CURRENT RESEARCH PROJECTS

The logic of civil society in new democracies - Hungary, Poland, South Korea and Taiwan (Jan Kubik co-principal investigator in collaboration with Bela Greskovits, Sunhyuk Kim, Chinen Wu, Jason Wittenberg and Michal Wenzel).

This collaborative project is a rigorous empirical study of the civil society development and its impact on the quality of democracy and governance in newly democratized states. It focuses on civil society's structure, its activities and their evolution in four countries (Hungary, Poland, South Korea and Taiwan) and covers over a twenty-year period, since the democratic breakthrough until 2011 in each case. A uniform methodology is employed in all four countries to ensure maximum comparability of the information collected. Event analysis, the project's principal method, is explicitly designed to capture the dynamism of civil society's actions and their effects on other domains of the polity. The influence of civil society's actions on the quality of democracy is tested against competing theories that emphasize the role of economic performance, political culture, and institutional design. Our data show a striking diversity in patterns of civil society development and its impact on democracy. Interestingly, these patterns do not conform to regional boundaries.

The project started in 2004 and data collection took the extended period of time. The first workshop of project participants presenting the country studies took place at the Center for European Studies at Harvard University in June 2008, the second in 2009 in Taipei, and the final one in Seoul in 2012. In addition, to a number of papers some of which has been already accepted for publication, we plan to publish a comparative book and a monograph on Poland. There is also going to be a monograph on Korea and possible one on Taiwan. The project entered its final stage. We expect to have the draft manuscript of the comparative volume by the end of this calendar year.

Mobilized contention: the state-social movements nexus (co-organizers Elizabeth Perry and Yan Xiaojun).

This project focuses on state sponsored social movements and government organized civil society organizations in authoritarian and hybrid regimes and in particular on China and Russia. Protest movements and civil society organizations do not operate exclusively or even predominantly along the state-society divide. Not only do movements emerge to challenge other movements (in a movement-counter movement dynamic) but modern states are also busily organizing their citizens to promote specific state goals and interests. Increasingly, it seems, major protest events and sustained movement activities around the world are state initiated, state sponsored and state supported. States' roles in initiating and sustaining social movements are sometimes open and obvious, but very often they are not. Movements and civil society organizations often masquerade as genuine expression of autonomous social interests, grievances and emotions, while in fact they are being constructed and manipulated by states. The project is designed to investigate these understudied and under-theorized relations between states and protest movements and civil society organizations. The question of when, how and why the state gets involved in generating and sponsoring movements and in supporting protest activities directed against other movements and political actors both domestically and abroad, and what kinds of dilemmas these initiatives pose to both states and civil society actors are fascinating issues.

Logistically, the project will include two conferences (Hong Kong University and Harvard University) leading the edited volume by Grzegorz Ekiert, Elizabeth Perry and Yan Xiaojun. The first conference is scheduled to take place in June 2015.

Political geographies and political economies of postcommunist Europe and the problem of long run historical continuities (single author book project)

This project is designed to examine the patterns of postcommunist transformations and to evaluate scholarly debates and theories explaining trajectories of transformations developed in comparative politics and political sociology since 1989. It focuses on the role of deep historical legacies in shaping contemporary political outcomes and methodological challenges involved in studying the role of historical legacies.
