

Mental capacity: supporting decision making after brain injury

Andrew Taylor
and Richard Morris

the brain injury association

This booklet is for anyone concerned about another person's capacity to make decisions. It explains the principles of the Mental Capacity Act, which can help you to assess the person's decision making ability. Information is also provided on applying to the Court of Protection, which may be necessary in order to make decisions on their behalf.

This e-booklet is an adaptation, created in August 2016, of the Headway print booklet Mental capacity: supporting decision making after brain injury and may contain minor updates to the original version.

Introduction

Brain injury can have a significant impact on a person's ability to make decisions. In the immediate aftermath of brain injury a person may be in a coma or post-traumatic amnesia, and family members will be required to manage finances. At this stage, clinicians will need to consider treatment decisions. However, they should take into consideration the wishes of the patient and their close family.

During the recovery process, cognitive, emotional and behavioural problems can make it impossible for brain injury survivors to understand the consequences of their decisions. In some cases, the effects can leave people unable to manage their own affairs or make decisions about their welfare. These changes can be permanent, so long-term arrangements may need to be put in place to enable decisions to be made in a person's best interests.

The information in this booklet is designed to take you through the relevant issues in the order they arise. However, not all of the material will apply to your situation so you may want to look at the contents page and refer to the information relevant to you.

It is important that you receive as much support and guidance as possible and the Headway helpline can talk you through the situation, send free copies of Headway publications and refer to local Headway groups and branches. The Court of Protection enquiry line on 0300 456 4600 is also an important source of advice on many of the issues discussed. You can find more information on useful organisations and further reading in the back of the booklet and in relevant places throughout.

Section 1 Decision making after brain injury

 In the early stages after a severe brain injury people are highly unlikely to be able to make decisions for themselves and responsibility will rest with the clinical team and family. As recovery progresses, the long-term difficulties caused by the injury will become more apparent.

This section explains some of the effects brain injury can have on decision making ability at different stages of recovery.

Hospital treatment decisions

After a severe brain injury a person is likely to be unconscious and urgent treatment decisions will need to be made. Even when they regain consciousness they are likely to experience a period of post-traumatic amnesia, during which they will be unable to make sense of the situation.

Treatment decisions are the responsibility of the medical staff, unless the person has registered an advance decision regarding treatment, or they have a legally appointed representative available. The law is clear that when a person lacks capacity any decisions must be made in their best interests, respecting their values, beliefs and wishes. In order to do this, it is important that doctors discuss these matters with family members when appropriate. It is also important that family members ensure their guidance is based on a reasonable judgment of their relative's wishes, as well as their own. If there is disagreement at any stage, mediation should be provided through the Patient Advice and Liaison Service \(PALS\).

Withdrawal of treatment

Sometimes decisions may need to be made about whether to continue life-prolonging medical treatment. In such cases, the clinical team will go through a formal process, and may need to seek a court judgment. If there is a disagreement between the medical team and family members, mediation should be offered to allow everyone to express their views and, if possible, seek agreement. If not, the courts may be required to make the final judgment on whether treatment can be withdrawn.

Decisions not to pursue treatment can be very distressing. However, such decisions are not about giving up on a patient, they are about treating them respectfully as a person and ensuring they get the treatment that is right for them. Whatever decisions are made, this is an extremely difficult time for family members, who should seek support from appropriate counselling services.

Recovery and long-term difficulties

When your relative's condition has stabilised and physical injuries have been treated they will be ready for discharge from hospital. Their everyday decision making problems may become more apparent at this stage.

The cognitive, emotional and behavioural effects of brain injury can make rational decision making very difficult. Making decisions involves many different functions working together. For example, the following skills are essential:

- Short-term memory – holding information in mind and thinking things through
- Long-term memory – remembering previous choices, decisions and their outcomes
- Emotional regulation – assessing and controlling the emotional aspects of situations
- Planning and organisation – making plans and assessing their likely outcomes

If any one of these processes is affected by brain injury, then decision making abilities may be impaired.

People are affected in different ways – some find it hard to make a decision at all, finding that even seemingly simple choices, such as what to have for dinner, become almost impossible. Some people become impulsive, making hasty decisions and acting without thinking things through. This can have devastating consequences for finances, relationships, careers and any other aspects of life.

People who are experiencing difficulties with decision making after brain injury should be assessed by a neuropsychologist, who can plan rehabilitation programmes and help with compensatory strategies.

Further information on this subject can be found in several Headway publications, such as Difficulties with decision making after brain injury, Rehabilitation after brain injury, Executive dysfunction after brain injury and Memory problems after brain injury.

Example

“ My son, Adam, sustained a brain injury in a car accident and after three months in hospital recovered sufficiently to be discharged. The health and social care staff believed that he needed to be referred to a rehabilitation unit in order to continue his recovery. Unfortunately, the unit was over 50 miles from our home and we wouldn't be able to visit Adam as often as we would like. We asked if he could come home as we felt that we could provide the care he needed. Adam's short-term memory was still very poor and he was unable to make even the simplest of plans.

Obviously, we really wanted our son to make the best recovery possible and the staff made us realise that he needed rehabilitation to do this. We agreed to send him to the unit and after three months he had made sufficient progress to return home with continued out-patient support.

Key points

- In the early stages after brain injury medical staff will be responsible for treatment decisions
- Any decisions should be made in the person's best interests and should take their values, beliefs and wishes into account
- It is important that doctors discuss matters with family members when appropriate
- There should be an attempt to reach agreement between medical staff and family members when withdrawal of treatment becomes a possibility – if agreement cannot be reached then the courts may have to make the final decision
- The long-term cognitive, behavioural and emotional effects of brain injury can impair the ability to make decisions
- Neuropsychological rehabilitation can help people to overcome decision making difficulties

Section 2 Assessing capacity to make decisions

This section explains how to assess a person's capacity to make decisions, and introduces some of the key legal principles that help protect their rights and wishes.

Helping others to make their own decisions

The first step is to assess whether they have the capacity to make a decision for themselves. It is important not to assume they do not have capacity, although some cases are much clearer than others.

Before you can make decisions on behalf of someone else, you must make every reasonable effort to support them to make it themselves. This may include taking time to discuss the decision with them, and explaining the relevant circumstances and possible consequences. It may be necessary to discuss the issues on several occasions to assist them to take on board all of the relevant information.

Some people may be able to consider decisions better in the morning, or maybe later in the day. It may help the person if distractions are removed, such as turning off the television, or discussing matters in a quiet room away from other people.

Introduction to the Mental Capacity Act

The Mental Capacity Act 2005 (MCA) sets out important legal principles concerning people who lack mental capacity. It outlines how people can be helped to make decisions for themselves and sets out rules for those who take decisions on someone else's behalf. The MCA applies to decisions relating to financial affairs, property, health and personal welfare.

The five key principles of the MCA are:

- There is a presumption that a person has mental capacity unless proved otherwise
- Only after all practical steps have been taken to help a person make their own decision, should they be treated as incapable of doing so
- It should not be presumed that a person lacks mental capacity just because they make an 'unwise' decision
- Any acts carried out on someone's behalf should be done in their best interests
- Before acting for a person lacking mental capacity, consideration should be given as to the least restrictive way of achieving the desired outcome

These principles are set out in the MCA to ensure that people are involved as much as possible in decisions about their own personal affairs.

The MCA sets the following definition of when a person lacks mental capacity:

- “...a person lacks capacity in relation to a matter if at the material time he is unable to make a decision for himself in relation to the matter because of an impairment of, or a disturbance in the functioning of, the mind or brain”.

The cognitive, emotional and behavioural effects of brain injury often fit into this definition.

According to the MCA, when considering whether a person lacks mental capacity the following should apply:

- It does not matter if the mental impairment is permanent or temporary
- Age, of itself, does not establish a lack of mental capacity
- An “unjustified assumption” of a person’s condition should not, of itself, establish a lack of mental capacity
- Lack of ability to communicate, of itself, does not establish a lack of mental capacity

You can find out more about the MCA and assessing capacity in the Headway factsheet A guide to the Mental Capacity Act.

Legal framework across the United Kingdom

The Mental Capacity Act applies to England and Wales. Scotland has its own legislation called the Adults with Incapacity (Scotland) Act 2000, and you can find more information on this in the Headway factsheet A guide to the Adults with Incapacity \(Scotland\) Act. There you can find links to other useful publications, including step-by-step guides to applying to make decisions for someone else. Northern Ireland also has its own legislation called the Mental Capacity Act (Northern Ireland) 2016. The Channel Islands and the Isle of Man do not currently have specific mental capacity legislation, so issues of capacity are dealt with under common law.

If you wish to seek a ruling to manage someone else's affairs in these areas of the United Kingdom, you should seek advice from a solicitor with experience of mental capacity and brain injury issues. You can search for a brain injury specialist solicitor using the Headway Head Injury Solicitors Directory or contact the Headway helpline for more details.

Capacity for specific decisions

When considering a person's capacity, the complexity and magnitude of each decision should be assessed individually. For example, someone may be able to manage £100 in a bank account, yet require assistance dealing with £1million worth of investments. Similarly, buying a bus ticket is less complicated than buying a new house. A person may be able to buy the ticket, but they may need someone to assist them with choosing and purchasing a property.

According to the Mental Capacity Act, the criteria in all cases are whether a person is able to:

- Understand information relevant to the decision
- Retain the information long enough to make the decision
- Use or weigh up the information

- Communicate their decision by any means, even if only by simple movements, such as blinking an eye or squeezing someone's hand

Capacity can be assessed by different people depending on the decision being made and its importance. For instance, carers and relatives may be able to judge capacity relating to straightforward everyday care issues, whereas GPs, social workers, psychologists and solicitors may be involved with more complex decisions, such as setting up care plans and signing legal documents. If the person has communication difficulties then it would be useful to consult a speech and language therapist to help them convey their wishes.

Example

“ My husband, Dennis, had communication difficulties after an aneurysm. After our children moved out, the house was too big for the two of us, so we needed to move somewhere smaller. This was a huge decision and I wanted Dennis involved as much as possible.

His speech and language therapist helped me to convey all the information about our options and also helped Dennis communicate his own preferences. We eventually settled on a one bedroom bungalow perfectly suited to our needs and finances. ”

Beryl

It is important to remember that a person has a right to make an unwise, unusual or eccentric decision. Just because the decision seems wrong, that doesn't mean they lack capacity to make it. Therefore, it is important not to focus on the decision itself, but on whether they have made it according to the above criteria.

Example

“ I was furious when my dad wanted to spend a lot of his savings on a new hot tub in the garden. I felt that his brain injury had led him to make some strange decisions, and this would cause him financial problems in future. However, after speaking to dad and his GP, I realised that he fully understood the consequences of spending his savings in this way and had always wanted a hot tub. Even though I still feel the decision is unwise, I respect his right to make it. ”

June

Key points

- It is important to support people to make their own decisions as much as possible
- The Mental Capacity Act 2005 (MCA) provides a legal framework to help people who lack decision making capacity for financial affairs, property, health and welfare
- The MCA applies to England and Wales
- Scotland and Northern Ireland have their own mental capacity legislation, while in other areas of the UK capacity issues are dealt with under common law
- Capacity should be judged on the ability to understand, retain and use information relevant to a decision and ability to communicate the decision
- All reasonable attempts should be made to help the person to communicate
- When considering a person's capacity, the complexity and magnitude of each decision should be assessed individually
- Capacity can be assessed by a number of different people such as carers, GPs, neuropsychologists, social workers and solicitors, depending on the decision being made and its importance
- A person has the right to make an unwise, unusual or eccentric decision

Section 3 Preparing to make decisions on someone else's behalf

This section gives you an overview of some points to consider before you apply to make decisions on behalf of someone else. It also provides an introduction to the Court of Protection \(CoP\), which oversees most aspects of decision making for people who lack capacity.

Consider whether arrangements have already been made

The Mental Capacity Act allows people to make legal agreements called Lasting Powers of Attorney (LPA). These agreements allow people to appoint an attorney to make decisions for them if they lose capacity in the future. Under previous legislation the agreements used to be called Enduring Powers of Attorney (EPA), and any EPAs made before October 2007 can still be used. There are two different types of LPA, one for a person's property and affairs and one for a person's health and welfare. Anyone appointed under an LPA has responsibility for decisions covered in the agreement.

The Office of the Public Guardian \(OPG\) keeps a database of all Enduring or Lasting Powers of Attorney that have been registered. You should contact the OPG if you don't know whether the person you are concerned about has an LPA in place (see the 'Sources of support' section for contact details).

Decisions that do not need authority

Many everyday decisions have to be made quickly and it is simply not practical to get formal authority for them. The Mental Capacity Act provides protection for people who need to make quick decisions on someone's behalf, provided they:

- Have reasonable belief that the person lacks capacity in relation to the matter in question
- Have reasonable belief that the action is in the best interests of the person concerned

This does not exclude a person from civil liability for loss or damage, or criminal liability resulting from any negligence in performing the action. However, it is unlikely that this will happen with most common-sense decisions.

Decisions that may be made without legal authority include those concerning everyday care, such as whether a person ought to be bathed, what they will wear or what to have for dinner. Small amounts of money can also be managed without permission. Some more serious decisions can be taken when there isn't time to seek authority, such as consenting to hospital treatment or medical procedures.

You may require legal authority in order to make more complex decisions which can have a serious impact on the person's life, or which involve legal contracts. The following sections explain the processes involved.

Introduction to the Court of Protection

If the person you are concerned about lacks capacity to make decisions about their financial affairs, property, health or personal welfare, then you may need to make an application to the Court of Protection (CoP) to be able to intervene. It is important to have a clear idea of the decisions that need to be made.

The CoP specialises in all issues relating to lack of capacity and it can decide whether or not someone lacks capacity to make a decision for themselves. It has the power to make decisions for them, or can authorise someone else to do so.

The Senior Judge is based in London and there are specially trained judges in key locations around England and Wales. This means that hearings can be held in most regions. The CoP is intended to be accessible and maintains an informal style for hearings. In practise, hearings are often unnecessary anyway, and rulings can usually be made based on the application forms.

The CoP may appoint a deputy if a series of linked decisions is required. However, if the matter relates to a single issue then a judge will usually take the decision. In personal welfare matters, the CoP is reluctant to appoint a deputy and will usually prefer to make a single decision itself.

Key points

- Lasting Power of Attorney agreements allow people to appoint an attorney to make decisions for them in the future
- You can check with the Office of the Public Guardian to see whether the person you are concerned about has made a Lasting Power of Attorney
- The Mental Capacity Act allows most everyday, common-sense decisions to be made without having to seek legal authority
- If complex decisions are required regarding financial affairs, property, health or personal welfare then an application may need to be made to the Court of Protection
- The Court of Protection can make a single decision on someone's behalf or appoint a deputy if a series of linked decisions is required

Section 4 The duties and responsibilities of decision makers

As a family member or carer, the Court of Protection (CoP) may appoint you as a deputy. This will allow you to make a series of linked decisions on behalf of your relative, usually in relation to their financial affairs and/or property, without applying to the Court each time. Alternatively, you may want to take payment of someone else's welfare benefits, in which case it is possible to become their appointee.

Becoming a deputy or appointee is a lot of responsibility and there are rules which must be followed in order to respect the rights of people who lack capacity. This section provides an overview of these duties and responsibilities.

What is a deputy?

The Court can appoint two different types of deputy:

- One for financial affairs and property
- One for health and personal welfare

A deputy has a responsibility to make decisions in the best interests of the person who lacks capacity and is usually a close relative or friend of the person with a brain injury. In some cases a professional, such as a solicitor or accountant, can be appointed. The CoP can appoint a 'panel deputy' to act on a person's behalf if nobody else is willing or able to take on the role. A deputy must be over the age of 18.

It is worth noting that, while most applications to be a financial affairs and property deputy are successful, the success rate for welfare deputy applications is very low. In many cases where a welfare deputy application is made, the CoP may only make a single decision, or they may refuse the application altogether.

The role of a deputy

The deputy should give careful consideration to the wording in the order made by the CoP. This is a document which bears the Court's seal (an impressed stamp in one corner) and the deputy's power and authority is limited to that set out in the order.

A deputy is required to:

- Only make decisions that are allowed within the Court order
- Abide by the principles of the Mental Capacity Act
- Make decisions only in the best interests of the person
- Ensure a high standard of care when making decisions

Before making any decision, the deputy should consider whether the person would be able to make it themselves. They should ensure the person they are acting for is allowed, encouraged and assisted to make their own decisions whenever they are able to do so. The important thing to remember is to follow the five key principles set out earlier in 'Introduction to the Mental Capacity Act'.

A deputy should not make a decision for someone when:

- They believe the person can make it themselves
- It will physically restrain the person, unless it is for their own safety
- It goes against a decision made under a Lasting Power of Attorney
- It concerns withdrawing life-prolonging treatment, such as ventilation and artificial nutrition

There are also some things that a deputy should never do when acting on behalf of someone. These include:

- Making or amending the person's will
- Making large gifts from the person's money or property, although some small gifts may be permitted
- Holding money or property on behalf of the person

A financial affairs and property deputy will be required to keep records, receipts and statements of financial transactions. A deputy may also be required to report annually to the Office of the Public Guardian \(OPG\) on how they have allowed, encouraged and assisted the person to make their own decisions, and the people with whom they have consulted (for more information on the OPG see 'Sources of support').

The duty to act in another's best interests

Every decision a deputy makes, from simple choices about what to wear and when to wash, to major financial, welfare or property decisions, must be done in the best interests of the person they are acting for.

The Mental Capacity Act sets out a checklist to be used when determining what is in a person's best interests. As far as possible, the decision maker should consider:

- The person's past and present wishes and feelings (including any written statement made when he/she had capacity)
- The beliefs and values that the person would be likely to have if they had capacity
- Factors the person would consider if able to do so
- The views of other interested parties, such as close family members and friends

Example

“ After sustaining a severe brain injury in a traffic collision, my son, Paul, lacks capacity to make any decisions regarding money. Paul received a significant amount of compensation for his injuries and I was appointed as his deputy to invest the money.

Paul has very strong ethical views and has always been a passionate supporter of animal rights charities, so I put some of the money into a current account and set up direct debits to several of Paul's favourite organisations. Personally, I would rather invest as much of the money as possible into a high interest savings account, but I know that it is very important to consider Paul's beliefs and values. ”

Eric

Appointees

If a person receives income from welfare benefits and/or a state pension, and they haven't appointed an attorney under an LPA or EPA, you may be able to make an application to become their appointee. Being an appointee means that you:

- Sign the claim forms
- Are responsible for telling the benefits office of any changes which may affect the amount of benefit the person receives
- Are required to claim any benefits to which the person may be entitled
- Must spend the benefit in the best interests of the person – although paid to you, the benefit is not yours to spend on yourself
- Can be responsible for any overpayments, if you knowingly provide wrong information

Becoming an appointee can be a simpler and faster process than becoming a deputy. However, if the person claims benefits that are paid by different government departments, separate applications may need to be made for each.

Appointee applications should be made to the office listed on the benefits award letter.

Example

“ When my father had a stroke, he was no longer able to manage his finances. Dad’s income came mainly from his state pension, so I was able to apply to become an appointee.

I contacted the local Pensions Service, which pays dad’s pension, and after a face-to-face interview they agreed to allow me to manage this income. I am now able to pay dad’s rent and household bills.

Virender

Key points

- A deputy must be over 18 years old and is usually a relative or close friend of the person who lacks capacity
- The Court of Protection can appoint two different types of deputy, one for financial affairs and property or one for health and personal welfare
- Professionals such as solicitors or accountants can be appointed as deputies
- Deputies are required to abide by the wording of the Court order and by the key principles of the Mental Capacity Act
- It is of particular importance for deputies to act in the person's best interests, taking into account their views, beliefs, values and wishes as well as the views of other relevant people
- If the person's main income is from welfare benefits and/or a state pension then it is possible to receive the money for them as their appointee

Section 5 Becoming a deputy

Once you have decided which decisions need to be made, and whether you would like to become a deputy or ask for a single decision to be considered, you will need to make an application to the Court of Protection \(CoP\). It is advisable to engage a solicitor specialising in CoP matters to carry out the necessary legal steps. This is particularly important if your application is for complex powers or if there are likely to be objections from other parties. You can search for solicitors advising on CoP issues on the Headway website. However, using a solicitor is not essential and you can make the application yourself.

This section goes through the application process, including a guide to standard, urgent and fast-track applications. It also gives you some useful guidance on seeking support while waiting for an application to be processed, before telling you what to do if you disagree with a CoP ruling.

Making the application

If the issue relates to the person's health and welfare then you will need permission from the CoP before you make the application. You will not usually need permission if the issue relates to property and financial affairs. If you are in any doubt whether you need permission, you should contact the CoP enquiries line to discuss the situation.

When you are ready, you can find the appropriate application packs on the government website. These include both application and permission forms. Alternatively, you can contact the CoP directly.

The forms should be completed to specify the decision or decisions that need to be made and to outline the circumstances. If you would like to become a deputy and make a series of linked decisions, you should fill in the Deputy's declaration form. Applications should be accompanied by medical evidence from a doctor confirming the person's lack of mental capacity.

The application will incur a fee, which at time of writing is £400. This can be waived or reduced if a person is on a low income and the appropriate form is submitted with proof.

You will be required to notify all interested parties about the application, in case they wish to object. The CoP will usually only intervene after the appropriate people have had an opportunity to raise any objections, usually allowing three weeks after the last person has been notified.

Urgent applications

The CoP recognises that in some cases a decision needs to be made quickly and has put procedures in place to allow this. An urgent application can be made to the CoP when a person is at risk of serious loss or harm and a decision needs to be made within 24 hours.

Examples include:

- Applications about urgent medical treatment

- Applications to prevent someone being removed from the place where they live
- Applications to execute a statutory will or financial transaction if the person's life expectancy is very short

To make an urgent application, you should contact the CoP and ask to speak to the Urgent Business Officer.

Fast-track applications

The CoP may agree to fast-track an application in certain circumstances, when a decision is required quickly but doesn't qualify as an urgent application.

Examples may include:

- Property sale or purchase where there's an immediate risk that a buyer might be lost
- Investment of money when there is a deadline approaching
- Release of funds to pay for care or treatment
- Release of funds to pay for household maintenance

Existing applications may be fast-tracked if an important issue arises. In all cases, enquiries regarding fast-track applications should be directed to the Fast-track Business Officer at the CoP.

Waiting for an application to be processed

Waiting for an application to the CoP to be processed and approved can be very difficult and frustrating. At the time of writing, the waiting period for a standard application is typically around 14–18 weeks. Among the main practical issues to consider during this time are the finances, health and welfare of all concerned.

Finances

If the person with the injury is a key wage earner for the family, then loss or reduction of their salary can make life difficult financially. Therefore, it is very important for other family members to have access to essential finances.

Sadly, during the waiting period, financial institutions such as banks, insurance firms and mortgage providers may refuse to speak to anyone other than the account holder, so you will not be able to discuss anything that is in the sole name of the person with a brain injury.

It is important for family members to seek advice as soon as possible to avoid further financial difficulties in the future. Services such as the Citizens Advice and Civil Legal Advice may be able to help you contact financial institutions and signpost you to other sources of independent financial advice. They can also discuss any welfare benefits that may be available (see 'Sources of support' for contact details).

Example

“ My husband, Alan, has just begun to emerge from a coma after sustaining a brain injury. The doctors say that his injury is severe, and it will take many months of rehabilitation before he can return home. I was unable to pay the household bills and manage his bank accounts, as everything is in his name.

I applied to the Court of Protection to become a deputy in order to manage all of Alan's finances. I contacted the Citizens Advice straight after sending off the CoP application. They helped me to work through the family budget, which eased the pressure while I waited for the application to be processed.

Karen

Health and welfare

In the early stages after a moderate or severe brain injury, medical staff will help you to make the majority of decisions regarding health and welfare. However, when the person has returned home there may be decisions that will need to be made for them.

You may need to make some everyday decisions without any formal authority, and the law provides protection as long as they are made in the best interests of the person. You can seek further advice by speaking to the person's GP or social worker, who will be key sources of support.

It is also important to remember your own welfare. Headway's booklet Caring for someone with a brain injury provides a guide to the practical and emotional issues faced by family members and carers. Further information is available on the Headway website.

The Headway helpline can send out free copies of printed booklets, provide emotional support and signpost to local Headway services. Headway's groups and branches can also be a valuable source of support and information.

Appealing against Court of Protection rulings

If you disagree with the CoP's ruling, you can ask for a review at no extra cost within 21 days (although in some instances the judge may specify a different time limit). If the time limit for a review has passed, it will be necessary to make a new application.

After you've been appointed

As a deputy, you will be supervised by the Office of the Public Guardian (OPG) which is responsible for helping you carry out your duties and making sure you comply with the Mental Capacity Act.

Once appointed you will be sent a court order telling you what you can and can't do as a deputy. You can start acting on behalf of the person:

- As soon as you're appointed if you're a health and welfare deputy.

- When you pay a 'security bond' – a type of insurance to protect the person's money - if you're a property and financial affairs deputy. You'll get a letter from the court with details of how to do this. The bond is paid to a bond provider and the amount is decided by the CoP.

You will need to check the court order to make sure it is entirely accurate as this is a legally binding document. If there are any mistakes then inform the OPG as soon as possible.

You will also get official copies of the court order to send to banks and other institutions you need to deal with. These prove you're acting on behalf of the other person. It is important to ask for any official copies you send out to be returned, although you can order extra copies by writing to the CoP.

How you'll be supervised

When you're appointed as a deputy you'll be assessed by the OPG to decide the supervision and support you need. As a new deputy you will need to pay a £100 assessment fee.

You will be assigned to an OPG case manager who specialises in one of the different deputy types: lay deputies, professional and panel deputies, local authorities or health and welfare deputies. If you are a lay deputy or a professional who has not previously handled a deputyship, the OPG will contact you within the first few weeks to set up a telephone discussion with your case manager.

The purpose of this conversation is to ensure you are clear about your role and responsibilities, and the scope of the powers you have been given. It will also cover the OPG's responsibility to the Court to supervise and support you in a proportionate way, and what that means in terms of periodic contact.

The case manager will explain the need to pay a general supervision fee, currently £320 a year. This expense is met from the money of the person you are protecting and is payable at the end of the financial year.

Supervision visits

Following the initial telephone call, the case manager will decide whether you would benefit from a face-to-face visit. The purpose is to support you and ensure you are comfortable with your role.

The OPG has a dedicated team who deal with all requests for visits to deputies. A visit may be required for a number of reasons:

- To ensure you understand your duties
- To ensure you have the right level of support from OPG
- To ensure you are carrying out your duties in the best interests of the person
- If you are under investigation because of a complaint

If a visit is required then a Court of Protection visitor will be sent. The OPG will arrange for a CoP visitor to contact you to arrange the visit and explain the reason. Alternatively, a telephone call may suffice to cover the issues at hand. The amount of visits or calls required varies between individuals. In the first year of your deputyship it is likely that you will need at least one or two supervisory sessions. Some people may require very little supervision after this, while others need regular ongoing visits. You can request a visit or call if you need help. This can be done by contacting the OPG who will then decide if they need to call on a CoP visitor.

Annual reports

You'll need to write an annual report for the OPG explaining the decisions you've made as a deputy. The report should include:

- The reasons for your decisions and why they were in the best interests of the person
- Who else you spoke to and what they said was in the person's best interests
- How you resolved any differences between what you and other people thought

As a property and financial affairs deputy, you must fill in details of how you've managed the person's money in your annual report. You are required to keep copies of any bank statements, receipts, contracts, letters or emails relating to your deputyship duties.

Major decisions

You must tell the OPG if you're planning to make an important decision such as selling the property of the person you're deputy for.

- Contact the OPG for further information about supervision and your requirements as a deputy. See 'Sources of support' for contact details.

Changing circumstances

In some circumstances it may be appropriate to ask the CoP to reconsider a matter at a later date. For example, the passing of 12 months may allow a person time to demonstrate how well they can manage their finances themselves. Their ability to make their own decisions may have improved after the initial effects of the injury have passed, or they have stabilised on a particular course of medication.

If you no longer feel that the person requires a deputy then it is advisable to contact the CoP. You will then need to send in the appropriate forms and up-to-date medical evidence so the Court can assess the person's ability to make their own decisions.

If the person's ability to make decisions has deteriorated, or you feel you need authority to make new decisions on their behalf, you will need to make another application to the CoP.

Key points

- You will need to decide whether you would like to become a deputy, or if you would like the CoP to make a single decision
- It is advisable to consult a solicitor about making the application
- The appropriate forms need to be sent to the CoP along with medical evidence
- In some cases it is possible to speed up the process by making urgent or fast-track applications
- Applications can take 14-18 weeks to process, during which time intermediate arrangements will need to be considered for financial and welfare issues
- It is very important to consider your own welfare and seek appropriate support
- You can appeal against a CoP ruling, at no extra cost, within 21 days of the judgement
- Circumstances often change and if a deputy is no longer needed it will be necessary to inform the CoP
- Once appointed you will be supervised by the OPG
- You will be required to pay a supervision fee and provide annual reports explaining the decisions you have made

Section 6 Protecting people's welfare

This section covers the important steps that need to be taken to protect the welfare of someone who lacks capacity. This includes an introduction to the Mental Health Act, which allows people to be detained for treatment if their behaviour is putting themselves or other people at risk.

Challenging the decision of a deputy or attorney

Sometimes there may be serious concerns of abuse or ill-treatment by deputies or attorneys, while at other times there may be less serious, but very genuine, worries. In order to protect the interests of potentially vulnerable people, the Mental Capacity Act allows for decisions made by deputies or attorneys to be challenged and reviewed.

If there are concerns about a decision the following options should be considered:

Discuss your concerns with the decision maker

In some circumstances it may be appropriate to firstly approach the deputy or attorney to discuss the concerns. They may reconsider their decision in light of what is said.

Contact the Office of the Public Guardian (OPG)

If you are concerned about the actions of a deputy or attorney, you can telephone the OPG to report your concerns on 0300 456 0300. The OPG can investigate the matter and can also refer concerns to other relevant agencies. They can also make an application to the Court of Protection if required.

Make a new application to the Court of Protection (CoP)

Ultimately, it may be necessary to make a new application to the CoP in order to challenge a decision made by a deputy. The application may ask the CoP to make a decision about:

- Whether the person has the mental capacity to make their own decision
- What decision should be made in the person's best interests and what is the least restrictive option for them
- Whether the attorney or deputy is an appropriate person to continue to make decisions
- Whether a new or replacement deputy should be appointed and, if so, the extent of their powers

See Section 5 for more information on making an application to the CoP.

Reporting concerns about a person's welfare

When there are concerns about a person's welfare, the following agencies should be contacted:

- The Office of the Public Guardian (OPG) – you can report suspicions of fraud or abuse by a deputy or attorney
- The local police – if there is a suspicion that someone has committed, or is about to commit, a crime against a vulnerable person, such as theft or physical assault
- The local authority's Social Services Department or adult safeguarding team – if there are concerns about a person being abused, at risk of abuse, or if you wish to complain about a social worker

- The local authority or the Care Quality Commission (CQC) – when there are concerns about the standard of care in a care home, or about the care provided in a person’s home
- Patient Advice and Liaison Service (PALS) – when there are concerns about the care or treatment given to a person by an NHS service

Treatment under the Mental Health Act

Behavioural problems and lack of self-awareness are common after brain injury. This can sometimes lead to behaviour which puts the brain injured person and/or others at significant risk. The Mental Health Act 2007 (MHA) stipulates how a person could be detained against their wishes for assessment and treatment. The person has to be shown to have some kind of “mental disorder”, including behavioural problems caused by brain injury, and for it to be severe enough to warrant detention for an assessment.

Detention under the MHA must be in “the interests of the person’s health, safety or the protection of others”. It also has to be shown that the person would not willingly accept treatment, which sometimes happens after brain injury if the person doesn’t understand that there is any problem.

It is worth noting that drug or alcohol dependence are not in themselves grounds for detention under the MHA.

If you have serious concerns about the behaviour of a person with brain injury, you should contact your GP or local social services. If they agree with your concerns, they may refer the person for assessment by a psychiatrist.

People who are detained under the Mental Health Act have a right to appeal against their detention. An appeal will be heard by a judge in the presence of an independent panel, usually consisting of a doctor from outside the service and a lay person.

Example

“ I couldn't cope when David had a manic episode after his brain injury. He stopped sleeping and eating. He was overly talkative and his speech would go off at a tangent. He felt that he was very rich, began spending excessively on credit cards and became increasingly irritable with me if I spoke to him about the money situation. As his condition deteriorated he started to neglect his personal hygiene and became physically violent with me.

In desperation I spoke to David's GP. He agreed David's behaviour was putting us both at risk and referred him to a psychiatrist for assessment. Following this, he was placed in hospital under the Mental Health Act and is receiving treatment. ”

Deprivation of Liberty Safeguards (DOLS)

The Mental Health Act added safeguards to the Mental Capacity Act to ensure that the deprivation of a person's liberty should not happen unless absolutely necessary and in the best interests of the person concerned.

The following safeguards create a process to be followed whenever it is thought necessary to restrain or restrict a person living in a hospital or care home:

- The deprivation of liberty must be formally authorised - this is the responsibility of either the NHS hospital or the registered care home
- The application should be submitted to a supervisory body for approval, usually the Clinical Commissioning Group (CCG) or local authority
- The process can only be applied to someone who is incapable of making a decision about the arrangements made for their care and/or treatment
- After an independent assessment, the deprivation must be considered to be in the person's best interests and necessary to protect them from harm
- All minimally restrictive means of meeting the person's best interests must be considered

If it is felt that a deprivation of liberty is inappropriate, or the deprivation has not been properly authorised, the matter should be discussed with the relevant supervisory body. When agreement cannot be reached, an application to the Court of Protection may be needed in order for the matter to be reviewed by a judge.

Advocacy services

In most situations, people who lack capacity will have some support from family members and friends. However, for circumstances where people do not have anyone appropriate to help them, the Mental Capacity Act created a national system of Independent Mental Capacity Advocates \(IMCAs\). If you do not feel that you are being treated as an appropriate person then you can ask for an IMCA to be appointed.

IMCAs are trained professionals appointed in hospitals and communities to represent the rights of people who have no one else to speak up for them. The system is designed to provide extra safeguards for particularly vulnerable people in specific situations. This may be particularly relevant to medical treatment or long-stay accommodation decisions.

The responsibilities of IMCAs are to:

- Represent and support the person who lacks capacity
- Make representations about the person's wishes, feelings, beliefs and values
- Bring all relevant factors to the attention of decision makers
- Challenge decision makers if necessary

Local authorities and NHS bodies are under a duty to provide this service where necessary. If you know of someone who may require an IMCA but has not had one made available, you should contact their hospital, Social Services or the IMCA service provider in your area (see 'Sources of support').

IMCAs are not available to people detained under the Mental Health Act. However, some people – referred to as 'qualifying patients' – are entitled to help from Independent Mental Health Advocates (IMHAs). Qualifying patients include those detained under the Mental Health Act for longer than 72 hours and people living in the community under Mental Health Act guardianship. Others receiving treatment in hospital may be entitled to IMHA support if the hospital is proposing certain treatments under the Mental Health Act, such as neurosurgery. IMHAs should be made available by the hospital to anyone who qualifies.

For further details on locating IMCAs, IMHAs and other advocacy services, see 'Sources of support'.

Example

“ I nursed Alena in a care home after she sustained a severe brain injury. She insisted on being sent home with social services providing care, but they disagreed with her decision and refused to co-operate. She had no family or friends to help her.

An IMCA was appointed to represent Alena and investigate her options. As there was a capacity issue, the IMCA suggested that an application be made to the Court of Protection so they could consider her decision and assess whether she had the capacity to make it. The IMCA sought Alena's views and communicated these to the Court of Protection. ”

Key points

- The Mental Capacity Act includes safeguards to protect vulnerable people
- It is possible to challenge decisions made by deputies or attorneys by discussing concerns with the decision maker, reporting the issue to the OPG or making a new application to the CoP
- Concerns about welfare should be reported to the OPG or any other relevant authorities, such as PALS, the CQC, or even the police
- The Mental Health Act 2007 (MHA) allows people to be detained against their wishes for assessment and treatment if their behaviour is a danger to the health and safety of themselves or others
- Deprivation of Liberty Safeguards (DOLS) ensure that the deprivation of a person's liberty should not happen unless absolutely necessary and in the best interests of the person concerned
- Independent Mental Capacity Advocates (IMCAs) and Independent Mental Health Advocates (IMHAs) are available for people who need representation and support beyond that available from other professionals, friends and family

Summary

It is common for people to have difficulty making decisions after brain injury. This can place enormous pressure on families, who are required to manage financial and property affairs and to ensure that welfare decisions are made in the best interests of their relative.

You can make simple, everyday decisions without applying to the Court of Protection. However, when complex decisions are needed for financial affairs, property, health and personal welfare, an application may be required. It is important to keep in mind that all decisions must be made in the best interests of the person with a brain injury, and their values and wishes should be considered as much as possible.

The Court of Protection enquiries line can be a good source of support when making an application, as they can guide you to the correct forms and answer any queries you may have. They can also provide information about your role as a deputy. The Office of the Public Guardian is in charge of supervising deputies and is there to support you after you are appointed. You can find details of these and other useful organisations in the 'Sources of support' section.

Although the laws might appear complex, they are there to protect vulnerable people. With a clear idea of the decisions required and an understanding of the process, it is possible to support someone's decision making, while preserving their freedom and individuality.

Sources of support

There are a number of organisations that are directly responsible for the welfare of people who lack capacity to make their own decisions. This section provides further details of some of the most important organisations and services. It also gives details of other useful organisations that can provide support to people who lack capacity, as well as their family and carers.

● The Court of Protection

Tel: 0300 456 4600

Email: courtofprotectionenquiries@hmcts.gsi.gov.uk

Web: www.gov.uk/court-of-protection

The Court of Protection (CoP) is a court specialising in all issues relating to lack of capacity. For a detailed explanation of the role of the CoP, see Sections 3, 4 and 5 of this booklet.

● Office of the Public Guardian

Tel: 0300 456 0300

Email: customerservices@publicguardian.gsi.gov.uk

Web: www.gov.uk/government/organisations/office-of-the-public-guardian

The Office of the Public Guardian (OPG) protects people who lack mental capacity to make decisions for themselves.

The role of the OPG is to:

- Support the Public Guardian in the registration of Enduring Powers of Attorney (EPA) and Lasting Powers of Attorney (LPA)

- Supervise deputies and attorneys, helping them to carry out their duties
- Work with other organisations to ensure that allegations of abuse are fully investigated and acted upon
- Take responsibility for mental capacity policy, providing guidance to the public as well as legal and health professionals

The UK Government website is now the main host of information relating to the MCA, deputies, guardians, LPAs and EPAs. In addition to the links provided above you may find the following particularly useful: www.gov.uk/become-deputy/overview

Advocacy

The following organisations are responsible for providing many IMCA and IMHA services in England. Each operates in different areas of the country. You will need to visit their websites or contact them to find out about services in your region.

Mental capacity: supporting decision making after brain injury

Andrew Taylor and Richard Morris

This booklet is for anyone concerned about another person's capacity to make decisions. It explains the principles of the Mental Capacity Act, which can help you to assess the person's decision making ability. Information is also provided on applying to the Court of Protection, which may be necessary in order to make decisions on their behalf. This should always be done in the person's best interests, in order to protect their financial and personal welfare, while also preserving their freedom and individuality.
