable exegesis is the primacy of the Aramaic. The Way researchers assert that the NT was originally written in Aramaic, not Greek. They make extensive reference to Syriac versions and to the Peshitta version translated by George Lamsa, an inferior biblical text. Wierwille also manipulates Orientalisms to reinforce his own preferred doctrine.

Members of The Way do not accept the deity of Christ. Wierwille regularly asserts, "Jesus Christ is not God—never was and never will be." The Way teaches that Jesus is the son of God, but he is not God the Son. Consistent with Wierwille's unitarian monotheism is his rejection of the Holy Spirit as the Third Person of the Godhead. In his view, the Holy Spirit is the Father (God) and just another name for God. When the words "holy spirit" are not capitalized, Wierwille is referring to a spiritual ability of power. Therefore, according to The Way theology, the Holy Spirit is not a person but an impersonal power or enablement.

Speaking in tongues is central to The Way's theology. Wierwille teaches that speaking in tongues constitutes the true worship of God and that the practice is a necessary indicator of the new birth. As part of the Power for Abundant Living course Way members are taught how to speak in tongues, following Wierwille's rather mechanical instruction.

Other errant doctrines of The Way include the belief that there is no glory in death and that the dead remain dead until the final resurrection ("soul sleep"); the teaching that water baptism is not for Christians; and the view that faith is a spiritual thing given to humans only after Pentecost, and therefore it is the faith of Jesus Christ that saves, not our faith in Jesus.

The Way International has headquarters in New Knoxville, Ohio. Its outreach program includes Word Over the World (WOW) Ambassadors, a leadership training program called The Way Corps, and publication of The Way Magazine. The organization espouses a very conservative political ideology and has been accused by some parents of mind manipulation and aggressive recruitments tactics.

R. ENROTH

See also CULTS.

Bibliography. R. M. Enroth, Youth Brainwashing and the Extremist Cults; J. MacCollam, "The Way," in Guide to Cults and New Religions, R. M. Enroth, ed.; J. G. Melton, Encyclopedic Handbook of Cults in America; D. V. Morton and J. C. Juedes, Integrity and Accuracy of The Way's Word; J. L. Williams, Victor Paul Wierwille and The Way International.

Way of Affirmation. See VIA AFFIRMATIVA, VIA AFFIRMATIONIS.

Way of Illumination. See ILLUMINATIVE WAY, THE; MYSTICISM.

Way of Negation. See VIA NEGATIVA.

Way of Purification. See MYSTICISM; PURGATIVE WAY, THE.

Wealth, Christian View of. The term wealth is derived from weal, an Anglo-Saxon word that means a general state of well-being. For an individual the word wealth signifies the well-being resulting from outward rather than inward causes such as health or contentment. So a man who has $100 is wealthier than a pauper with only 50 cents, even if the rich man is Dives and the pauper is Lazarus. Adam Smith used the word to signify the material well-being produced and consumed in the community. Both uses of the term, whether pertaining to an individual or a community, represent the evaluation of things according to priorities.

Wealth, Christian View of

The market price measures the value of an item of wealth. If there is no market, the value can only be appraised. Because a railway and a share of stock in the same railway are not separate items of wealth, counting paper wealth such as equities and securities together with the underlying physical nonhuman goods involves double counting. When debits and credits for all forms of wealth are summed for a community, paper wealth cancels out and double counting is eliminated.

Individual Wealth. For the Christian, wealth is not an innate evil but an opportunity for godly service. While not the greatest value on earth, wealth can be a good thing. We should not put our trust in it because it can be lost or stolen. Among the many things more important than wealth, the Bible mentions the fear of the Lord, wisdom, knowledge, understanding, integrity, a lowly spirit, righteousness, and peace. As in the case of Solomon, if we receive these things, wealth often accompanies them.

Abraham was a very wealthy man who owned gold, silver, and cattle. Lot was also very wealthy. Job was a wealthy man before his ordeal and twice as wealthy afterward because God prospered him with cattle and livestock and blessed the work of his hands. God in no way questioned the legitimacy of their wealth. Although wealth is sometimes associated with violence and oppression, it is often a gift from God representing a blessing on his people. Sometimes wealth can help us when there is trouble, although it cannot shield us from God's judgment. Wealth can tempt us to forget God and prevent us from enjoying things.

God entrusts his wealth to individuals and institutions in order to increase its value. As compassionate stewards of God's property, we are fully responsible to him for the proper administration of his wealth. At the same time we are the legitimate owners during the period of our stewardship. Complete economic self-sufficiency for an individual or even a small community is difficult, if not impossible, because of the curse of the ground. This forces us to cooperate with others to increase our own per capita wealth. In this way our interdependence as human beings is demonstrated. How we manage our cooperation with other people will determine to a large extent the value of our wealth.

Studies for the United States and other countries generally show that a relatively small percentage of the population (1–2 percent) owns a high percentage of wealth (20–70 percent). Although there are many motives for accumulating wealth, most of the population has no significant accumulation. Most people tend to live above or at their income and run down what little liquid wealth they own preferring present to future consumption. They may do this in reaction to those who love money and wealth for its own sake rather than for what it can do or in reaction to examples of the tyrannical use of wealth. Nevertheless, wealth can be enjoyed for the prospect of family continuity it offers, the status it provides, and the opportunity for the exercise of power.

In recent times the importance of providing for one's children as a motive for accumulating wealth has diminished, especially since a large stock of wealth may be necessary to maintain estates and other inherited possessions associated with family continuity. Public and private security and pension plans; taxes; and geographical, occupational, and marital mobility have all contributed to this tendency. When a family has managed to maintain a certain position in a community for a long time, however, there may be an element of pleasure in perpetuating the position for another generation. This case may be an exception to the general tendency of not providing much for one's children.

Some people enjoy the process of accumulating wealth because it demonstrates that they have the ability to grapple with the vicissitudes of life and win. A person who puts together a successful deal may even feel the same kind of inner satisfaction as a poet or a mathematician who has just completed a creative endeavor. For that person it is not so much the enjoyment of using wealth that motivates as the fun of the game.

The owner of a business may enjoy identifying himself with the success or wealth of his business, especially if it dominates a market. The accumulation of wealth in this case accompanies successful activity and enlarges the individual's influence. Directing great affairs, putting one's ideas into practice, or doing good for humankind may be important motivating factors that impel a Christian to devote energy, capital, and time to subduing the portion of the earth under his or her sphere of responsibility.

One's worldview affects one's attitude toward wealth and its accumulation. The dualism of Aristotle and Thomas Aquinas caused people to think that being spiritual was something distinct from the practical issues of life. They then emphasized the difference between wealth and the spiritual world. When the highest purpose of humankind is seen as the attainment of spiritual union with God, wealth may be regarded with a certain amount of disdain. The accumulation of wealth beyond the minimum to live an ascetic life may then harm the individual and subvert his or her spiritual union with God. Because the desire for wealth and the things wealth allows can defile the spirit in this paradigm, the struggle of life is to mortify any desire for wealth and to escape any attachments to wealth. The antagonism between spirit and wealth in this context is unnecessary and may ultimately be anti-Christian.

For others who accept this same dichotomy, spirit is something obscure and unreal if it exists at all, while the practical issues of business are real. Under this view wealth is seen as real but also dead and inert because it is totally unrelated to the spiritual issues of life. For this reason such people fail to relate to wealth except to use, manipulate, or destroy it. This attitude directed toward the physical world is equally defective and leads to the depletion and destruction of the earth's wealth. Only by having our minds renewed can we come to a true and joyous repentance of our anti-Christian attitudes toward wealth, our rape of the environment, and our disdain of God's creation.

Still others believe we are caught up in an inevitable process of evolutionary advancement to which all means of wealth should be directed. Only the best in civilization as confirmed by repeated human judgments should be encouraged. Adherents of this view suspect that substantial wealth retards human creation, knowledge, and experience and causes civilization to decay. For the evolutionist great wealth causes cultural tastes to coarsen and conscience to atrophy, as the wealthy seek sensual pleasures that satisfy only for a moment. For the Christian this scenario, while real, results from turning from God rather than accumulating wealth.

When the Christian begins with God, who created the heavens and the earth and pronounced it good, all the earth is full of the beauty, goodness, and love of a holy God. The Christian sees a world where spirit and wealth flow together in oneness without antagonism. Through Jesus Christ all wealth is clean, and both spirit and wealth are to be respected. In the biblical view the Spirit of God naturally flows through everything the Christian is and does. Material wealth can fulfill and express the Christian in an abundant and prosperous life. The Lord then blesses everything his child touches. Guided by purity, honesty, and integrity, and with concern for his or her fellow laborers, this person works as unto the Lord, realizing that nothing is secular.

The view that God is active in wealth and present in the whole of creation removes the sense of guilt associated with the accumulation and use of wealth. For the Christian, human passion is not opposite to the life of the spirit but the very medium through which we grow to be fully human. It is in the use of wealth that we learn to choose between the wrong passions of the flesh and the pure passions of the spirit. John Wesley's injunction to Christians was, "Make as much as you can; save as much as you can; give as much as you can." The Christian view frees us in our pursuit of wealth and permits us to bring a greater sense of well-being to the hungry as part of the task of making the kingdom of God real on earth.

Wealthy people derive benefits from their wealth that they divide among different forms in accordance with their priorities. Five different forms in which wealth can be held are (1) money, (2) securities, (3) equities, (4) physical nonhuman goods, and (5) human capital. The primary benefit from holding money is derived from its liquidity, which gives the holder command over goods and services and the power to provide for exigencies. Securities (bonds, notes, and bills) yield a fixed interest and capital gains, or losses if sold before maturity. Investors in equities receive dividends and capital gains. Physical nonhuman goods such as art objects, furniture, vehicles, and property yield benefits in their use, while investment in human wealth through education or health-related services increases the potential income from labor.

Money. Money is a form of wealth that serves as a temporary medium of purchasing power. It is accepted in payment of debts and in exchange for goods and services because people know others will accept it in like circumstances. It overcomes the difficulties of barter. Many objects such as cattle, salt, shells, cigarettes, cognac, and even women have been used as money, but precious metals, especially gold and silver, have been the most popular. The Bible records the long history of silver and gold as forms of wealth. In Strong's Concordance there are three columns of references to silver and three and a half to gold. God calls attention to the gold of Havilah. He expects people to recognize the special nature of this gift, which is almost universally recognized as valuable. Gold was one of the three gifts brought by the magi to honor the child Jesus. Gold is the highest earthly standard by which we can compare God's judgments. Even the New Jerusalem is to be constructed of gold. So from Eden to the New Jerusalem gold is a valuable form of wealth.

Despite its special characteristics among forms of wealth, money is still a marketable good and is not equally useful or valuable in every possible situation. Neither gold nor any other form of wealth has absolute value but is subject to the laws of God. For instance, if faith in market institutions fails and people give up their hope in their earthly futures, the value of money will be affected. What has formerly been valuable can fall to close to zero value, demonstrating that there is no ultimate, infallible, all-purpose "store of value" in economics. In a world of uncertainty no single commodity, not even gold, can successfully preserve value under all contingencies. This is what Christ pointed to when he cautioned people to lay up treasure in heaven, since there alone is a person's treasure safe from the flux of human events.

Community Wealth. Economic development began when God drove Adam from the Garden of Eden and said that he would earn his living under conditions of scarcity by the sweat of his brow. Adam and his sons set out to lighten the burden of this curse by using stone, copper, bronze, iron, and steel to make tools to farm, hunt, and build shelters. Progress was slow, but they learned to use natural resources to make power and to organize people and processes to increase production. Civilizations rose only to fall by war, catastrophe, plague, or exhaustion of natural resources.

In the fifteenth century the Italians adopted Arabic symbols and double-entry bookkeeping for business records. In the same century the joint stock company, the stock exchange, and deposit-credit banks emerged to separate ownership from control of business. This facilitated transfers of ownership and provided a payments and lending mechanism. These institutions, while facilitating large economic enterprises, tended to obfuscate most people's understanding of the fundamentals of economic life.

In the 1850s the legal invention of the limited liability corporation expanded the concept of the joint stock company by limiting the investors' risk and liability to the extent of their ownership. Since ownership could be divided into small portions, many people participated. In the 1890s investment banking houses underwrote security issues by guaranteeing to furnish funds at a given time whether or not the securities were sold. They raised capital for financing large-scale enterprises by selling bonds and stocks to many people. These institutions facilitated an unprecedented economic expansion.

Today financiers who trade paper wealth every day live in a world of symbols where a very important factor is the reaction of other financiers. Because of this, their actions can lead to more volatility in the prices of paper wealth than would take place if only the underlying real wealth were exchanged. This overreaction is also more apparent because there is usually a liquid market for paper wealth where the rights to use, derive income from, or control are evaluated and discounted continuously.

In the last two hundred years people have learned to reorganize production in factories, to apply steam and water power to production and transportation, and to facilitate development with new financial institutions. But the new element enabling people to use their ingenuity and determination was an unprecedented license for free enterprise. This produced a degree of economic freedom never before attained. From 1775 to 1850 the United States in particular threw off society's long-standing restrictions on individuals and witnessed an unprecedented surge in material wealth. Freedom of choice produced the opportunity and incentive for productive activity and economic development.

Under the free enterprise system the variety of products and services available to the public increases constantly as a result of scientific discovery, experimentation, and risk-taking. The possibility of accumulating wealth stimulates individuals to develop new products and more efficient production methods. Everyone has the opportunity and motivation to exploit new ideas, while competition exerts pressure on management to improve productive processes. Workers are free to select their occupations and offer their services to whomever they wish, while businesses are free to choose their products, workers, manufacturing techniques, and locations. Consumers who are free to buy or not determine what will be produced and how much. Businesspeople must respond to this competition or fail. While no nation has ever had wholly unrestricted free enterprise, the most rapid economic progress has occurred in those nations that have given it the most latitude.

Why did this freedom appear so fully on the American scene? Francis Schaeffer traces how the biblical teaching in the Reformation not only opened the approach to God through Jesus Christ but brought forth political and economic freedom in society without chaos.

Although many of the U.S. founding fathers were not Christians, they functioned within the Christian consensus. The U.S. Constitution permits the ordinary citizen on the basis of biblical teaching to call the majority wrong. A majority is prevented from becoming a final authority to the extent that biblical teaching is practiced in the community. And yet amid this freedom there was no chaos because the freedom took place within a consensus based on the Bible.

Unfortunately, the wealth accumulated in England and the United States from the Industrial Revolution under this freedom was not used compassionately. The greater flow of goods was accompanied by the increasing exploitation of women and children, the rise of slums, and a growing inequality of wealth. Our ability to produce enough to meet the basic needs of all did not lead to economic wealth for everyone. It was not that the majority of people were worse off but that the dignity of many suffered. New economic problems such as unemployment and depressions arose. Individual efforts of charity, while frequent, did not suffice. Unfortunately, the churches were silent about the Bible's emphasis on a compassionate use of wealth.

Because of the negative side effects occurring in communities as a result of the lack of compassion accompanying rapid economic development in a free economy, some claimed that we were making no real economic progress and that our present attainments were in jeopardy.

Jeremy Bentham's utilitarianism and Thomas Malthus's and David Ricardo's view of the inevitability of poverty stifled the teaching of Christ and the Bible on the compassionate use of accumulated wealth. Around 1850 John Stuart Mill and Karl Marx agreed that there was little hope for improving the welfare of the masses under existing institutions. Mill had no solution, while Marx called for revolution. Around 1870 Henry George attracted attention by claiming that wealth increases poverty. By the 1930s some believed that we were heading for economic depression because our economy was "mature" and the opportunities for invention and production were exhausted.

If the church had been faithful at this time, it might not have lost so many workers and intellectuals. If it had spoken clearly against the uninhibited use of wealth, the "survival of the fittest" concept might not have taken over so fully. Pessimism in the face of abuses real and threatened and mistrust of businesspeople have led to the growth of government corporations and regulation. In the past fifty years this government regulation has increased vastly, leading to a whole new set of problems, limiting the precious freedom spawned by the Reformation and retarding economic growth.

Conclusion. Because God made the world and everything in it, wealth as a part of God's creation is not inherently evil and to be refused. In the Bible it is often depicted as a blessing from God and a sign of his favor. Because this is a fallen world, however, wealth also partakes of our fall-ness. If it is used to exploit, dominate, or persecute, it becomes a great evil. Covetousness is equivalent to idolatry (Col. 3:5), and the love of money is the root of many kinds of evil (1 Tim. 6:10). Thus, the Bible admonishes us not to become anxious over our possessions, exhausting ourselves to pile up treasures on earth where moth and rust corrupt. Our heavenly Father knows we have needs, and whether we abound or suffer want, we should be content with what his kind hand provides (Phil. 4:11–13). D. K. ADIE

Bibliography. W. Block and D. Shaw, eds., Third World Development and Economic Justice; W. Block, G. Brennan, and K. Elzinga, eds., Morality of the Market: Religious and Economic Perspectives; E. von Bohn-Bawerk, Capital and Interest; C. Carter, Wealth, an Essay on the Purposes of Economics; J. B. Clark, Philosophy of Wealth; R. G. Clouse, ed., Wealth and Poverty: Four Christian Views of Economics; R. R. Doane, Anatomy of American Wealth; R. T. Ely, Property and Contracts in their Relations to the Distribution of Wealth; I. Fisher, Nature of Capital and Income; M. Friedman, Optimum Quantity of Money and Other Essays; R. W. Goldsmith and R. E. Lipsey, Studies in the National Balance Sheet of the United States; B. Griffiths, Creation of Wealth; Morality and the Market Place; R. J. Lampman, Share of Top Wealth-Holders in National Wealth 1922–56; R. Nash, Poverty and Wealth: Christian Debate over Cap- italism; G. North, Dominion Covenant: An Economic Commentary of the Bible; Introduction to Christian Economics; W. Ropke, Humane Economy: The Social Framework of the Free Market; T. Rose, Economics: The American Economy from a Christian Perspective; F. A. Schaeffer, How Should We Then Live?; J. A. Schumpeter, History of Economic Analysis; E. L. H. Taylor, Economics, Money and Banking Theology.

Weber, Otto (1902–1966). German theologian, author, and professor. Weber, one of Europe's most significant theologians of the twentieth century, was born in Cologne, Germany. In 1928 he was made the director of the Theological College of Wuppertel. During Hitler's efforts to unify the Protestant churches of Germany under the control of the Third Reich, Weber, an early leader in the Deutsche Christen (German Christian) movement, was appointed professor of Reformed theology at Göttingen University (1934). For the next thirty-two years, until his death in 1966, he devoted himself to teaching and writing extensively.

Among his many works, Weber produced Church Dogmatics: An Introductory Report (1953). As a digest of Karl Barth's eight massive volumes, the Report is an outline map to one of the greatest theological achievements of the twentieth century. This one convenient volume made Barth's landmark work accessible to many who would not otherwise have read it. One of Weber's most lasting contributions is his Grundlagen der Dogmatik (Foundations of Dogmatics, 1955). Foundations has served both as a basic textbook in systematics for generations of theological students and as a valuable reference work in Reformed theology. J. R. LINCOLN

See also BARMEN, DECLARATION OF; BARTH, KARL; NEO-ORTHODOXY.

Bibliography. K. Scholder, Churches and the Third Reich; O. Weber, Foundations of Dogmatics, D. L. Gruder, trans.; Karl Barth's Church Dogmatics: An Introductory Report.

Wenger, John Christian (1910–1995). A prominent churchman, bishop, author, and seminary professor in the largest North American Mennonite denomination, the Mennonite Church. Born Christmas day, 1910, near Honey Brook, Pennsylvania, J.C., as he later liked to be called, always retained the faith learned from his parents and formed in the Rockhill Mennonite Church of Bucks County, where the family moved in 1923. He attended Eastern Mennonite College, graduated from Goshen College, studied with J. Gresham Machen at Westminster Seminary, and with such notable scholars as Karl Barth at the University of Basel and Emil Brunner and Fritz Blanke at the University of Zurich, from which he received the Th.D. He later acquired an M.A. in philosophy from the University of Michigan.

Wenger, John Christian

Along with a teaching career at Goshen College and then at Goshen Biblical Seminary (now part of Associated Mennonite Biblical Seminary, Elkhart, Indiana), Wenger held many churchwide offices as well as serving on the presidium of the Mennonite World Conference. Often referred to in later years as “the beloved J.C.,” he traveled continually to speak in Mennonite congregations. A prolific author, he edited six books and wrote some twenty books as well as many booklets and numerous popular and scholarly articles. Important books include History of the Mennonites of the Franconia Conference, which also served as his doctoral dissertation; Separated unto God; Introduction to Theology; Glimpses of Mennonite History and Doctrine; and Even unto Death. Wenger took great satisfaction from being a member of the Committee on Bible Translation for the New International Version.

As a churchman, his irenic spirit did much to hold factions of the church together. A protégé and then confidante and advocate of Harold S. Bender, Wenger popularized Bender’s “Anabaptist Vision” school of thought. Although Wenger’s formal theology was shaped by interaction with fundamentalism, it had an irenic spirit, rounder edges, and more flexibility than classic fundamentalism, with a strong dose of Wesleyan holiness mixed in as support for traditional Mennonite ethics. On the culturally progressive side of the Mennonite Church spectrum in his youth, Wenger adopted Mennonite plain dress upon ordination, wearing the “plain coat” to the end of his life after most church leaders had abandoned it in the 1970s. Books such as Separated unto God and Introduction to Theology, which became primary sources of Mennonite church beliefs in the third quarter of the twentieth century, linked classic, conservative theology with plain dress and the Mennonite ethic of pacifism. J. D. WEAVER

See also ANABAPTISTS; MENNONITES.

Bibliography. J. C. Wenger, J.C.: A Life Sketch; P. Toews, Mennonites in American Society, 1930–1970.

Wesley, John (1703–1791). The primary figure in the eighteenth-century Evangelical Revival and founder of Methodism. Wesley was born in Epworth, England, to Samuel and Susanna Wesley, one of nineteen children. Although both his grandfathers distinguished themselves as Puritan Nonconformists, his parents returned to the Church of England, where his father ministered at Epworth (1697–1735) and Wroot (1725–35). Wesley spent his early years under the careful direction of his remarkable mother, who sought to instill in him a sense of vital piety leading to a wholehearted devotion to God.

Life. Wesley was educated at Charterhouse, a school for boys in London, and then Christ Church, Oxford, where he received the B.A. degree in 1724 and the M.A. degree in 1727. Although a serious student in both logic and religion, Wesley was not to experience his “religious” conversion until 1725. He was then confronted with what to do with the rest of his life. He decided (through the influence of his mother, a religious friend, and the reading of Jeremy Taylor and Thomas à Kempis) to make religion the “business of his life.” He was ordained deacon (1725), elected to a fellowship at Lincoln College, Oxford (1726), and served as his father’s curate at Wroot (1727–29). He then returned to Oxford and became the leader of a small band of students organized earlier by his younger brother, Charles. This band, dubbed the “Holy Club,” would later be called “Methodist” for their prescribed method of studying the Bible and for their rigid self-denial, which included many works of charity. During this period (1729–35) both John and Charles fell under the influence of the nonjuror and mystic William Law. Although Wesley confessed that he did not at that time understand justification by faith (seeking instead justification by his own works-righteousness), it was during this period that he formulated his views on Christian perfection—the hallmark of Methodism.

In 1735 (Wesley’s Journal begins at this point and continues until shortly before his death) Wesley went to Georgia as a missionary to the Indians. Although the Indians eluded him, he did serve as priest to the Georgia settlers under General James Oglethorpe. During a storm in crossing Wesley was deeply impressed with a group of Moravians onboard. Their faith in the face of death (the fear of dying had been constantly with Wesley since his youth) predisposed Wesley to the Moravian evangelical faith. After a disastrous experience in Georgia, he returned to England (1738) and met the Moravian Peter Böhler, who exhorted him to trust Christ alone for salvation. What had earlier been merely a religious conversion now became an “evangelical” conversion. At a Moravian band meeting on Aldersgate Street (May 24, 1738), as he listened to a reading from Luther’s preface to his commentary on Romans, Wesley felt his “heart strangely warmed.” Although scholars disagree as to the exact nature of this experience, nothing in Wesley was left untouched by his newfound faith. After a short journey to Germany to visit the Moravian settlement of Herrnhut, he returned to England and with George Whitefield, a former member of the Holy Club, began preaching salvation by faith. This “new doctrine” was considered redundant by the sacramentalists in the Established Church, who thought people sufficiently saved by virtue of their infant baptism. The established churches soon closed their doors to the Methodist's (a name carried over from their Oxford days) preaching, so they began preaching in the open air.

In 1739 Wesley followed Whitefield to Bristol, where a revival broke out among the miners of Kingswood. At that point Wesley's true genius surfaced through his ability to organize new converts into Methodist "societies" and "bands" that sustained both them and the revival. The revival continued under Wesley's direct leadership for more than fifty years. He traveled some 250,000 miles throughout England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland, preaching some 40,000 sermons. His influence also extended to America as he (after considerable reluctance) ordained several of his preachers for the work there, which was officially organized in 1784. Wesley literally established "the world as his parish" in order to spread "scripture holiness throughout the land." He remained fearlessly loyal to the Established Church all his life. Methodism in England did not become a separate denomination until after his death.

Theology. Although Wesley was not a systematic theologian, his theology can be described with reasonable clarity from the study of his published sermons, tracts, treatises, and correspondence. In essence, Wesley's theology, so akin to the Reformation, affirms God's sovereign will to reverse our "sinful, devilish nature" by the work of his Holy Spirit, a process he called prevenient, justifying, and sanctifying grace (grace being nearly synonymous with the work of the Holy Spirit).

Prevenient or preventing grace for Wesley describes the universal work of the Holy Spirit in the hearts and lives of people between conception and conversion. Original sin, according to Wesley, makes it necessary for the Holy Spirit to initiate the relationship between God and people. Bound by sin and death, people experience the gentle wooing of the Holy Spirit, which prevents them from moving so far from "the way" that when they finally understand the claims of the gospel upon their lives, he guarantees their freedom to say yes. This doctrine constitutes the heart of Wesley's Arminianism.

Justifying grace describes the work of the Holy Spirit at the moment of conversion in the lives of those who say yes to the call of prevenient grace by placing their faith and trust in Jesus Christ. Wesley understood such conversion as two phases of one experience. The first phase—justification—includes the Spirit attributing or imputing to the believer the righteousness of Jesus Christ. The second phase—the new birth—includes the Spirit launching the process of sanctification or imparted righteousness. These two phases identify, in part, the Wesleyan distinctive. Here he combines the "faith alone" so prevalent in the Protestant Reformation (Wesley insisted that he and Calvin were but a hair's breadth apart on justification) with the passion for holiness so prevalent in the Catholic Counter-Reformation.

Sanctifying grace described the work of the Holy Spirit in the lives of believers between conversion and death. Faith in Christ saves us from hell and sin for heaven and good works. Imputed righteousness, according to Wesley, entitles one to heaven; imparted righteousness qualifies one for heaven. It is here that Wesley goes to great lengths to describe his views on Christian perfection.

The process of sanctification or perfection culminates in an experience of "pure love" as one progresses to the place where love becomes devoid of self-interest. This second work of grace is described as the one purpose of all religion. If one is not perfected in love, one is not "ripe for glory." It is important, however, to note that this perfection was not static but dynamic, always improvable. Neither was it angelic or Adamic. Adam's perfection was objective and absolute, while Wesley's perfection was subjective and relative, involving, for the most part, intention and motive.

Although Wesley talks about an instantaneous experience called "entire sanctification" subsequent to justification, his major emphasis was the continuous process of going on to perfection. Perhaps first learned from the early church fathers like Macarius and Ephraem Syrus, this emphasis on continuous process was enforced by Wesley to prevent the horrible expectation of backsliding. Wesley soon learned that the only way to keep Methodists alive was to keep them moving. This same concept of continuous process was later polished by the influence of mystics like François Fénelon, whose phrase moi progressus ad infinitum (my progress is without end) greatly impressed Wesley and became a major tool for the perpetuation of the Evangelical Revival. The watchword for the revival became: "Go on to perfection: otherwise you cannot keep what you have."

Prevenient grace, therefore, is a process. Justifying grace is instantaneous. Sanctifying grace is both a process and instantaneous. Although Wesley's theology went through some subtle shifts later in life (for example, he placed more and more emphasis on good works as the inevitable fruit of saving faith), this is fairly representative of Wesley's theology throughout. Generally speaking, Wesley was a practical theologian. In a very practical way his theology was geared primarily to his own needs and to the needs of those given into his care.

R. G. TUTTLE JR.

See also ARMINIANISM; HOLINESS MOVEMENT, AMERICAN; METHODISM; REVIVAL, SPIRITUAL; REVIVALISM; WESLEYAN TRADITION; WHITEFIELD, GEORGE.

Bibliography. J. Wesley, Journal, N. Curnock, ed.; Letters, J. Telford, ed.; Standard Sermons, E. H. Sugden, ed.; Works, T. Jackson, ed.; W. R. Cannon, Theology of John Wesley; M. L. Edwards, John Wesley and the Eighteenth Century; V. H. H. Green, Young Mr. Wesley; R. P. Heitzennater, Elusive Mr. Wesley; H. Lindström, John Wesley and Sanctification; A. C. Outler, ed., John Wesley; M. Piette, John Wesley in the Evolution of Protestant Discipline; M. Schmidt, John Wesley: A Theological Biography; R. G. Tuttle, John Wesley, His Life and Theology; L. Tyerman, Life and Times of the Reverend John Wesley; C. W. Williams, John Wesley's Theology Today.

Wesleyan Tradition. In the broad sense of the term, the Wesleyan tradition identifies the theological impetus for those movements and denominations who trace their roots to a theological tradition finding its initial focus in John Wesley. Although its primary legacy remains within the various Methodist denominations (the Wesleyan Methodist, the Free Methodist, the African Methodist Episcopal, the African Methodist Episcopal Zion, the Christian Methodist Episcopal, and the United Methodist), the Wesleyan tradition has been refined and reinterpreted as catalyst for other movements and denominations as well—e.g., Charles Finney and the Holiness movement; Charles Parham and the Pentecostal movement; Phineas Bresee and the Church of the Nazarene.

In the more narrow sense of the term, the Wesleyan tradition has been associated with Arminianism, usually in contrast to Reformed Calvinism. This could be misleading. Historically, Calvinists have feared that Wesleyans have strayed too close to Pelagianism. On the other hand, Wesleyans have feared that Calvinists have strayed too close to antinomianism. In fact, neither is necessarily true. Calvin was no antinomian and neither Arminius nor Wesley a Pelagian. Justification by faith is pivotal for both traditions. Although free will is an issue, in many respects the two traditions are not that far apart. For example, Wesley stated that he and Calvin were but a hair's breadth apart on justification. Sanctification, not free will, draws the clearest line of distinction. Good theology, for Wesley, was balance without compromise. This balance is most evident in Wesley's understanding of faith and works, justification and sanctification. Those who espouse such a tradition like to think of this as their peculiar genius.

Wesleyan Distinctives. In a phrase, the Wesleyan tradition seeks to establish justification by faith as the gateway to sanctification or "scriptural holiness." Taken separately, justification by faith builds the foundation. Wesley himself in a sermon entitled "Justification by Faith" makes an attempt to define the term accurately. First, he states what justification is not. It is not being made actually just and righteous (that is sanctification). It is not being cleared of the accusations of Satan, nor of the law, nor even of God. We have sinned, so the accusation stands. Justification implies pardon, the forgiveness of sins. God justifies not the godly but the ungodly. They that are righteous need no repentance, so they need no forgiveness. This pardon or forgiveness comes by faith. Then Wesley states what faith is and what it is not. It is not that faith of a heathen, nor of a devil, nor even that of the apostles while Christ remained in the flesh. It is "a divine supernatural, evidence or conviction, 'of things not seen,' not discoverable by our bodily senses." Furthermore, "justifying faith implies a sure trust and confidence that Christ died for my sins, that He loved me and gave Himself for me" (Works 5:60–61). This faith is received by repentance and our willingness to trust Christ as the one able to deliver us from all our sins.

With justification by faith as the foundation, the Wesleyan tradition then builds a doctrine of sanctification upon it. The doctrine develops like this. Man and woman were created in the image of God's own eternity. They were upright and perfect. They dwelt in God and God dwelt in them. God required full and perfect obedience, and they were (in their unfallen state) equal to the task. They then disobeyed God, and their righteousness was lost. Thus, they were separated from God. We, as their seed, inherited a corruptible and mortal nature. We became dead, dead in spirit, dead in sin, dead to God, so that in our natural state we hastened on to death everlasting. God, however, was not to be undone. While we were yet sinners Christ died for the ungodly. He bore our sins that by his stripes we might be healed. The ungodly, therefore, are justified by faith in the full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice. This is not the end, however. This is only the beginning. Ultimately for the true Wesleyan salvation is completed by our return to original righteousness. This is done by the work of the Holy Spirit. Although we are justified by faith alone, we are sanctified by the Holy Spirit—the Spirit that makes us holy.

The Wesleyan tradition insists that grace is not contrasted with law but with the works of the law. Wesleyans remind us that Jesus came to fulfill, not destroy, the law. God made us in his perfect image, and he wants that image restored. He wants to return us to a full and perfect obedience through the process of sanctification. As we continually yield to the Spirit's impulse, he roots out those things that would separate us from God, from ourselves, and from those around us. Although we are not justified by good works, we are justified for good works. To be sure, no good works precede justification, as they do not spring from faith in Christ. Good works follow after justification as its inevitable fruit. Wesley insisted that Methodists who did not fulfill all righteousness deserved the hottest place in the lake of fire.

Fulfilling “all righteousness” or being restored to our original righteousness became the hallmark of the Wesleyan tradition.

To fulfill all righteousness describes the process of sanctification. Wesley insisted that imputed righteousness must become imparted righteousness. God grants his Spirit to those who repent and believe that through faith they might overcome sin. Wesleyans want deliverance from sin, not just from hell. Wesley speaks clearly of a process that culminates in a second definite work of grace identified as entire sanctification. Entire sanctification is defined in terms of “pure or disinterested love.” Wesley believed that one could progress in love until love became devoid of self-interest at the moment of entire sanctification. Thus, the principles of scriptural holiness or sanctification are as follows: sanctification is received by faith as a work of the Holy Spirit. It begins at the moment of new birth. It progresses gradually until the instant of entire sanctification. Its characteristics are to love God and one’s neighbor as oneself; to be meek and lowly in heart, having the mind of Christ Jesus; to abstain from all appearance of evil, walking in all the commandments of God; to be content in every state, doing all to the glory of God.

Wesleyanism. The Wesleyan tradition’s defense has normally exercised four basic proofs: Scripture, reason, tradition, and experience. Although these “proofs” represent only a construct of Wesley’s theology, the principles can be clearly identified.

Scripture. Wesley insisted that Scripture is the first authority and contains the only measure whereby all other truth is tested. Delivered by divinely inspired men, it is a rule sufficient of itself. It neither needs, nor is capable of, any further addition. The Scripture references to justification by faith as the gateway to scriptural holiness are well known to true Wesleyans: Deuteronomy 30:6; Psalm 130:8; Ezekiel 36:25, 29; Matthew 5:48; 22:37; Luke 1:69; John 17:20–23; Romans 8:3–4; 2 Corinthians 7:1; Ephesians 5:25–27; 1 Thessalonians 5:23; Titus 2:11–14; 1 John 3:8; 4:17.

Reason. Although Scripture is sufficient unto itself and is the foundation of true religion, Wesley writes, “Now, of what excellent use is reason, if we would either understand ourselves, or explain to others, those living oracles” (Works 6:354). He states quite clearly that without reason we cannot understand the essential truths of Scripture. Reason, however, is not a mere human invention. It must be assisted by the Holy Spirit if we are to understand the mysteries of God. With regard to justification by faith and sanctification Wesley said that although reason cannot produce faith, when impartial reason speaks, we can understand the new birth, inward holiness and outward holiness. Although reason cannot produce faith, it shortens the leap.

Tradition. Wesley writes that it is generally supposed that traditional evidence is weakened by length of time, as it must necessarily pass through so many hands in a continued succession of ages. Although other evidence is perhaps stronger, he insists: “Do not undervalue traditional evidence. Let it have its place and its due honor. It is highly serviceable in its kind, and in its degree” (Works 10:75). Wesley states that men of strong and clear understanding should be aware of its full force. For him it supplies a link through 1,700 years of history with Jesus and the apostles. The witness to justification and sanctification is an unbroken chain drawing us into fellowship with those who have finished the race, fought the fight, and who now reign with God in his glory and might.

Experience. Apart from Scripture, experience is the strongest proof of Christianity. “What the Scriptures promise, I enjoy” (Works 10:79). Again, Wesley insists that we cannot have reasonable assurance of something unless we have experienced it personally. John Wesley was assured of both justification and sanctification because he had experienced them in his own life. What Christianity promised (considered as a doctrine) was accomplished in his soul. Furthermore, Christianity (considered as an inward principle) is the completion of all those promises. Although traditional proof is complex, experience is simple: “One thing I know; I was blind, but now I see.” Although tradition establishes the evidence a long way off, experience makes it present to all persons. As for the proof of justification and sanctification, Wesley states that Christianity is an experience of holiness and happiness, the image of God impressed on a created spirit, a fountain of peace and love springing up into everlasting life.

Development of Wesleyan Thought. The emphasis on justification by faith as the foundation and sanctification as the building upon it kept the Methodist people moving perpetually toward God. Even entire sanctification as an instantaneous experience was never cause to sleep. Not to improve it was to lose it. One was to grow in love. Perfect love continually plumbed some new depth of the human experience. These distinctives of the Wesleyan tradition were powerful tools for the perpetuation of the Evangelical Revival. Unfortunately, many of these doctrines have been either lost or misdirected. Many within the Wesleyan tradition have slipped into legalism, for example. Their understanding of sanctification has become too closely identified only with the form of godliness. Wesley intended that sanctification should be a disposition of the mind or a condition of the heart from which spring all good works. Wesley would be grieved to see good works become an end in themselves.

Wesleyan Tradition

Ironically, in spite of an emphasis on “doing,” many within the Wesleyan tradition have lost their social vision as well. Originally Wesley championed the fight against injustices like slavery and the lack of prison reform. Many followed in his footsteps. The cry of the early Holiness movement (which carried the banner of the Wesleyan tradition throughout the nineteenth century) was, “Repent, believe, and become an abolitionist.” Unfortunately, many within the Wesleyan tradition lost their social consciences when the Holiness movement became defensive and ingrown during the late 1800s. When such movements lose their theological head (Finney died in 1875), they tend to become more and more rigid. The social gospel became associated with liberalism, and many within the Wesleyan tradition overreacted. There was also a period of infighting. At the turn of the century the Wesleyan tradition, then deeply embedded within the Holiness movement, splintered. Now the Wesleyan tradition can be traced through many different movements and denominations that still hold, in one form or another, a view to justification by faith as the gateway to sanctification. Admittedly, there might have been some improvements on Wesley’s legacy, but much has been lost as well. Wesley’s own question—“How to reunite the two so long divided, knowledge and vital piety?”—strikes a relevant chord. The principles of scriptural holiness still have meaning and contain much that is yet precious and important for our contemporary world.

R. G. TUTTLE JR.

See also ARMINIANISM; HOLINESS MOVEMENT, AMERICAN; METHODISM; SANCTIFICATION; WESLEY, JOHN.

Bibliography. J. B. Behney and P. H. Eller, History of the Evangelical United Brethren Church; C. Carter, ed., Contemporary Wesleyan Theology; S. Harper, John Wesley’s Message for Today; T. Langford, Practical Divinity: Theology in the Wesleyan Tradition; H. Lindström, Wesley and Sanctification; P. A. Mickey, Essentials of Wesleyan Theology; F. A. Norwood, Story of American Methodism; J. Peters, Christian Perfection and American Methodism; J. Wesley, Works, T. Jackson, ed.

Westcott, Brooke Foss (1825–1901). One of the foremost NT scholars of the nineteenth century. A fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, for several years as a young man, Westcott spent almost two decades as a master at the famous Harrow School. In 1870, primarily at the instigation of his close and learned friend, the renowned NT scholar J. B. Lightfoot, he was invited to return as Regius Professor of Divinity. Here he did his greatest NT work. With F. J. A. Hort he worked in textual criticism, publishing the Westcott-Hort edition of the Greek testament, and he produced famous commentaries on the Gospel of John, the epistles of John, and the epistle to the Hebrews. His work reflects the best of the English exegetical tradition, which he and his colleagues did so much to develop. Based on massive historical and theological learning, the approach was conservative and spiritual, as expressed in his introduction to the epistles of John: “the sense of rest and confidence which grows firmer with increasing knowledge.”

Westcott was also deeply involved in social issues and was the first president of the Christian Social Union. Abhorring the raw brutalities of unfettered capitalism, he found his answer in an organic view of society based on an incarnational model similar to that of F. D. Maurice. Since Jesus Christ in his incarnation assumed humanity and then glorified it in his resurrection, so all humanity is already bound together in Jesus Christ. The need is for this corporate reality to be recognized. The sacraments play an important part in this scheme, for the incarnation of Christ is expressed through the sacraments, which sanctify all of human life in community. Through this emphasis Westcott became one of the progenitors of the famous school of Anglican Christian Socialists, which would include Stewart Headlam, Scott Holland, Charles Gore, and William Temple.

After two decades at Cambridge, Westcott succeeded Lightfoot as bishop of Durham in 1890. In the industrial Northeast of England his social consciousness, as well as his intelligence, scholarship, and spirituality, helped to make him a great bishop.

I. S. RENNIE

See also GORE, CHARLES; MAURICE, JOHN FREDERICK DENISON; SOCIALISM, CHRISTIAN; TEMPLE, WILLIAM.

Bibliography. C. K. Barrett, Westcott as Commentator; H. Chadwick, Vindication of Christianity in Westcott’s Thought; P. d’A. Jones, Christian Socialist Revival 1877–1914; S. Neill and T. Wright, Interpretation of the New Testament: 1861–1986; D. Newsome, Bishop Westcott and the Platonic Tradition; F. Olofsson, Christus Redemptor et Consummator: A Study in the Theology of B. F. Westcott; A. G. B. West, Memories of Brooke Foss Westcott; A. Westcott, Life and Letters of Brooke Foss Westcott.

Westminster Catechisms. After the Westminster Assembly completed its work on the confession, it focused its attention on preparation of a catechism. Its early attempts were frustrated, and a consensus developed that two catechisms would be needed, “one more exact and comprehensive, another more easy and short for new beginners.” The Larger was intended for pulpit exposition, while the Shorter was intended for the instruction of children. These were completed, the Shorter in 1647 and the Larger in 1648. Both function as official standards of doctrine in many denominations today within the Reformed tradition. The Larger has, to a considerable extent, fallen into disuse, while the Shorter has been greatly used and loved, though many have found it too difficult to be an effective teaching aid for children.

The theology of the catechisms is the same as that of the confession. The catechisms (especially the Shorter) also share the confessions' conciseness, precision, balance, and thoroughness. Neither breathes the warm, personal spirit of the Heidelberg Catechism, but it may be argued that some of the answers are equally memorable and edifying. They do, in my opinion, excel the Heidelberg in conciseness and precision. Both are structured in two parts: (1) what we are to believe concerning God, and (2) what duty God requires of us. The first part recapitulates the basic teaching of the confession on God's nature, his creative and redemptive work. The second part contains (a) exposition of the Decalogue, (b) the doctrine of faith and repentance, and (c) the means of grace (word, sacrament, prayer, concluding with an exposition of the Lord's Prayer).

The Larger is sometimes thought to be over-detailed, even legalistic, in its exposition of the law. One emerges with an enormous list of duties that are difficult to relate to the simple commands of the Decalogue. There is truth in such criticisms, but those who urge them often fail to realize the importance of applying scriptural principles authoritatively to current ethical questions. Whatever we may think of their conclusions, the Westminster divines provide us with a good example of zealotry at that task.

J. M. FRAME

See also CATECHISMS; WESTMINSTER CONFESSION OF FAITH.

Bibliography. G. I. Williamson, Shorter Catechism.

Westminster Confession of Faith (1647). The Westminster Assembly (so called because of its meeting place) was summoned by the English Parliament in 1643. Its mission was to advise Parliament in restructuring the Church of England along Puritan lines. To the assembly were invited 121 ministers (the "divines"), 10 members of the House of Lords, 20 of the Commons, plus 8 nonvoting (but influential) representatives of Scotland, which was allied to the English Parliament by a treaty, the "Solemn League and Covenant." Different views of church government were represented, presbyterianism being the dominant position. On theological matters, however, there was virtual unanimity in favor of a strong Calvinistic position, unequivocally rejecting what the assembly saw as the errors of Arminianism, Roman Catholicism, and sectarianism.

The assembly's Confession of Faith, completed in December 1646, is the last of the classic reformed confessions and by far the most influential in the English-speaking world. Though it governed the Church of England only briefly, it has been widely adopted (sometimes with amendments) by British and American Presbyterian bodies as well as by many Congregational and Baptist churches. It is well known for its thoroughness, precision, conciseness, and balance. Notable elements are: (1) the opening chapter on Scripture, called by Warfield the best single chapter in any Protestant confession. (2) The mature formulation of the Reformed doctrine of predestination (chs. III, V, IX, XVII). It is noncommittal on the debate between supra- and infralapsarianism but teaches clearly that God's will is the ultimate cause of all things, including human salvation. It teaches the doctrine of reprobation in very guarded terms (III. vii. viii.). It is careful to balance this teaching with a chapter on human freedom (IX). (3) The emphasis on covenants as the way in which God relates to his people through history (VII, esp.). (4) Its doctrine of redemption structured according to God's acts (X–XIII) and human response (XIV–XVII), thus underscoring its "covenantal" balance between divine sovereignty and human responsibility. (5) Its Puritan doctrine of assurance (XVIII)—a strong affirmation, yet more sensitive than other Reformed confessions to the subjective difficulties believers have in maintaining a conscious assurance. (6) Its strong affirmation of the law of God as perpetually binding the conscience of the believer, even though certain ceremonial and civil statutes are no longer in effect (XIX), balanced by a careful formulation of the nature of Christian liberty of conscience (XX). (7) Its Puritan view of the Sabbath, regarding the day as a perpetual obligation, contrary to Calvin's Institutes of the Christian Religion and other Reformed writings. (8) The first clear confessional distinction between the visible and invisible church (XXV).

J. M. FRAME

See also CONFESSIONS OF FAITH; WESTMINSTER CATECHISMS.

Bibliography. S. W. Carruthers, Westminster Confession of Faith; G. Hendry, Westminster Confession for Today; A. I. C. Heron, ed., Westminster Confession in the Church Today; W. Hetherington, History of the Westminster Assembly of Divines; D. Laing, ed., Letters and Journals of Robert Baillie; A. Mitchell and J. Struthers, Minutes of the Sessions of the Westminster Assembly; J. Murray, "Theology of the Westminster Confession of Faith," in Scripture and Confession, J. Skilton, ed.; B. B. Warfield, Westminster Assembly and Its Work; G. I. Williamson, Westminster Confession of Faith for Study Classes.

Whichote, Benjamin. See CAMBRIDGE PLATONISM.

Whitby, Daniel (1638–1726). Anglican minister and scholar. Born in Northamptonshire and educated at Trinity College, Oxford, Whitby held a series of church appointments leading to the position of rector of St. Edmund's, Salisbury, in 1669. Although he was a popular preacher, his reputation mainly rests on his voluminous writings—thirty-nine volumes filled with controversial material. At first his work, such as a collection of materials that attacked Roman Catholicism, was quite popular, but when he published a plea for concession to Nonconformists in order to win them to the Church of England (Protestant Reconciler, 1683), this changed. The violent opposition aroused by his suggestion led to the burning of his book at Oxford. Among his other writings were attacks on Calvinism and a defense of Bishop Hoadly in the Bangorian controversy.

Whitby's most notable work was the two-volume Paraphrase and Commentary on the New Testament (1703), which continued to be popular throughout the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. In the latter part of this commentary, he placed an elaborate twenty-six page "hypothesis" on the millennial reign of Christ. According to Whitby, the world would be converted by the gospel, the Jews restored to the Holy Land, and the papacy and the Muslims defeated. This would lead to the thousand-year period of peace, righteousness, and happiness on earth. At the close of the millennium, Christ would return and the last judgment would be conducted. Whitby's postmillennialism became the leading interpretation for most of eighteenth-century English and American commentators.

R. G. CLOUSE

See also MILLENNIUM, VIEWS OF THE.

Bibliography. D. Whitby, Last Thoughts; A. Gordon, DNB 61:28–30.

Whitby, Synod of (664). English church assembly that brought together the Roman and Celtic streams in English Christianity to discuss differences, notably the question of the date of Easter. This matter had become acute since Scottish monks of the Celtic tradition had settled in parts of northern England. King Oswy of Northumbria, who presided at Whitby, adhered to the Celtic practice; his wife, however, had been brought up in Kent and observed the Roman Easter. The Celts claimed their usage was derived from the apostle John and from Columba of Iona. The Romans referred to Rome and Peter, and argued that "a corner of a remote island had no business to stand out against the custom of the rest of the Catholic Church." The prestige of Rome won the day; the king decided that uniformity was crucial and that those who served one God should observe one rule of life. A majority assented. The dissenters withdrew to Scotland.

There was, however, no schism. Rome had won a victory over the old Irish church, but it was well into the Middle Ages before the Celtic church was completely Latinized.

J. D. DOUGLAS

See also PASCHAL CONTROVERSIES; ROMAN CATHOLICISM.

White, Ellen Gould (1827–1915). Seventh-day Adventist leader. Born Ellen Gould Harmon in Maine and brought up in a Methodist family, she with them was influenced by addresses given in Portland by the Adventist William Miller. In 1843 the family was expelled from Methodist membership for accepting premillennial views. Soon after joining the Adventists Ellen, who had little formal education, claimed to have seen in the first of many "revelations" the triumph and vindication of the Adventists over earthly persecution. Before her death seventy years later, she was said to have experienced "two thousand visions and prophetic dreams." Her early followers regarded these visions as partially fulfilling Joel 2:28–32. The Adventist movement suffered a severe setback when two dates in 1844 set by Miller for Christ's return proved to be mistaken.

Ellen became a "sabbathkeeper" in 1846, soon after her marriage to James White. The Seventh-day Adventist Church as an official denomination was established at Battle Creek, Michigan, in 1863, with Ellen as leader and her writings and counsels accepted as the "spirit of prophecy" (Rev. 19:10). This, according to Fundamental Beliefs of Seventh-day Adventists, is "one of the identifying marks of the remnant church." Modern Seventh-day Adventism denies that Mrs. White's writings are to be equated with the biblical canon, which closed nearly two thousand years ago, though a leading Adventist says that "just as God enlightened Moses . . . he enlightened Ellen G. White."

Mrs. White herself declared that all teaching is to be judged by the Bible and that "the Spirit was not given . . . to supersede the Bible." Acceptance of her writings is not to be made a matter of church discipline, but Adventists hold that in her life and ministry the "gift of prophecy" was restored in these last days of the Christian church. Through more than sixty works (100,000 handwritten pages), Ellen G. White still dominates the movement seventy years after her death, even though the leadership carefully refers to her as "a lesser light to lead men and women to the greater light." Nonetheless, at the denomination's World Congress in Vienna in 1975 her writings were commended as timeless and realistic, for they "lift up Christ and His Word, foster Biblical doctrines and standards, encourage personal piety, devotion and sacrifice, spiritual and physical health, church unity and effectual methods of work, provide a clearer understanding of our times and coming events, and offer needed warnings, admonitions, and reproof."

Among White's publications are the nine-volume Testimonies for the Church (1855–1909) and Steps to Christ, which has sold more than twenty million copies in more than a hundred languages. W. R. Martin, a careful modern researcher, concludes that despite all her misinterpretations and deficiencies, Ellen G. White was "true to the cardinal doctrines of the Christian faith regarding the salvation of the soul and the believer's life in Christ." Not all evangelical scholars accept Martin's assessment.

Having lectured throughout America, Mrs. White took Seventh-day Adventism to Europe (1885–87) and Australia (1891–1900).

J. D. DOUGLAS

See also ADVENTISM.

Bibliography. D. M. Canright, Life of Mrs. E. G. White; N. F. Douty, Another Look at Seventh-Day Adventism; L. E. Froom, Prophetic Faith of Our Fathers; A. A. Hoekema, Four Major Cults; W. R. Martin, Kingdom of the Cults; True Story of Seventh-day Adventism; F. D. Nichol, Ellen G. White and Her Critics; R. L. Numbers, Prophetess of Health: A Study of Ellen G. White; W. T. Rea, White Lie; A. L. White, Messenger to the Remnant.

Whitefield, George (1714–1770). The best-known evangelist of the eighteenth century and one of the greatest itinerant preachers in the history of Protestantism. Whitefield, an ordained minister of the Church of England, cooperated with John and Charles Wesley in establishing at Oxford during the 1720s the "Holy Club," a group of young men dedicated to seriousness in religion and a methodical approach to Christian duties. Whitefield showed the way to the Wesleys in preaching out of doors and in traveling wherever he could to air the message of salvation. He visited Georgia briefly in 1738 to aid in the founding of an orphanage. When he returned to the colonies in 1739, his reputation as a dramatic preacher went before him. His visit became a sensation, especially when it culminated in a preaching tour of New England during the fall of 1740 when Whitefield addressed crowds of up to eight thousand people nearly every day for over a month. This tour, one of the most remarkable episodes in the history of American Christianity, was the key event in New England's Great Awakening. Whitefield returned often to the American colonies, where in 1770 he died as he had wished, in the midst of yet another preaching tour.

Whitefield was a decided, if unscholarly, Calvinist. In 1740, in his one visit to Northampton, Massachusetts, he moved Jonathan Edwards to tears by the emotional and evangelistic power of his Calvinistic message. Whitefield also moved Charles Wesley to tears, but to tears of frustration at a Calvinism that was too harsh for Wesley's more Arminian views. Whitefield and John Wesley broke with each other over Calvinistic-Arminian issues in 1741, but they soon mended their differences enough to establish a peaceful truce, and at a memorial service in England after Whitefield's death, John Wesley praised his colleague as a great man of God. Whitefield was not a skilled theologian. Although he preached on the bound will, the electing power of God, and the definite atonement—all themes of traditional Calvinism—he confessed in a letter to John Wesley early in his career that "I never read anything Calvin wrote; my doctrines I had from Christ and His apostles: I was taught them of God." Whitefield did acknowledge, however, that his views had been shaped by the Reformed theology of the English Puritans.

Whitefield's greatest significance may have resided in his innovative approach to pulpit speech. Unlike the Wesleys, he was not a good organizer, so those quickened through his preaching found their own ways to Anglican or Methodist congregations in England or to Congregational, Presbyterian, and Baptist churches in America. Whitefield did, however, know how to address plain people in plain language. And he did so in a much freer context than had been customary. His appeal to the heart and to the emotional nature, though within a Calvinistic framework, and his casual approach to denominational traditions aided the move toward a more democratic and popular style of religion that would shape American Christianity after his death. Whitefield remained in his own estimation only a herald of the gospel. He devoted his entire adult life to public preaching. The fifteen thousand times that he preached in a ministry of thirty-three years remain his most enduring monument.

M. A. NOLL

See also GREAT AWAKENINGS, THE; REVIVALISM.

Bibliography. A. Belden, George Whitefield—The Awakener; A. Dallimore, George Whitefield; E. S. Gaustad, Great Awakenings in New England; S. C. Henry, George Whitefield: Wayfaring Witness; H. S. Stout, Divine Dramatist: George Whitefield and the Rise of Modern Evangelicalism; A. S. Wood, Inextinguishable Blaze: Spiritual Renewal and Advance in the Eighteenth Century.

Whitehead, Alfred North. Alfred North Whitehead created the metaphysic that underlies process theology. Born in Britain in 1861, he became a mathematician and philosopher. In 1924 Whitehead began teaching philosophy at Harvard University, there developing his impressive metaphysical system. Whitehead constructed this cosmology as an underpinning for science. He died in 1947.

Many assume that reality is composed of objects, but Whitehead posited that events (actual occasions—fleeting drops of experience), not objects, form the building blocks of reality. Everything, from God to the smallest puff of smoke, is an actual occasion participating in the cosmic process.

Whitehead, Alfred North

As a single, eternal, actual occasion, God offers a blueprint (initial aim) to each newly forming actual occasion, guiding it to achieve some value. God thus expresses creativity. But each actual occasion has its own life, choosing whether or not to incorporate the influences it feels (prehend), thus freely creating its own life. An actual occasion comes to full experience (satisfaction) and then immediately dies.

God is composed of two poles, an incomplete primordial (mental) pole and a consequent (physical) pole. God needs actual experience to complete the primordial pole. The life of each actual occasion enriches God's experience. Each is also remembered by God. God looks back to these past actual occasions as well as to abstract ideals (eternal objects) when forming initial aims for new generations of actual occasions. Since their influence lives on, actual occasions achieve objective immortality.

Since actual occasions live and die rapidly, entities like human persons are not single actual occasions, but self-sustaining societies of occasions. Humans will relate to a few other occasions. But God remembers the entire past and envisions all future occasions, weaving all reality together into a single process. Although God is incomplete, depending on the world process for the actuality of the divine being, it is God who unifies the world process.

Evangelicals say that since Whitehead's God needs the world to actualize the divine experience, his metaphysic compromises the independence of God. Further, since Whitehead allows no metaphysical exceptions, process theology struggles to develop an orthodox Christology. Whitehead's metaphysic is sophisticated and compelling to some, but it creates tensions for orthodox theology.

D. K. CLARK

See also PROCESS THEOLOGY.

Bibliography. A. N. Whitehead, Process and Reality; D. Brown, R. E. James Jr., and G. Reeves, eds., Process Philosophy and Christian Thought; J. B. Cobb Jr. and D. R. Griffin, Process Theology: An Introductory Exposition; N. L. Geisler, "Process Theology," in Tensions in Contemporary Theology, S. N. Gundry and A. F. Johnson, eds.; R. G. Gruenler, Inexhaustible God; C. Hartshorne, Divine Relativity; Logic of Perfection.

Whitsunday. See PENTECOST.

Wiley, Henry Orton (1877–1961). Wesleyan Arminian theologian. Born in Marquette, Nebraska, Wiley received an A.B. from the University of California, and his B.D., S.T.M., and S.T.D. from the Pacific School of Religion, the latter degrees over a long period of time ranging from 1909 to 1933. During those years Wiley served primarily in Nazarene educational institutions as teacher and administrator. He was dean and then president of Pasadena College (California) from 1910 to 1916, president of Northwest Nazarene College (Nampa, Idaho) from 1917 to 1926, and president of Pasadena College from 1926 until his retirement in 1949. His early years at Pasadena College were wracked by controversy over taking a more open stance against a more rigid formulation, respecting traditional Nazarene doctrines. He was able, in the end, to smooth out many of these difficulties through helping to revise the Nazarene denomination's Manual of Discipline.

Wiley as theologian is best remembered for his three-volume Christian Theology (1941), subsequently abridged in one volume as Introduction to Christian Theology (1946). This magnum opus has become a standard for evangelical Wesleyan Arminianism, in the holiness tradition. It is reflective of Richard Watson, John Miley, and especially William Burt Pope, whose three-volume Compendium of Christian Theology (1875–76) provided the structure for Wiley's own systematic theology. In Christian Theology he emphasizes the distinctive Wesleyan doctrine of entire sanctification, yet shows a new and remarkable openness to some of the newer Pentecostal emphases on the one hand and sensitivity to non-Wesleyan traditions, from Augustine on, in a constructive and irenic way, on the other.

Wiley believed that Christian theology must be based ultimately upon the Bible, which is our only authoritative source of doctrine. He also believed that because Jesus is the personal Word of God, there is an intimate connection between Christ and Scripture, concluding that the Word and the Word of God are one.

In Arminian fashion, Wiley believed that God's foreknowledge should not be identified with predestination. If it were, human freedom would be denied. He also rejected the view, now coming into vogue, that to preserve human freedom one must deny the very idea of foreknowledge. Such a view was Socinian, not Christian, and would ultimately lead to theistic finitism, as found in B. P. Bowne or E. S. Brightman, whom he almost never quotes.

There is an extended discussion of entire sanctification, which Wiley defined as "that act of God, subsequent to regeneration, by which believers are made free from original sin, or depravity, and brought into a state of entire devotion to God, and the holy obedience of love made perfect" (2:466, 67). This happens instantaneously with a baptism of the Holy Spirit. The believer then progresses on to Christian perfection, and here Wiley follows John Wesley's Plain Account of Christian Perfection very closely. Wiley makes careful distinction between voluntary transgressions of a known law, which would be sin and hence incompatible with Christian perfection, and involuntary transgressions of divine laws, which would not be sin. This allows Wiley to preserve the obvious, namely, that not even people who are “free from original sin” always do everything perfectly.

Wiley is considered by many to be the leading Wesleyan theologian of the twentieth century.

W. A. ELWELL

See also ARMINIANISM; HOLINESS MOVEMENT, AMERICAN; METHODISM; PENTECOSTALISM; PERFECTION, PERFECTIONISM; POPE, WILLIAM BURT; WATSON, RICHARD; WESLEY, JOHN; WESLEYAN TRADITION.

Bibliography. T. Langford, Practical Divinity: Theology in the Wesleyan Tradition; T. L. Smith, Called Unto Holiness, The Story of the Nazarene: The Formative Years; J. R. Tyson, “H. Orton Wiley,” in Dictionary of Christianity in America, D. G. Reid, et al., ed.; HET 113–28.

Will. The Scriptures manifest greater interest in the will of God than in the will of man. The latter is not treated in analytic fashion any more than heart or other psychological terms. Yet the material warrants consideration. The notion of inclination is expressed in the OT by ’ābā, nearly always in negative form, whereas the other leading words for will, rāṣōn and hāpēs, emphasize the element of good pleasure. In the NT the chief verbs are thelō and boulomai, which mean to wish or to will according to the demands of the context. The noun thelēma is used mainly of God. Decision or plan is the force of the rarely used boulē (Luke 23:51; Acts 5:38). To will in the sense of coming to a decision is sometimes expressed by krinō (1 Cor. 5:3). Among the more striking passages in which thelēma is used of man are Ephesians 2:3, where the word has the force of desire, and 2 Peter 1:21, where it denotes an act of the will.

Of supreme import is Luke 22:42, the Gethsemane declaration of Jesus’ submission to the Father’s will. Here is the pattern for the capitulation of the will of the believer to God. But this does not mean the adoption of an attitude of passivity, such as may be suggested by the motto: “Let go . . . let God.” It means, rather, the determination that the individual shall actively cooperate with God’s revealed purpose. The power of the flesh is so great that even in the Christian the will to do God’s will may be largely immobilized (Rom. 7:15–25). The Holy Spirit’s aid is needed (Rom. 8:4). Continued dependence on the Spirit results in the strengthening of the will so that the meeting of the divine requirement becomes more constant.

The present trend in psychology is away from the notion of will as a faculty and toward the viewpoint that it is an expression of the total self or personality. Normal life includes the capacity for making decisions, and one is responsible for one’s choices. The choice that makes all others more meaningful is commitment to Christ.

E. F. HARRISON

See also FREEDOM, FREE WILL, AND DETERMINISM; MANKIND, DOCTRINE OF; WILL OF GOD.

Bibliography. D. Müller, NIDNTT 3:1015–23; G. Schrenk TDNT 1:629–37; 3:44–62.

William of Ockham (ca. 1280–1349). Medieval English theologian. He was born in Ockham, Surrey, sometime between 1280 and 1285. His ambition was to enter the order of Friars Minor, and in 1306 he received lesser orders and began a rigorous course of study at Oxford. Ockham was deeply influenced by John Duns Scotus, also at Oxford, whose ideas were very popular during the early fourteenth century. Scotus’s theology centered on the thesis that God is omnipotent and infinite, and therefore cannot be bound by the limitations of human reason, which is finite.

Ockham’s first major work was his commentary on the Sentences of Peter Abelard. It created a sensation at Oxford. The chancellor of the university, John Lutterell, remanded selections from the commentary to the papacy at Avignon. There Ockham’s ideas were censured, and he was summoned to explain his views in person. While at Avignon, he continued to write. Of special importance were his Summa Logicae and De Sacramento Altaris.

Ockham believed himself to be a devout Christian. However, Pope John XXII found it difficult to accept the wholesale attack on Thomism that Ockhamism represented. Ockham insisted that faith and reason could never be reconciled, that reason could construct universals with regard to nature alone. Nothing about God, faith, or doctrine would be known in this way. Knowledge of God came by way of revelation and intimate personal experience.

Nevertheless, Ockham was relatively secure in spite of argument and censure until he sided with the head of his order against the pope in a debate over apostolic poverty. Michael of Cesena, the head of the Franciscan Order, attempted to return his friars to the ideals of strict poverty advocated by Francis of Assisi. He and his followers, including Ockham, were excommunicated. In 1328 they fled to the protection of the German emperor, Ludwig of Bavaria.

Ultimately it was not Ockham’s attack on Thomism and the scholastic intellectual order that forced his separation from the established church. Rather, it was his insistence on supporting a lifestyle he believed to be of true Gospel origin and which stood in harsh contrast to the extravagance and corruption of the late medieval church. Ockham’s situation was rendered untenable when John XXII declared belief in apostolic poverty heretical.

William of Ockham

Thereafter, Ockham questioned both papal and conciliar authority and seems to have concluded that individual conscience was the final test of faith. His ideas stimulated the growth of mysticism and fed the spiritual environment in which the Reformation occurred. Ockham was reconciled to the Roman Church before his death.

C. T. MARSHALL

See also NOMINALISM; THOMAS AQUINAS; THOMISM.

Bibliography. William of Ockham, Predestination, God's Foreknowledge and Future Contingents, M. Adams and N. Kretzmann, trans.; M. M. Adams, William Ockham; P. Boehner, Collected Articles on Ockham; G. Leff, William of Ockham: The Metamorphosis of Scholastic Discourse; D. Webering, Theory of Demonstration according to William Ockham.

Williams, John Rodman (b. 1918). Charismatic theologian. Williams was born in Clyde, North Carolina, on August 21, 1918. He graduated from Davidson College (A.B., 1939), Union Theological Seminary (Virginia) (B.D., 1943; Th.M., 1944), and Columbia University/Union Theological Seminary (New York) (Ph.D., 1954). He taught at Beloit College (1949–52), Austin Presbyterian Seminary (1959–72), Melodyland School of Theology (1972–85), and currently is professor of theology at Regent University. He was also a chaplain in the Marine Corps (1944–46) and pastor of First Presbyterian Church, Rockford, Illinois (1952–59). Williams's studies under Paul Tillich at Union Theological Seminary in New York resulted in Contemporary Existentialism and Christian Faith (1965), a book that left Williams dissatisfied and searching for the truth. The answer to his quest occurred in November of 1965 with a filling of the Holy Spirit: "It was 'joy unspeakable,' reality amazing, upsurge of 'heavenly language'—glory! I received my baptism in the Holy Spirit."

This experience so transformed Williams's understanding of theology and the Scripture that his professional career has dealt with little else since. He wrote Era of the Spirit (1971), Pentecostal Reality (1972), Gift of the Holy Spirit Today (1980), and a three-volume systematic theology, Renewal Theology (1988–92).

The major focus of Williams has been to speak for the contemporary charismatic revival and to clarify the work of the Holy Spirit today. In defending the charismatic revival, he points to these positive benefits: (1) the recovery of a vital and dynamic sense of the reality of the Christian faith; (2) a striking renewal of the community of believers as a fellowship (koinonia) of the Holy Spirit; (3) the manifestation of a wide range of "spiritual gifts," with parallels drawn from 1 Corinthians 12–14; (4) the experience of "baptism in the Holy Spirit," often accompanied by "tongues," as a radical spiritual renewal; (5) the reemergence of a spiritual unity that essentially transcends denominational barriers; (6) the rediscovery of a dynamic for bearing comprehensive witness to the good news of Jesus Christ; and (7) the revitalization of the eschatological perspective (CT [February 28, 1975] 9).

Regarding the work of the Holy Spirit, Williams emphasizes, along with other evangelicals, that all genuinely regenerated Christians possess the Holy Spirit; and along with Pentecostals, that a special baptism of the Holy Spirit connects his work with water baptism or confirmation. Williams's syntheses of these elements marks him out as an original thinker in charismatic circles.

W. A. ELWELL

See also CHARISMATIC MOVEMENT; HOLY SPIRIT; PENTECOSTALISM; SPIRITUAL GIFTS; TONGUES, SPEAKING IN.

Bibliography. S. M. Burgess, HET 307–20; J. R. Williams, "Profile of the Charismatic Movement," CT (February 28, 1975) 9–13.

Will of God. Scripture frequently mentions the "will" of God. Various words are used to set forth that idea. In the OT they are mainly hāpēs, rāṣôn, and 'ābā; in the NT thelō/thelēma, boulomai/boulē, and eudokia, with the meanings "to will, desire, favor, enjoy, have pleasure, counsel." Ephesians 1:5, 9, 11 are instances where the three major Greek words are used. In the introductions to his letters, Paul attributes his calling as an apostle to the will of God (1 Cor. 1:1; 2 Cor. 1:1; Eph. 1:1; Col. 1:1; 2 Tim. 1:1), and the expression is used in numerous other places to indicate God's will as the final ground of all things. Since Scripture is primarily the history of God's redemptive purpose, most allusions to the divine will refer to that purpose, but there are instances where God's will is seen as the ultimate cause of the entire created world (e.g., Rev. 4:11).

It is necessary to make distinctions within the will of God. Thus God's will may be said to be both necessary and free. It is necessary with respect to himself; it is free over against creation. God's necessary will means that he cannot deny himself but that he must act consistently with his own nature. Some things he wills necessarily; some things he cannot do (Num. 23:19; 1 Sam. 15:29; 2 Tim. 2:13; Heb. 6:18; James 1:13). God's will is not arbitrary, as the medieval theologian Duns Scotus said it is. Scotus held that God can save by an act of will alone without satisfaction for sin through atonement. Since the sovereign God has absolute freedom and power, he can do whatsoever he desires. Even the moral order, Duns Scotus said, is based on a decree that could have been altered. This view threatened the biblical picture of God, the foundation of Christian morality, and other doctrine; hence it had to be withstood in the church. Herman Bavinck gives the biblical position: “God’s will is identical with his being, his wisdom, his goodness, and with all his attributes. And it is for this reason that man’s heart and mind can rest in that will, for it is the will not of blind fate, incalculable fortune, or dark energy of nature, but of an omnipotent God and merciful Father” (Doctrine of God, 235).

God’s will is free with respect to creation. He did not have to make the world; to deny this is to slip into pantheism. Creation, preservation, and salvation are free acts of God. It can be said that whereas God had to react against sin—because of his holy nature—he did not have to save. Redemption, which culminated in the coming into the world of Jesus Christ, his suffering, and death, are acts of God that are grounded in free grace.

The will of God is also distinguished as decreative and preceptive, or hidden and revealed. God’s decreative, or hidden, will, sometimes called his secret will, is that attribute of God by which he has determined what he will do; it is known to him alone. His preceptive, or revealed, will is that attribute by which he tells us what to do. This latter is revealed in Scripture; thus, the law of God is correctly said to be an expression of God’s holy will. Deuteronomy 29:29 refers to this distinction within the will of God; Psalm 115:3; Daniel 4:17, 25, 32, 35; Romans 9:18–19; 11:33–34; and Ephesians 1:5, 9, 11 refer to his secret will; and Deuteronomy 30:14; Matthew 7:21; 12:50; John 4:34; 7:17; and Romans 10:8; 12:2 refer to his revealed will.

Another more dubious distinction within the one will of God has been called his antecedent and subsequent, or consequent, will. Some following the same pattern of reasoning have distinguished between God’s intentional, circumstantial, and ultimate will. From Tertullian until today there are those who favor this distinction because they believe that God offers sufficient saving grace to all humankind; then, after the personal decision of the creature, God adjusts his will to that decision and determines that he will save those who believe, condemn those who do not believe, and determine what else he will do under the new circumstances. In the case of misfortune, it is reasoned that God’s antecedent, or intentional, will did not encompass this, but because of the entrance of sin into the world, it is included within his circumstantial will. Because God is God, he will reach his final goal; thus, his ultimate will, or consequential will, is accomplished.

This distinction has seemed inadequate to many because it compromises the biblical picture of God Almighty in complete control of the world and of humankind as having a will that is only contingently free. While it recognizes that the awesome reality of evil runs counter to God’s intended purpose and that God permits certain things without desiring them, it fails to see that God’s will is more than a mere “willingness” and that its most usual meaning in Scripture is his good pleasure (eudokia), which is sovereignly efficacious, immutable, and identical with God’s very being.

The above may seem to suggest that God’s will is the reason for the fact of sin in the world and that therefore God can be said to be its author, whereas Scripture holds that sin is the very antithesis of his holy nature. In the face of this difficulty, some have claimed that God has only foreknowledge of future evil and that in no sense can it be said to be related to his will. Others with such Scripture as Acts 2:23; 4:28 in mind have felt constrained to confess that somehow even wickedness must be comprehended within the permissive will of God. He is the Lord, even of a world in rebellion against him, and he will accomplish his purpose.

Remember this and consider, recall it to mind, you transgressors, remember the former things of old; for I am God, and there is no other; I am God, and there is none like me, declaring the end from the beginning and from ancient times things not yet done, saying, “My counsel shall stand, and I will accomplish all my purpose,” calling a bird of prey from the east, the man of my counsel from a far country. I have spoken, and I will bring it to pass; I have purposed, and I will do it.

Isaiah 46:8–11 RSV

Whereas there is much that is obscure in the subject under consideration, with Scripture affirming that no one can plumb the depths of the counsel of God (Job 9:10; 38; Rom. 11:33), the teaching about the importance of doing God’s will and the detailed exposition of his preceptive will are crystal clear. God’s children are called to obedience. Faith, by which one is accepted of God (Rom. 3:24–28; Gal. 2:16; Heb. 11:6), means trusting in God’s promise of salvation in Christ and obedience; the rule for discipleship is “trust and obey.” That which is to be obeyed is the will of God expressed in his law. The law of God is set forth in a variety of forms in Scripture: the Ten Commandments; the Beatitudes and other teachings of Jesus; summaries given by Christ (e.g., Mark 12:30–31), Paul (e.g., Rom. 13:8–10), and John (1 John 4:7–21); other hortatory passages (e.g., Rom. 12; James 1:22–2:26; 1 Pet.); and the new commandment Jesus gave his disciples before his death (John 15:12, 14).

Although Christian duty is set forth clearly, human ability is impaired by sin so that obedience at best is imperfect and one is cast on the mercy of God. Through the Holy Spirit, however, as believers mature in faith, they have an increasing desire to give obedience and are enabled to make some small beginning in this life. Thus, however feebly, they come to be conformed to the image of Christ, whose delight it was to do the will of his Father.

Will of God

In the transition from doctrine to Christian living in the Epistle to the Romans, the apostle asks Christians by God's mercy to give themselves as a "living sacrifice, dedicated and fit for his acceptance, the worship offered by mind and heart. Adapt yourselves no longer to the pattern of this present world, but let your minds be remade and your whole nature thus transformed. Then you will be able to discern the will of God, and to know what is good, acceptable, and perfect" (Rom. 12:1–2 NEB).

M. E. OSTERHAVEN

See also PROVIDENCE OF GOD.

Bibliography. L. Berkhof, Systematic Theology; D. G. Bloesch, God the Almighty; B. W. Farley, Providence of God; G. Friesen, Decision Making and the Will of God; O. Jager, What Does God Want, Anyway?; W. G. T. Shedd, Dogmatic Theology 1; L. D. Weatherhead, Will of God; O. Weber, Foundations of Dogmatics.

Wisdom. In the OT the English word wisdom represents the translation of many Hebrew words, but by far the most common is hokmâ (150 times). More than half of these references are found in the so-called Wisdom literature (Job, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes).

Outside this Wisdom literature the word seldom refers to God or even purely "spiritual" wisdom but to human skills or abilities that may or may not be God-given. Such skills were involved in the tabernacle preparation (Exod. 28:3; 31:3, 6), in warfare (Isa. 10:13), and in ruling (Deut. 34:9; 1 Kings 2:6; Ezek. 28:4; and very frequently with reference to Solomon). Wisdom (skill) may be bad and condemned by God (2 Sam. 20:22; Isa. 29:14; 47:10; Jer. 8:9; Ezek. 28:17).

In the Wisdom literature the word often refers to a mere humanly derived knowledge (Eccles. 1:13), which brings only grief and frustration (Eccles. 2:9–11). In contrast with this human wisdom, however, there is a divine wisdom, given by God, that enables humans to lead a good and true and satisfying life. Such divine wisdom keeps the commandments of God (Prov. 4:11); is characterized by prudence (Prov. 8:12), discernment (Prov. 14:8), and humility (Prov. 10:8); and is based on the fear of the Lord (Job 28:12–28). Only God, of course, possesses this wisdom in the absolute sense (Job 12:13). It cannot be derived by human intelligence (Job 28:12–13; Eccles. 7:23). The scoffer will never find it (Prov. 14:6); but God, whose attribute it is (1 Kings 3:28; Dan. 2:20), freely gives it to those who seek it (Prov. 2:6; Eccles. 2:26).

The controversial passage in Proverbs (8:22–31) has often been interpreted as a proof of the Trinity in the OT. In its context, however, it is better taken as a personification of the divine attribute God exercised in the creation of all things and which he wishes to impart to people in order to lead them into a righteous life.

In the OT the concept of divine wisdom must not be abstracted from its practical implications for people. The truly wise person is the good person, and the truly good person is he or she who at the very beginning wisely chooses to give God his proper place in his or her life.

In the OT Apocrypha, three books—the Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus, and Baruch—are also to be included in the Wisdom literature. In postbiblical times the Jews developed this type of literature still further. Its culmination is to be found in the works of the Jewish philosopher Philo (d. A.D. 50).

In the NT the Greek word sophia occurs frequently and repeats most of the OT usages supplemented by the relation Christ bears to the divine wisdom. Wisdom is an attribute of God (Luke 11:49), the revelation of the divine will to humans (1 Cor. 2:4–7), a religious and spiritual understanding of the will of God (Matt. 13:54; James 1:5; and often ascribed to Christ in an absolute sense as perfect humanity), and the human intellectual capacity (Matt. 11:25; 12:42). There is also a proud human wisdom that spurns the divine wisdom and leads only to destruction (1 Cor. 1:19–20).

The distinctive element in NT wisdom is its identification of Jesus Christ as the wisdom of God (1 Cor. 1:24), who becomes the ultimate source of all the Christian's wisdom (1 Cor. 1:30).

Some recent christological speculation has seized upon the fact that "wisdom" (sophia) is a feminine noun in Greek and has sought to add a feminine dimension to God and even to Jesus on the basis of that. James M. Robinson writes of Jesus as "very goddess and very man." Most see this line of reasoning as highly suspect theologically and, at the very least, confusing grammatical gender with natural gender. To say Jesus embodies the wisdom of God as a quality is one thing—even Paul does this (1 Cor. 1:24); to say that wisdom is a substantive feminine divine (as semidivine) potency is quite another.

K. S. KANTZER

Bibliography. H. Conzelmann, IDBSup; J. L. Crenshaw, ed., Studies in Ancient Israelite Wisdom; J. A. Davis, Wisdom and Spirit; S. T. Davis, ed., Encountering Jesus; J. Goetzmann et al., NIDNTT 3:1023–38; W. R. Harvey-Jellie, Wisdom of God and the Word of God; M. Noth and D. W. Thomas, eds., Wisdom in Israel and in the Ancient Near East; R. R. Ruether, Sexism and God-Talk; R. L. Wilken, ed., Aspects of Wisdom in Judaism and Early Christianity.

Wisdom, Gift of. See SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

Witchcraft. In modern terminology, the term witchcraft is used of three different phenomena. The first is that of a practitioner who uses magical means to bring harm or provide benefits. Such people have been found in virtually every culture. In our culture, they range the spectrum from home-grown approaches to religions that are magically based, such as Voodoo, Santeria, and Macumba. This is the type of practice that is specifically condemned in both Old and New Testaments (Deut. 18:10; Mic. 5:12; Gal. 5:20).

Another phenomena is that of “diabolical witchcraft.” Accusations about this type of witchcraft arose in the medieval period and continue today, and they focus on a witch as a person consciously aligned with Satan. Typically female, her prototype in cultural form is exemplified in the character of the Wicked Witch of the West from the movie Wizard of Oz.

The third phenomena involves the neopaganism found in contemporary Europe and the United States, which has been largely the result of a twentieth-century revival of magical thinking. Practitioners of the neopagan revival refer to their practice as wicca and to themselves as wiccans. They sharply distinguish themselves from contemporary satanists and the medieval picture of witchcraft. Following the historiography of Margaret Murray (Witch-Cult in Western Europe, 1921), they claim that they are simply returning to the paganism that is part of the ancient European heritage. Murray’s claims are now largely discredited in academic circles, and historical scholars are skeptical that any direct link can be established.

Historically, various forms of folk magic arrived in North America with the early colonist in the 1600s. Persecution over witchcraft arose by 1648, culminating with the Salem trials in 1692. The Salem events were so shocking that even the proponents were startled. Scholars of religion have noted how the social pressures of the time were combined with a naive gullibility and theological justification to result in these accusations. As a result of the Salem excesses, intellectuals began to downplay beliefs in witchcraft as little more than superstition. For the next two hundred years witchcraft thinking and practice went largely unnoticed in the larger culture.

A witchcraft revival of sorts was seen after the turn of the twentieth century. One of the seminal thinkers associated with this modern revival is Aleister Crowley (1875–1947). Crowley renounced his Plymouth Brethren background and took on the title “the Great Beast.” He practiced and invented new pagan rituals and wrote widely. His writings formed the seed bed of the modern flowering of wiccan ideals and practices, especially as they were mutated into the writings of Gerald Gardner (1884–1964), a retired British civil servant whose writings (e.g., High Magic’s Aid, 1949) form the foundation for most popular neopagan practices today. Though gaining in popularity throughout the century, it was not until the 1960s that wiccans felt enough freedom to practice their craft publicly. By the 1970s a wide variety of neopagan groups had appeared. The feminist movement initiated several exclusively female covens, and today several female neopagans such as Starhawk provide key influence in the movement.

The possibility of a return to persecution keeps many of the practicing groups from being too open about their beliefs and practices, though many are now establishing web pages and clearly identifying themselves as wiccans. They are particularly skeptical of Christian witness to them, and great care should be taken to respect them as people when communicating the love of Christ with them. A. S. MOREAU

See also DEMON, DEMONIZATION; SATANISM.

Bibliography. M. Adler, Drawing Down the Moon; J. G. Melton and I. Poggi, Magic, Witchcraft, and Paganism in America: A Bibliography.

Witness, Witnessing. Properly, a “witness” (martyrs) is “one who testifies” (martyreō) by act or word his “testimony” (martyrion) to the truth. This act of testifying is called his “testimony” (martyria). In ancient days, as at the present, this was a legal term designating the testimony given for or against one on trial before a court of law. In Christian usage the term came to mean the testimony given by Christian witnesses to Christ and his saving power. Because such testimony often means arrest and scourging (cf. Matt. 10:18; Mark 13:9), exile (Rev. 1:9), or death (cf. Acts 22:20; Rev. 2:13; 17:6), the Greek was transliterated to form the English word “martyr,” meaning one who suffers or dies rather than give up one’s faith. However, in the NT suffering was an incidental factor in the word.

A thorough study of witnessing would necessitate a study of the whole Bible. Such words as preaching, teaching, and confessing would have to be included. Greek words (fifteen in number) stemming from “witness” (martyrs) are used over two hundred times in the NT. The most common usage is found in the Johannine writings, in which seventy-six instances are found. Acts has thirty-nine instances and the Pauline writings thirty-five.

Leaving aside those uses of the word that refer to man’s witness to man (cf. 3 John 12), God’s witness to men (cf. Acts 13:22), man’s witness against men (cf. Matt. 18:16), and miscellaneous uses (cf. John 2:25), we will consider the distinctive Christian use of the words.

First, there are those testimonies that are meant to establish the incarnation and the truth of Christianity. In John's Gospel, where this is primary, we find instances of all the main witnesses. John the Baptist "bears testimony" (martureō) to Jesus as the coming Savior of the world (John 1:7–8, 15, 32, 34; 3:26; 5:32). The works that Jesus did were a testimony that he came from the Father (John 5:36); this explains why John called the miracles "signs" (sēmeion). The OT Scriptures are a testimony to Jesus (John 5:39); this thought is behind most of the NT quotations from the OT. After the resurrection the main evidences of the truth of Christianity are the ministry of the Holy Spirit (John 15:26), the witness of the disciples to the resurrection (Acts 1:22), and the signs and wonders by which God attested the ministry of the apostles and the churches (Heb. 2:4).

Witness, Witnessing

The pattern of Christian missionary and evangelistic activity is set in the NT. Several principles emerge. (1) Witnessing is the universal obligation of all Christians (Luke 24:48; Acts 1:8). That the act of witnessing was not restricted to the apostles or ministers is shown by those references in Acts that speak of all the disciples giving testimony (cf. Acts 2:4). This is one of the most needed emphases for modern Christianity. (2) The testimony to be given centered in the facts and the meaning of the earthly ministry of Jesus (Acts 10:39–42) and his saving power (Acts 10:43). The primary witnesses were the apostles, who had personal knowledge of this ministry from its beginning (Acts 1:22). This knowledge they delivered to others who gave testimony to it also (Heb. 2:3–4). They, in turn, were to entrust this message to others who would continue to give witness to it (2 Tim. 2:2). The primary message was this Christian "tradition" (paradosis; 1 Cor. 15:1–3). (3) Christian witnesses were to be faithful without regard to their personal safety or comfort (Matt. 10:28). (4) Christian testimony was attended by the ministry of the Holy Spirit and the manifestation of God's presence and power (Heb. 2:3–4).

F. L. FISHER

See also EVANGELISM; MISSIOLOGY.

Bibliography. S. L. Brengle, Soul Winner's Secret; G. Campbell Morgan, Evangelism; R. E. Coleman, Master Plan of Evangelism; L. Drummond, Word of the Cross: A Contemporary Theology of Evangelism; L. Ford, Good News Is for Sharing; M. Green, Evangelism in the Early Church; J. Heck, ed., Art of Sharing Your Faith; R. Kolb, Speaking the Gospel Today: A Theology of Evangelism; M. McCloskey, Tell It Often—Tell It Well; R. A. Torrey, How to Bring Men to Christ.

Witness of the Holy Spirit. See INTERNAL TESTIMONY OF THE HOLY SPIRIT.

Wittenberg, Concord of (1536). An agreement on the Lord's Supper between Saxon Lutherans and southern German Protestants. Discussions had been initiated by Martin Bucer in 1529, aimed at establishing a united evangelical position, and as a result he and Luther had been drawing closer together. Briefly, the concord (or articles) declared: (1) That the Eucharist has both an earthly and a heavenly reality; thus Christ's body and blood are "truly and substantially present and presented and received" with the bread and wine. (2) That while no transubstantiation takes place, "by the sacramental union the bread is the body of Christ . . . present and truly presented." (3) The sacrament is "efficacious in the Church" and independent of the worthiness of minister or recipient.

This achieved a substantial measure of agreement; indeed, the only point unsettled was that of ubiquity. It was this that prevented the Swiss Protestants from accepting the concord. While the Zwinglians continued to insist on the symbolic interpretation of the Lord's Supper, they sought to live on cordial terms with their Lutheran brethren.

While Bucer had set himself up as honest broker between Lutherans and Swiss Zwinglians, some suggest that this success was bought at the cost of his integrity, or at least by the exercise of "evasive weakness," as he sought to explain and commend one side's views to the other. The Concord of Wittenberg is perhaps most vulnerable on two fronts: the ambiguity surrounding the word "substantial" and the somewhat disingenuous attempt by Bucer to distinguish between the unworthiness of the godless unbeliever and that of the unspiritual unbeliever.

J. D. DOUGLAS

See also BUCER, MARTIN; LORD'S SUPPER; LORD'S SUPPER, VIEWS OF.

Bibliography. D. Stone, History of the Doctrine of the Holy Eucharist.

Wolterstorff, Nicholas (b. 1932). Christian philosopher in the Dutch Reformed tradition, whose parents emigrated to the United States from the Netherlands. Educated at Calvin College and Harvard University, he was professor of philosophy at Calvin College from 1959 until 1989 when he accepted an appointment as Noah Porter Professor of Philosophical Theology at Yale Divinity School, which included service as adjunct professor in the departments of philosophy and religion at Yale University. In addition to his numerous lectureships at American universities, he was awarded the Kuyper Chair at the Free University of Amsterdam (1981) and has delivered such prestigious lectures as the Wilde Lectures at Oxford University (1993–94) and the Gifford Lectures at St. Andrews University, Scotland (1994–95).

Wolterstorff's early published work was in metaphysics. In his book On Universals (1973) he defends a position that he calls realist, though it has been argued persuasively by some critics that his position is actually a version of nominalism. This work was followed by two books on aesthetics. In Works and Worlds of Art (1980) he explores the representative capacity of art, and in Art in Action (1980) he develops a Christian philosophy of art that emphasizes the place of art in human life. His two substantial contributions to political philosophy are Until Justice and Peace Embrace (1983), his Kuyper Lectures for the Free University of Amsterdam, and Religion in the Public Square (1997), in which he debates philosopher Robert Audi on the proper role of religious conviction within the political arena.

While all of his published work is theologically significant, his contributions to epistemology and to philosophical theology are perhaps most important and influential. In his seminal work Reason within the Bounds of Religion (in two editions, 1976 and 1984), he proposes a conception of Christian scholarship that countenances a regulative role for Christian commitment. Distinctively Christian beliefs may function properly as "control beliefs" in the development and assessment of theories within the disciplines. In his essays "Can Belief in God Be Rational If It Has No Foundations?" (1983), "Migration of Theistic Arguments: From Natural Theology to Evidentialist Apologetics" (1986), and "Is Reason Enough?" (1981), he sets forth a version of religious epistemology at odds with evidentialism of any kind, including Christian natural theology. Indeed, Wolterstorff is one of the original formulators of what has come to be called "Reformed epistemology." His general epistemology is further developed in John Locke and the Ethics of Belief (1996).

In philosophical theology, three articles and one book are especially worthy of note. "God Everlasting" (1982) argues that if God is the Redeemer, then God is a God who changes and must therefore be everlasting rather than eternal; "Suffering Love" (1988) stresses "God's ability to suffer alongside his creatures"; and, "Divine Simplicity" (1991) endorses a "relational ontology" with respect to God's nature. Wolterstorff's book Divine Discourse (1995), derived from the Wilde Lectures, exploits speech act theory in philosophy to clarify the nature of divine speech.

R. D. GEIVETT

Bibliography. R. Audi and W. J. Wainwright, eds., Rationality, Religious Belief, and Moral Commitment; S. M. Cahn and D. Shatz, eds., Contemporary Philosophy of Religion; R. D. Geivett and B. Sweetman, eds., Contemporary Perspectives on Religious Epistemology; T. V. Morris, ed., Philosophy and the Christian Faith; A. Plantinga and N. Wolterstorff, eds., Faith and Rationality; J. E. Tomberlin, ed., Philosophical Perspectives, 5: Philosophy of Religion, 1991; N. Wolterstorff, "Grace that Shaped My Life," in Philosophers Who Believe, K. J. Clark, ed.

Woman, Biblical Concept of. The place of women in the family, in society, and in the church has been the object of much attention in the latter part of the twentieth century. It is important to have clear biblical moorings in an area where positions vary to an extreme degree. The Scripture provides a wholesome contrast with the oppressive attitude and practice that prevailed in biblical times in the nations surrounding the Jews and that (alas) often prevail to this day around the world.

The Creation of Woman. In the first chapter of Genesis we have an account of the creation of humanity as the climax of God's creative activity. The supreme dignity of human beings is expressed in the concept that they are created "in the image of God." This is immediately related to both male and female (Gen. 1:27). If anyone were to doubt whether the image of God terminology applies to women (perhaps by some misunderstanding of 1 Cor. 11:7), it is quite apparent from Genesis 9:6 and James 3:9 that the term applies to females as well as to males, since the sinfulness of murder or of cursing is not different whether women or men are in view.

Genesis 2:4–25 provides fuller detail concerning the precise order of events and circumstances of the creation of humanity, somewhat like a road map that has an inset with fuller details of roads in and around a city. Here it is apparent that Adam was created first (cf. 1 Cor. 11:8; 1 Tim. 2:13) and received the task of classifying and naming animals. Many of these may have been presented to him in pairs, and Adam's loneliness must have been painfully apparent to him: there was no "helper" suitable for him. It is in response to the yearning that Adam must have felt that God supernaturally created Eve as his counterpart; and when Adam saw her, he was naturally enthralled and saluted the wonderful gift of God with the well-known words: "This is now bones of my bones and flesh of my flesh" (Gen. 2:23). This account, therefore, emphasizes the fundamental unity of male and female. The very nature of Adam from the start called for a counterpart whom God graciously provided. While chronologically Eve followed Adam, in the purpose of God there appears to be an equal ultimacy for both sexes.

The creation of Eve is also the origin of the institution of monogamous marriage. The unity between husband and wife into "one flesh" is asserted in Genesis 2:24 and referred to in the NT on several occasions (Matt. 19:5; Mark 10:8; 1 Cor. 6:16; Eph. 5:31; cf. Luke 16:18). It is this unity that is the fundamental bond at the root of society. Its closeness, perennial character, and importance in humanity can scarcely be exaggerated.

Woman, Biblical Concept of

When Adam and Eve fell in disobedience and unbelief (Gen. 3), the first rift appears between them, for in answer to God's questions, Adam in a cowardly manner accuses his wife and by implication God himself: "The woman you put here with me" (Gen. 3:12, italics added). The rift that opened up at the point of the fall has tended to increase in the passing of the years and centuries and has poisoned even the beneficial institution of marriage. In the punishment meted out to Eve is the statement, "Your desire will be for your husband, and he will rule over you" (Gen. 3:16). This was a divine description of what would occur, not a mandate that obedient servants of God should attempt to carry out. Subordination is not enjoined here any more than it is mandated that women should suffer a maximum of pain in childbearing, or men a maximum of discomfort and toil in earning their living. God has graciously provided means whereby even the curse of evil may be alleviated, and those who wish to carry out his will can and should as much as possible counteract the painful effects of evil. It is to be noted also that the promise of a redeemer through a descendant of Eve precedes the statement of the curse incurred by women at the fall (Gen. 3:15).

After the fall narrative the movement is steadily downward. Genesis 4 records the first instance of polygamy on the part of Lamech, descendant of Cain, and the context shows him to have been otherwise fearfully unprincipled. A consideration of human societies, primitive and civilized, leads us to the painful observation that women have very frequently been abused and oppressed, degraded to playthings, sexual objects, and beasts of burden. Whenever a human being is debased, civilization is damaged.

Human corruption called for the flood, that fearful judgment of God in which humanity was wiped out except for Noah and his immediate family. We note here a reaffirmation of the principles of monogamous marriage in that four men and four women were preserved in the ark by the gracious appointment of God.

The Mosaic Economy and Onward. To understand properly the significance of the provisions of the Mosaic economy, it is important to view them in contrast to the surrounding civilizations. When this is done, we note a special concern to recognize the dignity of women, the significance of motherhood, and the importance of appropriate safeguards for the welfare and security of women.

Mothers are frequently recognized along with fathers. This is the case in the fifth commandment (Exod. 20:12) and also at many points in the book of Proverbs (1:8; 6:20; 10:1) and elsewhere. Mothers have a right and an obligation to share in the trial of a rebellious child (Deut. 21:18–19). Frequently daughters are listed with sons both in the narrative and in legal prescriptions (e.g., Exod. 20:10). Merciful laws protect women in slavery (Deut. 21:10–14) and widows (e.g., Exod. 22:22; Deut. 14:29; 24:17, 19; 27:19). Sins against women are very seriously dealt with—notably, the death penalty is imposed on both parties who are found guilty of adultery (Lev. 20:10; Deut. 22:20–24). The case of David's sin with Bathsheba may also be viewed as an expression of God's sharp condemnation of adultery—this in contrast to nations surrounding Israel. When a male heir was not present in the family, daughters could be counted as heirs (Num. 27:1–11; et al.).

In the OT women could occupy exalted positions such as that of prophetess (Miriam in Exod. 15:20 and Num. 12:2; Deborah in Judg. 4:4; Huldah in 2 Chron. 34:22); of judge (Deborah shared with Barak in this office, Judg. 4–5); of queen (Athaliah in 2 Kings 11, Esther).

In spite of these notable advantages in the OT, there were some circumstances and regulations that seemed to be detrimental to women. In the first place, women did not, as men did, receive in their body the sign of the covenant (circumcision). They were surely encompassed in God's covenant, but their participation in it was not physically signified in the same intensive way. No women were admitted to the priesthood, perhaps because in surrounding nations the presence of priestesses was almost invariably tied up with immorality, but undoubtedly women felt somewhat disenfranchised by this exclusion. Leviticus 12 provides regulations for purification after childbirth. Perhaps the suggestion that there is impurity connected with birth may be due to the bleeding during and after the delivery. A period of thirty-three days was assigned in connection with the birth of a boy and sixty-six days in connection with the birth of a girl. This also might appear discriminatory. Unquestionably, the OT society was a patriarchal society, and the word father is used in OT Scripture about five times as often as the word mother. God is also represented as a male. To do otherwise would have undoubtedly severely curtailed the understanding of his majesty, and the licentious developments in religions in which female deities are found would manifest the appropriateness of avoiding this representation in OT times.

Jewish Attitude toward Women. Outside the canon it would appear that frequently the Jewish attitude toward women was severely discriminatory. Quotations are often cited from Jewish writings that manifest a contemptuous attitude. While this at times may be exaggerated, there is nevertheless an attitude that frequently demeans women. For instance, rabbis were encouraged not to teach them and not even to speak to them. This may be epitomized in the passage "From garments cometh a moth and from a woman the iniquities of a man. For better is the iniquity of a man than a woman doing a good turn” (Sir. 42:13–14). While there are passages in Ecclesiasticus that are more appreciative of women, this may stand as a sample of the things that were sometimes said among the Jews.

Jesus and Women. The birth and infancy narratives in Matthew and Luke feature a remarkable number of women in addition to Mary, the virgin mother of our Lord. Thus, from the very start the record stresses a place for women that goes well beyond what was ordinary in Jewish life. This is made even more manifest in the three years of the public ministry of our Lord. He was willing to speak to women (as in the conversation with the Samaritan woman in John 4), to teach women (as in the ministry at the home of Martha and Mary in Luke 10:38–42), to admit women as his followers (Luke 8:2–3) in spite of the objections and suspicions that might arise.

In his teaching our Lord featured women in a number of ways. They are the central figures in some parables—e.g., the yeast (Matt. 13:33), the persistent widow (Luke 18:1–5), the ten virgins (Matt. 25:1–13), the lost drachma (Luke 15:8–10). He observed the significance of the widow’s mite (Luke 21:1–4); he pointed to the place of women in the descriptions of the times of the end (Matt. 24:19, 41).

Christ manifested a special compassion to women in distress. His ministry of healing extended to females as well as to males. In Luke 13:10–17 he was willing to affront the anger of the Jewish leaders in refusing to wait one more day to heal a woman who had been crippled for eighteen years. He called her a “daughter of Abraham.” Similarly, he manifested special graciousness to the woman who touched his garment, risking thereby to make him ceremonially unclean (Matt. 9:20–22). Yet our Lord had words of commendation for her faith. He responded to the plea of a Gentile mother who desperately craved the healing of her daughter (Matt. 15:21–28). He raised the daughter of Jairus (Matt. 9:18–26), and the other two resurrections on record are related to the women who were bereaved: the widow of Nain (Luke 7:11–17) and Martha and Mary (John 11). Jesus furthermore showed compassion to women of dubious reputation whom others would have shunned (Luke 7:36–50, and possibly the incident of the adulterous woman, if indeed John 8:1–11 belongs to the text or at least represents an authentic incident).

Jesus safeguarded the rights of women in a remarkable way in his instructions on marriage and divorce (Matt. 5:27–32; 19:3–9).

After the resurrection our Lord first appeared to women and made them the bearers of the good news even to the apostles (Matt. 28:8–10; cf. John 20:14–16).

It is true that our Lord appointed only males as his apostles, but this does not necessarily represent a discrimination, since the ministry of the apostles needed to be readily received and for that purpose the attitude of some of those to whom it would be addressed needed to be considered. Jesus used extensively the “Father language” in his teaching, but once again this does not imply any contempt for motherhood. In its totality the attitude of our Lord was revolutionary even though the primary point of his ministry does not appear to have been to precipitate a revolution in this area. Women who aspire to a greater fulfillment of their own humanity and those who sympathize with them in this yearning can hardly look for a better ally than Jesus.

Women in the Early Church. The broadening brought about by Jesus’ attitude is reflected at many levels in the early church. Mary the mother of Jesus is listed among those who worshiped in the upper room (Acts 1:14). Baptism—the sign and seal of the covenant of grace—is now administered to women as well as to men (Acts 8:12; 16:15). Women may perform the ministry of prophecy (Acts 2:18; 21:9; 1 Cor. 11:5). Widows who were often eking out a miserable existence in society are now recognized in the church, almost to the point of having a special office (1 Tim. 5:2–16). The apostle Paul was surrounded by women coworkers. In Romans 16 it would appear that ten of the twenty-nine persons mentioned are women. The way in which Paul characterizes the women that he lists here is also interesting, for a number of them are presented in the same terms as his male collaborators—Timothy, Apollos, Epaphras, Titus. The verb “worked very hard” (16:6, 12) is used of ministerial service. Phoebe is called a deacon and one who presides. Priscilla is associated with her husband, Aquila, here as well as in the book of Acts (Acts 18:18–19, 26). This whole approach is climaxed by Paul’s great declaration that in Christ “there is neither male nor female” (Gal. 3:28). In 1 Peter 2, Christians of both sexes are represented as “living stones . . . built into a spiritual house to be a holy priesthood,” and in the book of Revelation, Christians in general are presented as “a kingdom and priests” (Rev. 1:6; 5:10). Thus, with respect to our position in Christ, the NT obliterates any distinction of rank between male and female.

Passages Articulating Distinction. In the light of these practices and specific texts, certain passages that appear to enjoin some distinctions must be considered.

1 Corinthians 7. In this passage the apostle deals with the Christian attitude toward marriage, and he seems to refer to this issue as if the decisions were always the prerogative of the males, whether husbands or fathers of the women to be married. This indeed may be in conformity with the prevailing usage of the time, but it does not constitute a mandate. What needs to be carefully observed is the complete mutuality in the marital relationship emphasized here, which is stunning when considered against the Greek background of the Corinthians (1 Cor. 7:2–5, 10–11, 15–16).

Woman, Biblical Concept of

1 Corinthians 11:3–16. The necessity of decent attire for women and the importance of retaining a sense of submission related to a woman's position in the home is here emphasized. Again we notice a special emphasis of Paul to balance his statements (11:11–12) lest women's rights might be considered abridged by what he has said. It is also noteworthy that this passage emphasizes that women may pray and prophesy in public (11:5, 13).

1 Corinthians 14:33–36. This passage has often been construed as forbidding a woman to speak in the public gatherings of the church. This understanding would put the passage in direct contradiction with 11:5, 13. Taken strictly it would also prevent women from sharing in the congregational singing. This makes a different interpretation imperative. One could perceive that what Paul is forbidding is a kind of disruptive babbling and questioning that would interfere with a worshipful attitude in the church. Questions must be asked at home, not during the service. The reason that women rather than men are mentioned here may be due to the fact that in Corinth women were the primary disturbers. Obviously the injunction would apply to males as well as to females if a worshipful atmosphere is to be maintained.

Ephesians 5:22–33. This has often been considered to be disparaging to women because submission is enjoined by the apostle upon the wives. However, it is preceded by a commandment for general submission (5:21). That which applies to the wives is only a particular case of the basic principle. The context is the home and carries no implication of roles in society, in the church, or in other relationships that do not affect the home. This is obvious in connection with the other two types of relationships that Paul considers: children and parents, slaves and masters. The submission enjoined at the home level in these relationships manifestly does not bear an implication for church offices or society. It is not a violation of God's order when a son has a higher army rank than his father, a higher place in a corporation, or a pastoral office in a church in which his parents are members. Similarly, the submission required of wives in Ephesians 5 could not be interpreted to include anything that lies outside of the home realm. Within the home when ordinary circumstances prevail, God has given to the husbands a special responsibility for leadership. To use a modern phrase, he has put the husband in the driver's seat. This in no wise precludes the exercise of leadership by women in society and in the church.

Meanwhile, by comparing the role and the love of husbands to those of Christ, this passage places a much greater demand upon husbands than upon wives. Specifically, it is not difficult to imagine circumstances in which a wife might say, "I have obeyed the injunction of Ephesians 5; I have shown submission beyond question." Few if any husbands will be in a position to say, "I have perfectly obeyed this command. I have loved my wife as Christ loved the church." In fact, the very nature of the love of Christ is manifested in that he gave himself (John 15:13; 1 John 3:16) and took the form of a servant (John 13:1–20; Phil. 2:7). The husband's love is not one that revels in lording it over his wife, but rather one that is prepared to be subservient. This ought to make the duty of submission on the part of wives much easier to bear.

The passage does elevate marriage to unprecedented heights, for it compares the union between husband and wife to the union between Jesus Christ and the church; there is no loftier comparison that could well be presented, since here the purpose and climax of the whole redemptive plan is in view.

1 Peter 3:1–7. This passage is written in very much the same spirit as Ephesians 5. It enjoins submission for wives, but it ennoble their function in the home and commends as supreme not physical beauty, which only some may possess, but spiritual beauty that any Christian woman may exhibit by virtue of the work of God's grace in her heart. As men may rejoice in being "sons of Abraham," women may take comfort in calling themselves "daughters of Sarah," and they are described as "heirs . . . of the gracious gift of life."

1 Timothy 2:9–15. This is generally recognized as the passage that constitutes the clearest restriction on the activity of women. The context favors an interpretation of the directions given as applying to church life, although the mention of childbearing might also suggest that the reference is to life in the home and in society. Certainly the instructions concerning a woman's attire have a wider relevancy than the church context.

Here the apostle enjoins quietness and full submission and forbids teaching and usurpation of authority. The quietness in view is not spelled out, but a ready explanation of the term may well be silence, as indeed it is translated in the NIV in verse 12.

Some have suggested that the passage was not written by Paul but represents a stiffening that occurred after the death of the apostle (e.g., Swidler). This explanation is unacceptable for those who hold strongly to the canonicity of Timothy together with its assertion of Pauline authorship. Some have been so bold as to say that the author of this passage, whether Paul or any other, was simply wrong at this point (e.g., Jewett); but this is obviously in conflict with the doctrine of the truthfulness and normative character of Scripture. Still others have thought that the passage does not represent a permanent mandate but relates to a cultural situation in Ephesus, tied perhaps to the kind of disorders brought about by some women mentioned in 2 Timothy 3:6–7 (e.g., Howe). The great difficulty with this position lies in the fact that Paul builds his argument on the order of creation and (as we perceive it) on the order of the fall. It would appear that Paul's reasoning is, generally speaking, as follows: Eve was created second and she fell first; therefore, women are under some restriction. If this is the correct understanding of the passage, the question arises: What is it that Paul (and the Holy Spirit through Paul) forbids?

Perhaps one way to respond to this question may be to recognize at once some areas where the prohibition cannot be lodged: (1) Paul could not forbid mothers to teach their children, since this is enjoined in Proverbs 1:8; 6:20; 31:26; and implicitly in Deuteronomy 6:7. This would also be in conflict with the commendation given to Lois and Eunice (2 Tim. 1:5), who guided Timothy toward the faith. (2) It would appear that Paul does not refer here to the teaching profession per se, since probably a majority of all teachers have been women and have often been blessed in this function. In Paul's day quite often teachers were slaves, so the act of teaching did not involve taking undue authority. (3) It is difficult to think that Paul would disallow the religious teaching of women in situations such as the Sunday school. God has been pleased to bless this ministry immensely, which could hardly be the case if he had expressly forbid it. The suggestion that the Sunday school pupils should not be adult males might be given consideration, but it is not clearly borne by the context. (4) A similar remark might be made with respect to the religious teaching done by women in the mission field, for here again the blessing of God has been evident beyond question.

If these considerations are deemed valid, it remains to assess precisely what Paul does forbid, and if no assured results can be reached on that score, it will be important not to curtail the ministry of women that God has clearly blessed on the basis of a passage we simply do not understand too well. It is certainly unwise to "doubt in the dark what one has seen in the light."

This should be particularly emphasized here because of a number of problems that remain in the interpretation of this pericope. It is not clear, for instance, why only men are enjoined to pray (1 Tim. 2:8) when this activity surely should be open to women both at home and in the church (1 Cor. 11:5). It is not clear why the fact that Eve was deceived when Adam was not is construed to warrant a restriction on women. The person who sins with eyes open would appear to be even less reliable than one who succumbs to deception. For this reason, we may interpret the passage to refer to the order of the fall rather than a special type of failure in the fall, but this is not absolutely evident. Verse 15 furthermore has a strange shift in the number of the verb. The first verb, "women will be saved," agrees with the previous statement, "the woman . . . was deceived." But afterward a plural verb comes in somewhat unaccountably. Under no condition can we assume that here Paul speaks of salvation by child-bearing instead of salvation by faith, but precisely what he has in view may be difficult to ascertain with assurance. Since he deals with the early chapters of Genesis, it appears plausible that his reference to childbearing points to the protevangel and the entrance of our Lord into humanity through a woman, the Virgin Mary. If this be the correct view, Paul would then complete his discussion with a reminder of the dignity of women and their place in the saving economy of grace that would counterbalance a restriction previously imposed.

But what is the restriction? The present writer is unable to make an assertion here. Some inordinate assumption of authority in teaching appears to be in view, but it is not clear under what circumstances this would actually arise. When we read in 2 Timothy 3:16–17 that all Scripture is God-breathed and is useful for "teaching, rebuking, correcting and training in righteousness," we might have expected that after these descriptions of ministry Paul would use a term for "the man of God" that emphasizes distinctive maleness, but, in fact, the language he uses is that of generic humanity and applies to women as well as to men. One can hardly forget this when attempting to understand the meaning of 1 Timothy 2:9–15.

Conclusion. In view of all the above it is clear that the Scripture provides for women a place of unusual dignity and significance. It never deems the activities in which primarily women are engaged, such as functioning as wife, home builder, mother, educator of children. To engage in these notable activities according to Scripture is not to choose some second-best option, manifestly inferior to the pursuit of an independent career. In this respect some of the emphases of certain forms of modern feminism are doing a great disservice to a very large number of women by failing to recognize the worth and dignity of their tasks. Meanwhile, there is no scriptural reason to consider women as inferior, as too often has been done in human culture.

Created in the image of God to be man's helpmate, "not made out of his head to rule over him, nor out of his feet to be trampled upon by him, under his arm to be protected and near his heart to be beloved" (Matthew Henry), woman has a glorious place and destiny in God's purpose.

Woman, Biblical Concept of

Although encompassed in the ruin of the fall, she is the object of God's compassion and grace. It is through a woman, the Virgin Mary, that the Lord Jesus Christ made his entrance into our race. Women were among the first to respond to his ministry and the first to witness his resurrection. Women, in even greater number than men, have responded to the invitation of the gospel and to the mandate of the Great Commission. In Revelation, the concluding book and climax of Scripture, the church as the body of all God's redeemed people is represented as a woman, the bride of Jesus Christ.

R. NICOLE

See also EVE; WOMEN, ORDINATION OF; WOMEN IN THE CHURCH.

Bibliography. S. B. Clark, Man and Woman in Christ; E. Deen, Bible's Legacy for Womanhood; E. Elliot, Let Me Be a Woman; M. J. Evans, Women in the Bible; S. Foh, Women and the Word of God: A Response to Biblical Feminism; P. Gundry, Heirs Together; Woman, Be Free; E. M. Howe, Women and Church Leadership; J. B. Hurley, Man and Woman in Biblical Perspective; P. K. Jewett, Man as Male and Female; G. W. Knight, New Testament Teaching on the Role Relationship of Men and Women; L. Scanzoni and N. Hardesty, All We're Meant to Be: A Biblical Approach to Women's Liberation; L. Swidler, Biblical Affirmations of Women.

Women, Ordination of. The inclusion of women in the ministerial and sacramental orders of the church. Ordination itself has multiple meanings, and the arguments for or against the inclusion of women depend heavily on the underlying theology and historical and social framework. The history and theology of the ordination of women, then, will be discussed separately, and together with the wider issue of women's spiritual leadership with which ordination is inextricably entwined.

History. Early church leaders were itinerant missionaries or heads of household assemblies. Jesus sent all his disciples out to preach and heal, and the Great Commission was given without distinctions of gender. Women were the first witnesses to the Resurrection, and the Spirit descended equally on men and women at Pentecost. The Epistles contain a few verses that have long been interpreted as precluding women's ordination, but Romans 16, for example, cites numerous examples of women in positions of leadership—Phoebe the deacon/minister, Priscilla and Aquila, coworkers with Paul, and perhaps Junia as an apostle.

This early inclusion of women in leadership has been exhaustively studied by many contemporary scholars—Schüssler Fiorenza, Torjesen, and Kroeger, among others—seeking to revise our understanding of the participation of women in the first few centuries of church life. They argue that the Greco-Roman social structures within which Christianity was nurtured explain both the ultimate shape of the church's institutions and the eventual exclusion of women. Greek culture made a sharp delineation between the male public space and the female household domain. Ideal women, in contradistinction to men, were to be passive and to exhibit virtues of obedience, silence, and humility. For a woman to flaunt her sexuality was a shame, and any public role was easily interpreted as such. Some of these sentiments are found in Paul, but when the church was organized mainly around house churches, women could and did easily take a leadership role without appearing unvirtuous. Torjesen contends that manuscript evidence both in and out of the Bible demonstrates that women held positions as ministers, missionaries, and even bishops in the very early church.

When worship moved into basilicas in the third century, the domain of the church became public. With the ever-present threat of scandal and persecution, Christian leaders became eager to stress the church's affinities with Greek social and philosophical life, and its similarities to the various fertility cults and Gnostic groups were downplayed, thus excluding women's leadership. In practice, however, many wealthy noble women used their influence to endow their favored evangelists and churches.

With Constantine's conversion, the civil and the sacred spheres were conflated, and the ordained orders were no longer the province of women. Various church decrees from this time specifically forbade women to administer the Lord's Supper and baptize, thereby suggesting that women had taken these roles. Women's marginalization was made more predictable as the church (including Augustine) adopted an interpretation of Genesis 3 that blamed women for the fall, a view that also borrowed much from the Greek and Manichean opinions of feminine gender as physical, animal-like, uncontrollable, and inferior. Hence, from the early Middle Ages women were able to forge out a leadership role only by renouncing the world and their procreative powers, and entering into monastic orders where they were nonetheless still barred from holy orders.

The hegemony of this hierarchy was first questioned by new philosophies that called into question the monopoly of the church in matters of grace and sacrament, and by the much persecuted renewal communities, including the Beguine women, abounding in the pre-Reformation period. With the Reformation the political/religious alliance of the Roman Catholic Church in the West was broken, probably sowing seeds that would later lead to emancipation of serfs, slaves, and women—whose subjections were all religiously legitimated. And the Reformation, with its emphasis on sola scriptura, was to change the contours of the later debate on ordination—focusing the arguments on the few scriptural injunctions concerning women and their place. Luther and Calvin, departing from the Greek/medieval view, both taught that marriage and sexuality were good in themselves, but that women were also secondary or subordinate to men. Luther thought that women might perhaps preach, but men had better memories and voices. Nevertheless, Luther's great discovery of the priesthood of all believers was to have long-lasting impact on the way women would conceive their roles, especially among Anabaptists, and later Baptists, who took this teaching to heart.

But the Reformation period was to be a mixed blessing for women. With the dissolution of monasteries, a separate and sacred space where women had long achieved a degree of autonomy was gone. Counter-Reformation women, like Teresa of Avila, continued the medieval tradition, but in Protestant communities the image of the virtuous woman was now transferred to roles of home and motherhood. Nevertheless, a few noble women like Argula Von Grumbach in Germany, and Marguerite of Navarre in France played key roles in the Reformation struggle. In 1666 the Quaker Margaret Fell was to write the first defense of women's ministry in English.

The revivals of the eighteenth century brought women to the fore, especially in Methodism, where John Wesley (the child of a powerful evangelist mother) recognized the call of women to preach. Even in the more Reformed Great Awakening, women were encouraged to give testimony to their experience of grace and renewal.

Many tracts defending women preachers and ministers appeared in the early nineteenth century, the arguments and exegesis borrowing much from the fight for abolition. Nancy Hastedy has described how a group of women who were to become famous as defenders of women's rights to preach and vote were educated at Oberlin under Finney from the 1840s on, including Mary Antoinette Brown, the first woman to be ordained (1853). Finney's less Calvinist theology promoted activism, and his egalitarian interpretation of Genesis encouraged women to be bold. Wesleyan-inspired holiness, with its emphasis on the possibility of perfection for men and women, was also a liberating theology. Phoebe Palmer, a leading holiness woman, was to have a long preaching ministry, and she and Catherine Booth, who with her husband started The Salvation Army, wrote two of the earliest defenses of women in the ministry (1859). Women were also among the first to volunteer for overseas missionary service, and by the end of the nineteenth century, Bible Colleges were filling up with women. But there was also strong resistance:

Baptists A. T. Robertson and John Broadus, for example, were deeply opposed to women's ordination and preaching.

The Pentecostal movement of the early twentieth century, with its emphasis on the calling and movement of the Spirit above other forms of discernment, also accepted women as leaders. But backlash against women in ministry was experienced in the United States after both wars. Fundamentalists were raising issues of inerrancy, and the passages on women received careful attention. By the 1950s few Bible schools or conservative seminaries had any women students. Many of the nineteenth-century arguments of women's ordination had been "forgotten." Moreover, as Margaret Lamberts Bendroth has detailed in her book Fundamentalism and Gender, the old stereotypes of the "evil woman" were reappearing. Preachers were keen to promote a more masculine image of Christianity, and conservative Christians, seeking a lived-out apologetic, could point to their structured and role separated marriages and churches as evidence of difference. Women preachers did not fit this worldview.

Some of the neoevangelical seminaries were more willing to open doors to women, Fuller and Gordon Conwell among them, but debate over the validity of ordaining women continued. As late as 1991, J. I. Packer, a leading evangelical theologian, argued against the ordination of women in Christianity Today. And Baptist theology has always favored women in ministry more than has Baptist custom; the 1984 Southern Baptist Convention voted heavily against women's ordination, reversing established practice.

In mainline churches the road to ordination was marked by less biblical rhetoric but nevertheless a strong resistance. Methodists and Presbyterians, however, first voted to ordain women in 1956, Lutherans in 1970, and Episcopalians in 1976. Canterbury passed a resolution allowing women's ordination into the Church of England only in 1992. Roman Catholics and the Orthodox remain the most impassable; in 1995 the pope "ended" discussion among Catholics, proclaiming that women were not ever to be priests in Roman Catholic orders.

Theological Issues. The arguments for the ordination of women and for a fully egalitarian church include a theology that centers around the universal and eschatological proclamations of Galatians 3:28 that in Christ "there is neither . . . male nor female," and those of the prophet Joel who declared that "in the last days your sons and daughters will prophesy" (Joel 2:28). Important also is an emphasis on the priesthood of all believers, a belief that Genesis declares women and men to be equally made in the image of God and to have participated equally in the fall, the witness of women in the Bible and throughout church history, and lastly an acknowledgment that women with men are equally bestowed with gifts of public speaking and leadership. Those articulating these arguments believe that men and women should serve equally in the ordained ministry or that the line between ordination and laity should be blurred, emphasizing the unique calling and ministry of each Christian.

Women, Ordination of

But the burden of proof has always been on those who assert a woman's right to ordination. Thus, the arguments against the ordination of women will be discussed further.

1. Women, it is argued, cannot be ordained because they are female and hence do not fully represent the male humanity of Christ. Similar arguments suggest that as Christ is the bridegroom of the church, those representing him must also be male. These arguments, strongest in Reformed Church, Orthodox, and high liturgical churches, suggest a mystical view of priesthood that is a carryover from Old Testament notions of the priest as mediator between God and the people. Those who argue against this position point out that Christ was also Jewish, as were his chosen twelve, but that this does not prevent male leaders of other races. Moreover, it is argued, Old Testament notions of priesthood are not legitimate in the post-New Testament period. Christ came as the one and only mediator, making all believers priests with direct access to God. Hence, the gender of the minister does not matter.

2. Similar natural law arguments cast doubt on the "rightness" and natural aptitude of women to lead and preach. Catherine Booth spoke to this issue in the nineteenth century, arguing that women preachers were among the most spiritual and gracious of their sex. These doubts have waned as more people experience women ministers, but women continue to receive more criticism of their style, voices, and appearance than do male clergy.

3. Arguments from tradition: Women should not be ordained, it is argued, because the long tradition of the church has ruled against it, the change is too drastic, and the effects are unforeseeable. Some have insisted that in changing the tradition on this point, we run the risk of upsetting the delicate balance of the sexes and hence our very civilization. Challenging this view are scholars who respond that a reexamination of the first few centuries reveals women participating equally with men. Moreover, it is increasingly understood that the subjection of women to men is a ubiquitous evil (as was slavery), not a part of the original order of creation, but the result of the fall, and is to be resisted like any other evil. And if women are indeed called by God to labor as ministers, prohibitions, however longstanding, are not neutral but oppressive in themselves.

4. The arguments for subordination: women are intended to have a role and place under men and are thus excluded from the ordained ministry. This is the most common evangelical argument against women in ministry or in favor of a limited role for women under the authority of a man; and an enormous weight of cultural, philosophical, and biblical evidence is brought to bear on this point. To the extent that we have inherited Greek gender ideals as a part of our civilization, these notions of subordination run very deep. The biblical foundation of these arguments begins with the second creation account, in which Eve was created after Adam as a helpmate, evidence that women were always intended to be under men. Subordinationists argue also that the curse on women is prescriptive rather than descriptive. With these theological assumptions already in place, the widely debated 1 Corinthians 11 passage: "the head of every woman is man, and the head of Christ is God," and associated demands for head coverings, are then interpreted as further evidence for the subordination of women.

Other scholars respond that later creation does not entail inferiority, as witnessed by Adam's place in the order—after lower animals—and the word "helpmate" is used most often of God helping people and thus does not bear connotations of subordination. Furthermore, the curse on women should be interpreted like that on men, as an evil to be resisted rather than a burden to be accepted. Against 1 Corinthians 11 it has long been argued that many much clearer biblical passages teach equality. More recently Paul's pronouncements have been interpreted within the context of the fertility cults of the time, where the bared heads of women might be interpreted as symbolizing prostitution. Some exegetes also claim that the word for "head" (kephalē) is better interpreted as "source," rather than leader.

5. The arguments on silence: Much is made of the injunction in 1 Timothy 2:12–14: "I do not permit a woman to teach or to have authority over a man; she must be silent. For Adam was formed first, then Eve. And Adam was not the one deceived; it was the woman who was deceived and became a sinner," and the 1 Corinthians 14:34–35 passage: "Women should remain silent in the churches. They are not allowed to speak. . . ." Many commentators have long considered these verses to be culturally embedded statements at odds with Paul's own practice and Galatians 3. The Greek word "speak" (laleo) in Corinthians is easily rendered "babble," and the word "silence" (sigao) bears connotations of desisting from chatter. Paul may have been seeking order in an unruly congregation. The Kroegers, in I Suffer Not a Woman, argue that the rare Greek word translated "authority" (authentēin) in 1 Timothy may be better rendered "usurping authority," and the word for "silence" here connotes peace and harmony (hesuchia). The references to Adam's priority and Eve's duplicity make sense as a refutation of the pervasive Gnostic belief in Eve as a fertility goddess, the source of all life, who cleverly outwitted the Creator and Adam. This may be Paul's way of insisting that Eve did not come first, Eve's actions were a sin against the Creator God, and women need to be in harmony with rather than usurping the authority of men. (But see contra, Women in the Church, eds. Köstenberger, Schreiner, and Baldwin.)

6. From Genesis 3, and from 1 Timothy 2, it is argued that women are more easily deceived than men. These latter verses are most readily understood as directed against the Gnostic beliefs discussed above. But this concern over deception has long restricted women (the majority in most congregations) to teaching only children or other women. Questioning this position, others have pointed out the dangers of allowing easily deceived women to teach children. And as David Scholer has noted, the implications of believing women deceived "contradict the reality of the whole of biblical teaching, church history and human experience."

Conclusion. Women, then, are entering into ordained orders, but the church is very far from consensus on this matter. When women are ordained they labor more often than men as non-stipendiaries, in small and isolated congregations. Thus, the story of women's ordination is also the story of the search for justice, and of power dynamics in the church. Christians have always experienced hierarchical power as a temptation and an ambiguous good. The challenge for the church is not just to agree on the ordination of women, but to reform hierarchical structures that have tended to divest women and laity of their priestly functions.

N. HOGGARD-CREEGAN

Bibliography. R. Bainton, Women of the Reformation; M. L. Bendroth, Fundamentalism and Gender; C. Booth, Female Ministry; J. Bristow, What Paul Really Said about Women; M. Bruce and G. E. Duffield, eds., Why Not? Priesthood and the Ministry of Women; M. Chaves, Ordaining Women: Culture and Conflict in Religious Organizations; B. Clouse and R. Clouse, eds., Women in Ministry: Four Views; J. Daniélou, Ministry of Women in the Early Church; N. Hardesty, Women Called to Witness: Your Daughters Shall Prophesy; H. W. House, Role of Women in Ministry Today; P. Jamieson, Living at the Edge; A. J. Köstenberger, T. R. Schreiner, R. and C. Clark Kroeger and S. Baldwin, eds., Women in the Church: A Fresh Analysis of 1 Timothy 2:9-15; R. and C. Clark Kroeger, I Suffer Not a Woman: Rethinking 1 Timothy 2:11-15; J. Evans Leonard, Called to Minister, Empowered to Serve; S. Marshall, ed., Women in Reformation and Counter-Reformation Europe; A. Mickelsen, Women Authority and the Bible; B. T. Roberts, Ordaining Women; R. Ruether and E. McLaughlin, eds., Women of Spirit; F. W. Schmidt Jr., Still Small Voice: Women, Ordination, and the Church; E. Schüssler Fiorenza, In Memory of Her; A. Spencer, Beyond the Curse: Women Called to Ministry; K. Torjesen, When Women Were Priests; R. A. Tucker and W. L. Liefeld, Daughters of the Church; M. Warkentin, Ordination: A Biblical-Historical View; C. Wessinger, Religious Institutions and Women's Leadership.

Women in the Church. In the Bible. The roots of the church lie in early Israel, where women occupied a high position and had a strong influence both in the home and in the believing community. The leadership of Miriam (Exod. 15:20-21) is viewed as a special gift to Israel (Mic. 6:4). Deborah served as judge, general, and prophetess (Judg. 4-5), while Hulda the prophetess declared an old scroll to be indeed the Word of God and called the nation to a repentance that resulted in a great revival (2 Kings 22:8-20; 2 Chron. 34:14-28). "Wise women" played a considerable role in the moral and political life of Israel (2 Sam. 14:1-20; 20:14-22; Prov. 14:1), and female cult officials served in both the tabernacle and the temple (Exod. 38:8; 1 Chron. 25:5-6; Ezra 2:65; Neh. 7:67; 10:39; Ps. 68:24-25; Luke 2:36-37). Female prophets functioned throughout the history of Israel (Exod. 15:20; Neh. 6:14; Isa. 8:3; Ezek. 13:17-23; Luke 2:36-37), and the courage and fidelity of Esther caused many to convert to the Jewish faith in the postexilic period (Esth. 8:17).

Attitudes toward women, and concomitantly their position, sank in later Judaism as it came into contact with Hellenistic misogyny. Although one may point to the heroism of Judith and the highly able leadership of Queen Salome in the intertestamental period, women were frequently denigrated and forbidden the study of Scripture. By contrast, Jesus accepted women as both students and disciples and demonstrated a rare sympathy for their interests and concerns.

The first women in the church were the group of female followers who were attached to Jesus and traveled about with him (Matt. 27:55-56; Mark 15:40-41; Luke 8:1-3). We are not told that they were sent out on separate missions but rather that theirs was a significant ministry in the presence of Jesus. Some of the women are named and appear to form a cohesive and purposeful unit (Luke 8:2; Acts 1:13-14). Luke notes that these women, along with others, followed Jesus to Jerusalem, the cross, and the tomb (23:27, 49, 55-56). After the body was interred, they maintained watch over it and noted the exact location (Matt. 27:59-61; Mark 15:47). On Easter morning the women were instructed by an angel to proclaim the resurrection, a task for which Christ had prepared them (Luke 24:6-8). After the departure of Peter and John, Jesus showed himself first to Mary Magdalene, then to the other women, with the specific direction that they convey the news to the male disciples, especially Peter. Thus, women are attested as the primary witnesses of the birth, crucifixion, burial, and resurrection of Jesus Christ. This witness, together with their confession of him as Messiah and Son of God (John 4:27–42; 11:27), is biblical testimony essential to the formulation of the church's basic beliefs.

Women in the Church

Women were significantly present in the upper room at the choice of Matthias (Acts 1:13–14). On the day of Pentecost the Holy Spirit fell equally upon men and women (Acts 2:17–18), and women had a pronounced role in the ministry of the early church (Acts 9:36–43; 21:8–9; Rom. 16). Churches are identified as meeting in the homes of women, who apparently gave them leadership (Acts 12:12; 16:40; Rom. 16:3–5; 1 Cor. 1:11; 16:19; Col. 4:15; 2 John). Euodia and Syntyche are mentioned as colleagues of the apostle Paul (Phil. 4:2–3), as is Priscilla. She enjoyed an outstanding ministry along with her husband, Aquila, whose name usually stands second (Acts 18:1–4, 18–28; Rom. 16:3–4; 1 Cor. 16:19; 2 Tim. 4:19). Some early fathers understood Junia (Rom. 16:7 KJV) to be a female apostle, although modern translators frequently give the masculine “Junias,” a name unattested in the ancient world. There was a strong tradition of Thecla as apostle and associate of Paul, and there is indeed evidence for her life and ministry.

In Church History. Tertullian wrote that there were four orders of female church officers, all of whom are mentioned in the Bible. These appear to be female deacons, virgins, widows, and elders. Some of these women were considered clerics, given ecclesial authority, and seated with the other clergy (Testament of the Lord 1.23). The NT speaks twice of women deacons (Rom. 16:1–2; 1 Tim. 3:11), and Pliny reports two ministrae, or deaconesses, as leaders of a Christian community (Epistles 10.96, 8). The ordination service of deaconesses is still preserved in the Apostolic Constitutions (VIII.19–20). Women elders are mentioned in 1 Timothy 5:2 and Titus 2:3, where they must be hieroprepeis, “worthy of holy office.” The title “eldress” was applied by the early church to those in the order of widows, whose qualifications are given in 1 Timothy 5:5–10. Early catacomb paintings show women in the authoritative stance of a bishop, conferring blessing on Christians of both sexes. Two frescoes appear to show women serving Communion. Beginning about 350 the following prohibitions were issued against women's activities: Council of Laodicea—serving as priests or presiding over churches, establishing presbyteresses or presidents in the churches, approaching the altar; Fourth Synod of Carthage—teaching men or baptizing; First Council of Orange and the councils of Nimes, Epaons, and Orleans—the ordination of deaconesses. These prohibitions provide indication of the previous existence of such offices for women.

Although deprived of official status, women continued to serve the church in many ways. The responsible behavior of Christian wives and mothers won from the pagan Libanius the exclamation, “What women these Christians have!” Jerome once referred a hermeneutical dispute to the great Bible scholar Marcella; and the empress Pulcheria, a prime mover in the Council of Chalcedon, was declared by Pope Leo I to be the major defender of orthodoxy against both Nestorianism and Eutychianism. Women exerted tremendous influence in the Reformation, Counter-Reformation, and Great Awakenings. In the American church they were in the forefront of evangelism and of the Sunday school, missionary, Holiness, and Pentecostal movements. The first woman to be ordained by a recognized denomination was Antoinette Brown (1853), a convert of Charles Finney. The ordination of women still remains a controversial issue in evangelical churches.

In Evangelical Thought. Within Protestant evangelicalism there are significantly differing views as to the proper activities, role, and status of women in the church. Perhaps three major stances may be discerned. The first embraces the traditional thinking of the last millennium and a half in assigning women a subordinate status. Proponents argue that the priority of man's creation gives him a superiority over woman (1 Cor. 11:8–9; 1 Tim. 2:13). As she led him into sin, God has ordained that he should rule rather than she (Gen. 3:16; 1 Tim. 2:14). Because of Eve's misdemeanor the earlier church fathers, most notably Tertullian, had concluded that women were weak, degraded, depraved, and an obstacle to the spiritual development of men. Although considerably modified, the doctrine of woman's inferiority has been eloquently expressed by modern theologians as well. Women are viewed as less capable of good judgment, while decision making and leadership in ministry become male prerogatives. The prohibition against women teaching or exercising authority over men is strongly emphasized (1 Tim. 2:11–14), as is the command of women to be silent in the congregation (1 Cor. 14:34–35; 1 Tim. 2:12).

Some stress the subordination of women as following implicitly from the subordination of Christ to the Father and draw on the headship concepts of 1 Corinthians 11:3–15. Others accord women a full equality of being but an inferiority of status both in the family and in the church. The subjection of wife to husband in Christian marriage (Eph. 5:22; Col. 3:18; 1 Pet. 3:1) is transposed to general male-female relationships in the church. Women who have no husbands are encouraged to seek out a male figure, such as a father or pastor, who may serve as intermediary in her access to God. Certain evangelicals hold that the submission of wife to husband must extend even to obedience if he commands her to perform a sinful act and that the guilt is his rather than hers.

In contradiction, there has grown up a so-called biblical feminism. Although the roots of this stance are older than the last century, D. L. Moody, A. J. Gordon, C. G. Finney, and J. Blanchard all found the equality of women to be a biblical concept and urged full utilization of women in the church. Phoebe Palmer, an associate evangelist with D. L. Moody and herself credited with the conversion of 25,000 souls, declared the church to be a sort of potter's field in which the talents of women are buried. Although largely ignored, much scholarship was expended and an extensive literature developed. One contemporary group lays great stress on Genesis 1:27; 1 Corinthians 11:11–12; and above all on Galatians 3:28 in its affirmation of women as the equals of men in Jesus Christ. These universal statements, it is maintained, supersede the narrower dictates of Paul, who is sometimes viewed as a victim of rabbinic prejudice and somewhat misguided. The contradictory nature of Paul's statements is explored and a distinction made between those that are universally normative and those that are culturally relative. Just as certain statements regarding slavery are no longer applicable today, so certain statements regarding women better served another age. God is affirmed as no respecter of persons (Acts 10:34) and as having maternal aspects (Deut. 32:18; Ps. 131:2–3; Isa. 42:14; 49:15; 66:9–13; Matt. 23:37). This maternal and feminine image allows women as well as men to serve in the gospel ministry. For some, theological justification for ordination rests upon the leadership roles of women in both the OT and the NT. Egalitarian marriage is set forth as a biblical and humanitarian principle involving mutual submission (Eph. 5:21). Allied in some respects with liberation theology, this group has produced a radically new theology that is highly controversial in the evangelical world.

A more irenic school of thought, seeking to uphold both the authority of Scripture and the equality of women within the church, holds that the "difficult" passages are no less inspired by God than 1 Corinthians 11:11–12 and Galatians 3:28. Adherents demand that texts be studied in their linguistic, religious, historical, social, and geographical setting. The Greek word for "head," for instance, unlike its English and Hebrew counterparts, did not convey the meaning of "chief" or "boss." Thus, the concept of "head" in Ephesians 5:23 and 1 Corinthians 11:3 must be studied in the light of its accepted Greek meanings as integrating source (Eph. 4:15–16; Col. 2:19), topmost bodily member (Eph. 1:22–23), interdependent with the body (1 Cor. 12:21; Eph. 5:23–30), and the part that is usually born first (Col. 1:15–18). Genesis 3:16 is viewed as a divine prediction of sinful dominance (Matt. 20:25–28; Mark 10:42–45; Luke 22:24–27) rather than a divine decree and is countered with Jeremiah 31:22, 31–34 in the new covenant.

Research into the cult patterns of ancient women has a high priority in an understanding of Paul as missionary to the Gentiles. The ceremonial shouts of women, obligatory in certain pagan practices, contained no meaning but aroused considerable religious awe in the hearers. These sacred cries are attested in Corinth; thus it is understandable that the apostle, in seeking to curtail meaningless noise and confusion during worship (1 Cor. 14), would ask women to refrain from such utterances while allowing them to pray and prophesy meaningfully (1 Cor. 11:5). The possibility of alternative translations of 1 Timothy 2:12 is raised, especially since authentein, generally rendered "to bear rule," had several more common meanings in the NT era. Proponents suggest that it may be a directive against women involved in false teaching (1 Tim. 4:7; 5:15; 2 Tim. 3:5–7; Rev. 2:20). The entire passage (1 Tim. 2:5–15) must be studied in the wider context of the Pastoral Epistles with their concern over heretical opposition to the truth and need for suppression of false teachers (1 Tim. 1:3–4; Titus 1:10–11). In particular there is evidence that there may have been a distortion of the Adam and Eve story (2 Cor. 11:2–4, 13–15; 1 Tim. 1:4; 2 Tim. 4:4; Titus 1:14) similar to Gnostic theologies that portrayed Eve as a celestial power and as the one who brought life and light to Adam through the serpent's gift of knowledge. First Timothy 2:11–15 may then be a refutation of such doctrines rather than a rationale for the restriction of women.

In any event, the proper utilization of the talents of gifted Christian women remains a pressing contemporary issue and one that requires much thought, study, and reflection.

R. C. KROEGER AND C. C. KROEGER

See also WOMAN, BIBLICAL CONCEPT OF; WOMEN, ORDINATION OF.

Bibliography. S. Bacchiocchi, Women in the Church; R. H. Bainton, Women of the Reformation; L. Belleville, Women Leaders and the Church; J. and R. Boldrey, Chauvinist or Feminist?; Paul's View of Women; K. Bushnell, God's Word to Women; E. Clark, Jerome, Chrysostom and Friends; J. Daniélou, Ministry of Women in the Early Church; E. Deen, Great Women of the Christian Faith; V. B. Demarest, Sex and Spirit: God, Woman, and Ministry; R. Gryson, Ministry of Women in the Early Church; N. A. Hardesty, Great Women of Faith; G. E. Harkness, Women in Church and Society: A Historical and Theological Inquiry; A. R. Hay, Woman's Ministry in Church and Home; V. Hearn, ed., Our Struggle to Serve; R. Hestenes and L. Curley, eds., Women at the Crossroads; M. McKenna, Women in the Church Role and Renewal; L. Mercadante, From Hierarchy to Equality: I Corinthians 11:2–16; V. Mollenkott, Women, Men, and the Bible; J. Morris, Lady Was a Bishop; A. Oepke, TDNT 1:776–89; D. R. Pape, In Search of God's Ideal Woman; J. Penn-Lewis, Magna Charta of Woman; R. C. Prohl, Woman in the Church; D. Sayers, Are Women Human?; L. A. Starr, Bible Status of Woman; K. Stendahl, Bible and the Role of Women; L. Swidler, "Jesus Was a Feminist," CW 212:177-83; Women in Judaism; G. H. Tavad, Woman in Christian Tradition; B. Trude, Woman More Precious Than Jewels; E. Verdesi, In but Still Out; C. J. Vos, Woman in Old Testament Worship; P. Wilson-Kastner et al., Lost Tradition: Women Writers of the Early Church; F. Zerbst, Office of Woman in the Church.

Women in the Church

Wonder. See MIRACLE.

Woolman, John (1720-1772). Quaker social reformer and mystic; one of the most effective advocates for peace and the abolition of slavery in colonial America. Woolman's family helped settle Quaker West Jersey. Here John Woolman earned his living as a tailor, and from this same location he embarked after 1746 on a series of tours to argue against slaveholding and war. His diplomacy was mild but firm. He retained compassion for the slaver as well as for the slave. But he would brook no compromise with the evils of the slave system, insisting, for example, on paying slaves when they performed personal services for him or eventually rejecting food they grew or cloth they dyed. His antislavery efforts had an impact in Rhode Island, where wealthy Quaker shipowners had long taken part in the slave traffic, but especially in Pennsylvania, where Woolman's resolutions against slaves (first introduced in 1758) led to the final disavowal of slavery by the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting in 1776. Woolman's Considerations on the Keeping of Negroes, written in two sections in 1754 and 1762, contended that slavery affronted common humanity and the "inner light of Christ" that had been placed in all people.

Woolman also was influential in Quaker withdrawal from Pennsylvania politics during the French and Indian War (756-63). Under pressure from Woolman and other fervent Quakers in England and America, most Quaker members of the Pennsylvania legislature resigned their seats rather than compromise their "peace testimony" through the promotion of war with the French and their Indian allies. Woolman published also a Plea for the Poor, which urged those who had enough of the world's goods to care for those who did not.

Woolman's mystical piety represented an important development in Quaker thought as well as in Quaker social action. His Journal reveals one who saw physical life as an intimate reflection of the spiritual world and who devoutly revered the work of God in both nature and other humans. He was a man of rare spiritual sensitivity who, without fanfare or posturing, exerted more of an influence on public moral values, at least among the Quakers, than many of the would-be reformers in America during the Revolutionary period.

M. A. NOLL

See also FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF.

Bibliography. P. P. Moulton, ed., Journal and Major Essays of John Woolman; E. H. Cady, John Woolman; R. Jones, Quakers in the American Colonies; P. Rosenblatt, John Woolman; W. T. Shore, John Woolman: His Life and Our Times; J. Whitney, John Woolman, American Quaker.

Word, Word of God, Word of the Lord. Of the three Hebrew terms used in the OT to express God's communications, that of peh ("mouth"), generally translated "word" in these contexts, is the most vivid. It specifies the source of the declarations as coming directly from God himself. Both Moses (Num. 3:16, 51; cf. Josh. 22:9) and Joshua (Josh. 19:50) received instructions from the mouth of the Lord for their people. They consequently declared their word to be his.

Every instance of the term 'imrâ, including the occurrence of its one plural form (Ps. 12:6), has God's word in view, while the term itself focuses on the act of speech as such. Only four of its twenty-seven references are outside the Psalms (Deut. 33:4; 2 Sam. 22:31; Prov. 30:5; Isa. 5:24, which in the NEB appears between vv. 4 and 5 of ch. 10). As the speech of God his word is "tried" (Ps. 18:30 KJV), or "proves true" (RSV, cf. 2 Sam. 22:31; Pss. 105:19; 119:140), having "stood the test" (Prov. 30:5 NEB). Such a word laid up in the heart is a sure safeguard against sinning (Ps. 119:11).

The word dābār is used 394 times to characterize a communication as the word "of God" or "of the Lord." Here the emphasis falls upon the matter of the utterance, on the what is said. As dābār, God's word is the virtual concrete expression of his personality. God is what he says. Therefore did the Lord reveal himself to Samuel through "his word" (1 Sam. 3:21). As the expression of his being and character, the word of the Lord is the supreme means by which God makes himself known to his creatures. By such a word the world was brought into existence and history set in motion. This dābār of the Lord can be trusted (Ps. 119:42) as the source of life (Ps. 119:25), light (Ps. 119:105), and understanding (Ps. 119:169).

In the LXX the words rhēma and logos are used to translate the Hebrew dābār. In the familiar phrase "the word of the LORD came" it is rendered logos in 2 Samuel 24:11; 1 Kings 6:11; et al., and rhēma in 1 Samuel 15:10; 2 Samuel 7:4; 1 Kings 17:8, et al. In the prophetic books the LXX translators favor logos to denote God's message to the prophets for proclamation to the people.

The NT uses both rhēma and logos with apparent indifference to any significant nuance of meaning. In addition to the word “of God” and “of the Lord” there is that “of Jesus” (Matt. 26:75; cf. John 2:22; 4:50; et al.) and “of Christ” (Col. 3:16; cf. John 5:24; 17:17; et al.). One and the same, then, with “the word of God” and “the word of the Lord” is the “word”—the logos—of Jesus Christ; so are his words (rhēmata) spirit and life (John 6:63).

In three contexts in the NT the designation “the word of God” appears. The preached word of the gospel is spoken of in such terms. There was a time when the NT as we now have it was not in existence. But “the word of God” was there—the saving message of Christ. The first disciples spoke “the word of God” with boldness (Acts 4:31) and so “the word of God” increased (Acts 6:7; cf. 19:20). At Salamis, Paul and Barnabas “proclaimed the word of God in the synagogues” (Acts 13:5), which “word of God” Sergius Paulus desired to hear (v. 7). This “good word of God” (Heb. 6:5 κτν) is “the word of truth” (Col. 1:5) and is consequently God’s gospel (Rom. 1:1; 15:16; 1 Thess. 2:2, 8, 9; 1 Pet. 4:17; cf. Acts 20:24; 1 Tim. 1:11) and Christ’s (Mark 1:1; Rom. 15:19; 2 Cor. 2:12; et al.). It is the logos of promise (Rom. 9:9) and of wisdom and knowledge (1 Cor. 12:8), therefore the rhēma of faith (Rom. 10:8). By this “living and enduring” logos of God man is born anew (1 Pet. 1:23) and by this rhēma of God man lives (Phil. 2:16; cf. Matt. 4:4; John 6:63). Such a “word of God” is the “word of the good news” of the apostolic gospel (1 Pet. 1:25), being preeminently the word of reconciliation (2 Cor. 5:19) and the message of salvation (Acts 13:26), which find their summary and dynamic in “the message of the cross” (1 Cor. 1:18).

The word of God proclaimed orally by its first witnesses is one with the word finally embodied in written form in the NT.

In Revelation 19:13 the exalted Christ is specifically designated “the Word of God.” The title naturally associates itself with the same author’s logos doctrine either by way of an approach to it or as an application of it. In John 1:1–2 the term logos—Word—is used in an absolute sense of Christ as the incarnate Son of God. In the person of Christ, John thus affirms, God’s essential being became actual, comprehensive, and historical. As the Word—logos—Christ was among humankind as the incarnate speech of God; and as such he communicates eternal life to those who receive him. John declares that this Word had an existence beyond the limits of time. He stresses both his separate personality—“the Word was with [pros, ‘toward’] God” in the intimacy of an eternal relationship—and his true deity—“the Word was God” in the actuality of his essential nature. Precisely because the Word was personally distinct from God and yet truly God, he made God known.

Throughout John’s prologue, then, the logos is set forth as the personal self-disclosure of God in his total being. Thus is the Word more than divine reason. In Jesus Christ, the Word made flesh, there is a real incarnation of God, coming forth in human actuality of the innermost nature of eternal deity. Hence Jesus Christ is the perfect medium of God’s self-revelation. To speak of him as “the Word” is consequently to affirm more about him than that he is ho legōn, “the he who speaks.” He was not just a teacher sent from God. As Logos Jesus Christ is the Son of God in his everlasting relationship with his divine Father and in his continued function of divine revealer.

The source of John’s Word-logos doctrine has been much discussed. Seeing that John was a Palestinian Jew, some regard the OT as its source, since the idea of God’s self-manifestation by means of an intermediary agent, more or less personal and blending with the divine personality, was clearly present in Jewish thought. The “wisdom” of Proverbs 8, for example, is given personal attributes and at the same time wears the aspect of divinity. Others see John’s logos doctrine heavily indebted to Philo, the Jewish Alexandrian philosopher, who in his turn was much influenced by Plato. From the time of Heraclitus, a logos doctrine was developed in Greek thought with a view to explaining how the deity could relate to the world, but the Greek logos was generally understood as impersonal reason.

It was with this understanding that it was introduced into early Christian thinking by the Greek apologists of the second century. Thus did Theophilus and Athenagoras speak of the logos as immanent in God, but uttered, or “belched forth,” prior to creation to become the agent of the creative process. Justin Martyr likewise refers to Jesus the Christ “being of old the Logos, . . . now by the will of God having become man for the human race.” Among the Alexandrians the logos doctrine reached its ascendancy. According to Origen the Logos-Word had its being eternally in God but was brought forth by the Father’s will to an existence as Son of God, thereby to accomplish God’s purpose of redemption for the world. Seen in retrospect, however, the use made of logology by the apologists and Alexandrians was a desperate expedient, which in the course of christological development was to result in the unacceptable notion that the logos-Son was somehow caused by God. In this way the filial subordinationism of the NT was substituted for that of the Son’s essential inferiority to God the Father, being at best for Origen “a second God,” and at worst “a thing made.” Such a word-logos Christology failed to secure what the dictates of biblical revelation require—the hypostatic preexistence of Christ and the reality of his eternal and essential divine personhood.

In several NT passages “the word of God” is used to designate in principle the written Scriptures themselves. Our Lord authenticated this use by declaring that Scripture as the word of God cannot be broken (John 10:35). It is “the sure word of prophecy” of which Peter speaks (2 Pet. 1:19 KJV) because it results from God’s outbreathing (2 Tim. 3:16; cf. 2 Pet. 1:21).

By characterizing the Scriptures of the OT as the word of God, Jesus incidentally yet specifically affirmed the identity: what is Scripture is the word of God, and vice versa. Into this category the canonical writings of the NT eventually came. Its writers frequently allude to the divine revelation preserved in the OT as the word of God, and they regarded the message of the gospel as the true meaning and fulfillment of that former testament. They had learned from their Lord himself that Moses and all the prophets wrote of him (Luke 24:27). The fathers of the early church and the Reformers of the later church were at one in affirming faith in the biblical writings as the word of God. Augustine of Hippo states the general conviction of the former. “What is the Bible else but a letter of God Almighty addressed to his creatures, in which letter we hear the voice of God, and behold the heart of our Heavenly Father?” The Reformation brought to a focus once again this valuation of the Bible as the word of God. Luther’s identity of Holy Scripture with the word of God is generally assumed and sometimes explicitly stated. In fact, in the opening words of his Table Talks he declares, “That the Bible is God’s Word and book I prove thus . . .” Elsewhere he asks rhetorically, “Where do we find God’s word except in the Scriptures?” to require the reply, “Nowhere.” For Calvin, too, the Bible is specifically God’s word, at once sure and true. The Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England state that the Bible is “God’s word written” (XX), while the Westminster Confession later affirms that since God is the author of Scripture, “it ought to be received because it is the Word of God.” The Longer Catechism poses the question, “What is the word of God?” The answer is explicit: “The Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament are the Word of God, the only rule of faith and obedience.” For the Puritans the same sure faith in Scripture was constant. And from their evangelical successors there have been renewed affirmations of confidence in the Bible as truly and fully the word of God. To speak of the Scriptures is indeed to use a term that etymologically specifies the word of God in written form. Without the writing there would be no Scriptures, and therefore no word of God. The Bible is God’s word written.

It is, however, this identification of Scripture as a written form with the word of God that has been called into question in recent times. Some contend that the Bible merely contains the word of God, and then only insofar as it speaks inspiringly to the individual human soul. To regard the Bible in its full extent as the word of God would be to posit for its composition the sovereign action of the Holy Spirit. But it is precisely this action of the Spirit on the writers of the Scriptures that they themselves claim and that requires for their production the designation “the word of God.”

Others consider the biblical writings to be at most a witness to God’s revelation disclosed in the moment of the divine encounter. Those passages in the Bible that “find me” may be regarded as the word of God for me; but objectively, and in themselves, they cannot carry the designation. No such word-of-God type of language, it is presently affirmed, is appropriate. At best the OT can be referred to as the word of Israel and the NT as the word of some leading Christians of the first century. But the prophets of the OT were sure that they were recording God’s word for Israel, and leading NT Christians, like Paul, believed themselves to be stating God’s word for the churches.

The designation “the word of God, word of the Lord,” appears then in three distinct contexts. It refers in particular to Jesus Christ, in general to the divinely disclosed message through God’s chosen spokesmen, and in principle to the biblical writings. These three meanings are not, however, unrelated. Rather, they lie one within another on three concentric circles. Christ himself is the ultimate, the total, Word. As the normative expression of God he is consequently the Word in an absolute and personal sense. For the apostolic church the OT read from the perspective of the Word made flesh validated his presence as “he who should come,” and so is properly designated the word of God. Against this background and in obedience to their Lord’s command, the apostolic preachers went forth with the gospel of God’s salvation sure in the conviction that they proclaimed the word of God. In summary, then, “the word of God, word of the Lord” belongs in turn to God’s own revelation of himself made known personally in Christ, to the proclamation of Christ in the apostolic ministry, and to the truth of Christ embodied in written form in the Scriptures.

H. D. McDONALD

See also LOGOS.

Bibliography. J. Barton, People of the Book? The Authority of the Bible in Christianity; G. Bornkamm, “God’s Word and Man’s Word in the NT,” in Early Christian Experience; R. E. Brown, Gospel according to John; D. A. Carson and J. D. Woodbridge, eds., Scripture and Truth; A. Debrunner et al., TDNT 4:69–136; J. D. G. Dunn, Christology in the Making; H. Haarbeck et al., NIDNTT

3:1078–1146; L. W. Hurtado, One God, One Lord: Early Christian Devotion and Ancient Jewish Monotheism.

Work. Throughout the Bible there are many references to work, the words used to designate it being divided into two classes. Mēlā'kâ (Gen. 2:2; Exod. 20:9; 1 Chron. 4:23; Hag. 1:14) and ma'ā-šeh (Gen. 5:29; Exod. 5:13; Prov. 16:3; Eccles. 1:14) in the Hebrew, and ergon in the Greek are the usual words employed when the word work has no moral or physical implications as, for instance, when God works in creation, or when reference is made generally to a person's works in this life. Other words are yēgīa' (Gen. 31:42; Deut. 28:33; Ps. 128:2; Isa. 55:2; Ezek. 23:29) and 'āmāl (Ps. 90:10; Eccles. 1:3; 2:10; Jer. 20:18) in the OT, and kopos in the NT (Matt. 11:28; John 4:38; 1 Cor. 4:12; 15:58; 1 Thess. 1:3; 2 Thess. 3:8), which imply weariness, trouble, and sorrow.

Work and labor of themselves are never held to be evil, but rather are thought of as a human's natural occupation in the world. Even in the state of innocence, man as the apex of creation, the representative of all creation before God (Gen. 2:15), was given work to perform as part of his normal existence. This is contrary to much modern thinking, which adopts the attitude that humans should regard work as something evil and to be avoided if at all possible.

That human's sin has corrupted and degraded work is at the same time continually repeated in the Bible. Genesis 3:17–18 specifically states that work will, because of sin, change its character to become the cause of a person's ultimate physical disintegration. This would seem to be the reason for work in subsequent portions of the Bible frequently embodying the idea of weariness. Indeed, this is the theme of the book of Ecclesiastes, in which the preacher says that all man's labor that he does under the sun is vanity. Man as a sinner works solely with worldly ends in view, the outcome being a sense of frustration and hopelessness, for ultimately he will disappear from this earth and his works with him (Eccles. 2). Only as he interprets his work in the light of eternity will his understanding of it change.

Yet even sinful humans possesses great gifts and abilities with which to subdue and use the physical world. Exodus 31:1–11; Judges 3:10 (cf. also Isa. 45) and many other places state that it is the Holy Spirit who gives people these endowments. Certain OT characters are also said to have received special gifts from God that would enable them to do their work: the judges, Saul, and even the heathen king Cyrus (Judg. 3:10; 1 Sam. 10:6–7; Isa. 45). The NT writers assume the point of view of the OT but stress it particularly in connection with gifts and abilities possessed by members of the church (1 Cor. 12; Eph. 4:11–13). Moreover, they continually emphasize that God calls all people to work and list positions in life in which they are to serve him. While this appears in the OT, as in the case of Esther (Esth. 4:13–14), the apostle Paul repeats it with great frequency in his writings (Eph. 6:5–8; 1 Tim. 6:1–2; Philem.).

Work, however, even though a man may be richly endowed with gifts, cannot be anything but ultimately empty unless man realizes that its true purpose is to glorify God. Paul makes this very plain in speaking to both servants and masters (Eph. 6:5–8), summing it all up in his instruction to Christians to “never be lacking in zeal, but keep your spiritual fervor, serving the Lord” (Rom. 12:11), and in his exhortation to do all things to the glory of God (1 Cor. 10:31).

In practice, such a view of work means that the Christian must always regard his work as a divinely appointed task in which, as he fulfills his calling, he is serving God. This requires him to be honest and diligent in all that he does, whether as employee or employer. Such, for instance, is the central point in the parable of the talents (Matt. 25:15). If he is a servant, he is to be faithful and obedient, doing all things as in God's sight (Eph. 6:5–8), while if he is an employer God lays upon him the responsibility of fair dealing and consideration toward his employees. He is to pay them adequately and not to defraud them of their wages, for “the worker deserves his wages” (Luke 10:7; cf. Lev. 19:13; Deut. 24:14; Col. 4:1; James 5:4–5). Thus, all honest work is honorable and to be performed as a divinely given commission to God's eternal glory (Rev. 14:13). W. S. REID

Bibliography. K. Barth, Church Dogmatics; G. Baum, Priority of Labor; J. Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion; R. Clark, Work in Crisis; H. C. Hahn and F. Thiele, NIDNTT 3:1147–59; A. Kuyper, Work of the Holy Spirit; P. Marshall et al., Labor of Love: Essays on Work; J. Murray, Principles of Conduct; A. Richardson, Biblical Doctrine of Work; M. Weber, Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism; G. Wingren, Luther on Vocation.

Works. The works of both God and humankind receive prominent attention in the Bible. God's works, mentioned early in Genesis and throughout the giving of special revelation, consist of creation, providence (including the preservation and government of the world), and redemption. Jesus' comment that his Father was still working (John 5:17) is reinforced by Paul (Rom. 14:20; Phil. 1:6), who considers his activity as an aspect of the work of God (1 Cor. 16:10; Phil. 2:30; cf. Acts 13:2).

Although human labor was originally given as a divine commission and privilege (Gen. 2:15), the intervention of sin gave it a negative connotation in biblical usage. Man now eats and lives by the sweat of his brow (Gen. 3:17–19; cf. 5:29), and his works are seen increasingly in the OT as being marked by vanity and sin. This negative attitude toward mere human action was accentuated by an emphasis in the opposite direction in late Judaism: the righteousness of works and their deserving a reward. The NT teaching on works must be seen against this background. Here human works are characterized in general as of the devil (John 8:41; 1 John 3:8), of darkness (Rom. 13:12), of the sinful nature (Gal. 5:19), as ungodly (Jude 15), lawless (2 Pet. 2:8), and dead (Heb. 6:1; 9:14). The only works that will stand the scrutiny of God are those effected by his Spirit and grounded in faith (John 3:21; 6:29; Acts 26:20; Rom. 2:6–7; 1 Thess. 1:3). Such are not only approved by Jesus (Matt. 5:16; 7:21; 21:28–32) and Paul (Rom. 2:6–7) but are expected of God’s people (Matt. 25:37–40). Thus, the Heidelberg Catechism defines good works as “only those which are done out of true faith, in accordance with the Law of God, and for his glory” (Q. 91). What is condemned is the expectation of payment from God for doing what he has commanded men to do. After they have done all that he has commanded them to do—as though that were possible—they must still say, “We are unworthy servants; we have only done our duty” (Luke 17:10). The chief work that God desires is the obedience of humble belief (John 6:29), which then begets a life full of good deeds (Titus 3:14).

Good Works. Soon after the apostolic age, a drifting from the biblical view of good works is noticeable. Whereas the NT had taught that the kingdom is built on God’s grace, not human merit, and that God rewards according to his grace, not merit (Matt. 20:1–16), leaders in the church held that baptized persons must obey the commandments, and when they do God rewards them. Thus, Tertullian, a former lawyer, saw God related to humankind as lawgiver; he commands, and we obey and obtain merit. God is the rewarder of merit. “If God is the acceptor of good works, he is also the rewarder. . . . A good deed has God as its debtor, just as has also the evil deed, since the judge is the rewarder of every matter.” Although all service to God is meritorious, he has decreed that certain good works give one merit when freely done. Penances, fasting, virginity, martyrdom, and other good deeds please him and receive his reward.

Soon merit was said to be transferable; salvation was seen as grace and as something merited; by free will we obtain merit and by merit, operating within the context of grace, salvation. Peter Lombard, whose Sentences was the standard theological textbook in the late Middle Ages, saw grace and free will cooperating in salvation to produce good works and thus obtain salvation. Good works produce merit; “without merits to hope for, anything cannot be called hope but presumption.” This theology was refined, and merit was said to be “that property of a good work which entitled the doer to receive a reward from him in whose service the work is done. . . . In the theological sense a supernatural merit can only be a salutary act to which God in consequence of his infallible promise owes a supernatural reward, consisting ultimately in eternal life” (Catholic Encyclopedia). The merit of human good works in the scheme of salvation ordained by God was associated with and dependent on the merit of the passion of Christ so that there was seen to be a congruence of the two. Thus the Catechism of the Council of Trent in the sixteenth century reads: “It is his passion also that imparts to our good actions the twofold most excellent quality of meriting the rewards of eternal glory, so as that even a cup of cold water given in his name shall not be without its reward, and of satisfying for our sins” (Ch. IV, Q.67).

This unbiblical teaching, combined with a semi-Pelagian doctrine of free will and human ability, was the fundamental reason for the necessity of doctrinal reformation in the late medieval period, as Luther declared in his debate with Erasmus. The problems of the papacy, purgatory, and indulgences he calls mere trifles compared with the real issue: the condition of humankind in the state of sin. Before his rediscovery of the gospel, he had struggled to acquire merit by good works. “I was a good monk and kept my order so strictly that I could say that if ever a monk could get to heaven through monastic discipline, I should have entered in. All my companions in the monastery who knew me would bear me out in this. For if it had gone on much longer I would have martyred myself to death with vigils, prayers, readings, and other works.” Luther became a doctor of theology and “did not yet know that we cannot expiate our sins.” So he, and others, tried the impossible, to expiate them by themselves through good works. This was changed for Luther and a large part of the church with the development of the doctrine of justification by faith in the merits of Christ alone and not those of the believer obtained through good works. The Reformers declared that the only righteousness which can stand before the judgment of a holy God is one which is “absolutely perfect and wholly in conformity with the divine law. But even our best works in this life are all imperfect and defiled with sin” (Heidelberg Catechism, Q.62). If God marks iniquities, who can stand? But he forgives and reckons sinners righteous. This is the teaching of Romans 4. The reckoning, or imputation, of the righteousness of Christ does not mean that God observes how well the sinner has done and then declares him a fit citizen of his kingdom. Rather, the Bible, and the Reformation with it, declares that God justifies the ungodly (Rom. 5:6, 9–10, 16–21). Christ came not to call the righteous but sinners to repentance (Matt. 9:13). It was the publican who smote his breast, asking God to be merciful to him, a sinner, who went home justified, rather than the self-righteous Pharisee (Luke 18:14). Sinners are justified freely, as a gift, through the redemption—i.e., the good work—of Jesus, says the apostle, after which he asks, “Where, then, is boasting?” He answers, “It is excluded. On what principle? On that of observing the law? No, but on that of faith. For we maintain that a man is justified by faith apart from observing the law. . . . The wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life in Christ Jesus our Lord” (Rom. 3:24–28; 6:23).

Salvation, freely given, does not mean that good works are unimportant. They are commanded and are the fruit of faith (Matt. 5:16; Eph. 2:10; Titus 2:14). They are necessary, according to the Heidelberg Catechism, “because just as Christ has redeemed us with his blood, he also renews us through his Holy Spirit according to his own image, so that with our whole life we may show ourselves grateful to God for his goodness and that he may be glorified through us; and further, so that we ourselves may be assured of our faith by its fruits and by our reverent behavior may win our neighbors to Christ” (Q. 86). James says that good works are as necessary as faith; he even claims that justification comes through them, thereby seeming to contradict Paul and the rest of the New Testament. His intention, however, is to teach the necessity of good works to show that faith is present and real (James 2:14–26). “Faith by itself, if it is not accompanied by action, is dead” (v. 17). Conversion means new life in Christ (Rom. 6:4–6; 1 Cor. 5:7; 2 Cor. 5:17; Gal. 2:20; Eph. 4:22–24; Col. 3:1–17), and this includes “a strong desire to live according to the will of God in all good works” (Heidelberg Catechism, Q. 90). Our works are known of God and will be taken into account in the final judgment (Rom. 2:6; 1 Cor. 3:14; 2 Cor. 5:10; Matt. 16:27; 1 Pet. 1:17; Rev. 22:12).

Since the days of Vatican II (1962–65) there has been a rethinking on the part of many Roman Catholic theologians regarding the nature and place of works in God’s plan of salvation. Some are even willing to concede that Luther was, in principle, correct. However, no official statements have been made, so it remains to be seen how far the Roman Catholic Church is willing to revise its time-honored definitions regarding faith and works to accommodate the newer situation.

M. E. OSTERHAVEN

See also GRACE; PENANCE; REWARD; ROMAN CATHOLICISM; SALVATION; SEMI-PELAGIANISM; TRENT, COUNCIL OF; WORK.

Bibliography. G. Bertram, TDNT 2:654–55; H. Hepp, Reformed Dogmatics; J. Murray, Principles of Conduct; G. Rupp, Righteousness of God; H. Thielicke, Theological Ethics; K. Thieme, SHERK 5:19–22; R. S. Wallace, Calvin’s Doctrine of the Christian Life.

World. In the OT ’eres, which is properly earth in contrast to heaven (Gen. 1:1), is occasionally rendered “world,” but the more usual term is tēbēl, which signifies the planet as having topographical features, as habitable and fruitful (Pss. 19:4; 90:2). The NT words are oikoumenē, denoting the populated world (Luke 4:5); aiōn, which is usually rendered age, but which occasionally combines the concept of space with time (Heb. 1:2; 11:3); and kosmos, which contains the thought of order or system. The latter word may denote the material world (Rom. 1:20) or even the totality of heaven and earth (Acts 17:24); the sphere of intelligent life (1 Cor. 4:9); the place of human habitation (1 Cor. 5:10); humankind as a whole (John 3:16); society as alienated from God and under the sway of Satan (1 John 5:19); and the complex of ideas and ideals that govern people who belong to the world in this ethical sense (1 John 2:15–17; James 4:4).

Since kosmos is the leading term involved, it calls for further consideration. Among the Greeks, kosmos became used for the universe, since it suitably expressed the order noted there. The Hebrews, on the other hand, were not hospitable to the concept of universe, but thought in terms of the heavens (the abode of God) and the earth (the realm of human existence). God was the author of both, and the regularity of the movements of the heavenly bodies and the rhythm of the seasons bore witness to his creative wisdom and the power of his sustaining control. NT writers follow this pattern of OT thought, avoiding, with rare exceptions, the use of the word kosmos for the heavens and the earth combined (Acts 17:24 is explicable as an adaptation of the message in terms congenial to the hearers, who were Greeks). The word kosmos then, in the NT, prevailingly denotes the earth, and by an extension of thought is used for humankind, which dwells on the earth. Perhaps this process was assisted by the fact that, owing to human intelligence and the drive for social integration, life presents considerable order.

But the most striking fact about the NT use of kosmos is the readiness with which the term is employed in an evil sense. Again and again, especially in the Johannine writings, the world is presented as something hostile to God. This seems to spell disorder. How, then, can kosmos be used to describe such a state of affairs? The answer is likely to be found in the fact that the powers of spiritual evil, which have Satan as their head and appear to be organized on a vast scale and with great efficiency (Eph. 6:12), dominate the life of unredeemed humanity. Satan rules a kingdom that is opposed to the kingdom of God (Luke 11:18).

We are not dropped into the depths of a hopeless dualism by reason of this opposition, for the Word teaches that the sphere of divine control embraces "all things." Therefore, God is still sovereign, even over the world, which is marred by the love of evil and by the sinister hold of the devil. Satan's kingdom exists by permission, not by reason of divine helplessness. Reconciliation has been provided for the world (2 Cor. 5:19), whereby people may leave the realm of darkness and be transferred into the kingdom of the Son of God's love. Those who will not do so must share the fate of Satan.

Worldliness, though not a scriptural term, is certainly a scriptural concept. It is an affection for that which is unlike God and contrary to his will (James 4:4; 1 John 2:15–16). The refusal to live an ascetic life is not a proof of worldliness, nor is the love of the beautiful. The determination of what is worldly should not rest solely upon the nature of an activity or habit viewed as a thing-in-itself, but also upon the spirit of the one who indulges one's self. If one is actuated by selfishness or neglect of God, one may be more worldly in God's sight than another whose outward acts are more questionable, but whose heart does not condemn him or her, because he or she is not consciously disobeying the Lord.

E. F. HARRISON

See also AGE, AGES; THIS AGE, THE AGE TO COME; WORLDLINESS AND OTHERWORLDLINESS.

Bibliography. G. Bornkamm, Early Christian Experience; G. Johnston, "Oikoumenē and Kosmos in the New Testament," NTS 10:352–60; O. Michel, TDNT 5:157–59; R. Morgenthaler et al., NIDNTT 1:517–26; J. M. Robinson, "World in Modern Theology and in New Testament Theology," in Soli Deo Gratia; H. Sasse, TDNT 3:867–98; W. Zimmerli, Old Testament and the World.

World Council of Churches, The. International ecumenical organization of Protestant, Anglican, and Orthodox churches. Its roots go back to the Edinburgh Conference of 1910, at which missionary societies sought greater cooperation in carrying out their goals. This meeting spawned a vision of church unity that led to the formation of Faith and Order, which, stalled by World War I, met in Lausanne in 1927. A second meeting took place in Edinburgh in 1937, where the Life and Work Movement proposed the establishment of a World Council of Churches. A further step was taken in Utrecht in 1938, when The World Council of Churches in Process of Formation was set up. Delayed by World War II, the WCC was founded in 1948 as delegates of 147 churches (of which 144 were members) from 44 countries met in Amsterdam. By 1989 it had more than 300 member churches in 108 countries.

Its basis is defined in the first article of its constitution, "The World Council of Churches is a fellowship of churches which confess the Lord Jesus as God and Saviour according to the Scriptures and therefore seek to fulfill together their common calling to the glory of the one God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit." Headquartered in Geneva, it includes all the main denominations of the West (except for the Roman Catholic Church and the Unitarians), most of the Eastern Orthodox churches, and about two hundred other churches, chiefly from Africa and Asia.

The main vehicle by which the WCC extends its ecumenical vision is its assemblies. Since the first assembly in Amsterdam in 1948, these have taken place in Evanston, Illinois, in 1954, New Delhi in 1961, Uppsala in 1968, Nairobi in 1975, Vancouver in 1983, and Canberra in 1991. Assemblies are made up of representatives appointed by member churches, consultants, fraternal delegates, youth delegates, observers, and accredited visitors. The chief goals are to promote ecumenicity and to conduct the business of the WCC.

The Central Committee, made up of 150 members elected by the assembly, meets annually to govern between assemblies. An executive committee of sixteen members meets twice a year. Three program units facilitate the work of the WCC: Faith and Witness, Justice and Service, and Education and Renewal. The Ecumenical Institute at Bossey, near Geneva, serves to train ecumenical leadership and promote scholarship. The WCC also has an ecumenical library, a communications office, and publishes the Ecumenical Review, a quarterly journal.

The Second Vatican Council encouraged the setting up in 1965 of the Joint Working Committee, which handles relations between the WCC and the Roman Catholic Church. Its members are jointly appointed by the Vatican and the WCC. Since 1961 Rome has appointed accredited observers to assemblies. Cooperation was furthered in 1968 when the Roman Catholic Church became a full member of the Faith and Order Commission of the WCC.

The WCC has had four general secretaries: W. A. Visser't Hooft, Reformed Church of the Netherlands (1948–65); Eugene Carson Blake, Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. (1966–71); Philip Potter, Methodist Church, West Indies (1972–84); and Emilio Castro, Methodist Church, Uruguay (1985). The WCC channels large amounts of money for ecumenical programs, development projects, and relief; in 1983 alone more than $44 million were devoted to these ends.

Evangelical Christians have been critical of the WCC, chiefly because of its doctrinal laxity and its policy of funding radical political movements.

R. A. PETERSON

Bibliography. B. K. A. Bell, Kingdom of Christ: The Story of the World Council of Churches; R. S. Bilheimer, Breakthrough: The Emergence of the Ecumenical Tradition; H. E. Frey, ed., Ecumenical Advance: A History of the Ecumenical Movement; R. Rouse and S. C. Neill, eds., History of the Ecumenical Movement 1517–1948.

Worldliness and Otherworldliness. Israel's world-affirming outlook—God is creator and ruler of this world—was reinforced by incarnation of the ideal in flesh, in Jesus Christ, who proclaimed the rule of God in this world. Nevertheless, he sharply criticized his “evil and adulterous generation”: disciples must be different (“it shall not be so among you”) yet must love their neighbors. So Peter and Paul exhorted converts to protective “separation” from the world while stressing involvement in human needs and the mission to save the world. John was uncompromisingly world-renouncing: society organized against God “lies in the evil one”; love of the world contradicts love for the Father; yet Christ, the Savior of the world God loves, dies for the world (1 John 2:2).

Tension grew between world-affirming ministry and world-renouncing concentration upon the world above (mysticism) or upon the world to come (adventism), as Christians resisted the theaters, games, and debauchery rampant in the Roman world yet cared for the world's unwanted. Separation strengthened into rejection of the world and ultimately into escape, as anchorites and monastics despised marriage, cleanliness, and all human comforts in an otherworldly search for deeper truth and the vision of God. Simultaneously, the conversion of Rome fostered a new kind of worldliness, ambition for all the rewards of power. Two types of Christians emerged—the religious, withdrawn from the world, and the lay, active in the world.

Augustine held that Christians should use but not enjoy the world; Aquinas would impose natural law upon it. Luther's “kingdom of grace” (the church) was paralleled by “the kingdom of God's left hand,” the secular world, ruled by law: Christians live within both. Calvin would restore the world to God's rule by discipline, making the world one vast monastery. For Puritans, the world is Vanity Fair, to be traveled through toward the Celestial City, not dwelt in. Yet not the world but worldliness is sinful, the desire for the world's way and prizes when the heart's true loyalties lie elsewhere.

Nineteenth-century social gospel reformers, firmly rooted in the kingdom (Maurice), in compassion (Gladden), or in a liturgical vision of God's glory (Holland, Temple), strove to embody their spiritual vision within the everyday world of wages, houses, work, and peace. But Bonhoeffer insisted that the world is already spiritual, reconciled, needing “religionless,” unseparated Christians to plunge into its life to prove it is not godless.

In the tensions of such unworldly worldliness the Christian ever lives, not of the world, redeemed from it, independent of it, but sent back to minister to it, living within it in the power of the world to come, knowing that the world is God's.

R. E. O. WHITE

See also WORK; WORLD.

Bibliography. O. R. Barclay, Developing a Christian Mind; H. Blamires, Christian Mind; Where Do We Stand?; B. J. Walsh and J. R. Middleton, Transforming Vision: Shaping a Christian World View.

Worldwide Church of God. See ARMSTRONGISM.

Worms, Diet of (1521). One of the most dramatic events of the Reformation. Martin Luther, a miner's son, confessed his faith before Charles V, scion of the house of Hapsburg. Elected Holy Roman Emperor in 1519, Charles scheduled his first meeting with the German princes for a diet (parliament) at Worms in 1521. A major concern was Martin Luther. Upon the urging of Luther's prince, Frederick the Wise, Luther was invited on March 6 to appear at the diet. Charles gave a safe conduct pass. Luther was determined to go to Worms even if there were “as many devils in it as there were tiles on the roofs of the houses.” Accompanied by Nicholas von Amsdorf, a fellow professor; Peter Suaven, Pomeranian nobleman and student; John Petzensteiner, another Augustinian friar; and Caspar Sturm, the imperial herald, Luther left for Worms on April 2. Justus Jonas, canon at Erfurt, joined them. For two weeks Luther made a triumphal tour across Germany, arriving at Worms toward noon on April 16. Greeted by a trumpet blast from the cathedral, Luther entered town in his two-wheeled cart, greeted by more than two thousand people, who accompanied him to his lodging at the Hospital of the Knights of St. John.

April 17 at 4 P.M. Luther entered the diet to be questioned by the archbishop of Trier, who pointed to a table of writings and asked if the Reformer had written them and if he recanted any of them. “The books are all mine, and I have written more,” Luther responded. “Do you defend them all, or do you care to reject a part?” he was asked. “This touches God and his Word. This affects the salvation of souls. . . . To say too little or too much would be dangerous. I beg you, give me time to think it over,” Luther answered. Allowed a day for reflection, Luther reappeared at 6 P.M. on April 18. The same questions were posed once more. Luther explained that his books were of several types—pastoral, polemical, theological. Denied the opportunity to further explain, Luther was asked for a simple reply. He stated: "Since then your Majesty and your lordships desire a simple reply, I will answer without horns and without teeth. Unless I am convicted by Scripture and plain reason—I do not accept the authority of popes and councils, for they have contradicted each other—my conscience is captive to the Word of God. I cannot and I will not recant anything, for to go against conscience is neither right nor safe. God help me. Amen." Some accounts add, "Here I stand, I cannot do otherwise." Confusion followed. Compromise was impossible. On April 23 Luther was permitted to leave Worms. His supporters left. Charles then issued the Edict of Worms on May 26 accusing Luther of heresy and treason, placing him under the imperial ban.

Worms, Diet of

Worms marks Luther's complete break with the past—excommunicated by pope and banned by emperor—and the birth of Lutheran Protestantism outside the Church of Rome. C. G. FRY

See also LUTHER, MARTIN; REFORMATION, PROTESTANT.

Bibliography. R. H. Bainton, Here I Stand: A Life of Martin Luther; H. Boehmer, Martin Luther: Road to Reformation; H. J. Grimm, Reformation Era, 1500–1650; D. L. Jensen, Confrontation at Worms.

Worry. See ANXIETY.

Worship. Our English word means "worthship," denoting the worthiness of an individual to receive special honor in accordance with that worth. The principle biblical terms, the Hebrew šāhā and the Greek proskyneō, emphasize the act of prostration, the doing of obeisance. This may be done out of regard for the dignity of personality and influenced somewhat by custom (Gen. 18:2), or may be based on family relationship (Gen. 49:8) or on station in life (1 Kings 1:31).

On a higher plane the same terms are used of divine honors rendered to a deity, whether to the gods of the nation (e.g., Exod. 20:5) or to the one true and living God who reveals himself in Scripture and in his Son (Exod. 24:1). The tutelage of Israel in the wilderness laid great stress on the sinfulness of idolatrous worship and its dire consequences (e.g., Deut. 8:19). No injury to God compares with the denial of his uniqueness and the transfer to another of the recognition due to him. In this light must be understood his references to himself as a jealous God (Exod. 20:5).

Perversion of worship is seen in Satan's avid effort to secure for himself what belongs properly to God alone (Matt. 4:9), as well as in the blasphemous figure of the beast (Rev. 13:4). Undue deference paid to men verges at times on worship and is resisted by the godly (Acts 10:25–26).

Barnabas and Paul protested the attempt to worship them at Lystra based on the impression that they were gods who had come down to men (Acts 14:11–14). Loyal angels refuse veneration (Rev. 22:9).

It is useful to distinguish between a broad and a restricted meaning of worship as applied to God. In general he may be honored with prayer and praise and the bringing of sacrificial gifts (1 Sam. 1:3). This cultic worship is especially appropriate in the house of God (Ps. 138:2) and when it is carried on with a desire to be clothed in his holiness (Ps. 29:2). In a still broader sense, the inspiration of service issued and derived from worship may be included (Matt. 4:10).

In the narrower sense worship is pure adoration, the lifting up of the redeemed spirit toward God in contemplation of his holy perfection. Matthew distinguishes between the presentation of gifts by the magi to the Christ child and their worship of him (Matt. 2:11).

Jesus made an epochal statement on this subject (John 4:24). To worship God in spirit involves a contrast with worship in the letter, in the legalistic encumbrance so characteristic of the Jew; to worship him in truth contrasts with the Samaritan and all other worship that is false to a greater or lesser extent.

Our Lord made possible a more intelligent worship of God by revealing the Father in his own person. As the incarnate Son, he himself is deserving of the same veneration (John 9:38; 20:28; Heb. 1:6; Rev. 5:6–14). E. F. HARRISON

See also WORSHIP IN THE CHURCH.

Bibliography. R. Abba, Principles of Christian Worship; W. Hahn, Worship and Congregation; A. B. Macdonald, Christian Worship in the Primitive Church; R. P. Martin, Worship in the Early Church; W. D. Maxwell, History of Christian Worship; E. Underhill, Worship; G. Wainwright, Doxology; J. F. White, Introduction to Christian Worship.

Worship in the Church. To worship God is to ascribe to him the worth of which he is worthy. The church of Jesus Christ is by definition a worshipping community called into being by God to be "a spiritual house . . . a holy priesthood, offering spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God through Jesus Christ" (1 Pet. 2:5). The Christian church has from the very beginning gathered regularly for corporate worship. The most basic acts of worship in the early church—reading and exposition of Scripture; prayer; singing of psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs; and observance of the sacraments—are all derived from the example and command of Jesus himself. With the exception of the celebration of the Lord's Supper, however, Jesus did not originate these practices. They were derived from the synagogue worship of the Jews.

The Early Church. The first Christian community in Jerusalem was essentially Jewish in orientation and as such accepted the OT as the Word of God. What distinguished these early Christians from the Jews was their conviction that Jesus was the promised Messiah and that salvation was found only in him. They continued to worship in a basically Jewish fashion but added the Lord's Supper (Acts 2:42, 46) and prayers in the name of Jesus (Acts 4:24–30).

Although the Christians gathered daily for prayer, fellowship, preaching, and teaching (Acts 2:46; 5:42), the chief day for services of worship in the church was changed from the Jewish sabbath to the first day of the week almost from the beginning, because it was the day of resurrection.

It is not clear what the order of worship in the church as established by the apostle was, but the service was basically a simple one. All the early evidence (NT and noncanonical writings) indicates that while the elements of the service had no fixed sequence, the climactic event of the weekly service on the Lord's Day was the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. One early source, the Didache (ca. 95–150), gives us a detailed description of how the Lord's Supper was celebrated, including the prayers to be used, as well as other liturgical directions and usages. Fixed forms of prayer were included, but provision was made for free prayers in some places in the liturgy. Confession of sin was required before partaking of the Lord's Supper (Didache 14:1).

Justin Martyr's First Apology, written somewhere near the middle of the second century, describes the Lord's Supper as the Eucharist (meaning thanksgiving), as does the Didache (14:1). In describing a service of worship, Justin says, "The memoirs of the Apostles [the Gospels] and the writings of the prophets were read aloud as long as time allowed" (First Apology 67). The writings of the prophets were undoubtedly the books of the OT. From Justin's writing it is clear that the churches had a definite order of service established by tradition, but the service was still very simple.

In the primitive church there were gatherings in which the believers who had been baptized celebrated the Lord's Supper along with a full scale meal. At a very early date, however, the meal was separated from the sacrament (Clement of Alexandria, Paedagogos 2:1; Stromata 3:2; Tertullian, Apology 39; Chaplet 3) and was called the agape, i.e., love feast. By the fourth century the observance of the agape had largely died out because of disorders in its conduct (Augustine, Letter to Aurelius 22:4).

The observance of festivals throughout the year by the Jews gave rise among the Christians to the idea of a "church year," now referred to as the "liturgical year," but this effort to sanctify the entire year by a succession of sacred festivals developed slowly. The festivals of Christmas and Epiphany were not added until the fourth century, and the liturgical year as it is now observed was not completed until the end of the sixth century.

The apostle Paul mentions revelations, speaking in tongues, and the interpretation of tongues as present within the worshiping congregation. The exercise of these special spiritual gifts (charismata) was strictly regulated so that the service could be carried on in good order and the believers edified (1 Cor. 14:40). Thus, the free expression of the Spirit went hand in hand with liturgical restrictiveness in the same service. This free expression of the Spirit in tongues and prophecy seems to have died out very early, in all probability concurrent with the recognition of the final authority of the writings of the apostle as canonical. As early as the time of Justin Martyr, prophesying, speaking in tongues, and the interpretation of tongues had disappeared. What remained was a service of two divisions, the first part being an adaptation and expansion of the synagogue service of praise, prayer, and instruction, and the second the observance of the Lord's Supper.

A process of steady departure from the evangelical faith and free worship the NT describes had its beginning in the second century. This departure was sufficient gradually and progressively to change the character of Christianity itself. It is clear from the Church Order of Hippolytus, compiled before the year 236, that considerable development had taken place by the middle of the third century. Some liturgical forms had been established this early, but the worship was still quite simple and relatively brief, and some of the prayers were free.

The Middle Ages and Reformation. When Emperor Constantine made Christianity the official religion of the Roman Empire in 313, the new public image of the Christians encouraged the building of splendid churches and the creation of longer and more colorful services. The results were not uniformly beneficial. As pagans professed to embrace Christianity in great numbers, they began to have influence, especially in the introduction of an emphasis on the "mystery" of the Lord's Supper. Rather than perpetuation of the simplicity of early Christian worship, form and ceremony became the important thing. The way was prepared for the radical change of the Lord's Supper into the Roman Mass with all the abuses that developed from this in the medieval Roman Church.

Originally the Roman Mass was a simple rite with two main divisions, the Liturgy of the Word and the Liturgy of the Upper Room. Gradually, however, the Communion table gave way to the altar, which was placed against the wall, and the officiating clergyman became a priest who went to the altar to offer a sacrifice for the people, which they were not allowed to offer themselves. By the end of the fourth century, as the reality of Christ's presence in the Communion service yielded to an extremely localized view of his presence in the bread and wine, barriers began progressively to be raised between the altar and the people. The Lord's Supper was no longer a joyful service of evangelical thanksgiving; it had become an awesome objective sacrifice of the body and blood of Christ. The importance of this radical departure from NT teaching and practice cannot be overestimated. It represents a watershed in the history of the worship of the Christian church. It resulted in the elimination of most of what is characteristic of evangelical worship. The worshipers became mere spectators observing the activity of the priest at the altar. Doctrinal errors such as transubstantiation, penance, and meritorious works contributed to the decline of worship and the growing dissatisfaction of the worshipers, which became major factors in the Reformation.

Worship in the Church

The Reformers were more concerned with doctrine than with worship materials, and most of them gave comparatively little attention to the development of liturgy. A wide variety of worship services came into being. Luther at first used only a shortened version of the Roman Mass, later making some significant changes to recover the NT idea of fellowship in the observance of Communion. Zwingli denounced the Mass and eradicated everything suggesting the Roman practice. He even eliminated congregational singing and use of the organ. Calvin's aim was to return to the worship practices of the primitive church. While he too eliminated everything indicating that the Mass was a sacrifice and all prayers to the saints or to the Virgin Mary, he endorsed congregational singing, especially the use of metrical versions of the Psalms. He also gave the sermon an important place in the service. His liturgy became the norm of worship in the Calvinistic churches of Europe.

In the Protestant Reformation on the continent the break with the Roman Church was more complete than in England. Henry VIII did not embrace the doctrines of the continental Reformers. He simply wanted to be free from the authority of the pope. Services in the English Church continued to be conducted according to the practices of the Roman Church before the break. The continental Reformation had its effect, however, for Thomas Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury, headed a commission that changed the Latin Mass into an English Communion service, a revision approved by Parliament. A revised edition of Cranmer's work, known as the Second Prayer Book of Edward VI, was published in 1552. It included a number of changes brought about by strong Puritan pressures. It was sufficiently purged of Romish elements that it was endorsed by John Knox for use in Scotland. The final edition of the Book of Common Prayer was published in 1662 and has remained authoritative in the Church of England to the present.

In 1643 Parliament called together the Westminster Assembly of divines, which produced not only a confession of faith and catechisms but also the Directory for the Public Worship of God. Although accepted by Parliament, the liturgical directions of the directory never enjoyed widespread acceptance in England but were followed as a standard in Scotland until late in the nineteenth century. As far as worship practices are concerned, the Protestant Reformation came to an end in England in 1662.

The American Churches. Throughout the seventeenth century Protestants moving from Europe to America carried with them their Reformation principles, but with some exceptions their worship practices were modified by the circumstances associated with their colonial life and the struggles they endured as they fought for independence and then developed and expanded a new nation. Three principal types of worship were transferred to the American colonies. First, there were some churches that retained a fixed liturgy such as had been known in the Anglican Church. This allowed maximum opportunity for formal corporate participation and, while deemphasizing the preaching function of the minister, encouraged frequent individual participation in Communion. A second type was characteristic of churches that stemmed from what might be termed radical Puritanism. They rejected all forms in worship as quenching the Spirit and felt that people should be as free as possible in praising God and communicating his message to others. A third type of worship, distinct from the other two, might be characterized as an attempt to worship according to the Word. This was the emphasis of the Calvinistic churches that followed the dictum of Calvin that nothing was to be allowed in worship except that which the Scripture commanded. The preaching of the Word of God became predominant in their services, but because of the example of Calvin and Knox, they did not hesitate to produce liturgies for their congregations.

A number of different aspects of colonial life influenced the early settlers. Nearly all settlements had their beginnings without church buildings, so worship took on the informality of the schoolhouse or the home or the grove where it was conducted. It was characterized by a very simple pattern of unskilled singing, extempore prayer, Scripture reading, and a sermon when a minister was present. United worship with Christians of other churches played a significant part in lessening the emphasis on the distinctive worship practices of the various sects.

As the frontier was pushed westward, most of the American denominations holding solid historical connections with Old World churches were strongly influenced by revivalism as it spread through the new land. Many of America's free churches have their roots in the American revival tradition. The revival meeting began with a song service of three or more songs chosen to raise the emotional pitch of the congregation. Prayers were offered, but they were intensely personal. An offering was received in conformity with the tempo of the service, and after a highly subjective musical number, usually a solo, the congregation was prepared for the climax of the service, the evangelistic sermon, which was always followed by some form of altar call.

While not many churches follow this pattern today, it did have a strong impact on most evangelical churches of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, and its effects remain to this day. Strong revivalistic and judgmental preaching tended to completely overshadow the experience of corporate worship. The balance between Word and sacrament was largely lost. The Lord's Supper was limited to semiannual, quarterly, or sometimes monthly observance. There was very little experience of common prayer. The pastor's sermon was the all-important part of the service.

Another movement that had a strong effect on evangelical Christian worship in America was the Chautauqua, which rose in the nineteenth century for the distinct purpose of raising the cultural level of the country by informing and entertaining the public. Chautauqua spread widely over the country, but when it began to dwindle, the only organization able adequately to provide for community cultural growth was the church. The minister, who was often the best educated member of the community, was expected to carry on these educational and entertainment functions. Thus, the personality and ability of the preacher became vitally important. Churches began to be built like theaters with banked seats, so that what was taking place in the pulpit area and choir loft could be more readily observed. People became more and more adjusted to being mere spectators in their worship services.

The combination of the effect of the highly subjective emphasis of the revival movement with the entertainment aspect of the Chautauqua has been felt strongly in the evangelical churches of America in the twentieth century. The choir and soloists often seem to be providing Christian entertainment for the congregation, while individual participation in the service is limited to the singing of hymns. While the central and all-important part of the service is the sermon, in line with an appropriate emphasis on the Word of God, the potential richness of common worship for the individual worshiper is often unrealized.

Among the growing number of independent, nondenominational churches as well as many evangelical churches in denominations with Old World roots, there is not presently any evident widespread concern for developing richer corporate worship. The structure of their worship services is without any particular scriptural or historical significance. However, in some of the evangelical denominations there is widespread interest in worship renewal. Even some of the denominations that have been traditionally antilurgical are now seeking ways to enrich their worship experiences, not by simply introducing one or more ancient elements into their liturgy, but by a careful effort to develop services in harmony both with NT standards and with historic, prophetic, evangelical Christianity.

R. G. RAYBURN

See also CHRISTIAN YEAR; WORSHIP.

Bibliography. D. Adams, From Meetinghouse to Camp Meeting; O. Cullman, Early Christian Worship; J. G. Davies, ed., New Westminster Dictionary of Liturgy and Worship; T. Klausner, Short History of the Western Liturgy; R. P. Martin, Worship in the Early Church; W. D. Maxwell, History of Christian Worship; R. G. Rayburn, O Come, Let Us Worship; B. Thompson, ed., Liturgies of the Western Church; J. J. von Allmen, Worship: Its Theology and Practice; R. Webber, ed., Complete Library of Christian Worship; H. Wegman, Christian Worship in East and West; J. F. White, Introduction to Christian Worship.

Wrath of God. Wrath, anger, and indignation are integral to the biblical proclamation of the living God in his opposition to sin. While God's love is spontaneous to his own being, his wrath is called forth by the wickedness of his creatures. Thus, it is the wounding of his gracious love, the rejection of his proffered mercy, that evokes his holy wrath. Scripture calls God's act of wrath his strange work (Isa. 28:21). C. H. Dodd has well observed, "Wrath is the effect of human sin: mercy is not the effect of human goodness, but is inherent in the character of God."

On the other hand, the exhaustive studies of Fichtner in the OT and of Staehlin in the NT do not sustain the thesis that wrath is an impersonal retribution, an automatic, causal working out of an abstract law. In the OT wrath is the expression of the personal, subjective free will of Yahweh, who actively punishes sin, as in the NT it is the personal reaction of God, not an independent hypostasis. In the face of evil the Holy One of Israel does not dodge the responsibility of executing judgment. He demonstrates his anger at times in the most personal way possible. "It is I the LORD who strikes the blow" (Ezek. 7:8-9). In such NT passages as John 3:36; Romans 1:18; Ephesians 5:6; Colossians 3:6; Revelation 6:16; 11:18; 14:10; 16:19; 19:15; cf. Romans 9:22, wrath is specifically described as “God’s wrath,” “his wrath,” “your wrath,” or “the wrath of the Lamb.” The wrath of God is being continually revealed from heaven, actively giving the wicked up to uncleanness, to vile passions, to reprobate minds, and punishing them in the day of wrath and revelation of the just judgment of God (Rom. 1:18–2:6). In 2 Thessalonians 1:7–9 Paul writes as personal a description of the Lord Jesus’ action in directly punishing the disobedient as can be penned.

Wrath of God

In the total biblical portrayal the wrath of God is not so much an emotion or an angry frame of mind as it is the settled opposition of his holiness to evil. Accordingly, the wrath of God is seen in its effects, in God’s punishment of sin in this life and in the next. These inflictions include pestilence, death, exile, destruction of wicked cities and nations, hardening of hearts, and the cutting off of the people of God for idolatry or unbelief. The day of wrath is God’s final judgment against sin, his irrevocable condemnation of impenitent sinners.

The OT description of God as “slow to anger and plenteous in mercy” is best understood as a blessed revelation full of wonder and awe. For only he who apprehends the reality of God’s wrath is overpowered by the magnitude of his mercy, as it is declared in Isaiah 54:7–10 or in the ASV reading of Psalm 30:5: “His anger is but for a moment, his favor is for a lifetime.” As mercy gets the upper hand in these OT passages, so the ultimate NT word is the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, the love of God the Father made ours in the fellowship of the Holy Spirit.

Accordingly, the way of escape from the wrath of the Almighty is abundantly presented in both testaments. While humankind’s puny efforts are insufficient, God’s own heart of love provides a way of salvation. He calls people to repent, to return unto himself, to receive his forgiveness and renewal. He receives the intercession of his servants—Abraham, Moses, Eleazar, and Jeremiah—for his people, and himself provides the OT sacrificial system by which his wrath may be averted.

In the NT the call is to faith, repentance, and baptism in the name of the Lord Jesus who saves us from the wrath to come (1 Thess. 1:9–10). For when we are justified by his blood and reconciled by his death, we shall be saved from the wrath by his life (Rom. 5:9–10). The most poignant word about God’s punishment is that it is the wrath of the Lamb who took upon himself and bore the sins of the world.

W. C. ROBINSON

See also ETERNAL PUNISHMENT; JUDGMENT.

Bibliography. G. Bornkamm, Early Christian Experience; A. T. Hanson, Wrath of the Lamb; H. Kleinknecht et al., TDNT 5:382–447; G. H. C. Macgregor, “Concept of the Wrath of God in the New Testament,” NTS 7:101–9; L. Morris, Apostolic Preaching of the Cross;

H. Schönweiss and H.-C. Hahn, NIDNTT 1:105–13; R. V. G. Tasker, Biblical Doctrine of the Wrath of God.

Württemberg Confession (1552). A Lutheran statement of faith used alongside the Augsburg Confession and the Formula of Concord in Swabia. It was mainly the work of theologian John Brenz (1499–1570), “Luther’s most reliable friend in South Germany.” A Swabian, Brenz was educated at Heidelberg, where he came to know Philip Melancthon, Martin Bucer, and Eberhardt Schnepf. He met Luther at the Heidelberg Disputation in 1518 and embraced the Reformation. Attending the Marburg Colloquy (1529), supporting the Augsburg Confession (1530), he introduced Lutheran Church orders into several German territories. Although the Reformation had spread early to the imperial free cities of the south—Reutlingen, Esslingen, Ulm, Hall, and Biberbach—it was only upon Brenz’s return in 1534 that the thorough reform of Württemberg began. Influences were felt from both the Swiss and Saxon Reformations. Brenz reformed the University of Tübingen (1537), attended the meeting at Smalcald (1537), emerging as “the chief Reformer of Württemberg,” and becoming provost of the cathedral in Stuttgart in 1554. The convening of the Council of Trent (1545–63) impelled the Swabians to restate their faith. Brenz was the chief author of the Württemberg Confession, which he took to the council in March 1552, though he was not permitted to read it. Viewed by many Lutherans as “a restatement of the Augsburg Confession,” the Württemberg Confession was described as “an excellent statement of positive Lutheranism, presented in mild, popular, and moderate language” and directed chiefly toward the Roman Catholics. By 1559 the confession was incorporated into the Great Church Order, which was used by the Lutherans in Württemberg for centuries. It was also used by Archbishop Parker in preparing the Thirty-nine Articles (1563).

C. G. FRY

See also CONFESSIONS OF FAITH; LUTHERAN TRADITION; THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES.

Bibliography. P. Schaff, Creeds of Christendom.

Wycliffe, John (ca. 1330–1384). English scholar and theologian who is often called “the Morning Star of the Reformation.” A native of Yorkshire, he attended Oxford University, receiving the doctorate in theology in 1372. Supported by church positions, he spent most of his life teaching at Oxford. A brilliant scholar who mastered the late medieval scholastic tradition, he came to the attention of the government. The Duke of Lancaster, John of Gaunt, son of Edward III, enlisted his services on several occasions. Gaunt was the effective ruler of England from the death of his father (1377) until Richard II was old enough to reign (1381). Wycliffe performed diplomatic duties for the crown and wrote in support of civil government. His work denied the validity of clerical ownership of land and property as well as papal jurisdiction in temporal affairs. The doctrine of dominion, which he set forth in On Divine Dominion (1375) and On Civil Dominion (1376), declared that all people are the tenants of God, and only the righteous as God's true stewards ought to have political authority, because they alone have the moral right to rule and hold possession. The wicked on the other hand, even if they are nobles, kings, or popes, have no such right despite the fact that at times God may allow them to temporarily hold power or property. Wycliffe believed that churchmen who lived in mortal sin relinquished their right as God's stewards and should be deprived of their wealth and authority.

These views led to Wycliffe's condemnation by a series of papal bulls issued in 1377, which indicate that Oxford University should stop such teaching. Opposition drove Wycliffe to more extreme positions, and he moved from an attack on the wealth and temporal power of the church to criticism of the central dogmas of medieval Catholicism. He rejected all ceremony and organization not specifically mentioned in the Bible, condemned transubstantiation, renounced the sacramental power of the priesthood, and denied the efficacy of the Mass. He also dismissed the whole structure of rituals, ceremonies, and rites that pervaded the church on the grounds that they were not only false but they interfered with the true worship of God. He came to agree with Augustine that the church is the predestined body of true believers and that salvation comes through divine grace rather than through people's efforts to save themselves.

In 1381 the Peasants' Revolt in England forced the church and the aristocracy to cooperate in restoring law and order. Although Wycliffe was not involved in the rebellion, those who opposed him claimed that it was the result of his teaching. Taking advantage of the situation, the leaders of the English church forced his followers from Oxford. Wycliffe went to live at his parish in Lutterworth (1382), where he died of a stroke in 1384.

Wycliffe's writings, in addition to his work on the problems of church and state, include logical and metaphysical treatises and numerous theological books and sermons. He is best known, however, for instigating a translation of the Vulgate into English. According to his doctrine of dominion, Christians are directly responsible to God. Therefore, in order to know and obey God's law, it is necessary for them to read the Bible. For Wycliffe, the Holy Scriptures were the only standard of faith and source of authority. That is why he felt that it was so important to make them available in the vernacular. He spent the last few months of his life on that task, leaving the completion of the Wycliffe Bible to his followers.

The followers of Wycliffe, known as Lollards, were made up of scholars from Oxford, the lesser gentry, and many poor people from both rural and urban areas. They based their preaching on the Bible and counseled disobedience to unjust churchmen, attacked the priesthood, affirmed the idea of the invisible church, and condemned monasticism and ritualism. This message led to their persecution, which some scholars feel was effective in destroying the movement by the end of the fifteenth century. Others argue that Lollard sentiments were preserved in certain places and led to an enthusiasm for the Reformation of the next century.

If Wycliffe's influence on Protestantism is difficult to trace in England, it is somewhat clearer in continental thought. His ideas spread to Bohemia through Czech students who attended Oxford University. In Prague, John Hus adopted his teachings, and the Hussites kept them alive for many years. One of the early proposals of Luther was that justice should be done to the Hussites, who he believed were wrongly condemned. Through the Bohemian connection Wycliffe was indeed a forerunner of the Protestant Reformation.

R. G. CLOUSE

Bibliography. E. A. Block, John Wyclif: Radical Dissenter; J. H. Dahmus, Prosecution of John Wyclif; G. Lechler, John Wycliffe and His English Reformers; K. B. McFarlane, John Wycliffe and the Beginnings of English Nonconformity; J. A. Robson, Wyclif and the Oxford Schools; J. Stacey, Wyclif and Reform; H. B. Workman, John Wyclif.

Yy

Yahweh. See GOD, NAMES OF.

Year, Christian. See CHRISTIAN YEAR.

Young, Brigham. See MORMONISM.

Young, Edward Joseph (1907–1968). Old Testament scholar and evangelical theologian. Young was born November 29, 1907, in San Francisco and received his education at Stanford University (B.A., 1929), San Francisco Seminary, Westminster Theological Seminary, Leipzig University and Dropsie College (Ph.D., 1943). He acknowledged his theological indebtedness to Oswald T. Allis, J. Gresham Machen, Robert Dick Wilson, William Henry Green and B. B. Warfield, but he also referred to Albrecht Alt and Karl Elliger as influencing his thought. He was ordained in the Presbyterian Church, USA (1935), but transferred to the Orthodox Presbyterian Church upon its founding in 1936. He taught at Westminster Theological Seminary from 1936 until his death in 1968.

A brilliant linguist and knowledgeable in more than 20 ancient languages, Young's goal was to write in the meticulous tradition of German scholarship, following the lead of C. F. Keil and E. E. Hengstenberg. This is best seen in his magnum opus, Book of Isaiah (3 vols., 1965–72), but is also evident in his standard work Introduction to the Old Testament (1949) and My Servants the Prophets (1952). Young held the traditional conservative positions on matters of Old Testament introduction, authorship, and date but surprisingly opts for a non-Solomonic authorship of Ecclesiastes. He held to a literal 24-hour day interpretation of Genesis 1, arguing vigorously against the so-called framework hypothesis of N. H. Ridderbos and liberal evolutionism.

Theologically, Young's interest was in the doctrine of biblical inspiration, upholding the earlier Princeton view of plenary, verbal inspiration as held by Archibald Alexander Hodge, Charles Hodge, and B. B. Warfield. He first defended this in "Authority of the Old Testament," written for Infallible Word (1946), a symposium written by the faculty of Westminster Seminary. Young followed this up with a full-length work Thy Word Is Truth (1957). He intended the book to be a popular apologetic against neo-orthodoxy and other more extreme views. He argues presuppositionally using as his starting point Christian theism and the divine authorship of Scripture. "There can be no neutral position" (Thy Word Is Truth, 32); that is his bottom line. He continues this line of reasoning in discussing the canon of the Old Testament (Revelation and the Bible [1959], ed. C. F. H. Henry). A doctrine of inerrancy is the logical outcome of this view. "One does not believe the Scripture is God's Word on the basis of his ability to demonstrate that it does not contain errors. The Bible is the Word of God because God has himself so declared" (Bible: The Living Word of Revelation [1968], ed. M. C. Tenney, 118).

W. A. ELWELL

Bibliography. J. D. Douglas, "Young, Edward Joseph (1907–1968)" in Twentieth-Century Dictionary of Christian Biography; R. B. Gaffin, "Young, Edward Joseph (1907–1968)," in Dictionary of Christianity in America, D. G. Reid et al., eds., 1298–99.

Zz

Zeller, Eduard (1814–1908). German Protestant theologian and philosopher. Born in Württemberg, he studied with F. C. Bauer at Tübingen and later became his son-in-law. Zeller also became close friends with D. F. Strauss there and fully accepted his explanation of the Bible as a collection of myths that obscured the person of the historical Jesus. After completing his doctorate, he began lecturing at his alma mater in 1840 and within two years emerged as the leader and guiding force of the “Tübingen School” by editing its literary organ, the Tübinger Theologische Jahrbücher (1842–57). He spent two stormy years at Bern (1847–49) and then went to Marburg, where after some controversy he was appointed to the philosophical faculty. Next he taught in Heidelberg (1862–72) and finally Berlin (1872–95). He devoted his later years largely to writing and revising his landmark work on Greek thought, History of Greek Philosophy (5 vols., 1844–52), and the shorter Outlines of the History of Greek Philosophy (1883), but he continued to hold Strauss in high regard, publishing a study of Strauss and Renan in 1864 and a biography in 1874.

In a lengthy commentary, Contents and Origin of the Acts of the Apostles, Critically Investigated (1854), Zeller utilized the critical views advanced by Baur and Strauss to call into question the historicity of the book of Acts. As a theologian he rejected the orthodox view of God as the personal, transcendent Creator of the world, and in a pantheistic fashion regarded him as the creative basis of all life and existence. The supernatural person of Christ was the mythical embellishment of the early church, life after death was only a matter of speculation, and the fundamental beliefs of the church were little more than hair-splitting scholasticism. Although philosophically a Hegelian in early life, he became a neo-Kantian in his middle years.

R. V. PIERARD

See also TÜBINGEN SCHOOL.

Bibliography. W. W. Gasque, NIDCC 1070; H. Harris, Tübingen School.

Zinzendorf, Nikolaus Ludwig von (1700–1760). German religious reformer and founder of the Moravian Church. Born in Saxony to a noble family, he was educated at the Francke school in Halle and studied law at Wittenberg, where he attempted unsuccessfully to reconcile Lutheran orthodoxy and pietism. Foreign travels helped to broaden his understanding of Christendom, although he always regarded himself basically as a Lutheran. He accepted a civil service position, but a turning point in his life came in 1722 when he invited a group of Bohemian Brethren (Unitas Fratrum) refugees to settle on his estate in Saxony. He organized them into a community named Herrnhut (The Lord’s Watch) and devoted full attention to its development. In 1727 he left government service to become a lay preacher and evangelist as well as spiritual leader of Herrnhut. Following a period of theological study he was formally ordained a bishop in 1737, after opposition from orthodox Lutherans had forced his group to assume a separate existence. In numerous trips to other lands, including two visits to America, he founded and nurtured churches and kindled a missionary vision hitherto unknown in Protestantism. He also wrote hymns and prayers, created liturgical forms, and prepared daily “watch words” (Losungen) to foster spiritual growth.

Zinzendorf held to the essentials of Lutheran theology, accepting without question God’s revelation in Jesus Christ, the distinction between law and gospel, justification by faith, sanctification of life, and Christ’s real presence in the Lord’s Supper. His distinctive emphasis, however, was on “heart religion.” One must live in communion with God, and in turn this meant a living communion with Christ since God was revealed only in him. When one’s existence was oriented to the person and work of Christ, that would lead not only to the blessedness mediated through Christ but also to participation in the common work to advance the kingdom of God. The more unions like the one at Herrnhut that could be introduced into the church, the more the Christian life could be realized historically. Zinzendorf envisioned the revitalization of the existing Lutheran Church through the cultivation of an intense community religious life. This included frequent worship services, organizing the community into groups with spiritual supervisors, setting up schools, the use of choral and instrumental music, and an active program of evangelism and missions to the heathen world.

Moravian piety differed from that of Halle in that it contained much more of the element of joy and less emphasis upon the struggle with sin and a conscious conversion experience. Although Zinzendorf advocated an experiential religion, he rejected perfectionism. The conception of the church as a fellowship bound together by a common salvation, obedience, and joy kept his movement within the mainstream of Protestantism, while the stress on the proclamation of the gospel, the realization of brotherhood, fostering Christian living on a voluntary basis, the missionary imperative, and an ecumenical outlook transcended the boundaries of countries and churches and made him one of the most influential eighteenth century preachers. R. V. PIERARD

See also BOHEMIAN BRETHREN; PIETISM.

Bibliography. N. L. Zinzendorf, Nine Public Lectures on Important Subjects in Religion, G. W. Forell, ed.; A. J. Lewis, Zinzendorf, the Ecumenical Pioneer; J. R. Weir, Count Zinzendorf.

Zionism. This term refers to the philosophy of the Jewish people's restoration to "Zion," which early in Jewish history was identified with Jerusalem. After the Roman expulsion of the Jews from Jerusalem in A.D. 135, this "Zion" idea was never divorced from Jewish thinking, and Jewish prayers (both individual and corporate) emphasized the desire to return to their homeland. The religious Jew dreamed of an end period of ultimate release from his people's dispersion among the nations and a return to the land of promise. A handful of Jews had always remained in Palestine, and their numbers were augmented by refugees from the Spanish Inquisition in 1492. Nevertheless, to many Jews the notion of a physical return to Palestine seemed an illusive, if not impossible, dream.

During the nineteenth century the rise of Hebrew literature, Jewish nationalism, and most importantly a fresh outbreak of anti-Semitism stimulated groups such as Hoveve Zion ("Lovers of Zion") to raise money to send Jewish settlers to Palestine. Pogroms in czarist Russia after 1881 resulted in thousands of panic-stricken refugees who realized that Palestine was their safest place of refuge. Agricultural settlements were also sponsored by benefactors such as Baron Edmond de Rothschild.

Premodern Zionism emphasized a religious motive and quiet territorial settlement. With the publication of Der Judenstaat ("Jewish State") by Theodor Herzl in 1896, however, political Zionism was born and with it the modern conception of Zionism. A new era in Jewish history unfolded when Herzl, an Austrian journalist, changed from an advocate of Jewish assimilation to a belief that anti-Semitism was inevitable as long as the majority of Jewish people lived outside their homeland. He expounded political, economic, and technical efforts that he believed were necessary to create a functioning Jewish state. The first Zionist Congress met in 1897, and over two hundred delegates from all over the world adopted the Basel Program. This stressed that Zionism sought to create a legal home in Palestine for the Jewish people and would promote settlement, create worldwide organizations to bind Jews together, strengthen Jewish national consciousness, and obtain consent of the governments of the world.

Herzl's thinking was purely secular; in fact, he was an agnostic. The majority of his followers, however, were Orthodox southeastern Europeans, and while Herzl opposed turning Zionism into a cultural, religious, or piecemeal settlement society, he did make concessions to these advocates. This fragile alliance indicates the many facets of Zionism during the twentieth century. To Herzl, the main goal of Zionism was to obtain a political charter granting Jews sovereign rights in their homeland. Shortly after this death in 1904 approximately seventy thousand Jews had settled in Palestine. A majority (at least 60 percent) lived in the cities. Zionism was metamorphosed into a mass movement and political power during World War I. In 1917 the British issued the Balfour Declaration, which bestowed favor upon the establishment in Palestine of a Jewish national home.

Zionism was a minority movement and encountered opposition even within the Jewish community. American Reform Judaism, for example, believed that Jews were not suited for the rigors of Palestine, where disease and famine were rampant. Furthermore, they claimed that Palestine was no longer a Jewish land and that the United States was "Zion." To these non-Zionist Jews, Zionism was damaging to the fabric of Judaism and only served to stir up the Russians. It was only the horror of the mass murder of a hundred thousand Jews by Russian army units from 1919 to 1921 and, ultimately, the Nazi Holocaust during World War II in which six million Jews were exterminated that drew Zionists and non-Zionists together in support of Palestine as a Jewish commonwealth—a haven for the persecuted and homeless. In November 1947 a partion plan creating a Jewish state, endorsed by both the United States and the Soviet Union, was adopted by the general Assembly of the United Nations. The State of Israel was formally recognized on May 14, 1948, when British rule ended. As the young state strengthened, the definition of Zionism and what its current goals and purpose should be have been heatedly debated within the World Zionist Organization itself. Since 1968 the emphasis of aliyah (personal migration to Israel) has been seen by many as an ultimate, yet controversial, goal.

D. A. RAUSCH

See also ZIONISM, CHRISTIAN.

Bibliography. S. Aveneri, Making of Modern Zionism; B. Avishai, Tragedy of Zionism; I. Cohen, Theodor Herzl: Founder of Political Zionism; A. Hertzberg, Zionist Idea: A Historical Analysis and Reader; J. Kornberg, Theodor Herzl: From Assimilation to Zionism; N. W. Cohen, American Jews and the Zionist Idea; G. Kressel, EJ 16:1031–1162; W. Laqueur, History of Zionism; J. Neusner, Stranger at Home: "The Holocaust," Zionism and American Judaism; C. C. O'Brien, Siege: The Saga of Israel and Zionism; O. K. Rabinowicz, Fifty Years of Zionism; R. Tekiner, S. Abel-Rabbo, and N. Mezvinsky, eds., Anti-Zionism: Analytical Reflections; D. Vital, Origins of Zionism.

Zionism, Christian. Christians have had an important part in supporting the Jewish people's restoration to "Zion." Within the millenarian tradition the conviction that the Jews would return to Palestine became an important dogma. As premillennialism gained ground during the nineteenth century, forming the core of the early fundamentalist movement, adherents not only believed that the Jewish people would return, but also vocally supported the right of the Jews to be restored to their former homeland. Even before Theodor Herzl's Der Judenstaat fundamentalist-evangelical William E. Blackstone advocated the reestablishment of a Jewish state and circulated a petition urging the United States to return the land of Palestine to the Jewish people. The Blackstone Petition of 1891 was signed by 413 outstanding Christian and Jewish leaders and through the State Department was distributed to the principal nations of the world. During World War I, Blackstone urged a new petition on Woodrow Wilson, and in 1918 he was invited to address a Zionist mass meeting in Los Angeles.

Other Christians, such as Herzl's close friend William H. Hechler, worked diligently to promote political Zionism as the ultimate solution to the Jewish question. Hechler tried to encourage heads of state (including the Turkish sultan who controlled Palestine) to support Herzl's proposals, and he accompanied Herzl to Palestine in 1898 to meet with the Kaiser. The active support of such Christian Zionists in many countries influenced political action, and even the Balfour Declaration of 1917 was the product of religious as well as political activity. Individual Christian Zionists came from a broad spectrum of theological traditions. Even liberal Protestantism, which has historically opposed Zionism, contributed clergymen through organizations such as the Christian Council of Palestine during World War II.

Nevertheless, because of their premillennial eschatology fundamentalist evangelicals have been particularly supportive of the restoration of the Jewish people to Israel and of Israel itself in the twentieth century. In his periodical Our Hope, from 1894 to 1945 Arno C. Gaebelein taught that the Jewish people would return to Palestine and that they had an inherent right to that land as well. When Israel became a state in 1948, prophetically minded Christians viewed it as a miracle of God. In the 1960s liberal Protestantism called for the "internationalization" of the city of Jerusalem, but the fundamentalist evangelical declared that the Bible gave it to the Jewish people. After the 1967 Six-Day War the National Council of Churches denounced Israel's annexation of the old city of Jerusalem. In contrast, fundamentalist evangelicals rejoiced and insisted that God had seen to it that the Jewish people had come out on top in spite of world oppression and obstacles.

On October 30, 1977, Billy Graham enhanced decades of support for Israel by addressing the National Executive Council meeting of the American Jewish committee and calling for the rededication of the United States to the existence and safety of Israel. At the Bicentennial Congress of Prophecy in Philadelphia the year before, a proclamation in support of Israel had been signed by eleven prominent fundamentalist evangelicals. It then quickly received seven thousand additional signatures and was presented to the ambassador of the State of Israel. Statements of support have also appeared in full-page newspaper advertisements—several in the New York Times.

Such unequivocal Christian Zionism has not gone without attack. It has been criticized even within evangelicalism as an erroneous political philosophy based on a spurious interpretation of the Bible which dictates that modern Palestine is the Jew's own special piece of real estate. These critics argue that Christian Zionism totally ignores the rights of the Palestinian Arab people and that the Jews forfeited their title to the Promised Land through unfaithfulness long ago.

D. A. RAUSCH

See also JOCZ, JACOB; MESSIANIC JUDAISM; ZIONISM.

Bibliography. Y. S. Ariel, American Premillennialism and Its Attitudes toward the Jewish People, Judaism and Zionism, 1875–1925; On Behalf of Israel: American Fundamentalist Attitudes toward Jews, Judaism and Zionism, 1865–1945; G. Burge, Who Are God's People in the Middle East?; C. C. Chapman, Whose Promised Land?; E. Ellisen, Who Owns the Land? The Arab-Israeli Conflict; H. Fishman, American Protestantism and a Jewish State; A. Fruchtenbaum, Hebrew Christianity: Its Theology, History and Philosophy; G. C. Oosthuizen, Birth of Christian Zionism in South Africa; W. G. Pippert, Land of Promise, Land of Strife, Israel at Forty; D. A. Rausch, Zionism within Early American Fundamentalism; J. Walvoord, Nations, Israel and the Church in Prophecy.

Zionism, Christian

Zoroastrianism. A religion that developed in Iran from about the sixth century B.C., generally ascribed to Zoroaster (Zarathustra), who was born in Iran “258 years before Alexander.” The date of Zoroaster’s birth has been given variously as 6000 B.C., 1400 B.C., and 1000 B.C., but Herzfeld accepts the traditional date, approximately, as now confirmed (Herzfeld, 570–500 B.C.; Jackson, 660–583 B.C.). Accordingly, Zoroaster was contemporary with several other great religious personages, including Buddha, Confucius, Lao Tze, and several Hebrew prophets. That Zoroaster used Vedic materials found in early Hinduism can hardly be denied; that he was a polytheist like Darius, Xerxes, and others who were probably Zoroastrians (at least, their inscriptions pay homage to Ahura Mazda) seems most likely. But Zoroaster was protesting against the false and cruel in religion, and followed the principle “If the gods do aught shameful, they are not gods.” Accordingly, he exalted Ahura Mazda (“wise Lord,” often improperly translated “Lord of light”) as supreme among the gods or spirits, and viewed the world as an age-long struggle between Ahura Mazda and Angra Mainyu (or Ahramanyuš, Ahriman, “Spirit of evil”), both of whom came into existence independently in the distant past. Zoroastrianism is therefore called a dualism—but it is a limited dualism. Zoroaster calls upon human beings to join in this conflict on the side of Ahura Mazda, the key words of such religion being “good thoughts, good works, good deeds.” The ultimate victory of Ahura Mazda, however, was not to be accomplished by human assistance but by the advent of a messiahlike figure, the Saoshyant. The duration of the struggle was to be six thousand years (three thousand had already passed when Zoroaster was born), following which was to be the resurrection and judgment. Many of the details of Zoroastrianism are later developments, some post-Christian and even post-Mohammedan, and scholars are divided on what elements are to be traced to Zoroaster’s own teaching.

Because of the fact that the revelation of the doctrines of resurrection, angels, Satan, and the Messiah comes late in the OT or even in the intertestamental period in early Judaism, scholars have frequently traced these ideas to Zoroastrian influence exerted upon the Jewish people after the Babylonian exile. Moulton examined these points in detail and concluded that they were “not proven.” The discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls has reopened the discussion, due to the presence of marked “Zoroastrian” influences in the Qumran literature. Some of the most striking parallels to Jewish-Christian eschatology can be shown to be very late developments in Zoroastrianism. On the other hand, it would not do violence to a high view of inspiration to admit that God could have used Zoroastrianism as a means of stimulating the Jewish mind to think on these subjects even as he used Hellenism to prepare the Jewish mind for the Christian revelation (witness Saul of Tarsus). The magi (“wise men”) of the birth narrative may have been Zoroastrian priests.

W. S. LASOR

Bibliography. M. Boyce, History of Zoroastrianism; “Zoroastrianism,” in Historia Religionum, C. J. Bleeker and G. Widengren, eds.; E. Herzfeld, Zoroaster and His World; A. V. W. Jackson, Jewish Encyclopedia; W. W. Malandra, ed., Introduction to Ancient Iranian Religion; R. P. Masani, Religion of the Good Life, Zoroastrianism; J. J. Modi, Religious Ceremonies and Customs of the Parsees; R. E. Waterfield, Christians in Persia; E. Yamauchi, Persia and the Bible; R. C. Zachner, Dawn and Twilight of Zoroastrianism.

Zurich Agreement (1549). The statement on the Lord’s Supper that prevented a split between Calvinists and Zwinglians in Switzerland; also called Consensus Tigurinus, after the Latin name of the city. Calvin expressed himself differently on the Lord’s Supper than Zwingli had done. Calvin spoke of a true, though only spiritual, communication of Christ in the Lord’s Supper. Heinrich Bullinger, Zwingli’s successor at Zurich, spoke of the Lord’s Supper in merely symbolic terms. After Luther renewed his attack on Zwinglianism in 1544, Calvin and Bullinger negotiated more seriously. Calvin and William Farel met with Bullinger in Zurich in 1549, and the Zurich Agreement was the result. Calvin was the main author, but Bullinger’s influence was evident throughout. In twenty-six articles the agreement presented a unified doctrine that became the basis for unity among all the Reformed in Switzerland.

The document was more Zwinglian than Calvinist in its expressions, but it affirmed the spiritual presence of Christ in the Lord’s Supper. The sacraments, it said, were not “empty symbols” but seals and attestations of grace. The Spirit was said to work independently of the eating and drinking in the Lord’s Supper, and believers were said to have communion with Christ outside of and before the use of the sacraments. The document clearly limited any divine operation to the elect.

The Zurich Agreement rejected both Lutheran and Roman Catholic views on the Lord’s Supper as well as consubstantiation. It said that Jesus’ body was confined to heaven and that a literal interpretation of "This is my body" was preposterous.

J. M. DRICKAMER

See also LORD'S SUPPER; LORD'S SUPPER, VIEWS OF.

Bibliography. W. A. Curtis, "Confessions," HERE 831–92; P. Christ, SHERK 12:536–37; J. T. McNeill, History and Character of Calvinism; T. H. L. Parker, John Calvin; P. Schaff, Creeeds of Christendom.

Zwickau Prophets. The "Zwickau prophets" were Nicholas Storch, Markus Stübner, and Thomas Drechsel, three refugees from the conventicle movement of Zwickau, who visited Wittenberg shortly after Christmas 1521. For a brief time their extravagant claims perplexed and excited the Wittenbergers. These disturbances contributed to Luther's decision to return from the Wartburg and also fixed the prophets' long-term notoriety. Storch, a weaver with impressive but informal knowledge of the Bible, acted as leader of the conventicle movement of Zwickau, along with Thomas Müntzer. Stübner had studied theology in Wittenberg. Drechsel was an unlettered weaver.

The conventicle movement had divided Zwickau into two sharply conflicting camps, with the situation degenerating on occasion into rockthrowing incidents. Lay persons from the lowerclass laborers made up the conventicles. Their main idea was the conviction that God spoke directly to people and revealed his will through visions and dreams rather than through the church or the Scriptures. Storch's party claimed to hold familiar conversations with God. As a result, they predicted that within five to seven years the Turks would invade Germany and destroy priests and all the godless. Storch saw himself at the head of a new church, designated by God to complete the reformation left unfinished by Martin Luther. Reliance on the direct voice of God led to the rejection of Scripture as authority in itself and the rejection of the sacraments as means of grace. Storch rejected infant baptism, believing that fides aliena as taught by Luther could not substitute for the absent faith of an infant, and that Mark 16:16 required baptism only after faith is engendered. However, Storch did not advocate rebaptism as did the Anabaptists.

The long-term significance of the Zwickau prophets falls into two related areas. (1) They formed part of the backdrop for some early positions of Martin Luther. Against their spiritualism Luther asserted that spirits must be tested by Scripture and that they would say nothing which contradicted the Bible. To defend infant baptism Luther not only asserted the tradition of the church, but also affirmed the presence of latent faith in infants through which they responded to the grace of baptism. (2) The Zwickau prophets have been part of the discussion of Anabaptist origins. They formed the image of Anabaptist for Luther and Melancthon, who believed that the prophets, along with Thomas Müntzer and Andreas Carlstadt, were the fathers of Anabaptism. This view of origins prevailed until the twentieth century, when Harold S. Bender made prominent the view that totally divorced Anabaptist origins from these radicals. Early modern scholarship credited Storch with causing Müntzer's break from Lutheran ideas during Müntzer's pastoral activity in Zwickau, May 1520 to April 1521. More recent work discounts Storch's influence and attributes the break to Müntzer's mysticism, his spiritualism discovering a like-minded individual in Storch. While recent scholarship on Anabaptist origins does consider some Müntzerian ideas a source of South German Anabaptism, it is true that the Zwickau prophets contributed little if anything to Anabaptism.

J. D. WEAVER

Bibliography. H. S. Bender, "Zwickau Prophets, Thomas Muentzer, and the Anabaptists," MQR 27:3–16; M. U. Edwards Jr., Luther and the False Brethren; E. Gritsch, Reformer without a Church: The Life and Thought of Thomas Muentzer; J. S. Oyer, Lutheran Reformers against Anabaptists; G. H. Williams, Radical Reformation.

Zwingli, Ulrich (1484–1531). After Luther and Calvin, the most important early Protestant reformer. Zwingli was born in Wildhaus, St. Gall, Switzerland, and showed early promise. He studied at Berne and Vienna before matriculating at the University of Basel, where he was captivated by humanistic studies. At Basel he also came under the influence of reformer Thomas Wyttenbach, who encouraged him in the directions that would eventually lead to his belief in the sole authority of Scripture and in justification by grace through faith alone. Zwingli was ordained a Catholic priest and served parishes in Glarus (1506–16) and Einsiedeln (1516–18) until called to be the people's (or preaching) priest at the Great Minster in Zurich.

Sometime around 1516, after diligent study in Erasmus's Greek NT and after long wrestling with the moral problem of sensuality, he experienced an evangelical breakthrough, much like Luther was experiencing at about the same time. This turned him even more wholeheartedly to the Scriptures, and it also made him hostile to the medieval system of penance and relics, which he attacked in 1518. One of the great moments of the Reformation occurred early in 1519 when Zwingli began his service in Zurich by announcing his intention to preach exegetical sermons beginning with the Gospel of Matthew. In the final decade of his life he shepherded Zurich to its declaration for reform (1523). He wrote numerous tracts and aided in the composition of confessions to promote the course of the Reformation (e.g., the Ten Theses of Berne, 1528); he established solid relationships with other Swiss reformers, including Oecolampadius in Basel; he inspired and then broke with the rising Anabaptist movement; and he had a momentous disagreement with Luther over the Lord's Supper (expressed most sharply at the Colloquy of Marburg in 1529). Zwingli lost his life while serving as a chaplain to Zurich troops engaged in warfare with other Swiss cantons.

Zwingli, Ulrich

Zwingli's Protestantism was a more rationalistic and biblicistic variation of Luther's theology. His discussions with German Protestants about the Lord's Supper led him to doubt Luther's belief in a sacramental real presence of Christ in Communion, and even Martin Bucer's belief in a real spiritual presence, in favor of a nearly memorialistic view. To Zwingli the Lord's Supper was primarily an occasion to remember the benefits purchased by Christ's death. In his approach to theology and practice Zwingli looked for strict and specific scriptural warrant, even though this led him into embarrassment when early Anabaptists demanded proof texts for the practice of infant baptism. Zwingli's strict adherence to the Bible caused him in 1527 to remove the organ from the Great Minster, since Scripture nowhere mandated its use in worship (and this in spite of the fact that Zwingli was an accomplished musician who otherwise encouraged musical expression). He was strongly predestinarian in his theology, but did not display the consummate sense of Scripture's thematic relationships which Calvin employed in the discussion of election. Zwingli had no qualms in seeking reform through the authority of the Zurich council. Even after his death the Zurich city government under his successor, Heinrich Bullinger, exercised a dominant role in church affairs. This model of church-state relations eventually appealed to England's Queen Elizabeth, even as Reformers Calvin and John Knox fought for the autonomy of the church over its own affairs.

Zwingli's noble character, his firm commitment to scriptural authority, and his diligent propagation of evangelical reform, even more than his writings, marked him as one of the Reformation's most appealing leaders.

M. A. NOLL

See also MARBURG COLLOQUY.

Bibliography. G. W. Bromiley, ed., Zwingli and Bullinger; O. Farner, Huldrych Zwingli; G. R. Potter, Zwingli; G. R. Potter, ed., Huldrych Zwingli; W. P. Stephens, Theology of Ulrich Zwingli; Zwingli: An Introduction to His Thought.