The team at NKPR is still catching its breath.

While the days surrounding the Toronto International Film Festival are always busy for the public relations firm, this year was extraordinary. For seven years, Natasha Koifman, NKPR president, and her team have drawn A-list celebrities to the It Lounge, a gifting suite in their offices. This year, the firm transformed the space into a portrait studio from September 6 to 9.

And they got Patrick.

Famed fashion photographer Patrick Demarchelier adopted the studio as his own for a day. His never-before-seen photos appear first in this special issue (Pages 4 and 5).

And while Demarchelier, 69, is most famous for his work in Vogue, his ability to put people at ease makes him a favourite with those whose portrait he takes.

"I think I now know his secret," says Koifman. "He doesn't give you the chance to think or pose, before you know it, he's captured the inner you." He was a gentleman, whether shooting supermodel Yasmin Warsame (cover) "or a regular person like me," says Koifman (portrait, right).

Each day, the studio featured a new photographer. Norman Wong shot singer Fefe Dobson and Breakfast Television's Dina Pugliese in a space styled by Stephanie Mark of The Coveteur. "Patrick's work literally got me into fashion photography," Wong says. "Only briefly watching him work honestly fulfilled my boyhood fantasies of working in this crazy little industry."

Musicians Sarah Slean and Royal Wood posed for Dustin Rabin, whom Paul McCartney chose to photograph a portion of his 2011 tour. Caitlin Cronenberg captured actors Famke Janssen and Mads Mikkelsen in images reminiscent of old movie stills.

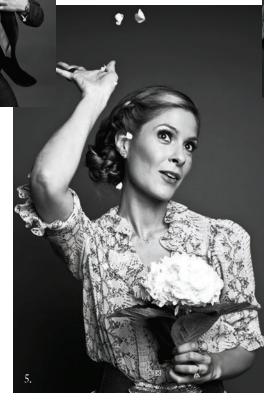

Among the many visitors to the lounge were Gabriel Macht, who traded his Suits suit for a V-neck sweater at the RW&Co. pop-up shop; Daniel Radcliffe of Harry Potter, who posed for snapshots with fans; and Judy Greer, who fell in love with an art-deco inspired necklace from Lia Sophia.

That weekend, the group put the power of their celebrity to good use. A brunch hosted by Oscar-winning director Paul Haggis and actors Jude Law and Trudie Styler raised more than $550,000 for non-profit Artists for Peace and Justice. Elton John took the stage at Fashion Cares, helping the event raise money for the Elton John AIDS Foundation and AIDS Committee of Toronto.

"Cause is an integral part of why we do what we do," says Koifman, who also launched Kandy with a K this year, NKPR's 10th in business. "Kandy with a K connects our love of candy with our love of cause. Between APJ, ACT and Camp Oochigeas, it's these causes that truly inspire us to do what we do every day."

Tracy Briggs's party-planner wardrobe takes her from day to après-five. stefania yarhi

When your job is to coordinate events for the Canadian Opera Company, fashion and fantasy become your everyday. Needless to say: Tracy Briggs is the life of the party. And she always looks great at work and at play.

Working in events means transitioning from professional to glam party in mere minutes. This is Briggs' staple look: a dress that can take her from day-to-night. Briggs has mastered the change-up by swapping flats for heels then adding a statement necklace and stand-out lipcolour.

Having to dress for a ball is another story; "I occasionally rent my dresses to ensure I have something new and bold for every event."

This year's Operanation, the opera company's largest annual fundraiser, is inspired by Die Fledermaus and as Briggs tells us, "It's a big splashy champagne ball that has a hint of masquerade." With a theme like Sweet Revenge, it is definitely an opportunity to dress up. "Wear a gown, a really nice suit and get comfortable in the crowd of glamour."

The theatrics: That's what theopera is all about, isn't it? "Fashion is a huge integral part of opera," says Briggs. From the costumes on stage to the audience turned out for a night out. Briggs work-to-play style reflects her love of the job—even after the fat lady sings!
